GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope. He said: Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to lead off the debate on second reading of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

A new bill was required because parliamentary practice would not permit us to make the clarifications which we desire to the former bill, Bill C-105.

Bill C-113 seeks to implement a number of expenditure restraint measures which I announced in the economic and fiscal statement tabled in the House last December and supersedes Bill C-105 through the clarification of provisions in respect essentially of changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

These measures are essential in our work to contain the deficit and to maintain an environment that supports economic growth and increased employment. These are the goals, very specifically of this government, jobs and growth.

These are the goals and objectives that underlie the philosophy of this government. These are the goals of the policies and programs that we have brought forward to the House of Commons for the Canadian people that underlie the basic thrust of our government's initiative.

Before I describe these measures, I want to note some very encouraging signs that are appearing that give us clear hope for a durable and sustained recovery.

Just this morning we were given by Statistics Canada the latest Canada merchandise trade figures for 1992 and, as my hon. Liberal colleague across the way just indicated, they are very impressive figures indeed.

Exports have reached a record high annual level of $157.5 billion. This was an 11 per cent increase over 1991 and the largest year over year increase since 1984.

Our exports to the United States reached a record high level of $122.3 billion, $14.7 billion more than in 1991, and about $20 billion more than in 1988, the year prior to the free trade agreement.

Canada's merchandise trade balance with the United States reached $17.7 billion, the highest since 1985 and $3.9 billion higher than 1988.

That clearly means that the policies we have been following are indeed working. The policies of restructuring, the policies of enhanced productivity, the policies of the GST which have made Canadian exporters, particularly manufacturers, more competitive, the policies of tax reform, the policies of expenditure restraint, the budgetary measures, the measures that we took in terms of improving the capital cost allowance for the manufacturing and processing sector, all of these things are starting to take hold.

What is more is that on February 16 we had the latest monthly survey of manufacturing statistics. Here again is some good news for my hon. friend from across the way. Shipments experienced a strong recovery in the second half of 1992, increasing at an annual rate of 17.2 per cent since July. This really means that some of the things that we incorporated in the budget of February 1992 are starting to take hold. The fundamental philosophy of this government is indeed working, preparing Canadians to take advantage of a globalized economy and to take advantage of the competitiveness out there and meeting that competitiveness.

It should come as no surprise to my friends across the way that employment too has improved. Employment has risen in eight of the last nine months with full-time employment up 35,000 in January, bringing the cumulative gain since August to 161,000. That is clear progress.

I know my hon. friends across the way do not like good news. They are the preachers and they are the advocates of gloom and doom. There is some good news. It is not a tribute to them, but it is a tribute to the Canadian people, to small business and to the entrepreneurs. They are taking advantage of the kinds of policies that they know are needed in order to improve their competitiveness and to compete in a global economy.

The government's efforts to bring down inflation have too borne fruit. The inflation rate for 1992 was 1.5 per cent, the lowest in 30 years. That has an impact upon prices. It has an impact upon unit cost. It has an impact upon interest rates, all in a very positive way. As a result, interest rates have come down significantly. Today's 6.75 per cent prime rate is 300 basis points lower than its November peak.

As I indicated, labour productivity has grown strongly at 2.6 per cent for the first three quarters of 1992.

With housing starts, and again responding to a number of the initiatives that we took with respect to the housing industry, the fact is that housing is now made more affordable thanks to low inflation, thanks to low interest rates and thanks to some initiatives that the government took in the February budget such as the RRSP proposal. Yes, it is something that my friends across the way did agree with.

Mr. Milliken: We suggested it.

Mr. Mazankowski: They did not suggest it. The home builders suggested it. Let us give credit where credit is due. The reduction in the level of the down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, all of these things have had a very positive effect upon the housing industry. We have seen housing starts up by 7.7 per cent, according to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in 1992. There is optimism for a 5 per cent to 6 per cent increase in 1993.

Our gross domestic product is the over-all gauge of where we are going in terms of economic growth. We have had seven consecutive quarters of growth in Canada. Contrast that with the United Kingdom. It has had nine consecutive quarters of negative growth. Germany now has had two consecutive quarters of negative growth and it is expecting to have negative growth in 1993. Japan has had a quarter of negative growth.

Around us we are not experiencing that robust recovery and that too has an effect upon Canada because we are a trading nation.

• (1020)

We rely upon trade for one-third of our gross domestic product. When the world economic situation is in a slow-down, then obviously Canada experiences that. Notwithstanding that, we are making progress.

All these factors have underpinned a modest but steady growth in GDP as I have indicated. We have been experiencing this modest steady growth notwithstanding the fact that there has been a stubborn global recession.

Economic activity in the major industrialized countries world-wide has been held back by corporate restructuring, by trade uncertainties and by huge levels of debt overhang. These are facts of life. The weaker than expected economic growth we have seen in this country has meant that government revenues are less than we expected.

Mr. Milliken: In spite of the 32 tax increases.

Mr. Mazankowski: I know my friends across the way are going to be fully supportive of the Clinton measures which amount to the biggest tax grab in American history. It will be rather interesting to see how they respond to that.

Mr. Milliken: The Prime Minister said they are following your policies.

Mr. Mazankowski: Just for the record, I did not increase taxes in the December statement. I did not increase taxes in the February budget. As a matter of fact, we reduced taxes and that irritates the hon. member across the way. He does not like anything that is good. He does not like anything that is positive. He is just so negative.

Government revenues have been a problem and I alluded to that in the economic statement. That is why we are dealing with this bill today. This has led to severe upward pressure on the deficit. As a consequence, we have to take strong measures to keep our fiscal situation under control.

We know and even my friends across the way are starting to learn that sound fiscal policies are essential if we are to maintain economic growth that secures existing jobs and creates new ones.

In the economic statement I presented to the House in December I did outline the steps we are taking to assist economic recovery which is now under way and to foster and bolster stronger growth.

We took measures to stimulate job creation, especially through the small business sector. The small business sector is responding in a very positive way. I think it is a clear indication that in this country small business is indeed the main engine of economic activity.

We took steps to enhance support for research and development, which is one of the most generous R and D programs in the world. We continue to take action to encourage exports through improved access to foreign markets and to improve Canada's international competitiveness.

We increased funding for worker training coupled with measures to foster joint efforts by government, business, labour and the learning institutions to work together to upgrade our skills, to bring about new skills and to make learning a lifelong priority. There is $3.8 billion being provided.

We provided for additional support for strategic investment in Canada's infrastructure, not the willy-nilly infrastructure program that is being proposed across the way. It is an infrastructure program that is strategic in nature, that will help improve our productivity, that will help improve our competitiveness, that will remove economic bottlenecks. The work can get started on it almost immediately in co-operation with the provinces and the private sector.

These important investments in our economy are indeed necessary, but we cannot allow ourselves to make these expenditures without ensuring that we have sources of revenue and without allowing the debt and the deficit to get out of control. We are at the stage where we cannot simply say "charge it" and make no provisions to pay for the actions we have announced.

The debts held by governments at all levels in this country and the deficits that are fuelling them are a serious burden holding back economic growth and job creation.

As I said in the economic statement: "Excessive government deficits, both federal and provincial, have contributed to a level of net foreign debt far higher for Canada than for any other G-7 country. This large net foreign debt, public sector and private sector, means that Canadians paid out more than $22 billion in interest last year to foreign lenders. That is money that Canadians cannot use to develop our economy".

Those words are as true today as they were in December and that is really what the C. D. Howe Institute was saying when it brought down its report earlier this week.

Since we have come into office we have worked to put this country's finances back in order. We have taken difficult steps and every one of those steps we have taken to curb and restrain government expenditure has been opposed by the Liberals and the New Democrats, every single, solitary one of them.

I think there are about 12 measures in all. We privatized Crown corporations and they opposed it. We passed a spending control act. We implemented the debt servicing reduction account making fiscal responsibility a part of federal law. We have cut the growth of program expenditures from 14 per cent to less than the rate of inflation, somewhere around 3.8 per cent. Government operations have been scaled back way below the rate of inflation. They have opposed every single solitary one of those initiatives.

Notwithstanding those measures which I think amount to about $118 billion worth of cuts, given the impact of the recession on the government revenues we have to continue to do more to restrain the deficit and we have to do more on the government spending side. In other words we have to cut back further still. There are two clear reasons why we must take this action.

First, higher deficits will damage prospects for sustained recovery. Growing deficits compete with productive private sector initiatives for the limited investment funds that are available in the country. This puts upward pressure on domestic interest rates and forces domestic borrowers to seek funds abroad thus increasing the nation's indebtedness to foreigners. As a consequence the country is left more vulnerable to exchange rate and interest rate volatility.

Second, if we fail to act now we will have to deal with even greater deficits in years to come and bringing the fiscal situation back in balance will exact an even more painful price from Canadians at that time. This would mean significantly higher taxes, reducing our competitiveness and our ability to create sustaining durable jobs.

The alternative to spending restraint is the imposition of higher taxes and that in my view is not a solution. A recent editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald made a very good point in commenting on the economic recovery currently under way and I quote: "Recovery is not yet so strong that it cannot be taxed away". I certainly agree with that.

As I indicated earlier in my remarks, we are going through some very positive economic indicators that clearly identify the fact that we are coming out of this economic downturn but we should not be doing anything deliberate that would undermine the fragility of that recovery.

Clearly then the most responsible avenue of action is to further constrain government spending. The measures we have proposed including those implemented by this bill will reduce allocations by some $8 billion over the next two years. Considering a portion of that is being allocated in the current fiscal year this will bring about a significant reduction in the structural component of the deficit.

The bill takes action in a number of specified areas. For example, it will impose a freeze on salaries for elected representatives and government personnel. It provides for changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act so that average benefits payable to claimants over the next two years remain at average 1992 levels. It also provides for claimants who leave their jobs voluntarily and without just cause or are fired as a result of misconduct to be ineligible for UI benefits. It provides for the reduction by 10 per cent of certain regional transportation subsidies where the decrease requires legislative amendment. Finally, it will implement a 10 per cent reduction in federal payments under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act.

Deficit control is a key foundation for Canadian investment, for Canadian competitiveness, for growth and for job creation. In the past when this government decided to put forward measures to restrain spending we knew that the government itself must set an example. Between 1984-85 and 1991-92 we limited the cost of government operations to an annual average increase of just 2.2 per cent. This was less than half the rate of inflation in that period and well under the 4.1 per cent annual growth rate in over-all federal program expenditure. Now, as part of this additional spending restraint, we are reining in further the cost of government operations, building on the efforts we have taken over the past number of years.

Bill C-113 proposes to freeze the salaries of some 390,000 personnel in the public sector. This freeze will cover the next two fiscal years and is expected to save the government $800 million over that period. Those affected include the Governor General, the lieutenant governors of each of the provinces and members of the federal judiciary. All federal public servants will also have their salaries frozen, as will the Prime Minister, as will all members of the cabinet and as will all members of the House of Commons and the Senate for a two-year period, as the economic statement suggested. It is interesting to hear the NDP scream about that.

The hon. member over there says: "Do not worry about the deficit. Just print more money and we will get on with the show". That is the old solution of the NDP. It is rather interesting that even the New Democratic leader is now talking about fiscal restraint and cutting the deficit. We are really going to be interested in seeing what she has to offer.

As well, employees of Crown corporations who are dependent on appropriations and not in competition with the private sector will have their wages held at current levels. Crown corporations that are dependent upon appropriations but in competition with the private sector will be funded as if their wages were frozen.

Departmental operating budgets are also being reduced by a further 3 per cent on top of the 2 per cent cut that was taken last fall.

Taken together the wage freeze and the operation cuts mean that the total cost of government will be 5 per cent lower than planned levels over the next two fiscal years. That is a very important element to bear in mind, because we have heard as we go through this very difficult economic period that businesses and companies have had to restructure, families have had to restructure and cut back and clearly, there is an expectation that governments must do the same. Governments at the federal and provincial levels must do the same. They must lower their overhead costs and they too must set an example. That is precisely what we are doing. Even the President of the United States recognizes that.

An hon. member: He is following your example. Even the Prime Minister said that.

Mr. Mazankowski: If he follows us and it works as well as it has been working for us, as I have indicated here, he is really on the right track. The only difference is that he thinks he can tax his way out of this particular situation. We have chosen another route.

Mr. Milliken: You cannot. You have already done it for the past eight years.

Mr. Mazankowski: We are taking advice from a gentleman whose party when we came into power was spending $1.33 for every dollar's worth of revenue it was taking in. Anyone, even someone in kindergarten would understand that you cannot continue to spend $1.33 on program expenditures for every dollar's worth of revenue that comes in. That is how sadly they are lacking over there in terms of straight fundamental business acumen.

There is a lot of chattering over there, Madam Speaker, but no concrete ideas. It is rather interesting that when we brought down the economic statement we debated for the equivalent of three or four days to see what they had in mind. There was nothing, absolutely zilch. They said: "Spend $15 billion on infrastructure". Where were we going to get the money? "Well, you get it from the taxpayers. You get it from the municipal taxpayer, the provincial taxpayer and the federal taxpayer".

Mrs. Feltham: Same taxpayer.

Mr. Mazankowski: Right. Same taxpayer.

I suppose I should start attacking the NDP government in Ontario. Then my hon. friend and I would agree on that.

I turn now to the changes to the UI act. In the December economic statement we announced a number of measures to stimulate job creation and in this particular area we provided some very positive initiatives.

For example, the government will effectively pay any increase in unemployment insurance employer premiums in 1993 over 1992 to a maximum of $30,000 for any small business that increases employment. This is a very good initiative and it is being utilized very effectively.

As well, we are holding the line on UI premium rates for both employees and employers in spite of the high payouts from the UI fund estimated to be something in the order of $22 billion in 1993.

Again danger is posed by growth in the deficit and means we must keep costs of the unemployment insurance system under control. With premium rates for 1993 kept to 1992 levels we are proposing to hold the average level of benefits over the next two years likewise to the 1992 levels.

The benefit rate will be set at 57 per cent of insurable earnings for the next two years, down from the current 60 per cent. This reduction will offset the growth in wages that would otherwise cause average benefits to increase during this period.

The new rate will apply to claims made after April first of this year or on the day that this bill comes into force if that is later. Workers who start receiving benefits before that date will not have their benefits reduced.

As well, we propose to establish a new rule that would disqualify claimants who quit their jobs voluntarily and without cause or who are fired because of misconduct. The total saving from these changes is estimated to be some $850 million for 1993-94 and $1.6 billion in the following year.

There has been a lot of discussion about these measures, a lot of hysteria and misinformation, but clearly our motivation in making this change was our commitment to treating all Canadians as fairly as possible.

In our current economic situation we believe it would not be fair to continue subsidizing those individuals who chose to quit their jobs without justifiable reason. However, many people including workers and their representatives have expressed some concerns about the implementation of this new provision.

In order to reassure them that the implementation of this measure will conform to the same standard of fairness that motivates this policy decision, we are making certain clarifications to the Unemployment Insurance Act, many of which are already part of the administrative procedures of the UI plan. Much of the jurisprudence and the Unemployment Insurance Commission policy already in effect will now be stated explicitly in law.

Over the years extensive safeguards have been built into the system to ensure that those who have just cause to leave their jobs will receive their full benefits. All cases are reviewed and will continue to be reviewed in an objective and compassionate way.

The definition of just cause is clearly laid out in the existing Unemployment Insurance Act and applies to a wide range of individual situations. For example, the disqualification does not apply to those who leave their jobs because of harassment, including sexual harassment or discrimination on grounds prohibited by the Canadian Human Rights Act.

As well, the act covers those who are obliged to quit their jobs to accompany a spouse or dependent child to another residence or because they work in conditions that endanger their health or their security. These people will not be disqualified. Workers who must leave their jobs to care for their children are not affected.

The list of definitions of just cause will be extended so that situations already recognized by the case law in this area will be explicit in the revised act. The act will now explicitly recognize the following situations as just cause: reasonable assurance of another employment in the immediate future, excessive overtime or refusal to pay overtime, significant changes in work duties or wages, antagonistic relations between an employee and a supervisor for which the employee is not primarily responsible, practices of any employer that are contrary to law, discrimination because of membership in any worker organization and undue pressure by the employer to force the employee to leave his or her job.

As well, we are explicitly recognizing the special needs of workers and their families by extending the definition of child care just cause to include care for any member of the immediate family.

The purpose of this is to clear up some of the misinformation, distortion and confusion that has been perpetrated by critics and indeed by people across the way. We believe this is a step in the right direction and we believe that most Canadians will support it. Other aspects of the unemployment insurance policy are also being enshrined explicitly in legislation. For example, workers who leave their jobs because of harassment, sexual or otherwise, will have their claims heard with sensitivity and privacy and without having to confront their abusers.

I simply want to re-emphasize the point. A fair and efficient system of adjudicating claims is already in place to ensure that people who voluntarily quit their jobs are protected from biased considerations of their claims. What we are doing with this legislation is making much of the case law and UIC policy explicit in the Unemployment Insurance Act, both to reassure Canadians that the system is fair in practice as well as in principle and to better inform workers of their rights.

I now turn to the transportation subsidies and what we are proposing to do under this legislation in that regard. I would like to deal with the issue of regional transportation subsidies in particular with respect to the Atlantic Region Freight Rate Assistance Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act. These programs will be cut by 10 per cent over the next two fiscal years, commensurate with our commitment to reduce grants and contributions by 10 per cent over the next two years.

Likewise, with respect to the western grain transportation subsidy, the bill we are currently considering proposes a new formula for calculating payments by the federal government under the Western Grains Transportation Act. The setting of freight rates under the act will be modified to achieve a 10 per cent reduction in federal expenditures for 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Turning to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, this legislation proposes to reduce payments under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, or PUITTA as it is commonly known in the House of Commons, by some 10 per cent. PUITTA provides for the transfer to the provinces of 95 per cent of the federal income tax collected from privately owned electric and gas utilities. The budgets of February 1990 and February 1991 capped these payments at their 1989-90 levels. However this measure has failed to provide any savings since payments in the last two fiscal years were well under the ceiling we had set. We have decided on a modest reduction to keep in line with the over-all approach of a broadly based cut in grants and contributions. We have provided for a modest reduction of 10 per cent in the actual grants that are provided under this program for the years 1993-94 and 1994-95.

By stressing these measures we are making it absolutely clear that it is necessary to keep our deficit under control. The issues of taxation, spending and interest rates are closely linked. The policies that we pursue in these area have a profound impact upon the viability of economic recovery which I have indicated is now gathering steam.

We know that the only way to ensure the prosperity of Canadians is through sustained economic growth. We have no intention of endangering the growth we already see by allowing the deficit to spiral out of control. This bill is a key part of our effort to rein in the deficit. I urge all members of the House to support it with enthusiasm. Given the fact we have the Leader of the Opposition committed to deficit reduction and given the fact we have the New Democratic Party getting on to this, we are now asking and appealing to them. This is what Canadians want us to do. They want us to act responsibly and they want us to bring the deficit under control. They are concerned for the future. They are concerned about their children and their grandchildren.

It was quite evident last night as we watched President Clinton set out his economic plan to the joint session of Congress. Obviously we welcome Mr. Clinton's initiative because he has recognized what we have been recognizing in this country for a number of years and has acted upon it. He has acted on confronting the difficult challenge of controlling the rampant growth of deficits and debt.

Under the plan he set out last night the U.S. government will consume less of the world savings rather than an increasing share. This should help reduce interest rates and encourage productive investment and growth, not only in the United States but in all countries around the world. We were encouraged by the fact that the president did not try to put any gloss on the enormous challenge of reducing the deficit. He was forthright and frank. He did not try to soften the hard reality that we as Canadians know to be true. Deficit reduction is painful. Deficit reduction is not politically popular. Deficit reduction affects all Canadians. We obviously want to support and maintain the programs we have in place but we cannot continue to do it on borrowed money. We have to pay our way.

It is interesting to note that the economic plan Mr. Clinton announced last night is very similar to the plan we have been pursuing as a government since we came to office. He has emphasized investments in public infrastructure and training and the important role that small business can play in stimulating investment in jobs. These precisely echo the themes of our February 1992 budget and the December 2 economic statement.

In December of last year I laid out a plan for bolstering infrastructure by $2 billion over the next five years. That is about $20 billion in American terms. Our plan emphasized roads, bridges, railroads and high technology communications just as the president referred to last night.

In Canada we too have emphasized skills training and education. We have doubled the funding for federal supported labour force training in the past several years. Tax assistance will be provided for sector training councils in the private sector.

In Canada we have stressed the importance of small business. In December I introduced a program for an investment tax credit so that small businesses could improve their technological capability, their productivity and their competitiveness through the purchase of new machinery and commitment.

Programs have been introduced for encouraging job creation by cutting the cost of hiring such as the unemployment insurance freeze for small business.

When we look at some of the more specific proposals in the president's economic plan we see obvious parallels to Canada's economic plan. For example, in the February 1992 budget we introduced an earned income supplement that will provide additional benefits to low and middle income working families with children. President Clinton has emphasized such a program for removing a major impediment to many families fully participating in the work force. The child benefit package we brought forward is a benefit package to help the working poor maintain their activity in the work force.

To reduce the deficit President Clinton has proposed deep cuts in program spending particularly in defence and in the operating costs of government. In Canada we have consistently followed a policy of spending restraint during our term in office. For example, the president proposed a one-year freeze on U.S. civil servants' wages. In Canada federal public sector wages will be frozen for three of four years from 1991 to 1994. In many respects we are being harsher in showing federal government leadership in a more aggressive way than what the president proposed last night.

With his fiscal proposals he hopes to bring the U.S. federal deficit as a share of GDP down to 2.7 per cent by 1997, from about 5.2 per cent or 5.3 per cent, which will be about half what it is now. With the fiscal structure already in place in Canada our deficit by 1997 will be considerably lower as a proportion of GDP than the American deficit.

It is important to note that the improvement to the Canadian deficit will come through a focus on spending restraint. In fact in both the February 1992 budget and the December statement we were able to introduce tax cuts for Canadians, not tax increases.

The president has proposed higher taxes for wealthier citizens. The Canadian income tax system is already considerably more progressive than the American system and in a real sense the U.S. proposals bring it more into line with ours.

In the U.S., as we all know, there is considerable focus on health care reform. We in Canada recognize that we too must control the costs of the health care system while we maintain the standard of excellence in providing health care. However we do not face the same degree of difficulty as the United States does.

When I met Secretary of the Treasury Bentsen he indicated to me that health costs were extracting about 13 per cent to 14 per cent of GDP at the present time. In Canada our health costs extract something around 9 per cent or less. He indicated to me that if nothing was done by the end of the century health care costs would be extracting close to 20 per cent of the American GDP. They clearly have to do something to bring about cost containment.

As a proportion of the GDP the U.S. faces a formidable task, but it also recognizes that in the course of all this 35 million to 40 million Americans have no health coverage at all. In Canada we do have a universal system and we want to keep it that way.

• (1050)

We will be working together with the provinces to try to identify the cost containment measures in an effort to deliver the best medical care in the most efficient and effective way possible. The ministers of health and the ministers of finance, federally and provincially, had a very productive meeting in that regard. We will be working together in a co-operative fashion with the health care sector because it too has some very important views and some very important recommendations to make in this regard.

In conclusion, we welcome the realistic economic plan set out by the president. In many respects it moves the American economy in the direction the government has been moving the Canadian economy. We have had, as I indicated at the outset of my remarks, some pretty clear indicators the plan is working. We are coming out of a very stubborn recession. It is clearly not over in some parts of the world, but we are moving ahead.

We hope the economic plan which Mr. Clinton put forward last night will sustain the trend toward economic growth, economic activity and job creation in the United States. That will make the North American economy very strong.

We firmly believe that as their economy grows, so will Canada's because we have the fundamentals right. We have made the tough and difficult choices. We have put in place the structural reforms which were necessary: tax reform, liberalized trade, a better tax system, investments in people through improved skills upgrading and retraining, more investment in research and development. It is showing up in our ability to reduce the labour input costs, the unit labour costs and in our ability to become more productive and more competitive.

There are encouraging signs. However we have a deficit and a debt that clouds the future and we must deal with it. That is why we are dealing with it here. I urge and I appeal to my colleagues across the way: Canadians do not want us to ignore this situation, they want us to deal with it and I ask for their support.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, I rise today to address a matter which is of great importance to millions of Canadians. The changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act contained in Bill C-113 will have serious consequences for many Canadians. It is very important that we discuss these changes in the House.

If Bill C-113 becomes law, people who leave their jobs without government-defined just cause or who are fired for misconduct will not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. This change is very significant. What it says to any Canadian in a difficult or unfair work position is be careful, because if you quit or get fired, you are going to have to prove you deserve UI.

Bill C-113 tells Canadians in these situations that you are guilty until proven innocent. With this bill the burden of proof is transferred to the UI claimant, who is often a person in an extremely vulnerable position. This is unfair and it is the main reason why Bill C-105, Bill C-113's unloved predecessor, generated so much hatred.

Bill C-113 is the government's attempt to blunt that hatred. Under attack from every corner, including its own caucus, faced with daily embarrassments in the House and the minister's clumsy defence of the bill, the government had no choice but to retreat sheepishly in the hope of returning to fight another day.

Now we have Bill C-113, nothing more than Bill C-105 in sheepish clothing. It is a PR exercise. In the marketing of Bill C-113 minor changes are presented as major concessions. However the minister of employment made it clear that there is no question of compromising on the substance of Bill C-105, which is that voluntary quitters must be punished.

Bill C-113 attempts to make some positive changes. It attempts to make more clear the question of people who accept early retirement packages. It expands the definition of just cause and it attempts to be more sensitive toward sexual harassment.

These are only corrections of errors made in the badly designed Bill C-105. There is nothing in the bill that corrects the arbitrary nature of the proposed changes. Indeed, the minister almost seems to be proud of the bill's arbitrary, merciless quality.

It is no secret that the minister of employment has little sympathy for the unemployed. His crude description of voluntary quitters as freeloaders who take off to Florida or the ski slopes reveals his generalized contempt. Bill C-113 reveals the government's approach to Canada's unemployment crisis. It focuses on voluntary quitters but ignores the 1.6 million people in this country who cannot find work.

We were given an indication of the government's attitude toward this issue two weeks ago when a number of government members addressed an opposition day on Bill C-105. Most of the attacks on the motion were fairly standard Tory rhetoric, rambling, unfocused, sometimes making irrelevant observations.

However, one speech stood out. It was the one made by the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration. I am glad she felt this issue is serious enough to warrant a coherent, though misleading, response.

The minister's speech seems to be a fairly accurate summary of the government's position in the debate of these changes. That position amounts to a very simplistic rhetorical question: Is it fair for those who pay UI premiums to support people who decide to leave their job on a whim in order to take a little vacation? The answer to this frivolous query is a resounding, of course it is not fair. No one is arguing this.

For the record, I would like to say that I think it is wrong for someone to quit a job on a whim in order to take a few months of holiday at the expense of the unemployment insurance program. For the record, however, I am pleased to say that I have never met a person who has done this. Of the unemployed people I have met, not one is happy about his or her position. Each and every one of them wants a job immediately.

In reality, the unemployed are desperate for work. Despite the discouragement and despair of 1.6 million unemployed Canadians and 2.2 million Canadians who are on welfare, this government has chosen not to address seriously the problems of the unemployed. Instead the Conservative government perseveres with the despicable fiction that our worst problem as a society is the army of freeloaders cashing their UI cheques in Florida and Jasper.

When the minister of employment and his colleagues in government are not leading a smear campaign against certain Canadians who leave their jobs, they are trying to assure us that the law will protect all those who leave their jobs with good reason.

During the debate I mentioned earlier, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said:

> These changes will affect only those who voluntarily leave their jobs without just cause or who are fired for misconduct.

Wrong. The changes may be aimed at people who quit their jobs without reason or who are fired with reason. In reality, they will affect many others. The minister would have to be incredibly naive to think otherwise. Later in her speech, the minister referred to the special protections built into the guidelines for field officers as they relate to the question of sexual harassment.

> In cases where all things are considered equal, the benefit of the doubt will be given to the claimant and thus tip the scale in his or her favour.

• (1100)

The minister puts a great deal of faith in the idea that the benefit of the doubt will be given to such women when they apply for unemployment insurance. I have to ask her however, what does benefit of the doubt mean? Does it mean that every woman who makes a claim and gives sexual harassment as her reason for quitting will get benefits?

As soon as you answer no, and reason dictates that you do so, you allow for errors. You admit that some women who are harassed but cannot prove it will not get benefits. You accept as a given that some deserving women are going to fall through the cracks. That is unacceptable to the Liberal Party. We in the Liberal Party say that these changes are too inflexible, too unyielding. They stack the deck against the most vulnerable among us and victimize the innocent.

The government believes that the letter and the spirit of the legislation will protect the innocent. We on this side of the House know that in the real world there are delays. We know that decisions are sometimes made in error. We know that people fall through the cracks.

It is clear from this legislation and the government's anti-quitter rhetoric that the Conservatives are out of touch with the reality of the work place. Look at the demonstration in Montreal a few weeks ago. Forty thousand people filled the streets in minus 25 degree temperatures to protest against the government's neglect of the unemployed.

The people in Montreal were shouting On veut travailler. We want work. They were not protesting for more UI. They were asking for jobs from a government that has abandoned them.

Those were not lazy, freeloading people. They were not sitting home watching videos or skiing in the Laurentians. They were demonstrating against an unfair government that does not have a plan to help them get back to work.

We were shown the real world that day at the demonstration, a world of frustration, anger and hopelessness. The government's response has been scornful and insulting. The government called the demonstrators separatists. It threatened to create a UI police squad and a UI snitch hotline. Its behaviour throughout these past few months has resulted in a tragic comedy. For too long this government has ignored the real world.

On December 2, the finance minister said something which I found deeply ironic, and I would like to repeat it. In his economic statement, the minister said: "There are those who would follow policies based on the world as they would like it to be, not as it exists". I found that ironic because the minister was putting down the first group, those who would follow policies based on the world as they would like it to be when he and his government are so obviously members of that group.

Think of it in the context of the present debate. Think of the minister and his civil servants who designed these changes and you will see how removed they are from the real world. They sit in their offices in L'Esplanade Laurier, the closest thing to ivory towers in Ottawa. They develop these policies in safe, clean, air-conditioned offices, the ideal work place in many ways.

It is understandable that these people might not be completely aware of the larger reality, removed as they are from small factories, restaurants, offices and work sites where the majority of Canadians work. That is why the minister of employment can say with complete conviction that the changes in Bill C-113 will not inconvenience anyone other than the quitters. He does not know any better.

Sadly in the world as it exists, to use the expression of the Minister of Finance, reality is quite different. Already employers are starting to use the proposed changes to the UI act to pressure their employees into more restrictive work situations. Le Devoir recently gave the example of Litho Montérégie, a small printing company in Longueuil. Here the employer is imposing a 30 per cent salary cut on the older, better paid half of the work force. The people targeted by this move are highly skilled and were instrumental in computerising the business, one of the first to do so in the industry. They were well paid as a result. The president of the company has said: "I used to be at the mercy of their skills. Now it is a different situation".

Maybe people in such situations should quit and apply for UI. It is easy to say, but sometimes it is a difficult decision, especially if you are not certain you will qualify for benefits. Think about the typical person who quits his or her job or is fired. To begin with, he is under a lot of stress and probably does not have a very positive outlook when he goes to the CEC to apply for unemployment insurance. If he is required to justify his situation before a decision is made about his eligibility that adds more pressure.

What if he is not as articulate as he could be? Maybe he has difficulty convincing the employment officer that his claim is justified. Maybe his former manager is more persuasive. Maybe he does not get the benefits even though he deserves them.

What is there in Bill C-113 to guarantee that such a person will be treated fairly? What protection does such a person have against the perils of the world as it is? The fact is this bill does not and cannot protect everybody, and that is why it should be withdrawn.

Perhaps the government should listen to the Quebec Bar Association and the Conseil du Patronat which have both expressed serious reservations about the changes proposed. Perhaps the government should pay attention to the human rights commissioner, Max Yalden and Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland who have both expressed concern about the effects of this bill.

Perhaps the government should have listened to suggestions made by members of its Quebec caucus instead of dismissing them so rudely. Those few brave men who dared to speak up did so on behalf of their constituents. They should have been shown some respect. Instead, the minister rejected their ideas out of hand.

Those Conservative members who spoke out against Bill C-105 understand that the changes will create a great deal of hardship for many Canadians. We on this side of the House know that too. We know that the problem is not laziness; it is joblessness. We know the problem is not layabouts; it is layoffs. We know the problem is not the indolence of our workers; it is the insolence of our ministers.

As we saw during the demonstration in Montreal, Canadians are angry at this government and will not put up with its neglect and misinformation any longer.

While we are on the subject of misinformation I want to be perfectly clear on one point. Job quitters are not the problem this government makes them out to be.

A 1991 Economic Council of Canada report found that people who quit their jobs are not a drain on the UI fund. Half of all job quitters went to another job immediately and another 43 per cent found new jobs within 10 weeks. The largest burden the UI fund must deal with are those hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have been laid off from the manufacturing sector. These people have been neglected by the government during this recession and are still waiting for the promised workers' readjustment programs.

The government claims it must penalize job quitters in order to control the deficit in the UI fund. It says that with the UI fund deficit at $4.9 billion in 1992 it cannot afford to support people who give up work. While it is true that the UI deficit is a very serious problem, I would suggest that the government is not doing all it can to control it. It has chosen an ineffective way to do so and could have chosen a better, more productive way. The government is not doing all it can to control the deficit and the UI fund. I say this because while the government moves against people who quit without just cause and people who are fired for misconduct, it ignores those who abuse the UI program through misuse or outright fraud.

There are many people who claim UI while earning more than they are allowed in under-the-table jobs. There are many who collect UI while studying full-time, and many who defraud the system with bogus claims. Those people, who we might refer to as cheaters cost Canadian taxpayers more than $200 million a year. Is it not strange that a government which claims to want to stop those who abuse the UI system has decided to focus on job quitters rather than cheaters? I would think the government would want to stop this type of abuse before any other.

I said earlier that by going after voluntary leavers the government has chosen an ineffective way to control the deficit and the UI fund. In order to illustrate what I mean by this I would like to briefly outline the present state of the UI fund.

In 1990 the government stopped contributing to the unemployment insurance fund from general revenues. The fund became entirely financed by premiums paid by employers and employees. Since then the cost of the UI program has increased by $7 billion.

To meet these rising costs the UI premiums paid by employers and employees have been increased twice. In July 1991 they were increased by 24 per cent and then by 7.1 per cent in January 1992. Unfortunately these increases in revenue have not kept pace with the demands placed on the UI fund. Chronic unemployment has kept the UI fund in a deficit. The cumulative deficit now stands at $4.9 billion.

Desperate to control the deficit in the UI fund, the government decided it had only two choices: raise premiums again or cut benefits. They chose the latter. Unfortunately, the cuts are expected to save only $2.5 billion over two years. The effect they will have on the UI fund deficit is negligible. By the end of 1993 the deficit will rise to an astounding $7.6 billion despite the cuts.

That is why I say the government has chosen an ineffective way to fight the UI fund deficit. Earlier I also said the government could have chosen a better, more effective way to control its deficit. I suggest the best way to control the cost of the unemployment insurance program is to put unemployed Canadians back to work.

Consider that every percentage point of unemployment is estimated to cost $2 billion. That means that if the government decided to help the unemployed by bringing the rate down to 8 per cent, we would cut $6 billion from the deficit in the UI fund.

The government could act but it refuses to do so. The government is still waiting, trying to ride it out and hoping that the economy will eventually turn around and take care of things naturally, just like it has always done. That is wishful thinking.

The government is deluding itself if it thinks the business cycle is going to save our economy from eight years of Tory neglect. The unemployment we faced in the past was cyclical. It resulted from a slowdown in the economy as factories laid off workers in response to a drop in demand. After a time, demand would rise again and the workers would return to jobs like the ones they had left.

While cyclical unemployment was a difficult problem, the unemployment challenge we now face is much more daunting. Instead of cyclical unemployment we are now faced with structural unemployment. Instead of joblessness caused by temporary slow downs we have joblessness caused by permanent shutdowns. Our economy is in transition. Factories are shutting down forever. Old established firms like General Motors and IBM regularly announce huge layoffs. Whole sectors of the economy are downsizing and moving toward smaller workforces. None of the old truths apply any more.

According to the OECD, the Conference Board of Canada, the UN Department of Economic Development and other institutions, Canada is going to continue to be plagued by high unemployment well into the next year and probably even longer, despite strong economic growth. We are entering the jobless recovery. In the past two years 460,000 people lost their jobs and analysts believe many of these jobs will never reappear.

These people and other unemployed Canadians have the right to look to their government for help and direction. They have the right to expect their government to live up to such commitment as jobs, jobs, jobs, adjustment programs for displaced workers and the development of a learning culture.

The government has not lived up to these commitments. For over eight years the Conservative government has ignored the unemployment problem and abandoned millions of Canadians to the mercy of the marketplace. The government put its faith in economic theory at the expense of everything else.

Instead of an activist government which cares deeply about people, Canadians have an unfeeling government which talks coldly about getting the fundamentals right. We have a government which frittered away great opportunity in good years and did nothing to help the needy in the leanest years since the Great Depression.

This government does not understand that while deficits are very costly, human misery also carries a very high price tag. All of society suffers in a period of prolonged high unemployment because unemployment represents lost production, lost wages and lost human potential.

One organization estimates our economy is presently operating at 9 per cent below its potential, which means we are losing $60 billion a year. Between 1991 and the year 2000 Canada is expected to lose about $400 billion. That is $400 billion in lost exports, lost tax revenue and lost wages.

Besides the financial cost, high unemployment has a huge social cost as more and more people are forced onto welfare or out of the system altogether. In metro Toronto, for example, officials are predicting that the number of people on welfare could climb to above 200,000 this year. That represents a disastrous 75 per cent increase since 1990. In the past year every province has seen dramatic increases in the number of people who must rely on welfare in order to survive. All of this human suffering is a result of the most painful recession in 50 years.

The situation is bad at present but will only get worse if the changes in Bill C-113 become law. If people who quit their jobs or are fired are barred from collecting unemployment insurance, as these measures propose, they will have to turn to welfare. Because of technicalities some people may not even be eligible for social assistance. That is another unfair element of this bill and another reason why the government should withdraw it.

Finally I would like to address the question of how these changes will affect young Canadians. I believe that young Canadians have much to fear from these measures. There are presently over 400,000 unemployed young people in this country. The youth unemployment rate is 17.2 per cent, compared to a national average of 11 per cent. While young people are generally disenfranchised in our society, they are over-represented in the unemployed population. People aged 15 to 24 make up only 29 per cent of the total population but they represent 38 per cent of the number of jobless Canadians. Many speak of a lost generation of young people condemned to a lifetime of dependence on unemployment insurance, broken up by stints in low paying, low skilled jobs. Many young Canadians in their mid-20s have never even had a first job, and for those who have their introduction to the labour force is often a waste of their skills.

I read recently about a 23-year old-with an English degree who sells plastic dinosaurs and colouring books in a children's shop. She earns $7 an hour and is struggling to make ends meet. One of her former class-mates is slightly worse off. He is putting his education to use behind the deli counter in a supermarket.

These are the kinds of jobs reserved for the best and the brightest coming out of our universities. These are the kinds of jobs that the minister of employment is encouraging our youth to hold onto with this bill. Young people are caught in a vicious circle. They want to go to university to improve their employment prospects but in order to finance their education they are forced to find work.

An increasing number of young Canadians are finding it difficult to get a post-secondary education. Tuition fees have increased 58 per cent over the past 5 years. The price of books has more than kept pace with inflation and living expenses continue to rise. Many university students must alternate between work periods and school in order to get an education. The entry level jobs they find are often low paying, have little if any responsibility and are not very challenging. Often the only way for these young workers to advance themselves is by moving from job to job as they acquire experience.

Bill C-113 discourages that upward mobility and will have a dampening effect on youthful ambition. I, for one, do not think that is good for our society.

We need our young people to lead the way into the new economy. They must be encouraged to advance, not stand still. Canada will never be a leader in the global marketplace if it is a nation reliant on low paying, part-time jobs. We need highly skilled, highly paid jobs to lead the way to the 21st century.

In conclusion, I would like to summarize why I believe this is a bad bill. First, it is too arbitrary. Despite the pious promises of the minister of employment, his minister of state and other members of the government side this bill does not provide the necessary protection for workers. By its absolute black and white nature this bill puts the onus of proof on the person claiming UI benefits, withholding those benefits until the person's credibility has been established.

It has been said before that this reverses one of the oldest and most cherished principles of our democratic system, which is that a person is innocent until proven guilty.

I also believe that this is a bad bill because it will not accomplish what it is designed to do. The bill's savings of $2.5 billion will not make a dent in the UI fund deficit of $7.6 billion. If the government is serious about controlling its spending why does it not cancel or scale down its plan to spend $4.4 billion on a submarine-hunting helicopter fleet? If the government is serious about wanting to put its financial house in order why does it not go after the $16.1 billion that Canadian companies have hidden in tax havens in Barbados, Cyprus and elsewhere?

This government has no clear plan for controlling its spending, and now the most vulnerable Canadians are being forced to pay for its economic mismanagement. That, in a sense, is the greatest failing of this proposed legislation.

Bill C-113, like Bill C-105 before it, reveals this government's glaring lack of vision. In this time of economic hardship the government could have proposed measures to help the unemployed find work, help young people break into the job market, or help high school drop-outs and others get skills training.

Instead the government chose to tinker on the sidelines. If it believes it wants to overhaul the UI system, if it wants to come out with a new innovative UI reform package, then it should present a serious approach toward this issue. This bill is a hesitant half measure which does nothing to address Canada's unemployment crisis.

The government has a moral responsibility to show Canadians how it intends to prepare our nation for the future. With this bill it has abdicated that responsibility. The people of Canada are in desperate need of help in order to acquire the skills needed for the new global economy.

In light of this urgent need for action, I find it distressing that the government would present such an inert piece of legislation. We can no longer afford such an action. Canadians need to believe in the future again in order to begin the rebuilding process.

I urge the House to reject the bill.

I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak in opposition to Bill C-113, which is an omnibus bill that covers many areas as well as unemployment insurance.

Bill C-113 addresses the Crow rate, grain subsidies, wage freezes to civil servants as well as members of Parliament and the Governor General, et cetera. We will have other speakers later in the debate who will address those particular issues. However I would particularly like to direct my attention to the section of this omnibus bill that concerns unemployment insurance.

Bill C-105, the previous bill, had many faults. The Minister of Employment and Immigration said in the scrum area the other day that: "If anybody feels that I have backtracked on this they do not know the meaning of the word".

I would just like to point out to the minister that we know the meaning of the word and the minister did backtrack simply because he had to go back and redraft this bill to change certain parts that were not in the previous bill. Those came to light as a result of the pressure placed on him and his department by the opposition. If we had not brought our concerns forward he would not have had to backtrack and redraft the bill.

The question that demands to be answered is: What consultations took place prior to and after Bill C-105? Where did the minister get the information that was necessary to make these changes?

There were not any consultations for Bill C-105. It was thought to be a bill that could be rammed through the House without too much opposition because the government felt that it had enough support out there from the right wing, that it could garner some votes from this move and that it was something that was very popular.

There is newspaper article after newspaper article that indicates exactly why the government has done this. They clearly show that there are 50 per cent of people on the right saying: "Yes, this is great, this is really good". Therefore the Conservative party thought: "Here is an opportunity to attract some votes in the west. We will get some of that Reform vote back. This is the kind of stuff they like. They have a feeling that workers are a little less than human, that workers are there to be exploited". This attack on the unemployed is simply that.

We asked the government about statistics. We asked it on what basis it is putting this legislation forward, what it is using as its statistics. We called the minister's department to get these statistics and were told that it was having some great difficulty in getting the numbers we asked for. I asked the minister in the House to table the statistics he was using to base this change on, which would clearly show that there were thousands upon thousands upon thousands of Canadians quitting their jobs for absolutely no reason whatsoever other than that they wanted to become couch potatoes.

The minister said: "You are going to have to get those on the Order Paper. The member knows very well that is the proper procedure". If the minister had been totally honest and wanted to disprove what I was saying then he simply had to table the documents, but he did not have them. They do not exist. The biggest problem with this whole legislation is that the decision to attack the unemployed was based simply and clearly on political gain. It has nothing to do with deficit reduction or spending control.

I have a newspaper article from The Citizen outlining information it received from Statistics Canada. It says:

> Statistics Canada figures show they are a relatively small part of total unemployment insurance claims that are currently delayed or denied.

The statistics show that in September 1992 16,710 people quit their jobs, 2,740 people were fired for misconduct, and 132,800 claims were delayed or denied.

According to Statistics Canada, the article continues:

> The major factors for denying a UI claim are failure to prove a person is unemployed, not being available for or capable of work and having incomplete documentation.

That does not tell us that there are thousands of people who are quitting their jobs just because they feel like it, but tells us that people are quitting their jobs and in most cases are not being given benefits. It tells us that there is no real problem in terms of people quitting jobs.

We must look at what the government is trying to do. It is trying to create a perception that if we can convince these people to stop quitting their jobs then the UI fund will rectify itself and return to the black. It is saying that people who are working should not quit their jobs simply because they want to sit at home and then expect fellow Canadians to support them for absolutely no reason whatsoever.

Under the conditions in which we live today and under the economic failure of this government people who have a job are darned lucky and do not want to quit their jobs. They want to work.

I can bring hundreds of names, if not thousands, of people who are very willing to work if they only had a job. The government should not tell me that people are quitting simply because they want to quit. It is not true. It does not happen. The government does not have the statistics to prove that is true. They do not exist.

Let us look at the situation as it stands in Canada and the changes to the UI. I would like to refer to another article that I have from the Hamilton Spectator headlined "Cutting unemployment payout is mindless and moronic". The article read:

> We are told that by cutting the average weekly payout of UI, we will save a couple of billion dollars. This, of course, will go to reduce our deficit. This is the same deficit that went from $27 to $34 billion in the past year under this government. How can they be out $7 billion and keep their jobs let alone their self-respect?

These are not my words. They are from the Hamilton Spectator. That is the perception in Canada today.

This government is trying to blame all its economic failures on the unemployed. It is trying to create the myth that the unemployed are creating problem and that it is their fault they are unemployed. It is saying: "They are not victims of this economic policy. They want to be unemployed. They love suffering".

I do not understand how the government can introduce this kind of legislation and keep a straight face. How can it expect Canadians to believe that what it is doing is for the benefit of all Canadians?

The government did not anticipate that there would be such an outcry from Canadians from coast to coast to coast. It has seen the beginning of that in Montreal. It has seen the beginning of that with the people I invited here yesterday, clients of Mouvement Action-Chômage. We have put real faces on the problems. These are people who are directly affected. These are women who face sexual harassment in the work place. These are spouses who want to move with their families, to be with their families when the other breadwinners move as a result of their jobs.

We have seen the real faces of people who have come here and said: "I have to stay home to care for my child but I have been barred from doing that". We have seen and have heard from domestic employees who are not allowed to use the phone, to leave the premises without the assistance of their employer or to write letters unless they are screened. Yet these people are supposed to have their rights protected when they claim UI if they ever get a chance to apply for it.

One of the biggest problems with this whole legislation is sexual harassment. I do not really like to talk about about sexual harassment but I must. We must consider what a person who has been sexually harassed on the job has to go through. We have seen in the new improved formula, Bill C-113, that the government is attempting to say that it has broadened the range of just cause for quitting. There are certainly acceptable circumstances under which they can quit their jobs, but in the case of sexual harassment the burden of proof belongs to the claimant. The person must go before an agent who has had his or her wages frozen for three years, who has been legislated back to work, who has worked under conditions that are a little less than good and who has sometimes worked extended hours without remunera tion. They get time off instead. These agents are sitting there and listening to people who have come for assistance and they have to make decisions. As well, these agents are restricted in what they can do. They cannot cross-examine. They are limited as to how they can approach these people and try to help people.

The sexually harassed person has to appear before such an agent, bear his or her soul and explain in detail what happened. The agent under the new and improved legislation will now do his job behind closed doors. That was not in the old legislation. This is not backtracking, but it is in the new bill. That is fine and is very much appreciated.

The problem is that the agent cannot take the word of the claimant because it is not good enough. Now the agent has to go to the employer. The employer is the one who has been sexually harassing the claimant. The agent will go to the employer and seek to determine whether or not the person was sexually harassed. What employer in his or her right mind will say: "Oh, yes, I did it. I sexually harassed this person. Give her the benefits"? I do not know too many employers who will do that.

Mr. Heap: That will be the day.

Mr. Samson: Of course the employer is going to deny it. Where is the benefit of the doubt? The agent has the claimant's word and the employer's word. Let us bring in a witness. Keep in mind that all related parties will be excluded from the interview with the agent. During the interview the agent will be alone with one person.

If I were a claimant I would certainly want to be present when somebody is saying something about me. I have that right. That information will not only be available to me. It will also be available to the employer and to the witnesses in writing. Transcripts will be available.

Then the agent brings in a witness who works for the employer and was there at the time the harassment took place. Do we think for one minute, given the conditions we work under today, that witness will put his or her job in jeopardy by siding with the claimant and saying: "Yes, the employer sexually harassed the claimant"?

Mr. Heap: Fat chance.

Mr. Samson: Fat chance for sure. They are going to take the side of the employers to protect their own jobs because jobs are hard to get. There are no jobs. Of course they are going to say: "I didn't see anything. Oh, gosh, I don't remember that. No, I don't think it was that bad". Or, they may even say: "Hey, listen, this person has been after the boss for I don't know how long. It is not his fault; it is her fault".

This is a lop-sided, sick piece of legislation. The claimant is the one who is going to lose. The hands of the agent are tied. When we look at the document it clearly says that the agent at no time will cross-examine to determine who is right or who is wrong.

If agents are to become police persons, lawyers and judges, how can they arrive at an answer if they cannot do all these things: do the investigation and do the cross-examination? How will they establish who is right and who is wrong? How will they establish if the claimant has a right to benefits or not? How will they establish benefit of the doubt for the claimant? They cannot. It is impossible.

There is something drastically wrong with this legislation. It implies that persons who are sexually harassed must tolerate the situation as long as they can. They must try to exhaust all other avenues, including asking for a transfer. That is a good one. While they are asking for a transfer because they are being sexually harassed, the spouse—he or she—may be in trouble. Unless they exhaust all other alternative measures to move with the other spouse, they have to go through this whole process too if both spouses are working. They have to prove that they tried to do everything they could in order for them not to move. They have to try to find alternative transportation measures. They have to try to find all kinds of things. The whole process is sick. It really is.

The government is saying that the unemployed have to realize they have to be part of the deficit reduction to get the economy going again. The answer is get people to work. Put people to work.

The funds for training our unemployed people come out of the fund. A lot of money comes out of the fund. Administration costs come entirely out of the fund. Training comes out of the fund. Everything pertaining to the unemployed comes out of the fund. The government withdrew funding to the UI with the introduction of Bill C-21 in 1990. The government does not contribute to the UI fund any more but it still wants to regulate the fund and it still wants to control it.

Mr. Heap: They also cut out its own training programs.

Mr. Samson: I would like to go on for about another hour frankly, because I have tons of material that I can go through to speak against this bill. It is a Draconian bill.

I would like to conclude by saying that the attack on the unemployed which is created as a result of the economic policies of this government is not the answer to the problems of the unemployed.

The minister started out by arguing that we have to get rid of these frauds. Nobody in my office who commits fraud gets support from me, none. If they cheated the system by working while they collected unemployment insurance and there was a penalty to pay, fine, let us address that. If we are talking about penalizing the unemployed people for quitting their jobs, I am sorry. Let us make the penalty fit the crime. Let us not put people in jail for the rest of their lives for stealing a chocolate bar.

There is nothing wrong with the penalty that exists today. People are penalized now for quitting their jobs up to 14 weeks, the two-week waiting period, plus their benefits are cut by 50 per cent. That is penalty enough. That is deterrent enough. I feel this bill is Draconian. It goes far over to the right, and it should be defeated.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I have one question for my hon. friend from Timmins who has made some very interesting policy pronouncements from time to time.

I want to ask him one question. Does he think it is right that an individual who quits his or her job for no good reason should collect insurance, which is designed for people, who through no fault of their own, need it to carry them over a period of time until they find another job?

Does he think the people, the union workers who are paying these unemployment insurance fees and stick with their jobs, should support those who quit voluntarily to sit at home and not work? Does he support that? I want a yes or no answer on that.

Does he also support the premise that the person who sets his car on fire or sets his house on fire should collect insurance on it?

An hon. member: It is arson.

Mr. McDermid: It is the same principle.

• (1150)

Mr. Samson: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for that question. When this minister starts answering our questions with a yes or no, I will answer his with a yes or no.

In the meantime I am going to tell him this. We must not lose sight of the fact that this is unemployment insurance and it is for people who are unemployed. Yes, people are unemployed. A penalty now exists for people who quit their jobs and that penalty is a two-week waiting period, a 7 to 12 week penalty period, plus a reduction of 50 per cent in their benefits.

At the end of the 14-week period they must prove to the agent they are ready, willing and actively seeking employment. If they fail to do that they get zero. I challenge the minister to tell me that it is not penalty enough to deter people from quitting their jobs without just cause.

People who set their houses on fire, who burn their vehicles, are committing arson, and there is a penalty under the law. Do they get life imprisonment? No. Do they have to pay a fine? Do they lose their residence? Do they lose their insurance? Yes they do. That is penalty enough.

However, it is not good enough for the unemployed, not according to this minister. The unemployed? No, no. It has to be worse than that. We have to cut them off. We have to make them starve. We have to send them on to the welfare rolls of the provinces and in Quebec they do not even have welfare. They cannot apply for it. They have to get a loan that has to be repaid in Quebec. They do not get welfare. That is what you are sentencing these people to with this legislation.

There is no way that anyone is going to convince me that this is a fair penalty for people who leave their jobs because they may have a reason to leave but they cannot prove it or they cannot justify it to the agent, an agent who is under stress as it is because in this same bill their wages are being frozen for two years. Their working conditions are being affected.

According to this new and improved document people have just cause to leave their jobs for significant modifications in terms and conditions respecting wages and salaries. That is one of the conditions for leaving employment with just cause. Those agents can leave their jobs with just cause according to this because this government froze their wages. Now you tell me where the justification is.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, the member is right in deploring the government action on UI, there are no two ways about it. In fact the government has recognized there are a lot of deficiencies in the UI bill. It is my hope that before proceeding with the bill it will look at the whole issue of fairness.

I want to ask my colleague from the New Democratic Party if he subscribes to the NDP government in Ontario because it has introduced a freeze when it comes also to employees at the provincial level. We on this side of the House deplore the action of any government that puts a freeze on Public Service wages, and limits Public Service wages to rates below that of inflation. I want to ask him if he deplores the action of the NDP government in Ontario when it also put a freeze on Public Service wages in Ontario.

Mr. Samson: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question coming from my hon. friend from the Liberal Party. No one likes to see the wages of anyone being frozen. Nobody likes to see where a person's quality of life is in jeopardy.

I would like to remind the member that if the federal government would transfer the funds owed to Ontario it would not have to take these kinds of tactics.

The minister again is raising his voice and saying that is not true but the numbers speak for themselves. Check the record. Check the books. Look at the cap on CAP. Look at the transfer payments as they affect Ontario. What do you expect provincial governments to do when they do not have the income?

One thing I would like to point out to my Liberal friend is during the speech of the Liberal critic it was very obvious to me that he did not say one word about the reduction of benefits from 60 per cent to 50 per cent. I wonder why. Would it have anything to do with the fact that maybe that is the part of the bill the Liberals do support? Would it have anything to do with the fact that in 1978 they reduced benefits by 6-2/3 per cent? I would like to know what the Liberal Party position is on the reduction of benefits. I would like to know from the Liberal Party what impact that is going to have on local economies when, in a city like Timmins where I come from, that 3 per cent represents $195,000 per month in reduction in spending power from the people who are unemployed.

Unemployment insurance was designed as a safety net to help boost the economy during a time of unemployment. It was designed to boost the economy.

Mr. McDermid: Help boost the economy?

Mr. Samson: Yes, boost the economy.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, come on.

Mr. Samson: Oh, come on. Yes, right, I know. Let us take all the money away and let us see what that does to the economy. Is that not a great idea? When I hear from the Liberals and they start asking me about our provincial government I look across the other way and I say: "Look, you get the transfer payments that are owed to Ontario and it will do what it has to do and will do it very well".

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to my hon. friend. I must confess I am impressed with his efforts on this. He is very accurately reflecting the trade union movement and the CBC on this one, but he is not in touch with what the Canadian people are saying.

When the member talks about penalty he betrays that he does not understand what the issue is here. The issue is not one of penalty; it is one of eligibility. What the minister is saying and what he is reflecting in terms of public opinion in this country is that honest, hard-working Canadians do not think, especially at a time when employment is difficult, that people who simply decide not to work any more, those people without just cause, should be eligible to draw unemployment insurance. In the same way when talking about automobile insurance, you have to smash your car before you can claim the insurance. You cannot just say: "It is my vested right. I paid into it, therefore I should draw it out".

My question for my hon. friend is: Does he know what insurance is?

Mr. Samson: Madam Speaker, it is a buffer during a time of need. If you lose your house, you collect on your insurance and that is why you pay it. You lose your job, you get insurance. If you leave your job because there are conditions you believe you cannot cope with, then you get insurance that you have paid into. It is plain and simple.

This government is trying to intimidate people into staying in conditions that are intolerable, that they cannot get out of any other way. Then they have to prove it. They have to disrobe themselves in front of all kinds of witnesses to prove their case. These guys are sick.

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-113, the government expenditure restraint bill.

It has been interesting listening to the discussion about the bill. There has certainly been a lot of heat from the last two speakers but not a lot of light. I would like to have the opportunity of discussing some of the real elements involved in this bill.

As the Minister of Finance has already stated this morning, the major purpose of this bill of course is to bring government expenditures into line. It has to do some of the tough things. None of them are easy and in the best of all possible worlds we would not have to do these things but we have to. We are facing a financial situation in this country and we have to start at home. We all have to contribute to this exercise. Indeed, as members of Parliament and cabinet ministers we are contributing in that we are freezing our own salaries. There are many other measures throughout this bill and in all departments of government so that we can bring about those $8 billion of savings which will result from this bill over the next three years.

As the Minister of Finance has indicated there are some good signs developing in terms of the economy. Being from western Canada I know we can certainly see those developing in British Columbia.

That does not mean we do not have to continue to be persistent and consistent in getting our own expenditures under control. Whether it is within departments where we are reducing our operating expenses or whether it is in terms of grants that we give out and reducing those, we all have to recognize that we have to make these changes.

However, I too wanted to talk about one particular aspect of this bill that has caused a lot of discussion and generated a lot of debate over the last couple of weeks. That has to do with the provisions relating to the changes in unemployment insurance.

I thought this morning listening to the debate that there really are some very different views about what the unemployment insurance fund is all about. Some people seem to think it is there to boost the economy. That was never my understanding of what it was brought in for. Others seem to think it is an entitlement. No matter what happens to you, you paid into it and you get a chance to get your money out.

I say with respect to my hon. colleagues that was never the intention of the unemployment insurance fund as it was developed nor indeed is it the intention in most cases for insurance. Generally speaking, for insurance you pay a premium and then if basically through no fault of your own circumstances should occur and a catastrophe happens with respect to your house or your car or your life you will get whatever the arrangements are for the payment.

The same thing is true for unemployment insurance. You pay premiums and if circumstances should come about through no fault of your own that you lose your job, then indeed you have the opportunity of being able to collect under the terms and conditions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is not something that is automatic and never has been.

I would like to turn now to another part of this discussion. It deals with the aspect of sexual harassment. Over the past couple of weeks there has been a great deal said in the media and in this House that these provisions we are bringing in with respect to unemployment insurance will somehow have an adverse impact on women because they would deny the opportunity to a woman who was the victim of sexual harassment from being able to leave her job and collect unemployment insurance.

For the record, that is just not the case. That is not the case now and it will not be the case in the future. Indeed, let me remind my colleagues that in October 1989—and I know many of the members were here in the House at that time—we had the debate about unemployment insurance and amendments were made to the act to provide for specific definitions of just cause, reasons that would continue to make someone eligible for unemployment insurance. At that time a very specific provision was added to the act to be very clear that one of the grounds for just cause would be sexual or other harassment. That was a very important amendment.

I looked up the voting record on that and it is interesting. I was present and certainly voted for it and indeed my colleagues from the NDP voted for it. However, quite surprisingly, the members of the Official Opposition, the Liberals, voted against it. I never have been able to quite understand why that occurred.

That has been the case. Sexual harassment has been and continues to be a just cause for an individual to leave his or her job and be able to collect unemployment insurance. Indeed, of course this bill continues in that effect.

The debate around sexual harassment has been interesting as well. I think on balance it may be a very productive debate in that it is bringing to the public's attention just the fact that this issue exists. It has long been my view that one of the difficulties we face is that for many—and I am speaking primarily of women, although not exclusively because men too can be the victims of sexual harassment in certain circumstances—it is obviously a very traumatic and terrible thing. Often women have not wanted to talk about it and have just said: " I don't want anything to do with it, I just want to get out of this situation and get on with my life".

I sympathize with that and truly understand that, but it only perpetuates the problem because it does not bring the issue out into the open. It does not enable the individual employer or society at large to be able to do anything about it.

If we are really going to come to grips with the issue of sexual harassment—and we are talking particularly of the workplace—we have to make it transparent. We have to ask those women or those victims to speak out against it. That is the issue we talk about generally with regard to violence against women. It will not stop until we bring it out into the open. That is when we can really start to take those measures.

Sexual harassment of course is against the law. The Canadian Human Rights Commission very clearly makes that point. In ideal circumstances in many cases employers themselves have very specific guidelines and procedures through which an employee can go to get redress or hopefully be able to deal with the problem internally. That is obviously what we all encourage. All employers should have those kinds of guidelines with an independent person within the work place to whom victims can go, even if they are just disturbed by comments rather than actions. They can then bring the people together and make sure everyone understands the situation. Employers should have the appropriate training and orientation programs within the work place so people understand how language or actions can poison the work place and be offensive to people.

There are some very delicate issues around that. Sometimes what one person may perceive as harassment another does not. You will not really deal with that unless you get people talking around the table.

It was extremely interesting in my previous department when we got people around the table. Some people said: "I did not know doing that would be offensive to anyone. I am certainly prepared to change my ways." Obviously that is the ideal way to deal with these situations but it is not always possible. Some small companies do not have those procedures.

I want to make it very clear that no one, woman or man, should have to continue in employment as a victim of sexual harassment. There may be people watching today or reading this transcript who are in that situation. If there is no way within their work place to resolve the situation, they are absolutely and legitimately within their rights to leave that situation and be able to apply for unemployment insurance.

The question then becomes: What happens in a concern about how these issues might be dealt with? How might a woman feel going to the unemployment insurance office? One of the real improvements that is going to come about as a result of this new legislative package is that there will be—and indeed it is going on right now—an increased emphasis on the orientation and training of all the officers who deal with these issues. This legislation contains some very legislated procedures that will protect the privacy of an individual who is laying these complaints.

My own department, Status of Women Canada, has been brought in to these discussions. We have been working very closely with the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Labour to ensure there are appropriate procedures. We have training packages which are now under way and I believe 75 per cent of the officers who deal with these cases are women. We make sure they have an understanding of the circumstances of sexual harassment, how you might deal with victims and some of the problems victims might face so they can deal with it in a very sensitive manner. I think there has been a lot of support and co-operation around that.

The guidelines make it very clear that the benefit of the doubt is to be given to the claimant. This is a very important point and I really do not think it has come out clearly enough at this point. In the circumstances of sexual harassment we are obviously talking about the victim. It is very clear. They are obviously not judges, but where there is conflicting information the benefit of the doubt is to be given to the claimant. I think that should really give some comfort to those who might be concerned about applying for unemployment insurance. They will be treated in a sensitive manner.

If for some reason a claim is not accepted at that first level it goes to the board of referees. As we see now in the legislation there are very specific provisions whereby the employer and the employee do not have to be in the same room. They can be separated. The hearings will be held without media or publicity which I think is very important in terms of the comfort level for victims. There is a very important strengthening of provisions that makes sense and will enable those, primarily women, to come forward in those circumstances.

The guidelines will also counsel the unemployment insurance agents to listen to claimants in a neutral and objective manner and recognize that situations such as sexual harassment may induce an employee to act out of panic or stress and there will be a lot of stress around them. They are instructed that in cases of sexual harassment the claimants will have the choice of talking to an officer of the same gender. Obviously, they may have a higher comfort level in doing that. A closed office is to be available for that interview to ensure the privacy of the information.

Again, just to re-emphasize a point, the guidelines are very clear in stating that UI agents are not in the business of determining who is right or wrong, innocent or guilty and the benefit of the doubt must be given to the claimant. In cases with conflicting information, the review process is to find in favour of the claimant. That certainly goes a long way toward dealing with these issues.

In addition to the issue of sexual harassment there are other just causes outlined in this legislation that are also very important. The obligation to care for a child was already in the old legislation but we have added as well, "or for a member of the immediate family". We are certainly aware of situations where a spouse or someone does have to leave their employment to provide that kind of care and support, and where it obviously can be considered as a just cause.

There is also the issue of antagonistic relations between an employee and a supervisor for which the employee is not primarily responsible. That is an issue of concern that has been raised by caucus colleagues. It also will give comfort to employees that in those situations they could be considered to have just cause. This list that has been enumerated in the legislation provides that in addition to the enumerated reasons for just cause, other reasonable circumstances as prescribed by the Governor in Council can be added. This really does deal with the question of fairness.

I have heard from my own constituents, as I am sure many colleagues have as well, that people are really surprised. They say: "Good heavens, you mean up until now someone could just leave their job for no reason, just because they wanted to and after a period of time collect unemployment insurance". Most people think that is totally unacceptable. Ideally no one would do that and hopefully no one will. Then we will have the best of all worlds.

Where they do in those particular circumstances, I do not see how any reasonable member of this House or of the public could say: "Oh well, it does not matter, they can just go and get UI". It was not the intention of UI nor do I think it is fair to the contributors, the employees, the employers and the general public who are involved in this program. UI is there for a very important specific purpose. It has been around for many, many years and will continue for many more years.

This bill with these changes can lead us forward by recognizing such issues as sexual harassment as well as verbal or physical harassment. There is a good definition that has been set out for harassment. Those persons who may be victims of harassment do not have to continue in those circumstances. They will be dealt with fairly at all stages of the process.

They will continue to be eligible for unemployment insurance and hopefully be able to get on with their lives. We can begin to deal more effectively with the whole issue of sexual harassment in the work place. This government believes it is a serious issue. It is one in which we all want to work together.

We want partnerships with employers, employees and unions to eradicate harassment from the work place so all individuals can be productive in their work lives without having to suffer from the fear or actuality of harassment and particularly sexual harassment.

That component of this bill combined with the broader measures to bring government spending under control is good news for the women of Canada. Women of Canada who are increasingly involved in the business community can take advantage of some of the new provisions that are being provided under our Small Businesses Loans Act. There is a time of grace when they will not have to contribute to UI and that will encourage the employment of more people. All of these measures will help us get our economy on track and encourage and improve the situation for women and all Canadians.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have listened attentively to the minister's intervention. Knowing her interest in the subject matter, I guess it would be safe to assume the minister had a fair amount to do with the provisions contained in this particular bill. I am making reference, of course, to the phrase and subject matter of sexual harassment.

Since the minister is responsible for the status of women, my first question is with regard to staff training. Since the minister has been so seized of the subject matter would she indicate to the House, in response to my question, how much money has been allotted for the purpose of training staff in order to make them more sensitive to the concerns which could be raised by potential claimants as they relate to sexual harassment? I am sure the minister has that in her briefing book.

The second question I ask the minister is that on page 2 of the news release from the minister, she indicated that the board of referees will be given a clear mandate. That is what the minister said: "a clear mandate with regard to the privacy of the victims".

In fact the news release says on page 2:

> Boards of referees would be given clear authority to protect the privacy of victims of sexual or other harassment.

That is what the minister says. That is what the news release says but the law says something different. The law says:

> That the chairperson of the board may direct that the hearing be held in camera or that the details concerning the circumstances not be published.

It is also discretionary for the applicant. I am not asking the minister to make a decision right now but would the minister consider the possibility of just changing that? Would she make it very clear that on the claimant's application it would say "shall" and not "it may" or "it may not"? I point out to the minister there is a discrepancy here.

There may be one kind of decision made by the board of referees in British Columbia and quite a different decision made by the board of referees in Newfoundland.

I would suggest that the consistency to which the minister has referred would not be there. Perhaps the minister could respond to those two questions in full detail.

Mrs. Collins: Madam Speaker, I would like to advise my hon. colleague who raised the question of training, which is important. It is an area in which we have been developing this co-operation between our two departments. We are in the process, and it should probably be completed by now, of developing a national training package. It will be used to train about 17,000 unemployment insurance employees located at more than 440 Canada Employment Centres right across Canada.

Along with the package of materials for all employees, all staff who deal with claimants will also be attending a training workshop which will include video and discussion packages. It will involve the participation of local women's groups and persons with expertise on discrimination and sexual harassment.

These are going to be held across the country. We have been in close co-operation in developing this training package. The program is to be completed by April 1993, when the proposed legislation comes into effect.

We are also working on evaluation mechanisms, because they are important as well, to examine how the training is going and how effective it is. That will obviously be ongoing. The initial round will be for everyone and then we will be evaluating and determining what areas could be strengthened.

This is a very important plus. Quite honestly, I do not know if it has even been done in this way before. We certainly have not been involved to this extent before and we appreciate the opportunity. We have had a lot of experience in this area and have a lot of links back to the community.

I do not know exactly what the cost will be because a lot of it will be local. We will bring together people on a local basis and the national package materials will be funded by employment and immigration.

With respect to the issue of the board of referees, it is given the discretion. There could be circumstances in which it would not be appropriate. However, it is very clearly provided for in the legislation that upon the application of the claimant these hearings can be held in private and without media attention, and that is very important. As I understand from past experience, these cases very rarely get to a board of referees and they are in fact adjudicated at that first level.

Given the circumstances I have already discussed about the benefit of the doubt it is unlikely that many will have to go to the board of referees. I hope not.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I would like to follow up on a case scenario my colleague for Timmins—Chapleau mentioned in his contribution. This scenario was also raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

It centres around the whole question of just cause, particularly as it applies to sexual harassment. I have a case at the present time in which a young woman about two months ago was finally forced to quit her job because her employer was continually making remarks about her appearance.

He would grade her on a daily basis on a scale from one to ten. Today she looked like a nine and tomorrow she was graded as a number seven. This went on for six months. Although she requested him to stop he continued and persisted in doing so. It finally got to the point where she quit. She was immediately disqualified from receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

Subsequently, she appealed to the board of referees. She had the hearing. I told her to tell it exactly what was said and how it was said, et cetera. They overturned the disqualification and she was reinstated.

Now I want to deal with the comfort level. The board of referees forwards its decision to the employer. I do not think that is going to change under this system. The employer in turn appealed and is now under appeal to the umpire. He does not deny her story at all.

How will this change? This 21-year old woman had this indignity forced upon her in the first place. She had to go to the board of referees and explain. It overturned the decision, advised the employer of its decision, and he has now appealed it. It is a small work place and he went around and convinced other young women in that place of employment to write letters to the umpire saying that he did not sexually harass them. That is an exact case. On a privileged basis I am prepared to provide the minister with a copy of the decisions, letters, et cetera.

Mrs. Collins: Madam Speaker, it is difficult to talk about a specific case. However, we anticipate that what will happen as a result of the training that will be done with the first level of officers is that there will perhaps be a greater sensitization to issues of harassment.

Let me share with the House what harassment is, because sometimes people do not quite understand the definitions that are being used. Harassment, sexual or otherwise, is improper behaviour. The person directing the behaviour ought to have known it would be unwelcome. Harassment may be verbal, physical, deliberate and unsolicited. It may consist of only one incident or a series of incidents that demean, belittle and/or cause personal humiliation or embarrassment.

Harassment also includes abuse of power through the injurious exercise of authority for the purpose of compromising a person's employment. Acts of intimidation, threats, blackmail or coercion are also forms of harassment. Whether it is sexual or not and whether it happens once or more often, harassment cannot be tolerated.

These are the kinds of guidelines that are now being provided. I think they are going to give a much broader understanding of what harassment is to all officers so that these situations can be dealt with much more quickly and expeditiously at the first level and then not require appeals.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, we are discussing Bill C-113, which is a bill dealing with unemployment insurance and other matters. It is a bill which attempts to correct many of the mistakes that the government made a few weeks ago in presenting Bill C-105, again relating to the unemployment insurance matter.

In effect Bill C-113 is an admission that the government bungled Bill C-105, that it moved in a clumsy way in drafting that bill and that it moved too quickly. It was a knee-jerk reaction to the policies of the Reform Party, which is threatening some of the Conservative candidates in the west. Therefore the government put forward these reactionary provisions in Bill C-105 concerning unemployment insurance. Now it has realized it was wrong and it is attempting to correct them.

While these changes in Bill C-113 are an improvement they are still not right, and I would like to explain why they are still not right. First, in Bill C-105 the government was going to reduce the benefits to the unemployed from 60 per cent of their income to 57 per cent, up to a maximum of $447 a week.

Second, Bill C-105 was going to completely cut off from unemployment insurance those who presumably left their jobs without cause and those who were fired for misconduct.

Bill C-113 has kept the cut from 60 per cent to 57 per cent for benefits but only for two years, until April 1995. One might ask why the government is making this cut to 57 per cent of salaries in the middle of one of the worst recessions that we have ever faced in this country.

There are over one million people unemployed. They are struggling to put food on the table, feed their children, pay their rent, and meet the basic costs of their families and the government is cutting the benefit from 60 per cent to 57 per cent for two years, and then it will once again return the benefits to 60 per cent when hopefully we will be in better times. This is something that is not acceptable. We will continue to oppose that measure.

With respect to the second and probably just as controversial part of its policies, which is the provisions that would totally prohibit from unemployment insurance those who leave their jobs without just cause or who are fired for misconduct, the government has made some improvements. For example, it will set out in the law additional grounds defining just cause. That is good. It is good the government put that in the law. It will provide that in harassment cases, sexual and otherwise, these hearings will be held in private. That is a good thing, because sometimes the claimants do not wish to discuss matters of sexual harassment, in particular, in public. Providing that this be done in private is an improvement.

The government is also providing in Bill C-113 that those who leave a job in order to preserve other jobs in the company or firm will not be denied unemployment insurance.

Despite those minor improvements, and they are improvements, the bill is still not acceptable because the penalty is still excessive. It is still an excessive and harsh penalty when we consider that just cause is not always clear. It is very often a grey area. It is very hard to prove and it is time consuming. It takes at least two to three months in the appeal process to prove that one has just cause when one leaves a job.

There was a case in Montreal in which it took up to two years of pursuing the appeal process before the applicant won his case and proved just cause.

In effect, this is a situation in which the application, the employee, is presumed guilty until he proves his innocence. It is presumed that when people leave a job they are leaving without just cause, that they simply want to goof off, and that most people who leave jobs simply want to goof off. It is presumed that they are guilty and that they are in that position. They must go through the whole process of proving: "No, I did not just goof off. I had just cause". That is not an easy job.

The individual must put together the proof, must get witnesses and documents and go before a board of referees or an arbiter to prove that it did have just cause. It is time consuming, expensive, and extremely difficult. Meanwhile, the individual has no income even though he or she may have just cause during the whole period of time that he or she is trying to prove just cause.

We are saying that to totally deny benefits to these individuals is an excessive, unreasonable, and harsh penalty, which was never in the law before. We in this party are not saying that there should not be a penalty for those who leave their jobs without just cause. There has always been a penalty in the law. The Liberal Party started the unemployment insurance program. For years we had in the law a penalty of one to six weeks, which was discretionary depending on the seriousness of the case.

The officials in the department could assign a penalty of one to six weeks. It was usually an average of two to three weeks in addition to the two-week waiting period for those people who left their jobs without cause. This was a reasonable penalty considering that many cases are difficult to prove and so on.

In 1990 the government changed that penalty to one of seven to twelve weeks. We opposed it at the time saying that it was an excessive penalty. At the time we said that we would have accepted extending the range from one to twelve weeks but not setting the minimum at seven weeks because there were cases in which it may be desirable to give a two or three-week penalty. However, the government moved from a penalty of one to six weeks to one of seven to twelve weeks.

That was only two years ago. Now all of a sudden the government is proposing an absolute denial of benefits. There will be no range of penalties but simply a total denial of benefits when a person leaves a job without just cause.

One might have expected that maybe the government would have once again extended the range, let us say from a seven-week penalty to perhaps a total denial of benefits, and then the officials and board of referees could make a decision as to what was a just penalty in the case before them.

However, the government has eliminated any possibility of discretion and has not allowed the board of referees of the department to say: "Well, yes you left but this case is in a grey area. You have not been able to totally prove just cause so we will give you a five or eight-week penalty".

The government has to totally deny benefits in situations which are not always clear cut, which are very difficult to prove, very time consuming and expensive. Meanwhile, the individual is left without benefits.

In this debate the government has completely forgotten that there is another rule in the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is that in order to keep collecting unemployment insurance people must always be ready and available for work. If they show that they are not ready and available for work then they are cut off from unemployment insurance benefits.

We in the Liberal Party are not protesting that rule. It has been in the act for years and years. The government is presuming that if people quit their jobs for good reasons they are just going to sit at home and not try to get work. That is not the case. The law requires that once people are on unemployment insurance, once they receive it and have been proven eligible, and if they have suffered a temporary penalty if required, then during the period they are receiving unemployment insurance they must be searching for work. They must be ready and available for work. They cannot say: "I have retired. I do not want to work. I am going on a holiday to Florida" or "I am just going to sit home and write books".

They must always be ready and available for work. If it is shown that they are not ready and available for work or if they refuse jobs in their own profession or trade then they are cut off completely.

Why is there the necessity of this massive and excessive penalty against those who leave their jobs when just cause is not always clear cut?

I want to repeat that we believe in a penalty for quitting without just cause. There has always been a penalty in the law for quitting without just cause, but it was a reasonable penalty. First it was one to six weeks and then it was changed to seven to twelve weeks.

The other day in the House I asked the minister why after two years he decided that seven to twelve weeks was not harsh enough and why he is moving to a total denial of benefits. He never answered the question. Was there an evaluation done of the penalty put in the law in 1990 which showed that people were sitting at home goofing off and going to Florida? He did not give us any evidence to that effect. There were no studies, no evaluations made and no impact studies.

We know what it was. There is a Reform Party now in the west, and it has an excessive reactionary policy on these things. That party was putting pressure on Conservative candidates in the western provinces and in part of Ontario. To respond to those voters in those ridings, without thinking and without really looking at it very closely the government threw this on the table. Now it has admitted it is wrong and it is backtracking to a certain extent, but it is not backtracking enough.

What the government has forgotten in the whole debate is that if people are not always ready and available for work while they are receiving payments, while they are considered eligible, then they can be cut off.

Every year thousands are cut off because they are not ready and available for work. That is a rule of our system. We in the Liberal Party do not oppose that principle. We put that in the law. We put penalties in the law, but we believe in reasonable penalties considering the seriousness of the situation and the fact that just cause is not always easy to prove and is not always clear cut.

The government has said it is doing this because in recent months and recent years there has been a tremendous drain on the unemployment insurance fund. That is a real laugh.

In 1990 what did the government do? Before 1990 there were three groups that contributed to the unemployment insurance fund. Workers and employers contributed to the fund, and the government contributed to the fund when the unemployment rate went over, I believe, 6 per cent. Prior to 1990 the contribution by the government was $2.8 billion. What happened in 1990? In 1984 when this Conservative government was elected it began to cut the payments for training and retraining. Every year from 1984 to 1990 it cut the money available for retraining.

All of a sudden there was a lot of criticism of the government by people saying there was not enough money available for training. The de Grandpré commission report said more money had to be put into training. The free trade agreement had been approved and there was a need for more money for training. The government started searching around for more money for training. It looked at the unemployment insurance fund and saw that it had a surplus of $3 billion.

It amended the law in Bill C–21 and did away with the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund but took the $3 billion and put it into training. It took that amount out of moneys that were supposed to be for workers when they were unemployed and put it into training. Then it boasted about what a great government it was for contributing to the training programs in the country and about how much it did for training.

In 1990 when it hijacked the unemployment insurance fund of $3 billion for training it only brought the training budgets back to what they were in 1984 before it cut them so badly between 1984 and 1990.

It was quite a laughable matter to listen to the previous speaker, the minister from British Columbia, suggest that we believe that the unemployment insurance fund should be used for other matters than for the unemployed. It was her government, supported by herself and others, that agreed to change the unemployment insurance fund, take $3 billion out of the fund and use it for training.

Prior to 1990 the unemployment insurance fund worked so that in good times when unemployment was low there was a surplus in the unemployment insurance fund. That is why there was a $3 billion surplus in 1989-1990. There was a surplus in the fund. When things became bad, as they are now and have been for the last two years, the fund would use up that surplus and go into a deficit. However, in the long run the fund remained rather stable. There was a surplus in good times and a deficit in poor times. In the long run the contributions to the fund, with the government contribution, kept it at a reasonable level.

Now the government says the fund is in a terrible deficit so it is going to cut benefits, cut people off and so on. The reason the fund is in difficulty is that the government hijacked the fund in 1990 and decided to use a great percentage of it for training.

We in the opposition were all for training, but we agreed that training, like education, should be paid for by the entire taxpaying population of the country and not just by workers who contribute to a fund. They alone should not pay for training programs.

We objected to Bill C-21 at the time. We still object to the principle on which it was based.

Bill C-113 does not correct the problems. There are some improvements in Bill C-113 but it does not correct them. The government is shifting a further burden to the provinces and the municipalities with respect to welfare and social assistance.

People who will not get unemployment insurance as a result of this bill will have to live. We are not a country that leaves people dying on the streets from starvation. They will be picked up by the provincial welfare system, and in Ontario and Nova Scotia by the municipal welfare systems. Their deficits for these matters are growing by great percentages each year because of the shifting of burden to them.

When I raised this the other day in the opposition day debate a government member got up, took issue with me and said that what I said was not true. The member said that the government is giving increased sums of money to the provinces and municipalities. It is probably correct that in dollar terms the amounts the government is giving in 1992-93 are greater than it gave in 1990-91. However, in percentage terms it has cut back on what it should be giving and it is leaving a greater percentage of the burden with the provinces and municipalities. They have a much greater burden than they have had to deal with in the past.

We are in a very grave situation. Over 1 million Canadians have been unemployed for more than a year now. One would think that the principal thrust of the government's legislation and policies would be to put these people to work. My colleague from Toronto spoke of the very sad situation with respect to young Canadians coming out of universities and colleges with degrees and not being able to find work or working for minimum wages in fast food outlets and so on. One would think that its highest priority would be to create jobs and work for Canadians.

However, what is it doing? It is cutting unemployment insurance benefits from 60 to 57 per cent during this period of high unemployment. It is making it more difficult for those who leave jobs for just cause, and I say for just cause, harassment or whatever, because even though it says in the law that people get unemployment insurance benefits if they have just cause it leaves them with the great difficulty of proving it over a long period of time, which is a difficult and serious burden. That is what the government is doing when it should be doing more positive things to put Canadians back to work.

The jobs that are available to Canadians more and more are low-paying, non-union jobs without benefits. They are service jobs that do not compare at all with the industrial jobs that many Canadians had a few years ago.

Unemployment insurance was introduced in 1941 following the Great Depression of the 1930s. In the 1930s there was no unemployment insurance and very little social assistance. The thousands and thousands of people who were laid off had to go to soup kitchens and bread lines and had to use up their savings. Many people lost their homes and sold their furniture because there was no unemployment insurance. Canadians in all provinces said: "We do not want to see that again" so they agreed to an amendment that gave responsibility for unemployment insurance to the federal government and we started the unemployment insurance program.

The unemployment insurance program was a great step forward for Canada, if we look back at the period before we had it. It is not only good for the workers who lose their jobs, because it helps them to put bread on the table, pay their rent, and take care of their children during that period of unemployment, but it is also good for the whole community because it keeps money in circulation. It is good for the corner store. It is good for the person who is renting homes because they do not go bankrupt. We avoid the snowball effect that happened in the 1930s when a whole community went under because there was no unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance economically sustains the whole community during periods of unemployment.

While this bill is an improvement on Bill C-105 it is still not good enough. Unless the government improves it even more we are still going to oppose it.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member who said, in concluding, that when unemployment insurance was introduced, it was a good thing for the unemployed. It still is. As far as we know, people who lose their jobs will always be able to receive unemployment insurance benefits. In fact, I think the hon. member is making a mountain out of a mole hill, and even engaging in demagogy.

In the bill before the House today, eight valid reasons have been added for quitting one's employment. These apply to more than 40 situations that are considered to be just cause for quitting one's job on a voluntary basis, including adoption, pregnancy, union activities, going into business or becoming self-employed, moving to get married, a job that would require a person to work away from his family, and so forth. After exhausting all these possibilities, a person who decides to quit voluntarily without just cause, without provocation, will be assumed, according to this bill, to be the author of his own misfortune, and Canadian workers should not have to pay for that person.

Finally, the hon. member is actually saying he is fully prepared to pay for people who voluntarily quit their jobs and abuse the system. Considering the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund, it is clear the federal government has to borrow on international markets to be able to finance that particular deficit and the Canadian deficit. What is the result? The result is that your children and my children and future generations will be saddled with a debt that was created because we did not have the guts to put some teeth into the system.

My question to the hon. member is very straightforward. Does he really mean what he and his party are saying, when he rises in the House and says that he disagrees with our proposal to put some teeth into the system and make people who create their own misfortune, their own situation, bear the cost? That is how insurance works. Madam Speaker, have you ever seen a person who set his house on fire get compensation from the insurance company? What we are saying is that someone who sets his house on fire, who voluntarily quits his job without just cause, should not expect the workers of this country to pay his keep. Does the hon. member really mean it when he says we should maintain the status quo, ignore the deficit and keep raising the national debt and mortgaging the lives of future generations?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, as I and members of this party have said several times in our speeches, we believe in a penalty for those who quit without just cause, but the penalty has to be reasonable in consideration of the fact that just cause is often a grey area. It often is not clear cut, is very difficult to prove, takes a long time, and so on.

We do believe in a penalty that is reasonable. We believe in such reasonable penalties because we know, and the hon. member should know as well but he does not seem to, that even if you get unemployment insurance after, let us say, a penalty of five or six weeks you have to be ready and available for work. If you are not ready and available for work, then you can be totally denied unemployment insurance.

I would like to ask the hon. member a question, but he will not be able to answer. Maybe members of his party will be able to answer when they speak further in this debate. In 1990, just two years ago, the government did not seem to have this view of the unemployment insurance system. What it did was it extended the range of weeks of penalty to those who quit without just cause. At that time, two years ago, the government did not seem to think it was necessary to totally deny unemployment insurance benefits to those who might quit in a very difficult situation, because it was realized that they had to be ready and available for work and if they were not they would be denied benefits altogether.

I could ask the hon. member, as I did in my speech, where were the evaluation studies or where were the impact studies of the government which showed that what it did two years ago was not working? We were not given any such study. No, there is no basis for what it has proposed in Bill C-105 and in Bill C-113, this total denial of benefits.

A Conservative government was in place under the right hon. member for Yellowhead in 1979. He did not take the same point of view as this Mulroney government today that unemployment insurance benefits should be totally denied to those who quit. The Diefenbaker government in the late fifties and early sixties never took that point of view.

For years we have had unemployment insurance with reasonable penalties for those who quit without just cause. Reasonable penalties, because we knew there was another rule that you had to be ready and available for work.

Our policy in this party has been the mainstream policy of all parties for a number of years now, including the Conservative Party. It is the Conservative Party that has done an absolute flip-flop on these things from what it did two years ago. It has brought in this absolute denial of benefits to those who quit without just cause.

We agree that those who quit without just cause should be penalized, but it should not be an absolute excessive penalty. It should be a reasonable penalty considering that those people will still have to be ready and available for work.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I would like to preface my comments and my question by saying that I have a great deal of respect for that member. I consider him to be one of the senior members in this House and someone who has been here for many, many debates and for the many, many changes in legislation which have passed through this place.

At the same time, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. When he talks about the reduction of benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent, he refers to unemployment insurance as being a buffer, a stimulant for the economy in a community that is being hit hard by unemployment insurance. It helps people pay rent. It helps people put food on the table, et cetera. He is absolutely right.

I would like the hon. member to give me, if he can, his party's position. He has declared his position in that he opposes the reduction. In asking for his party's position, I remind the hon. member, who was probably in cabinet in 1978, it was the Liberal Party that reduced the benefits from 66-2/3 per cent to 60 per cent. At that time the Hon. Bud Cullen was the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He said that one of the reasons it was being reduced was to encourage people to stay at work, so that they would not quit, loaf and be on unemployment insurance.

I would like the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce to give us his explanation as to what his party's position is going to be in terms of the reduction in benefits. I doubt it very much but those members seem to think they are going to form the next government. I would like to ask the hon. member if that happens by some magical reason, will those members reintroduce benefits at the 66-2/3 per cent level in order that people are not put through undue hardships as a result of being unemployed?

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, the comments I made during my speech represent our party's policy.

We are opposed to the cut from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. It will be noted that in Bill C-113 this cut which was supposed to be an ongoing cut has now been limited to two years. We are opposed to that cut as a party. If we were to form the government, we would put it back to 60 per cent. Maybe at one time or another we would have a review of the unemployment insurance system and consider other ranges as well. We are not committed at this time to restoring it to 66 per cent. I have to be honest with the hon. member on that. What the exact amount of entitlement should be is open to debate.

Obviously no unemployment insurance system pays workers 100 per cent of what they were getting when they were employed. They are paid 75 per cent, 60 per cent, 66 per cent, or whatever. He is correct that in 1978 our party cut the payments from 66 per cent to 60 per cent. I can tell the hon. member I have not always been in full agreement with things done in our party, but overall I think our party's programs are better than any other party's program.

He is a member from Ontario. I would not be surprised if he does not agree with all things that are now being done by the NDP government in Ontario. He may think it is the best possible government for Ontario. I would be surprised if he agreed with everything that it has done recently. It has not done everything that I would expect it to do as a government in Ontario. It made a few cuts here and there that were not expected and that were never talked about when that party was in opposition.

Our party policy is that the rate should be 60 per cent at least. Perhaps we would agree to review that as a government to see if there is a more reasonable or a more just rate, but we are not committed to returning to 66 per cent. I appreciate that 66 per cent put more money in the pockets of the unemployed, but at the time the minister must have been balancing one thing off against the other.

We are opposed to this cut at this time. We think to bring in this cut now when we have over one million Canadians unemployed is totally ridiculous.

An hon. member: In the fifth year of its mandate.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, in the fifth year of its mandate. It is obviously a reaction to the policies of the Reform Party threatening the government's candidates in the west. There is no doubt about it. It was badly thought out, badly conceived and now the government is back-tracking and trying to correct the mistakes it made in Bill C-105.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the recent announcement that 1,200 public servants have been terminated by the Department of Supply and Services is to be followed by 1,700 more Public Service jobs to be lost within that department.

This a penny wise and pound foolish Conservative government. It has over its nine years in office demoralized the Public Service of Canada. It has destroyed a long proud record of public service to Canadians. The Tories have not saved Canadians any money with these cuts.

The goal for the Tory government is to scapegoat the Public Service. The goal for the Tory government is to privatize public services to provide additional patronage for its friends already too deeply gorged with public patronage and public taxpayers' dollars.

We call on the government to end this practice of destroying the Public Service of Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, a press release issued by the National Media Archive on February 16, 1993 says: "CBC sources misled the public on the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act announced in last December's Economic and Fiscal Statement. This is the primary finding of a soon to be released study conducted by the National Media Archive on CBC's and CTV's national news coverage of Don Mazankowski's mini budget".

It also says: "On the December 2, 1992 newscast, CBC quoted Judy Rebick's false claim that victims of harassment would be ineligible to collect UI benefits under the proposed changes. CBC not only failed to refute the statement in the remainder of the story but has continued to report these allegations as if they were true." That is from the press release.

Canadian taxpayers fund the CBC to the tune of nearly $1.3 billion. I think this study's finding on the quality of information that the CBC should provide is very important. I therefore ask the CRTC and Keith Spicer to consider this issue seriously. Canadians are entitled to expect that our national networks will provide quality, unbiased information and report the facts.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, today I challenge the Canada Post Corporation to abandon its policy of closing all rural Canadian post offices.

Under the corporation's natural opportunities policy, all rural post offices are slated for closure when the natural opportunity of retirement, resignation or death of a postmaster occurs.

This policy is seriously flawed and short-sighted. It does not allow for the examination of the particular situation of a community. When a natural opportunity presents itself, the corporation moves and closes the post office.

Canada Post announced that it would close the post office in Pointe-Verte, in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur. The corporation is still going ahead with this disastrous policy.

I oppose this policy and the closure of the post office in Pointe-Verte. I urge the government to order Canada Post to abandon forthwith its policy of closing post offices.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform you that an organization in my riding, the Société de coopération pour le développement international (SOCODEVI), has developed several original initiatives for International Development Week, an activity sponsored by the Canadian International Development Agency.

To help Canadians understand the issues of development and international co-operation, SOCODEVI has done various things to inform the public and raise awareness in the riding of Québec-Est and in several other regions of Quebec.

Also, with the co-operation of the Agropur co-operative, a message on International Development Week is being carried throughout February on more than seven million milk cartons all over Quebec.

This initiative shows the interest that private organizations have in working closely with international development groups to provide a better future for all.

TORONTO ECONOMY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the past two years over 100,000 jobs have been lost in metro Toronto, many of them never to return. In addition millions of square metres of office space sit empty. Almost $200 million in property taxes are due by companies that have gone bankrupt.

Tomorrow at the economic summit metro Chair Tonks and the six mayors are likely to ask Ottawa to declare Toronto an international banking centre like Vancouver and Montreal, to remove the federal freeze on transfer payments to Ontario, to invest in research and development for the advancement of rapid transit technology, to help redevelop the railway lands to enable urban intensification in the city, to clean up the polluted Toronto harbour from toxic contamination and hopefully to improve the aging sewer infrastructure.

We urge this government to help kick-start the metro economy. When Toronto thrives, Canada thrives. When Toronto suffers, Canada suffers.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, MSV Resources of the Corpomin group announced yesterday that it had reached an agreement in principle with Westminer, a mining company, whereby MSV would by the Copper Rand and Portage mines and the processing plant in Chibougamau from Westminer.

With this acquisition, MSV, which has a mining concession in Eastmain, north of Lake Mistissini, will produce 45,000 ounces of gold and 11 million pounds of copper a year and own a smelter with a capacity of 3,000 tonnes a day.

MSV announced that the transaction was preceded by an agreement on salary reductions for some 300 miners who lost their jobs when two plants closed on November 26, 1992.

On behalf of the mine workers, I want to thank the Mayor of Chibougamau, Ronald Blackburn, the James Bay Development Corporation, a dynamic minister in the Quebec government, Lise Bacon, and federal member of Parliament and Minister of National Health and Welfare for their work on this issue.

FORESTRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the importance of forestry to the economy of Canada is really Canada's best kept secret. The forestry industry which is the production of newsprint, kraft, fine papers, container board, and softwood lumber from two–by–fours to the finest plywood made for furniture is Canada's single largest industry.

The forestry industry provides over 750,000 jobs for all Canadians. There are over 8,000 businesses from small family sawmills to large corporations whose main purpose for being is the forestry industry.

Forestry is the main employer in over 350 small communities in Canada. It creates over $35 billion worth of wealth in our country and almost $20 billion of that is in export sales. Need I say more?

I ask this government and the governments of every province and every territory to protect this valuable Canadian resource, to protect this valuable Canadian industry, to assist it to expand its horizons and thereby create more jobs for all Canadians.

WORLD VISION FAMINE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, last month I wrote members urging them to support World Vision's 30–hour famine.

For the past 15 years World Vision Canada has encouraged teenagers across the country to abstain from eating solid food for 30 hours in an effort to raise awareness of the issues of Third World hunger.

Today I want to urge all Canadians through Parliament to support this worth–while venture. Last year the 30–hour famine involved 100,000 students across Canada and raised over $2 million.

World Vision is committed to emergency relief, the supplying of food, medicines, and supplies in situations of disaster and natural famine. It is also committed to long–term sustainable development.

Young people participating tomorrow and through Saturday will learn what lies behind the gnawing hunger that is a reality for millions of men, women and children every day in this world. They learn that they can do something about it. By inviting their families and friends to support them they also discover the benefits of being an advocate for the poor. By participating in this 30–hour famine young people become proactive in the program of experience, learning and sharing.

World Vision is proud of the kids who support and promote the 30–hour famine. They are tomorrow's leaders but they are making a difference today.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, earlier today at the National Arts Centre, a map of Canada was raised with over 200,000 signatures of Canadians from all regions demanding a halt to the cuts in arts and culture.

Since the election of the present government there has been a steady decrease in support to the arts. The arts community understands the dire conditions of our country's financial situation but it wonders about the economic management and wisdom of the government. While programs like the $4.4 billion for 50 helicopters are not cut and megadollars continue to be poured into white elephant megaprojects, the government however cuts funding to the arts and cultural industries.

• (1410)

The arts and cultural industries provide jobs to over 346,000 Canadians, return $17 billion to the Canadian economy and earn $1.3 billion in annual cultural exports.

This government's misplaced priorities will mean orchestras, theatre companies and galleries will have to close resulting in job loss and less productivity within the arts and cultural industries.

Canadians who have signed the largest petition ever presented by the arts community demand that the funds which have been cut be restored.

Canada has a strong and vibrant arts and cultural industry. Canadians are telling this government: "Do not destroy it".

ARMED FORCES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of this House the most unusual thing that has occurred to our Armed Forces.

Because we do not have enough regular troops to replace the ones in Yugoslavia and other areas, we are training reservists to be able to replace the regular force if necessary.

This House is aware that for almost two years the people of Annapolis and Digby counties along with the elected officials, both provincial and federal, have sought to add peacekeeping training to CFB Cornwallis.

What did this government allow our Armed Forces to do to train 826 reservists and regular troops? It allowed them to be sent from Manitoba to California to be trained for peacekeeping.

Imagine what that says to the rest of the world about Canada's ability for peacekeeping training. Imagine what it says to the people in the Armed Forces and to a place like CFB Cornwallis that does recruit training. Imagine what it says to the laid-off people and the businesses in the CFB Cornwallis area.

It makes absolutely no sense to send 826 Canadians to California to be trained in peacekeeping when we have the facilities in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, today Canadians have an example of a government that listened to their representations after Bill C-105 was tabled.

A special committee of the PC caucus conveyed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration the legitimate concerns expressed by Canadians. The committee members also made specific recommendations not only on the amendments proposed in the bill but also on several other points concerning the administration of unemployment insurance.

The minister listened to the committee and took its recommendations into account. That is why we have tabled the new Bill, C-113 which responds appropriately to the earnest representations we received.

This is the result of the serious work done by a committee of Progressive Conservative members and the open-mindedness of the minister.

MARKET VALUE ASSESSMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, literally thousands of residents in my riding of York West have been attending giant sized meetings and rallies to protest the increasing amount of property taxes and particularly to protest and outcry the decision of the Ontario New Democratic government to block market value assessment.

Market value assessment would have meant that for the residents in my riding over 80 per cent of those households would have seen a reduction in their property taxes.

The New Democratic Party purports to be the party of working class Canadians and the party that suggests day in and day out it is prepared to reform the system. The blockage of market value assessment by the New Democratic government in the province of Ontario is absolutely irresponsible.

I call on the premier of that province and of that government to reconsider and to give working and middle-class Canadians in my riding and countless other communities in metro a legitimate break. They have been paying too much for many years and now the New Democratic Party is forcing them to continue to pay those illegitimate costs.

TORONTO ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, employment in the Toronto region is now just over 90 per cent of its pre-recession level. In the rest of Canada employment has returned to 99 per cent of its pre-recession level.

The Toronto region represents one-sixth of Canada's population and about one-fifth of its total economy. Therefore Toronto must recover before Canada will truly return to prosperity.

The economic downturn has however created an opportunity. The fall in commercial and industrial real estate prices has made the region much more internationally competitive than it was during the late 1980s. Metro Toronto wants to take advantage of this by building a new international trade centre. A new trade centre in T'aipei boosted the entire economy of Taiwan. A new trade centre in Toronto can do the same for the Canadian economy.

Hopefully our government will be prepared to help Toronto to help Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, fair is fair and some issues should never be partisan.

Just as Jean Pelletier was wrong in his judgment about politics and race, and his views condemned, so too should be the views of those who have explicitly agreed with him such as that self-styled New Democratic pundit on CTV.

We should condemn as well the parliamentary secretary—remember the member for Athabasca—and his Tory colleagues on the employment and immigration committee who not only acted in an unusual way to suppress from public view testimony concerning discrimination in the Immigration and Refugee Board, but proceeded to treat the witnesses in the same inappropriate way about which refugees too often complain.

All of them are wrong. All have sullied the image of the Canada that I love.

Mr. Speaker: I am taking nothing away from the matter which the hon. member raises. While names were not named, I do not think it would be very hard to identify them. The imputation of motive was certainly very strong in the statement.

I listened carefully but I would ask hon. members to be very careful when they are making statements to keep in mind the strictures which bind us and that is there should be no personal attacks in member's statements.

LOBBYISTS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the Earnscliffe Strategy Group appeared before the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

An allegation was raised by the Earnscliffe group concerning the objectivity of a member of the press corps. It was alleged that Mark Kennedy, a reporter from The Ottawa Citizen had contacted Gordon Ashworth, who is the campaign director for the Liberal Party, concerning recent articles Mr. Kennedy wrote about the relationship between lobbying firms and government.

Mr. Kennedy pointedly asked Mr. Ashworth if Michael Robinson, a member of the Earnscliffe Group and also affiliated with the Liberal Party, was upset about the stories that had appeared in The Ottawa Citizens.

When Mr. Ashworth replied yes, indeed, Michael Robinson was less than happy about the coverage, the Citizen reporter stated that Mr. Robinson should not be upset because, and I quote: "the purpose of these stories was not to get to the Liberal Party but in fact to embarrass the Tory government".

It is small wonder that the Canadian public is disillusioned with politicians when stories are written or fabricated by the press corps with the express intent of embarrassing the government.

I call on The Ottawa Citizen to conduct an internal investigation of this allegation regarding Mr. Kennedy's journalistic practices.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, we saw an extraordinary contrast. President Clinton introduced measures to create up to 500,000 jobs, to stimulate the economy, to raise taxes for those earning over $100,000 and to spare families earning less than $30,000. Here in Canada on the same day, the worn-out, tired Conservative government created no jobs and attacked the unemployed who make $253 a week on average.

Does the minister really think that he can fool the people of Canada as easily as he fooled the Conservative caucus?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member's interpretation and allegations are absolutely false.

What I heard last night in President Clinton's address to the nation was a program to provide stimulus to strengthen the economic recovery, a program of targeted investments in people, training, infrastructure, technology and equipment.

• (1420)

That is precisely what we undertook to do in the December statement. We took steps to invest in people, to invest in infrastructure, to enhance the small business sector activity, to enhance trade, to enhance research and development. We talked about partnerships with labour, with business and with the provinces. We froze salaries. We continued our program of de-scoping government and scaling down the operations of government, streamlining agencies. We put forward a deficit reduction plan.

Clearly the President of the United States believes that the deficit and the debt are important considerations, key to economic growth, key to bringing down interest rates, and key to investment. In that regard, it is really very little different from the plan we announced in December. The only difference is that they propose to tax and tax very heavily. We provided tax relief.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): There have been 34 new taxes since 1984, Mr. Speaker. I wish the minister would go to the people and let them judge this government on its tax record. President Clinton said quite clearly last night that people earning under $30,000 a year would be spared.

In fact, this week in a bill put before the House, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is asking those people who earn on average $253 a week to take a 3 per cent cut in light of the government's deficit position.

How does the government justify attacking the unemployed, whose average salary currently is $253 a week? Why is the President of the United States kick-starting the economy and the Prime Minister of Canada kicking the unemployed?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member is outdated. She is talking about horrendous tax increases. Yes, there were some tax increases. Surely she would not expect the Canadian people to go on with the policy the Liberals had in place which provided for the expenditure of $1.33 for every dollar's worth of revenue that was being taken in and that generated a $38 billion deficit.

She talks about low income people. I remind the hon. member that under tax reform a number—850,000 families, I believe—were taken off the tax rolls. People earning under $30,000 have their GST refunded to them. The child benefit program helps the working poor. It targets the money from the rich to the working poor to help them raise their families and stay in the labour force. Those are very positive and progressive policies.

The hon. member should go back and read up on some of the programs and plans that we have put in place.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that in Montreal, one family in four is living on welfare thanks to his economic policies. Last night, President Clinton announced a program to create at least 500,000 jobs. Here in Canada, although the Liberal Party has been asking repeatedly in the past year for a municipal infrastructures program that could provide that kind of boost for the Canadian economy, it has yet to materialize.

Again, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister how he can justify cutting benefits to people who are earning $253 a week, while he does not take anything from people earning more than $100,000?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Clinton's short-term proposals provide for $3 billion in highway investments, $2.5 billion in community development block grants, $845 million in waste water clean-up initiatives and a temporary incremental investment tax credit.

We have provided for an infrastructure program that will invest some $2 billion and create some 4,000 to 5,000 jobs every year in strategic investment. Based on the size of the two economies, we have contributed more to the infrastructure program than has President Clinton. Also, the additional investments in research and development, the electronic highway and the investment in the microwave landing system are investments in infrastructure. They are investments to create new job activity and new opportunities for Canadians.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

The many changes to the UI legislation proposed by the minister only fooled the Quebec Tory caucus. The fact remains that the proposed changes to the UI act do not guarantee that a person who deserves UI benefits will get them. This is the most fundamental flaw of this legislation.

Will the minister abandon this ridiculous approach toward deficit reduction and so-called UI reform and withdraw this bill?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is suggesting that those people who voluntarily leave their jobs should qualify for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Program, paid for by the workers and the employers of Canada, I have to tell him no, we will not accept the position of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that while this government was trying to figure out whether the demonstrators in Montreal were separatist, whether it would set up a UI snitch line or UI police, the reality of this tragic comedy is that there are 1.6 million Canadians waiting for this government to take the leadership and put them back to work.

Why do you not address the number one problem of this country which is unemployment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we have done in this bill is clarify a number of the issues that were raised.

We particularly clarified the distortions and the misinformation that was perpetuated by the members opposite and by other critics of the program. We have clarified the issue and we hope that the hon. member will now support it.

There is some very positive action on the trade front which is good for jobs. In the manufacturing sector—

Mr. Nault: What are you going to say now?

Mr. Mazankowski: I know good news is not welcome over there but manufacturing sales have increased by 17.2 per cent in the last six months.

Canadian exports reached a record high annual level of $157.5 billion. That is an 11 per cent increase over 1991 and the largest year over year increase since 1984. Exports to the United States reached a record high of $122.3 billion, $14.7 billion more than in 1991 and $20 billion more since the free trade agreement came into effect in 1988.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, they are not going to shout me down. Good news is very tough to filter through this gang. I am telling you and the Canadian people the fact of the matter is very simply—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: These people across the way are trying to oppose the free trade agreement, the GST and all the things that have turned this economy around.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this morning our New Democrat leader released a five-year plan to achieve half a million additional jobs and cut unemployment—

• (1430)

Mr. Langdon: As I said, our New Democrat leader this morning released a plan which would achieve 500,000 additional jobs and cut unemployment levels to 7 per cent. For the first time ever in the country the plan was released with an independent assessment by a neutral, professional, economic forecasting company.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. This independent assessment says that the New Democrat plan means thousands more jobs, an $8 billion savings on the deficit and lower taxes for 80 per cent of Canadians, compared to the present government's approach. Will the government take off its partisan hat, seriously consider this full employment package and accept this challenge to put 500,000 more Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues on this side of the House called it a plan from Disneyworld. In many respects it is kind of a Chrétien II economic policy. They are calling for a national infrastructure and the expenditure of something in the order of $25 billion. They have not told us whether they are going to borrow the money or who they are going to tax.

They talk about eliminating the GST and that is going to create 50,000 jobs. They should ask the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association tells us that the GST has had the effect of improving their competitive position by between $3.5 billion and $4 billion. That is why we have seen manufacturing sales going up by 17 per cent in the second half of this year. They want to scrap the free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Isn't that wonderful? Our exports to the United States are up by almost 20 per cent since we signed the free trade deal. Every province in Canada has benefited from the free trade agreement, and they want to dismantle it. Why do they want to dismantle those things that are creating jobs, creating economic activity, bringing the economy along and allowing people to enjoy—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on a supplemental.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the minister should read the plan before he comments. He would find the figures that he has quoted—

Mr. Speaker: The proper way to put a question is to put a preamble and to put the question. The proper way to answer it is to pay attention as closely as possible to the question and try to respond to it. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Langdon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for pointing that out to both of us. My point is that we have a plan to put forward which eliminates the GST because it will benefit jobs and will cut taxes for 80 per cent of Canadians.

We have a realistic plan of action that will create 500,000 more jobs and reduce the deficit to a far greater extent than would the government's proposal.

Is the minister prepared to set partisan considerations aside? Is he prepared to give our plan of action careful consideration and create the jobs that are so important to Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, he has to make up his mind. According to the document I read, I think the NDP's objective is to contain the deficit and not to reduce it. He talked just now about reducing the deficit.

The member also says that they have a plan for creating jobs. I think they are calling for the creation of 1.6 million jobs over a five-year period.

The Conference Board of Canada, on the basis of the current economic policies in place and the monetary and fiscal policies the government is following, has estimated that there would be 1,651,000 jobs created over the next five years. That is the Conference Board of Canada. That is about 51,000 more. Why is he being a piker about it?

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister must admit that at least we have a plan, unlike the Liberal Party of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nystrom: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance to take a look at one of these specific proposals: the idea of creating 70,000 new jobs through a national day care system, a promise that was made repeatedly by the Conservative government across the way, a promise that has been broken repeatedly by the government across the way. Will he now look at a national day care plan and put 70,000 people to work in something that is needed in this country and do it right away?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed there is a striking similarity between the NDP plan and the Liberal plan. That is why I call it a Chrétien II plan.

They are proposing a national infrastructure program. They are not saying how it would be paid for. They are talking about deficit reduction or deficit containment, and yet they are going to spend $6 billion to $10 billion on a new national child care program. They talk about the elimination of the GST which would force our manufacturing and processing sector to be in a non-competitive position again. They do not talk about how they are going to replace it.

They talk about abrogating the free trade agreement. Why would they want to abrogate the free trade agreement when it is one of the most important elements of our economic success? That is where the jobs are being created. That is where the initiative for growth is occurring. That is why the combination of the tax reform, the dismantlement of the manufacturers' sales tax, the free trade agreement, the North American free trade agreement, the tax policy and the investment policy are now starting to produce results. The Conference Board of Canada has recognized that.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, a funding crisis for over 400,000 workers in the Canadian arts and cultural industry has been created by this government. Today hundreds of artists stood out in the freezing cold, raised a petition on the wall of the National Arts Centre, called for no more cuts to the arts and asked for a positive, forward looking response from the government to the cultural committee's four-month old report requiring a response called The Ties that Bind.

Will the Acting Prime Minister stand and promise no more cuts to the arts? Will he commit to a positive response to the committee's recommendation that would strengthen Canada's national identity, properly financed through our Canadian cultural industries? Will he do that today for Canadian artists?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the communications and culture portfolio's adjusted total appropriations in 1992-93 are $2.3 billion. Even with the reductions from the February 1992 budget and the operational review exercise, adjusted appropriations for the portfolio in 1992-93 show an increase of $178.8 million over 1991-92 or 8.5 per cent, which clearly exceeds the level of inflation for the same period of 2.3 per cent.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that is the most creative bookkeeping the arts, culture and Canadians have heard in a long time.

Parliament has passed the Status of the Artist Act which provides, among other things, for establishing a tribunal on professional relations. This was eight months ago. Unfortunately the government still refuses to make this legislation effective, thus denying artists the right to collective bargaining.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister and otherwise to the Minister of Labour. When will he make this legislation enforceable? When will he establish this tribunal? Is the government capable of keeping its word? Or is it going to maintain its present attitude, in other words ignore all artists in this country?

• (1440)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have made a note of the hon. member's question. I know the bill respecting the status of the artist was adopted by the House of Commons and by the other place. I am discussing the matter with the Minister of Communications, and as soon as we have a decision, we will be delighted to confirm that for the hon. member.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Solicitor General.

Many people across the country are angry about the number of violent crimes committed by people on parole. They feel that law-abiding members of society are being placed at risk by the parole system.

What is being done to ensure that the protection of the public is the most important factor in all decisions relating to the treatment and release of inmates?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I share my hon. colleague's concern about this issue.

Bill C-36 was proclaimed in December. Clearly the paramount principle in the legislation guiding the parole board in granting any form of conditional releases is the protection of society.

With Bill C-36 we also lengthened the time that violent and serious drug offenders spend in prison by delaying eligibility for full parole.

It is most important to make sure that society will be well protected by keeping those who represent a danger in jail for a longer period of time. We understand that and I think this is in Bill C-36. My colleague and I are still looking at this issue.

MAGAZINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

Sports Illustrated thinks it has found a loophole in Canada's laws that are protected in the free trade agreement and in the NAFTA. This magazine plans to divert from the Canadian magazine industry large advertising revenues at a time when the industry is reeling from Tory economic policies.

Will the minister say no to Sports Illustrated, and to all other foreign publishers who seek to violate Canada's laws and to ruin Canada's magazine industry?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would have been following the debate with U.S. magazine publishers and the government, he would have noted last week that, as this article says: "Ottawa warns U.S. magazines over ad inserts". That continues to be the case.

We fought very hard on behalf of Canada to keep the cultural context in the free trade agreement. I can assure the hon. member and this House that we will continue to maintain that position.

We are in discussion with representatives of Time Warner with regard to Sports Illustrated magazine. We have warned them of the existing rules and regulations that are in place. We have told them that they must abide by those rules and regulations, otherwise appropriate action by the government would be taken.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not go far enough to say that if there were loopholes in the present law the government would bring in new legislation to plug those loopholes.

I also have another suggestion for the minister. As he knows, Time Warner is the American owner of both Sports Illustrated and Time magazine. This company is the one that is pressing ahead to subvert Canadian laws and to steal away Canadian advertising revenues.

Maybe the minister would be willing to consider ending the special privileges Time magazine now enjoys in Canada, of dumping U.S. content into Canada and shipping millions of Canadian dollars to the United States.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member prefaced his question by saying if there are loopholes in the legislation. That is a hypothetical question and very difficult to answer because we do not know at this point in time what Time Warner intends to do with Sports Illustrated.

In discussions with Time Warner, we have asked them to deliver to us a detailed brief to tell us what their plans are. Upon receipt of that brief we will look at what they are planning to do, failing which we will wait until the first publication comes into Canada and then we will take the necessary and appropriate action according to the rules and regulations that are in place today.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance will know that many times in this House I have asked him and his predecessors to consider making the income tax system in Canada more progressive, particularly by creating new income tax brackets at the top end of the spectrum for people who are making six figures in this country. Many times I have received the answer that we cannot do this because we have to remain competitive with the United States.

Given that President Clinton has moved to create such a tax and such a tax bracket in the United States, will the Minister of Finance now consider making Canada's income tax system more progressive by doing what the NDP has been asking him to do for a long time and reiterated today in the statement by our leader?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if we take into account the provincial and federal levels of tax, the U.S. proposal that Mr. Clinton outlined last night would reduce the difference in the top Canadian marginal tax rate and the top U.S. rate. The U.S. proposals provide for a range from 40 to 47 per cent, while the top Canadian range would be something in the order of 46.1 to 51.9 per cent in 1993.

In effect, at that level our taxes are still considerably higher than the United States.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, President Clinton has asked wealthy Americans to make some sacrifice in order to bring around their economy and in order to reduce their deficit, a sacrifice that has not been asked of the wealthy in this country.

I am asking the Minister of Finance to reconsider the answer that he just gave me. On previous occasions I have asked him about the business and entertainment tax deduction which costs this country about $1 billion a year. I understand that President Clinton has apparently moved to reduce that kind of break in the United States, so the Minister of Finance no longer has the excuse that we have to remain competitive.

Will he consider eliminating that tax break here in Canada and freeing up $1 billion to create jobs in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member talks about the loopholes and the wealthy not paying taxes, he really is in effect dealing in many respects with those people who utilize their lifetime capital gains exemption. Because of that there is a reduced tax burden. There is no question about that.

What I think the hon. member is really suggesting in an indirect way or maybe even in a direct way is the fact that he would like to see the lifetime capital gains exemption removed. That is not the position of this government.

He would like to see the lifetime capital gains—

Mr. Speaker: We really will have to move on. The hon. member for Moncton.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence or whoever is going to speak for her in her absence. It concerns the closure of the Moncton base and depot.

I was pleased that the minister agreed last week in a statement to media in Charlottetown and Halifax to review the decision to close the Moncton depot.

Will she promise to the citizens' committee input into a review? Because the workers at the depot are on tenterhooks wondering whether they have a job or not, will the minister tell us when the review on the closure will be completed?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence is unfortunately not in Ottawa today. She indicates that she certainly is aware of the concerns of colleagues in the community, but the reality is that rationalization of DND structures is essential if there is going to be enough money to provide the equipment the military needs. As she indicated, she will in fact be discussing the issue with the community involved. If the hon. member wants more details, I am sure he can talk to the minister when she is back in Ottawa.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this minister and the previous minister have both indicated that the closure of the Moncton depot is to proceed quickly. Has the minister issued a stop work order on the closure of the Moncton depot pending the outcome of her review, or in light of her letter of February 4 is this promised review as hollow a promise as the $100 million expansion given by three previous Tory ministers?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I guess he had his supplementary written out before I answered his first question. I do not think I have anything more to add.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

My question is for the Minister of Finance. The aboriginal people of Canada, including the Innu of Davis Inlet, have identified control of their own lives and preservation and enhancement of their languages and cultures as priority goals.

Given the desperate social conditions in aboriginal communities nation-wide, why is the government in this international year of indigenous peoples about to cut aboriginal language, culture and communications programs by as much as 10 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question, but I imagine he is also aware of the general situation in this country. Government decisions are made with that situation in mind, and not on the basis of one particular sector. I think he should remember that when asking his question.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, with respect to control, the Innu have expressed their desire to establish a bilateral relationship with the federal government without the province in between.

The premier of Newfoundland has expressed a willingness to discuss this. Is the federal government prepared to enter into direct bilateral negotiations with the Innu in relation to the Innu getting control of their own lives?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I think the government and the Prime Minister made considerable progress in 1990 on Native issues, and subsequently—especially in 1992—the Prime Minister worked very hard to ensure that Canada's native people would have their place in the Canadian Constitution. Once again he did a remarkable job.

That being said, to respond more specifically to the hon. member's question he must realize that the way the Canadian Constitution and our statutes are drafted means that we must work as a team and consult with the provinces on certain issues. That is the philosophy which guides this government and my department in helping to improve the well-being of native people and Innu across the country.

LUMBER EXPORTS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the minister of external affairs and the international trade minister, the two ministers involved, I would like to put this question directly to the Deputy Prime Minister since it does involve international relations and a disaster about ready to happen unless the government takes a little stronger action than it has taken to date.

I am referring to the European Common Market non-tariff barriers on the importation of Canadian lumber.

I know there was a delegation in Ottawa the other day. I hope that delegation met some of the members of the Tory government caucus and that it may have been discussed in caucus.

I think the Deputy Prime Minister must know that the effective date of this non-tariff barrier that affects $1.4 billion worth of trade is June 1.

What is the government going to do about the lack of response on the verbal note, the protest note, that was sent on September 4? We still have not had a reply from Europe.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade has protested what the hon. member is complaining about.

There are intense communications going on now. I expect we are going to have a favourable reaction to what we have proposed to the Europeans.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and/or to the minister of small business or whatever.

We are talking about trade. This House is preoccupied with NAFTA, unemployment insurance and many other important things. These are people who presently have jobs in a very precarious part of Canada, the Atlantic region, eastern Canada, and parts of Ontario. I ask the government if it is action to sit for five months when in the arcane world of diplomacy there is a protest note and you have not heard a reply. As I understand it, it is because five ministries are involved in Ottawa—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question. The minister may wish to respond.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The Minister for International Trade is heading up the team and progress is being made. I would like the hon. member to know that we are hopeful of a successful resolution of this.

I would also like to remind him that today export figures came out indicating that our trade surplus, not just with the United States which is up a record amount, 8.8 per cent to $17 billion, but with the rest of the world which is now over $9.6 billion, the highest it has ever been in Canadian history.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. One of the things that the New Democratic economic statement recognizes is that joblessness and the empowerment of Canadian workers in a knowledge-based economy depends upon a very much greater emphasis being put on training and education, from day care to the doctorate, if we are going to thrive and create jobs in the modern economic circumstances in which Canada must compete.

My question to the hon. minister is this: Is this government prepared to recognize that it must put far greater emphasis on creating the context for workers in this country to be much better trained, much better taught and have greater opportunities to learn, to create jobs as a most effective attack on the deficit, rather than using the deficit as an excuse for doing nothing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the hon. member. That is why under the science and technology envelope we are spending $5.9 billion on research and development through the universities and the granting councils. That is why we are spending $3.8 billion on training and skills upgrading and retraining programs. That is why we have established the network of Centres of Excellence. That is why we are increasing the funding to the Industrial Research Assistance Program. That is why we are committing $250 million over five years to lever a national private sector driven training effort. That is why the government is developing tax incentives to help defray the cost of training workers to the occupational standards set up by the councils. That is why we are committing—

Mr. Speaker: This is of great interest and I know the hon. minister might want to send a note. The hon. member, a short supplemental.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): The fact is that expenditures on training and education and research and development are inadequate in this country. In the president's economic statement of last night he indicated that there are going to be sharp cuts in the expenditures on the space program.

Mr. Speaker: I do ask members and ministers to co-operate. We are getting close to the end of Question Period. I have asked that questions be put succinctly and as short as possible and that the answers be the same.

Mr. McCurdy: My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: There are going to be hundreds of millions of dollars over the next decade saved by a cutback in the space program. Will he use this money and the money saved from abandoning the helicopter program to double investment in the Industrial Research Assistance Program and double grants to universities and colleges so that they can carry out research and increase their level of research in this country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The Canadian Space Program is perhaps the jewel in the Canadian science crown in terms of producing high-tech jobs. I am surprised that the hon. member wants to do away with the Canadian Space Program. I am shocked. Tens of thousands of jobs.

In the president's speech last night three things were reaffirmed by his science adviser: First of all, the program will continue. It will be streamlined. What they do they will do in consultation with their partners, Canada included.

FORESTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario NDP government has recently announced that it is cutting its tree seedling program from $170 million to $110 million per year. This is a whopping 35 per cent reduction. It is obscene.

What is the federal government going to do to rectify this more than deplorable situation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that is absolutely awful. We will look into it right away.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, moreover, in 1989 the Prime Minister tabled in the House the bill to create the forestry department.

Then he added much importance to the concept of sustainable development. How can this government stand by idly today and allow the Ontario government to regress on its reforestation policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that our government's Minister of Forestry is very respectful of fields of jurisdiction. My colleague knows very well that reforestation is in provincial jurisdiction. Nevertheless, in 1991 we signed a $50-million agreement with the province of Ontario to promote sustainable forest development. The Government of Ontario and the federal government, through the Department of Forestry, put over $30 million into technology transfer and I think this is a considerable contribution of our government to the province of Ontario.

ICE JAMS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. For several days, an ice jam on the St. Lawrence River at Tracy has threatened to flood properties along the river in several municipalities, including Repentigny. Some have said that these problems are due to the failure to install ice booms this year.

Could the minister give us some indication of where matters stand now and explain why no ice booms were put up this year?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform my colleague that the question is important because several municipalities along the St. Lawrence River are affected by this situation. I must tell him that a few days ago, we had at least five ice-breakers working to remove the jam and the operation was successful. The situation should now return to normal very quickly.

We did not install ice booms because observations made by the Coast Guard in recent years showed that they were not effective.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Varaztad Avonyan, member of Parliament of the Republic of Armenia and General Secretary of the Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to correct an erroneous impression that may have inadvertently been made during Question Period.

During the preface to his question, the member for York North implied that changes made to the unemployment aspect of what is now Bill C-113 were introduced as a concession to a Quebec caucus.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. It may be a very important point and it may be an exact point, but it is a matter for debate and is not a question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD APPOINTMENT

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

On February 12, this month, the Minister of Agriculture announced the appointment of Ken Beswick as Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Since that time, Mr. Beswick has given interviews in the role of commissioner. No Order in Council has been tabled in this House. As late as just a few minutes ago, my office checked with the Privy Council Office and no such order has been issued.

I would like to know what is going on. Is this a charade? After all, we have a man parading around as a new Canadian Wheat Board commissioner but there is no Order in Council. As you know, Mr. Speaker, certain members of this House have responsibilities regarding the Canadian Wheat Board but we have difficulties carrying out those duties because of the incompetence of this government.

Why has the minister made the announcement—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his point. I am prepared to consider it. Is there any reply?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, yes, there is a reply.

To begin with, that was not a point of order. It has nothing to do with the order of the House. There is nothing that this gentleman has done, at least by what I heard, that was disruptive to the conducting of business in this House or in any way reflects on the order of the House, which points of order are supposed to be all about.

From what I understand of the gentleman in question from all concerned, he would make an outstanding commissioner of the Wheat Board and I am sure the hon. member from Winnipeg is looking forward to his appointment as I am.

Mr. Speaker: I have some concern as to whether it is a point of order, but I will consider the representation made and I will report back to the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the government House leader could give us the House business for the remaining part of this week as well as next week. While he is on his feet, perhaps he could also indicate when the next supply day might be.

Third, can he confirm for the House that the tabling of the estimates will in fact be next Thursday, February 25? In view of the break in the calendar could he indicate to the House the date and timing of the throne speech which has been intimated in previous conversations by numerous individuals on that side of the House?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in terms of business this afternoon we will proceed with second reading of Bill S-8, the Motor Vehicle Act, which we hope we will be able to consider during the course of debate and proceed with all stages of this bill. I understand there might be a consensus to look at that. In any event, my intent then is to go to Bill C-88. I understand there might be agreement among all parties to have report stage and third reading of this important legislation passed.

Tomorrow we will complete third reading of Bill C-76, the Budget Implementation Act. On Monday I hope to complete second reading of Bill C-110, the Northumberland Strait Crossing Act, which is so important to job creation in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island by this important infrastructure program. Since all parties are in favour of infrastructure investment, I am sure they will be anxious to pass this bill to show that their views expressed about infrastructure investment are factual and not simply for effect.

On Tuesday morning we will commence second reading debate on Bill C-92, the income tax technical bill. In the afternoon we hope to complete second reading of Bill C-101, the Canada Labour Code Act. If time permits we would also like to have second reading of Bill C-101, the Criminal Code Act dealing with radio communications, protection of privacy and so on.

As usual, I will carry on discussions with House leaders in terms of other business.

In regard to a supply day, given the way yesterday's supply day was used, I am surprised that there should be so much interest in getting another one, but the rules spell out the number of required supply days. However, I also have a lot of legislation which failure to pass is costing the taxpayers a lot of money. I would like to get the co-operation of opposition parties to pass this legislation to save the taxpayers money. Then of course we could look at supply days and in fact other interesting debates on subjects that would be of interest. Our first priority has to be the concern for the taxpayers who are paying unnecessarily because of the delay in the legislation.

It still is the government's intention to bring the Main Estimates on Thursday, February 25.

In terms of a throne speech, stay tuned, you will be enthralled and on your feet applauding vigorously.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, just so the government House leader and members of the House are not in the dark, the hon. House leader of the government knows full well that those of us in the opposition have been attempting to try to co-operate with the government where we can. However, it is not our fault that the government is waiting so long to call Bill C-110 which it says is of great importance as well as other legislation. When it does pass second reading I would hope that ample opportunity would given at committee stage to have a full airing of the legislation. Although it may be important, it is important for Canadians to have a full debate of those subject matters. I hope I can get an undertaking from the government House leader that he will instruct his colleagues in that regard.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in reply to that comment, the one thing those who observed this House and expressed such disapproval of its conduct have not said is that we do not debate enough. The one thing they do say is that too often the debate is irrelevant.

I can assure the hon. member that all members on this side are always interested in good, productive, constructive debate, suggestions, ideas, comments and so on. At some point in time we have to allow things to come to a vote. All I am appealing for is to allow that to happen in a timely fashion so that we can use the rest of our time debating subjects of the opposition's choosing and other areas not directly related to the legislative program of the government.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, when the government House leader reported on House business he suggested there might be an agreement to consider Bill S-8 at all stages today.

To my knowledge—and in addition to being the Whip I am the critic—there have not been discussions to do anything more than facilitate second reading approval today. Then off it goes to the transport committee for the normal review, not necessarily for a long time. Certainly I do not want the House to misunderstand the agreement which, as far as I know, is only for second reading today.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, obviously we cannot proceed any further without the agreement of everybody in the House. Since the agreement is not forthcoming that is it.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I understand by divine telepathy that there have been discussions among the House leaders, but not being party to them I should like to ask in the open court here of the House of Commons just where the electoral reform bill stands.

As the government House leader and anyone who read the commission report will know, there is a fundamental discrimination in the present election law adverse to Independents raising money and giving tax receipts, which is a pretty fundamental part of the whole election process. Frankly it is something I should have taken to the Supreme Court last year. I would have won but I did not have the money at the time.

I think the government intends to bring in a whole bill and is trying to get the agreement of parties. I indicate to the government House leader that other members and I—in fact we all do—have a very real interest in the bill.

Are we going to see it before the break in March, or is it going to come in after March? I should like some idea of a timeframe.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am very hopeful I will be able to get a draft copy of it within minutes. Hopeful is the operative word, not sure.

With regard to the question the hon. member raised, a committee of the House has been looking at amendments to the electoral act for some months. There are some things on which there is a consensus among all parties that would be useful to put in place and that require the Chief Electoral Officer to have a long lead time before he can do them. The first bill that will be coming forward will actually deal with those subjects.

The question of the rules with respect to funds, tax deductions, allowable limits and so on is something that literally could be agreed to on the eve of an election and be implemented during an election.

It is my understanding that the committee is now working on those and expects to have a report on that within weeks, not months. That second tranche of amendments would also be brought forward as a bill.

It is certainly the desire of the government to have these changes in place prior to the next election. A lot of money was invested in the Lortie royal commission on electoral reform and there have been many months of hard work by members of this House of Commons. It would seem to me a disservice to everybody concerned if we did not get these changes passed and in place prior to the next election.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): On the same bill, Mr. Speaker, I have the same reservations as the hon. member, especially when we consider an article that appeared in Le Soleil. It says that instead of providing for comprehensive changes in the bill, the proposed amendments seem to be taking aim at members of the Bloc Quebecois and Independents, in that these members would lose their right as the candidates having received the most votes to monitor enumeration proceedings. Similarly by abandoning phase two of the bill we would also lose air time on television and radio.

Will the minister confirm that if there is electoral reform it will be across the board? In fact his party made a formal commitment to improve electoral practices. This commitment was mainly to restrict spending by big corporations and so forth, not to a mini-reform leading to partisanship or the form of dictatorship we see in certain countries, and ensuring that specific parties, not democratically elected representatives, control the electoral process.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, this whole set of reforms comes out of the Lortie commission and has been studied by a committee of the House.

The government has not come forward with a set of proposals and said: "Here are the government's proposals". What has happened is that a committee of the House has examined the recommendations and has come up with a report. All the government did in respect of that report was check it out to see whether the Department of Justice would okay certain amendments as to whether they agreed with the charter of rights.

They should not accuse the government. I know certain interests have been suggesting that the Prime Minister was behind the business of spending limits and so on. The Prime Minister has never expressed an opinion on that to me. I do not know what his opinion is.

This is an initiative of the House of Commons and it is a consensus of all parties. I cannot guarantee at the end of the day that it will have 100 per cent approval of each and every member of the House. I can say with some assurance that if there is significant opposition by significant numbers of members it probably will not go through. These are the rules for running elections. It has to have the approval of members of the House of Commons, and that is what we are seeking.

I remind the hon. member, as I said to the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, that there are three tranches. The big issue and the first one, quite frankly, is the question of allowing Canadians who are not in their constituency or not in the country on election day to vote with special ballots. It requires about six months for the Chief Electoral Officer to put them in place. That is why it is separated from the second issue of spending limits and so on which the committee is working on. I am expecting a report very soon.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to make a couple of comments regarding some of the issues we have been speaking about. The member to my left spoke about the whole situation of spending limits and making sure that radio and television time had been paid for and distributed fairly. This is something I have had particular interest in and Canadians have been watching. It would seem that someone in power—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret, but this is debate. I do not think we should get into that. If the member has a question for the House leader I ask her please to put it.

Miss Grey: My question revolves around volume VI of the report of the Electoral Commission. I do not have it with me, but it is the one about women and spending ceilings for nomination meetings. I heard from members of the committee that actual legislation was written up.

The commission was obviously aware that legislation was difficult. It took the time to write up an actual piece of legislation. I am just wondering at what point it is. Will it be used? Will it be paid attention to or will it be nixed?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have to suggest the hon. member should go to the committee that is looking into it because she is asking technical questions.

I do not know. I am not a member of that committee. I am reacting to the report of the committee. The first tranche does not deal with that kind of question as far as I know.

However, if the member wants to get into the details of the Lortie report and the committee's activities, she should attend the committee meetings.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order about this subject.

It is about this bill.

My rights and privileges as an independent member will be violated in the report that is to be tabled. The newspapers mentioned this. I want to make sure of the bill and the complicity of the three major parties. It never mentioned the Bloc Quebecois. It referred to the three major parties. They have agreed to violate the rights of independent members and members of the Bloc. This is a serious matter. Mr. Speaker, and it is your responsibility to investigate this.

• (1520)

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, no one minds hon. members asking questions of the government House leader with regard to the business of the House. In point of fact the government House leader responded in full to the questions which have been put to him.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dingwall: You may not like the answers, but nevertheless there were answers.

The second point is that the hon. member has used the term complicity. We in this House all know the connotations of that word. It impugns the motives of all hon. members of different political parties.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would do some reflection upon the intervention made by my colleague. I do not think it is necessary. I do not think it is appropriate. I do not think it is fair to members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I agree with the hon. member.

If the hon. member wishes to withdraw and drop the debate, I would ask him to withdraw his statement. Does he wish to withdraw?

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: The hon. member was disturbed by the word complicity. I am willing to explain the meaning I had in mind when I used it, but I will withdraw and use another word. Mr. Speaker, just a minute; let me finish. You are very patient with other members but seem to be very impatient in my case. If I use the word—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think I have been very patient with the hon. member. I wish he would come to the point. If he has a further question to ask of the government House leader, then he should ask it, put his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: My question is as follows: Will the bill violate my rights as a member and as a winning candidate by prohibiting me from monitoring the enumeration proceedings and giving that right to the party with the most votes? These are my rights and that is why I am saying that, like in the last referendum—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is not a question. It is debate. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-8, an act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just before the minister rises to speak on this bill, there have been some discussions among the three parties. Because of an overlap of the transport committee sitting simultaneously with this bill, the member for Davenport who will be speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party has graciously agreed to switch places with me, provided that he has the normal amount of time that would be allocated had he spoken in the normal order; in other words, whatever the Standing Order provides for the second speaker.

I will speak for 10 minutes at the most. The order will be the Minister of Transport, followed by myself, followed by the member for Davenport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to open the debate on second reading of Bill S-8, an act to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. This bill is an update of existing legislation and combines two acts, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act, that are now in force.

I would like to put this bill in context by noting that in the 20 or so years since the original acts were passed, we have incredibly seen a reduction in the number of traffic fatalities despite a doubling of the number of vehicle registrations. Even with these remarkable improvements, road accidents cost Canadians more than $6 billion each year in lost working time, health care, property damage and legal actions. This economic reality does not count individual pain and suffering. The new Motor Vehicle Safety Act will play a major role in future safety improvements. There are exciting opportunities for vehicle design and manufacture, including anti-lock braking systems, air bag supplementary restraints and improved side impact protection.

An effective regulatory program will ensure that these measures and many more are available to Canadians as soon and as widely as possible.

The bill seeks to make the process of regulation development more responsive to changes in industry and international standards. Nowhere is that more evident than in areas that touch on our concerns for the environment. The new legislation provides us with the ability to incorporate complex technical standards for a dynamic industry at the leading edge of technology, as fast as they are implemented anywhere in the world.

Harmful emissions from motor vehicles have been the target of considerable attention, within the restrictions of our existing legislative framework. The new act will make us even more responsive.

Better combustion through elaborate sensors and electronic control, improved after treatment with new catalyst designs and on-board diagnostic systems to warn of and identify emission control failures all offer cleaner vehicles in the future.

The bill provides for phase-in of standards and for a system of emission credits, providing Canadian industry with the same flexibility to plan compliance as is offered in the United States.

The emission credit system proposed in the bill will allow standards to be set that more evenly challenge industry to achieve the tightest possible emission targets. Averaging, banking, trading and civil penalties, components of the credit program, are all contained in the bill. These authorities will allow Canada to apply parallel standards with the same force as those in the United States and other jurisdictions.

Another area that witnesses discussed during the committee hearings in the other place concerned vehicles purchased in the United States for importation to Canada.

[English]

First I want to absolutely assure this House that the authority provided by this bill will be used to establish an effective process to see that all such vehicles meet our over-all Canadian safety standards.

Second, any regulation emanating from this bill will be consistent with the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and will seek to ensure that there are no anti-competitive repercussions for the Canadian motor vehicle industry including manufacturers and dealers.

Third, Transport Canada will take action to see that a system is developed so that a manufacturer's notice of defect campaign for U.S. vehicles will also provide notice to any Canadian owners of those vehicles.

I have been necessarily extremely brief today. Nonetheless, I believe you will find that the bill contains the detailed changes necessary to enable the Motor Vehicle Safety Act to provide the efficient technical regulations that will meet the future needs of Canadians for the best available vehicle safety and emission control technology.

I look forward to discussion of this important legislation which I believe benefits us all.

I would like to conclude by asking for the consent of the House to amend the original motion to refer the review of this bill to the Standing Committee on Transport. I hope you will find such consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, before I begin, let me once again thank the hon. member for Davenport for agreeing to change the rotation so I could speak on this bill before I have to go to the Standing Committee of Transport where this bill will be going.

I want to thank the members of the Thunder Bay Association of Automotive Trades for the assistance I received in reviewing this bill. I would particularly like to thank Glen Harmer, who is the president of the Thunder Bay branch as well as the national president. I also want to thank a member of the Thunder Bay police force who was there at my request and with the permission of the chief. Bill S-8 deals with a number of relatively minor but important elements in the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. They are gaps that have been in the system that the government is wisely moving to correct.

There are new child restraint safety regulations so they can control that add-on. They can ensure that if there is a recall there is consumer registration, et cetera. Another positive move is the government's ability to control the standards for all-terrain recreation vehicles.

Too often we find that a vehicle that was bought for the bush is used on the roads. It may be in unsafe condition and whether it was used illegally or not it is appropriate that we control the manner of the manufacturing. The increase in fines for corporations from $200,000 to $1 million and for individuals from $5,000 to $10,000 is also quite appropriate. It brings it in line with some of the other acts we have passed in this House.

We may want to look in committee at putting some kind of COLA clause in there; a CPI link so we do not have to amend that part some time in the future.

There is the whole question of emission credits and averaging. I am not going to go into any detail but we have looked at that. We think it makes sense within the automotive industry. We do not believe it is necessarily the answer for smoke-stack industries. Within the automotive sector it will allow for implementation of clean air controls without harming the economic viability of the companies or forcing them to scrap equipment that is already on line but due to be phased out within a year or two.

There is also the ability to follow up if there is an imperfection in the manufacture of a pollution control element of an automobile. You can do a recall on that. Currently, as I understand it, the act does not provide for that opportunity.

There are a couple of areas I want to focus on that have been raised with me, not just in the context of this bill but in the context of the need to ensure that whatever is on the road is safe.

I want to start with what I will refer to as wrecks. These are cars that have been totalled and normally end up in the junk yard. We have a lot of folks in this country and I suspect in the United States who take those cars, cannibalize them, recycle them if you like, and in a lot of cases those recycled cars are not as safe as the new cars. I am advised if you weld the frame on a vehicle and it is not done right, in an impact you are actually jeopardizing the lives of the occupants or the occupants of the vehicle with which you have collided.

Under the Constitution at the manufacturing end it is the federal government's responsibility. Once the car or truck is built anything beyond that is the responsibility of the provinces. We need to find a way to impose a national standard on the provinces. One of the ways suggested in this bill is the use of a national safety mark. Whether it is a tire or a vehicle built according to Canadian federal standards developed under this act, they will get a safety mark that says this is a safe vehicle. It will be similar to the CSA putting a tag on our appliances because they have passed with approval.

I want to explore this concept in committee. If a vehicle has the national safety mark and is wrecked, we have to be able to remove that mark and develop a system so that before that vehicle can be put back on the road it must go through some kind of process to make sure it is a functioning automobile that is structurally sound.

The province of Quebec, I understand, has a system whereby if a vehicle is wrecked and someone wants to put it back on the road when they go into the licence issuer they have to bring a photograph of that vehicle on what is called a full-body frame. Instead of somebody repairing the vehicle in the back yard it proves they have gone to an authorized repair facility which uses the most up-to-date equipment and has the knowledge of the integrity of the structure. They can therefore assure the licence issuer that this vehicle complies with, in that case, Quebec standards. I would like to see us do that on a national basis.

We have all seen these folks in our communities, at least in the rural and northern communities, who decide it is really neat to put tires on a car or truck that are five or ten times the size of what is supplied at the manufacturing level. In other words, the vehicle has been redesigned by the owner and does not meet the safety requirements or certainly the manufacturer's requirements. I think we can use the national safety mark as a mechanism to prevent that from occurring. The moment they add those monster truck tires, they would lose that safety mark and the car or truck would not be certified by the provinces.

Under this act we are also managing the trade of used automobiles between Canada and the United States. Under the free trade agreement, American-produced used cars are able to come into Canada. Until the free trade agreement very few cars came across. This bill sets out the requirements for those vehicles. They must meet Canadian standards. It is a way of managing this particular trade deal until the FTA is abrogated, but that is for another debate at another time.

It is designed to ensure that any vehicle imported meets Canadian standards, U.S. safety recalls apply and there is a consistency of labelling.

I would like to suggest there is a gap in this particular aspect as well. If I went to Duluth, Minnesota, bought a used car and brought it to the Canadian border I would only have to sign a declaration at the border that I was going to get any deficiencies fixed. There is no provision to ensure that those changes are done by the appropriate personnel. I could do them in my own back yard, or I could just say I had done them. I think we need an amendment to ensure that anyone bringing a vehicle across the border has to take it to a body shop, if it is something like a bumper replacement or a service station.

In Ontario there are various types of licences issued to certified mechanics licensed by the province of Ontario, and I am sure it is the same in other provinces. Let us make sure the vehicle goes through some kind of third party who can attest to the fact that the work has been done and the vehicle is safe to drive in Canada.

The final point I want to make concerns the question of wrecks coming here from the United States. Under this act wrecks will be allowed in. I argued that any Canadian wrecks should go through some kind of certification process and I believe American wrecks should be forced to undergo the same process as well. That may be another way we can set a national standard that is easily adhered to or adopted by the provinces.

Those are the areas I will raise in committee. There may be one or two witnesses we wish to call. I think this bill is an important one and it is not my intention to drag out the committee review, but I think we need to take a specific look at some of these elements so we can improve the bill.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we would like to congratulate the senators for initiating this measure. It is a bill that will obviously help clear the air in our Canadian cities and rural Canada. It is a measure that is badly overdue which has been promised since 1989.

In our presentation today we would first like to examine what is generally understood about car emissions and put that into a particular framework.

Generally speaking, there is an impression that so long as car emissions are diluted they are not damaging to human health. Therefore idling a car, for instance, or accelerating, excessive burning of fuel in other words, is something that one should not pay too much attention to because it will dissolve and go up into the air.

This notion has to be dealt with because the emissions from a car contain a number of extremely dangerous substances. Therefore, the motor vehicle is a very convenient means of transportation that burns substances that are profoundly poisonous and dangerous to human health and to certain types of crops and agricultural activities, which I will mention later.

In examining the environmental damage, one finds out that the combustion of fossil fuels has an impact on the question of climate change, particularly because of the production of ozone. There is also the production of heavy metals and the pollution that is attributable to the toxic substances contained in gasoline and other transport fuels.

It is a well-known fact that the burning of gasoline and petroleum products through motor vehicle engines does contribute to the creation of smog, particularly from cars. The formation of smog in the urban setting and also in densely populated areas outside the urban setting can lead and has led to damaged crops and to poor quality air in our urban centres; so much so that sometimes in the summer there are excessive measurements of pollution in the cities, which in good part is attributed to ozone and other forms of pollution emanating from motor vehicle activity.

The substances in question are carbon monoxide, nitrogen dioxide, ozone, toxic chemicals, lead, benzene, formaldehyde and polyaromatic hydrocarbons. In essence, carbon monoxide interferes with the blood's ability to absorb oxygen and it impairs the perception and thinking ability of humans. It has the capacity to slow reflexes. It can cause drowsiness, and in high concentrations it can even lead to death.

Nitrogen dioxide can increase the susceptibility to viral infections such as influenza, irritate the lungs, and cause bronchitis and pneumonia.

Ozone is one of the pollutants formed by the burning of gasoline and related substances. Ground level ozone irritates the respiratory system, causing coughing, choking, impaired lung functioning, reduced resistance to colds and possibly pneumonia. In some cases, the medical profession has identified chronic heart disease, asthma, bronchitis and even emphysema as being attributable to the burning of gasoline and related substances.

In the case of toxic emissions and metals one must underline the importance of the presence of lead in gasoline. In Canada we have reduced the amount of lead in gasoline in recent years. We could still further reduce it to the standards the Americans have reached and thus improve the quality of air and the health conditions of our population, particularly of children. Other chemicals that are found in gasoline are cadmium and asbestos, which collect on the roads through the wear and tear of tires, through the activity of brakes and the use of clutches and the wearing of clutch linings.

That can cause nerve damage in children and even in expectant mothers. Cadmium is suspected to cause cancer. With regard to asbestos, although the question is hotly debated, it may cause lung cancer.

This background is simply intended to put on record and demonstrate the fact that we are dealing with activities dangerous to human health and the environment. We can now briefly analyse the substance of the bill.

The requirements in the bill for the reduction of emissions would allow us to achieve new standards which will reduce emissions by up to 60 per cent per kilometre driven. That is a welcome measure. Under the scheme envisaged in the bill new cars would produce .25 grams of nitrogen oxide per each kilometre compared to the present .62. That is reduction by over half.

The production of hydrocarbons will be reduced from .25 grams to .16. Carbon monoxide levels will remain unchanged.

The point of contention does not so much concern reduction, although it could be improved, as the timetable. The question is when this measure will come into effect, which the minister unfortunately did not answer in the course of his introductory speech.

In 1989 the then Minister of the Environment and Minister of Transport promised to have these standards incorporated in this particular bill by 1994. We find out today that these measures will instead come into effect by 1996, and this is a very disturbing factor. In other words, the government made a commitment with a target date of 1994 but now finds itself in the position of postponing the date of enforcement until 1996 because of the slowness in producing this legislation. That is highly regrettable, because it is at the expense of public health.

Another aspect of this bill that is a cause of concern is that the government, having promised binding regulations, has now produced a voluntary agreement by way of a memorandum of understanding with industry. This memorandum of understanding is not legally enforceable. We therefore find ourselves in a situation in which what is being proposed through the legislation and subsequently through the regulations may be implemented but may not be. It will depend on the good will of the parties concerned.

That approach leaves much to be desired. A piece of legislation should instead be passed by the Parliament of Canada in the interest of public health which is written in a manner that gives an assurance to the public that what is contained in the bill will rather than may take place. The difference between the two can be considerable.

The third point that must be raised here today is the question of permitting the industry to average emissions. In other words, certain fleets and certain models of cars would be above permitted standards and certain others would be below and the average between the two, so long as it meets the over-all standards, would then be accepted. In other words, certain types of cars would be polluting more and certain types of cars would be polluting less.

This type of approach is not very clever and is not very good for human health or the environment. This point was stressed in a submission presented by the AirWatch program of the Canadian Acid Precipitation Foundation from Toronto. When it appeared before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee in June of last year it drew this particular question to the attention of concerned parties.

I would like to put on the record a paragraph from its brief that enunciates the position with which I concur:

> This bill amounts to legislative sleight of hand, which would allow the department and the industry to increase emissions by employing emissions averaging methods already rejected in the United States.

The averaging approach is the issue on which this non-governmental group focused in particular. It specifies the problem in the following manner:

Under a vehicle-by-vehicle standard, individual vehicles must each meet a certain emission standard. To do this, there must be a margin between the actual amount of pollution produced by each vehicle, and the standard, in order to ensure compliance and to avoid recalls. Under an averaging system, the same margin must exist for some vehicles, but other vehicles can be allowed to exceed the standards. Depending on where such non-complying vehicles are sold, how many are produced, and the amount by which they exceed the supposed standard, additional pollution can be produced, and air quality problems can be aggravated.

The point to be made, and it is an important one, is that instead of emissions averaging, as this bill proposes, we would urge the government to have standards that would be applied to each car, vehicle by vehicle. Then public health and environmental concerns would be met in a far superior and more satisfactory manner.

Another point that needs to be made in connection with this bill is the moot question as to the importation of used cars in the proposed NAFTA area. Suppose that used cars will be imported from Mexico and the United States. These cars would already be of a certain age. Whose standards would these imported cars be expected to meet? They will probably be quite cheap. They will be quite appealing. However, they could be highly polluting vehicles and their presence in the marketplace could constitute a considerable threat to air quality and human health.

The issue here is one of balancing a variety of interests. The government with respect to the economic aspect of this issue, another key point, has come down in favour of allowing in clause 8 of the bill payment in exchange for permission to increase tailpipe emissions.

In other words, what the government is proposing is the introduction of the polluter pays principle. That in itself would not be a bad thing if we were to know what the polluter will pay and how the funds collected by way of this principle will be used. Will they be earmarked for additional pollution reduction, pollution research and other initiatives that will help reduce pollution in that industry?

I would argue, and it is a point that needs to be made in this debate, that the polluter pays principle is all right if the fee to be charged will discourage the polluter. If the fee to be charged will be such that the polluter will pay his way into polluting in having paid that fee, that fee will not act as a disincentive. That principle will not be served and will not be implemented in the manner that it was originally intended by those who introduced it some time ago.

It should be clear that by charging a fee that is too low, you would just provide a licence to the polluter to continue to pollute. Under this bill, instead of charging a fee that is a disincentive to pollute, you would be applying the polluter pays principle in its original intent and meaning.

Therefore, it is incumbent upon us in the opposition to make this point in the hope that when the bill is examined in committee at second reading it will be given a thorough analysis. The section dealing with the matter of fees to be charged for vehicle emissions permits will be examined appropriately. The fees that will be charged for permission to produce excess pollution should be such that instead of becoming licences to pollute, they will become disincentives to pollute.

I am sure that there are members in this Chamber in all parties who would agree with this point. They would see the distinction between the two approaches.

To summarize our presentation, I will put it in those terms. We have a history of lagging behind the United States with respect to progressively implementing motor vehicle emission standards. This step is highly desirable and overdue. Second, we regret very much that the full deadline for implementation has been moved from 1994, as promised, to 1996.

The emission averaging as proposed in this bill, my third point, would result in increased vehicle emissions rather than in reductions. The alternative to this would be an enforcement of a vehicle by vehicle standard approach.

• (1600)

This legislation creates the authority for a vehicle manufacturer to pay fees in exchange for permission to possibly produce excess pollution. If that is going to be the net effect of this legislation, then this legislation regrettably will have failed its own purpose as set out in the preamble.

Having put these points in as concise a manner as possible and seeing that you would like to hear another voice on stage, thank you for your patience and your attention.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks on this speech, I would like to express my appreciation for the process that brings a very progressive bill like this one to us from the Senate to the House of Commons. I would like to pay tribute to the work of Senator Murray and Senator Oliver in the Senate who carried this bill through the committee and through the Senate and delivered it on June 19, 1992, for my birthday.

I hope for my next birthday on June 19 we will be able to have the regulations complete and the act in place, all in a good cause of cleaner air for Canadians.

This is an area in which I have considerable interest, quality of life issues, not just for the Fraser Valley where I live and where it is very important, but around the globe as a major issue that is carried forward by global parliamentarians on human settlements and particularly our emphasis toward developing sustainable cities programs.

The updating of this act is very significant because it reflects contemporary concerns regarding climate change and sustainable development. Therefore it is appropriate and not just for Canada. It is an initiative in co-operation with global discussions that came out of Rio and so forth.

This is of particular interest in the major cities of Canada, Toronto, Montreal, and above all Vancouver because greater Vancouver is located in the Georgia Puget Basin which is very akin to Los Angeles. Each of them is in a valley reservoir of rapid growth, confined geographically by mountains that produce air inversions. Along with ever increasing car emissions, over one million cars cross the bridges of Vancouver each day.

As we put these combinations of factors together, we do not want the Fraser Valley to become Los Angeles north. In fact that has to be a major fight, a major voice and a major reason why I stand here in the House of Commons.

The very basic essence of life is the quality of our air and the quality of our water. The quality of the airshed of the bioregion of Georgia Puget Basin, now with 4.5 million people, is intensely threatened daily as that population over the next 20 years doubles from 4.5 million to over 10 million people.

We do have in the greater Vancouver region a particular interest and concern that this bill be introduced, passed and more important, made effective. The nitrogen oxides, which are a key factor in causing ground level ozones, are released into our environment during the combustion of fossil fuels including gasoline, diesel, natural gas and coal. Nationally both nitrogen oxides and volatile organic compounds, which are the major contributing agent of ozone, are both projected to grow by about 6 per cent between 1985 and the year 2005. If no new controls are developed to combat this problem, more problem areas will merge throughout our country and our globe.

California needs credit here because California has realized this difficulty and has legislation in place to deal with the problem, including laws mandating the sale of minimum percentages of zero emission vehicles and the maintenance of supply of alternative fuels to power these vehicles at gasoline stations.

California also has credible marketable credits for exceeding emission requirements. These credits allow for the attainment of the over-all policy objective at a lower cost to society because of efficient gains reaped by market allocation of these credits. I am pleased to see that this legislation follows that basic idea.

Canada must follow this lead before it becomes too late to save our air quality, particularly in our cities. Our approach must, however, be somewhat different in order to deal with the jurisdictional realities and constitutional differences between our countries.

We must have not only action at our national level in this form but joint action with the provinces that would permit the problem to be addressed in a more comprehensive fashion and that is the effective approach that we should take.

Our cities will only be made sustainable if we can combine the constitutional and jurisdictional responsibilities of the national government, the provinces and of our local governments, including our regional districts.

We must change this format, but until we can change it, we must operate respecting those jurisdictions, as I believe this bill has done.

An approach I strongly believe that Canada should take to deal with this problem would be by encouraging the development and sale of either ethanol of electrical powered vehicles. I am pleased that the research in this area is moving quite dramatically.

In fact, if you take the issue of electric vehicles, all the major car companies of the world are producing prototypes in this area. This prototype research is important and needs to be encouraged through incentives and of course through regulation and legislation.

When you think in terms of not just the research where in low emission vehicles, zero emission vehicles and electric vehicles there is encouraging results that are gained through vehicles like the Los Angeles car which is a combination of gas and electric, or some of the newer technologies that are looking at alternate fuels. Mazda, for example, is showing in Ottawa and Eastern Canada Day at the car shows. It is showing a rotary engine combined with a metal hydride fuel tank. This Mazda car uses hydrogen gas.

Nissan and others are working with liquid hydrogen fuel and the many other kinds of possibilities. All of these present particular problems. The particular problems they create are the problems of supply of fuel, whether that supply is found at the electrical level at residences or the need to have fuel supplied for whichever of the alternate fuels are required for the new vehicles, the new prototypes.

The method of approach in this bill I think is particularly useful. Bill S-8 proposes the use of emission credits as a tool for implementing tighter emission standards. Emission credits have been very effective incentives for encouraging manufacturers in California to produce zero emission vehicles.

The possibility of selling credits also encourages the development of desirable zero emission vehicles by permitting the recovery of some development costs from competitors.

I think the point that was made by the member for Davenport is a valid and interesting point that needs to be explored further and that is the question of how do you apply them? Do you apply them through averaging of vehicles or do you apply them on the basis of specific individual vehicles? This would vary from province to province according to the capacity of a province to have motor vehicle testing stations, if you are dealing on a vehicle by vehicle basis. Perhaps there could be an application in co-operation with the provinces. To start with the concept of averaging is appropriate and probably all we can achieve at this stage. However, I think we should look in the direction of ultimately testing individual vehicles as well.

This is an area of opportunity, an opportunity to consider the North American free trade agreement. President Clinton will sign the North American free trade agreement, but he has suggested parallel agreements on the environment. Vice-President Gore has been particularly strong in this area. It is an area where we can demonstrate leadership through this bill. In fact, the bill does have the flexibility to adapt to certification and international standards of other countries. This is a place where we could find agreement.

As the parallel agreement on the environment is established with the free trade agreement, we need to rationalize the various laws and regulations of all three countries; Mexico, Canada and the United States. There could be a tendency toward two things in this parallel agreement: to take the lowest common denominator of all of the standards of each of the countries; or to take the highest common denominator. In other words, we would take the strongest regulations from Canada, the strongest regulations from the United States and the strongest regulations from Mexico, and put those as the standards for the North American continent.

I hope we will choose the high road and the highest possible standards for the regulations for all three countries. I hope those will be established in a parallel agreement to be signed along with the free trade agreement. I urge that we proceed in that direction.

I hope also that in the free trade agreement those parallel agreements will mean that competition among the countries will be on a level playing field because, in fact, we are all playing to the same standards.

A second element of the free trade agreement parallel accord that should be developed in air and vehicle emission standards should relate to enforcement. We can write this law but if we do not have the capacity to enforce it through the testing of vehicles and through the co-operation with manufacturers, then we have nothing. It is like a constitution; it means nothing if it is not enforced and applied.

Therefore, the regulations that go with this act are extremely significant. I would hope that the regulations can be looked at in committee because if you pass the act and the regulations are not stringent, then you have accomplished nothing or very little other than a statement of principle and intent. If I had my preference, I would put in this bill that the regulations be known at the same time as the bill is passed. In fact the government is working on regulations on the basis of the bill that it has produced. Therefore, I would like to see consideration given to putting some of those main regulations in the bill.

I recognize that we do not want the regulations to be so inflexible that we cannot change the standards as technology allows us to change them, but I think it is something we will need to consider in committee.

This bill is not the end, it is but a beginning, the first stage. In addition to that is the implementation process of this bill, taking us from prototypes in each of the experimental automobiles to the fleet situation, a situation where you try it in a large group of cars and then finally the broad public market. Government can help in this area.

I will be proposing two private member's bills in companion to this bill which suggest, for example, when the Government of Canada and our Crown corporations buy new automobiles, a percentage of these automobiles should be low emission vehicles or zero emission vehicles. If we are spending billions of dollars and of those billions of dollars a good portion are automobiles, why should the government not set the standard by buying these and use the fleet system that is necessary to carry us to the next stage?

For example, when you buy a hydrogen gas car, you have to find a gas station that sells hydrogen. You cannot expect every station suddenly to have hydrogen. If you use it through the fleet process, Crown corporations and governments will establish a central depot that these vehicles operate from and then that can be the middle stage. The co-operation of governments is required and I will bring in a private member's bill in to that effect.

Second, the bill has a sanction of tax on vehicles that in fact will raise some money hopefully. The tax is a disincentive. I think we should also have incentives. While the government might feel this is a bit of heresy it is my view that as an incentive to introduce electric vehicles or alternate fueled vehicles we might allow an exemption from the GST.

If that kind of exemption could be given, it is a very high-profile exemption that says to people it is important to the quality of air that they should go out and buy one of these cars. To do that the Government of Canada will give the incentive right to the individual in the marketplace.

Second, we need a fast write-off for businesses. A business person should be able to get a write-off in one, two, or three years as opposed to five or ten years. Perhaps we would have a further incentive for business to go beyond the government corporations, the Crown corporations, to the business corporations and then to the individual in the market. I think we would have a considerable speed-up of moving from prototypes to reality and to a higher quality of air.

These are some ideas I have. This is pioneering the new world. This is pioneering the next century as we move to live in cities. Many of us are country boys with country values. We want clean air, clean water, a little green space in our cities. We want an efficient transportation system.

Would that I could will away my desire for a car but I am a North American male—and this would apply to the North American female—and when a North American male or female turns 16 the first thing they want, your children, my children, and me, conditioned or whatever it is, a car because a car is synonymous with freedom. You can try to defeat that and say to your son or daughter at age 16 "take a bus". Well you can try. You can try to say to yourself "take a bus" or get on the rapid transit. I think we need lots of support for rapid transit, but at the same time there is the reality of our passion for our cars. It is North American. It is Canadian. It is world wide. Look at China today, it is going from the bicycle to the motorcycle, to what is highly desirable after the television set and the refrigerator is the car. This is true everywhere in the developing world.

You can fight that value and try to condition that value by saying get on your bicycle, get on the rapid transit but it will only sell in part. Therefore we must deal with the issue of cars themselves and that means electric cars. It means hydrogen gas cars, hydrogen liquefied fuel cars. Look at Mohawk and the great ethanol movement. It deserves a word of credit. You can drive by a Mohawk station in Vancouver and put ethanol in your car. These are the very positive kinds of initiatives that governments need to reward. We are never going to take the car off of our roads in our time because it is a special symbol of freedom for young people, of prosperity, affluence and so forth. Therefore, we are going to have to deal with these alternatives.

• (1620)

On that basis, this is a futuristic bill. It deserves the support of all of us. It deserves that we should all look forward to this bill, not in the context of safety as it used to be drafted—that is part of the bill—but in the context of can we continue to live in the 21 megacities of the world whose quality air is depreciating and the major factor in that depreciation is auto emissions.

Members of the House and of the Senate, this is a great bill to proceed with. We must make the regulations stringent. I look forward to a cleaner, better world because we met and had this debate today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-88, an act to amend the Copyright Act, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-88, an act to amend the Copyright Act, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Communications) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to lead off the debate on third reading of Bill C-88, tabled in the House on June 18 last year, whose purpose is to amend the Copyright Act.

The bill reflects the main objective of the Copyright Act, which is to protect creative activity. When we say copyright, we no longer refer exclusively to printed works. Today, creative works are transmitted in a multitude of ways, as a result of the incredible technologies that have been developed in the past 20 years.

By amending the Copyright Act, we are trying to adapt the legislation to the present context. There have been radical changes in recent years, while the wording of the legislation remained practically unchanged from 1921 to 1988.

Bill C-88 proposes to amend a number of definitions contained in the Copyright Act. More specifically, it proposes to replace the obsolete definition of the term musical work, redefine performance and clarify the definition of the term network in order to determine who pays what to whom. For instance, the present legal definition of a musical work is "any combination of melody and harmony, or either of them, printed, reduced to writing or otherwise graphically produced or reproduced".

In fact, only music scores meet the current criteria for musical work. According to the amendment we are proposing, any form of musical composition, with or without words, will constitute a musical work in the meaning of the Copyright Act.

The Society of Composers, Authors and Musical Publishers of Canada, also known as SOCAN, collects royalties on behalf of authors and composers, both for the transmission of musical works to the public by means of telecommunications and for the public performance of such works.

The impact of technological change, which has also changed the way musical works are used, has been greatest on composers, authors and music publishers. Previously, the definition of a musical work or, should I say, a music score prevented SOCAN from collecting royalties for the transmission of musical works by specialized services and "paying" services.

This kind of transmission is meant when we refer to the right to communicate to the public by telecommunications. Bill C–88 makes a clear distinction between the right to communicate a musical work to the public by telecommunications and the right to do a public performance of the work, a distinction that is not made in the Copyright Act in its present form.

In making that distinction, the bill determines that payment must be made in return for exercising each of these rights. Bill C–88 ensures that everyone who transmits musical works and who takes an active part in their transmission, including programmers, cable companies, networks and their affiliated stations, is jointly and individually responsible for all payments chargeable for rights to communicate such works to the public by telecommunications.

This provision will simplify the equitable distribution of royalties to be collected pursuant to those rights. Failure to clarify the situation and ensure that the amendments proposed to the Copyright Act in 1989 are fully implemented will further increase the amount of royalties fore gone.

For artists, who are one of the least well–off groups in our society, the situation is a serious one. The government is determined to ensure that authors and composers of musical works are fairly remunerated for every use of their works, and I know members on both sides of the House support this objective.

By adopting Bill C–88 we will meet a commitment made to copyright holders. This measure will send a clear message that review and clarification of the Copyright Act, which has tremendous repercussions on the economic viability of this group, is a priority.

In concluding, on behalf of the Minister of Communications, I would like to thank all members of the legislative committee for their work on Bill C–88. As a result the process has been constructive and well timed. I would also like to thank all members of the House for their co–operation.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it was a great pleasure for me to listen to the hon. member, who was a good witness for the interests of artists, especially those who appeared before us on the committee. I listened to you with pleasure. You spoke on behalf of the minister, because you are faithful to the committee and I am pleased to recognize that today.

[English]

The enhancement under Bill C–88, the act to amend the Copyright Act in this third reading comes finally after years and years of an absence of a right, which deprived artists particularly musical composers and writers from earning a fair livelihood through an error committed during the negotiations of the free trade agreement. Not only did the free trade agreement have negative fall–out in many other areas, certainly for the artistic community and those who write, produce and compose it has been a source of great irritation and an unnecessary degree of financial deprivation which I would think has concerned all of us.

Those people involved in this particular field, those song writers and composers, can really be very appreciative of the incessant pressure they have put on this government through their collective SOCAN. They were very articulate in explaining and expressing their deep and serious concerns. It has taken a long time and it took a strong friend of the government to really get this whole thing moving.

We are pleased to be standing here today and finding a mechanism to answer that concern and at the same time to acknowledge that the essence of copyright is the finding of a fair balance between the rights of the creators and the rights of the users.

I and the Liberal Party support this bill because in its present form it does represent what we consider to be the kind of fair balance between the rights of the song writers and composers and the people who make commercial use of music. Rights were denied and I think even though those rights were denied in error during the free trade implementation legislation procedure, it is nonetheless not too late. I hope to repair some of this very serious damage.

I must make an observation about copyright. My colleagues have heard me say only too often that it is the kind of legislation I hate to do. Most people do not understand what copyright is all about and its vital importance to the life of many people in terms of intellectual property. It is particularly important to Canadian artists, entertainers and creators in every field of their expression. It is also a subject of increasing importance to the welfare of our Canadian economy. The same holds true on the international scene today through the multilateral conventions.

I would like to draw to the attention of the minister some very important multilateral issues that are going to arise in Stockholm very shortly, I believe at the beginning of June. These will have serious implications for the audio-visual producers and for the song writers if we do not take a firm stand to protect their claims under the Berne convention, the Rome convention and to ensure that our American neighbours are supportive of the interests of the arts.

We already overlooked them once. We fought hard in order to protect our cultural industries through the free trade agreement. We got special concerns.

Today is a very important day in the life of the artists. They were here to express their very serious concerns about the underfunding and the cuts that have taken place in the field of artistic grants and contributions by this government over the last eight years.

They raised against the wall of the National Arts Centre that incredible banner of Canada on which 200,000 signatures had been affixed as the flag went across this land which indicates the importance expressed by Canadians who support the arts, buy tickets to the theatre, buy the records and the songs, who enjoy the plays. They recognize that our films, movies, videos and our television series are selling so well around the world and that we have as a small country the most incredible talent everywhere.

Today is a very apt day to move once again into a field where there has not been adequate protection which in, of and by itself creates the low income our artists have to live with. In essence, it is the artists who are the best supporters of the arts of this country. It is the artists who not only produce but also have to sacrifice many things in life in order to allow their creative juices and talent to be expressed in a variety of ways.

To them we have to be very grateful for they mark our place on the global map as Canadians, as distinct, as unique. In a globalized world it is very important that we with the values we stand for express them through the screen, song and dance or in any variety of ways throughout the world. We should pay and respect these people to the best of our ability.

Today these artists and entertainers who are performing works across the country and around the world and in whom we take great pride bring into this country very important revenues. I do not know how many people realize the numbers of people involved in this field. Over 400,000 people work in this field.

We bring in over $17 billion in revenues to this country. We are about number four in the GDP of this country. About 2.6 per cent to 3 per cent of the GDP comes out of the field of art. It is the successes of artists like Roch Voisine, Bryan Adams and Céline Dion who are selling around the world. Their revenues come here and we take a good part of them in taxes and that helps the economy of this country. It is a business. Art is an expression. It is not a widget. It is a business, but it is a different form of business.

There are hundreds of names I could mention. These people are recognized by critics and audiences around the world. They are among the best in the world. When they sing, perform, write and compose, they do not get paid for their work if it appears on a cable system or on our network system. That is because of an error in law.

The artists have been losing millions and millions of dollars and I think that is grossly unfair. This is what the minister, this bill and this government were trying to shore up and fill in. It is its own error in the free trade agreement which it is trying to patch up now. I know we are pleased to participate in that.

Copyright protects their interests and enhances the cultural sovereignty of Canada. I do not think I need to go into a song and dance about that. If we did not have these cultural expressions, who and what would we be? Would we be extended Americans with no identity? It is happening fast enough. We need to really maintain this and who we are through the expression of these people. Copyright is important to business, as I said.

Intellectual property is the bedrock upon which we build our information-based society. It is critical to the future of this country. The accelerating pace of technological change demands greater ingenuity and creativity to compete in world markets. It is our knowledge that adds value to the goods and services we sell.

Canadians need a legislative framework to be able and capable of supporting these developments and defending the rights of Canadian creators.

Bill C-88 is another step toward the modernization of the Copyright Act. For some Canadian song writers and composers it is a very important step. It is by no means the major revision that is required in phase two of copyright that was promised before copyright phase one even came in. Although I am delighted that we have this revision, it is by far not the answer that we really need so that all forms of copyright are protected. Canadian artists and Canadian businesses can really be protected in the fullness of the intent.

The Canadian Independent Record Production Association in a recent newsletter called for phase two of this copyright reform. It reflects the current realities and enables creators to receive fair recompense for their work. I think this bill fills in a large part of the void that was highlighted.

I would like to read into the record what they had to say because I think it is important. They said: "It is extremely difficult to run an efficient, profitable business if the law allows users and consumers to use our property freely while negating the efforts and business acumen of our members. It seems unbelievable that such a gross injustice should continue to have been perpetrated over more than two decades, not just from the point of view of the lack of morality and disregard for the basic principles of justice and fairness that this implies, traits which are supposed to be common to all Canadians, but equally important, the attitude toward intellectual property that ignores the inherent value to Canadian society of having a strong, value-added industry that will make a substantial contribution to Canada's future prosperity. We can but hope that 1993 will bring a long-awaited change in this unhappy situation and enable our sector to make the contribution to Canadian culture and export earnings it is capable of, given the proverbial level playing field of opportunity that it has long deserved".

Although this particular aspect of the bill will cover one small part, it certainly does not cover home taping, performing rights, neighbouring rights and many other rights which are yet to be discussed.

I asked today in the House during Question Period whether we were truly interested in the well-being of our arts, cultural institutions and artists. The bill we passed on June 8 last year gave artists the right to go before a tribunal and a tribunal was to have been set up so they could negotiate properly and in due form. The government has not seen fit to put that into place. It has not proclaimed that bill even though it has gone through the Senate and is law. It takes political will to name the judges for that tribunal. All that is left is political will.

Although we are debating and passing this bill today, I call on the government to realize it is one thing to put on a public face and lots of performance, but this box we are now presenting may be a Trojan Horse unless this bill is proclaimed into law and enacted upon. The tribunal for the artists has not been acted upon to date.

Cable companies that carry specialty services such as MuchMusic, MusiquePlus, YTV, Vision and Arts and Entertainment, that do not broadcast over the air, use the works of Canadian musicians without paying for them. Is that right? Would you like your works to be used without any recognition or pay? It does not put food on your table or pay your rent. This means that while song writers such as Gordon Lightfoot, Roch Voisine or whoever, might receive royalties for air play of a song on radio or on a broadcast television like CTV, TVA or CBC, there is no remuneration for their air play on channels such as MuchMusic, MusiquePlus, Nashville Network or other services which are available only on cable.

The whole reason for this is forgetfulness when the free trade agreement was negotiated, amongst other forgetfulnesses. I will not go into that. I can see you are smiling, Mr. Speaker. This is perhaps not the moment, but boy could I really enjoy a real debate on free trade.

An hon. member: Do it.

Mrs. Finestone: Do it, okay. How about you speaking for me over here?

This is an injustice as is any other service. Let us put this bill through and ensure that the errors that were about to be committed are not committed again by a minister ill-advised by his staff. This minister almost committed an error that would have caught nursing homes, hospitals, mom and pop shops and small businesses where they had a radio on or were playing a cassette because it would have been trapped under the gramophone act it had put in here.

I can say to you we got rid of the gramophone exemption. We then clarified the copyright issues around CTV. We hope we will not have to be concerned that there will be any kind of double payment and that we are severally and jointly considering responsibilities.

We will hopefully have the Canadian Copyright Board review the flat revenue tariff versus the incidental tariff that is presently in place as the payments system, in the interest of what is best for the artists involved.

I hope this copyright bill will be the forerunner of phase two of copyright which is desperately needed. I certainly support the move of this bill into law.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the fact that this is a short debate and there is all-party agreement to this government bill tells an interesting story. It is a story that is worth putting on the public record.

When the Standing Committee on Culture and Communications was holding hearings earlier last year on the state of the cultural industries in Canada which resulted in our unanimous report on The Ties that Bind, we heard presentations from SOCAN which is the Society of Composers, Authors, and Musical Publishers of Canada. We heard how a technical oversight in the drafting of the copyright law is costing them millions of dollars every year.

As the government person and the spokesperson for the Liberal Party have also pointed out, the problem was that the old copyright law defined a musical work as having a written score. The cable companies were saying; "we are not transmitting a written score. We are transmitting sound".

In the old copyright law, the definition of broadcasting was something that was broadcasted over the air. The cable companies were saying; "but we are not broadcasting over the air, we are broadcasting by wire".

They were using the works of song writers, composers and authors without paying one cent in royalties. I suppose the other television companies like CBC and CTV, Global and so forth could have also said: "Well, we are not transmitting something that is written". But they did not. They lived within the intent and spirit of the law, unlike the cable companies.

I initially suggested to my fellow members on the committee that we have a quick little amendment to plug this. It was obvious that all members from all political parties who were at that committee hearing were convinced this was an unacceptable situation. It was stupid. Why not have a quick little amendment to change this and rectify the situation?

We invited the government to bring in the bill that is in front of us, although it is not quite the bill in front of us. There was full co-operation of all political parties and members on our committee and we worked in a co-operative way together. It is an example on how Parliament can and should operate and what we accomplished demonstrates what a truly representative system can do.

Also interesting was the interference from the department and bureaucrats, although not from the minister. I would like to separate the minister from the bureaucrats, although I was not privy to all the communications. My criticisms were of the bureaucrats from the department. Instead of presenting us with a bill to plug those loopholes as we wanted, they brought us a bill that also had a whole bunch of other bells and whistles attached to it.

They wanted us to tackle the whole question of what is commonly called the gramophone exemption. This is an exemption in the existing law that would allow a restaurant or a public place to play a gramophone and not be charged royalties. It is outdated and has to be addressed but this was not the place.

Organizations like the Restaurant Association et cetera made a valid submission to our committee asking us to leave it as it is right now. We have to discuss this whole other area in phase two of copyright. Do not take this little part that has to be reformed and try to do it. Leave it because there are some interesting questions.

I used to operate a restaurant and would turn the radio on in the kitchen to listen to music. Now is that commercial exploitation? Should I be paying royalty for that? I do not believe so, but if I was running a fancy restaurant and tuned into an FM station that just played certain types of music, if it was important for me in terms of creating the ambience of my commercial establishment and I was making money off somebody else's creative work, then yes I should pay some royalty for that.

These are some very fundamental principles and we have to debate them. I urge the government to proceed with phase two of copyright. It is badly needed. I am critical of the government for delaying it so long but to deal with it in this particular piece of legislation is inappropriate.

Finally the department came with some further amendments. Those amendments in turn created a whole slew of other problems and then we started hearing from people who made films including educational films because the amendments the bureaucrats were introducing affected a whole group of other people. Finally we were able to convince the bureaucrats and the government to drop that section of the bill.

I thought everything was solved but then the last Wednesday before Christmas recess the committee was to deal with clause-by-clause considerations. Before we could proceed the government came up with a whole new set of amendments.

We began to wonder whether the government and the bureaucrats really wanted this. Every time they introduced these new amendments they created another road-block. This new amendment dealt with the definition of a network. I asked them if they had consulted and they said they had but when I went to the broadcasters they told me they had not been consulted.

You have to ask the question: Why did the government bureaucrats come in at the last moment with a whole new set of amendments that did not affect the intent and essence of the bill? My experience in copyright is that if you change even one part of it the ramifications can affect all sorts of different enterprises and groups you were not even aware of.

The only decent way of handling it is through a consultative process, an open process that holds hearings so all parties can appear before our committee and tell us the effects of whatever change is being proposed. We did not do it. The government came in at the last moment with a whole new set of amendments and did not allow us to listen to the broadcasters.

In this particular case, CTV would be directly affected. We have never heard from CTV how this amendment which is now in this bill is going to affect them. I think that is wrong and unfair. It is not the correct process. I am not certain if we really understand and know what this will mean until we hear from all interested parties.

I am very happy to see the bill and will not object to it, nor will I object to any parts of it. I suspect once I understood the implications and application of the amendment the government introduced at the very last moment, I would probably agree with it. I certainly did not want to be stampeded into it. I certainly did not want to make a decision on it without hearing all the affected parties. The government did not give us that opportunity.

Even though Bill C-88 is an example of where all political parties and parliamentarians from the government and the opposition can work together in harmony, it is also an example of how bureaucrats can interfere with that process. I want to put on record that there is a lesson to be learned from this.

I am happy we will be able to proceed with Bill C-88 and pass it in all stages, hopefully this afternoon. It corrects an injustice. It corrects a wrong. It establishes some fairness, some justice and some equity for important citizens of our society, the creators of musical works that we listen to, musical works that are like mirrors of ourselves and society.

It does not solve all the problems. It certainly does not solve all the severe problems of the artistic community in this recessionary time and in a period of increasing government cutbacks. The cutback to the Department of Communications by 10 per cent this year and 10 per cent next year across the board will have devastating implications and applications.

When granting agencies like the Canada Council have to scale back it means that some orchestras, some theatre groups and some galleries will not be able to continue, and that is unfortunate. It is not just unfortunate for the cultural life, the image of our country and our self-awareness as a country, but it has negative economic implications.

My colleague from the Liberal Party, the Liberal critic for culture, put on record some of the economic factors involved. Earlier today in my statement to the House I went into some of the economic factors. Almost 350,000 people are employed in the industry. Some say it is almost 400,000 people. It contributes some $17 billion to economic activity in Canada or some 2.5 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. These are significant economic realities.

The arts, the culture, artists, musicians, writers and actors make a tremendously important contribution to the psyche of the country and to the economics of the country. We earn in Canada in terms of our foreign balance of payments from the arts some $1.7 billion from people offshore who bought our records, our movies, our books, et cetera. For us to cut back in this important economic activity is counterproductive.

These are the arguments. These are the debates. These are the battles I am sure will be fought in this House on other occasions and during the election campaign whenever that occurs. However today we are united. There is total unanimity of all members of the House in urging the passage of this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, since there is only a minute left and we would like to pass this bill today, I would like to say that the Bloc Quebecois fully supports this bill and even congratulates all parties in the House for co-operating so much in order that authors can earn a living from what they do. We are ready to vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved that Bill C-336, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (absence of criminal liability of child under 10 years of age and definition of child and young person), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to present a private bill that I feel addresses a flaw in our justice system.

I would like to take a look at the purpose of the bill. It is specifically to reduce the age for the operation of the Young Offenders Act from the current 12 years of age to 10 years of age. That requires two specific statutory amendments.

The first is that section 13 of the Criminal Code will have to be amended to reduce the age of criminal responsibility from the current 12 to 10. Second, it will require a change in the Young Offenders Act of the definition of a young person from the current 12 to 17 year age group to 10 to 17 and describe as a child a person who is under 10 years of age.

A little background would be useful in understanding why I propose this amendment. The Young Offenders Act was enacted in 1984. Prior to that act, offences by young persons were covered by the Juvenile Delinquents Act which covered youths aged 7 to 18. In effect, after 1984 youths aged 7 to 11 simply dropped out of the justice system. It was believed at that time that child welfare legislation would be sufficient to regulate their affairs even if those affairs involved ciminality.

In any event, now the public knows that the Young Offenders Act has more than one problem. Many people have suggested that we should change the name. Let us be honest. Changing the name of the statute will not do anything. We have to address the real problems in the statute.

As I see it there are at least two flaws—there are others—in the current act. It is odd that just a year ago the House passed an amendment to the Young Offenders Act. We were told at that time by the government that the act would address the flaws in the Young Offenders Act. I say that is not true. It did not address them and it was only a superficial response. We still have work to do.

The criminal justice net currently excludes crimes by those who are under 12 years of age. Not only do we have the scope or net problem where acts by those individuals escape the system, but to many the act appears not to have any teeth. It is ineffective. That is not just a perception; that is a reality.

If one looks at the principles contained in the Young Offenders Act, and I will simply cherry-pick through, one reads things like: The youth have special needs and require guidance and assistance; it is not inconsistent with the protection of society to take no measures or take measures other than judicial proceedings; young persons should have special guarantees of their rights and freedoms; rights and freedoms of young persons include a right to the least possible interference with freedom that is consistent with the protection of society. The act shall be liberally construed to mean that young persons will be dealt with in accordance with the principles, some of which I just enunciated. In the end we can see that in those principles there is no principle of general or specific deterrence to young offenders contained in the act, none at all. If there is no goal, if there is no deterrence, the act has no teeth for that age group.

Let us move now to the amendment I propose: the lowering of the age from 12 years to 10 years to include young offenders. Let us take a look at what has been happening with the under-12 group over the last few years.

In 1991 I received a letter from a principal in my riding of Scarborough—Rouge River. I will just read a portion of it because it is very instructive. He wrote: "A 10-year old boy in my adjustment class assaulted seven girls" and he described the sexual offence, sexual assault. "While discussing the problem with him he went into a rage, physically assaulting, kicking, punching, biting my vice-principal, social worker and myself. He threatened to return with a gun and shoot me. He was suspended. The following week he returned with a bb gun or pellet gun. I was out of the school at a meeting so he threatened several students with it and followed two of the above-mentioned girls home".

He described the action that the school took including a suspension and informing the Children's Aid Society. He continued: "My problem is the inability to deal with the incident as it affects society. The police inform us that they can do nothing because of the Young Offenders Act. They further stated that they probably could not even take away the gun. The Children's Aid Society has difficulty doing anything if the problem is not a threat to the boy himself. Threats to others are not their mandate".

In 1992 I had a letter from two teachers from another school. They said: "There have been increasing occurrences of theft in our classrooms. Children are stealing from other children as well as from adults. These children have no remorse about their actions. Some of these young children continue to commit these crimes on a regular basis and as a result we are dealing with property damage, home-made weapons, verbal abuse, physical abuse, harassment, intimidation. If we continue to excuse inappropriate behaviour from the above areas we will also continue to give students the message that their crimes are not serious enough and they will not be accountable for their actions. We feel that if students choose to commit crimes they should also be responsible for these actions and serve the proper punishment according to the law for all people".

That is just a sampling from my riding, but Scarborough is not alone. There is great frustration at the failure of the Young Offenders Act in every area of the country.

In August 1992 the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, by a resolution at its annual conference, urged the Minister of Justice to review the application of the Young Offenders Act to include individuals under 12 years of age.

We have information from the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics. It is a collection of data from 10 per cent of Canada's police forces. If we extrapolate—this is not scientific—from the data gathered by that centre for statistics we can estimate that there are approximately 14,000 otherwise criminal acts being committed by offenders under the age of 12. I call them offenders even though in law they are not offenders and even though in law those acts are not criminal offences.

I have some additional examples from that grouping. Last February The Ottawa Citizen reported the case of a five-year old girl who could not go to school because a ten-year old boy had slapped her and was threatening her with a knife. In September 1991 two serious incidents occurred, also in the Ottawa area. Four elementary school students, all under the age of 12, kidnapped, gagged and physically assaulted a seven-year-old. In the other incident a 10-year old boy was shot in the arm and leg by an 11-year-old.

In the 1989-90 year, the Ontario English Catholic Teachers Association conducted a survey of assaults upon teachers and students. Among other things, it found 664 incidents of common assault; 73 incidents of assault with a weapon, threatening with a weapon and serious physical injury and harassment; and 570 incidents of vandalism.

The number of those incidents are growing. I want to point out that many police will not either bother to report or act in relation to criminal acts committed by youths under 12 years of age because, they say: "It simply is not a crime. It is not a criminal offence. We do not have a criminal. We have not got a charge. We have not got a process. We cannot arrest. We cannot intervene. We cannot detain. The matter is closed". Many statistics just do not get reported.

In a report prepared in 1990 for the Department of Justice, it appears that there are recommendations from the governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia, all recommending that the Young Offenders Act age be reduced to nine or ten years of age. I point out that my bill would bring the age down to 10 years of age.

One of the problems cited in that study is the ineffectiveness of existing child welfare legislation in filling the gap in dealing with and responding to those kinds of offences by youths under 12 years of age. I do not have time to review the child welfare legislation in every province, but essentially child welfare legislation permits intervention by authorities only to protect the child. It is for the purpose of protecting the welfare of the child that the authorities can intervene, not for protection of the public.

When the intervention occurs generally, it must be by law in the following manner. They must take the child home to the parents or to a place of safety. That is only for the purpose of protecting the child. In many of the incidents I have mentioned there was not any question of any danger to the child involved. The child was a danger or had committed a criminal act in relation to someone else.

Therefore, in those instances where we think we can rely on child welfare legislation, there is no sanction, absolutely no sanction at all. What do we do when we take this offending child home to a family where there is no real family, when they do not care, when they do not know what to do? That child is simply given a free ride home with no sanction.

From the study prepared for the Department of Justice there were a number of reasons cited why the age should be reduced. Again, I will just cherry pick through some of those reasons. Some children under 12 are responsible for their actions and take advantage of their immunity from prosecution. They do have a criminal intent.

We could lower the age to prevent or to reduce the likelihood of older persons using under 12-year-olds to commit offences; to protect the public and to give consideration to victims; the need for consequences for the child when a law is contravened; the need for specific and general deterrents which are simply not in the system at all now, not even in the existing Young Offenders Act as it applies to all youth under the age of 18. There is not even any reference to general or specific deterrents in that act, let alone for the children who the act does not cover at all.

There is a need for more effective intervention, more effective than a simple referral to the child welfare system, and a need for some middle ground or alternative measures between returning a child home with no further action and referral to child welfare. The children will benefit from services available in the youth justice system as well as the controls possible with a court order like curfew, probation, non-association conditions.

There are many reasons why many observers think this act should be amended in the way I have proposed. I am not advocating that 10 and 11-year-olds be dealt with in adult court. No. I am simply asking that they go to youth court. I am not asking to send them to a maximum security institution but only that they be dealt with by the young offender system that is in place. It is the same place where we deal with 12, 13 and 14-year-olds.

I ask you to put yourself in the position of a parent of an 11-year-old who is either robbed, physically assaulted or sexually assaulted by a person of the same age with criminal intent. That person is simply met by someone and taken home.

You are helpless to deal with that youth. Society is helpless in dealing with the youth. There is no legislation that permits intervention or sanction. That simply is not acceptable when we already have a Young Offenders Act. It specifically provides for youth services, intervention, sanction, probation, curfew, conditions, guidance and psychologists.

The Young Offenders Act provides for that system in each of the provinces. Yet for these young offenders aged 10 and 11, we are not using it. They simply drop outside the system. They do not come within the net. I think Canadians want young offenders of that category dealt with by the Young Offenders Act.

Maybe there is no real family at home. That is often the case for young offenders of this nature. There is no accounting. There is no apology and there is no sanction for these 10 and 11-year-olds.

What kind of message does that send to the young offender of that age? What kind of a message is it? He or she would be totally unsure whether there was any line drawn in the sand, whether there was any sanction, whether or not society was really showing any denunciation for the act.

Sadly yesterday we learned about a case in the United Kingdom. It was not in this country. It is a few thousand miles away. It involved the case of a murder of a 2-year-old who was bludgeoned and then left on a railway track. As awful as those details were, I was shocked when I heard that the police were looking for two suspects, youths aged 10 to 12.

If that happened in this country, I say that those youths would by law, if they were caught and if they were of that age group, be simply taken home. They would have to be taken home to their parents. That is it. There is no more sanction. There are no more dealings. A social worker would check into it. That is it. There is no ability to do anything other than to do something to protect the offending child. There is nothing to protect society. That is simply not good enough.

Child welfare legislation is there to protect the young child and not the public. We need legislation that will address protection of the public. Where is the justice now? Where is the sense of proportion? Where is the ability of society to protect itself? Where is the procedure to give those 10 and 11-year-old young offenders access to young offender treatment programs? It just is not there.

On this one item of amending the age category, the Young Offenders Act needs reform. I know members opposite know that. The age must be reduced. I urge members in the House to adopt this reform as one of several which we have to see to. My constituents want these reforms, as do all Canadians.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate with regard to young offenders.

I have to say right from the very start that I am not in favour of lowering the age from 12 to 10. The minimum age of young offenders prior to the Young Offenders Act being passed in the House in 1984 was certainly discussed not only here in this House but right across the country in each province as well as the two territories.

• (1720)

A lot was taken into consideration. First of all, you have to take a look at the mental capacity of a 10-year-old. While chronologically somebody can be 10, their capacity to understand and comprehend varies greatly. It varies with the individual and the family surroundings in which he or she has been raised.

Let us just take the capacity of a youngster who is 10 or 11. Does he or she understand the criminal law system? Does he or she understand what it is to go into court and what their legal rights are? I think we would be taking far too much for granted if we ever even gave a thought to lowering the age.

I agree that there are some things within the Young Offenders Act today that need to be amended. I know my colleague mentioned that in his closing remarks. However, it is not lowering the age by any means.

I want to look at a troubled youngster. A 10-year old or an 11-year-old troubled youngster commits a crime. Why? Often it comes down to a family in which there is some sort of dysfunction. Either it is a single parent or, not always, two parents where both of them are working and there is not enough supervision or indeed there is abuse. When I speak of abuse I do not just mean sexual abuse. We get into psychological abuse, emotional abuse, physical abuse. There are all kinds of abuse. Many of our youngster grow up in that today. We need to put more emphasis on the family and ridding ourselves of family violence and family abuse.

Obviously this is a major problem. I understand what my colleague said with regard to two or three cases that he elaborated. One had to do with a youngster in a school who was sexually assaulting. He was 10-years old and sexually assaulting another youngster and then coming back with a pellet gun.

I would have to ask myself, number one, about the principal and counsellors within that school. Certainly some reporting must have been done. Second, when youngsters are apprehended by the police department they are, yes, taken to their house.

Mr. Lee: They cannot be arrested.

Mrs. Sparrow: I am not asking that they be arrested but there is something wrong to cause them to commit that particular offence in the beginning. I think it is up to our social services with regard to assisting these youngsters. It may be a family problem and the youngster would have to be removed from the family. That can be done. It can be done through the social services or through the child protection system. It is unfortunate but sometimes it is a lot better for the youngster.

It is clear that the needs of youngsters who are 10 or 11 years old must be looked at and must be reviewed by the child protection and mental health systems, not by forcing them into family court and not by finding them guilty of a certain criminal crime. Incarceration, you cannot do that to a 10-year-old. Not at all.

What we have to do is strengthen the social services so we could get into the home, into the communities and into building up the family life. That is what is so needed.

Let us talk about the Young Offenders Act. This has been a very volatile subject in my riding and in a lot of ridings right across the country.

First, under the 1984 legislation, it deals with youngsters who are 12 years old through to 17 years old inclusive. I would strongly say that youngsters who are 16 years old and 17 years old should be moved to adult court. They are not young offenders. I would like to see an amendment where we would lower the age from the top down and say that the 12 to 15-year-olds are young offenders. However 16 and 17-year-olds who can have jobs, leave school, drive cars and assume responsibility should be treated like adults.

I feel very strongly there are habitual young offenders and they are the ones who we have to treat more seriously. Any young offender who has been twice convicted of an indictable offence and is back in court for the third time should automatically be moved to adult court.

There are weaknesses in the system. I feel very strongly that there are some amendments that need to be made, but I am not going to say that a youngster of 10 or 11 should fall under the Young Offenders Act. We have to deal with it with our social services, and I know that a lot of those responsibilities are within provincial jurisdiction. I also know that by working with Brighter Futures, which the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled some months ago, or working with our aboriginal peoples we can certainly improve the system.

However, it is through education, counselling and public awareness that we can improve the situation.

If both parents are working, that is tough. How many members in this House have latchkey kids? How many members in this House are really single parents with full responsibility for their youngster plus a job? There are not very many. It is a big responsibility, so there is a lot more to this than sending youngsters who are 10 years old to jail.

Let us look at the young offenders. There are lots of things we can do. We legislate the law, the provinces administer the act along with the courts, and the police department makes all of the decisions about whether to charge or not. We do have problems and a lot are in the court system. The court system is under such stress and strain because of the backlog that there are certain convictions that should not even go into court, such as speeding, unless it is dangerous driving. There are certain tickets that I can pay by sending in a cheque, be it a speeding or parking ticket. We should remove these from the family court system.

What about sentencing charts so that all across our country youngsters in the young offender system who are found guilty and convicted of a similar crime receive a similar sentence? It differs greatly from the city of Calgary to the city of Vancouver.

We can encourage out of city initiations to put the youngsters to work so they understand what an eight-hour day is, be it perhaps in the forestry business or the parks and recreation business, and at the same time teach them a vocation so that they then can carry on in a meaningful way with employment in their future lives. There is education. A lot of these youngsters have dropped out of school. They do not have enough education to get them through society in the coming years.

It is most important that we not only have the young offenders system that we have today but that we set up certain types of work camps for habitual young offenders and teach them a trade.

How about the financial accountability of some of these young offenders? What of those who steal cars for a joy-ride and then damage them? The car is then a write off. Somehow through the insurance system, and even through the income tax system, there could be a charge so that over the period of 10 or 12 years, once they go into the working system, they will slowly have to pay off their financial responsibility to society. That should be put in there.

I absolutely believe that there are many means by which we could strengthen the Young Offenders Act so that youngsters who are 16 and 17 are treated as adults and we get to the habitual young offender, who is 6 per cent of all the young offenders but is doing 80 or 90 per cent of the offences. Those are the people we should be after, not the little kids who are 10 and 11 years old and come from broken families or families who have problems. They need counselling and they need help. I agree.

If there are family problems they should be removed from the family, I agree with my colleague from across the way, but there are certainly ways to help the family without putting these youngsters in jail.

• (1730)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate today. This bill that is before us is proposing to lower the age of people covered by the Young Offenders Act to 10 years from 12 years. Although I sympathize with some of the member's concerns and some of the points made by the member from the government side I do not think, and certainly members of the New Democratic Party would not think, that we should lower the age from 12 years to 10 years.

In this country we spend over $8 billion a year on the justice system right now. Canadians are feeling less safe in this country than they have probably ever felt. The United States has become very serious about building more jails and becoming tougher on offenders but it has a worse record than we do.

The answer is not in making tougher laws and further deterrents. The answer is in other areas. With respect to this bill, yes, there are children who are 10 or 11 or sometimes 7 or 8 years of age who have some severe problems and are a detriment to themselves and the people around them. However, changes should not be made specifically to the Young Offenders Act unless they are linked with increased mental health and social services with the provinces and with federal cost sharing for those services. There must be a broader approach.

A child who is seriously out of control, such as the one mentioned by the hon. member who threatened to use a pellet gun, is a serious problem. A child who is seriously out of control requires long-term, open-ended treatment. That simply cannot be appropriately provided under the definite sentencing framework of the Young Offenders Act. Criminalizing behaviour is not an effective response in dealing with a child with severe behavioural problems.

The Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General is examining law enforcement and the future of law and order in this country. I want to note the Canadian Police Association position on this issue. It stated before this committee just recently that: "As a society we should also recognize that the solution to crime by younger criminals is not to reduce the age of the Young Offenders Act applicably, but instead to accept the reality that failing to intervene in some cases does the young person and society a greater disservice in the long run. This approach, intervention by provincial authorities in child welfare situations, is obviously fraught with immense difficulties itself. Just because that is so, however, should not deter us from carefully having the courage to make the tough judgments necessary. It will by no means be easy. But to ignore such problems potentially condemns children to a likely worse state".

These are the people who are working on the front lines. These are the police officers who deal with this on a daily basis, and they are taking that approach. Yes, there is a need to deal with this issue. Yes, there is a problem in this area. Yes, there are problems with the Young Offenders Act and they will be looked at.

If we are going to deal with this problem effectively we must have a broader approach. I understand that the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, which is looking at this area, is going to come out with a recommendation that will say that we must look at preventing crime before it begins by working with the family, and by doing things in this in society that will be preventative in nature. That is the approach this committee is going to take, having looked into it. That is the underlying principle from which we are going to have to deal with this issue and other issues pertaining to law and order.

Although I sympathize with the member's concerns and I agree with him that there is a problem the answer is more in terms of looking at crime prevention and seriously working with the provinces to deal with these incidents. In many cases a deterrent factor is not going to help a child who is 10 or 11. If we do lower the age to 10, what happens when a child who is 8 or 9 commits murder? Are we going to lower the age to 8 then? No.

The way to deal with this issue is to take the broader approach. That is the way we should deal with this issue. With due respect to the member, I think that would be the better approach.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, if the intent of the member who proposed this bill is to express a concern for law and order in Canada I would be standing with him and beside him, because all Canadians want to see a greater level of law and order maintained in our communities. If he wants to specifically recognize that law and order has changed to the point that it is not just adults or young people but children who are now involved in crime then I would also agree with him.

The question is how to handle the situation to obtain more law and order and fewer offences, less criminality. I am not sure that the solution the hon. member is proposing is really an answer, let alone the answer.

We have argued these ages before. I sat on the first Young Offenders Act committee in the seventies when we made the first revision since 1911 or 1921, it was something like that. We had the same problem of making a subjective or arbitrary decision: What would the age of a young offender be? At that time we were dealing with the upper age: Should it be 19, 18, 17, 16, 15 and so forth?

As a matter of fact it was a Conservative member of the committee, Allan Lawrence, the former Attorney General of Ontario, who moved to make the age that we were going to establish 16. The NDP members at the time said it should be 21. I remember making a motion myself saying that we should saw it off at 17, which it is in several of the provinces now.

It was also an issue of jurisdiction. At that point in some provinces it was 16, some 17 and some 18. The question was who would take responsibility for the young offender at that time. Would it be the federal level or the provincial level? If the federal government legislated, that meant the provincial governments had to increase their facilities and their ability for care.

The federal government forcing the provincial governments to increase the numbers of people they had to care for meant that their facilities became overcrowded. As the facilities became overcrowded they put them out onto the street too fast and too soon and there were not enough spaces. All of these kinds of repercussions further undermined law and order.

It was a problem of choosing an arbitrary age. In that case, the question was when does a person become an adult? Certainly, all the arguments that were put forward are arguments similar to ones being made now. It is true that some people become adults at 14 or 15 years old and others never become adults for their entire life. Maybe the age is 25 or maybe it is 30. It is true that this is an arbitrary subjective decision that is not the same for all people in our society.

Similarly the issue of 12, 11, 10, 13, 14, and 15 years of age are all subjective decisions that are different for each person, each child, in each family in each situation. You cannot draw that perfect line.

I think it is generally agreed that the young offender at the other end becomes an adult when they become independent of their parents or away from their parents. We were trying to find that age somewhere in there. Probably in retrospect I think we came up too high. At that time I moved an amendment that it should have been lower and in the same space at the end when a person becomes an adult.

Then at the other end of the range the same thing occurs with a child. I think generally it is perceived that a child becomes a young person probably around the age of puberty because that is when the changes really start to happen. Usually it is around the age of 12.

It is true some people enter puberty at 10 or 11 years or whatever age, but a space has to be picked where most children are. I think to say it is 11 years of age or less is probably too young. As they approach 12 years of age then they come into a new category.

The Young Offenders Act then accommodated the fact that at 12 years of age one can also be a violent criminal. Therefore we allowed in the revisions that a young person at the age of 12 could then be brought before a higher court, to an adult court if necessary and appropriate depending upon the nature of the crime and giving flexibility.

It could be that we could recognize a degree of criminality or allow some sort of a judgmental process which could raise that child to a young offender depending upon maturity and other things. I do not think that is where it is at in the attitudinal sense about how we want to care for children, how we want to care for young offenders and how we want to care for older or adult offenders.

There is the sense that we look at each of them differently. Perhaps for the older offender we are looking at rehabilitation, incarceration for the protection of that person plus society or their victims and the victims of that criminal. Then we are into the field of actual punishment which could go anywhere from emotional punishment to the age-old question of corporal or capital punishment which has been removed from our system. That is another area of debate.

At the adult level we want to apply all of those things. Perhaps in some measure it is to cause correction, in other words to cause correction giving us social behaviour as opposed to anti-social behaviour.

We get down to the bottom end. Let us say the top end is the ultimate criminal who has the least chance of rehabilitation and perhaps none. We always hope that person can be rehabilitated. However, that person is a violent criminal murderer addicted to drugs and alcohol, an almost total reject from our society with very little probability of rehabilitation. Therefore the maximum incarceration would be given for the protection of the public because we cannot bring that person back to the public.

Going to the second level of young offenders surely there is a greater emphasis in the young offender group that there is a possibility for rehabilitation. Therefore rehabilitation needs to be a pre-eminent factor among young offenders.

If we are talking about children we have to have maximum hope for rehabilitation. Surely we are not ready to write off a young person up to the age of 11 or 12 in terms of criminal justice, criminal punishment, retribution and these kinds of things. Hopefully the child is someone we can care for and correct because the patterns have not been so severely established that they cannot be corrected.

We are causing an almost impossible corrections process for a child under the age of 12 because even those systems of care are being totally imperilled. Those systems of care are the first line of care, the home and the family. There is the denuclearization of the family.

We are no longer a nuclear family. Our values are different, circumstances are different, and so forth and thus the loss of those family values that normally care and nurture. That is the best place to find it. That is where it works the best, but our system has changed and it does not necessarily exist.

Already we are going to start with problems. Those problems are not identified when a person becomes 12 years old. Ask any grade one teacher and they can tell you which of those kids are already problems and are going to be problems heading toward age 12. However, do they have the resources or the capacity to correct it?

This is an important issue. I do not think the age question is the answer. The answer is in recognizing the symptom of the problem of a child and finding the resources within the community, within our families, to accept that child, love that child, care for that child, rehabilitate him and give him a chance as a young person and an adult in our society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Do I have unanimous consent to go to the adjournment motion?

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think there might be a disposition to proceed to the late show but I am wondering if we could perhaps get the consent of hon. members to rearrange the order of speaking. Some of our colleagues are on route to the Chamber. In fact one of the more distinguished members has just arrived and perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if you would give him about 30 seconds to get his breath we would then be in a position to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): He will be number two anyway. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre is number five. We will try to rotate it if the other members are not here.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

OLD GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Curly.

Mr. Bird: I will try to ignore that demeaning remark from across the aisle simply because that hon. gentleman bears the same characteristics, not nearly so well groomed I might say and not nearly so grey.

I welcome this opportunity to elaborate on a question I put to the hon. Minister of Public Works on September 10 with respect to Old Government House in my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Old Government House is a national historic site that represents probably one of the best expressions of the tricultural history of our country, native, English and French, that exists anywhere.

The property is now surplus to the requirements of the Department of Public Works. Over the past four years through the efforts of all three levels of government at the local level we have been preparing a plan and advancing a case for the restoration of that property to be used as the lieutenant governor's office quarters for the province of New Brunswick. It would house the protocol offices of the province of New Brunswick, have a tricultural museum on the second floor and maintenance and historic furniture on the third floor. There would be a very large block of parkland surrounding the property on the banks of the Saint John River for which the city of Fredericton has committed itself to beautification and upkeep.

The general thrust of the proposal is that the Government of Canada would deed the ownership of the land and the property to the province of New Brunswick. The province of New Brunswick would undertake the ownership and the maintenance thereafter.

The cost of the restoration is estimated at about $10 million excluding property costs for which the local trilevel steering committee proposed that the federal government consider approximately 70 per cent, the provincial government approximately 30 per cent and the city of Fredericton would put its contribution in in terms of the long-term property maintenance and beautification of the area.

I have suggested in my correspondence with the hon. Minister of Public Works that the federal contribution of approximately $7 million would be divided as follows: $1 million from Public Works Canada itself would be in lieu of ongoing maintenance work. The building is in serious need of repair and there is a major maintenance cost that is presently attributable to it. It will increase as the years go by. Environment Canada under its Canadian Parks Service and National Historic Sites would contribute $1 million. Communications Canada under the Museums Assistance Program and the Cultural Initiatives Program would contribute $2 million. Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency would contribute the final federal equity of $3 million.

The province of New Brunswick as I have said would contribute the remaining $3 million to the capital restoration costs. It would assume in our proposal, and it has not committed to this, the annual maintenance of about $350,000 with the city of Fredericton's ground maintenance being $30,000 per year.

We proposed that this project would be conducted over a five-year period. The initiative is presently with the Minister of Public Works on the federal side and with his counterpart, the Minister of Supply and Services, at the provincial side.

My question for the Minister of Public Works is as to how this matter stands with respect to the proposals I have made to him. Is he ready now to give us a definite and an affirmative answer that will see the opening of this restored Old Government House in Fredericton—York—Sunbury before the turn of the century?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Public Works I would like to respond to the question by the most hon. member from Fredericton.

He has spent a lot of time not only at home but also in Ottawa working on this project. Not only he and I but the department and the government also agree it is a worth-while project. It is one that is highly desirable. There are not that many buildings in Canada that have the same kind of historic significance. If I understand correctly, that building was actually part of the initial discussions that led up to the Confederation of this great country of ours.

As the member indicated, there has been a trilevel committee of which he was one of the co-chairs. It involved the municipal, provincial and federal levels. It produced a report of the recommendations. Of course, the essence of that report was that they proceed with the renovations to make this a permanent historic site.

As a result of that report, the Department of Public Works has drafted a memorandum. It outlines the work that has to be done as the member has indicated along with an allocation of costs. Under the proposed formula, the federal government would be asked to contribute in land and by other means through the departments that have already been mentioned a total of about 65 per cent of the cost.

Although there has been broad general agreement, there are still some outstanding issues and negotiations are continuing. It is our hope that they will see an early conclusion because we are anxious to move ahead with this project and will give it all our support and encouragement.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on September 15 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration what he was planning to do to help the unemployed in all of Canada, but especially in the greater Toronto area. At that time 11.7 per cent of the people were jobless. Now, five months later, the situation has not improved very much; it is still over 11 per cent. This means that 212,000 people are looking for work in metro Toronto.

In the same period last year, toward the end of January, beginning of February, 202,000 people were looking for work, which means an increase of 10,000 jobless people in metro Toronto over the past year.

The Leader of the Official Opposition announced that job training will be the number one priority when the Liberals form the government. I ask the government of the day why can that government not make people its first priority also?

Toronto used to be the place where people from other parts of Canada came to find jobs. If jobs were not available in the Atlantic region or in the western provinces, people would come and find jobs in Toronto. Now, unemployment is higher in Toronto than in Halifax, Saint John, New Brunswick or Quebec City.

I have constituents in my riding who have never been unemployed for one day in their lives, suddenly at age 55 finding themselves without work and too young to retire. Job retraining is often the only hope for these older workers. These people need help in the new economy, and yet last year the government ran out of money around May or June because of poor planning.

I have many constituents who paid into the UI fund all their lives and when they needed help the government said: Sorry, we goofed, we mismanaged the economy and we cannot help you. Actually, many of them did not even get a sorry; they were very rudely treated when they went to apply for the retraining programs.

My constituents are not looking for handouts. They need a hand up. What assurances can the government give Canadians that the job training fund will not run out of money again? I was pleased that the minister did commit extra funds for the year 1993 of $2.2 billion. Again, are these funds going to run out in May or June, and then for six months people will be coming to their MPs' offices because there are no funds when they go for training?

I did a little research and I found out that the job training fund does not respond to demand. If the money runs out before the end of the fiscal year, Canadians are out of luck, even in the middle of this recession. What kind of economic management is this?

The government has never been capable of managing the economy. The numbers speak for themselves: three million people on welfare; 1.5 million people unemployed. The minister said that the ones who get retraining do go on to better jobs. If that is the case let us put our money where our mouths are. Why should it be just the employees and the employers paying for retraining. Should not all Canadians pay? When a doctor goes to be trained it is not the medical association and the client that pay. When someone goes to learn to be a teacher, it is not the teaching profession that pays for that education. It comes from general funds. It is the whole country that pays. This should be treated the same way.

Do not put all the training on the backs of the employers and the unemployed. They have been hurt already. I hope the government will have an appropriate answer today.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to review this. When Bill C-21 first went through the House, and was held up in the other house and went back and forth, we did not get much co-operation from the other side. In that bill we introduced training expenditures under the UI program. In 1990, $500 million was committed to training the UI recipients.

• (1800)

Bill C-21 really showed us that this is the way to go and in 1993 we continued our support to training and set up UI training dollars at $2.21 billion. Canada Employment and Immigration over-all expenditures on training and employment assistance is going to reach $3.8 billion in the years 1993-94. With that $3.8 billion, as my colleague has been saying, we are going to provide assistance to over one million Canadians; $300 million of total UI developmental uses goes to address the needs of displaced workers or workers who have a history of long-term attachment to the labour market but who have lost their jobs.

Some 326,000 Canadians are going to receive skills training. Another 162,000 Canadians will train under the Fee Payer Program. We will see $110 million allocated to self-employment assistance and $15 million to assist workers to move to where the jobs are. Over 11,000 Canadians will be assisted under this particular program.

We are also going to see $120 million budgeted for UI job creation in 1993 to assist probably about 31,000 unemployed workers to get back into the work force. Also we will be providing $130 million in work sharing assistance and, therefore, about 160,000 Canadians are going to participate in that particular initiative.

I agree with my colleague across the way that training, education and skills training is extremely important. As we see the job market change all around the world, not just here in Canada, but all across Europe, England, Japan, the United States, Central and South America, there is going to be more of a necessity for skills training.

I know that private enterprise, unions and educational institutions are also joining with various governments, not just federal but provincial governments, to realize and emphasize the importance of that. While $3.8 billion may not be enough at this particular time, because of the restraints we are under it is all that we can afford. We have to spend it in the most effective places and get the best bang for our buck.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on February 1 I asked the Prime Minister a question. The question was based on a meeting the Prime Minister had with the premier of Saskatchewan last fall. The Prime Minister had said that if there was a need, the government would be willing to look at some other solutions with respect to agriculture.

I just want to refer to the response. When I rose in the House I asked the Prime Minister exactly what his government was planning to do with respect to agriculture in Saskatchewan as a result of the very poor harvest and the difficulties that exist in Saskatchewan at this time, he responded, and I quote: "This government brought in the GRIP. This government brought in the NISA. Both programs are greatly admired by Saskatchewan farmers".

The GRIP is not greatly admired by Saskatchewan farmers. Saskatchewan farmers do not like the GRIP. They do not like GRIP 91. They do not like GRIP 92. They do not like the Alberta or Manitoba GRIP. They do not like GRIP. That was made abundantly clear at a rally that took place less than a week prior to the day I asked the question. It was made very clear by the 13,000 farmers and others at that rally they did not like the program.

For a government and a party that purports to be such good managers of the economy, I find it strange that the Prime Minister knows so little about western agriculture, especially considering that his government has spent over $16 billion in direct payments in the last seven or eight years in this field.

Perhaps if the Prime Minister knew more about western agriculture that money would have been spent more wisely.

If the Prime Minister cared more about western agriculture and western Canadians he would not have eliminated one agriculture minister recently and given the other agriculture minister the position of justice minister. The justice ministry is a very full portfolio and that minister will not have time to deal with agriculture. He will be the agriculture minister in name only. We in fact have one agriculture minister.

It seems clear that the government has abandoned this area, that it has lost interest in this area, and we in western Canada are going to suffer for it.

We do not want to hear a litany of all the things the government has done, because they have not worked. Farmers and rural people, in fact all western Canadians, want to know what approach this government is going to take toward agriculture in the future.

We know there has to be consultation with the provinces. We know there have to be new programs developed. It is going to take the leadership of this government to initiate those programs.

What plan does the government have with respect to the future of agriculture? Oftentimes when governments do not have an answer they simply stand on their laurels and brag about all the things they have done.

I hope the government will not do that this time. Please tell western Canadians, please tell the people watching the parliamentary channel right now or those who will be reading Hansard what this government is planning to do with agriculture. What is the future direction with respect to agriculture in this country?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has supported farmers at an unprecedented level. We are going to continue to do so. We are going to continue to use all the safety nets which happen to include NISA and GRIP.

Those programs were developed by the producers through consultation with the agriculture minister and indeed the Governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. There was three-way participation. This was not by any means a unilateral agreement.

From 1985 to 1992 the federal government has provided close to $17 billion in direct payments to agriculture. Out of that $6.6 billion has gone to Saskatchewan. Much of this support was provided to overcome problems of drought and the effects of the international grain export subsidy war.

This year payments under crop insurance in GRIP alone are expected to increase to between $800 million and $1.1 billion in Saskatchewan, to which we are going to be adding $170 million from the agreement worked out a few weeks ago. I think my colleague mentioned the agreement that was worked out with that particular province.

In addition, we still have an offer of $63 million with Saskatchewan if we can cost share with the province. That represents a significant amount of money for a single province at a time when all of us at all levels are under restraint and other programs are being cut.

This government recognizes there are problems. We know that. We are making our programs as responsive as possible. The problems cannot be solved by more federal payments. The industry also needs long-term solutions and we would all like to see better prices. We want to see improved market opportunities, diversification and rural development opportunities. These are areas that we continue to work through.

We will be able to put more emphasis on GATT with regard to removing the subsidy war between the U.S. and the EC. Western diversification kicks in there as well.

I think the member will find that we have done a great deal.

HEALTH

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on November 18, 1992 I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I asked the minister if he would establish a full and independent inquiry, independent of governments, bureaucrats and politicians, with regard to a very serious issue concerning tainted blood.

Early in the 1980s the blood supply in many countries, including Canada, was contaminated by HIV. A study conducted by the Canadian Haemophilia Society provides reasonable grounds, and I underline the words reasonable grounds, to suspect that hundreds of blood transfused persons within Canada have yet to be notified of their HIV positive status.

The minister of health unfortunately rejected my call for an independent inquiry based on the grounds that it was not needed. He did however, to be fair and objective, say that he would consider an inquiry if it were needed to maintain Canada's faith in the country's blood management system and if the Red Cross and the Canadian Haemophilia Society were to request an inquiry.

On December 3, 1992 the Canadian Haemophilia Society called for a full independent investigation into the current blood system. Also five out of the six witnesses who have appeared before the subcommittee on health and welfare have called for a full independent inquiry.

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary, a very able and a very knowledgeable individual on the particular subject matter at hand, would avail of the minister as well as the department to concede to the request for an independent inquiry. To underline the sincerity of the request, I wish to tell the Chair and hon. members that the kind of inquiry we seek will certainly go back into years in which members of the opposition were in fact members of the government. This is not a witch-hunt of any sort. This is an opportunity to clear the air, to have an independent inquiry, in order to put some of these major issues to rest.

I would hope the parliamentary secretary responsible would respond in the affirmative, whereby careful and prudent consideration would once again be given to this request in view of the evidence which has come forward from reliable, sincere and responsible individuals following the issue for quite some time.

I hope the parliamentary secretary, in her usual way, could give me the kind of answer that would give assurances to those people who are in desperate need at this time.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the contamination of the blood supply in the 1980s by the HIV virus really represented a source of great personal tragedy for many people around the world. Indeed Canada did not escape.

According to the federal government's extraordinary assistance plan for HIV infected blood and blood product recipients, 928 Canadians were infected with HIV in this manner between 1978 and the implementation of the blood screening in 1985.

Others of course have been infected from transfusions that were received between 1985 and the establishment of the assistance plan in 1989. To the best of anyone's knowledge, these cases are associated with donors who through a brief window period before having developed any detectable sign of HIV infection donated blood.

While anything less than perfect is really very lamentable, today we do have a high standard of security and quality control in the blood system. However I would like to review the role of the federal government. We are a regulator. Under the Food and Drugs Act, Health and Welfare Canada has been responsible for the regulation of manufactured blood products like factor 8 and factor 9 for the treatment of coagulation disorders like haemophilia since the inception of these particular products.

The first factor 8 was licensed for sale in Canada in 1969. Also under this authority in November 1984 the department required all manufacturers of factor 8 and factor 9 to heat treat all products for use in Canada by a method known to inactivate HIV.

The second component of the department's role is as national health advisor to Canadians. Through the department we report the results of surveillance of AIDS and we started as early as 1982. We have provided regular comprehensive information on AIDS since then.

The third element is the department's role in the blood supply was as a non-voting advisory member of the Canadian Blood Committee. The federal government relinquished its non-voting advisory role in overseeing the blood supply in 1989 when the provincial and territorial ministers of health agreed to establish the Canadian Blood Agency.

As my colleague mentioned the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare is studying this particular issue of HIV transmitted disease in the blood supply during a specific period, looking mainly at prior to 1985.

I know there are numerous witnesses we have not heard from yet but I can say that under the direction of our chairman from Delta in B.C., who is a physician, the committee will be bringing forth recommendations.

I am a member on that committee and look forward to hearing as many people as possible. We hope to come forward with recommendations that will be satisfactory to all members in the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on February 12 I put a question to the minister of employment and asked him why he was proposing to totally deny unemployment insurance benefits to those who quit their jobs but could not prove just cause, when in 1990 his government brought in a penalty of seven to 12 weeks for the same matter.

I asked him why this excessive new penalty. Was the penalty he imposed in 1990 of up to 12 weeks not harsh and tough enough? If it was not, where were the studies to show it was not? Where were the evaluation studies? Where were the assessment studies?

Why after two years with a new rather harsh penalty of seven to 12 weeks was it necessary to bring in this new total disqualification of these individuals, especially when very often the matter of just cause is not clear cut? It is very difficult to prove and takes a long time to prove. It takes from two to three months on average to prove. We had one case in Montreal where it took up to two years.

Why is it necessary to have this absolute total disallowance of unemployment insurance benefits when you have another rule in the Unemployment Insurance Act that says you can only continue to receive benefits as long as you are ready and available for work?

I am saying this new proposed penalty is disproportionate to the offence. Under the present law a real abuser, the person who wants to quit without just cause and simply take a holiday, can be subject to a 12-week penalty. He then becomes eligible for benefits but if he is not ready and available for work he is totally disqualified. He does not get any unemployment insurance.

On the other hand is the person who wants to work but quits a job and has a just cause but cannot prove it because it is difficult to prove. Under the present law that person would get the 12-week penalty but would then qualify and immediately start looking for work. He would get unemployment insurance because he would be ready and available for work. He would be out searching for a new job.

Under this proposed law that same person would have no chance for any benefits whatsoever. He leaves his job. He believes he has just cause but cannot prove it. He gets turned down for one reason or other and is totally disqualified even though he is looking for a new job.

He does not want to sit at home; he does not want to go to Florida; he wants to work. He could not stand the situation he was in for one reason or another. Even under the new rules that were proposed yesterday under Bill C-113, he just may not be able to get his evidence together because it may be a grey area or an unclear area but he wants to work.

I want the minister to show me the evidence that this new penalty of seven to 12 weeks imposed in 1990 in Bill C-21 was not tough enough. Why did we have to go to this total disqualification, especially when we will have another provision in the law that says that if you are not ready and available for work at all times you totally lose your benefits anyway? I support that provision in the law.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond today. The member is correct. In 1990 I served on a committee where we spent a lot of time trying to deal with that bill. It covered a number of improvements, a number of reforms, one of which attempted to get a better balance between the training and retraining of workers, rather than strictly the insurance aspect, and staying out of work and collecting UI with no preparation whatsoever for returning to the work force.

Obviously with the restraint the government is faced with, there is no question that UI is a very big factor in the country's economy. It is over $20 billion a year. The current deficit in the UI fund is in excess of $4 billion.

There are a number of people who are using the UI fund who have quit without just cause. This government does not feel that the average worker in this country should be forced through their premiums to support people who leave their jobs for no just cause.

It is an opportunity in trying to address the restraints that are required to re-establish unemployment insurance with the insurance basis, to insure those who through no fault of their own have left their jobs and this government does not feel that the other workers should be forced to support them.

There have been a number of changes brought about in the new release of the bill. We have heard from not only members opposite but from people across the country. There is concern about how this is going to be applied. There will have to be extreme care taken by the government. It has added eight other major reasons of just cause. They were there before but they are there to try to ensure that the people across the country who have a legitimate concern will realize that this is not meant to penalize them and that the insurance program will work well for the unemployed people across Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion that this House do now adjourn is deemed adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

Hon. Pierre Cadieux (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and commence today's debate on Bill C-76, the 1992 budget implementation act.

In so doing I note that it is almost one year since that budget came down. As with all budgets, they are debated and approved in principle. The will of Parliament is indeed known following that approval, yet here we are, almost one year later, proceeding with the implementation of the legislative measures that flow from that budget.

It is a sad comment on Parliament and rather indeed more a comment on my hon. friends opposite than on the government that one year later we are still debating it. It is regrettable the government is obliged to use closure to vote through a fairly straightforward measure the fundamental principles of which were approved almost one year ago by this Parliament.

That seems to be what has happened here. It is a sad state and a sad comment on the state of parliamentary democracy in this country that a government cannot proceed with fairly straightforward basic legislation without the imposition of time allocation and closure.

Nevertheless this government is determined to proceed with necessary restraint measures. It is determined to proceed with deficit control measures, and I might say that possibly, our hon. friends on the other side are finally getting the message.

Mr. Blenkarn: No they are not.

Mr. McCreath: I do not know. I have listened to their leaders. My hon. colleague for Mississauga South says that he does not think so.

I noticed as recently as yesterday that the leader of the New Democratic Party of Canada has now become a convert. She is for deficit control. We cannot necessarily make sense of it but we have certainly heard the recent pronouncements of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to deficit control.

• (1010)

I suppose at some point in the future we might even look forward to the day when my hon. friends opposite will not just talk about deficit control, they will actually walk into this place and support measures designed to achieve it. We will wait for that and some day we will see it.

I want to say two things in my remarks this morning if I may. As always, I will be very mindful of the clock, Madam Speaker. I will not abuse your patience. You have always been very indulgent of me in terms of the clock.

First I want to talk a little bit about the specifics of this piece of legislation. Then I want to talk about the subject of fiscal restraint and deficit control in general. Since my friends opposite have now become converts to this I would like to assist them in their learning curve of understanding the process by which this government has been making such significant progress over the course of the last eight and a half years.

Bill C–76, the budget implementation act, 1992 of course was in the budget. I might say it was a fiscally prudent, socially responsive and economically sound budget.

The budget contained measures to boost the competitiveness of Canadian firms and workers. It is interesting to note that it is having an effect. Canadian competitiveness is up 2 per cent in the past year compared to only a 1.2 per cent increase in our neighbours to the south.

Indeed the budget, the measures and actions of this government notwithstanding the gnashing of teeth from our friends on the other side would seem to be having a significant amount of progress.

As well, the budget brought forward further actions to reduce government expenditures in order that we could ultimately reduce taxes. I would remind all hon. members that last year's budget brought with it tax reduction.

When this government says it is going to bring tax reduction, it does. We had the proof of it in the 1992 budget. The Canadian public will experience that as they fill out their income tax forms this year. They will find that the bite is not great, but a little bit smaller which is at least an improvement over having taxes go up.

There were a number of tax relief measures provided in that budget for Canadian families and indeed for students and Canadians with disabilities. Measures were also part of the government's over–all strategy to promote economic recovery, strengthen Canada's international competitiveness and further control its expenditures.

Bill C–76 initially contained four elements. It contained references to the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Salaries Act, the Lobbyists Registration Act and the Canada Student Loans Act.

Since Bill C–76 was originally tabled, we have had the December economic statement which brought even more generous benefits and benefits that will be very positive incentives for small business in this country.

Due to the diligence of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, that legislation has been brought forward. On this one I must give credit where credit is due. I must compliment my hon. friends opposite for not having held up that bill with respect to the Small Businesses Loans Act. That act is very important to thousands and thousands of small businesses in Canada.

I would like to commend them for working with the government to move that legislation along. It is now at committee stage. We look forward to seeing that legislation back very soon to be passed. Then small businesses from coast to coast in Canada can benefit from that legislation.

That leaves the three remaining elements. The amendments to the Salaries Act reduced the salaries of the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers by 5 per cent effective April 1, 1992. I will be interested to see if my hon. friends opposite will be supporting this bill.

To not support this bill would be a clear indication that they believe the salary reductions should not hit the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers. I assume if they vote against that it is their indication that they feel the Prime Minister and the ministers of this government are doing such an excellent job that they should not have their salaries reduced.

Unfortunately some of them might be beguiled into thinking it is because they hope to be sitting in the treasury benches some time before the next year or two or three should pass. I hate to break the news to them but I say they should look at their vote on this act more from the perspective of endorsing the excellent job being done by the incumbents on those benches right now.

Nevertheless this government believes in leading by example: do as I do, not as I say. That is why the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Forestry who I see here this morning and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans along with others who are here, lead by example. Restraint starts with restraining oneself. That is a very commendable decision and a commendable example taken by these measures.

The Minister of Finance in bringing forward his budget also indicated the government would strengthen its cost recovery performance. One area we believe should operate on a cost recovery basis of course is lobbyist registration. We know the Lobbyists Registration Act is of great interest to members of this House.

There indeed is to be a fee imposed on lobbyists to cover the cost of that process. User pay of course is a concept that has underlined many of the policies of this government. Many people come before members of Parliament requesting that more money be spent, but the fact of the matter is in order for government to spend money, somebody has to pay. I do not hear indications of support very often from my friends opposite or anywhere else that they favour tax increases.

If there is not a user pay concept where it makes sense such as in a case of lobbyists who are obviously in the business to make money, it is only appropriate that the cost of providing that service be raised. I should point out that as is the practice with this government there will be full consultation with the constituency affected by this decision before it is raised. Concern was raised at the committee looking at lobbyist registration.

Some people or groups, for example student organizations or poverty groups, might be penalized by this measure because they lack the financial means to pay the registration fee to register as lobbyists. Quite simply, these people are not required to register as lobbyists unless they are permanently employed and are employed as lobbyists, permanent representatives making continual representations over the years to the government. In other words, a professional lobbyist. There is a difference between advocacy and lobbying and that is recognized and of course it is the responsibility of the lobbyist to recognize it.

With regard to the Canada Student Loans Act the amendments in Bill C-76 deal essentially with three major items: removing the six-month, post-school, interest free period as of the 1993-1994 loan year; updating the alternative payment formula for provinces choosing to opt out of the program in the future, including an increase to the period of notice for such action; and making the administration of the program easier by allowing the minister to prescribe the forms to be used.

These measures will remove the interest subsidy during the six-month period after borrowers have completed their studies when they are generally in a position to assume responsibility for repayment. Aside from self-enrichment, one of the reasons for further education is to provide and prepare oneself for employment in the work place. Notwithstanding the gnashing of teeth I hear day after day from some of my colleagues opposite, it is interesting to note that Canada in fact has the best record of job creation in the G-7. So this makes eminent sense.

I am dropping my paper here, Madam Speaker. I apologize for that.

In any event these measures will—

Mr. Boudria: Can you not drop some more?

Mr. McCreath: My hon. friend asked me to drop some more. There is so much wisdom here, I would not want to lose any of it because I know how much you are looking forward to hearing it all.

These measures will remove the interest subsidy during the six-month period after borrowers have completed their studies when they are generally in a position to assume responsibility for repayment. They will update an obsolete alternative payment formula to ensure that the cost of previously authorized loans in a province would be deducted from any future alternative payments. They will streamline the program as well.

It is interesting to note that since its inception in 1964 the Canada Student Loans Program has enabled more than 2.5 million students to pursue post-secondary studies thus contributing to the development of a well-educated and adaptable work force.

I bet a show of hands in this House would indicate that there are members present who over the years have benefited from that program.

Indeed an additional $100 million in Canada student loans was provided to needy students in 1991-92. This represents an increase of 16 per cent in assistance available under the program.

• (1020)

Notwithstanding the continued importance of the Canada Student Loans Program in maintaining an accessible post-secondary learning system, it is necessary to modernize the program to ensure its continued ability to provide assistance to needy students.

The amendments proposed in Bill C-76 should therefore be viewed in the context of other measures currently being undertaken by the government to strengthen and improve the Canada Student Loans Program.

The February 1992 budget signalled the government's intention to reform the program and this was reiterated in the December economic statement. The government undertook to initiate negotiations with lenders on a new financing structure for the program. The objective is to reduce the high default costs and improve the over-all efficiency of the program. Lender risk sharing, a new rate structure and administrative streamlining are among the anticipated outcomes of the new financing arrangements.

In addition, by reducing default costs and improving program efficiency, it will be possible to enhance assistance for needy students. Specifically, financial restructuring is expected to provide the scope to eliminate the 3 per cent guarantee fee on new loans and to increase aid to needy students, once again showing that this government listens. When that 3 per cent fee was introduced it was criticized roundly by my friends opposite. I am sure they will stand in their places today and commend the government for having heard what they and others have said in responding in this way.

I would like to emphasize that under the new financing arrangements the government will continue to ensure that needy students have access to financial assistance so they can pursue post-secondary studies. This was the purpose for which the program was created and will remain so under the new arrangements. The legislative amendments required to establish the new financing arrangements are expected to be introduced shortly.

I want to talk about some concerns that were raised in committee about the Canada Student Loans Program. In particular, members were concerned about two related issues; the rising student debt loads and increased bankruptcies.

With respect to the rising debt load of students, while the debt load of final year students has risen over the past five years, less than 5 per cent of Canada's student loan recipients had debts of over $15,000. About 85 per cent of the borrowers have less than $10,000 in loans. Those with higher debts are university students with the best prospects for high employment rates and incomes. In fact, most of the borrowers who default have loans of less than $15,000. Having said that, let me assure the House that the Secretary of State's officials will continue to follow the situation closely.

A related concern is the higher bankruptcy rate associated with higher student debt load. There has been a substantial increase in bankruptcies involving student loans, but for the most part this is the result of the weak economy over the past two years, with which we are all familiar. As well, with increasing numbers of mature students receiving loans, we are starting to see greater numbers of bankruptcies in which student loans are a relatively small portion of the debt.

The Canada Student Loans Program has served the country well during its 28 years. It has provided $7.6 billion worth of assistance to over 2.5 million Canadians, allowing them to pursue their studies at thousands of designated institutions. However, the government has recognized the need to modernize the program, to improve its effectiveness in providing learning opportunities. It is clear that the proposals for the program's modernization will ensure that it better serves the needs of present and future generations of students. Canada as a whole will benefit.

I want to speak briefly about the business of debt and debt reduction in general, because that is what this legislation is all about. It is about debt reduction and deficit reduction.

Federal debt piled up rapidly in comparison to the gross domestic product in the mid-seventies and the early eighties as structural imbalances developed between expenditures and revenues. I think it is important to understand this.

I noticed in following the debates that earlier this week the Minister of Finance made the comment that this government, in eight and a half years in office, has not added a single, not one penny—I believe he said a red penny, I have never seen a red penny—but not a penny to the national debt. It is true. On the other hand, the finance critic for the Liberal Party said: "But the debt has doubled since the Tories have been in power".

A reasonable Canadian might ask: who is telling the truth? It is very simple. They are both telling the truth. I think it is important that this business of debt be explained so that people can understand it. There are three concepts: the concept of debt, the concept of deficit and the concept of surplus.

A deficit quite simply is spending more money than you are taking in. For example, when this government came into office in September 1984 it inherited a situation where the previous government was spending $1.33 for every dollar it was taking in. That 33 cents is a deficit.

A surplus is if you are spending less than you are taking in, which is what this government is doing today. In fact in the most recent year, notwithstanding the recession, the government saved Canadian taxpayers over $6 billion in spending on programs, $6 billion less than it was taking in. That is what a surplus is.

If you take the 33 cents more that was being spent than the dollar that was being taken in, once spent, it accumulates and is called debt. Debt is an accumulated thing.

If you have a credit card, it is great, you do not have to worry about what you are spending. If I want to spend money I spend until my pocket is empty, but if I have a credit card I can keep spending. I do not have any money any more.

By spending monthly more than I take in, I start accumulating a debt. Eventually I have to pay that debt off but there is a problem because as long as that debt is there it accrues interest.

We put money in the bank but we expect the bank to pay us interest on the money because what we put in the bank is a loan to the bank. The same thing applies in reverse. If I am borrowing money by using a credit card, the bank expects me to pay interest on it. The same thing applies to government.

It is interesting to note that when this government came into power in September 1984 the previous government of the day—that $1.33 I spoke of a minute ago—was running a deficit of $16 billion a year on its expenditures. Meanwhile that had accumulated a debt of $206 billion.

On the day this government came into office there was a deficit on actually running the government of $16 billion more than was being taken in. There was a $206 billion debt already accumulated on which in that year alone the interest payments were $22 billion.

Guess what? You have to add the $16 billion operating deficit, together with the $22 billion of debt that was accumulated in that year, and that is why when this government came into office there was a $38 billion deficit on the over-all accounts of the government.

What has the government done? The government had a different approach. It believed a business cannot be run that way and government is a business. It believed that debt had to be brought into line. The government has gradually brought that situation into line by reducing expenditures.

It is interesting to note that since it came into office, the government has reduced expenditures, compared with what its predecessor was doing, by an accumulative total of $118 billion. That is equivalent to all the money that was spent running the government this year.

The first year the government managed to cut spending down by $4.8 billion, then $7.9 billion, $9.4 billion, $11.3 billion, $14.2 billion, $20.2 billion, $23.3 billion and this most recent fiscal year, it reduced spending from what it would have been on the Liberal track of $26.9 billion. That is pretty significant.

What would have happened if the deficit control measures of this government had not been brought into line? Where would we be today? The $38.5 billion deficit which was the legacy of that Liberal government, without the restraint measures that this government had brought in, today would be, imagine this, $82.5 billion. The deficit would be $82.5 billion today. I do not even know if there is a computer that could add up what the debt would be in that circumstance. Of course the government has been bringing that deficit down. It is very difficult to bring it all down in one snap move. It takes time to bring it down. This government gradually reduced that debt through deficit reduction programs.

The $206 billion legacy, Mr. Trudeau's legacy to Canadians, with compound interest of $237 billion added to it would have totalled $443 billion. That is what the debt would be if we compounded Mr. Trudeau's legacy to Canadians. By operating since 1987 in the black, by operating with a surplus, the government has prevented the growth of that debt to the point that it is more in the vicinity of $420 billion today. It is still an outrageous sum.

It will take generations to pay off, but at least it is now under control.

I hear a lot of scoffing from the other side about what I am saying even though they know every word of it is true. The government has brought in many measures to control the debt. It is interesting to note that every one of these measures has been opposed by the newest disciples of debt reduction: our friends opposite both in the Liberal Party and in the New Democratic Party who are now converts to deficit control. We brought in measures to reduce the rate of growth of transfers to the provinces. They say: "Oh, shameful". They call that off-loading. The provinces spend money and the federal government is supposed to subsidize them whether or not it is out of control.

When we brought in Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan Act, and Bill C-60, Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements, members on the other side were opposed. The government has brought in measures to streamline the operations of government. There have been six pieces of legislation since I have been here: the Budget Implementation Act, 1991; the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act; the Spending Control Act; the dissolutions act; and the Government expenditure restraint act, 1990. Indeed we have the Budget Implementation Act before committee right now, Bill C-93. Every one of those was opposed by those people over there. We try to streamline government because we believe that leaner government can be as efficient as fatter government sometimes. Yet they oppose it.

We have privatized Crown corporations. There is a belief on the other side that whenever something is created in the way of a government body or agency it is supposed to be there forever. We believe that an agency, a council, a board, a commission or a department is created because there is a need for it. Once the need has been fulfilled we do not keep that bureaucracy and keep paying for it. If there is a better way to do it, if we can amalgamate, streamline and provide as efficient or maybe even a more efficient service to the public, then we do so. If the problem can be handled in the private sector our philosophy is that the government should get out of it altogether.

We have privatized a number of Crown corporations and every one was opposed by my friends on the other side. We brought in measures to restrain the salaries of public officials from the Prime Minister on down, as I said earlier and as is in this piece of legislation: the public service employment act, pension benefits act, budget implementation act and the government restraint act. Every one of these was opposed across the aisle.

We have restrained grants and contributions. We have reduced budgets by 10 per cent across the board. It is painful. Nobody likes to have their budget cut back. Frequently I have said, as have my colleagues, that when witnesses have appeared before us in committee they have said: "Don't cut this program; this program is important". Every program is important in the eyes of somebody. So to come before government and say "gore somebody else's ox, don't gore mine", just does not work.

Fair, responsible and competent government is government that tries to live within the means available to it. That means having the courage and the integrity, I might say, to bring together restraint when restraint is necessary.

What has been the results? The results are impressive. Everybody knows that we have been through a serious recession throughout the world for the last couple of years. It has hurt a lot of people. It has hurt people in this country. It has hurt people in my South Shore riding. It has hurt people all over the world.

My friends opposite would like to take a simplistic approach, assume the ignorance of the public and blame it all on the free trade agreement, the GST or something like that. However, if we look at the performance of our country compared to other countries during this difficult time, we find that the record is pretty impressive.

If we remove the inflationary effect and look at program expenditure growth in Canada, the record between 1984 and 1990 was .1 of a per cent while in every other G-7 country it was higher: 1.8 per cent in the U.S., 2.5 per cent in the U.K., right up to 4 per cent in Italy.

As I mentioned earlier, productivity is going up in Canada. In 1992 it was up by 2 per cent compared to 1.2 per cent in the United States. That is not a bad record.

Turning to job creation in Canada, we hear moaning and groaning about the free trade agreement and how we should all be afraid of the Mexicans because the NAFTA is coming. Let us take a look at the record. Canada has the best job creation record in the G-7: 12.9 per cent compared with 11.3 per cent in the U.S., 10.5 per cent in Japan, all the way down to 3.6 per cent in France. Our situation is not bad at all.

What is the alternative? We will have an election this year. Canadians are mad at governments. Generally speaking if governments take tough, responsible decisions they become unpopular. There is nothing that focuses the mind like the issuance of a writ, as I have heard the Prime Minister say on a number of occasions.

The minute that writ drops it is no longer: "How do you feel about the government", but "who do you want to trust the future of your country to? Who do you feel has the competence to handle what is going on?" There is no doubt in my mind about which way Canadians will go when the election comes. They are going to pick a Prime Minister and a government that have laid it on the line and have said: "These are the realities. We need the courage to face them". They are not going to pick an alternative.

We know where the New Democratic Party is coming from. It has presented its economic plan. We have seen its economic approach have an absolutely devastating effect on the province of Ontario in the last couple of years. We are also beginning to see the impact in places like British Columbia.

I noticed the Leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday came out with her economic policy document: A Strategy for Full Employment. I reviewed this document last night and I found it interesting that she said her strategy for new employment will eventually lead to 1,601,000 new jobs by 1998. That is in her plan. Her plan will involve spending more money.

It says in the document that the objective of the NDP is to contain the deficit over the next parliamentary term but not to reduce it. It is planning to increase taxes and increase spending. As a result the bottom line is looser money and fiscal policy, and a significantly higher tax burden on Canadians is projected, all to create 1,601,0000 new jobs, full employment by 1998.

Yet, if we look at the analysis of the Conference Board of Canada just following the same track we have been following, the one that has been opposed so thoroughly by the New Democratic Party, and getting the deficit under control, what will be the result? We must remember that NDP figure of 1,601,000 new jobs. The Conference Board says the government's approach will result in: 1,651,000 jobs or 50,000 more new jobs. This means there will be 50,000 more jobs plus deficit and debt control as well, as opposed to allowing it to mushroom.

I do not think anybody will be fooled by the recent conversion of the New Democratic Party to deficit control. It would have been better to have stayed on the track it was on. At least it was given points for integrity even if its policies were not taken seriously by anybody with a bit of an understanding of economics.

Then we come to our friends across the aisle, the government in waiting, as they see themselves. When the election comes the Canadian people are going to have to look at the Leader of the Opposition and at the Prime Minister. The Liberals think that the Prime Minister has been unpopular and Canadians say they do not like him. Canadians may not like the Prime Minister, I do not know why because I think he is a great guy, but that is fine, they do not have to like somebody to recognize his or her competence. Deep down Canadians know that this Prime Minister has the courage to provide leadership for this country, as he has done for eight and a half years.

When Canadians look across the aisle they say: "Where do the Liberals stand?" Where did they stand when the United Nations and Canada went to war? Where have they stood when they say they want to get the deficit under control? Where have they stood on every single measure that has been brought before this House to control expenditures and reduce the deficit in this country? They have stood against those measures. We can look at the list of items that have been brought forward for expenditures with no indication whatsoever of where the money would come from.

Finally, we see the new economics of the Leader of the Opposition and his party with his recent statement that he is going to abolish the GST. That is $15 billion. He is going to abolish it and only if Canadians elect him will they get to find out where the money is going to come from.

Do not take it from me. Some might not consider me an objective observer of this. Listen to what The Ottawa Sun has to say about Liberal Party economic policy. I quote from the Ottawa Sun on February 4 of this month: "Jean Chrétien has come up with his own Liberal brand of voodoo economics by promising taxpayers that a future Liberal government would wave a magic wand and make the nasty old GST disappear. The Liberals would actually replace the unpopular tax with a brand new business transfer tax of their own, a sort of GST, Grit sneaky tax. This scam is little more than a hidden tax intended to fool taxpayers". That really sums it up, does it not?

Here is another one. This is a good one from Claire Hoy in The Sudbury Star: "To find a replacement', Mr. Chrétien said, 'you have to know what you have to replace. We have to know the figures and we are not privy to that information'. That is a lie. Mr. Chrétien knows exactly how much money the government collects from the GST. It is no secret. The government puts out quarterly economic statements which even he can read".

I do not think there is any question. I can go on at great length, and I know the House would really like me to go on for quite a bit longer but I must give others an opportunity to participate in this debate.

Just as there is no doubt that Bill C-76 is going to pass the House today because it is the right direction and the right move for Canada, when Liberal economics and NDP funny money ideas are put before the Canadian people there is no doubt where Canadians will put their X. When Canadians have a chance to look at what is offered by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, by the Leader of the Liberal Party or by the Prime Minister, who has served this country so well for eight and a half years, there is no doubt what their vote will be. Their vote will be with me and this government to see that the progress that has been made for the last eight and a half years continues.

My friends opposite might as well vote for the reduction in those ministerial salary raises today because it is not going to hurt them one iota as they will not have the privilege of enjoying them.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, never has so much nonsense been stated in so little time from the member across—

Some hon. members: And so enthusiastically.

Mr. Boudria: —and so enthusiastically, and I am not going to comment on the physical properties of the member across, as he just did.

The long and the short of it is that little that we have heard today is factually correct.

First, let us talk about Bill C-76. As of last count, that is what we were supposed to be debating in any case. The member across told us that this House had not been fast enough to react and to adopt this measure.

I say to the member across that I make no apologies for the fact that I have no intention to pass the bill. The bill should be defeated and not passed. In any case, the allegation, along with several others, is factually incorrect.

First, the member said the government invoked this particular provision last February and that members should be ashamed for delaying the bill this long.

Maybe he is right in terms of shame. The shame belongs to the government House leader across the way. If this bill was so urgent last February, why did the government only introduce the bill in the House on May 1, 1992? It blames the opposition because it failed to introduce its own bill.

Second, in the unlikely event that I have not convinced the hon. members yet, does the House know when the government decided to debate the bill? It was on November 16, for the first time. This is a bill that was supposed to be urgent, according the member across the way.

After debating it for a whole three hours that day the government decided to invoke closure after another three hours. It blames the opposition for that. Then the government forgot about the bill altogether, completely, and it was put on hold. On February 5, after one day of debate in committee, it invoked closure at committee and returned it to the House.

Mr. Blenkarn: We did not invoke closure.

Mr. Boudria: The hon. member across does not know how to invoke closure in committee. I remember when he was the chairman of the committee on the GST. Surely he remembers how he did it.

On February 12 the bill was debated another day in the House of Commons and the government moved closure again. This is where we are. All of this would be silly even if the bill was good, but the bill is bad. Therefore the member across has no case at all.

The hon. member talked a little bit about economics. I do not know in what subject the hon. member majored but it was probably not economics. He explained deficit reduction this way. He said: "When the Liberals left power the deficit was high and we have reduced it since". The deficit was $34 billion that year and it went from $34 billion to $35 billion. According to the hon. member across the way that is a reduction.

Every year in every budget the government has announced a deficit reduction but it is still at $34 billion. How does that constitute a reduction? That is the deficit.

Let us go to the national debt, which is the accumulation of all deficits for previous years. The member says that his party, his government has not increased the national debt. Who did it then? Was it the provincial New Democrats in Ontario?

Mr. Mifflin: They are trying.

Mr. Boudria: They are trying. Is it the devil that made him do it? The national debt went from $168 billion in 1984 to $450 billion this year.

Mr. Mifflin: It went there all by itself.

Mr. Boudria: It went there all by itself. It is not the fault of the member across the way. Bill C-76 is one of those so-called deficit reduction bills.

I want to deal with specific clauses of the bill. What does this bill do? It does two main things. First, it imposes registration fees on lobbyists. Second, it imposes fees on student loans. I want to address these two issues in sequence.

First, on the lobbyists registration issue, it is true that some lobbyists are rich. It is true that some of the activities of lobbyists have led us all to question what they are doing. There is a committee report dealing with that right now. It is also true that there is such a thing as a tier II lobbyist. They are advocacy groups, groups of farmers, groups representing public health organizations and so on. They are also registered as lobbyists. They are called tier II lobbyists in our system.

I know something about the act having assisted in the drafting of the report in 1987, the bill in 1988 and the review of it right now.

• (1050)

They are composed of a whole variety of groups. Whether they are rich or poor no one should ever have to pay for the privilege of seeing an MP. That is wrong. It is morally wrong.

Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, our manual that dictates to us how this Parliament should operate, talks about this. It has been the authority for hundreds and hundreds of years. Let me quote from Erskine May's 20th edition.

It refers to the right to petition the Crown and Parliament. In other words, it talks about the right to make representation for what one wants, regardless of whether the group making that representation is a rich lobbyist like GCI or an organization like that, the Federation of Agriculture in my riding, or any other group.

It says:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure.

It goes on to say:

> The rights of petitioners and the power of the House to deal with petitions were expressed in two resolutions of the Commons in 1669.

For 324 years people have had the right to make representation to those who they elect. It does not matter whether the fee is $1 or $1,000, no one should have to pay a fee to see me, the Prime Minister, the member across the way or anyone else. That is wrong.

Those who are advocating this say: "So what, the lobbyists are rich". Maybe some of them are. That is not the point. The point is that this institution exists for everyone and everyone should have the right to make representation to his or her member of Parliament.

I am not the only one who feels that way. The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore agrees with me on that point. He has spoken eloquently on this issue both in the House of Commons and in committee, and he is a Conservative member.

There are several others who agree on that point. Any student of parliamentary procedure would understand that. If this debate was even entertained in the British House of Commons it would be thrown out as being unconstitutional. The member across the way is treating this as a joke but it is not.

On the other point if I may—

Mr. Blenkarn: How about Bill C-76?

Mr. Boudria: That is Bill C-76. Perhaps the member across should read it.

We are talking about the imposition of fees on people for the privilege of addressing their grievances to Parliament. That is covered in Bill C-76. Perhaps the member across has not read it. That is okay. He can. He can familiarize himself with the topic and then he will know that is exactly what this bill does.

The other part of the bill concerns having fees applied to student loans. There are a number of young people who work in this Chamber for us. They are our pages. Perhaps some of them have had to borrow funds in order to obtain an education. There is nothing wrong with that.

It is always better when we do not have to borrow because we do not have to pay it back. However for those who do, why should they have a 3 per cent tax on the privilege of borrowing the funds?

If a financial institution charged a tax for the privilege of borrowing from it we as a House of Commons would outlaw it. We would call it usury. We would call it all kinds of things. We would probably invent a new article for the Criminal Code to deal with it.

No private institution would dare do that. There would be so much bad press and so much bad coverage that it would not do it.

What will a 3 per cent tax up front on student loans do?

I will have to grant this to the member across the way: He is going to obtain $23.4 million with this measure. He is going to obtain $23.4 million from the young people of Canada who are trying to obtain a post-secondary education to hopefully make a better life for themselves, reduce the incidence of unemployment and obtain technical skills. This is how we reward them, with $23.4 million worth of fees added on to their costs.

If that is not bad enough, let me talk about the other clause of the bill. In fact, $35 million will also be yielded by the provision whereby students will no longer have six months after finishing school to pay the money back. They finish school in April or May, depending on whether they are going to a community college or a university. When they leave that school with everyone else, with the summer rush, with people scrambling all over to find a job, they are in competition with everyone else and are unlikely to get a job until September when all the others go back to school and they can finally position themselves. The months that were interest-free, to allow a student when he or she gets out of school to find a job, have been removed. Now they start paying interest right away.

The member for Mississauga South says that is right. I do not know if he means that is what is contained in the bill or if he means that he approves of it. I really hope it is not the latter. I hope that he as a free-thinking member, as he is known to be, will understand that is wrong.

My colleagues and I will not stand idly by. We will not give our consent to this bill. We are going to continue to oppose it because we feel it is wrong, on both counts I raised earlier. The member across can say that we should vote for the bill. It is all wrong but there is a clause in it to reduce the Prime Minister's salary and because there is a clause in it to reduce the salary of someone who is not even competent to do his job we should approve the bill. The rationale for that is a little hard to swallow.

If the Prime Minister does not feel that he is worth his pay that is his problem. Most Canadians would agree that he is not worth what we pay him and the same goes for his ministers. If they were judged on performance their salaries would not be too big.

Let us leave that aside for the moment because they are not going to be there very much longer anyway. They are in the fifth year of their four-year mandate. Sooner or later the Prime Minister and his government will have to muster the necessary intestinal fortitude to call the election. When the government does call the election the Canadian public will judge it. They will make the judgment so that it will not be a 5 per cent pay cut that the Prime Minister will get but a 100 per cent pay cut when he is turfed out of office by the Canadian public.

That is what they are going to do with him and his colleagues across the way.

My colleague from St. Boniface has spoken eloquently on this issue of student loans, as he speaks eloquently on a number of issues. My colleague from St. Boniface issued a press release on February 18 pleading with the government. This hon. gentleman is an educator. He is a tenured professor at a university and a professor emeritus, and knows this issue better than many other hon. members. He knows the damage this is causing.

I cannot understand this. We have a government across the way that has embarked on a program—and I know because I participated in the process in my own riding—called the stay in school initiative to try to convince our young people not to drop out and stay in school. It is a program to convince them that there is a better future for them. What kind of conflicting message are we sending to young people when on one hand we are telling them not to quit school and on the other hand we are imposing user fees on them if they stay in school and are removing the provisions to help them stay in school?

What kind of a message is that? It is a stupid message, that is what it is, and it is wrong. I know they have a majority government today. When the time comes consideration of this bill will end. On Monday there will be a vote on it because the government has invoked closure.

I say to the members across the way: "Never mind the nonsense; vote against this bill. It does not defeat the government. That is not true. That is hog-wash. Even if it is a so-called budget bill, it does not defeat the government. It defeats the bill". It would be a heck of a slap on the face of the Minister of Finance but it should still be done.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to continue once we resume Government Orders later today.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, over one year ago the government recognized Croatia as an independent state, but the government has yet to initiate diplomatic relations despite the fact that the government maintains a consulate in Zagreb.

The House will know that the consulate in Zagreb is a consulate to the embassy in Belgrade and a virtual state of war exists between Croatia and Serbia.

I call upon the minister of external relations to immediately open diplomatic relations with Croatia, to make our consulate in Zagreb an embassy, and to quit the pretence that Zagreb is really a consulate for our embassy that deals with the Republic of Yugoslavia which for all intents and purposes no longer exists.

VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, late last year the RCMP Public Complaints Commission issued a report recommending among other matters that the Commissioner of the RCMP apologize to Kitty Nowdluk-Reynolds.

Kitty, Canadians will recall, is the young Inuk woman who was victimized twice in 1990. She suffered a vicious sexual assault and was then subjected to horribly insensitive and inhumane treatment by the Canadian justice system.

In January the commissioner apologized to Kitty for the inconsiderate and unacceptable behaviour of certain members of the RCMP. He expressed regret over their unprofessionalism and their failure to respect the basic tenets of human kindness. I thank the commissioner for his apology, but there are many other recommendations in the commission's report that need to be acted upon in order to improve the criminal justice system.

For Kitty's sake and for the sake of all victims I urge the government to implement these recommendations which deal with the special needs of persons who are victims of crime. Kitty's ordeal must never again be repeated.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON ENVIRONMENT AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I want to say a word this morning about the issue of world population and the failure of the UNCED meeting in Rio last June to address the appropriate issues there.

On December 30, 1992 Anita Gordon, media advisor to Maurice Strong, Secretary-General at the UNCED meeting in Rio who by the way is a Canadian, and co-author of the book It's a Matter of Human Survival, in discussing the failure of the earth summit at UNCED and referring to Agenda 21, the agenda for that meeting, said:

> In fact, if you examine Agenda 21 carefully, you'll see that what it does is talk about our symptoms. It does not talk about our basic problem. It talks about water quality. It talks about deforestation. It talks about loss of species. It does not deal with the fundamental problem, the thing that is sort of setting everything on fire on this planet, and that's the human species.
> It does not talk about how we ourselves are expanding on the planet. It doesn't talk about overpopulation and it doesn't—certainly not—talk about overconsumption, which is the problem in the West. And, because it doesn't deal with those two basic fundamental things, it really does not attack the root of the problem.

What we need is more foreign aid directed toward education and health care.

ARMENIA

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, yesterday, Thursday, February 18, together with several colleagues, I had the honour to meet Mr. Varaztad Avoyan, member and General Secretary of the Armenian Parliament. Mr. Speaker Fraser even introduced him to the House. Later that day, he met some of those responsible for external affairs in my party to inform them of the terribly difficult situation in Armenia.

Without partisanship, we strongly hope that the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada will urge that this issue be put on the agenda of the United Nations Security Council. We ask that Canada raise the question of access for humanitarian shipments with our NATO ally, Turkey, and that initiatives be taken with the Russian Republic to consider with them an airlift to help these desperate people.

Madam Speaker, the situation is serious and I hope that hon. members of this House as well as the distinguished representatives of the national press will inform the Canadian people about the gravity of the situation.

SOCIALISM

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, over the past few years we have watched socialist governments around the world flounder, fail and fall as the people living under these antiquated regimes struggle to survive. All these are the results of decades of socialist ideology.

However, here in Canada we were treated by the federal NDP leader to a litany of socialist ideas outlined in yet another five-year plan for economic ruin.

In Canada we watch the NDP Ontario government and the NDP B.C. government struggling to keep their heads above water by blaming their mismanagement on the federal government, but the simple truth is that socialism does not work. Do not take my word for it; check the annals of history where there is ample proof.

PENNY PROJECT

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, what do you do with a million pennies? Well, just ask Ernie Penny. He is chairman of the Penny Project, a fund-raiser launched by the Foundation for Centre in the Park. The objective is to help raise some of the $262,000 which represents the foundation's share of the cost of expanding and renovating the Moose Jaw library and art museum.

Ten thousand dollars worth of copper is ambitious but in a vault in downtown Moose Jaw, I might add a vault with a strong floor, the pennies continue to mount.

Ernie Penny, Al McEwan and all the others associated with the foundation are to be congratulated for coming up with this marvellous idea, an idea which has received national attention including a feature on CBC's What on Earth.

We have even managed to bring them some pennies from Ottawa. Now Ernie Penny and his committee should be especially proud of this accomplishment. Since I have arrived on the Hill there have been all kinds of groups that have been unable to get even one red cent out of Ottawa. The foundation however has managed to get a whole jar full.

CANADA POST

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, is there no limit to the ingenuity of Canada Post to find ways to infuriate the Canadian public and to induce phone calls to the offices of members of Parliament?

Canada Post says that if a letter is delivered to you in error it is now your responsibility to place it in a new envelope, readdress it, put a new stamp on it and put it back in the mail.

It is nonsense. It is an outrage with which Canadians will simply not put up, nor should they. This measure will not result in Canada Post getting its revenues in order. It will simply result in a lot of mail being thrown out that should be delivered.

I call on Canada Post to immediately remove this silly directive.

TAXATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to express my disappointment over the government decision to launch a study on how best to collect tax on prepaid funeral trust funds.

By imposing yet another tax this government has shown its lack of compassion to the seniors of Canada. As it is, people must pay the GST on all funeral costs including headstones and caskets. Surely prearranged funeral costs should be spared from any unfair taxation.

People who prepay for funerals want the peace of mind that goes along with it. By taxing these trust deposits there is no incentive for persons to prearrange their funerals.

The government has unfairly taxed everything from books to women's hygiene products and now it is attempting to tax prearranged funerals.

I call on the government to stop its attack on our seniors who built this country. Surely our seniors have earned the right to peace of mind.

TRADE

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I was disappointed to learn the other day that the parliamentary committee studying the North American free trade agreement has decided to cancel a hearing in Saskatchewan.

• (1110)

I have a letter from Mr. Paul Brassard, co-ordinator of the Rural Life Ministry. He wrote:

> The tour to Saskatchewan has been cancelled. We were missed in April and now again. What is happening to our democratic process? We are a part of Canada and insist that we be heard on NAFTA.

Those are the facts from Paul Brassard, co-ordinator of the Rural Life Ministry, a highly respected group in Saskatchewan.

They have the right to be heard. The people of Saskatchewan have the right to be heard on NAFTA. I insist that a parliamentary committee go to our province and let the people speak. I am not sure what the government is afraid of or what the opposition is afraid of, but these people have the right to speak.

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, yesterday at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa a large map of Canada was raised containing more than 200,000 signatures in support of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture Report entitled The Ties that Bind.

The raising of that banner marks the beginning of an aggressive campaign by Canada's cultural community to raise the priority for arts and cultural activities in the context of the forthcoming federal budget.

While that is a reasonable objective, I think the higher goal is to reach out to individual Canadians at all levels across the country in a campaign to create cultural awareness and to ignite the spirit of appreciation for and participation in cultural activities.

It is with the people of our nation that the priority for culture must first be elevated if it is ultimately to be reflected in government policies and budgets. That mission is one which has long been pursued by the Canadian Conference of the Arts. It is fitting that its launch of The Ties that Bind project yesterday will hopefully prove the catalyst to such a national cultural campaign on a continuing and lasting basis.

The arts and cultural activities in Canada deserve a higher priority both among the people of Canada and with their governments.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I rise today to express my utter disdain for the Prime Minister's cruel defence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his remarks concerning sexual harassment. The Prime Minister has only added to the agony of women who live daily with the contemptible behaviour the Prime Minister has condoned by failing to demand an apology from his minister.

Let me make it perfectly clear. Sexual harassment is not a laughing matter, ever. Sexual harassment destroys people, destroys families, poisons the work environment and keeps women subservient and stigmatized. Sexual harassment is not a compliment. It is not something with which one is favoured. It is humiliating, degrading, terrifying and soul destroying.

A few dozen or a few hundred appointments do nothing to help thousands of women who are being emotionally and economically destroyed by the obscenity of harassment. It is now the Prime Minister who owes Canadian women an apology.

ABORIGINAL FISHING STRATEGY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, the British Columbia fishing industry is facing another tense summer over the aboriginal fishing strategy. In order to maintain any conservation measures and to prevent serious confrontation between whites and natives certain things must occur.

First, there must be consultation with all parties involved: the processors, the sports and commercial fishermen, the natives, the province and the federal government. This consultation process is being initiated by the minister this week in Vancouver.

Second, there must be strict enforcement of all regulations on whites and natives alike.

Third, there must be a clear definition of the wording of the Sparrow decision.

Fourth, every effort must be made to maintain the high quality of B.C. salmon and to make conservation a priority.

Most important of all is a positive and co–operative attitude by all parties to maintain and enhance this valuable industry to the province of British Columbia and Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, on March 31, 1991, 500 workers lost their jobs when Abitibi's Thunder Bay mill was permanently closed. A year later 245 workers at Domtar's Red Rock mill lost their jobs when that mill reduced its operation. During the last two years hundreds more at Abitibi's provincial paper mill and other mills in Thunder Bay and area have lost their jobs as a result of downsizing.

The list goes on, with 200 workers at Canadian Pacific Forest Products now in danger of seeing their craft mill in Thunder Bay closing and yet another 100 workers at Provincial Papers as they continue to restructure.

Under the existing Unemployment Insurance Act anyone who loses his or her job and gets severance pay has to wait until the severance has run out before collecting unemployment insurance. Under that same act workers who in these cases have paid into unemployment insurance for decades are cut off from UIC after a total of two years from the date of lay–off.

In some cases family supporters who have paid into UIC for all of their work lives and who have never drawn pogey will not get one cent from this government.

I call on the government to act immediately to ensure that workers get the full UIC benefits they have paid for.

WORLD VISION FAMINE

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Madam Speaker, for the last 15 years World Vision Canada has encouraged teenagers from across the country to abstain from eating solid food for 30 hours in an effort to raise awareness of the issues of Third World hunger.

If we take just a moment to think of our friends from the Third World it will incite us to make that little effort which can contribute to better living for those less fortunate people. We as Canadians can do something about it. Participating in this 30-hour famine will give us a great experience of sharing.

In my riding students from the St-Alphonsus School in Chapeau and students from the Cité étudiante in Maniwaki and elsewhere are participating in this 30-hour famine. I wish to congratulate the students and their teachers.

I urge all Canadians across Canada to take part in this worth-while effort to raise awareness of Third World hunger and to show that we care. We can only hope that our contribution can make for a brighter future for those less fortunate.

Thank you students on behalf of those who will benefit from your efforts this weekend.

CANADIAN FORCES RESERVES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise to record my concern and the concern of the Official Opposition over the charges made by the Auditor General on the Canadian Forces Reserves in his report last November.

The Auditor General stated that the reserve system as it is presently constituted provides only limited military capability. He also pointed out that the Department of National Defence needs to devise policies that will ensure a reliable format of reservists for training and in emergencies.

With the stated defence policy of a total force concept since 1987, the Canadian Forces Reserves are an essential component of the armed services. They are increasingly forming more and more of our peacekeeping forces serving in areas of increasing risk. They presently form 10 per cent of all peacekeeping forces but will constitute over 50 per cent of the relief battalion designated for peacekeeping operations this spring.

I call on the government to address this serious finding, either to deny it or confirm it and to explain the government's plans for its immediate correction.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport.

The government has no policy on seating capacity in the airline industry. On the eve of a Toronto economic summit the government announces runway expansion, but admits it has no financing. It claims it will create 6,000 jobs and revises that within 10 minutes to 2,000 jobs. The government has no position to resolve the problems at Nationair. The government may or may not encourage airline mergers. What we have here are farcical, piecemeal steps, secret meetings and joke announcements.

Meanwhile airline workers do not know whether or not they are going to have jobs, consumers are in a quandary and the government is paralyzed. Why has the government allowed the situation in the airline industry to be reduced to such a shambles?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the government has a policy in the airline industry and that policy has been working. However, the policy is a continuation of the policy of deregulation that was suggested by the Liberal Minister of Transport.

There is a problem with airlines all over the world. They all are at present and have been for a year or two suffering from severe losses. This is true of Canadian airlines. It is true of American airlines. It is true of European airlines. It is true of far eastern airlines. It is a problem that the airlines have to solve. They are in the private sector and they have to do their best to solve their own problems.

With respect to the situation in Canada, the government has been working with Canadian Airlines, as one of our two major national airlines, to see how it can be assisted in overcoming its present crisis. As well, Nationair has been having discussions with the Minister of Transport for some time because of its financial problems.

We will continue to deal with carriers on an individual basis, depending upon their circumstances.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I wish to ask the same minister a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We have a Minister of Transport but no one has any idea of what he does. We have a Minister of State for Transport but no one has any idea of what she does.

• (1120)

It is wonderful that these ministers have their nice limousine and access to government jets, but airline workers fear for their jobs and the public is afraid of losing service.

Does the government understand that its inability to solve the airlines' problems threatens the industry and undermines public confidence even more?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I will ignore the silly cheap shots in those remarks and just deal with the substance of the question, if one could exaggerate a bit and say there was some substance to the question.

Mr. Hollis Harris of Air Canada put the situation quite succinctly a few days ago when he said that airline management has to accept that they made many mistakes themselves and it is not all someone else's fault. That is the situation exactly.

Airlines that are in difficulty have to hold themselves responsible for their difficulties if they over-expanded or made other mistakes in their operations. In the meantime it is not the fault of the government, but we are attempting to assist them anyway because we believe it is in the national interest to have two competing national airlines if that can be achieved.

As to the rest of the hon. member's remarks it is better not to respond and the way I feel about it today, I am not going to bother to respond.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for a minister who knows something about this issue. I would like to direct my question to the minister of state for small businesses who announced yesterday the policy of his government that there was going to be an expansion at Pearson International Airport.

One minute the minister announced the expansion was going to create 6,000 jobs and about 10 minutes later he admitted that it would in fact create 2,000. He also stated that he did not know where the money was going to be coming from.

Could the minister clarify who is going to pay for this half a billion dollar expansion? Will it create 6,000 jobs, 2,000 jobs or in fact no jobs because it will never happen?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like to know whether the hon. member agrees with expansion at Pearson. She does not say that she has a position on this.

What was announced yesterday is an acceptance of the panel report. We are going to go ahead with immediate construction of the north-south runway and indicated that the east-west runways will be done as well. The three runways will create 6,000 direct jobs. We made it very clear. The first one is 2,000 jobs but when the other two come on it will be 6,000 jobs.

More important, by giving this indication yesterday, people can plan. Industries can be attracted to the Pearson airport. Airlines can count on runways and an operation which will be efficient and on time.

What we were doing with that announcement was putting in place a framework for a strong Pearson. It is one of the biggest airports in all of North America. It is very important both to the Canadian economy and to our international competitiveness.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport.

Yesterday in the committee the chairman of PWA Corporation, the parent of Canadian Airlines, said that the Minister of Transport must provide leadership in restoring order to the airline industry which is continuing to bleed due to excess capacity in that industry.

Failure to act is going to lead to the destruction of one or both of our national carriers while losses are continuing at a daily rate. When is this government going to stop issuing idle threats and take concrete actions to deal with the problems in this vital industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, if there is overcapacity in the Canadian airline industry and it is agreed on all sides that there is, the overcapacity was not caused by the Minister of Transport or the Government of Canada. We did not put a gun to anyone's head in the airline industry telling them to go out and purchase more aircraft or to acquire more equipment. These decisions were made by those individual airlines.

Now it ill behooves them to say that the problem they have caused should now be entirely resolved and all the problems overcome by the leadership of the government. The government provided a regulatory framework within which they should operate. If they have not operated successfully, they should examine the mote in their own eye.

RAILWAY INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, the government has to play the hand it has been dealt, if it does not want to deal with the problems that are there, that are real and that are costing Canadians their jobs, why does it not get out of the way and let somebody else have a go at it?

It is not just the airlines. The Minister of Transport has been sitting on a report from the Rivard commission since the end of January that is telling him that the same problem is created for the railways.

Is this government going to sit back and let the railways go out of business the same way it has been sitting back and letting the airlines suffer? Does it have a transportation policy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the railways have a problem now caused by differences in the economy, in geography and in the way goods are carried. It is caused by billions of dollars in public funds going into roads so that their competition in the trucking industry has put them in a very difficult position, and so on. That is the reason for the problems of the rail industry.

With respect to the question of overcapacity, what does the hon. member want? He talks about jobs. Does he want us to order the airlines to let thousands of people go to meet his demands that the overcapacity be reduced? Why does he not adopt a policy of some specificity and tell us whose jobs are to go and how they are to go? Just whose capacity does he want reduced?

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the leader of the New Democratic Party released an economic paper outlining specific proposals for an alternative to the government's policies. The fact is the New Democratic Party was prepared to put it in writing while the Liberals are still hiding on all the major issues in this country.

Yesterday in response to the document produced by our party, the government House leader said that he was opposed to our position of abrogating NAFTA and the free trade agreement. We still do not know where the Liberals are.

When the government House leader made that statement was he aware that another 250 jobs were lost in Oshawa in the radiator plant as a direct result of that continuing free trade agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am in the process of reading the NDP economic plan.

An hon. member: It is good bedtime reading. It would put you to sleep.

Mr. Mulroney: It is not going too badly. I am getting there.

I have to say, with due respect for the leader of the NDP and my friend who just spoke, that while there is lots in there that I as a Progressive Conservative would disagree with, I commend the leader of the NDP for having the courage and the principle to bring forward a plan as opposed to the Liberals who indulge in shell games, hypocrisy and evasion of responsibility.

It happened that unfortunately the leader of the NDP brought out recommendations for example with regard to the cancellation of NAFTA on the very same day that Canadian exports jumped to $157 billion, the highest in history. Our merchandise trade balance with the United States reached $17.7 billion and trade exports to the United States are $20 billion higher today than when the free trade agreement was signed.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, that is cold comfort for the 250 people who have lost their jobs in Oshawa. It is cold comfort for the two million people who line up every week in this country at food banks and the 1.5 million people who have been unemployed since this government was elected and continued that chronic unemployment.

I do not expect specious answers from the Prime Minister. We do not know whether or not he is keeping his job. That is not what Canadians are concerned about. What we want to know is how can we get Canadians back to work when our jobs are going to the United States and will go to Mexico if we continue these foolish trade policies.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend asks a very key question: how do we keep and build very good jobs? The answer has to be with an economy with low inflation.

Inflation is now at 1.5 per cent, which is the lowest in 30 years in Canada. I suspect it has a lot to do with low interest rates which in 1992 averaged their lowest in 20 years.

More important than that, it has to do with increased productivity, which is up by 2.6 per cent, and the lowering of unit costs compared with the United States. In the first three quarters of 1992, our unit costs were down 6.6 per cent, which means that this combination of activity indicates very clearly that Canada has become strongly more competitive, therefore in a position to sell more abroad and create value-added jobs at home.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I do not suppose there is too much time in Question Period to get into debate. However, I want to make one point before I ask my question.

The unit costs have dropped simply because there has been a transfer of manufacturing tax off the corporate structure and on to the backs of the Canadian people through the GST. That is why the unit costs have dropped and that is where the Canadians are paying the subsidy.

There is 11 per cent unemployment in this country. In some regions it is up to 16 per cent. Does the Prime Minister think it is good enough for the Canadian people to hear nothing from the Liberals and sophistry from the government as they attempt to plan their lives in the face of all of these promises and still have no results?

What can he possibly say in terms of specific answers for jobs for Canadians now, not pie in the sky?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on behalf of those indulging in sophistry, I cannot speak for the phoneys but I will speak for the sophists today.

To answer my hon. friend, there were some 57,000 new jobs created in December; some 45,000 new jobs created in January and it is forecast that approximately 350,000 new jobs will be created this year.

According to the OECD, employment growth for Canada in 1993-94 will be the highest of the OECD and the G-7 countries. Employment will be strong and durable, providing we keep inflation low, our unit costs low and we continue to strengthen our productivity and trade into new markets being opened by the free trade agreement and by NAFTA. That is the way jobs are created in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, his minister of employment delivered what can be described as a disgraceful speech before the Empire Club in Toronto where he attacked once again the unemployed and the unemployment insurance system. He said that Canada's social system is like a net that catches fish. Hardly a proper reference to the many thousands of Canadian men and women who are out of work.

In the short time the Prime Minister has left, could he not find himself a minister of employment and immigration who would put his or her energies to putting people back to work and creating training opportunities rather than undermining the unemployment insurance system which is a basic fundamental element of the labour market in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the unemployment insurance system is precisely that: provided that its objectives are not distorted from providing for insurance against unemployment to insurance for just about anybody who chooses to leave his or her job for no reason or no provocation.

The ultimate original objectives were sound. Around 1971–72 the pattern began which has transformed unemployment insurance from something quite divergent from its original objectives.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration knows all about it. He comes from northern New Brunswick, and he is very sensitive to the questions raised by my hon. friend. He is aware of the value of these social programs to people because they impact so heavily on northern New Brunswick.

As a Canadian and as a minister, he is also aware of the greater damage that occurs when the fiscal strength of the country is drained away by abuses that should not be inflicted on ordinary Canadian taxpayers. He is in the process of trying to clean some of these up and he had hoped to count on the support of my hon. friend. Perhaps that will still be forthcoming.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise this question with the Prime Minister. He talks about distortions in the system. What is a more damaging distortion of the system than the fact that at present there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have already exhausted their benefits and have had to go on the welfare rolls?

In my own city of Winnipeg the rolls have increased by 400 per cent over the last couple of years simply because the unemployment system under this government has been undermined and has deteriorated.

Does the government know and understand that there is a very specific problem of people who want to work, who do not have benefits any longer, whose jobs are not there because the government policies have trapped them into an unemployment ghetto? When will we have a minister of employment who will begin to seriously address that issue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting, apart from the criticism, to hear from a Liberal about a given plan. What are his ideas, apart from the criticism?

We have already indicated that the programs we have are good. They can be amended, they can be strengthened, consistent with the need to strengthen the fiscal framework of Canada.

My hon. friend may have noticed that in the speech by President Clinton the other night, one of the points he mentioned was that if he did not get a deficit reduction program in place of the nature he indicated, some $400 or $500 billion over the next five or six years, he was horrified by the thought that 20 cents of every tax dollar in the United States would go to service the debt. He said: "We must stop this. This would debilitate the economy of the United States if ever we got into the position of paying 20 cents on the dollar."

The day I became Prime Minister I inherited a situation where 32 cents of every dollar went to service the debt. In 1984, for every dollar of tax revenue brought in, we were spending $1.33 in services. It was an unacceptable situation. Whether my hon. friend was in government or in opposition or on the street, he knows full well that he cannot maintain this partisanship in respect of the fiscal needs of Canada.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday in Toronto the Minister of Employment and Immigration continued his vicious attack on the victims of unemployment instead of addressing the causes of unemployment.

In view of the unprecedented levels of high unemployment in certain regions of this country, and I name Cape Breton which has an unemployment rate of 26.4 per cent, I want to ask the Prime Minister how will these changes, these new measures assist the unemployed find meaningful work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my friend refers to the unprecedented levels of high unemployment in Canada. I think the numbers, which were indeed too high at 11 per cent last month, were 11.7 per cent under the Liberal government when they turned it over to us in 1984.

The member ought to be more selective in his use of the word unprecedented, as unemployment was substantially higher. Parenthetically it was also higher, with inflation running at 12.9 per cent and interest rates running at 22.75 per cent. All of this has been corrected as well in the structural changes we have brought about.

How are jobs created? They are created by stopping the crowding out of the private sector in regard to interest rates, in regard to public borrowing, by strengthening our inflation rate and by strengthening the fiscal capacity of this nation to generate new economic wealth, which only comes about in one way, and that is by creating real productivity gains. Anything else is a myth. This country will prosper with new wealth only if we enhance our productivity.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also for the Prime Minister.

On Wednesday and Thursday of this week we listened attentively to the Deputy Prime Minister actually brag about his economic policy and how some day, some magical day in the future it will be much better.

If the Prime Minister is so confident, so reassured and so certain of his economic policy, why does he not put them to the real test and ask the Canadian people to make a judgment on this tired, old, incompetent government? Will the Prime Minister do that, go to the Governor General?

• (1140)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if he is talking about somebody being tired, I feel as young as a spring flower. I feel young and frisky, certainly compared to some people I know.

I have already told my hon. friend that the NDP and the Conservatives are ready to have an election any time, but we cannot have one until the leader of the Liberal Party fulfils his obligations and tells Canada where he stands on the GST. This is the important thing. Where does he stand on free trade?

I will conclude simply. I hate to do this on a Friday, but the last time I heard the member for Winnipeg say: "Call an election and give us a chance" was in 1988.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance claimed the Conference Board of Canada saw great job gains from the present government's policies. This month the Conference Board testified to the finance committee that its forecasts on present government policies showed 9.3 per cent still jobless four years from now. The Conference Board said it is "a pretty bleak picture".

Why is the government supporting economic policies that have these bleak results for jobs? Will it not look seriously and in a non-partisan way at the NDP jobs plan which would mean only 7.5 per cent unemployed in four years' time, lower taxes for 80 per cent of Canadians and a lower deficit?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I find it interesting where the hon. member gets his figures and facts from.

The Conference Board, in its report, said that in five years' time 1,651,000 new jobs would be created. That is over a five-year period. I have read the NDP—

Mr. Harb: Propaganda.

Mr. McDermid: My Liberal friend says propaganda. Actually Grimm could not write a better fairy tale than this, I will tell you that. It is unbelievable.

In any event, under the NDP's make-work projects and the plans that it has brought forward, it is forecasting just 1,600,000 jobs which is less than what the Conference Board said.

If the Conference Board says that will bring our unemployment rate down to 9 per cent and the NDP are saying the unemployment rate will come to 7.5 per cent and you are relying on the Conference Board's figures, then you had better adjust this report that was released yesterday because obviously it is wrong.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister is comparing different things. What he should do is look at the unemployment rate projected just this month, as I say, by the Conference Board in its presentations to the finance committee of the House of Commons in which it predicted, and I quote exactly from it: "in four years' time the unemployment rate in this country will be 9.3 per cent". This is direct from Mr. Frank, the chief economist to the Conference Board.

The projection that the New Democratic Party has in its jobs plan is 7.5 per cent, significantly lower.

Why is the government prepared to accept this kind of bleak picture for jobs in this country? Why is it not prepared to give up its Count Dracula school of economics and get with it in the 1990s?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, first of all I must say to the hon. member that we will go to the four year period if he wants. He is saying that the NDP will have the unemployment rate down to 7.5 per cent in four years if we follow religiously its economic plan. The Conference Board, which he quotes, says it will be around 9.3 per cent in four years time. The Conference Board in that same report says that under the current economic policies of the government, in four years time 1,375,000 new jobs will be created. Under the NDP plan there will be 25,000 jobs less.

The hon. member had better sit down and take another look at this report which, by the way, is so badly flawed that it is really hardly worth reading. I would suggest—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will continue.

SHAMATTAWA, MANITOBA

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The community of Shamattawa in northern Manitoba has been plagued by a high degree of violence related to gasoline sniffing. In this case it has an incidence of 80 per cent gasoline sniffing. Alcohol and drug abuse are major problems. Children are suffering because they do not have adequate heating and safe drinking water due to a lack of electrical service.

A cost-sharing project between Manitoba Hydro and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was to have financed the desperately needed hydro land line to Shamattawa.

Why has the Minister reneged on his part of the bargain and why has he withdrawn his support and commitment to this project?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I cannot comment specifically on the case of the project that my hon. friend raises, but I commit to her that I will provide her with a proper response.

The member raises another point that I think is very important and this is the question of the very serious issue across this country, but particularly in Manitoba, that is being faced by aboriginal children and families.

Since August of last year the department of Indian affairs has worked with a number of groups to deal with specific problems. Since September of last year the province of Manitoba with the department of Indian affairs and the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs has set up a task force to look at all Indian child and family agencies in that province. I think that working partnership with all of the parties is going to be important to all of the aboriginal peoples in Manitoba and I hope the results can be an example to the rest of us across the country.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Having said that they have set up a task force does not address the issue that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is being pressured to cut $40 million from his budget by the Minister of Finance.

Having said that, how can the department begin to assume that it can assist First Nations when it is proposing to cut the aboriginal economic development program funding by 28.8 per cent, which constitutes a $20 million cut and which in turn will cost the already economically depressed and job-starved communities 8,700 jobs?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think my friend is referring at least partly to an article in yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press. Suffice it to say that even the Winnipeg Free Press sometimes has to deal in speculation. Not until the estimates are down are we going to be fully aware of what is rumour and what is fact.

I think it is important to recognize that the people of Canada through the Government of Canada have made a strong commitment to aboriginal people, not the least of which is a financial commitment to aboriginal people, not only in DIAND, health and welfare, CMHC, environment for the green plan, but in a number of other departments to ensure that the partnership the aboriginal people want to build to guarantee their participation in their future is reinforced in everything that this government does.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will know of the existence of a product known as the Serial Killer board game, the object of which is to play the killing of children as a form of entertainment.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he is willing to do everything in his power and to give his own personal commitment to do whatever it takes to stop the importation into Canada of the offensive product known as the Serial Killer board game.

• (1150)

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we are aware of that particular issue. I want to thank my hon. colleague for providing us with a copy of the petition and also this press release on the issue.

I am informed that the Minister of Justice has already given instructions to his department to look into the situation immediately and to make recommendations on how to resolve that particular issue.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for answering my question. The Prime Minister will be interested to know that I have here today a petition with 14,222 signatures. This petition was signed largely thanks to one of my constituents, Léna Cléroux, who is here in Ottawa today.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister for his personal commitment that he will use the provisions of the Customs Act to prohibit immediately the importation of a game which, I think he will agree, is extremely repugnant to Canadians.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am told that the Minister of National Revenue has used this method. However, we must check the situation again with the Department of Justice to make sure that we can intervene in other ways as well and that all possible steps are taken to deal with this situation.

ABORIGINAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, in response to the government's December 2 restraints imposed by the Minister of Finance, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development seems to be unilaterally attempting to apply the bulk of the budget cutbacks to the aboriginal economic development program.

The Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations has written to the Prime Minister and has analysed the effects of a proposed 28 per cent cut saying that the impact would devastate the emerging First Nations' economies, create bankruptcies in the Indian commercial and industrial field and result in the countless loss of existing and future communities and membership.

Is the government prepared to exempt the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's economic development work from the over-all cutbacks that have been imposed to ensure that the commitments that have been made will be honoured and the bands' efforts toward self-determination and economic self-sufficiency are enhanced?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I was delighted to note earlier this week that even the New Democratic Party recognized that deficit reduction was the responsibility of all Canadians.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development shares in that responsibility as a department of government. Certainly that department, like every other, will have to go through a process that deals with its contribution to the over-all deficit reduction.

Certain programs in DIAND have already been exempted. I use the example of aboriginal housing. I can assure the hon. member that the minister and the government will review the expenditure reductions in light of being fair, making appropriate decisions and taking into account the success of CAEDS and other programs like that to enhance aboriginal investment and non-aboriginal investment in aboriginal communities.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I hope that the parliamentary secretary to the minister will have a look at the FSIN letter to the Prime Minister in which Chief Rowland Crow talks about the acknowledgement of this being the most disadvantaged and deprived group in the country and economic development being one of the most significant aspects of their future.

I want to also ask the government if under the circumstances it can do something that should not cost the government an extra penny, but gives aboriginal people through economic development a leg up. The Americans have a set-aside program for aboriginal procurements.

Is the government prepared to put legislation in place to allow procurement from aboriginal bands and specific purchases from aboriginal bands?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I just want to comment briefly, although I am sure that my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services is better able to respond to the specifics, on two things.

I think we have learned a lot in the last little while, that more money is not necessarily the answer to all our problems, but spending it better. That is the message I get from aboriginal communities as well as Canadians generally.

Second, I would say that the suggestion my colleague makes, if not specifically able to be carried out, is the type of creative approach this government has taken in the past in co-operation with aboriginal peoples and others to make sure that the best possible advantage is taken of things like government purchasing or the construction of communities and homes.

GILL-NETTING

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. This is a sort of seasonal question, but nonetheless a serious one.

As the minister knows, the practice of gill-netting is very destructive as a method of harvesting Atlantic salmon. There is a broad consensus among most angling interests that it is a practice that should be banned in the interests of conservation.

Will the minister consider banning gill-netting in 1993 and will he and his department enforce that ban once it is established?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has a great interest in the Atlantic salmon fishery as he well might, knowing personally the tremendous qualities of that splendid beast. I am very pleased to attempt to answer his question. He is also a great advocate of conservation in the salmon fishing industry.

As the hon. member knows, we had to manage the fishery under the Sparrow decision in a way that does not infringe upon food fishing activities, including fishing by aboriginals using their preferred means, unless there is a justification and conservation concerns to prevent that.

Last summer we negotiated agreements with a number of Indian bands in New Brunswick to have them voluntarily desist from the use of gill-nets. By the end of the season there was a marked decrease in the use of gill-nets. They opted into trap nets, guardian and habitat restoration programs. We are hoping to do more of that during this coming season and to reduce the problem of gill-net fishing.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has long predicated its harvesting regulations on the Sparrow case as a legal benchmark. Yet, gill-netting is a very destructive method.

Will the Department of Fisheries and Oceans consider challenging the Sparrow case in the interests of conservation?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the solution lies in good fisheries management. It does not lie in challenging the Sparrow decision, but trying to ensure that the aboriginal fisheries strategy which provides for conservation and, we think, the needs of aboriginal peoples to try to see that strategy goes into full force and effect and is accepted by everyone in the fishing industry. That is what we are working to do. It is by agreement that you can achieve real progress, not necessarily by threats of enforcement and hundreds of thousands of cases that go to the courts.

We are proceeding in a way which we hope will get everyone's support.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Canadian farmers are being thrown off the land in record numbers while a fund set up by the Farm Credit Corporation to help restructure them and keep them on the land is not being used. In fact, only 20 per cent of those who apply nationally and 14 per cent in Ontario have access to this fund.

Why are 80 per cent of farmers in Canada who apply denied access to this fund which is there to keep them on the land?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to take this question. That fund has been working for a number of years and working well for farmers. It has assisted many farmers to remain on the land and coming back to a competitive position.

The hon. member may think that we are not supporting them, but we have been supporting them and will continue to do so in the future.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I think the numbers really speak for themselves. In fact, there has been an over 300 per cent increase in the number of farms acquired by the Farm Credit Corporation over the last five years and a 1,700 per cent increase in the value of that land. In fact my office, as have many member's offices, has been deluged by many farmers who are both being denied access to this fund and whose farms are being undervalued by the policy of the Farm Credit Corporation.

What hope can this minister give the thousands of farmers who are losing their farms that they will be able to stay on the land? Will the minister instruct the Farm Credit Corporation to open up this fund to farmers to keep them on the land?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the fund has worked. The Farm Debt Review Board, an independent review board, goes out and meets with farmers and makes a recommendation to the Farm Credit Corporation. That has worked well and will continue to work that way.

Funding is one part that will keep farmers on the land but there is more to it than it. Agriculture has to be economic in Canada and the GATT agreements will be part of that. We will continue to work with farmers to provide them with a future through the safety net programs and various other programs we have brought forward for the last number of years. We will continue to work with the agriculture programs that we have.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport.

The cornerstone of the government's aviation policy has been no regulation, leave it to the marketplace. Yet we hear that Nationair is coming cap in hand to the Government of Canada asking for financial assistance.

If the government wants to be consistent in its policy, will it say no to any kind of bailout for Nationair, particularly because it has thumbed its nose at the Minister of Transport who has asked for capacity reduction in the industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, Nationair has had some conversations with the Minister of Transport. I believe it is requesting some kind of financial assistance. Whether or not that could be agreed to or if it was agreed to, what conditions might be laid down is yet to be determined. The Minister of Transport has not reported to the government yet or recommended a course of action.

With respect to thumbing their noses at the government, it is hard to find anyone in Canada who has not.

PROPERTY TAXES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, several Montreal area ministers and hon. members received a letter from the city of Montreal asking that the federal government fulfil its undertaking not to destabilize municipal budgets through changes to grants in lieu of taxes.

Why is the government refusing to put an end to this freeze? It could keep the promise it made to the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in 1986. Why is it refusing, and why is it continuing to penalize an area where there are more than 225,000 unemployed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe the minister responsible for housing answered that question the day before yesterday and intends to provide further details next week.

I thought the hon. member from Montreal had risen to congratulate the government for bringing about the $400 or $500 million dollar investment in northern Montreal, which should create thousands of jobs in tourism. I thought the hon. member would point out this piece of good news for the Montreal area. He therefore has a further opportunity to congratulate the government and Canada on this great success.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

My friend from the Western Arctic asked a question earlier concerning the specific case of the Shamattawa to which I was not able to respond. I want to give her an answer in respect to the concern she has expressed.

The question of the joint funding of the hydro line has been a subject of discussion. Unfortunately those discussions have not gone terribly well. However I did want to reassure my friend that the Government of Canada has not reneged on its commitment to jointly fund that line.

PETITIONS

CULTURE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition under Standing Order 36.

The petitioners say that culture reflects our country's values. Cultural activities are the means by which those values are nurtured and expressed. The petitioners ask that the Parliament of Canada adopt the recommendations of the standing committee report entitled The Ties that Bind and in particular that Parliament elevate the priority of cultural activities in the over-all context of its future budget considerations to ensure that further reductions in such funding will not occur.

I have an official document duly signed by 26 citizens of Canada. It is accompanied by a scroll I was presented with yesterday which is signed by several thousand citizens of Canada.

On the wall of the National Arts Centre is the continuation of this scroll in the form of the map of Canada. It contains more than a quarter million signatures. I appreciate the opportunity to make this presentation.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by 14,222 Canadians asking that the Government of Canada and this House ban the importation into this country of the Serial Killer board game.

Madam Speaker, as you know, the Serial Killer board-game proposes to entertain people by simulating the killing of children. The pieces used in the game represent dead babies. The game is packaged in a body bag. It is sick in the extreme, and we certainly don't need that kind of product in this country.

Madam Speaker, with your permission, I would like to take this opportunity to thank one of my constituents who helped me circulate the petition: Léna Cléroux, who is in Ottawa today.

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition on behalf of my constituents from the Western Arctic on the issue of child poverty.

The poverty of Canadian children will yield ever increasing costs in the administration of health care, justice and social welfare and inhibits learning and preparation for employment constituting a cost for future national productivity.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by many hundreds of people from British Columbia who have noted that there is a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society.

The petitioners also express their concern about the fact that we are becoming a culture of violence and that violence has become an ordinary part of our children's lives.

The petitioners note that part of this culture of violence is the Serial Killer board game, a game which comes with a bag of 25 babies. The point of this game is to murder as many defenceless children and adults as possible.

The petitioners request that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the Serial Killer board game and the Mass Murderer trading cards can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by members of my community in Ottawa Centre. As you know, the latest federal budget cut funding commitments for social housing in 1992 by 34 per cent, which eliminates the strong federal presence in the housing sector that guaranteed the equal access to decent and affordable housing to which Canadians are entitled.

My constituents and I ask Parliament to urge the government to restore its commitment to social housing and reinstate all programs in this sector.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have two different petitions today. The first petition can be added to those presented by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asking that the laws of Canada be amended to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards and the Serial Killer board game.

JUSTICE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society.

The petitioners ask that Parliament amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 444 and 445.

[Text]

Question No. 444—Mr. Mifflin:

Has the Department of National Defence completed or planned any studies concerning the effectiveness of our current submarine operations?

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): No study has been completed recently or is planned concerning the effectiveness of our current submarine operations.

Question No. 445—Mr. Mifflin:

Will the Department of National Defence make public the expected concept of operations as well as the statement of requirement details of the corvette as envisaged by the defence policy paper of April 22, 1992?

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The corvette project has been formally designated in the department as the Canadian Surveillance and Sovereignty Enforcement Vessel (CASSEV). The concept of operations and statement of requirement are currently under development. A statement of capability deficiency has received corporate management approval. This document is classified confidential.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Langlois: I suggest, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Bellemare: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When members present questions in writing, Standing Order 39(1) says that these questions can be placed on the Order Paper and addressed to various ministers. The questioner can also ask that a reply be given within 45 days.

This did not happen for two questions that I asked and I must tell you with regret that these two questions, Nos. 203 and 204, were raised on December 11, 1991 but were not answered for over 14 months. Yes, the answer took 14 months. In one case, I had asked that all departments involved in the question reply. The Department of Supply and Services, the Department of Justice and Statistics Canada have not yet responded.

As members of Parliament, we ask questions to be better informed and to be able to participate better on committees. The other day I sat on the public accounts committee and the subject was just those two questions. Strangely enough I had received the answer the day before.

If we have rules but they are not followed in this House, that is surely anarchy. For me in this case, anarchy means that I as a member of Parliament was not able to prepare carefully and in time for my committee meeting the other day. Furthermore, it is an insult to members not to receive an answer to a question that was raised very politely and within the rules.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I would just add that the member's representations have been received today and that in the coming days, we will see to it that his questions are answered more quickly.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Another member wishes to raise a point of order but I would ask him to wait a moment.

I understand the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester very well. I think that 14 months is far too long to wait when one is entitled to receive the answer and especially considering that the answer should have come in 45 days.

Unfortunately, the Chair can take no concrete action at this time. Nevertheless, I will tell the hon. parliamentary secretary that the Chair instructs him to convey to the various ministers and departments that this way of proceeding is totally unacceptable. I might suggest to the hon. member that he discuss this matter in the House management committee. Perhaps the Standing Orders should be changed if the rule cannot be followed.

However, I do think that this unacceptable situation must definitely be changed.

So I go back to where I was. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT CROSSING ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING OF BILL C-110

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

An agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the second reading stage.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform you that I wish to share my time today with the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. I will take the first 10 minutes and my colleague will conclude.

The bill before us today, Bill C-76, includes changes to the Canada Student Loans Program, a program that I have spent a considerable amount of time on during my years as an organizer within the national student movement and during my period of time as a member of Parliament.

There are a number of things I wish to say in the short period of time I have to speak. However, I would first like to put on the record some comments about the New Democratic Party's job creation paper that was released yesterday in Ottawa. It is a plan that will increase the number of jobs created in Canada over the next five years to 1.6 million, reduce the unemployment rate to 7.1 per cent, lower the deficit and bring down inflation, and it would achieve all of this without increasing taxes for low and middle income Canadians. Eighty per cent of Canadians would achieve these benefits without an increase in taxes.

I am proud of the accomplishment of my party and I will do all I can to promote this serious plan to the Canadian people. If we really want to address the employment problem in Canada we have to address education. Therefore we need a strong, adequate and fair Canada Student Loans Program to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of income, have access to education and training.

I would like to briefly quote from the NDP's job creation plan, from page 23 of the 60-page comprehensive, well-designed report. It says: "The skills and knowledge of the work force are critical to developing our economy, no less important than our country's physical and social infrastructure, investment strategies and research and development performance. By doing a better job at training and human development we will make our economy more competitive, improve employment and economic security for average Canadians and build social justice by helping reduce disparities in income and employment".

On page 24 it says: "Provincial and territorial governments have a critical responsibility to ensure that schools can do the best possible job at teaching basic skills and at preparing students for advanced education and the work force. Strategies must be developed to dramatically reduce the drop-out rate. Many of our schools' problems are linked to poverty. A full employment economic strategy is one of the best ways the federal government can contribute to Canada's school system".

The hon. member opposite asks what that has to do with the bill in front of us. Very clearly it has a tremendous amount to do with the bill in front of us. A full employment strategy also ensures that students have an opportunity to secure jobs upon graduation, something they have no hope of doing now. The unemployment rate for youth in this country is abhorrent and something must be done about it.

• (1220)

I am deeply concerned about the lack of opportunity facing young people. I am even more concerned about the lack of interest this government has shown in their plight. There are few jobs, and with this one piece of legislation there is an additional financial penalty attached to being a young graduate and unemployed.

As a nation we have a much greater responsibility to Canada's young people. These young people must expect much better from this government. I am asking all members of the House to review the bill carefully, defeat Bill C-76 and get on with real financial reform in education.

The Canada Student Loans Program is a very important program. We know that from the statistics. It is well used but it could be much better used under better circumstances. Those who have problems with the bill certainly should have them addressed.

I quote from the latest annual report for the loan year 1989-90: "From the inception of the program in 1964 to July 31, 1990 approximately 1.9 million full-time students negotiated loans of $6.3 billion under the Canada Student Loans Programs".

Very impressive and obviously very important to the young people of Canada. We should know and be aware that 23 per cent of full-time university students in Canada who enrolled in degree programs received Canada student loans. We have to address the problems inherent in this system.

The most contentious aspect of Bill C-76 in my mind is the Canada Student Loans Program part of it. There are three aspects to it: minor housekeeping regarding forms, the repeal of the six-month, interest-free subsidy students enjoy when they graduate and changes to the cost sharing formula with provinces that have opted out, i.e. Quebec and the Northwest Territories, both of which I understand have not objected greatly to those provisions.

When fully implemented the repeal of the six-month subsidy will cost students between $30 million and $35 million a year. This is money that is being taken directly from young people who have recently graduated and have yet to find their first job.

This is a time when graduates face enormous unemployment, particularly those who are under 25 years of age. Earlier I referred briefly to the 16 per cent to 20 per cent unemployment rate for this group of people.

Even though students will not actually have to make payments until six months after graduation, the tab will be running on the full principal for an extra six months, a move that is sure to increase the number of defaults on loans. The level of default is already a serious problem with $150 million in defaults annually. Increasing the cost of student assistance will only increase defaults if fewer needy students apply which defeats the point of the Canada Student Loans Program to begin with.

Earlier this month we received petitions in the House with the names of more than 3,000 Saskatchewan students demanding the retention of the six-month study. Who are we best to listen to in this case? The government opposite that says this is necessary or the students themselves who have come and said: "We need to retain this six-month interest relief"?

The petitions signed by these students also call for the repeal of the 3 per cent tax that has been applied to them and the proposed elements of the lending for learning agenda that the government has imposed. In particular they called upon Parliament to re-evaluate and amend the Canada Student Loans Program to enhance accessibility, to guarantee 100 per cent of student loans and to improve accessibility to student loans for part-time students.

These matters are all very important to students. We owe it to them to consider them very carefully. When they have taken the time to review these matters in their own experience we should listen to them.

When Bill C–76 came to committee government members opposite refused to hear the testimony from students and insisted upon going directly to clause–by–clause study. One member exemplified the Tory contempt for students when he cited a case where a student used her $3,000 loan to buy clothes. Both he and one of the members who is in the Chamber today urged even tougher measures to collect student debt.

The opposition at that meeting walked out and the Conservatives went through clause by clause in less than five minutes and did not listen to or pay any attention to the matters raised with them by students.

In terms of collection, I have cases in my constituency right now where Revenue Canada is insisting on collecting what it says are defaulted student loans from 20 years ago. The students in these cases are now adults and are insisting they have repaid their loans. The banks have destroyed the records of all those payments and Revenue Canada and the Secretary of State are insisting that these loans are outstanding.

The government has to do something about dealing with these particular matters. We have to change the Canada Student Loans Program. I accept that. I acknowledge it. I insist upon it. We have to change the Canada Student Loans Program. A number of reforms must be made. This bill does not do it. We have to scrap Bill C–76 and get on with bringing in a real bill that will deal with the Canada Student Loans Program.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the member referred to the New Democratic Party economic program. He will know that program calls for a minimum corporate tax of 14 per cent. He will also know, if he knows anything about things at all, that corporate profits this year are at the lowest level in Canadian history, lower than in the 1930s, and that over 50 per cent of Canadian corporations are in a loss position.

I was wondering how many jobs the member would think would be lost if we decided to impose upon losing corporations, corporations making no profits whatsoever, a further 14 per cent tax. I suspect that the unemployment rolls would zoom beyond all comprehension. I was wondering if he would comment.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I am more than happy to comment on the question raised by the hon. member for Mississauga South. I am aware he was part of the committee studying the student loans bill that managed to go through clause by clause in five minutes and did not even hear what many of the students had to say.

The member will be aware that in the United States a minimum tax on corporations already exists. It is something we have talked about extensively in Canada for quite some time. In fact at one point his government was looking at a proposal for a minimum tax on corporations to ensure that they pay their fair share.

Despite some of the numbers the hon. member has put before us, I find extraordinary that recently the Canadian Manufacturers' Association reported that it is having one of its best years ever. Yet it is employing fewer people and is projecting further job losses to the end of 1993.

We are seeing a situation in which the corporations are benefiting at the expense of the work force in this country, primarily driven by the forces of the free trade agreement in the United States and the North American free trade agreement in Mexico.

As corporations prepare to deal with a world economy which is run on a race to the bottom philosophy, they have forgotten that in Canada we have an economy that can be built upon a basis that relates to high wage, high skilled jobs. Those are the sorts of things we in Canada have to work toward.

I am proud of the work that has been done by the New Democratic Party, my colleagues, myself included, on developing this job strategy for Canada. I hope the government will not put on its blinders, continue to call names and fantasize about what this program is all about. Read it and study it, just as the Canadian people will because they are going to have to put up with it after the next election.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member in making his suggestion for changes to the Canada Student Loans Program is aware of what the premier of Ontario has done to the Canada Student Loans Program in that province. I wonder if he favours the reform that the premier has instituted where he cut all the grant portion of the program so that students now have to repay all the money instead of receive part of the funding in grants. Is that part of the reform he would like to see on a national basis to the Canada Student Loans Program?

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, in one of my jobs prior to being a member of the New Democratic Party caucus and elected by the people of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency, I worked for the national student organization in this country for four years. It fought very hard to establish ways in which students could have access to Parliament and the Canada Student Loans Program in order to talk about grants instead of loans as part of a national program.

We argued through the early 1970s that provinces did not have the capacity to fund these matters on their own. I would say that given the current circumstances where the free trade agreement is devastating the economy of Ontario the provinces have an extremely low capacity to be able to finance and fund programs like this one. There is a national responsibility for the Canada Student Loans Program and to education and training, and we have to accept that.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I too want to deal mainly with the student loans part of Bill C–76.

Many campuses have set up food banks for starving students. Included in those universities that have had to do so is the University of Toronto, Simon Fraser, the University of Manitoba, the University of Alberta and Dalhousie University. I would think that is a pretty good indication of the dire straits in which students are finding themselves as they try to get education at many of the universities and colleges in Canada.

Students ask for loans because they are unlikely to be able to afford to get post–secondary education unless they can find some outside financing. Gone are the days when the summer job would finance a major part of the school year. Students do not take loans in order to get extra spending money. Most students do everything possible to graduate with as small a debt as possible. They do not look forward to starting a career with a $30,000 or $50,000 debt at a time when their wages are as low as they will ever be in their career.

Under the circumstances the changes to the Canada Students Loans Act appear incredible. This bill increases the qualifying definition of a full course load from 60 per cent to 80 per cent. This measure will hurt the working student the most and the working student is the person who needs the assistance the most.

Many students can only attend post–secondary institutions if they can work part time to keep themselves and their families in many cases housed, clothed and fed. Working and attending classes become almost impossible if one has to take a full program or at least 80 per cent of a full course load.

If students in this situation are having to both borrow and work to fund their education the government by this bill is indicating: "If you can't work you don't deserve to go to school. If you can't work you can't have a loan". The result in many cases is the exit from the educational process of one potential student who would be a well skilled, well educated worker in the future.

As I said earlier, most students try to enter their profession with as low a debt as possible.

One of the things that has made the debt less odious is the fact that at least it did not start collecting interest until you had time to be settled in a career.

When this bill is passed, the interest charges will start immediately upon the student graduating, giving no chance for the student to get settled in a career. This means an even higher debt when the individual does start to pay. These days the chances of getting a job immediately are slim. Government policies are sending our industries south. This has made jobs all the more scarce.

Speaking personally, after graduating, both of my sons spent two years before getting jobs in which they actually used their degrees. My daughter who graduated as a chef was luckier but then she could not get a student loan anyway for that particular course.

There is a move to pull away from the guarantee of student loans by the government, making the banks take the risk rather than the government continuing with its present guarantee. How will the banks handle this kind of situation? They will probably handle it exactly the same way as they handle increased risks in other areas, by raising interest rates or working on a floating rate.

This makes it that much more difficult for the students first to get the loan and second to pay it off when they are required to do so. Again, this increases the costs to the students and is a further incentive not to get into debt and consequently not go to school at all.

More than 7,000, and I noticed that my colleague said 3,000, post-secondary students in Saskatchewan have signed a petition urging the federal government to drop the student loans part of this bill. The government has made much to do in the last while about the value of training and the need to keep the standards and the educational levels of workers high.

Every one of the changes to the student loans part of Bill C-76 will have the effect of reducing the number of students who will be able to take advantage of post-secondary education.

Tracy Sletto, external vice-president of the University of Saskatchewan, has mentioned another problem not directly connected with this bill but still a problem, one that needs to be dealt with. Tracy Sletto has suggested that the differences in costs of education are not recognized by the student loan operation.

A third year dentistry student pays $9,660 for tuition and instruments while a third year arts student pays $2,200. Both students are allowed to borrow the same amount under the student loans program.

The students want assessments of needs of living expenses separated from the educational costs such as tuition, books and instruments. If this goes on, and Ms. Sletto goes on to point this out, eventually only students from wealthy families will be able to afford the more expensive professional colleges such as medicine and dentistry.

If students pay more, they should be able to borrow more. The financial barriers mean that some are turned away from particular colleges.

The changes in this bill are a step backward. It has been our pride in Canada to say that if anyone wanted and qualified for post-secondary education they would have an opportunity to get it. This bill moves us closer to the old days when only rich parents' children and the few lucky scholarship winners could aspire to post-secondary education. That was not so long ago.

The government, this party, should change that. It should take a more progressive approach to attempting to get more people into the education program. Possibly it should change its name from the Progressive Conservative Party to the Regressive Conservative Party.

• (1240)

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I think it is ridiculous that we are having this debate today. This debate was really part of the budget of the Minister of Finance about a year ago when the minister laid out all the provisions of this bill. The bill is really an implementation of that budget and should have gone through a voice vote last fall. The opposition in its usual fashion has held up this bill as it has held up every other bill that was presented.

Let me give a list of the bills on which this opposition has had to take the government to closure. Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan, putting a ceiling on the growth of federal contributions. Bill C-60, the federal fiscal arrangements act by streamlining the operations of government. The Budget Implementation Act of February 1991; the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act; Bill C-56, the Spending Control Act; Bill C-63, the Dissolutions Act; Bill C-69, the Government Expenditure Restraint 1990 Act; Bill C-93, the Budget Implementation Act that is now before committee. We were forced into time allocation on that bill last week.

On the privatization of Crown corporations, Bill C-8, the Crown corporations restructuring act; Bill C-13, the Nordion Divestiture Act; Bill C-38, the Telesat Divestiture Act. Both are acts to try to get the government out of business and put money into the till by restraining the salaries of public officials. Bill C-26, the Public Service Employment Act; Bill C-55, the pension benefits act; Bill C-76, this act. We are on closure on this act on third reading.

We had to close second reading, we had to close report stage and now we are having to close third reading. It gets crazy. Of course we have Bill C-113 that is likely to receive closure as well. It is closure, closure, closure and that is from both sides of the opposition who say that we have to restrain spending, get at the deficit and make government more efficient. That is what we are doing.

Every time we bring forward a measure to try to get some efficiencies into the thing, to try to cut down the cost of government, to try to run things more effectively, this group claims across the countryside that they think the deficit is important. They think the debt is important. They want to increase it. They do not want to cut anything or change anything. Just leave it all the same. Yet day after day in Question Period they ask: "Why do you not spend money on this or more money on the other thing".

This a group of phoneys. They say they have a program and it is only one program of spend, spend, spend, borrow, borrow, borrow and I suppose, print, print, print. We will be like Argentina before we know it.

Let us deal with this bill for a moment. I was involved with this bill at committee. We heard from the government officials with respect to the bill. They went over what they hoped to save the taxpayer on the bill. It is not a lot of money, but there is some, as mentioned on the student loan part, getting students to pick up the interest. They do not have to pay right away but they have to pick up the interest from when they leave school. They no longer get a six month free ride. They have to pay interest on their borrowings. They do not make payments for six months but they have to pay the interest. There are some costs there and that is quite an important saving to the government. We cannot carry on with programs that are free lunches and hope to cut back the cost of government.

The bill also deals with certain fees. We have the lobbyist bill before the committee now. This bill imposes a fee that is to be set by regulation on those who are professional lobbyists.

The cost of running a lobby program is about $450,000 a year. It is only realistic that the people involved in professional lobbying ought to pay the costs of supervising the lobbying program. We expect the banks to pay the cost of supervising the banks. We expect the trade unions to pay costs when they want to be supervised. You expect airlines to pay costs for landing fees and so on. These are costs that have to be borne and there is no reason why those who are in the business of earning a living by lobbying government as professionals ought not to pay for the regulation of their services.

This is another part of this bill. It cuts down the cost to government. We also of course cut down the cost to government in this bill by reducing the salaries of the Prime Minister and the ministers of the Crown. Now that is not a lot of money, but it is $80,000 or $90,000 a year and that is important when we look at the financial conditions of this country.

Let me deal with the student loan portion for a moment. The suggestion is that the students were prevented from making any representation. That is not so. However, I want to say to you, Madam Speaker, that no student organization produced one brief, made one suggestion or produced one idea as to what changes within the fiscal constraints of the government, within the terms of the budget of the government passed by this House, could be made to this bill so that we could perhaps alter the bill in committee and come back to the House with something that they would like better. Not one brief, not one suggestion and nothing in writing other than a couple of letters that said: "We would like to appear". Why would you like to appear? Set out what you would like to appear for, you have had a year. The budget has been before us for a year.

There was not one bit of paper, not one set of ideas, not one explanation, nothing. Therefore we decided in committee that since there was nothing before us, we had other things to do and we had to pass the bill, so we passed the bill.

The opposition did not like that motion and so they walked out. The opposition walked out of committee. They did not come and make proposals in committee to amend the bill. Not on your life. They did not file a single amendment in committee as to how to amend the bill. They brought forth no suggestions and so we went ahead and passed the bill. We could see nothing wrong with the bill. It did not take us long to pass it and we passed it. Of course we passed it, that was our job, that is why we were on the committee and that is what we were doing. We were looking at the legislation going through it point by point and we did. We went through it point by point and we passed the bill.

We did not pass one section of the bill. One section of that bill dealt with the Small Businesses Loans Act. We did not pass that section. Another bill was before the House dealing with the Small Businesses Loans Act so we did not pass one section of the bill. We just refused to pass it. Therefore, that section of the bill is no longer in the bill that is before this House.

This whole matter of saying we foreclosed them out of committee, we somehow damaged their rights to appear, we somehow refused to hear the case is specious. It is not worthy of anything. To stand in this House and suggest that somehow they were abused, that somehow they were hurt is just not so. The Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party did not stay around for the clause by clause study, they walked out. They thought: "Well, we will walk out. We are on strike. We are not going to represent Canada any longer. We are not going to stay in committee. We are going to walk out".

They then come to this House and say: "They walked out. They did not have a chance". They had the opportunity to stay there, they had the opportunity to make amendments, they had the opportunity to make suggested amendments but they did not do it, they walked out. Of course that is what they do. They walk out.

• (1250)

An hon. member: They walked out today.

Mr. Blenkarn: I am not supposed to comment that way but they certainly walked out. Let us go on with some of the problems we have to face as a government.

This year the provinces, the provincial power corporations and the federal government will go to the markets of the world to borrow $60 billion. After this year is over the cumulative debt of the power corporations, the provinces and the federal government will be well over $650 billion. Right now the amount of money owing by the provinces, the power corporations and the federal government to foreigners and Canadian corporations to foreigners exceeds $300 billion.

We are probably the greatest indebted country in the world and certainly per capita we are. The question is: does Italy owe more than we? Certainly not to the outside world it does not. We are terribly in debt. We are so terribly in debt that it has been expressed by many, including the C.D. Howe Institute last week, that we are in danger of not being able to borrow more money at all.

Last September all of a sudden we could not sell our treasury bills and interest rates had to rise. They rose by a good full 2 percentage points, nearly 3 percentage points. Our treasury bills at that point had been selling for 5.5 per cent and all of a sudden they were selling for 8.5 per cent.

We blamed that on the referendum. We said that because of the dislocation of the referendum the markets had decided to forget about Canada. They would not trust us. The referendum probably had something to do with it but probably not everything because in November when the referendum was all over—there was no referendum debate in November—the same thing happened all over again. Only this time it went to 9 per cent.

Now we have been able to chisel rates back down again bit by bit but it is fragile. It is very fragile. Our financial conditions are not good. We have borrowed far more money than we can afford to pay back. We have to get our House in order and we cannot tax more. We cannot, like the New Democratic Party would have us do, put taxes on corporations that make no money. Otherwise they would go out of business. The fact is profits are far too low.

Our friend from Windsor was making a comment about Mr. Frank's statement before the finance committee concerning the Conference Board. Several people came before that committee. Most of the time the member from the New Democratic Party did not want to be there because he did not want to listen to this stuff—and he was not there and nobody represented the New Democratic Party. They did not want to listen.

The fact is we are in danger of having our credit cards pulled completely and so here we are. We cannot carry on with any more borrowing and we cannot carry on with any more taxing.

There is no point in trying to raise the taxes on the wealthy. They will leave the country like they have already done in many cases, taking their investment income through tax havens. It is not hard to do. It does not take a genius to figure out how to avoid Canadian income tax if you have lots of money. Those are the kinds of people they want to tax right out of the country. Instead of bringing them into the country and keeping them here where they will invest, they want to throw them out. That is supposed to create jobs. Yes it will create jobs for tax planners, airlines and movers. One-shot jobs and that will be it.

They talk the game about reducing the debt. The fact is that we cannot continue to run deficits. We have to priorize our government activity and only do those government activities that we really can afford to do.

I am going to say this as a member from this side, that our side has not been nearly tough enough in cutting back on the cost of government, on cutting back on expenses or activities. Simply, the time has come when we can only spend what we take in in taxes. We do not have any more money left and we cannot borrow any more. We cannot get any more by the printing press. We cannot get any more by taxation. We have tapped the well dry.

Therefore, we have to start learning how to cut our cloth. What we ought to be doing in this House is not debating this bill, but debating the activities of government and what activities they think and we think on a priority basis the government could get out of.

Somewhere along the line we are going to have to cut back on the amount of government we have. Whether that means in the entertainment field, whether that means National Film Board, whether that means changing unemployment insurance very much more dramatically than we have, or whether it means in transfers for education or loans and so on, we are going to have to cut back because it is not there any more. The well has no more water in it. We cannot keep adding on to the deficit and adding to the debt and not paying it back.

I regret this debate because I think it is a foolish debate. It is a debate about spending more money. The government has come forward with a plan that cuts back in a very minor way some of the benefits that some people have had. The lobbyists are going to have to pay a fee. The Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers are going to have to take a cut. Students are going to have to bear the interest on their loans from the date they leave school, though they will not have to commence payment until six months later.

In other words, we are going to have to cut back a bit. They say no and we say it is about time we started looking at the problems. I want to say that this bill is not nearly tough enough considering our financial condition. To stand and object to this bill as they have shows complete lack of understanding of the condition of Canada.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I would like to set the record straight if I may with two very quick comments. Then I would like to ask my hon. colleague a question.

On the remarks that my colleague made referring to the members of my party, the New Democratic Party, not wanting to listen to witnesses in committee, he should perhaps go back to the record. The NDP and others walked out of the committee because we felt that the committee itself was not really ready to listen and consult with students and people most affected.

It is important to know this information. Then you do not start giving motives to people in order to try and make them look bad. I would just counsel that to my colleague because people who are listening to us here in Parliament would appreciate us to at least state the fact that the opposition did walk out. But the opposition felt that it had been provoked primarily because the government side was not really prepared to listen to the people most impacted.

My hon. colleague used several words in talking about this being a foolish debate. I do not think it is a foolish debate. It is an important debate where we are going to be opposing Bill C-76 as a party. That is because we believe if we are going to change the rules in this particular legislation involving student loans then perhaps we should first force the government to do what it said it would do before accepting any of the changes to the law that it wants.

We would like the government to first, lift the 3 per cent tax on student loans and second, increase the weekly loan limits that were last raised in 1984 as a precondition—and I hope that my colleague hears me—to supporting the government's other initiatives.

Before we talk about raising taxes, before we talk about further burdening the Canadian taxpayer, can we not have an obvious sign from this government when it makes promises in committee that the reason it is going with this particular law is because it will enable it to reduce the 3 per cent or eliminate it and also increase the allowance? Can we do that first?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend from Chambly suggests they will go along with our bill if we take away the 3 per cent charge.

The 3 per cent charge is no darned different from the charge we make to CMHC on a CMHC loan when you get a government guarantee on a CMHC loan from your bank. We charge 2 per cent on the full amount of that loan. Here we are charging 3 per cent. It is a flat fee and is charged against the loan.

It is a realistic charge because it covers the cost of the government doing the insuring. It is a trade-off on the insurance. That is what it is. You do not have to borrow money on a student loan. You can go to the bank and borrow money if you want on your own.

This is a great deal. We give you a student loan. You do not pay interest during the time you are in school. Sure, 3 per cent is added to the amount of the loan to cover the loan insurance cost and then you start paying it back six months after you finish school. It is a pretty good deal.

The hon. member complains and says he wants the amount lifted from 1984. We would love to lift the amount. Again where does he think we will get the money from? Where do we get the money for these things? Who do we go after to get the money? Where do we get it? Do we pull it out of mid-air? Do we go behind this building and pick the trees—there are some beautiful money trees back there. That is the way they think. I only saw a big deep river valley back there. There are no money trees.

The suggestion that somewhere along the line we should just lift the 3 per cent levy, that we should increase the loan limits makes no sense.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, there seems to be a contradiction between what the hon. member is saying with reference to the 3 per cent administration fee and what the Minister of Finance said on February 25, 1992 when he delivered his comment in this House on the budget. The finance minister said: "In addition my colleague the Secretary of State will be negotiating a new arrangement for student loans with financial institutions. The expected saving will provide scope to improve the Canada Student Loans Program and to eliminate"—and I stress the word eliminate—"the 3 per cent administration fee on student loans".

Is the member in agreement with the Minister of Finance or do we have two views on this policy? Does he support the continuation of the 3 per cent fee on the loan or does he support what the Minister of Finance said and that is to remove it?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, it is very simple. If you negotiate a deal with the banks to take a portion of the loan risk then the government would waive the fee.

The trouble is the government wanted to get the banks to take 10 per cent of the loan risk. In other words, we would only insure to 90 per cent. The banks said: "Oh, no. We want 100 per cent coverage". You cannot have it both ways. We would like to be able to negotiate a deal with the banks to get them to carry these student loans risk free. We would guarantee 90 per cent but they would be stuck for 10 per cent of the loan and they will not do that.

There is a question of trying to get the matter running right. I understand where the member is coming from but we need two to make a bargain. We are using the regular banking system to put up the money because we do not have the money ourselves. We must have the bank supervising this loan arrangement. We would like to see the banks take a piece of the risk but the banks refuse to take a piece of the risk, probably because the students have not proven themselves to be very good commercial risks. It is a bad comment on a lot of our young people who go to universities and borrow money from this program, but the number of defaults has been literally amazing. That is an unhappy matter.

There we are. We have a fee to cover the risk and we have not been able to negotiate it out.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly. I listened to my hon. friend speaking about Canada's credit rating and I know he is a nationally recognized expert on markets and these things.

Therefore I ask: in the unlikely event that the money markets, money managers and so on came to believe that there was a serious possibility that there might be a Liberal government elected in this country, what impact would he anticipate on the Canadian dollar and on the markets generally?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, in the finance committee meetings of two weeks ago Mr. Neufeld from the Royal Bank indicated that one of his great concerns was statements that might be made by key political figures in this next year. He said that he felt the matter was so tenuous that a statement made by someone, either a leader of the government or a leader of the Liberal Party, or something of that nature, and he did not say necessarily a political person, might trigger a rejection of our debt.

That particular matter is quite serious. It has been suggested that perhaps statements by the Prime Minister during the referendum debate triggered part of September's problems but they did not trigger November's problems.

It does not take very much when someone is pushing the limit of his or her credit card to get somebody to say: "I am sorry, you have reached the limit you cannot borrow any more".

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to speak on Bill C–76, and particularly the amendment to the Canada Student Loans Act.

Unlike my colleague, who indicated a little earlier that the debate is somewhat foolish, I must suggest that this is one of the most important debates this House has seen in a long time, mainly because it focuses on education. If this House was to spend most of its time dealing with the questions of education and literacy in Canada we would not have to worry about the kind of difficulties the hon. member is referring to, whether we are dealing with the question of deficit or the question of debt.

I know and everyone in the whole world knows that if we were to focus on the question of education we would be able to help those who are educated to find jobs in a lot of ways. If they have jobs that will mean the generation of revenue and funds and the reduction of debts, and eventually it would mean the elimination of the deficit. It does not take a genius to make that direct correlation between job creation and education.

Everyone has said that, from social groups such as the National Anti–Poverty Organization to the Economic Council of Canada and the Conference Board. Everyone everywhere has said that in order for Canada to deal with this outstanding, incredible problem of debt and deficit we will have to focus on education and the elimination of illiteracy.

As it is the economic situation is in such a mess that it needs the attention of everyone, regardless of their political affiliation or partisanship, regardless of whether they are premier of a province, chairman of a bank or are the government at the federal level. However, we have seen a lack of co–operation, a lack of co–ordination and people shooting in different directions.

The debt and the deficit are everybody's problem. Between the provincial governments and the federal government we have borrowed from abroad, as the hon. member for Mississauga has indicated, hundreds of billions of dollars of foreign money, and that has put Canada in an extremely awkward position.

The main objective of any government is to provide services that are essential to society, essential to the community. As far as I am concerned, one of the main objectives of any government is to ensure that its people receive the education and the kind of tools they need in order to improve their lives and live in a comfortable setting.

To that extent I have always felt that the objective of our educational system should be to prepare our youth for a changing world in the field of humanities, in the field of technology and for an information–based future, as well as to enable them to become successful members of our society.

Frankly, while young people are the key to success in our society we are seeing a total failure on behalf of every level of government to address this whole question of education in order to help them to be full–fledged citizens of our country. I only have to outline the horrifying percentage of young people who do not finish their high school educations.

According to Statistics Canada more than 30 per cent of students who enrol in the primary and secondary educational system do not finish their high school education and therefore they end up in low paying jobs or on social assistance programs. For that matter, they even end up in jail by committing offences that are not tolerated by our society.

For those who continue on to university the statistics, which have been repeated over and over again, show that over 50 per cent of students who enrol at the university level do not finish university, whether they are part-time students, special students or full-time students.

Not only that, but the literacy level, which is reading and writing, is very alarming. In July 1992 Statistics Canada released an outstanding report indicating that 71 per cent of youth between the ages of 16 and 24 have literacy problems. As well, and even more shocking, 56 per cent of those between the ages of 16 and 24 have mathematical or numeracy skills problems when it comes to dealing with everyday requirements.

It certainly should be a cause for alarm to the government at the federal level and all governments at the provincial level that we have an outstanding problem that needs outstanding action, and they should take notice.

To use the argument that we just do not have the money, that we are running out of money, so we are not going to spend on education is foolish. We cannot just close the tap. We cannot look at money that we are spending on education as an expenditure. We must look at money spent on education as an investment. The only way to make money is to invest money.

What is better than investing money in the future of Canada, in the youth of Canada? It does not take a genius to understand the analyses done by Employment and Immigration, Statistics Canada and independent analysts all over the country. They are telling us that by the year 2000 we are going to have a situation in which unless people have a high school diploma there will be no hope of finding a well paying job.

Never mind that. They will not even find a job. It will be a lot more difficult by the year 2000 to find a job unless they have a high school diploma. That means that we must make it a priority of society that every single person, particularly our youth, who wants to go to school can be helped to enrol in schools.

The reason I say this is that we have it doubly difficult. We have a shrinking population. The Canadian population is on the decline. We are not on the upswing of things. By the year 2010 or 2020 a lot of people will be in the upper echelons of their life, age 55 and up, and fewer people will be between the ages of 16 and 24.

We are going to see more pressure being put on those who are in the work force to produce the kind of resources and assistance that is needed to support our social programs and those who are no longer in the work force.

We know, as Statistics Canada has indicated, that by the year 2000 we will only have 1.1 million youths between the ages of 16 to 19. That puts a lot of pressure on us as a government and as a society to do everything we can to ensure that those 1.1 million students receive the kind of education they need to be prepared by the year 2000 and beyond to support all the great social programs that we have in place.

Not only that, but the pressure is on these very same students, the same youths, to pay the debt that we have incurred in the past and which is still being incurred by federal, provincial and, to a large extent, municipal governments. The pressure is on those students, and we have to do everything we can to help them out.

That is why my party and my colleagues in the Liberal Party have been pushing over the past four years to ensure that the focus of the policy and everything this government does is on youth, the economy, job creation and everything that is needed to help our youth, students and workers to continue paying for all those wonderful services we are providing.

We can no longer do the same things we did in the past. We must do things differently because we are entering into North American free trade and we just had the free trade agreement with the United States.

We have learned from the past that unless we adapt quickly to the changes in technology and to the new era of information-based equipment and technology we cannot compete. Never mind what our neighbours in Mexico, the United States or Asia are doing. We cannot compete anywhere unless we make that drastic move, and unless we make education a priority.

That is why on a number of occasions we have called on the government to embark on some sort of tangible strategic national plan concerning the questions of education and literacy.

So far we have seen nothing but report after report. The government has put on the table a number of reports but we have yet to see an action plan that takes those reports and turns them into something that can benefit the community, particularly its youth.

My party has made some tangible suggestions. The hon. member from Mississauga was asking, what do we do? We have made some suggestions, such as establishing a national apprenticeship program. I think that would work beautifully.

If members asked the community, educational institutions, university professors, the business community and those who are out there they would hear agreement. This is the best and most effective way to ensure proper results for our youth. It is one of the best ways to help our students and our youth in order to carry on and move toward the future.

We called on the government to stop the consultation process, to introduce some sort of action plan. We will continue to call on the government to stop the cuts to transfer payments when it comes to those who are the providers of education to our students.

We called on the government to stop its attacks on the educational institutions and what did we get? From 1986 until now we have seen in excess of about $4.9 billion in cuts in transfer payments to the provinces in areas such as post-secondary education. That by itself is a tremendous burden on the provincial governments and it is a tremendous burden on the universities.

What we have seen in the past is a total and major assault on youth, whether we are talking about the government taxing books and reading materials or whether we are talking about the latest attack on the UI bill and what it is doing to our youth and our workers.

Those are some of the points I would like to bring to the attention of the House and my colleague on the government side who spoke a little earlier on.

We are opposed to this bill for a lot of reasons. One of the reasons is that the Minister of Finance had promised on February 25, 1992 he would remove the 3 per cent fees. I indicated this earlier in a question to the member for Mississauga.

The government indicated it will be removing the 3 per cent fees and the charge on the borrowing for student loans. What does the government do? It is February 19, almost one year later, and no action has been taken. We have not seen any movement on the part of the government in order to remove the 3 per cent tax. It was promised. The government should deliver the goods.

The second problem we have with this bill is the government is planning to eliminate the six-month interest free period. That will come into effect on August 1, 1993. If the government is willing to guarantee a job for every student who graduates from university immediately after graduation I would presume nobody would have any difficulty paying his or her loan.

Every one of my colleagues in this House and outside who have borrowed while he or she was going to school ended up paying back the loan if he or she had a job. But to turn around and to say to the student population whether you are working or not, you have to start paying the interest on your loan, I would suggest is highly unfair. Those are two of the reasons why we are opposed to this bill.

We are also opposed to the fact that the government did not address the questions it must address when it comes to the question of education in Canada and the question of youth.

My colleagues in the New Democratic Party had the audacity to stand up in this House and talk about the interests of students and youths when we have an NDP Government of Ontario that won on the premise it was going to reduce, never mind eliminate, tuition fees. That was a part of its policy. What a shameful stand the NDP has taken over the past few years.

The first thing the NDP did was attack the student population with an increase in tuition fees the first year. Then in the second year, a second whammy, a second increase in tuition fees. It came up with a third whammy, and that is to remove assistance for those students who badly need it.

I know there are some honourable colleagues in the New Democratic Party who will stand up in this House and publicly deplore the actions of the Ontario New Democratic Party when it comes to our student population. I know some of my colleagues who would not support that, but some members of the NDP have to say it on the record otherwise the population of Canada, in particular the population of Ontario, will not and will never forget that.

This is one problem. Another problem is attitude. I do not know whether the Ontario government is learning from the federal government or vice versa. There seems to be a partnership between both provincial and federal governments in their attack on the youth of Canada, on the youth of this province and on the youth of this community.

I can only say that in my region, in my city and my community in excess of 25 per cent of youth are living below the poverty line. We do not have to go very far. We only have to cross Wellington Street where we see those four or five tents. On a regular basis there are homeless youth sleeping in those tents, youth who want to see a better life for themselves, youth who have found themselves without any help and without any support from anywhere, whether it is from the NDP provincial government or the federal government.

Those are the kinds of people when we have to make our priority. Only the youth are going to be able to move us forward as a society and make sure that we can deal with the questions we have been unable to deal with in the past. They are the best investment this country has, the best insurance for the future.

That is why my colleagues and I are adamantly opposed to Bill C–76. Simply put, we consider Bill C–76 an attack on our youth.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear my hon. colleague's remarks wherein he called our party, the New Democratic Party, audacious. I think we are audacious. I think we have a great deal of audacity, particularly when I look at the strategy for a full employment economy that was released yesterday by my leader. I really believe it is an audacious program and I am proud of having this audacity as being a member of the New Democratic Party.

I can hear the prattling of my fellow colleagues on the Liberal side who do not like to really hear some of the examples of NDP audacity, but let me simply tell you what lack of audacity means. It means not having any program at all. It means not having alternatives. It means to me not managing properly.

Every time the Liberals mention Ontario they fail to mention the fact—and I would not call that audacity, I would call it lack of audacity—that when the NDP was elected in Ontario—I hope it does not make the Liberals unhappy to learn that it was an election. We were not just appointed. However, we opened up the Treasury and we looked in and found that the David Peterson government had left us with a huge debt.

An hon. member: How much?

Mr. Edmonston: Approximately $300 million at the time. That was the debt. Eighty per cent of the total deficit was a Liberal heritage. It was a legacy that we were given.

Sometimes when I hear the Conservatives on the other side saying: "Look, go easy with us a little bit because we inherited all this debt", at least I know how they feel because we in Ontario had the same experience as the poor Conservatives over there. They inherited Liberal debt.

I think audacity means courage and I believe our party has courage and that is why our party is presenting alternatives. I would ask the Liberals: Where are your alternatives for children? Where are your alternatives for students? What do you have to replace the system we have right now?

• (1330)

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleague heard exactly what I said. I said that some of my colleagues have the audacity. When I say some, it does not mean all. There is a big difference between some and all.

The hon. member went on to talk about this famous plan of the NDP to deal with the question of the economy. I did not see anything in it for our youth. I did not see anything in it that will revitalize the economy per se. I did not see anything that really addresses this whole question. More important, they talk about the debt in Ontario. Do you know that in a matter of two years, the NDP Government of Ontario has increased the deficit from $800 million to close to $11 billion; $10.7 billion or something.

Maybe my hon. colleague should learn a little about mathematics just to verify those numbers because those are accurate numbers. If you are to calculate that per capita, perhaps the province of Ontario has the highest deficit of any province in Canada.

It has put us in an extremely awkward position. In a matter of two years it has incurred more debt in the whole history of Ontario, from Confederation until now. It has flip-flopped on every issue from auto insurance—he should be very upset with that—to the education question and everything else. There is nothing the Government of Ontario has not flip-flopped on.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from Ottawa Centre and I was very interested to hear what he had to say about our youth and their future.

I am a father of five children and I have looked at the legacy that we are going to leave for our kids. I look at what our kids are going to inherit. Today we have well over 1.5 million unemployed. We have a deficit and a debt in this country compounded by what my children in the province of Ontario have to face from the government of Mr. Rae.

I am devastated that my children will probably have to work for ages and ages by the time we come out of this predicament that the Conservative government and the NDP Government of Ontario have put us into.

My question to my friend is the following: does he not agree that unless we get programs from this government here today, our children will have to bear the brunt of it? Our children will probably have to work like slaves to get us out of this mess that the Conservative government and the NDP government in Ontario have put us in. Our country has a double B rating.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of my colleague. I know how hard he works trying to raise the issues for his constituents before the House.

Just to add to what the hon. member was saying, as it is we have students right now who are waiting in front of food banks. I appreciate his comments very much.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I know time is running out and I will be quick.

There should be a new theme song in here; "Where the Liberal Party Goes, Debt Follows". I am flabbergasted to hear the comments of my friend from Scarborough West. It is incredible.

I want to come back to my question. My hon. friend spoke on education. I listened with great interest to what he had to say on that subject. His solution to the problem seems to be throwing money at it.

This was the approach that his party took when in government. He criticizes what he referred to as reductions of more than $4 billion in spending by this government and my hon. friend over here complaint about debt. I do not know which way they want it but when he talks about the school system and the outcome of the educational system he seems to suggest that the solution lies simply in throwing money at the problem.

I spent 17 years in education before I came to this place. I want to tell my hon. friend that people who are making attacks and challenges on the education system do not recognize the fact that we now have the impact of the Young Offenders Act, the impact of drugs, the impact of television and television violence, the impact of kids coming from split homes and the impact of kids being latchkey kids. Is my hon. friend suggesting, or does he think, or is it the policy of the Liberal Party that we should have a national office of education? Does he think we should initiate national standards of testing in education?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, we always called on the consultative process with all partners, with all those who are involved in the educational system in order to come up with an action plan that will truly deal with the question of education and the question of literacy.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about Bill C-76. The purpose of this omnibus bill is to implement certain measures announced in the budget tabled on February 25, 1992. I would like to deal more specifically with the measures that affect the Canada Student Loans Act.

Education lessens the likelihood of unemployment and increases one's chances of making a better living. Since 1984 the federal government has stressed that to make Canada more productive, more competitive and to enhance the quality of life of Canadians it is vitally important to have an educated, skilled and adaptable labour force.

The report Inventing Our Future: An Action Plan for Canada's Prosperity, published in October 1992 by an independent group of prominent Canadians, has confirmed the already solid consensus on the crucial role of education in becoming competitive internationally.

The government has announced its plan to update and reinforce the Canada Student Loans Program in order to continue to provide financial assistance to eligible students to pursue studies at the post-secondary level. By reducing the cost of defaults and improving the efficiency of the program it will be possible to increase assistance to needy students. In his February 1992 budget the Minister of Finance promised that the 3 per cent fee would be eliminated and limits on loans adjusted, subject to the successful completion of negotiations with financial institutions on new financing arrangements for the Canada Student Loans Program.

It should be emphasized that the program's basic objective is and will be to provide needy students with financial assistance to pursue studies at the post-secondary level. The government is intent on offering a loans program that provides subsidized loans to borrowers who are still pursuing their studies, and does so at reasonable cost and with reasonable conditions for repayment.

The negotiations are progressing. The Minister of Finance announced in his economic statement in December 1992 that the government intended to table a bill to authorize the new financial arrangements very shortly.

In addition to a new financial structure, various proposals have been prepared and communicated to the provinces. These proposals concern the program's mission, eligibility criteria and accountability with respect to spending under the program. More specifically, the proposals are a response to a host of concerns that have been raised over the years by the general public, the provinces, students and the Auditor General.

Generally speaking, these measures will do more than encourage access. They will also be more results-oriented by linking payment of assistance to successful completion of the individual's studies within the requisite time frame. Fair and uniform standards will be set to regulate implementation of the program across the country, simplify evaluation of requirements, maximize resources and increase the level of assistance offered to needy students.

It was explained previously that the amendments proposed in Bill C-76 would deal with three main issues: eliminating the six-month interest-free period after graduation, as of the 1993-94 loan year; updating the alternative payment formula designed to compensate provinces choosing to opt out of the program, including an extension of the deadline for giving notice of their intention to opt out; and allowing the minister to determine which forms will be used in the program.

I will deal with each issue separately. First of all, the bill proposes to eliminate the six-month interest-free period after graduation. At the present time, the government guarantees loans made to full-time students by lending institutions and subsidizes these loans by paying interest costs while the students are at school and for six months after graduation.

After completing their studies, students must enter into a consolidated repayment agreement with their lending institutions. Borrowers must repay the principal and the interest accrued starting on the first day of the seventh month following their graduation. Depending on the total sum borrowed, repayment may extend over a period of nine and a half years.

The interest subsidy on student loans represents more than 40 per cent of the program's cost. Every year the subsidy costs Canadian taxpayers about $200 million. This is a very costly measure and a direct and substantial investment in our human resources.

During the past two years there have been recommendations that the government should completely phase out interest subsidies, even in the case of borrowers who are still pursuing their studies. The government is not proposing any thing as drastic. We will continue to pay the interest accrued on loans while borrowers are at school. Full-time students will continue to benefit as long as they are enrolled in an educational institution.

Furthermore, they will still have up to six months after graduation to negotiate repayment terms with their lending institutions. For borrowers with an average debt of $6,100 upon graduation, monthly payments will increase by less than $3.50 if they decide to capitalize the interest accrued on their loans.

Less than 5 per cent of all recipients of student loans accumulate debts of more than $15,000. In fact, 85 per cent of borrowers owe less than $10,000 and 60 per cent less than $5,000. Those whose debt levels are higher are, for the most part, university students who consequently have a better chance of obtaining a full-time, well-paid job. All things considered, the financial obligations of most graduates would seem quite reasonable.

I may add that although after graduation they no longer receive an interest subsidy borrowers remain eligible for interest relief, if they are unemployed because they are unable to find a job or are ill or temporarily incapacitated. Under this interest relief program, borrowers who are unable to repay their Canada student loans because they are unemployed can ask the government, and I think this is very important, to pay the interest on their behalf for a period of up to 18 months.

Furthermore, the existing legislation is still sufficiently flexible to allow borrowers to negotiate or renegotiate with the lender the kind of repayment terms that reflect their ability to pay.

I would now like to say a few words about the proposed changes in the formula for compensatory payments to provinces that may decide to opt out of the Canada Student Loans Program.

I may add that Quebec and the Northwest Territories have already opted out of the program. They have chosen to set up their own student aid program with the money they receive under the compensatory payments formula. They will continue to receive these payments, which amounted to $87 million in 1991-92, or about 20 per cent of the cost of the program.

The present formula, which has been used since 1964, presents a real problem. It does not strictly take account of the fact that if a participating province withdraws from the program the federal government would continue to pay costs related to previously made Canadian student loans.

The proposed changes to the compensatory payments formula will ensure that the program has the financial resources to help needy Canadian students in the provinces and territories and at the same time compensate provinces that establish their own student aid program.

Furthermore, the proposed amendments would require any province that intended to withdraw from the program to notify the administration in writing at least 12 months before the beginning of the loan year in which it intended to withdraw.

The third and final amendment to the act would simplify program administration. It will give us more latitude to plan and adopt changes to the form and co-ordinate changes with lenders and the provinces.

Clearly, the purpose of the proposed amendments to Bill C-76 updating the Canada Student Loans Program is to make this program better serve present and future generations in the interest of the whole country. Now that I have explained to them what the amendments in question are about, I would ask hon. members to please pass this bill which I and all Canadians believe is most appropriate.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague's remarks. His comments were very well expressed and I find that his speech was well prepared. I would just like to ask him some questions because, even though his presentation is complete, he still raises some questions which he could answer to complete what he said.

Bill C-76 would eliminate the six-month period for students. The government is trying to save $35 to $40 million with this measure, but we must keep in mind that the student will still have to pay interest on the principal, I believe. I do not think that will change. So the interest continues to accrue but the student does not need to pay it for six months.

My question is this: from what I understood, the reason for stopping the subsidies in this way was mainly a trade-off. In exchange, the committee agreed to remove the 3 per cent tax on that amount. Did the hon. member understand the same thing, that it was a trade-off? Because the 3 per cent tax amounts to $35 to $40 million, I think. Can we take one load off students and put another one on them, or should they have to bear both together?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I did not sit on the committee that studied the bill. I did not take part in the discussions. I cannot say today whether I understand the bill in the same way as committee members understood it then.

• (1350)

What I can tell my hon. colleague is that we do want to ask all Canadians to participate. Now we say, as I just said, that if a student cannot afford it because he is out of work, sick, or disabled or for other reasons, he can negotiate with the government for an 18-month period to pay the interest that my hon. colleague just mentioned.

This does not mean that we want to make a public issue of the interest students owe and tell them: "Well, you are not studying anymore so we do not want to help you anymore". It simply means that we are asking everyone in this country to take part with us in finding solutions and ways to help the economy recover, to get young people back in the labour market, to cut down the number of school drop-outs as much as possible and to give the most encouragement to those who want to learn and advance academically and go back to their studies. Those are the kind of measures we are trying to establish, and I believe that the hon. member sees the purpose of this bill in the same way.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the member's thoughtful speech and especially his concern that Canada requires more money to be spent on education and on students so that there are better opportunities to get jobs and we can compete more effectively internationally.

It is understood by the member that this is an absolute requirement. He also suggested that all Canadians should be expected to assist in resolving the financial problems of Canada. Just a short time ago his colleague indicated that the NDP in its economic proposals was not making a sensible proposal by calling for a minimum tax for corporations. As the member will know, just a few years ago 100,000 corporations in this country earning profits of $27 billion paid no tax at all.

That is largely because there are concessions made to business. For example, the business entertainment expense deduction allows three martini lunches and even the services of prostitutes to be purchased by businesses for their clients at taxpayers' expense.

How does the member justify this kind of tax policy that on the one hand allows 100,000 corporations earning profits of $27 million to get away tax free? Why should they not be obliged to share this burden of Canada's financial problems? On the other hand, in Canada we are charging income tax on scholarships earned by bright students.

Why does the Conservative government believe that lottery winnings, millions of dollars in some cases of unearned windfalls, should go tax free and yet make it tougher on students to obtain student loans and impose more strict and stringent conditions on the repayment of those loans?

Is there not a bit of inconsistency in what the member is saying? He says we need these people to go through school. We need them to improve their education for the benefit of all Canadians. We seem to give tax concessions to businesses for luncheons and prostitutes and that kind of thing. Yet we are taxing scholarships and making it tougher to get student loans.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I think that ideally speaking, the member is right. Everybody should pay their fair share of income tax in this country.

Also, we have to give some incentives to industries to promote their companies to provide work for people. I think we should have policies that would give all Canadians the opportunity to work and to be able to compete not only in Canada, not only in the provinces, province by province, but also abroad, world-wide.

I think the policy of the Conservative government would probably be the best in the world to allow these companies to do business with others.

I do not want to penalize students, companies or anyone in Canada but we have to give them the chance to be competitive and allow them to compete.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there are so many issues I would like to deal with in the debate today but I fear the time constraints on me will be overbearing.

I want to start by talking about the fact that the government is using time allocation once again on this bill. Just to remind the House and the Canadian public of the Draconian approach this government takes to dealing with legislation in the House, closure has been used 15 times in Parliament since the November 1988 election.

An hon. member: We need an election.

Mr. Milliken: We need an election in the worst way. I agree with the hon. member.

The fourteenth time closure was used to change the Standing Orders so the government would not have to use closure very much again. The fifteenth time it was used on a motion because it cannot move time allocation on a motion; it has to be on a bill.

We have had time allocation galore since the rules were changed in 1991. I could list the number of times since the rules changed. Over half the time allocation motions have been moved since the rules were changed which made it easier, shorter and faster for the government to use time allocation instead of the old closure rule.

We have had time allocation now 20 times in Parliament which is an unbounded record. No one comes close. If we count the number of stages of a bill to which it has been applied—like in one motion today it was applied to two stages of this bill, both the report stage and the third reading stage, which is allowed under the rules—there have been 31 applications of time allocation. It is pernicious, and today we had notice of time allocation on another bill for Monday.

What we have here is an absolute scandal in terms of the government's unwillingness to listen to the representatives of the people in the House. Never before have we had a government so reluctant to engage in public discussion on the bills brought before this House.

These are not bills that are popular. These are not bills that are designed to curry favour with the public. These bills in many cases represent very unpopular measures any government that had a chance of getting re-elected would not introduce.

The government knows it is in trouble so it is soldiering on with a bunch of unpopular measures at which a government that believed in its chances of re-election would balk and look at in a more reasonable way.

I want to look at the record on this bill alone. The bill was debated at second reading in November. It was referred to committee on November 30, 1992. We heard some reference to the committee proceedings and the usual high-handed way the member for Mississauga South dealt with the bill in committee by refusing to allow students to appear and be heard, who after all are gravely affected by the legislation. Members were boasting on one hand about consultation, about how they consult with everybody, but on the other hand when the students came to make their protests known about the bill they could not be heard.

You do not consult. You do not listen. You just soldier on and put the jackboot to everybody. You put them to the students when you do not hear them in committee and then you put them to the members of the House by putting time allocation on the bill. That is what you have done.

The bill came back to the House for report stage debate for something like 42 minutes on February 12. We know why the Conservatives did that. They had to get the debate started so they could move time allocation which they did on February 15. They slapped time allocation on the bill, here we have time allocation, a total of four hours and 15 minutes on report stage and one day, a short day, on third reading.

I suggest that the government's approach to legislating is frankly a disgrace. It cuts back the time the House is available to sit and then it applies closure to cut off the debate.

Mr. McCreath: Debate the bill.

Mr. Milliken: I heard that member speak this morning and he hardly said a word about the bill. The Minister of Finance, on his introduction—

Mr. McCreath: Why didn't you listen to my speech?

Mr. Milliken: I did. I listened to his speech. It was the most ridiculous set of comments I had ever heard. I also listened to the Minister of Finance in his speech yesterday morning when he introduced this bill.

An hon. member: It was another bill.

Mr. Milliken: It was another bill, but his speech on that bill had nothing to do with the bill. He almost popped out of his skin. I want to quote him for a moment. He was excited because he had some new figures on trade. He had new export figures and he said how high they were and what a tremendous increase it was. He said it was an 11 per cent increase over 1991, the largest year-over-year increase since 1984. Of course 1991 was not a great year for the Canadian economy. Though an 11 per cent increase may sound very good and it is quite good it probably started from a pretty low base.

• (1400)

The hon. member for Mississauga South knows all these figures, yet his minister did not dare put the figures on the record yesterday in spite of repeated urgings by me that he do so. I sat here and challenged the minister repeatedly in the course of his remarks.

If somebody had come into this country from outer space after listening to the minister's speech he would have thought the Canadian economy was coming up roses. You never heard anything so rosy in your life. He cited all these figures about how his policies had worked, how inflation had been wrestled to the ground, how trade was booming and how everything was just coming out the way it was all planned by the government.

The minister did not mention the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work. He did not mention the hardship his government has put on Canadians. He criticized President Clinton because he said that he was making a huge tax grab omitting to mention the fact that this government had taken another $50 billion a year out of the Canadian economy with tax increases since it took office.

I ask the member for Mississauga South to correct me and tell me that it is at least $50 billion. Is it not $60 billion or $70 billion now? I am sure he does not know those figures. I know why he does not say them. He is ashamed of them. The government has taken all this money. For eight years it has gouged Canadians of all this money and the deficit is still at $30 billion. Talk about incompetent management. At least President Clinton promised to reduce the deficit somewhat. This government promised it but never did it. It took all the taxes but it never reduced the deficit. Talk about incompetent management.

I do not want to get waylaid on that. Unfortunately it is a side issue to the main point of this bill. However when we hear the Minister of Finance introduce a bill, ignore the provisions of the bill and talk about his handling of the economy in laudatory terms, we have to say that something is wrong with this minister. He ignores the human suffering that the policies he has forced on Canadians have brought across this country.

Unfortunately that suffering is what we want to talk about in this House. That is what we want to discuss on budget implementation measures. That is what we try to raise on these budget bills but the government does not want to listen. It wants to apply the jackboot and put closure on it. It does not want to listen to the people affected. It does not want to listen to elected representatives in this House. It just wants to have its way with the Canadian public.

I would like to quote very briefly from a speech given by Matthew Barrett, chairman and chief executive officer of the Bank of Montreal, at the annual meeting of the shareholders on January 18 of this year. The member for Mississauga South is probably a friend of Mr. Barrett. I do not know but I suspect he knows him well. I would imagine he had him appear before the finance committee when the member was chairman.

In any event, I thought a couple of quotes might be helpful to remind members of the mess we are in as a result of the government's policies. He said: "As a percentage of income Canada owes more to foreigners than any other major industrial country and, make no mistake, attracting and holding those funds means higher interest rates". Of course the Minister of Finance boasted about how low interest rates were in Canada because, as he said, they are lower than before. But they are not low in real terms. That is the real cost of borrowing to Canadians. Canadians are paying a lot of money. Even though interest rates have dropped we are paying a lot of money, a lot more than other countries are.

Mr. Barrett also said something about the level of debt owed by each Canadian. He said: "The public debt continues to grow and spread insidiously. In 1976 we owed almost $9,000 for every household in the land". By the end of 1992 it was $60,000 and over half of that $60,000 is attributable very directly to the eight years that Canadians have suffered under this government.

I cannot let the government go without turning to its friends in the NDP who have blasted around the last couple of days with this new five-year plan. They have abandoned those plans in Russia, I believe, but we have the NDP pushing them here. I would have thought it would have had the sense to abandon them too, but apparently not. These copies are hard to come by. It was just released yesterday, but when I called to get a copy this morning I could not get one. I want to thank the hon.

member for Chambly for his copy. I see it is charging for this plan. I can understand why. That is part of the deficit reduction plan for the New Democratic Party.

I took a look at the plan. I have seen the lavish pictures in it, I must say. I do not know who the photographer was but the photographer did very well. There is a great shot of the member for Yukon at the front and some pictures of people handing out dollars and change in the centre. I am impressed with that. That is just great.

I think it is important to look at the NDP five-year plan in some kind of perspective. I suspect it had this plan financed by the Tory Party. I can see every day the aim of the member for Yukon and the Prime Minister is to get together, as the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca did this morning when he stood and sent one of these soft lobs to the Prime Minister in Question Period: "What are you going to do about the Liberals?" The Prime Minister lines up at bat and hits and it looks as though it is a home run.

When you are the front-runner I guess you have to expect these kinds of hits but you would not expect that the New Democratic Party, which protests that it has all the virtue in the world and does not really want to be partisan most of the time, to line up with the partisan Prime Minister of Canada and throw him soft lobs so he can take a swat at the Leader of the Opposition. Yet that is what we are witnessing in this House every day. As the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca says: "There are politics going on here". I will acknowledge that he is correct on that score.

In any event I enjoyed looking at this document. I enjoyed even more reading the comments about it in some of the newspapers. I know the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca will want to hear these comments. Apparently his leader, whom he almost beat in the leadership convention, had a little trouble when she got before the reporters answering questions about the document.

Apparently it says that the NDP's policies are going to reduce the deficit by $8 billion and yet Informetrica, the Tory-hired independent study group, says that in fact it is going to be $11 billion. The NDP had not picked up the difference between the two. Perhaps the $3 billion was a slush fund to hand out to people like Bob Rae to help him out of the particular financial difficulties he has got the province of Ontario into. I do not know. It is not clear where that money is going but there seemed to be some kind of discrepancy there.

As it said in the newspaper account:

> Ms. McLaughlin and Mr. Langdon—

I guess he was there to help:

> —repeatedly insisted that the NDP plan would reduce the federal deficit by $8 billion. In fact, the independent analysis by Informetrica Ltd. showed that the deficit would be reduced by the correct figure of $11 billion. None of the NDP officials noticed the discrepancy until it was pointed out by a reporter.

I do not know, but it appears that the hon. member for Yukon is embarking on a tour to pump this plan out to the public and she is going to speak in Winnipeg, Ottawa, Kingston and Toronto. I hope I hear her when she is in Kingston.

I want to say also that I thought the comment at the end of this newspaper article was interesting. The vice-president of Informetrica said:

> "Conservatives should be happy with the consequence," Mr. Sonnen told reporters at the NDP news conference. "This will shift people's perceptions of the NDP".

Perhaps the hon. member for Mississauga South is going to join the NDP now. I wonder if he is one of the happy Conservatives as a result of this plan. I did not hear him speaking in laudatory terms about it, but perhaps if the two got together Canadians would realize what we have been saying along, which is that there really is no difference between the two parties.

Either way Canadians get ridden with debt whenever one of these parties takes office. To hear the NDP and the Conservatives, it is the same old plaint every day: "The only reason we are in debt is because of those awful Liberals". Yet the NDP in Ontario, when it took office, had something like a $3 billion deficit after it cooked the books to increase it and then it has run it up to $10 billion or $11 billion now. It says: "Oh, it is all the Liberals' fault".

The Tories took over with a $38 billion deficit in the first year and they had six months to run that up higher, which they did. They stretched and spent and it went up to $38 billion. It was not at that figure in September 1984 when they took over, but they managed to get it to $38 billion and that has sort of been their benchmark ever since.

Never mind that in the 1985 budget the Tories said by this year it would be down to $15 billion or so. Forget all that. It is not. It is double that. However, they went ahead their merry way and predicted that in another two or three years the deficit would be down, but it did not go down. Perhaps the member for Mississauga South could tell us why the projections that the finance ministers gave in their budgets all proved wrong.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why. I will let you in on part of the secret. The government did not control expenditures the way it said it would. It cut expenditures here and there but then it increased them everywhere else. That is what it did.

No Canadian is fooled by this. We can cite all kinds of examples of government waste and extravagant expenditure. We have mentioned before how the government could have saved millions of dollars if it had cut its advertising budget. We know how much this government spends on advertising.

I suspect the NDP in Ontario does the same kind of thing now. Certainly this beautiful book of the new five-year plan is an indication of the lengths to which that party will go to spend money to convince Canadians that it is really doing something when it really is not.

There is another thing I want to mention about this document. I heard my friend speak about this and thought he should be very careful because he said this was a plan for full employment. It says it is a full-employment economic strategy. It may be but the difficulty is, and I did not see the figures mentioned in the report, that from the press reports it appears that the leader of the New Democratic Party admitted that this would take the unemployment rate from 11 per cent to 7.1 per cent in five years.

I grant that is a good start, I acknowledge that. I am delighted the NDP takes that position, even though there may be some weaknesses in the arguments and there may be problems in getting there because of some of the other things in the report, and I could say more about that. It is a laudable aim but it is not full employment. I do not regard 7 per cent unemployment as full employment and I do not think anybody in this party does either.

The scheme needs to be reworded to say toward full employment, but unfortunately that is not what it says. I know that the members would not want to mislead the Canadian public by suggesting that if these schemes were implemented everything would come up roses, as the Minister of Finance says it is now.

We know it is not. We know the Minister of Finance is wrong. He has been wrong before and his colleague, the former Minister of Finance, was wrong every time. The jury is still out on the Minister of Finance. He claims that the measures he took in December are the reasons that everything is working out so well today. We know it is not.

The minister also says that the free trade agreement and the GST have done wonders for the Canadian economy while almost every economist in the country will acknowledge that is not the case. Indeed, there is a strong argument to be made that the economy is now recovering from the free trade agreement that the Conservative government put in place in 1989. It has taken that long. It has taken years to recover.

I am running out of time. I had so much I wanted to talk about that it is difficult to fit it in, but I wanted to talk about the approach our party has taken to economic growth.

The Prime Minister, provoked by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca today, tried to say that the Liberals have no policy, but we do. The policy was put forward in two recent speeches by our leader, particularly in Toronto. The leader stressed the importance of economic growth to the development of our country and the fact that without growth we will not create jobs in Canada.

The aim and thrust of a new Liberal government will be to shift the focus from shrinking the economy and squeezing the economy through a tight monetary policy to one that is based on the growth of the economy to create jobs and new industries in the future. We also said that we were committed to fiscal responsibility in dealing with expenditure control, not necessarily an $8 billion reduction in the deficit. A reduction of $8 billion off $30 billion over a five-year period is not very much. I believe the figure from the five-year plan is cumulative. The debt problem in Canada is severe and this government has made it critical.

The monetary policy must be changed to allow a much more balanced approach to growth so that we can have some inflation, if need be, and not throw everybody out of work.

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh, no.

Mr. Milliken: The member for Mississauga South objects to that. The Conservatives have squeezed the economy so they can get inflation down to 1.5 per cent, but at what cost to Canadian workers? It has been tough, tough, tough. Tory times are tough times and NDP times are worse.

We need greater fiscal co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. That is something that has been sadly lacking under this government. When it introduced the GST the plan was clearly to have it dovetail with provincial taxes but it did not. The government was not flexible enough to manage to make that transition.

Had the government been able to get such agreement Canadians would not be saddled with two taxes at once when they go to the store and storekeepers would not be saddled with two different taxes to collect, all on different things. It is a real problem. It is a tremendous cost of doing business. The government boasts that the GST has helped but the only people it has helped are the people who are only involved in exports. Persons who are selling domestically, where they are manufacturing and selling more than one thing, are faced with difficulties because of the taxation system in place in this country.

We also believe that our trade policy must reflect the realities of the GATT. We are anxious to settle the problems in GATT and bring the agreement to a conclusion.

I see my time has run out. I profoundly regret that because I could go on at some length about the policies the Liberal Party has espoused and will espouse when it takes office, as soon as the government gets the courage to call an election.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the member, who is a great parliamentarian and historian, would probably want to say, but did not, and I thought I might do it for him, that in the 1980–84 Parliament the Liberal government introduced time allocation 25 times on 18 bills and full closure on two motions. In the 1984–88 Parliament time allocation was used 20 times on 16 bills and there were two motions of closure. That is quite less than the Liberal record.

So far in this Parliament, 1988–92, time allocation has been used 18 times on 13 bills and there have been three time allocations on motions.

That is an interesting situation because I note that the Liberal Party, desirous of expediting and improving the form of government and cutting the cost of government—and he made quite a speech with respect to the efforts of Mr. Matthew Barrett of the Bank of Montreal. He did not bother saying that the Liberal government had co-operated with the New Democrats to make closure necessary on Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan, and Bill C-60, the federal fiscal arrangements bill or that the Liberals and New Democrats co-operated to oppose Bills C-20, C-21, C-56, C-63, C-69, C-93 and C-76, all in this session of Parliament, all designed to cut and streamline the cost of government.

The member did not say that the New Democrats and Liberals had opposed the government on getting the government out of Crown corporations. On Bills C-8, C-13, and C-38 he and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party, tweedledum and tweedledee, voted together to make sure that the government had to force closure on the dissolution of Crown corporations. They believe in high Public Service salaries so they co-operated with the New Democratic Party again on Bill C-26, the public service employment act, Bill C-55, the pension benefits act, and they are now co-operating with them on Bill C-113, the Government Expenditures Restraint 1993 Act. I wonder whether that will require time allocation. I suspect it will.

I want to ask him one question because he raised the issue. It is a question we all want to know. He said: "Inflation, if need be". I want to know what inflation this country is going to get with a Liberal Party. What is a necessary inflation rate?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question directly, and then I want to comment on something the hon. member said in his remarks. I do not know what a reasonable level of inflation would be. It will not be high. However, we will not throw 500,000 people out of work in order to reduce the level of inflation from 4 per cent to 1.5 per cent. That is not what we will do. That has cost the Canadian economy millions and millions of dollars.

• (1420)

Not only are those people not paying taxes now, and remember it is this government that induced the recession, but they are drawing unemployment insurance. Now the government is introducing measures to take them off unemployment insurance so they cannot get a cent from their government after paying premiums at exorbitant rates to this government, which has doubled and tripled the premiums. It is an absolute scandal and a disgrace. Frankly if the government had done a reasonably proper job when it took office in 1984 of doing all the things it said it was going to do it would not be in the pickle it is in today.

I want to respond to the hon. member's comments about closure. He says we co-operated to block these bills so that closure had to be applied.

Let us take a look at the legislative record of some of these bills. I think the member will find that the debates were remarkably short. For example, notice of time allocation on Bill C-110 has been given for Monday. That is the fixed link bill for the Northumberland Strait. There have been five speakers on that bill, one hour and 39 minutes of debate, and the government has given notice of time allocation. That is the kind of record this government has.

This is not a case of prolonging a debate and then the government stepping in and introducing closure to cut it off. This is after a short debate. The government says it does not want to hear any more from the opposition and cuts it off right away. That is what is going on here. Do not make any mistake about it.

The hon. member talked about the use of closure and cited all these figures from past Parliaments which do not match what has gone on in this Parliament. None come close. He can cite all he wants. If he looks at the debates he will see that before closure or time allocation was used by previous governments a reasonable amount of debate had elapsed. The House sat longer per year in those days than it does now. We have had our time cut back. This House has not sat that much during the four years we have been here because the government keeps using closure whenever the House does sit in order to ram its bills through.

It does not want to have public discussion on the bills.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to question the member. The member mentioned as he began that we should have an election and I agree with him.

The Prime Minister said before the last election that he would not cut social programs, and we saw what happened. He said he promised his mother he would not do it. We see the cutbacks in unemployment insurance. We see the cutbacks in social programs. We see the cutbacks in equalization payments to the provinces. Now we see student loans being cut back.

We have a situation in which this government is on its last legs and is trying to force through legislation. I was here in 1984 when the Liberals were on their last legs. They went four and a half years before they called the election. Interest rates were running at 22 per cent. The New Democratic Party has finally put forward a program that we think could stimulate the economy and get things going but all we hear from both sides is that this side does not want to say what it is going to do and this side is showing us what it is doing.

I want to ask the member when the Liberal Party is going to tell us what it is going to do. He has said that it would harmonize the GST. The people of Canada do not want that. He said had the government done the right thing and worked with these people it would have harmonized the GST. Is that what the Liberal Party is going to do if it becomes the government?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member protests too much. He has very much misconstrued my words. I said that the government blundered ahead with the GST without having achieved any harmonization with the provinces before it did it. That has been a mistake.

We will introduce some new tax. Our leader has promised that after the next election he will set up a parliamentary committee of all parties which will consult widely—

An hon. member: It is a war on the GST.

Mr. Milliken: It is a war on the GST, as the hon. member says. That is correct. It is a war on the GST.

We will set up a committee which will conduct a study and determine what kind of tax will be reasonable, perhaps not acceptable but at least reasonable, for Canadians. It will consult with provincial governments so that they also have some input on the way the tax operates so the federal government does not bulldoze its way into the tax field and drive Canadians out of work, out of business and into bankruptcy. That is what the government's policies have done.

The GST was one of the major planks in that policy. The Minister of Finance was boasting about it yesterday in his speech, for heaven's sake. What more evidence do we need. Of course the member for Mississauga South was a staunch supporter of the GST. His constituents are going to thank him for that come the next election I am sure.

The NDP say: "We are going to get rid of the GST and soak the rich". As Mr. Simpson said, there is good reason to increase taxes in certain brackets in Canada. I am not disagreeing with that but let us look at what Jeffrey Simpson said in his article in The Globe and Mail. Mr. Simpson knows I like to quote him.

With regard to the Informetrica analysis of the socialist five-year plan he said: "The party wants out of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Nor could Informetrica estimate the very negative consequences of the NDP trade policy. Nor could Informetrica estimate the almost certain decline in business confidence caused by higher corporate taxes, a 2 per cent refundable training tax, the abrogation of trade agreements and higher personal income taxes. Nor could the NDP's fiscal commitments be considered fully credible. The party calls for defence cuts without saying how or where and outlines some new spending for child care infrastructure, research and development but the plan also notes many other areas for potential new spending without offsetting spending reductions".

So the answers are not all there. This document is trumped about as though it was some sort of a godsend, but I think the hon. member for Mississauga South and I at least have this in common: We agree this document is a pretty feeble effort.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr Speaker, I will be sharing my time with my hon. colleague from Comox—Alberni on this subject, 10 minutes each I believe with a period for questions.

I have been listening to the debate all morning with a great deal of interest. We do have a number of colourful speakers here. We have speakers from both sides of the House who have been in government for many years. It is very instructive to hear the substance they give forth occasionally but also the political parrying back and forth is also interesting, and entertaining as well.

I should have been forewarned when I came here that it would be that kind of a day because at 10.30 a.m. I saw about 40 students sitting where the Conservative members are sitting right now. They were students from the school attended by the Prime Minister's son. They wanted to know what we would be studying today, what legislation we would be passing and what we would be debating. It was refreshing to see students, actually children behaving as children, rather than seeing adults behaving as children.

When we get into these kinds of debates, we get into almost a bizarre world where the Conservative Party with Bill C-76 has a program without a doubt and we do not like it. The New Democratic Party does not think the solution is to penalize students to the degree that Bill C-76 does. We do not believe it is a solution. With respect to the part dealing with lobbyists, we do not think the lobbyists are being reined in or controlled as they should be. That is why we are studying the question in committee.

At least the Conservatives have a program we can oppose and we have a program which both the Liberals and the Conservatives, as I was not surprised to see them do, oppose as well. I am very proud of the NDP program because it has some good elements in it. I did give a copy of the NDP program to the member of the Liberal Party so he could base parts of his speech on it. I have not yet seen any program from the Liberal Party. In a preamble to what I have to say on Bill C-76 I hope that we will see something substantial, something which is serious and is not contradictory.

An hon. member: The Liberals are going to play hide and seek.

Mr. Edmonston: My colleague on the other side says the Liberals are going to play hide and seek. We will see but we do have some time left before the next election. I do hope the Liberal Party will give us at least as much as we have given them: a program they can debate, they can make fun of or they can agree with, at least something substantial.

• (1430)

Let me address the parts of Bill C-76 that we believe we cannot accept. There are several parts to Bill C-76. The parts that interest me are those dealing with lobbyists and those dealing with paying back student loans to the government.

I heard my hon. colleague from Laval-Ouest say that the government really has no choice, the rules have to be tightened up. We have several rules dealing with students and the repayment of loans. One rule is that there is more or less a subsidy of six months from the time that the loan comes due until they begin paying it off.

Bill C-76 in a sense is tightening that up in that it is saying we no longer allow that period. I must say during that period the students will still have to pay. My hon. colleague from Mississauga may be able to correct me on this. They will have to pay the interest on the principal. If this bill is passed they would have to start paying as soon as it comes due. There would no longer be a six-month period of forgiveness.

I have no qualm that students should pay what they owe. I have no problem with that. I do not believe there is such a thing as free education. People do have to pay for it, either the students partly, their parents, myself, or citizens in general. I think the citizens of Canada really want to pay for students because they are our future.

For many of the Conservatives who will no longer be sitting in those seats after the next election, those students will probably be paying their pensions. It will not be with a great deal of joy but they will be doing it anyway. It is in our best interests to make sure that those students have good, well-paying jobs.

When I look at the impact of Bill C-76 I do not see the trade-off I expected. I understand it was discussed and agreed upon in committee that in exchange for having the students pay when the loan falls due after they graduate without a six-month period of forgiveness the government would eliminate the 3 per cent tax on the loan.

That is one question I have been asking many of the speakers. I have not had an answer to it just yet. Perhaps I will not today but I expect that eventually I will. To me it means we are getting a 3 per cent tax on student loans. I really think it is a bit much if at the same time we remove the forgiveness period of six months while they are out looking for a job. I think that is taxing them again in a roundabout way.

I understand what my colleague from Mississauga said. We have to get this deficit down. I believe him. It is a serious problem. I read the financial press as much as anybody else. However, the problem is this: if we are going to have any credibility whatsoever in this government, we are going to have to set the example with expenses. I am not just talking about the Conservatives; I am talking about Liberals and NDPers as well. We have not done that to any great extent.

I know it can be said it has been done somewhat or that it has been done better than the Liberals. The population at large, Canadians outside these walls, are tired of hearing us say we did it a little bit better than the Liberals, or a little better than the NDP, or the Parti Quebecois, or the Bloc. They are worse than we are.

People are sick and tired of these sterile comparisons. The people of this country would like profoundly, in the depths of their hearts, to see us for once say that we are going to set a massive example. Here are the cuts and here is where they are coming.

I would like to compare this to what President Clinton said in his speech: "We have to make tremendous cuts". He mentioned entitlements. There is the question of universality and the safety net. He mentioned that but he also said: "Here is where we are going to make these tremendous cuts as of the next few months". A poll of his speech that night just came through the wires. Over 70 per cent of Americans were prepared to accept even additional taxes if he was going to go along with those massive cuts.

That is why we are against Bill C-76. We do not see the fairness aspect as a political party which is based on fairness. That is why we placed an alternative before Canadians. That alternative is toward a full-employment job plan. That is very important.

In conclusion, I would just like to say if you are going to attack the Conservatives or Liberals, you had better have an alternative. Our party has it.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member and I would appreciate hearing his opinion.

In Quebec today weekly lottery winnings total $2 million. Does the hon. member think it would be possible to have a special tax for lottery winners, who would in this way participate in the development of our country, because the money would be put in the bank and used to give our students a chance to get a better education? I would like to know whether the hon. member would support this idea.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a wonderful idea. I think it would be a way to really invest in our young people. In fact, there is a similar suggestion I would like to make.

One of the reasons why I object to the GST is that it does not apply to transactions in financial institutions. I invest a lot in the stock market, and whether I win or lose, I would not object to my transactions being taxed because I think these are financial transactions that ought to be taxed.

I think the kind of suggestion I heard from one of the Conservatives across the way—and one is the operative word—makes very good sense. The hon. member made a very sensible suggestion and I applaud that.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Chambly for sharing his time with me. I appreciate the opportunity to speak in the debate on Bill C-76, which as members know deals with a number of fiscal measures designed to trim government expenditures. Some of them I do not really have any difficulty with.

On the idea of taxing lobbyists to pay for the regulatory process for lobbyists, I think the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is a little overly concerned that this is a way of depriving people of getting access to their members of Parliament.

If there are people in the business of being third parties who introduce Canadian citizens to the government or to members of Parliament and derive funds from that, I have no hesitation in seeing them pay for the cost of regulating that kind of business. I have no difficulty with that section.

I do have some difficulty with the cutting of ministers' salaries and that kind of thing. I am not sure this really is going to have an impact on the deficit or the debt at all. As Mike Harcourt, the premier of British Columbia, pointed out when he was giving his pre-budget message to the people of British Columbia, the actual amount spent on the whole operation of Parliament is something like 1.82 per cent of the total expenditure in the province of British Columbia. It is a very tiny amount and any cuts to ministers' salaries or to those kinds of salaries are really token and symbolic. I think it misleads the people of Canada to suggest that it in any way contributes to the cutting of the deficit, although there is some value in that as a symbolic measure.

If we really want to take a look at the waste in this section of the Public Service that is represented by Parliament we should have an independent tribunal to examine salaries and benefits. It would ensure that those salaries and benefits enjoyed by members, ministers of the Crown and the Prime Minister are in line with the kind of work being done and the kind of expenses being experienced by people occupying those offices. I do not think it should be done on an arbitrary basis. As a symbolic measure, I think it should have real impact and people should know what the reasons for it are and what legitimate levels of compensation should be paid to members of the government and the Prime Minister.

I really do not look on that section of this legislation as being of very much importance. I hope the government will consider something along the lines of an independent and impartial salary and benefits tribunal that will look at salaries of members in this Chamber and make sure they are in line with our duties.

In addition, there has been some comment on the expansion of the limits of small business loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act. I do not think that is really an important section in this bill. In fact, I think all those measures are sugar coating to make it more palatable to accept the real weight of this bill, which is an attack on students through the changes in the student loans system.

If we are trying to cut the debt and deficit of this country it should not be done on the backs of students. I hear the government talking about the need for more education to make us more competitive and to make it possible for young people in our country to become more employable and more flexible so that they will be able to participate in the high-tech, information-oriented economy of the future.

This government has done virtually nothing to help Canadians realize the promise and the need for more education. A little while ago it was talking about adult literacy programs and yet almost no money has been put up to finance those programs. It talked about the tremendous cost burden that illiteracy constitutes in the Canadian economy and how much our Gross National Product could be improved if the adult literacy rate in Canada could be improved. However, very little in the way of government effort and government money has gone into that. It does not put its money where its mouth is when it speaks of literacy and education.

The government also criticized the fact that Canadian business spends less on worker and staff training than virtually any other business group in any other industrialized country. Canadian business ranks among the worst in terms of the amount it spends on improving the educational level of its employees. What has the government done to change that, to bring Canadian businesses up to international standards so that our workers and businesses will be more competitive and more able to be more successful in the world economy? It has done absolutely nothing.

Again, in this piece of legislation it has dumped the problem of the deficit and the debt on to the backs of Canadian students by making the Canadian student loans system more rigorous, more difficult for students to qualify for student loans and when they are finished their training, more difficult for them to pay it back. Why is the government putting the burden of the debt and the deficit on the backs of those who are least able to pay for it?

That is why I asked a previous speaker from the government side why there was such inconsistency in government policy in terms of the way it treats students as opposed to the way it treats business. On the one hand I pointed out that there are 100,000 businesses in this country that were very profitable. They earned $27 billion in profits, yet paid absolutely no tax at all. The member from Mississauga criticized the NDP's economic paper when he pointed out that we would impose a minimum tax on those businesses.

On the other hand, student scholarships that are earned by talent and ability and by the intelligence of the students are taxed under the income tax system when 100,000 businesses in this country earning $27 billion in profits are getting away tax free. How do they do it? They have the business entertainment deduction. They can deduct things like three martini lunches and the services of escort agencies paid for at the expense of the taxpayers.

What kind of a country would have those kinds of priorities where it is willing to finance or allow businesses to deduct the costs from their income tax of escort agencies and three martini lunches and yet tax scholarships in the hands of students who earn those scholarships by the talent of their brains and their ability. It simply does not make sense.

As was pointed out by the member for Laval-Ouest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 2.45 p.m., pursuant to a Standing Order made Monday, February 15, 1993, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock p.m., Monday, February 22, 1993.

I believe there is unanimous consent to go right into Private Members' hour.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ENVIRONMENTAL CHARTER OF RIGHTS

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should develop a comprehensive environmental charter of rights.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to stand in the House this afternoon to speak on my private member's motion: That the government should develop a comprehensive environmental charter of rights which would promote and protect the health of our planet and would impose harsh penalties on all individuals and corporations found in violation of the charter.

While Canadians may have trouble at times finding ways to keep our country united, one thing is certain. Canadians agree that there is an issue out there upon which the quality of our lives depends: the environment. There is no doubt that there has been a deep and permanent shift in Canadian values and attitudes on this issue. Despite our diverse linguistic and cultural backgrounds, Canadians from coast to coast to coast share an abiding relationship with the land they love and cherish so dearly.

That being said, every Canadian should have the right to a clean and healthy environment; clean air, water and soil and justice for those who threaten them. Unfortunately, there is no such legal right in Canada. In fact, most Canadians are excluded from the process by which environmental law is enforced in this country. There exists no requirement that they even be involved in the development of these laws.

The average citizen is not empowered as an individual to launch an environmental lawsuit against powerful corporations or government. Industry complains that the rules of the game change with the political winds of the day and environmentalists are concerned that existing environmental rules are not enforced or non-existent. The establishment of an environmental bill of rights would establish in law each citizen's fundamental right to environmental equality and would guarantee the public the right to a healthy environment.

The right of future generations to help the environment must also be protected as it is not enough to only be concerned about our short-term gains or health. Such a bill would also democratize environmental decision making by guaranteeing the public's right to participate and thereby increase government accountability.

Further, an environmental bill of rights could deal with existing environmental problems and would force government to address the issue of leadership and the environment in an area in which the need for leadership has never been greater than it is today.

I look to the south of us and I must say that it does my heart good to see the lights of that great environmentalist, Vice-President Al Gore, leading the way and breaking new ground as it relates to the environment and the new BTU tax that was set in the last speech of the President.

A federal environmental bill of rights would be similar to the Canadian Bill of Rights. It would take precedence over all federal legislation with the exception of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, it would not be binding upon provincial legislative authority.

A number of provinces and territories have already implemented environmental legislation. The province of Quebec established a Quebec Environment Quality Act in 1977 which includes elements of an environmental bill of rights.

The NWT was the first to pass a comprehensive NWT environmental bill of rights in November 1990. The elements of an environmental bill of rights are also included in the Yukon environment act of May 1991.

The province of Ontario released for public review an Ontario environmental bill of rights in July 1992. As well, several American states have the equivalent of an environmental bill of rights, the most noted being the Michigan environmental protection act of 1972.

The concept of the environmental bill of rights is very intriguing. An environmental bill of rights would contain both substantive and procedural features enabling the legislation to put into place certain mechanisms to achieve specific environmental objectives. These would include the public's right to a healthy environment. The public's right must be enforced through improved access to the courts and/or tribunals. The onus of proof should rest with the plaintiff and should be on a basis of probabilities. There must be an increase in public participation in environmental decision making and legislated intervener funding for public participation must be made available. There should be mandatory notification of the public when significant environmental approvals are made.

Greater protection is needed for employees who blow the whistle on polluting employers. If we are going to have a UIC snitch line we can have an environmental polluter snitch line too.

There must be the creation of an accessible and affordable electronic registry that would give the public necessary government and industry information concerning environmental standards: the use, storage and release of pollutants and infractions. The use and the access to the state of the art environment reporting would provide the public with news and changes in our environment on a regular basis. It would be like an environmental monitoring program.

I believe there should be an independent environmental commissioner or ombudsman appointed to make sure that the principles of the bill are applied in a fair and consistent manner.

In addition, the position of an environmental auditor general should be created who could report directly to Parliament with powers of investigation similar to the powers invested in the Auditor General. This office could issue an annual public report reflecting the federal government's goals with respect to environmental programs, spending, implementation and enforcement.

In the past governments have been held to public scrutiny mainly in terms of their economic achievements. This is no longer true. The time has passed when strict economics is the main indicator of progress.

Governments must become more responsible and accountable for the environment. After decades and even centuries of economic growth, environmental conditions have worsened. The health of Canadians has been threatened and the physical foundation of our economy, our precious stock of natural capital, being fish, forest, soil, air and water, has been eroded. In fact we are now building up an ecological deficit which is as threatening in the long run as the more visible financial deficit.

This country and its leaders need an agenda that is environmentally driven. Canada needs to carve out an industrial policy which underlines the fact that good environmental management is also good business by integrating the economy and the environment.

We need to encourage expansion of the industrial sector which is involved in producing goods and services that help protect the environment. Part of the problem is Canada's lack of innovation in relation to environmental management. Instead of strictly following the initiative of Germany, Japan and others, Canada should be blazing the trail. Clearly Canada needs to build a wider involvement from all sectors of the public, including the involvement of Canada's First Nations peoples.

1993 has been proclaimed the Internatioal Year for World Indigenous Peoples. The theme for this year is Indigenous Peoples—A New Partnership. I believe the time has come for western science to integrate its environmental efforts with that traditional knowledge.

Aboriginal people view the environment as the foundation of our spiritual well-being as well as our economic and physical health. One of the major costs of progress has been a spiritual one, the feeling that we have been alienated from nature. For many of us the physical uprooting from the land of our ancestors and the adoption of modern technologies have brought a deep sense of loss and in part disorientation, confusion and disempowerment.

By responding in a creative way, native communities have begun to rekindle traditional forms of worship and philosophies based on the understanding that the earth is our mother. Traditional knowledge is the accumulated knowledge and understanding of the human place in relation to the universe. It encompasses spiritual relationships with the natural environment and the use of natural resources.

The potential for the use of traditional knowledge in the areas of the environment, renewable resources and sustainable development is tremendous. A government of the Northwest Territories report on the traditional knowledge working group outlined recommendations calling for the use of traditional knowledge within the government decision-making process in a number of areas, including the environment.

Research and development efforts by the Dene cultural institute in Hay River, Northwest Territories, helps to bring greater recognition to the importance and value of preserving traditional knowledge for the use of scientists, governments and aboriginal peoples of today and generations to follow.

At the Rio conference in June 1992 a number of indigenous principles and objectives were recognized, including the world's need for better understanding of indigenous people's knowledge and management experience related to the environment, and the need to apply this information to contemporary development challenges.

Chapter 26 of Agenda 21 also recognizes indigenous values, traditional knowledge and resource management practices with a view to promoting environmentally sound and sustainable development. It also recognized that government should where necessary work in full partnership with indigenous peoples and their communities.

I believe the environment is an extremely appropriate area in which governments on all levels could develop co-management relationships with First Nations peoples. In doing so Canada would set an example for other global communities to follow.

It is not enough, however, to expect individual First Nations' representatives sitting on co-management boards to advance traditional knowledge. Extensive research and documentation work by aboriginal peoples on their environmental knowledge must be supported. Without this research support, decision makers will continue to rely on western science and will not implement the learnings and beliefs of traditional knowledge.

Where do we go from here? In conclusion, I have to say it is our responsibility to plan a strategic course of action to protect the future of our environment. Canada must become a true world leader in the fight to protect the ozone layer. We must protect the health and abundance of our oceans. We must give immediate attention to protecting traditional food sources of the world's indigenous peoples who are suffering from toxic and PCB contamination. Contamination of the food chain means a lot of suffering and a lot of hardship for indigenous populations. A moral code of ethics held by the Dene should be adopted to guide the interpretation and implementation of this bill.

As Bella T'seleie of Fort Good Hope, Northwest Territories, explained: "Everyone takes responsibility for what is going on, on the land with the animals, not only the game officers. This is why our Dene system works. Anyone in the community who does not follow it is considered naive and is not respected". There is a great deal of social pressure when these rules are not followed because our survival depends on the land and the animals.

We must develop ways to measure how we are doing in our efforts to protect the environment. We must establish cultural survival schools and regional and world environmental study centres, maybe even a world biodiversity centre in the Northwest Territories which is seen by many parts of the world to be the last frontier of clean air and clean water. That is not really true but that certainly is an image we would like to preserve.

We must also have more focused and tougher legislation put into place. An environmental bill of rights would be an excellent start. It would give each person the right to live in a healthy environment and make polluters and governments accountable should they infringe on those rights.

Those who resist this initiative really fear that the rules of the environmental decision-making game will shift into the hands of the public when in reality an environmental bill of rights ensures that individuals, groups, companies and governments all play by the same rules. This sounds like a reasonable goal in a democratic society.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this very important debate about the environment.

I would like to begin by commending my hon. friend from Western Arctic for bringing this important subject before Parliament. I know it is a matter of deep concern to her, particularly in view of her constituency and the sensitivity of the environment in that part of the country. I too represent a constituency that is blessed with the bounties of nature but is also an area very much subject to environmental damage and difficulties. I share her concern for the environment.

As to whether the solution she puts forward is the ideal one or not, that may be a different thing. I am not sure that it is an appropriate or desirable thing that the protection of the Canadian environment in the final analysis should be turned over to the courts as opposed to resting the obligation on the heads of the elected people, who are accountable.

When an environmental difficulty arises in my own area the telephone lines in my offices are absolutely blitzed with calls. That is appropriate and proper. If the public were to make a challenge under yet another charter of rights, I am not sure that would be the best protection for our environment. With the greatest of respect to my hon. friend, the imperative she is concerned about, the preservation and protection of our environment, is an aspiration shared by all members of this House. The best way to protect the environment and the interests of future citizens, my children and I hope some day my grandchildren if I should live so long as to have some, is by having accountability rest with government. I think actions speak louder than words.

I might use a few minutes to reflect on some of the actions taken by this government. Perhaps the most significant, but certainly the most visible, is the very historic green plan brought down by the government in 1990 with the greatest commitment of financial expenditure with respect to the environment in the history of governments.

I do not want to talk about just the money involved because I think the green plan is much more than money. One of its main features is that it sets forth an environmental action plan totally consistent with the principal recommendations of the Brundtland commission with respect to sustainable development as a goal.

If I may remind the House, economic development which meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs is the concept of sustainable development as set down by that commission. That is the basis for environmental policy but also resource development of this government, which is extremely important.

In effect the green plan is a co-ordinated action plan dealing with many environmental issues: acid rain, climate change, parks, wildlife, coastal ports and waters, and so on. I would be pleased to provide to my hon. friend or to anyone else a list of all the expenditures involved there.

The point is that it is not just a matter of spending money. It is the partnership approach that is applied in the green plan, the idea that the federal government does not just throw money at a problem but actually goes out and brings people together: other levels of government, industry, individuals, and people interested in preserving their future and their environment. As well, it requires of the government regular reporting to the people of Canada through this Parliament on the state of the environment in this country.

The green plan establishes targets and schedules for action. Take for example the recent establishment of regulations relating to the pulp and paper industry. These are not easy things to be faced by that industry. I know that the Bowater Mersey paper mill in Liverpool, Nova Scotia, is very much challenged by the $37 million that it has to come up with in order to comply with those regulations.

Obviously there is a need for the government to show some flexibility to ensure that the requirements of those regulations will improve the environment. These things have to be scrutinized.

What is significant is that those regulations are there. The government is not backing down in the face of the expenditures required. That is going to lead to exactly the kind of future my hon. friend is looking for.

The environmental review process put in place by this government with the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is extremely important. It was passed in June 1988. At the same time the government brought in a practice whereby no new policies can go before cabinet, no new initiatives, until there has been an environmental impact assessment done to make sure that development in this country is consistent with good environmental practice.

That is this government putting action where others might just use words. I do not refer to my hon. friend from Western Arctic when I say that, but I know that a lot of people like to mouth platitudes about the environment. If we are going to pass on to the next generation of Canadians a clean, healthy country, we have to set these standards and guidelines, and as a government we have to live up to them.

The record of this government is very impressive. We have to look upon development and economic development within the context of the environment.

My hon. friend spoke about the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in Rio last year. Although environmental aspects of the conference seemed to attract most of the media attention, it is very significant the two concepts of environment and development were linked by the United Nations.

It is equally interesting to recall—and I noted earlier today my hon. friend from Oxford spoke to this fact—that the leadership in that international gathering, the largest gathering of heads of states in the history of the world, came from Canada. It was not just from the fact a Canadian was the commissioner of that great event, but the fact that the delegation looked at as the world leader was the Canadian delegation and the fact that the green plan was looked upon as a model for the rest of the world.

That is very encouraging as Canadians. We cannot sit back and rest on our laurels about that. We have to continue to be vigilant. I can say that my colleagues on this side of the House, and I am sure my colleagues on the other side of the House, welcome the new priority it would appear the environment is to have in the United States.

There has been a lot of talk about the North American free trade agreement. Some concerns have been expressed by some people with respect to whether or not it adequately allows for protection of the environment and the maintenance of environmental standards. I am delighted President Clinton has indicated that he would like to have some sort of parallel agreement to address it. There is no question where the Government of Canada will be on it. As Mr. Clinton himself pointed out, we already have one of the most respected and successful records in the world in this regard.

It is extremely important that all members of this House, and indeed all Canadians, do not lose sight of the fact that we cannot lighten up on this issue. Our future in part is dependent on what we do with our environment. Therefore we cannot back off in any way, shape or form.

In concluding my remarks, I would not want to impose upon the House in the time available to me, I must again commend my hon. friend for bringing the subject forward. I really believe it is right here in Parliament that accountability should reside. That is why I do not think a charter of rights in this regard would be helpful to Canadians.

However I think we all have to look to the future. The environment is something that is a legacy to our children. We want to make sure that it is a legacy that we are proud to leave them.

• (1510)

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to enter into this debate sponsored by the hon. member for Western Arctic. She says in her motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should develop a comprehensive environmental charter of rights.

I am extremely pleased to see this motion on the table before us once again. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that I put forward a motion very similar to this in June 1991, just to refresh your memory and the memories of members of the House. The motion I put forward at that time read:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish a bill of environmental rights to empower Canadians to fight polluters and guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthy environment.

There is a tremendous similarity in these two bills and I am very pleased to rise again today to discuss this incredibly important issue for all of us.

As the hon. member who introduced the motion said, Canadians from coast to coast to coast are all too aware that our environment teeters on the brink of irreparable destruction. Cynical attempts by governments to buffer big businesses, continued practice of sacrificing our land, our air and our water to cheap and easy profits do nothing but sell our children's right to a healthful future.

This is very critical at a time when the entire world is debating the issue of how government should be involved in dealing with the environmental destruction that has occurred and how to prevent environmental destruction that we know will occur if we are not involved in the process.

The establishment of an environmental bill of rights or an environmental charter of rights is something that is most significant because it empowers people to be involved in the entire process of keeping an eye on corporations, governments and those people engaged in environmental activities.

There was a bit of a lull in this process of defining the rights of people on the environment and the jurisdiction of provinces, individuals, municipalities and the federal government over the environment. Some time around October 1992 when the government brought forward the motion to amend the Canadian Constitution, one of the principles included in that amendment was a charter of social rights. It included a right to a healthful environment.

That clause alone gave us reason to believe that the government was prepared to take certain steps that would give us something close to an environmental bill of rights. Therefore the debate over federal–provincial or whatever jurisdiction ceased for a short period of time.

There is no question that at a time when we are debating whether or not to build a bridge between the mainland and Prince Edward Island, how to deal with dams in western Canada, how to deal with the fragile environment of the Northwest Territories, of the Arctic and other such matters, it is very important that we have a context in which to look at them.

I am indeed shocked today to read in the Toronto Globe and Mail an article that tells me that the direction that this government is taking is exactly opposite to that which this country desires. I want to quote briefly from the article in today's Globe and Mail:

> The federal government is reviewing all of its environmental regulations with an eye to eliminating rules that might hurt national competitiveness or drain the public purse, The Globe and Mail has learned.

In other words, this government is trying to find a way to make it easier for environmental polluters to do business in this country and to get away from those things that will protect the Canadian environment and the Canadian people from the activities that they are engaged in.

I continue to quote:

> The Treasury Board told the environment department last fall "to look at existing regulations and identify those that significantly hinder Canadian competitiveness or impose needless costs on consumers".

This is from a memo from deputy minister Len Good to staff. This is simply incredible.

They talk about the review being linked to the Canadian government's Prosperity Initiative, a report released last October containing 54 recommendations to include Canadian industries' competitive position in the world.

In this House just a short time ago the subcommittee on acid rain to the committee on the environment tabled a report entitled From Words to Action. In that report we detailed findings from our study of the way in which the United States has dealt with acid rain controls. One thing we discovered in looking at the system in the United States was that under President George Bush, who is not a noted environmentalist as is Vice–President Al Gore, an office of competitiveness was established right next door to the President's office. The office of competitiveness was headed by Dan Quayle, a man for whom I am sure we all have some respect.

The office of competitiveness was eliminating environmental regulations to make business more competitive in the United States, thereby jeopardizing the environment. In our case we were looking at acid rain matters, and we found that previously agreed upon acid rain regulations were not being implemented on the specific request of the office of competitiveness.

Under its prosperity agenda, the equal of the Dan Quayle committee in the United States, this government is preparing to do exactly the same thing the Americans were doing, which has stalled acid rain matters in Canada.

If this is the action the Canadian government is prepared to engage in while at the same time talking about trying to protect this environment for the future of Canada, then we have to view with significant doubt virtually everything else it is saying because obviously its commitment to the environment is much less than the words it speaks here.

The North American free trade agreement is another matter that falls under some scrutiny for environmental considerations. An environmental charter of rights in Canada would go a long way toward empowering people to ensure that some of these matters were looked at more closely.

This government has accepted an environmental assessment of the North American free trade agreement. That environmental assessment was not done under the rules this House created just last year with the passage of Bill C-13, the Environmental Assessment Act. The assessment of the North American free trade agreement was not done by the agency that was created to do environmental assessments, previously the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, FEARO, but by a committee of deputy ministers. It was a committee on the government side. The committee basically said it was okay and that the North American free trade agreement passes the environmental assessment test. It did not pass any test that was established by this government.

I was a part of the committee that helped to rewrite the government's previously flawed Environmental Assessment Act. When Bill C-13 was passed in this House, despite certain objections I had to the way regulations were going to be dealt with, I very much agreed with most of it. We should be using that Environment Assessment Act when we examine all policies, programs and projects in the future, starting with the North American free trade agreement. We should also be applying it to the fixed link proposal which is going to be debated in this House next week.

In conclusion, I want to commend the member for bringing this motion forward to allow for the debate to continue on this most important issue. I want to urge the government to take every step possible to move away from this idea that business can look after the environment and get back to giving the people the power to protect and enhance the environment.

I agree with the member that the aboriginal peoples of this country—northern, plains, Cree and others—have a very solid reputation in this regard. We have a lot to learn from the way in which the environment has been protected and enhanced in the past. We must get back to that position whereby we can ensure that we will leave to our children a world that was better than that we inherited from our parents.

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on the motion of the hon. member which reads: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should develop a comprehensive environmental charter of rights". This charter would empower Canadians to fight polluters and guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthy environment.

Let me make it clear that the protection and enhancement of the environment are high priorities for this government. Our record clearly shows our commitment. On December 11, 1990, we released our environmental action plan, Canada's green plan. This plan is based on a vision which Canadians share: to secure for current and future generations a safe and healthy environment and a sound and prosperous economy.

This is what the green plan does. The government's commitment to the environment has been enshrined in legislation. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, affirms in its preamble a commitment to:

> Achieve sustainable development by conserving and enhancing environmental quality and by encouraging and promoting economic development that conserves and enhances environmental quality.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act ensures that all federal departments and agencies conduct environmental assessments of all project proposals for which they have a decision-making authority and gives the Minister of the Environment substantial powers to ensure that this process is fair, efficient, transparent and allows for a high level of public input into decisions on projects which have a potentially significant impact on the natural environment.

In addition to this legislated base, the Prime Minister has clearly committed this government to consider the environment as a priority in all its policy and program decision-making.

As a government, we realize that the activities of government touch Canadians in many ways which are not directly linked to projects. That is why it is government policy to require that an environmental statement accompany any proposal considered by Cabinet dealing with policies or programs which may have a significant effect on the Canadian environment.

While the process of assessing policies for their environmental impact is still in its infancy, considerable progress has been made. For example, the Department of National Defence reviewed its policy on port visits by nuclear-powered vessels. The transit of Dixon Entrance by U.S. submarines was also assessed.

Agriculture Canada integrated an environmental review component into its farm safety net program. In addition, External Affairs conducted and made public an environmental review of the North American free trade agreement, the first major economic policy initiative to undergo such a review.

The Minister of the Environment has the responsibility to administer the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA). This act gives the minister substantial power to establish regulations protecting Canada's air, water and land. More than this, the act obliges the minister to report to Canadians at regular intervals on the state of the Canadian environment.

CEPA guarantees extensive rights of public participation in decision making affecting the environment. It also confers upon the public the power to take court action against any polluter who contravenes the act.

Environmental information is another area to which the government attaches a great deal of importance. During the process of consulting with Canadians as a part of the development of the government's green plan, individual Canadians stressed repeatedly that a major priority of government must be the regular provision and wide dissemination of readily understandable information on the state of the environment and how it is changing.

Canadians told us they wanted a sound basis to make their own decisions about the environment. They wanted a basis to understand whether the actions they were taking as individuals would help to reduce environmental degradation. They want to be able to judge whether government is doing its part to contribute to a healthy and sustainable environmental legacy for our children. As well, Canadians want to have a basis to make judgements about the environmental performance of industry.

The routine provision of high-quality environmental information is a major commitment included in the green plan.

In the view of the government, the measures we have already put in place are the best way to empower Canadians to fight polluters and ensure that the government lives up to its commitments. We already have what is needed to guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthy environment. An environmental charter of rights would duplicate many of the provisions which already exist and is not an adequate substitute for an environmentally aware electorate making fully informed decisions about government performance. This is true accountability. The Canadian people will be the judge of whether we are successfully meeting our environmental goals.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be able to talk on this motion of my hon. colleague from Western Arctic on the issue of a comprehensive environmental charter of rights.

When my colleague from South Shore was speaking he mentioned that he would like to make sure that the environment is there for his grandchildren to enjoy. At the rate his party is going his grandchildren will not have any environment to enjoy.

He mentioned that the green plan was an historic plan and I think the plan is history all right. I have not seen much evidence of what the green plan is doing for the people of the eastern Arctic, the area I represent.

When I talk about the environment, as I mentioned earlier in Inuktitut, the aboriginal people have never ruined any part of the environment, have never caused any group of animals to become extinct.

For the Inuit, the Inuktitut language has no word for pollution because we do not create pollution. We do not have a word for radiation. We do not have words for cadmium or PCBs. We have words for dirt but that is about the strongest you can get. When we are talking about pollution or radiation the nearest we can come to is something that makes you sick.

When I say that the Canadian government would do well to listen to my colleague from Western Arctic and myself in terms of protecting the environment, I think it would be well advised to listen. When we are talking about preserving the quality of the environment, we are not just talking because it is the issue of the day. We are saying these things because we have always been concerned about the environment.

In the Northwest Territories, the area that my colleague and I represent, the government was the first to pass a comprehensive bill of rights on the environment in 1990. In 1981, the Yukon government passed legislation containing some elements of an environmental bill of rights. The principles involved in a bill of rights are: the people's right to be involved, the people's right to participate and the people's right to a healthy environment.

When we talk about pollution and not causing the pollution, I would just like to mention some few instances of where other outside groups have caused pollution and environmental damage on the land on which we live, in my case Nunatsiaq, "the good land".

The DEW line sites, the distant early warning sites, have been left behind by the Americans, leaving thousands of barrels of whatever the barrels contain as well as the barrels themselves, which has caused a considerable amount of damage to the land. One good example might be the Horton River DEW line site situated between the communities of Polutuk and Tuktoyaktuk. That site is littered with an estimated 10,000 45–gallon fuel drums, and various abandoned buildings and equipment. This site is on Inuvialuit land, the area the Inuit occupy in the Beaufort region.

It is astonishing that the federal government under its green plan decided it was going to clean up a minimum of 21 DEW line sites. That particular place at the Horton River site has not been cleaned up even after three years have passed since the Inuvialuit reached an agreement with the federal government to clean up that site. That agreement acknowledged that the government had an obligation to remove all debris, all the fuel drums, the towers and the structures that were not required at the site. I repeat, three years after that agreement was reached between the Inuvialuit and the Government of Canada, that site has not been cleaned up.

It seems there are insufficient funds in the Arctic environmental strategy, which the Minister of the Environment very loudly proclaimed in Iqaluit a couple of years ago as the answer to cleaning up the environment. It is too bad that the government has not followed through. I urge the government to try and work co–operatively with the Inuvialuit to achieve the wanted results, which is cleaning up the environment in the area that people see as pristine and without any environmental damage. Unfortunately the environmental damage has not been as a result of us living in that area, but other outside factors.

It has to be understood that the Inuvialuit have to be involved very comprehensively in the clean–up. The government must follow through and stop reneging on its promise to do this clean–up and should immediately take steps to correct the situation.

In the Northwest Territories we have some resources that people want to take out. We do not really have a problem with mining companies, oil companies and other groups wanting to take resources and minerals out of the Northwest Territories. I would like to mention briefly the Izok mine development in the Kitikmeot region. This is the central Arctic region in which they want to have a large–scale complex for development and mining.

Again, we do not really have a problem with people wanting to take that stuff out, but we want to ensure that the environment is not destroyed in the process. That is why we have to be involved as aboriginal people, whether Inuit, Dene or other groups of aboriginal people in Canada. That is why we have to be involved in the planning, development and the shutdowns in all aspects of any mineral development. I point out we have never caused any species of animals to be extinct because of pollution to the land. We have never destroyed any part of our land. That is why we have to be very involved in any development of any kind.

I would like to mention a recent study respecting caribou. A great number of the people I represent depend on caribou, which contains high levels of cadmium. It hurts when people mention that maybe we should be eating less caribou, seal or muktuk.

Some years ago I remember we were told that we should not be eating any more seal liver because it contains mercury. We did not stop eating seal because we believe it is very healthy. I certainly did not do that. As a matter of fact, I love to go out to the area I am from, go out to the flow edge, get some seal and eat the liver.

We are not going to stop eating seal because it is a very healthy part of our diet, fresh raw seal liver. We are not going to stop doing that and we are not going to stop eating caribou just because somebody tells us.

I remember one Inuk said he would never stop eating even if his hair were falling out from his head. That is how tied we are to the environment and to the issue of eating the animals that we hunt in the north.

We would like the government to do a little more to try and prevent the pollution that is occurring in the north. We would like the government to follow through on some of the green plan and on doing more for the people, especially the mothers. In a study done over a series of years, Inuit mothers were found to have high levels of PCBs in their breast milk. It is scary that some mothers decided that they would not feed their babies breast milk when it is still the best for the baby.

There was one instance where the mother was looking for alternatives to breast milk. It is a sad situation when mothers have to do that.

I urge the government to follow through and follow the advice of my colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic, and develop an environmental bill of rights so that we can feel that we are very much a part of the Canadian society and that people do listen to us.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this private member's motion. I certainly congratulate the hon. member on the spirit of the motion.

The enhancement and the protection of the natural environment is a goal to which this government and all members of this House are firmly committed. It is a goal that will require changes in the way we make decisions at all levels of society, as individuals in our lives at work and as governments.

We made the development of a comprehensive framework for better decisions on the environment a priority. That is why this government has developed an environmental action plan which it has called the green plan.

The government engaged in a series of very extensive consultations with Canadians in all segments of society. We started those consultations with a paper entitled: "A Framework for Discussion on the Environment". That paper outlined the government's proposed environmental framework and set out possible measures to deal with specific environmental issues. We asked Canadians to give us their vision on the government's suggested approach and to tell us whether they agreed with our proposed priorities.

A number of clear messages came out of those consultations. Despite the emergence of a number of major issues competing for attention such as the Constitution, the economy, native affairs and international developments, Canadians remained deeply concerned about the environment and felt that environmental quality actually is deteriorating.

Canadians are looking to their governments for leadership on this issue. People recognize that individuals have a key role to play. They are optimistic about our ability as a nation to solve our environmental problems if we work together.

In focusing on single issues, Canadians want action on a broad range of issues from global warming to toxins, to waste management, to parks and wildlife and of course to the north. Consistent with this, people attach a high priority to those activities linked to the solution of a number of environmental problems. For example, there was general emphasis on the importance of better science, information and education.

What Canadians were telling us in those consultations is consistent with what we now understand about the nature of our environment. That is that air, water and land are not separate entities but form integrated ecosystems which require systematic action across a broad front.

The green plan reflects both what we have heard from Canadians and the evolution of our own policy thinking. It takes a comprehensive approach, a co-ordinated package of action across a broad range of environmental issues from climate change to parks and wildlife. This corresponds to what Canadians want. Equally important it corresponds to what we know about our ecosystem and the linkages between issues.

The green plan reflects the importance we attach to taking action which helps us to address environmental issues across a broad front. For example, the green plan emphasizes better science to allow us to understand environmental problems and their solutions. It emphasizes better information so all Canadians can make more informed decisions and hold governments, industry and themselves more accountable. It also emphasizes better education leading to an environmentally literate population increasingly involved in making better environmental decisions.

The green plan is specific. It sets out explicit targets and schedules and commits to ongoing consultations and extensive environmental reporting. These are the green plan's goals in terms of the environment. However, they can only be achieved by changing how we behave toward nature. Hence the green plan focuses on environmental responsibility through better decision making.

The green plan empowers Canadians to make a difference in decision making at all levels. Through better environmental information and education, Canadians will be equipped to make informed judgments about the performance of industry. Through regular reporting on green plan progress, Canadians will be able to hold governments, business and each other accountable for their progress or lack of it.

Individuals are also empowered to protect the environment in federal legislation. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act, CEPA, gives extensive rights of public participation in decision making that affects the environment. CEPA also confers upon the public the power to take court action against a polluter who contravenes the act.

The green plan also recognizes the important role of the federal government in making good environmental decisions.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, to be proclaimed later this year, will ensure that all projects that require a federal decision are carefully assessed for their environmental implications.

Moreover, we have moved beyond the assessment of projects and since June 1990 have as a matter of government policy required that environmental impact assessments be made for all policy and program initiatives coming before cabinet for decisions.

Furthermore, our policy requires that a statement of the environmental implications of each policy or program be made public.

The green plan challenges all Canadians to make better environmental decisions. As a government we are prepared to lead by example. This is the way to effective protection and enhancement of the environment. It requires a change in behaviour at all levels of society. It requires a national co-ordinated strategy to provide people with the assurance that their individual activities are part of a co-ordinated approach to change.

Individuals, corporations, and governments need to know they can work together to make a difference.

Our government's priority is a broadly based attack on environmental degradation achieved by an environmentally literate society—one in which citizens are equipped with the knowledge, skills and values necessary for action—not piecemeal initiatives through the courts.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKay that Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Fulton (p. 15586).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands had seven minutes remaining.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to complete my remarks on this bill and to reinforce my opposition to this project, the fixed link in the Northumberland Strait.

My principal concern is the protection of the marine environment in the Northumberland Strait. This bridge will be constructed in the midst of a habitat which supports a $100 million a year fishery providing lobsters to North America and the world. It would also pass through one of the area's largest known scallop beds.

The bridge also threatens the physical and social environment of the island and the earning capacity of many diverse individuals and communities, including fishermen, ferry workers, retailers, food processors and tourist operators.

In 1988, the federal government promised that no bridge would ever be built without a full environmental assessment of the specific bridge design. That was its response to a number of concerns about a generic bridge design. Now, it seems to be pretending that an environmental management plan, a short, vague description of construction monitoring, is an environmental assessment. So much for the 1988 promise. So much for Canada's environmental credibility.

I want to go back to the federal environment assessment review process. When the federal government is involved in a major project which could affect the environment, the activity must undergo an environmental assessment and review process.

The Prince Edward Island bridge project was deemed to be such a project and the federal Environmental Assessment Review Office convened an independent six-member panel on April 28, 1989. Its mandate was to conduct a public review of three concept proposals for a bridge. It was never explained why a tunnel or improved ferry service were not considered as part of the publicly financed review.

The panel was asked to examine the environmental and socioeconomic effects of an imaginary bridge crossing without blueprints or actual design specifications. It was also asked to determine the possible effect of the construction operation and maintenance of the project and its associated facilities.

Public hearings were held in the three maritime provinces between March 12 and March 30, 1990. Over 1,500 people attended the 21 sessions. The intensity of public participation in the hearings gave credibility to a process that islanders initially viewed with some skepticism.

After that extensive public discussion as well as in depth technical and bureaucratic consultations, the FEARO panel released its final report in August, 1990. The panel unanimously rejected the generic concept of the bridge presented to it by Public Works. Its rejection was based on numerous significant concerns.

Let us understand what has happened. There was an environmental assessment of a generic bridge concept.

• (1250)

The panel recommended that the bridge project not proceed because of the following reasons: The potential impacts on marine ecosystems and agricultural microclimates arising from delayed spring ice-out; the risk of damage to near shore spawning grounds; the limited knowledge of the Northumberland Strait ecosystem making it difficult to predict impacts, monitor impacts, mitigate impacts and determine appropriate compensation to fishermen; incompatibility of the project with sustainable development; inadequate consideration of cumulative impacts; difficulties in finding socially acceptable solutions for displaced ferry workers and fishermen; inadequate consideration of the environmental and ecological impacts of the island on the predicted type of tourism and growth; and the need to resolve numerous land use issues in Prince Edward Island.

In conclusion the panel has noted there is a need for improved transportation service between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. After careful consideration, the panel concludes that the risk of harmful effects of the proposed bridge concept is unacceptable. The panel recommends therefore that the project not proceed.

What has this government done now? It has put forward an ice panel which refutes what the FEARO panel recommended. It is now trying to put forward and push this specific bridge concept ahead without environmental assessment. It is no wonder the people of Canada are cynical about the way this government operates.

I would also like to point out that there are considerations other than environmental. A Financial Post article of February 17 states:

> The federal government has not done the math to support building a bridge to Prince Edward Island.
> The September 1992 report by Halifax-based Gardner Pinfold Consulting Economists says a key 1987 economic feasibility assessment of a fixed crossing has several flaws.
> If economic viability is an important criterion for proceeding with the project, then it would be advisable to conduct a more rigorous analysis.

In conclusion, this bridge concept is not environmentally sound nor economically sound. It should be shelved until a full environmental impact assessment has been done on the particular project. Anything less is a repudiation of this government's own environmental assessment review process. It puts into doubt the whole environmental assessment review process put forward by this government.

I urge the House not to support Bill C-110.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-110 is the enabling legislation for a major infrastructure project that not only is immense in scale, but is also unique in its approach. This project is going to bring many benefits to the people of the maritimes, the Atlantic region. All provinces in the Atlantic region will benefit, but Prince Edward Island will in particular.

It is not just the people of the maritimes who will benefit. Taxpayers generally will benefit from this. What is not commonly understood across Canada is that it is a constitutional requirement that the federal government provide ongoing subsidy or support for the people of Prince Edward Island to maintain the service between the mainland and the island.

This is something that constitutionally will never cease as long as the ferry service continues. However, if the project proceeds that this legislation is dealing with, we have a situation where the ongoing cost of the ferry service will be maintained as a subsidy for 35 years. At that point in time the subsidy ceases.

Instead of the situation where for time immemorial the taxpayers of Canada will be required to maintain the ferry link between the mainland and Prince Edward Island it will in fact be fulfilled with the fixed link. There is another thing that is quite unique about this project that should be of interest to all taxpayers across Canada. It is not going to be funded in this case by the taxpayers of Canada. When they think of these major projects, they immediately perceive huge tax dollars being demanded of them. In fact, the tax dollars to support this will be those that are equivalent to what would have been paid out in the ferry service over the next 35 years.

This project will be funded, built and operated by three enterprises for the next 35 years. If we proceed successfully with this, there will be many people watching to see if this may be a framework for other major infrastructure programs. It is not just the taxpayers of Canada who will benefit. The users of the existing ferry service and the new fixed link will also benefit from it.

Something that is not commonly understood about this project is that the toll charges that will be paid by people who cross the link from the mainland to the island or vice versa will be fixed so that they cannot increase to anything greater than three quarters of the inflation factor. This means that generations to come in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will benefit from lower rates than they would otherwise experience. To put this in perspective, if over the last decade we had had an agreement that the ferry tolls could not increase by more than three quarters of the inflation rate then the current ferry rates would have increased by less than one third of what they actually increased. It is of significant benefit to those people who are habitual users of the service.

There are other economic benefits, those that will be returned primarily to those in the maritimes. I will refer to it as the Northumberland Strait one-two punch. Punch No. 1 is that construction of this massive project will create jobs and business opportunities starting immediately and continuing through the next four or five years.

Punch No. 2 will be that in the longer term, after the link is completed, it will enhance the province's growing tourism industry and result in cost efficiencies for agriculture and many other enterprises. Construction itself is expected to generate from 3,500 to 4,000 person years of employment over the next five years.

One condition stressed by Prince Edward Island and other Atlantic provinces was that maximum employment opportunities should and would accrue to the region as the project proceeds.

It is estimated that 95 per cent of the jobs will be supplied from within Canada and over 80 per cent of those jobs are expected to accrue to the Atlantic provinces. This will have a phenomenal impact on an area of Canada that is habitually hard-pressed and deserves this improved situation. For instance, it is estimated that the unemployment rate in Prince Edward Island will decrease by over 1.3 per cent, directly attributed to the fixed link. In all, the construction of the bridge will result in a direct expenditure of about $850 million. When the effects of respending that normally take place are figured into the economy of the island, the project will represent a stimulus to the Canadian economy in the order of $1.3 billion. There will be tremendous opportunities for businesses, not only in Prince Edward Island but in New Brunswick and, in fact, across the country. I think the principal beneficiaries, as I mentioned earlier, are going to be in the maritimes.

• (1300)

The selected bridge design means that almost 95 per cent of the construction materials and related services can be supplied from within Canada. Even more important to the people in the maritimes is that they expect 80 per cent of it can be provided by the local suppliers. That means that opportunities will be created for a range of products and services, including supplying cement, the aggregates of the steel, selling and leasing heavy equipment, fabricating and finishing reinforcing steel, the construction of roads leading to and from the fixed link and a whole variety of other services. Many of these services are ideal for smaller local-based companies.

The immediate response from Prince Edward Island in particular has been extremely positive. By the end of January, nearly 400 Prince Edward Island businesses had expressed interest in participating and most of them have shown that interest through the Prince Edward Island Business Development Agency.

A number of firms have already directly contacted the developer as well and the response there has also been positive.

One of the key requirements for the project is that the developer maximize the use of Atlantic Canada suppliers. In fact, SCI is currently preparing an industrial benefits plan which must be submitted to and approved by the federal government before the final contracts are assigned.

There is no doubt that this bridge construction will generate substantial immediate economic benefits for all of the maritime provinces and in fact for Canada. However, I would be remiss if we did not look further down the road. What are the long-term benefits that we see? When the bridge is in operation, there will be benefits and they will be substantial. The bridge will significantly reduce the amount of time taken to transport vehicles, passengers and goods between the two provinces. Crossing time will go from a current average of over one and a half hours to the neighbourhood of 15 minutes for crossing. This will provide an extremely important benefit to all of the users.

A factor of this crossing that I had not thought of until it was pointed out to me is that there is a very significant energy saving from the link. The energy consumption will be reduced to less than one-sixth of the amount that would be required if the ferries were still in operation. Of course many other sectors of the Prince Edward Island economy will be affected, in particular tourism.

Tourism is the province's second largest industry. It is expected to grow as a result of the relative ease of access. The bridge itself will become, like so many other major projects that have been built in North America, a destination. Tourists will come to see and to cross the bridge. This will draw visitors not just from Canada but from around the world.

Other major beneficiaries will be those industries that transport their goods from the island. Agriculture, fisheries and all the associated processing facilities will benefit by way of cost reductions, greater efficiency and, very important, improved reliability of delivery.

The Prince Edward Island trucking industry has gone on record with its forecast that it expects to save in the order of $10 million annually as a direct result of the bridge's construction.

There is no question that the economic arguments for proceeding with the link are strong and compelling. It represents a project that at absolute minimum cost to the taxpayer will bring both short and long-term benefits and hope for the renewal of the citizens of Canada's smallest province.

To be sure there are those islanders who oppose the project, fearing that the bridge will somehow change the province's way of life and its unique character. Similar concerns were expressed by the people of Cape Breton prior to the building of the Canso Causeway. Yet this region has seen no diminution of its distinctive character in the years since. Its tourism and other industries have clearly benefited.

The bridge will be a change to Prince Edward Island for sure, but my expectation is that it will be a change for the better.

I believe future generations of Prince Edward Island citizens will have reason to thank those who had the foresight and determination to press ahead with this great engineering undertaking.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the parliamentary secretary.

I know he was performing his function in his usual capable way and also that his riding is in British Columbia, which is on the other side of the continent. I listened with interest to many of his statements.

First, I would like to ask him a question about some of the concerns. In P.E.I. business is basically in favour of this move. The public has been divided. The referendum results were 60–40 in favour of a link, although not necessarily a bridge.

Let us look at the figures, which really give me concern. How can the parliamentary secretary stand there and say that the taxpayer is not going to be involved? The computed annual subsidy, which has been down to about $21 million a year, is estimated by Marine Atlantic to be $29 million over the 35–year period. Yet under this bill the Government of Canada is going to pay $42 million a year for that 35–year period. With the $29 million a year subsidy over 35 years we get a total subsidy of $1.05 billion. With the $42 million annual subsidy over a 35–year period we get a figure of $1.47 billion.

How can the parliamentary secretary and the government say that the Canadian taxpayer is not going to help the financing of this project? Why does the hon. parliamentary secretary keep saying, as the minister did when he opened the debate on this bill, that the cost of the project is going to be $800 million or $850 million? Those questions come first.

Second, I know the parliamentary secretary will be most aware, in view of recent news reports, of the Lions Gate Bridge in British Columbia. He talked about the great project of BOT: Build, own and then transfer back. This is a unique project. There has been no track history of this BOT, which is the jargon of build, own and transfer.

Let us assume that everything goes ahead and after 35 years it is transferred back to the government or the Canadian taxpayer who has helped foot the bill. Does the hon. parliamentary secretary not see the maintenance problems on a bridge over salt water?

A report this week said that there was an $18 million maintenance cost for the Lions Gate Bridge this year. He and I both know, having lived in British Columbia, that there is ongoing maintenance on bridges, especially over salt water. Is the Government of Canada going to get a 35–year old steel relic which the taxpayer paid for?

Regardless of all the interesting economic positives that he referred to on the island, how does the hon. parliamentary secretary rationalize what the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands said? She said that there was an environmental study commissioned in accordance with the Government of Canada's own laws.

There were hearings. However, as the parliamentary secretary must know, the summary and conclusions of the report mentioned by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands said that the admitted positives were outweighed by the negatives. The panel came out clearly and said not to proceed with the bridge.

It suggested more study of a tunnel or an improved ferry system so that the people of the island would still have their constitutional link.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I will try to cover all three points as quickly as possible.

I say the taxpayers will benefit because I sincerely believe they will. The ongoing costs of the ferry service are in the neighbourhood of $30 million or $32 million. If we are going to continue to provide the service the support of the federal government goes beyond the provision of the existing ferry link. There will be a time when new ferries must be built, and that is the responsibility of the federal government.

• (1310)

The subsidy is the long–term responsibility of the federal government, and it is calculated to be at $42 million a year. It is good for the taxpayer because the construction of the project will proceed on private enterprise funding. As the ferry service is removed the subsidy will be put into effect and will continue for 35 years.

That is the subsidy that the federal government would be responsible for anyway. We are providing the subsidy to fulfil the commitments we would have anyway. At the end of 35 years we would no longer have that commitment.

I say as a taxpayer of Canada, and as the member has pointed out as a taxpayer from the other part of the country, that is a good objective.

There are a number of differences from Lions Gate Bridge. If we had to go back to taking ferries across it would be untenable. A major difference in the design and structure is that the Lions Gate Bridge is steel. The bridge to Prince Edward Island is being designed to last at least 100 years and is a concrete structure. It will not be subject to the same kind of weather.

The third question concerned the panel. The panel did recommend against proceeding, based on the assumption that there was a longer than two-day delay in the ice. However, it said its position would be different if it could be achieved within the two days and it made a number of recommendations. Since that time the government, the contractors, and the provinces have been proceeding following those recommendations to a letter.

No project has had more ongoing environmental reviews. There continue to be reviews and if it is not environmentally sound the project will not go ahead.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary how the government can proceed without doing an environmental assessment on this specific proposal.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, there is an ongoing assessment. It started with the generic but it is done on every stage this project has undergone.

The environmental considerations have been examined along with it and continue to be reviewed. As one of the commentators from the maritimes has put it, if we took all of the material that has been studied, printed, published, and written about the fixed link over time there would be enough material to put a solid link across the strait.

There has been and continues to be serious environmental assessment made at each stage of this project.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this very important debate today, particularly in view of the fact that I am from New Brunswick, which is one of the provinces that will be directly involved in the construction of this very important structure.

Much has been said about the economic and other benefits that will accrue to Prince Edward Island. Much should be said about them because not only will there be economic benefits to Prince Edward Island but there will be a significant spin-off effect to the entire province of New Brunswick, the entire Atlantic region, and to Canada as a whole, as was mentioned by the hon. parliamentary secretary. I will attempt to deal with some of those matters.

I believe that the benefits are substantial and self-evident. However, we must look at the entire project on a much broader scale and come to terms with what it is going to mean to us as Canadians and to our reputation as a whole.

Canada has garnered an enviable reputation throughout the world for megaprojects on a grandiose scale. We only have to think of the SkyDome and the CN Tower in Toronto and now we will have this magnificent link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

From India to China to the Philippines Canadians have been involved in major projects such as dams, power generation installations, roads, telecommunication networks and so on. As a result we as Canadians have garnered a super reputation throughout the world for our capacity to be able to deal with projects of this nature and to complete them successfully.

It has brought about a significant amount of self-respect and international respect for Canadians for our ability to tackle large and challenging projects. Make no mistake, this link is big by any world standards.

What we are talking about in the Northumberland Strait bridge will be the largest bridge that will have ever been built in North America.

Let us take a look at some of the pieces of equipment to demonstrate the magnitude of what we are speaking about. The crane that will be used to put the pieces of this project together will be 325 feet in height. It will be one of the largest cranes that will ever have been built in the world.

The bridge will require 200,000 tonnes of cement, 53,000 tonnes of reinforcing steel and 130,000 tonnes of asphalt. It will be built in 183 separate parts. When it is completed this structure will be 10 times as long as San Francisco's famous Golden Gate Bridge. The project will be watched, it will be studied and it will be envied by engineering firms and governments around the world.

The Strait Crossing Incorporated is a Canadian firm which has already earned an international reputation in the design of bridges and other such structures. As it is being undertaken by a firm of such international reputation this will only serve to strengthen Canada's reputation for engineering excellence.

I believe people will come from all over the world, just as they have for the other projects we have undertaken in this country. I have already mentioned the SkyDome and the CN Tower.

I believe that people will come from far and wide to see what it is that we are doing once again here in Canada, which has contributed so substantially to our reputation.

There is something about bridges that catches the public imagination. It is true that people rarely write songs or write poetically about sewers or pipelines but bridges are different. They do catch the imagination of people. It has happened in the past. They have caught the fancy of poets, writers and singers from time immemorial.

Perhaps that is because bridges speak to the human aspirations of each of us in reaching out for unattainable goals and objectives. They break down the barriers that separate us and bring people closer together. When this bridge is completed there is no question it will take its place as one of the greatest bridges in the entire world and that it will be one of the great engineering undertakings of the late 20th century.

There is no question that there are some lingering concerns on the part of some of the people of Prince Edward Island. It is perfectly understandable that some people are concerned about what sort of effect this project will have on their lives and on their culture. These are natural concerns but by no means unique.

As a case in point I mention the bridge that connects Oland Island in Sweden with the mainland. This bridge crosses the Baltic Sea. Some 25 years ago this same type of controversy occurred in that particular community in Sweden. That bridge was eventually built and is the largest bridge in Europe, although it will be less than half the size of the Northumberland Strait Crossing. Nonetheless, as with the P.E.I. crossing, that bridge was talked about and argued about for decades before construction actually took place. There was a lot of passionate dissension about the ramifications of the bridge from some quarters before construction began, just as there has been in the case of the Northumberland Strait Crossing.

A Canadian government committee which studied the Oland bridge and a few other projects a few years ago found that it was virtually impossible to find anybody today on that island who is in disagreement with the fact that the project went ahead.

Any major commitment is to some extent a leap of faith. However this project has been carefully planned and carefully studied, and there has been a maximum of consultation with both the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island. I know the Government of New Brunswick has also been consulted. Most important, there has been a maximum of consultation with the public involved. It is a sound and economically viable project. It is a sound and economically sensible project.

As I mentioned when I began my remarks, I look forward to the economic spin-offs for the province of Prince Edward Island and the adjacent province of New Brunswick. I ran through some of the figures about the amount of cement and steel and things of that nature which will be put into this bridge. I mentioned the size of the crane. In the short term, let alone the long term, this means jobs which are vitally important to all of our economies, particularly to Prince Edward Island at this crucial time and New Brunswick.

I can only say that besides the obvious advantages of having an important transportation link finally take place, which has been talked about for a good many years and which will take place after an extensive and exhaustive examination of the details of any problems that might occur, we have been assured that the concerns about the project can be put aside. I am happy to support this bill.

Although it is not a bill about whether we should go ahead with the construction of the link but rather a bill that will put in place the mechanics so that we can deal with the financing that will be required, I am delighted that this government has taken the initiative to ensure that this will become a reality.

I want to express appreciation on behalf of the people of New Brunswick, who will be extremely pleased when they have the opportunity to take part in the actual construction phase. I know that the people of Prince Edward Island will echo those words. It is a project of the future and Canadians will benefit from it. It will happen in the very near future.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I listened with interest to the comments from my colleague, who is the chairman of the transport committee and a sailor of some note. I find it a bit disturbing that he is up in the House promoting a bridge that will replace a marine enterprise.

I want to raise with him the question of jobs. He will know that during the five-year construction phase of this bridge, should it come to be, roughly 1,000 jobs will be created. We heard the previous speaker talk about somewhere between 2,000 and 5,000 person-years of employment.

Can he explain why that is better than the 600 permanent maritime jobs that exist today for people on P.E.I. and in New Brunswick? Those jobs are going to be eliminated. Is he saying that it is more important to have 1,000 people working today for a short time than it is to have 600 people able to support their families not just for four years or five years but basically for a lifetime?

That is really the trade-off between these two. Is he saying that he supports the elimination of these 600 maritime jobs just so 1,000 construction workers can be employed for a little while?

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, the workers at Marine Atlantic will know, not only because of my fondness for maritime traditions and the sea but also because of the excellent service they and Marine Atlantic have given the residents of Prince Edward Island and the travelling public over the years, of the efforts that I have exerted on their behalf to ensure the continuity of those jobs.

I believe with substantial confidence that Marine Atlantic will work to ensure that a significant number of the 600 jobs the hon. member is referring to—although I am not certain that figure is not a little on the high side—will be assimilated into other phases and areas of the work place, either with Marine Atlantic or in the operation of the bridge after it is completed.

We are looking at the passing of an era. There is no question about that. What we are replacing it with is an opportunity for additional industry and additional infrastructure, whether it be in tourism or related areas either in Prince Edward Island or in New Brunswick. There will be the creation of an infrastructure to support the bridge. It is possible that an entirely new community may be developed just somewhat north of Cape Tormentine, which will also provide opportunities for additional jobs.

In the final analysis, if one did a model of the economic scale we would come to the conclusion that not only will the majority of the workers who the hon. member has expressed a concern for—and I know that concern to be genuine having served with him on the transport committee and know that he is very dedicated to the community that he represents—will not only be assimilated into new and exciting jobs and possibilities but that many more hundreds of jobs will become evident as we proceed with the project and the project becomes a reality.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to ask a question. I appreciate the hon. member's prowess on the high seas. I also know that he is a very real fiscal Conservative who really does not like to sugar-coat the public with a lot of false numbers when it comes to taxes and costs of projects.

I admit full well all the glowing things he said about the magnitude of the project, no one is denying that. Obviously many people on the island believe it is going to be an asset in terms of construction. Obviously it is going to provide jobs. Does he not think in this time of fiscal restraint, when the government is saying it does not have money for so many things that are laudable, that there is a little hocus-pocus going on here when there is almost a $220 million difference between the subsidy that is going to this private enterprise and the cost to the ferries?

He is the chairman of the transport committee. I have certainly had experience on that committee. The average is anywhere from $21 million to $29 million and it has been going down. The average now is $29 million and yet the subsidy is going to be $42 million for 35 years. Without getting into the subsidy, I would like him to state what it means in terms of his taxpayers and to come clean on this thing. Part of my problem with this project is the sugar-coating of the real costs and the fact that the public taxpayer is going to be involved, not only in the construction but in a continuing way.

The minister who introduced the bill said that it was an $800 million project. The parliamentary secretary said today that it was an $850 million project. I would like to remind the hon. member, since I imagine he is aware of the study of 1987, that Woods Gordon said that the project was going to cost $1.3 billion. Does the member honestly think that the costs of a project from six years ago are going to go down? Why are we concentrating on $800 million to $850 million for the project? The main study that justified this approach in 1987 from Woods Gordon, and I can give the quote which I hope to do when I make my speech, estimated that it was going to $1,311 million.

If we are going to face facts and be realistic with Canadians, let us not tell them that it is not going to cost any money. How can you say it is not going to cost any money when you do not agree that there is such an error in the estimate of the cost of the project?

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, there was a lot of substance in what the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants asked. Since I can no longer see a clock opposite me, I am not certain I have time to answer everything that was asked. I will seek your guidance as to just how much time I have to deal with it.

To begin with, I have no reason to doubt that the figures that have been projected as the final costs by the firm that has put together the bid on this project will indeed be the final costs.

I have already expressed to the House how pleased I am that this engineering firm of international stature was the consortium that was successful in having its bid to construct this megaproject accepted by the federal government. This did not come about overnight nor did it come without a substantial amount of study and investigation on the part of the people responsible for the fiscal purse.

I think we have to hearken back to the comments that were made by the parliamentary secretary when he reminded the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants that not only must we take into account the annual subsidies that are paid for the ferry crossing, but we must take into account the capitalization of those particular pieces of infrastructure that are in place, including the docking facilities, wharfage, the vessels and any other infrastructure that is currently required such as the toll booths and the parking areas, all of which require not only maintenance but replacement sooner rather than later. We are not talking about penny-ante stuff here. We are talking about replacement of a vessel which is going to cost tens of millions of dollars. Over a period of 35 years, forgetting about the built-in guarantees that are not only held in performance bonds that are required by the contractor but actual cash that is in the kitty, this particular infrastructure not only will be maintained and operated for the amount of dollars that they suggest they are going to be, but at the end of the 35 year period will be passed over to the taxpayers of this country with a guarantee that the condition will be substantial enough to carry it through to the 100-year peak.

The hon. member is absolutely correct. I am concerned. I am a fiscal Conservative. I feel that in the total picture of things this is going to be a boon for the taxpayers rather than a burden.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to speak at second reading of this bill today. I do so because of a strong belief that what this government is doing is wrong. That is a belief that is based not just on my assessment as a transport critic for my caucus, but is based on discussions I have had with people in P.E.I., the New Democratic Party on the island, friends of the island, labour leaders and others who are really concerned about a number of elements of this proposal.

Let me put this into a very personal context. A moment ago I raised with the chairman of the transport committee the question of jobs. When we talk about jobs, it seems like it is sort of a broad label. We do not talk about Joe Smith or Mary Smith by name. Let me bring it down to a local level.

In terms of the marine Atlantic employment on P.E.I., here are the communities and here is the payroll. It is the impact on these communities, not just at the funnel where the bridge will go but throughout the community.

Wilmot has 14 workers with a payroll of $436,000. Wellington has 11 workers with a payroll of $432,000. Summerside has 89 workers with a payroll of $2.6 million. St. Eleanors has 30 workers with a payroll of $895,000. Miscouche has 13 workers with a payroll of $513,000. Kinkora has 26 workers with a payroll of $750,000. Kensington has 19 workers with a payroll of $646,000. Crapaud has 14 workers with a payroll of $513,000. Cornwall has 29 workers with a payroll of $1,037,000. Charlottetown has 42 workers with a payroll of $1.4 million and Borden has 115 workers and their families with a payroll of $3 million.

That puts it into context. These are real people and real communities. They are going to lose their jobs because they are not construction workers. While some may currently be employed in the collection of cash and the selling of tickets and may logically move into employment with the bridge operator, I know of nothing that is written in ink and signed by lawyers and verified, no legal proof that guarantees any of these jobs for the current workers.

Certainly on the fishery side, even though there is talk about some kind of fund—a figure of $10 million has been used—there is no guarantee that will work or that there will be anything for them to do if the fishery is destroyed.

Let us take a look at the numbers. I want to run through them again. The estimates we have heard in this House and elsewhere suggest that on the construction side we have a five year period when the work will proceed, anywhere from 2,000, 3,000 to 5,000 person-years of employment, or roughly working out to 1,000 construction jobs. Clearly there are spin-off jobs as well because the suppliers of steel, gravel and concrete all have part of that. Quite frankly I am not sure if that is included in the 1,000 or if it is over and above the 1,000.

Compare that to what exists today: somewhere in the range of between 500 and 600 ferry workers, good paying jobs, union jobs primarily but also some non-union jobs, jobs that have kept those people and their families alive, jobs that they were thinking about retiring from, whether it is in 5 years, 10 years or 20 years, depending on where you are on the seniority list. If this project goes through, they are gone. We know that the unemployment rate on P.E.I. is one of the higher ones in our provinces, so on one hand we can understand why government, whether it is the federal government or the provincial government of P.E.I., is looking for employment opportunities. That is what we are here for, to try and assist in the development of greater opportunities for people to work.

What we are seeing with this project is that those permanent jobs are going. They are out the door. They are over the side. There will be some temporary replacements over five years for the construction. I do not know what the numbers are for the operating side, but I would suspect it is not 600. I would suspect it is not 500, not 400. Perhaps in committee that is one of the things we can get answered so that we can have everything on the table and know what we are dealing with.

P.E.I. itself is not going to be the great beneficiary of those construction jobs. The estimates I have seen show a range of 9 per cent to 35 per cent of those construction jobs going to residents of P.E.I. The rest one would assume would start in New Brunswick, but also elsewhere in Atlantic Canada, and who knows where else in Canada those jobs will go. Quite frankly, there will be people who want those jobs because people are hurting out there.

P.E.I. is not going to be the beneficiary to the same degree as other parts of the country. That is the job side. I have not even touched the fisheries workers and the impact on them and the numbers and the families. Nor have I touched on the environment. My colleagues who have spoken before me have dealt with those issues, so I am going to deal with other aspects of the process.

Let us take a look at the dollars and cents. We have had some questions and answers about that already, but let me put it in the context of what they are paying now and what we are going to be paid if this project goes forward.

Currently the cost of operating the ferries is around $41 million. About $17 million of that comes from fares. That is what the people who use the ferries pay to transport themselves and their vehicle across the strait.

The taxpayers' subsidy is roughly $24 million. Quite frankly, Marine Atlantic has done very well in terms of reducing the level of subsidy. In 1988, for example, it was $24.4 million. In 1989 it was down to $22.6 million. In 1990 it was back up slightly, to $23.8 million.

Revenues are moving up very well. In 1988 total fare revenues for both services were $13.9 million. They moved up to $15.1 million in 1989, and by 1990 they were at $17.1 million for a total cost of $40.9 million. Marine Atlantic was doing very well in raising their revenues.

We have $24 million from the federal government and $17 million from the passengers, for a total of $41 million. This proposal for the fixed link for the bridge will require, we are told, in addition to the private capital an ongoing operating subsidy from the federal government of $42 million a year for the next 35 years.

The parliamentary secretary talked about how in the long term that was going to save money. Even though we are going to be paying out more, in fact we are going to be paying out the equivalent of the amount that the users of the ferry are paying now, an additional $17 million a year, at the end of the 35 years that subsidy will stop. I assume that is when the bridge will become ours, that is the taxpayers of Canada, as part of the BOT that my friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants was talking about. That is one way to look at it.

Currently for those 35 years we are going to be paying out an extra $600 million. We are going to save money by spending $600 million more. That is an interesting perspective. If we were to keep the ferries in operation, that $600 million would provide another 17 years of subsidy, assuming the same level, on top of 35 years.

I do not expect to be here in another 50-odd years but that money would provide ferry services to Prince Edward Island beyond my lifetime.

The other aspect of this financing, and it was mentioned again in some of the government's speeches, is that you have to re-equip. It is an aging fleet and at some point we have to replace those ferries. Friends of the Island would argue we should be adding to the fleet right now to improve service, eliminate line-ups and delays. Those are some of the economic negatives of the current system.

It has been calculated that if we replace the equipment now because of the 35-year life span, the subsidy would only go up to $25 million a year assuming we bought offshore from Korea, Brazil or Japan. Unfortunately there are not many places left in Canada where we build ships and certainly the vast majority of the ships we build are government sponsored ships. It would be $1.2 million extra because it would be amortized over the 35-year pay-back period. If we were able to produce the ship in Canada the subsidy required would be $28.5 million.

It would cost more, but a $28.5 million subsidy is still a lot less than a $42 million subsidy which this government is prepared to pay for the next 35 years to provide a fixed link to Prince Edward Island. That does not include what it is going to cost us when we accept responsibility for the bridge.

There was some dialogue back and forth that this is a concrete, not steel bridge and therefore one cannot compare it to others. In one of my previous occupations I was a construction inspector for the Ontario Department of Highways. I supervised the construction of bridges. I did the concrete. I did the steel.

I was involved in supervising the building of a bridge in Thunder Bay which was completed around 1968-69, roughly 22 years ago. For the last two years they have been pulling off the old concrete. They have been replacing the walls along the side and have redone the deck. Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? The road salt in Thunder Bay ate away at the concrete and reinforcing steel. That is after 21 or 22 years over fresh water.

What is the cost going to be to the taxpayer 35 years from now for a bridge that has been operated by those in the private sector? They will minimize as much as possible the maintenance they do, particularly the structural maintenance, because they know in another 5 or 10 years it will not be their problem any more. They are going to give short shrift to any replacement of the abutment walls, guardrails or driving surface and the taxpayers will be stuck with the tab.

We cannot just look at the dollars and cents today. It is our job to anticipate the future costs to the taxpayers. That is what we are elected to do. If we do not look at that, or if we turn a blind eye to it and say: "let us go for it, we need a quick fix, we need a quick pre-election hit in terms of jobs in P.E.I., New Brunswick and elsewhere", then we are selling the taxpayers short.

At the same time and perhaps it is not so much for me to say as someone who comes from P.E.I., but I think a fixed link to Prince Edward Island will change that island.

There are the psychological and sociological implications; the raison d'etre of P.E.I. and the lifestyle. There is a transition and whether one flies in or goes by ferry, there is not the rushing in there on four wheels with the intensity we find elsewhere in Canada.

I have been to P.E.I. a number times. It is quite a remarkable part of this country. I think a fixed link will destroy that. Only time will tell what P.E.I. will become, but it will never be the same. We have to recognize that too. As one letter to the editor suggested: "Do not forget, there is a reason why it is called Prince Edward Island". We have to be cognizant of that.

The plebiscite was held and slightly more than 50 per cent voted in favour of a fixed link. They did not vote in favour of a bridge. They did not vote in favour of a tunnel. They voted in favour of some kind of fixed link.

My community had a similar experience in terms of how plebiscites can be used for the purposes for which they are designed and that is to get your own way. Back in 1969 the province of Ontario forced the amalgamation of the former cities of Port Arthur, Fort William, Neebing and McIntyre. We had a plebiscite to change the name. That is much different and much less important than whether or not there is a bridge between P.E.I. and New Brunswick but I think the example stands.

We had a choice between Lakehead, The Lakehead and Thunder Bay. As this House knows, if there are three elements in an election the result is a split vote. More people voted for a combination of Lakehead and The Lakehead than Thunder Bay, but Thunder Bay was the top of the list and that is our name.

In the same way, the plebiscite that was put out was ambiguous. It did not say: "Are you in favour of a bridge? Are you in favour of a tunnel? Are you against any form of fixed link?" That would have been the fair way.

Prince Edward Island New Democrats have continued to call for a second plebiscite to see whether or not there is support for the bridge type of a fixed link. I suspect the vast majority in that province would say no to it.

It is extremely important that the committee hear witnesses. It is unusual for a legislative committee, but we have a moral responsibility to the people of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick to have committee meetings in those provinces. It is their way of life. Regardless of what I may think or of what I may feel it is going to affect them. It is not going to affect me in Thunder Bay. The committee has a responsibility to hold public hearings on the island and in New Brunswick so we can hear both sides of the question. Then we can come back to Ottawa and deal with the question of the legislation itself and any amendments required that affect whether or not it is passed through this House.

It is an important issue. I believe this House has a responsibility to follow through in that way. I also believe this House has a responsibility to say no to this bill, vote it down when it comes up for a vote tonight and make sure we put an end to this idea once and for all.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure for me to take part in this debate. I have been waiting for this debate for many years.

Bill C-110 provides the authority to enter into agreements and provides financing agreements to allow the fixed link to go ahead between the province of New Brunswick and the province of Prince Edward Island.

I have an unique perspective on this because I live exactly at the intersection between the province of Prince Edward Island, the province of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick. I have relatives, friends and business acquaintances in each province and I often deal back and forth. I am very much affected by interprovincial trade barriers.

The Northumberland Strait is probably the biggest interprovincial trade barrier we have in the maritime provinces.

Many people consider this fixed link as a stand alone project. In my view as an Atlantic Canadian member of Parliament who is very much committed to Atlantic Canada and believes in it, we cannot compete. We can never pull ourselves up to take part in the strength of the Canadian economy without a proper transportation system. The proper transportation system must include a fixed link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

I would like to ask members to think about something. On one side of the Northumberland Strait is Prince Edward Island and on the other side is New Brunswick. They both share the same work ethic. They both have the same resources available and the same opportunities.

On one side of that body of water in Prince Edward Island, the unemployment rate is 16.2 per cent. On the New Brunswick side of that body of water it is 12.1 per cent. The only difference is a transportation handicap for P.E.I.

I hear some members talking about jobs lost on the ferries and competing with jobs during construction. To me that is just the tip of the iceberg. The jobs lost because P.E.I. is not competitive are in the thousands, not in the hundreds.

We talk about hundreds of ferry workers and hundreds of fixed link workers but the fact is that with an unemployment rate of 16.2 per cent P.E.I. has thousands of unemployed it would not have if its people had the same opportunities as those of New Brunswick. As an over-all concept and project for Atlantic Canada it is an integral part of our transportation system.

I compared the unemployment rate in P.E.I. with the unemployment rate in New Brunswick and it is just going to get worse. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have identified transportation, and specifically highway construction as the most important economic development tool we have.

Put aside all economic development incentives, regional development programs and everything else. If we in Atlantic Canada do not have a viable transportation system we will not achieve our goals no matter how much money is put into our area. Without transportation we cannot compete.

Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have acknowledged that. They have made every effort and are going to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on our TransCanada highway. If P.E.I. is left isolated without the fixed link, it will just slip further behind. Instead of having an unemployment rate difference between 16.1 per cent and 12.1 per cent, it will get even worse as the economies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick improve.

Of all the three maritime provinces, P.E.I. has the lowest average income. The only province with a higher unemployment rate and lower average income has longer ferries, and that is Newfoundland. Perhaps there is some connection between the length of ferries, unemployment rates and average income.

For P.E.I. to become part of our economy and take its appropriate place we must have a fixed link. The fixed link is just a part of our total approach to transportation. We spend a lot of time here asking the federal government to help finance highways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick because we know that is where our future is.

Without the fixed link as an integral part of our area we will not have the transportation system we need to go into the coming decades with global competition the way it is.

As a business person in Atlantic Canada living right at the intersection of the three provinces, I can attest to the handicap because of the ferry system. Maybe the ferry system is the best in the world but it still means hours and hours of delay if one is shipping a product or on a service call. It means inconsistency mostly.

Many people say it takes an hour to catch a ferry but that is not the case. Often people will wait three or four hours. If someone is trying to compete by shipping products or providing a service there is inconsistency and potential delays.

I talked to a major manufacturer's representative from central Canada this summer. He had approached me about a project in regional development and was visiting all three maritime provinces. He had just come from Prince Edward Island and had been caught in one of those line-ups at the ferries.

Without assessing it or talking to the provincial authorities or anyone, he knew he could not compete if he had to face that transportation handicap. He left the island without even a consultation and visited New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I predict that he will set up a manufacturing facility in one of those areas. It was the transportation link handicap between New Brunswick and P.E.I. that drove him away.

In summary, certainly for the economy of Atlantic Canada we must have an up-to-date, modern transportation system throughout the whole region, and that includes a fixed link as an integral part.

I want to address some of the environmental issues that have been raised by other members. An environmental study on this particular design was requested a few moments ago by another member. If I am not mistaken, there have been seven environmental studies performed on this project. The major environmental study—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but it being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

BUDGET OF MEMBER FOR ABITIBI

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, early this month I was advised in writing by the House of Commons that my main budget for 1993-94 would be increased by 3.16 per cent, pursuant to the economic and fiscal statement made on December 2, 1992 by the Minister of Finance. This represents an increase of $5,290 which I refuse to accept, speaking on behalf of Canadian taxpayers.

According to the notes on Bill C-113 provided by the Department of Employment and Immigration the purpose of these amendments is to limit unemployment insurance spending to an amount equal to 57 per cent of weekly earnings, in other words, a cut of 3 per cent for Canadian workers.

The purpose of my decision today is to limit my spending for the sake of Canadian taxpayers.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, a report by Le Journal de Montréal today projects a loss of $490 million for the Montreal area economy alone between 1990 and 1994 from this government's legislative changes to unemployment insurance. This loss of purchasing power is devastating to small business, creating a spin-off of job losses that will be most severe for women and young people.

The minister suggests that cutting UI benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and depriving anyone who has quit or been fired from receiving benefits will save the taxpayer money.

The government had better wake up to the fact that the taxpayer will actually pay more if these ill-conceived cuts to UI are not withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 the House debated a motion that would have allowed the state to use capital punishment. I voted in favour of the motion because I believed that the state should have the option to execute anyone convicted of first degree murder. Today my position remains the same.

The present law provides that anyone convicted of first degree murder will be sentenced to life imprisonment without parole for 25 years. However, it is troubling that a person convicted of several first degree murders is also eligible for parole after only 25 years.

Therefore I call upon the government to bring forward amendments to the Criminal Code that will ensure anyone found guilty of more than one first degree murder charge will serve a minimum of 25 years for each conviction and that all first degree murder sentences will be ineligible for judicial review.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post seems to have lost its sense of why it exists. Service to Canadians has always been and should continue to be the primary function of this Crown corporation.

However, the latest misguided practice announced by Canada Post leads Canadians to believe that corporation's drive for profits has pushed aside common sense. If a letter is mailed to the wrong address Canada Post will not permit Canadians to simply alter the address and send it along. Instead, we are to pay for a new envelope and a 43-cent stamp to redirect the letter or the letter could be returned to the sender.

If Canada Post showed common sense it would permit delivery to the correct address rather than going back to the sender. There would be no difference in the cost regardless of the letter's destination. Current policies are being designed to fleece Canadians, not to serve them.

TREATMENT OF CARDIOVASCULAR DISEASE

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, February is heart month. Three million Canadians suffer from cardiovascular disease. Every year, about 75,000 Canadians die as a result of heart disease or a stroke.

This government is proud of the fact that Canadian scientists have led the way in the progress that has been achieved in the treatment of cardiovascular disease. Thanks to their discoveries and improvements in preventive care, the percentage of deaths due to heart disease and strokes among Canadians under 65 has dropped by 36 per cent since 1955.

Under its national health research and development Program, the Department of National Health and Welfare funds the heart health initiative launched with provincial governments and other partners, including the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada and volunteer and professional organizations in the health sector. The federal government will spend nearly $13 million on this initiative over five years.

Furthermore, during the past five years the Medical Research Council has awarded about $79 million for cardiovascular research.

There are still major challenges to be met, since this type of disease is the main cause of death in Canada. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will join me in wishing them good luck during heart month.

RADIATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention by one of my constituents that the Government of Sweden is now developing new regulations for radiation exposure which are expected to be between two and ten milligauss. This came about as a result of studies which found that children exposed to a field of two milligauss from power lines have a threefold increase in their cancer risk, while children exposed to three milligauss have a fourfold increase in their risk of cancer.

In another study carried out in Denmark it was found that people exposed to three milligauss are 64 per cent more likely to develop leukaemia.

In summary, the evidence revealed that chronic exposure to weak electromagnetic fields of two to three milligauss may cause fatal sickness.

At present the Government of Canada uses a set of guidelines developed by the International Radiation Protection Association of 1,000 milligauss for public exposure and 5,000 milligauss for occupational exposure.

Without commenting on the merit of the European studies, I am calling on the government to examine these findings and, if needed, to develop new radiation standards to ensure the protection of our citizens.

GOODYEAR

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, jobs, jobs, jobs. Over 550 new jobs have been created since 1990 at Goodyear in Napanee. These are high-tech, well-paid jobs, created to supply state of the art automotive tires to North American and European markets.

Goodyear would like to expand its facility creating up to another 450 jobs. This new expansion is being threatened due to the high cost of electricity which has increased over 40 per cent in the past four years. This increase in electrical rates not only affects our competitive position to export but also threatens all small businesses and places serious burdens on home owners.

I urge the Government of Ontario and its Crown corporation, Ontario Hydro, to honour the verbal agreement and forecasts made to Goodyear that rates would not increase past the rate of inflation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as the implementation of the North American free trade agreement grows nearer this government's blarney blossoms like a wild flower. In fact if the collective noses of the Tory cabinet were to grow like Pinocchio's there would be no need for the fixed link to P.E.I.

A cursory cosy review done by internal federal bureaucrats is now hailed as a full environmental assessment. Wrong. The language of the NAFTA is now claiming to guarantee that countries will not lower environmental standards to attract investment. Wrong. In the latest twist, environmental regulations are being reviewed to ensure that they will not hinder trade or do not exceed those of our other trading partners. In short, get out of the way we are levelling the playing field.

Incredibly the regulations under review cover such sensitive areas as ozone depleting substances, transportation and storage of hazardous chemicals, pulp mill effluent and ocean dumping.

This government has fundamentally failed to understand the concerns of average Canadians, people who are looking for increased safety and health regulations, not the abandonment of our air, land and water to a dangerous chemical cocktail.

BILL S-8

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, because of a presentation in my riding I missed the debate on Bill S-8. I would like to put some concerns on record about it.

Bill S-8 does not address the double standard applied to motor vehicles in Canada, depending on whether the car came through the American system or the Canadian system. Essentially a Canadian car meets the Canadian standard and U.S. cars must meet the American standard with some upgrades, but they are not the same.

In principle I do not think Americans should be allowed to sell products in Canada that Canadians are restricted from selling by law. From a consumer's standpoint the result will be a diluted and inconsistent safety recall notice procedure. From a competitiveness point of view the Canadian car industry is required to meet more expensive standards than its competition from the U.S. I will be working to establish one safety standard for vehicles in Canada, no matter where they came from, through contacts in the Department of Transport.

CANADA POST

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Don Lander, president of Canada Post Corporation at a salary of almost $300,000 a year, has found yet another new way to infuriate Canadians when it comes to the delivery of mail.

Canada Post says that if a letter is delivered to you in error it is now your responsibility to place it in a new envelope, re-address it, pay for the stamp, and put it back in the mail.

The hon. member for South Shore makes the following statement:

> It is nonsense. It is an outrage with which Canadians will simply not put up, nor should they. This measure will not result in Canada Post getting its revenues in order. It will simply result in a lot of mail being thrown out that should be delivered.

I agree with my colleague opposite. This proposal should now be redirected to the garbage bin or, to quote a minister's look-alike, returned to sender.

JUSTICE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my constituents are concerned about the safety of their communities. Like many Canadians they have lost faith in the criminal justice system. They believe that it places the rights of offenders above the protection of society.

S. O. 31

The Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General are to be commended for the parole reforms which they have initiated. Praise for these reforms comes from many sources including my constituents.

Most first-time non-violent offenders respond well to rehabilitation and reintegrate fully into society. My constituents' concern however is about the violent, repeat and sexual offenders. Occasionally an offender is released from prison even though corrections officials know the offender is still dangerous to society.

I urge the Solicitor General to pursue actively the option of keeping designated dangerous offenders in prison beyond the end of their sentences and expanding the definition and use of serious harm provisions.

This solution would protect the public from those very few truly dangerous individuals who simply cannot be rehabilitated.

GRANTS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the city of Sudbury has passed a resolution requesting that the federal government reverse its decision to freeze grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities.

Canadian municipalities are crying foul over this government's back door approach to passing on debt time and time again.

The federal government has arbitrarily and without consultation decided to freeze these grants at 1992 levels and has proposed to amend the formula for calculating these grants.

As a result the city of Sudbury along with all other Canadian municipalities is faced with a combined loss of $80 million in the next two years, which will show up as a savings on the federal books.

One level of government cannot pride itself on tackling the debt by passing it on to another level whenever it suits it. Canadian debt is owed by all Canadians no matter at what level. It is time this government took responsibility for its share of the debt and co-operated with all other levels of government to deal with the serious problem of the total level of debt we face as Canadians.

THE RIGHT HON. MEMBER FOR YELLOWHEAD

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents from Cariboo—Chilcotin I want to pay tribute to a truly great Canadian.

I recall the first time I met Joe Clark back in the early 1970s on one of his several visits to the Cariboo. We stood together leaning over the snake fence that surrounded the stampede grounds. That conversation was the first of many, and the more I got to know my colleague the more I came to respect him.

Joe Clark is a man whose love of his country has earned him respect from coast to coast, but it goes beyond his love of country. In an era where nearly all politicians are held in low esteem Joe Clark has been one politician who is seen by the people of Canada as having retained his honesty and integrity.

Joe Clark will be missed by his colleagues on the Hill and he will be equally missed by the many Canadians whose lives he has touched. The people of Cariboo—Chilcotin wish him well.

EXPORTS

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to challenge the government's phantom increase in merchandise exports to the United States.

The government claims that our merchandise exports to the United States have risen 11 per cent and this is the greatest surge in exports since 1984.

I cannot help but notice that the Canadian dollar dropped in value relative to the U.S. currency by 10 per cent, more than any single year since the 1970s.

This of course means that a Canadian product sold in American markets and in U.S. dollars brought 10 per cent more in Canadian in December 1992 than it did in December 1991. A Canadian exporter can realize a 10 per cent increase in sales value without any increase in sales volume.

This kind of export increase means no increase in jobs or standard of living for Canadians. While these export increases are phantoms the job losses, the business closures and the capital flight have been all too real for millions of Canadians. While we cannot blame all of Canada's woes on free trade, we can observe that while Canada is not working neither is free trade, nor are the Tory and Liberal parties that embrace it.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents have written to me concerning the sales of so-called serial killer cards. These cards are allowed into Canada. They object strongly to the distribution of them.

Card collecting has been a pastime for young people for decades, but killer cards salute and extol those who inflict pain and death. Many Canadians consider these cards to be potentially harmful to the development of their children.

I wrote to the Minister of National Revenue on this issue and was greatly disappointed today to receive a letter in which he says that only one of three series of killer cards examined by his department meet the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada in terms of obscenity and will be banned.

I urge the government to review the legislation which is obviously out of date so that it will reflect the majority view that these killer cards are obscene and should be banned from importation into Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, our trade figures for 1992 are out and they look pretty good. In fact, they are so good they should be placed on the record.

As reported in Friday's front page article in The Financial Post, exports reached an all-time high in 1992, $157 billion, an increase of 11 per cent over 1991.

As well, our exports to the United States are up, as is our trade surplus with the United States. In fact, our over-all trade surplus increased by $1.8 billion over 1991 and the numbers are looking even better for this year.

I think our policies are working.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. According to an independent study obtained by the Mouvement action-chômage and done for the City of Montreal, the combined effects of the two reforms to unemployment insurance by this government in 1990 and 1993 will deprive Montreal's economy of over $490 million. Once again, the government is putting the burden of the debt on the unemployed and the least fortunate.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister justify taking nearly $500 million from the economy of a region which has 225,000 jobless and where the unemployment rate is over 14 per cent?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have not had an opportunity to examine the study to which the hon. member is referring. I suppose that the alternative is to ask the question differently. How much does it cost Montreal taxpayers to have their unemployment insurance premiums frozen? How much does it cost Montreal taxpayers to save, thanks to the measures announced by my colleague, on the additional UI premiums that they would have had to pay in 1993 for more beneficiaries or an extra payment charge?

All these measures benefit not only Montrealers but the whole province of Quebec and other parts of Canada. I know that the member does not care about the tax rate people pay or the national debt, but many Canadians and Montrealers do care.

An hon. member: That's false.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister may be forgetting that in 1990, his government withdrew from funding unemployment insurance, with Bill C-21, leaving the system with a shortfall of over $2 billion.

I would like to ask him the following question: How does he think he will revive Montreal's economy when he withdraws almost half a billion dollars just in unemployment insurance? How will he help Montreal's economy recover?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Liberal Party of Canada surely cannot agree on this point because he is arguing the opposite. They think that economic renewal would require treating a world-wide recession affecting all countries in the world as they dealt with the 1981–82 recession, with interest rates at 22 per cent, a galloping debt and a higher unemployment rate than today. That is the Liberal Party's recipe. Interest rates of 22 per cent do very little to help small businesses and companies in Montreal create jobs and we have rejected that recipe for the sake of Montrealers.

• (1420)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, according to an independent study commissioned by the city of Montreal, the combined effect of the government's reform of the unemployment insurance program will deprive Montreal of $490 million.

Assuming the government has already examined the effects of its own legislation, can the minister of employment tell us how much money is being removed from the economy of Toronto or other major cities concerning this legislation? Major cities and urban centres have a lot of unemployed people. How much money is this government taking away from the urban economy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Whether the question is in English or in French, the answer is the same, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

How can we ensure that the small business sector in Canada will be allowed to create jobs without an increase in taxes in 1993, by freezing premiums, by giving them a tax credit for those unemployment charges in 1993? How could we spend $260 million more to train unemployed people in urban centres in Canada? How could we target $300 million out of the UI account to help displaced workers in this country?

Well, there was an alternative: Increase the deficit or tax the people more, the recipe of the Liberal Party which we have rejected.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind this minister that it is not the government's money that is being spent; it is the people's money that is being spent.

Montreal has been called the capital of urban unemployment in Canada. There are 250,000 people out of work. Women and young people are the hardest hit in the economy and touched by this government's trickle-down policies.

How can this government defend $490 million taken out of the unemployment insurance fund when young people and women want a chance to work? What do you answer them with your trickle-down policy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not even funny. When we had the free trade debate, they were talking about Americanizing the Canadian way of life. They heard the term trickle-down in the United States and are now using it in Canada. This is the Liberal Party.

Creating jobs in this country is done every day by the private sector. With the economic policy of the government and the measures put forward, how can we best ensure that the unemployed reintegrate into the labour market? By training them.

We are spending $3.8 billion of taxpayers' money to retrain Canadians, a move that was opposed all the way by the Liberal Party of Canada.

Stand up and be honest with the people. Tell us where you stand on UI activation.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that answer makes me quite sick and the people of Canada are sick and tired of a government that will not answer for its policies that are creating the kind of situation we presently find in Montreal.

I will tell you that we have a chilling picture of 250,000 people in Montreal out of work and you have taken $490 million—

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members feel very strongly about these matters. I would ask hon. members to put their questions and their answers through the Chair.

Mrs. Finestone: My question is: Will this minister please go to the east end of Montreal and see the poverty? Will he go to Côte-des-Neiges and see the desperation? Will he go to the food banks and see the hunger? Will the minister and this government put back into the economy $490 million and put Canadian men, women and children, particularly in Montreal, back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, how seriously can we take the Liberal Party of Canada now talking about unemployment in Montreal when, for example, on a measure by which they were sure to see hundreds of millions of dollars invested in Montreal to create jobs—I am talking about the pharmaceutical bill—they opposed it all the way?

How can she stand here today and argue that we are not helping the unemployed when we know, Canadians know and in eastern Montreal they know that how to best help them is to give them training and programs that will help them reintegrate into the labour market.

When we tried to increase the amount of taxpayers' dollars to help them reintegrate into the labour market, it was opposed by Liberals all the way. I think the hon. member should look at what is being done.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In its latest economic statement, the government accepted an unemployment rate of 11 per cent, a rising deficit and slow growth.

We know that unemployment costs dearly and that the only way for the economy to recover is to put people to work. That is fundamental. Can the government say how much it costs to keep unemployment at 11 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not indicate I was satisfied with an unemployment rate of 11 per cent. We have to be realistic about what is going on here.

We are not only coming out of an economic downturn, we are going through a massive economic restructuring as a result of the changing world economy. While the employment figures are not as robust as I am sure the hon. member or I would like to see, the facts still remain that some 161,000 new jobs have been created since August. We have had employment growth in eight out of the nine last months.

What I find rather strange is that the proposal of the hon. leader of the NDP would reduce job opportunities because there is the suggestion that Canada can withdraw into isolationism without trading with other nations. The NDP would withdraw from the free trade agreement, it would withdraw from NAFTA. Canada is a trading nation. Every $1 billion worth of exports generates 15,000 jobs. That is why we are so concerned about trading our way to prosperity. That has been Canada's success in the past and that will be Canada's success in the future.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the trade policies of this party and those of the government is that we see trade policies that create employment and not unemployment, which is what this government has done.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that the reason we have 11 per cent unemployment is because the government has chosen policies, trade policies and interest rate policies, that have created an unemployment level of 11 per cent and more. The cost to the taxpayer of maintaining that is $27 billion a year.

The Minister of Finance often speaks of the fundamentals and getting the fundamentals right. The fundamental for every economic policy should be to ask the question: Where are the jobs? Will the minister in preparing his next budget do that and look at a full employment strategy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the success that her friend the premier of Ontario has had with his job creation effort. He proposed $1 billion to create jobs and I think they created 675 jobs. That is an absolute waste of money.

I have tallied up what the hon. member is suggesting. She is suggesting that they could spend $100 billion over the next five or six years and through some magical wand—I am not sure of the precise figure—we would end up with an improvement in the deficit of between $8 billion and $11 billion, depending upon whether you are using the statement of the hon. leader of the NDP or that of her economist, Mr. McCracken.

The fact of the matter is that the Conference Board of Canada indicated that the policy stance that we are following would generate more jobs than the policy stance the NDP has proposed and for a heck of a lot less money.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the policy that this government has carried out has created the highest number of people unemployed in this country, the highest number of bankruptcies and the highest debt. It seems to me that Canadians deserve a change and deserve a change in economic direction.

We know the budget is coming up. He has asked for Canadians' suggestions. I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he will seriously consider looking at a full employment strategy in his budget? Will he look at measures which will not lose jobs for Canada, but create and maintain jobs and take a new turn in policy direction which will be in the interests of this country and its people?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course I will always listen to good sensible suggestions, not those conceived in Disneyworld, but some that really reflect the realities of our time, the changing circumstances and changing conditions.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member from Winnipeg knows as well as anyone else that the economy is changing. We must adjust. We must adapt. We must retrain. We must improve our educational skills. That is precisely what we set out to do in the December economic statement.

If the hon. member has any sensible alternatives I will certainly entertain them. But the package presented last week is really the product of a dream world, believe me.

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

On Friday the Security Council, concerned over the security of peacekeeping troops, passed a resolution authorizing all UN troops, in the former Yugoslavia to use force under chapter VII of the charter. It also instructed the Secretary General to discuss with contributing states, including Canada: "Measures to strengthen the security of troops of UNPROFOR by providing the necessary defensive means".

What concrete steps is the minister taking to enhance the equipment and security of Canadian troops serving in the UN forces in Bosnia and Croatia so that they can fulfil this expanded mandate while ensuring their safety and security as requested by the UN Security Council?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the Second Battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment is one of the most heavily armed battalions in Yugoslavia at the time. At this date I am advised they are sufficiently well armed and protected to meet any kind of threat that they anticipate. I will however continue to consult with the members of our military staff.

We have a fundamental policy that we will not put Canadians in situations where they are incapable of protecting themselves. That is a fundamental policy and we rely on the expert advice of our military to ensure that we have that equipment for our Canadian forces.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. At a parliamentary committee meeting last week I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to explain the growing gap between our increasing peacekeeping commitments and the substantial reduction or shortage of manpower and equipment in our Armed Forces. The minister at the time answered: "Do not ask me; ask the minister of defence".

So I turn to the Minister of National Defence with a very specific question. Why is it that one week she rejects any proposals for enhancing or improving peacekeeping training facilities in Canada and the next week has thousands of reservists go down to California to be trained for new risky missions to replace regular troops because there are not sufficient regular troops in the Canadian Armed Forces? When is this minister going to stop and take time from her extracurricular political travels and present a policy paper to Canada on new security and peacekeeping requirements?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that very clear and direct question had a variety of facets. I will try to deal with them directly.

First is the question of training of our peacekeepers and the hon. member knows who the peacekeepers are. We have the total force policy in which we are shifting the balance between regular forces and reserve forces in Canada. This is part of the defence policy and it is designed to meet the needs of the Canadian Armed Forces.

The whole point of having reserves is to have them available to call up, to be used in various projects around the world. Ten per cent of our peacekeepers are reservists. They are sent abroad after a 90-day period of training which means that they are highly trained military people. Many of them have skills in trades that are important and that we call on from time to time when needed. That is part of sensible armed forces planning, as the hon. member will know.

In so far as we have members of our Armed Forces training in California, it is not a question of not being able to have the facilities here. Alas, we do not have the weather in Canada at this moment to train peacekeepers by the end of March to fulfil a springtime mission in Croatia. It will be springtime when they get there to serve. Alas, it is not springtime here in Canada while they are training.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the reserve forces the minister just spoke about in fact get 12 weeks of training and they do make up 10 per cent of our peacekeepers. For the relieving battalion for Croatia, reservists will make up 55 per cent.

Last week on the subject of peacekeeping, the minister of external affairs told the standing committee: "This system threatens to become seriously overloaded, not just in terms of the management of all these crises but also in terms of the personnel and financial resources needed to deal with them on the ground".

I want to ask the Minister of National Defence what she is doing about this serious challenge and warning that has been given by her cabinet colleague.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think in fairness one ought to quote my colleague correctly.

I think all of us in the government have made it very clear that with about 4,700 peacekeepers deployed around the world in 15 different locations, we are gradually reaching the limit of Canada's ability to say yes to requests by the United Nations.

In some instances we have in fact redeployed people to areas where the United Nations has regarded our services of greater urgency than where they were at the particular time.

It is largely a question of what Canadians are prepared to spend. We have an armed force. It is designed to meet our domestic concerns and our security concerns. When they are not needed on active deployment we make them available to the United Nations. This incurs costs to the Canadian people.

We have had serious reductions in our defence budget over the last couple of years to try to meet our fiscal goals. If Canadians were prepared to spend considerably more on the Canadian Armed Forces we could accept more engagements.

What we will do in Canada is the maximum that we can to meet our international obligations, consistent also with the proper equipment and training of the men and women we send abroad to fulfil those obligations.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the whole point of this debate and the questions is that a lot of concern is being shown over the manner in which we deploy our peacekeepers right now.

More peacekeeping operations have been approved in the last five years than in the previous 40, as the minister knows. This is at a time when government policy is to reduce our regular soldiers by 4,000. United Nations command and control is being publicly criticized. The minister should know by now that two of our serving generals, not one but two of them have spoken out in public. They have criticized the manner in which the forces are deployed.

I want to ask the minister what effect this concern has on the morale of our troops in the field.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, once again I think the hon. member does not do justice to the things that have been said in public by senior members of the Armed Forces with respect to our role in peacekeeping.

The bottom line is that Canadian men and women are serving with distinction around the world in 15 locations to meet international obligations. The world is changing dramatically and rapidly.

From the perspective of the Department of National Defence, the Department of External Affairs and my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has been working tirelessly on this question, we are trying to participate in the creation of a new world order. We are trying to develop rules of engagement that will enable the world to respond quickly to difficulties that now arise as a result of the loss of discipline of the cold war.

The Canadian Armed Forces must be well trained and well equipped. We cannot increase the person-power of the Canadian Armed Forces without a concomitant investment in capital equipment. That is why we are trying to raise the proportion of the defence budget that we spend on equipment, an exercise that does not meet with a great deal of assistance from members across the House.

We will continue to do this. Largely it is a question of what Canadians feel they can afford to spend in order to play a role around the world. I must say for the capacity that we have we play a role that is disproportionate to our size, and that is a credit to all Canadians.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Rhys Eyton, chairman of Canadian Airlines, issued a plea last week. He said: "Mr. Minister, call me. Call Hollis Harris. If necessary, knock our heads together so we can do something about airline overcapacity".

Thousands of airline jobs are at stake. Has the minister called?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that the hon. member would ask the government to do what the management of the company knows it needs to do. Why does the company not do it?

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that we would not be in the overcapacity situation if this government had not turned the regulation of the industry over to the airlines and therefore set up the scenario we now have.

The government has a responsibility to the tens of thousands of airline employees and to the communities they serve to do something about overcapacity. The minister has said in this House that he wants the airlines to do something about overcapacity. They have not acted.

I want to know, the employees of Canadian Airlines and Air Canada and all the people of Canada want to know, what steps is the minister going to take to make sure that something is done about overcapacity which is killing both airlines?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, certainly the hon. member knows that the whole airline industry across the world is going through a very difficult period. It is not only in Canada that airlines are experiencing difficulties. One of the largest American airlines announced last week that it would have a $1 billion deficit this year.

Overcapacity is a matter the airline industry and managers in the airline industry know about. They have the liberty to do it themselves. They do not have to ask the Minister of Transport to do what they can without any interference by the minister.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it concerns the future of Churchill.

Recent reports have indicated that the federal government is no longer going to use Churchill as a major supply route for the Northwest Territories. If this is true, it is going to cost the Manitoba economy $100 million and put in jeopardy all the airline routes into the Northwest Territories.

Will the minister give his assurance to the House that this government is not making this consideration but will continue to use Churchill as its major port for the north?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of the port of Churchill has been a concern of Transport Canada for a number of months. The crux of the matter is whether there will be some grain that will be handled by the port of Churchill.

We have undertaken a number of studies with the different stakeholders. The question that comes at the bottom line is whether there will be grain handling at this port in the future. If we can determine that a sufficient volume of grain can be handled at Churchill, then the problem will not be there. If we cannot do that, then of course we have to examine all eventualities.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised at the minister's response. The minister knows through his control of CN, through the government's control of grain movements, through the control of Transport Canada's purchase of heavy fuel for the north, through the purchases made by northern affairs that the government does control the future of Churchill.

Will the minister give his assurance? For the last eight years, the people of Churchill, the people of Manitoba, the Government of Manitoba and members on this side of the House have asked this government what it is going to do about Churchill.

Will the minister give an unequivocal reassurance to the House that the future of Churchill is assured under this government?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that over the past couple of years we have maintained the port of Churchill open in search of a viable permanent capacity of this port to handle merchandise, mainly grain.

We are continuing to look at it very seriously. We have no intention to close the port of Churchill in the immediate future but we are looking for a long-term solution.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend, the minister of fisheries.

When he reached an agreement last December with the European Community to end overfishing of straddling stocks off Newfoundland, many of us were a bit skeptical and for very good reason.

We now hear that the Spanish and the Portuguese are up to their old games. They are ravaging the undersized codfish and they are selling hundreds of tonnes of one and two-ounce fillets on world markets.

Does the minister realize that all of the sweet talk and diplomacy he has engaged in has not worked and is not working? Is he now prepared to get serious about this issue and take steps to end once and for all this piracy on the high seas off Canada's east coast?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all realize that the hon. gentleman's rhetoric is a bit on the extreme side.

There are reports that there have been very small codfish offered for sale on international markets by Portuguese owners or people of Portugal. We are checking to see whether or not that is the case.

I can report to the House that the European Community, Spain and Portugal, have not fished for northern cod in the area 3L outside the 200-mile limit since early last year. They are observing the moratorium. If this is Portuguese-caught very small fish it could possibly be caught on the Flemish Cap, 280 miles off our coast. We are asking the EC to check on this and to take action because if it is Portuguese and the fish were taken in that area of that size, it would be contrary to the regulations and clearly it would be subject to a penalty.

I notice that the Leader of the Opposition was in St. John's several days ago and said: "A Liberal government in Ottawa would take control of the disputed nose and tail of the Grand Banks if it could or if it were possible. The trick is figuring out how to do it legally".

I have not had one suggestion yet from anyone opposite as to how we could take over control of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, legally or otherwise. Every other nation in the world would oppose it, including the United States, Russia, West Germany, Britain and the European Community. I could name just about every other nation in the world. If that is the Liberal solution, give us a little more detail. He would do it if he could. Can he or can he not? That is the question.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows a bit about rhetoric and I say to him that this slow waltz with the European Community has cost Newfoundland millions of pounds of fish and thousands of jobs.

It was not the Leader of the Opposition who originated this idea. The minister was going around St. John's this last year or so, muttering this same idea, that if push came to shove he was prepared to take custodial management. Maybe the question is for him since he is in the administration. How would he achieve it and is he prepared to extend custodial management if the upcoming conference at the UN does not solve the problem for him?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, if I might actually quote the Leader of the Opposition from The Evening Telegram, February 19, 1992: "Mr. Chrétien said a Liberal government would like to extend Canada's jurisdiction outwards to encompass the Grand Banks. The trick is figuring out how to do it legally".

This is a marvellous policy. This is a policy of great specificity. We would like to extend jurisdiction if we could do it. If we could figure out a way to do it legally. If the rest of the world would let us do it.

While the Leader of the Opposition is giving off this specious nonsense trying to fool the electorate, we have originated a UN conference on overfishing. We had a meeting of 58 countries that think in a like way to us in St. John's several weeks ago to take steps to control fishing on the high seas. We have an agreement with the European Community. We have called in South Korea and asked them to remove their ships from the NAFO area. We are doing things while the Leader of the Opposition is trying to con the people of Newfoundland.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. On February 11 and 12 a panel reviewing the question of whether or not Canada subsidizes its softwood lumber exports to the United States heard evidence from Canada and the U.S. In discussions with officials from both sides in this dispute, it now appears certain that the Americans are planning an extraordinary challenge if a decision favours Canada.

Has the government received assurances from the Clinton administration that an extraordinary challenge will not proceed and that the ongoing harassment of our softwood exports will end?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we continue to take comfort from the fact that we have a special dispute settlement mechanism which has been engaged to resolve this dispute. We are perfectly comfortable with the fact that our position will be vindicated at the end of this process.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister on the same ongoing problem with our softwood exports to the United States. The harassment has continued under this government and under free trade and really points out the failure of that agreement.

Can the minister confirm to the House that the GATT panel dealing with this dispute filed its final report on Friday. Will he make that report public? Will he tell the House if the government will continue to challenge through GATT, and assure us that the Americans cannot get at our raw logs, that they are here for us to process in Canada.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the harassment began before the free trade agreement was even conceived. The free trade agreement will be the solution to the harassment.

• (1450)

As far as the GATT panel is concerned it produced some good and some not so good news for Canada and of course all of the panel's findings are made public.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Scholarships Program each year grants scholarships to outstanding high school graduates who plan to study scientific subjects in university. This is an excellent program, yet there is no way to measure how the applicants across the country compare.

I ask the Minister for Science if he would consider implementing a test to be taken by Canada scholarship applicants so that we can determine how well our educational systems are performing across the country.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister for Science, I am pleased to respond to this question. I realize that 2,500 Canadian students from across Canada participate in this program each year and we have now added some 800 extra students from the colleges who participate in it.

I think the member's idea is a good one. The government intends to look into it and will study it as a means of solving the problem to which he is referring.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and concerns economic recovery, more specifically mining exploration in Abitibi—Témiscamingue and in Quebec. For several years, tax shelters and flow-through shares have been at a very low level. I ask the minister what the government will do in the federal budget for economic recovery, in Quebec or in Canada.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member on the work he has done on the Canada-Quebec mineral development agreement which was signed last month.

An agreement was reached last September at the mines ministers' conference in Whitehorse for the federal minister, the provincial minister and the industry to sit down together and look at the over-all approach and the problems faced by our industry.

Meetings have been taking place. There will be another meeting in Toronto at the prospector and developers annual meeting at the end of March, where we will be looking at both land use, taxation, environment and financing for a very important industry.

MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

One year ago this week 40,000 farmers gathered on Parliament Hill. They were concerned that the government was going to sell out their supply management marketing boards in the GATT negotiations.

Now the chief negotiators for Canada are telling private meetings of press and other people that Canada is softening its position, that in fact Canada is losing support.

Does this mean that the government is going to sell out the supply management marketing board farmers? If not, what is the government doing to support them in these GATT negotiations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canada's position with respect to the GATT as it relates to article 11 in the supply management industry has remained the same. The hon. member knows that. There has been no change.

There has been some waning of support internationally. Several countries were supportive of the Canadian position but that seems to be waning. However it does not detract from the resolve of Canada to try to deal with this issue in an effective way.

The supply management industry is a fundamental part of the Canadian agricultural sector. The hon. member knows that, I know that, and we intend to pursue that policy.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, just over a year ago the House passed a unanimous resolution supporting supply management. It called on the Prime Minister to meet with the President of the United States to secure his support for our position in those GATT negotiations.

Since the Prime Minister recently met with President Clinton, I wonder if he was able to secure support for Canada's position for a stronger supply management system, article 11 and so on. Was the Prime Minister able to get the support he was asked to get by the unanimous resolution of the House of Commons?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has attempted to fulfil in every way, shape, or form the spirit of that resolution. The Prime Minister of Canada has not only raised it with the President of the United States, he has raised it as well with all the G-7 summit leaders.

At a meeting I attended in Munich in July, the issue of the GATT agreement and how we might proceed with its conclusion was very much an issue. The position of Canada has been clearly stated and continues to be stated by the Minister of Agriculture, by the Minister for International Trade and by the Prime Minister.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

The minister will be aware that the freeze in grants in lieu of taxes which the government announced December 2 was not only unilateral but it was made at the time of year when municipal budgets had already been approved in many cases.

I want to ask the minister if his government will withdraw the measure in question which will cost municipalities $80 million over the next two years, or at the very least will he delay it one year to permit municipalities to have some lead time.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member knows, because he is a knowledgeable member, that the grants in lieu of tax accounts which the federal government has been obliged to pay have risen dramatically. Reluctantly I have to tell him and members of this House that, no, we cannot accede to his request in this respect.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton said in a letter to the Minister of Finance that this move by the government represents "an unprecedented intrusion into the municipal domain of setting property taxes".

[Translation]

I now want to ask the Minister of Finance my supplementary question. Since Canadian municipalities will lose $80 million over two years, how can the minister explain to them that he is passing his government's deficit on to them?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what is unprecedented about this issue is the fact that the grants have doubled since 1987. Discipline has to be imposed. All Canadians are being asked to sacrifice and to cut back; provinces are, municipalities are. We all have to participate and contribute to this exercise. I would ask for the hon. member's support.

If he would like to have all the details of the growth in this particular sector, I would be pleased to send him all the information. Perhaps he can join the Government of Canada in trying to deal with the fiscal problems we have in a responsible manner.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

In 1989 as part of Canada's drug strategy, Parliament passed a law that allows police to seize the profits of crime of drug traffickers. However the law lacked a coherent plan to manage these funds. More important, local police forces do not have the resources to combat fully the wealthy, ruthless and sophisticated network of drug traffickers.

Can the Solicitor General assure the House and the people in my riding of Kitchener who want the police to have all the possible resources in their battle against the drug trade that 90 per cent of the cash assets realized by drug traffickers will be turned over to the local municipalities?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my hon. friend for the effort he is putting into combating this very serious problem in his community.

The government is actively pursuing a consultation process with the municipalities and the provinces with a view to sharing the proceeds of crime among the three levels of government. I should point out that the proceeds would go to the paying authority and not the actual police forces.

At the same time we are actively pursuing an office of asset management in order to look after the assets as they proceed from seizure to forfeiture. We expect to be ready to proceed in the House in the very near future.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

In her answer to the question from the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception I submit that she revealed the fatal flaw in the government's present approach to the defence policy.

She tried to justify continuing pouring billions of dollars into the reserve program, which the Auditor General said is a complete shambles. Second, she continues to justify increasing capital spending on cold war equipment which is no longer relevant in a period when the government is actually beginning to finally decrease the money it is spending on defence. She cannot have it both ways. Something has to give.

• (1500)

Will the Minister of National Defence not agree that the peacekeeping capacity of Canada is what it is giving and that the defence policy of this government needs a complete review?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it shows how you can stay in office for a month and you can already say no. When she was appointed Minister of National Defence one of the things she was quoted as saying was that there should be a public review of defence policy. Has the minister changed her mind?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I simply do not accept the premise of the preamble, with respect to the answer to the second part of the question.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, reports out of Montreal have made it clear that the UI reform will cost that city in excess of $490 million.

Would the Minister of Finance table in the House the impact studies which have been done on this UI reform, not only for the great city of Montreal but indeed for every urban centre across this country? Will the Minister of Finance table those impact studies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has responded to those questions earlier in the Question Period.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It relates to the spec system for engineers and architects who apply for government contract work.

It seems that the spec system works better for the larger firms and in some ways excludes or puts the smaller firms in not as good a position as the larger firms.

Will the minister review this program to ensure that the smaller firms can have access to government contracts as do the big firms? That is where they get most of their experience so they can build and progress.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises a good question.

After consultation with the building and trade associations about four years ago, our department implemented a contract selection process based on a computer generated selection for contracts below $1 million. We would like to continue to improve the fairness, the transparency and the efficiency of this type of award.

We would welcome any suggestions the member has. It is difficult sometimes to achieve the kind of balance that he wishes, but we would be glad to work with him on it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of State for Finance on a point of order.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is expedient to introduce a measure to implement the North American free trade agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States of America entered into between the Government of Canada, the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America and signed on September 17, 1992 and in particular (1) to impose custom duties in accordance with chapters three and seven of the agreement, (2) to authorize the imposition of temporary duties on agricultural goods in accordance with chapter seven of the agreement, (3) to authorize the imposition of duties for emergency action in accordance with annex 300-B of chapter three and chapter eight of the agreement, and (4) to revise the provisions in the Special Import Measures Act respecting the imposition of anti-dumping, countervailing and provisional duties relating to goods imported from Mexico and the United States of America.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved for leave to introduce a bill entitled an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Andre moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

BROADCASTING ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-407, an act to amend the Broadcasting Act (religious broadcasting).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, it is my sincere pleasure to introduce this bill to amend the Broadcasting Act. Over the past few years small religious broadcasting stations have operated in several Canadian communities. These stations were recently shut down by the CRTC, their only crime being they were operating without a broadcasting licence.

Unfortunately these stations cannot obtain a broadcasting licence. By definition the program of single denomination religious broadcasting station is contrary to the intent of the Broadcasting Act and subsequent CRTC guidelines with respect to balance, fairness, public property and Canadian expression.

In October 1992 the CRTC began public consultations into its religious broadcasting policy. I believe this is an acknowledgement by the CRTC that the conditions have changed so much since the policy was developed that a policy review is now appropriate.

The amendment proposed by this bill would enable single denomination religious stations to obtain broadcasting licences. It would also recognize a fundamental right that Canadians enjoy in every other communications medium, the right to freedom of expression.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Thorkelson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Val d'Or, Sullivan, Sainte-Gertrude and Amos, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present today that has been certified as to form and content.

The petitioners state that on November 24, 1989 the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion stating:

> That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

Poverty among children inhibits learning and preparation for employment, constituting a cost to future national productivity. Sound national financial management demands the prevention of poverty. Child poverty is a fundamental reality of family poverty. Canada has ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada. A political commitment to eliminate child poverty in Canada requires public commitment and initiative among broad sectors of the Canadian population at local and national levels.

Therefore the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

VIOLENCE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have three sets of petitions to present today.

The first one calls upon Parliament to understand that many studies have shown a link between violence and entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society; that hundreds of women, men and children, including seniors and the disabled, are killed every year by an increasing number of people who state that they got the idea from something they saw or who did not grasp and respect the humanity of their victims; that we are increasingly becoming a culture of violence and violence has become an ordinary part of our children's lives; that part of this culture is a game called the serial killer board game; and that the laws of Canada do not deal with this material portraying torture, rape and murder as fun.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading materials can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

This petition is signed by almost 500 people in my community of New Westminster—Burnaby.

STUDENT LOANS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, is signed by people from right across Canada. It has almost 1,200 signatures.

It calls upon the government to continue the six-month interest-free period for repayment of Canada student loans following graduation. It also calls upon Parliament to reverse the decision regarding the requirements for full-time student status and to define a full-time student as one who carries a 60 per cent course load.

As well it calls upon Parliament not to remove the six-month interest-free period on student loans and to withdraw the legislation, reverting to the principles of the Family Allowance Act, and not discriminate against those parents who are students and also use the Canada Student Loans Program.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have petitions from people in my community of New Westminster—Burnaby, British Columbia. Some 200 petitioners have signed this petition calling on the government and Parliament to reject legislation implementing the North American free trade agreement.

They do not want NAFTA.

DIVORCE ACT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my constituents asking Parliament to amend the Divorce Act so that a mother or father, unless there is serious cause, could be prevented from placing obstacles in the relationship between a child and the child's grandparents. In other words, they ask that the act be amended so that it would be illegal for a parent to obstruct the relationship between a child and the child's grandparents.

They petition for further amendments to the act that would give a grandparent who is granted access to a child the right to make inquiries and be given information as to the health, education and welfare of the grandchild.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition is regarding the CBC.

The petitioners ask that Parliament recognize the tools for building a better Canada have been abandoned by this Parliament; that important national institutions have been underfunded and then privatized; and that the government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the next four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations in Calgary, Corner Brook, Goose Bay, Sydney, Sept Iles, Toronto, Saskatoon and Windsor, as well as other areas.

I am particularly interested in this matter because Victoria, a city that is close to me, is the only capital city in Canada that is not provided with CBC radio service. I agree with the petition.

The petitioners urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have an extensive petition that I would like to summarize.

These petitioners point out that a great number of Canadian youths who belong to middle and lower-income families are drawn out of schools at an early age due to the present financial difficulty.

They urge the government to invest in Canada's future by promoting a better educational program for students and to prepare them for global competitiveness.

The petitioners make a number of recommendations and I will summarize them very briefly. They want the reformation of the income tax law to allow middle and lower-income parents to claim their children as dependants under certain circumstances.

They want the elimination of the goods and services tax on students' books and school supplies. They want the promotion of subsidies at the post-secondary level. They want the promotion of price control on text books and vital school supplies. They want the promotion of job training opportunities and programs for future graduates.

They want the promotion of job creation and implementation of assistance programs. They want provisions of incentives for youths to improve themselves through better education and training. They want leniency by the Secretary of State toward students whose student loans are due and who cannot afford to repay them because they have no job.

Finally, they urge the Secretary of State to involve students in all policies that affect them and Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of many of my own constituents in Vancouver East and other very concerned citizens, particularly in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

The petitioners state that whereas they are concerned with many of the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act in Bill C-86, in particular they strongly oppose the provisions that allow decisions to be made retroactively which would cause many individuals and families who will already have relied upon an earlier decision to be affected in a serious manner.

Therefore they call upon Parliament and urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join with my constituents in opposing the government's recent budget cuts in the area of housing.

There are approximately 164,000 tenant households looking for affordable and accessible housing. My constituents and I are asking this Parliament to urge the government to immediately reinstate all the social housing programs that were cut in the latest government budget.

(e) It is assumed that this question deals with the recovery of overpayments from claimants who failed to report other offsettable income, i.e., CPP and PSSA disability benefits, to the insurer in a timely manner and LTD/DI benefits were therefore not reduced when they should have been.

Once the necessary adjustment is calculated, the employee is given options for recovery of the overpayment. These could depend on how aware the employee was, in advance, of the impending overpayment, as well as the type of agreement they may have previously made with the insurer, in writing, to refund the overpayment. The potential financial hardship for the claimant, at the time, is also considered. All underpayments are promptly refunded to claimants.

(f) No. All medical documents are the property of the insurer. However, upon request from the claimant, or the claimant's legally designated representative, the insurer will: under the DI plan, release the medical reports to the claimant or to a third party designated by the claimant; or under the LTD plan, release medical reports to the claimant's attending physician(s).

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKay that Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Fulton (p. 15586).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate the hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester had 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of my remarks before Question Period I was addressing the economics of the fixed link.

I just wanted to summarize my earlier remarks. The fixed link will eliminate an impediment to trade among the three provinces of P.E.I., Nova Scotia and New Brunswick when it is completed. There certainly is now an impediment to transportation and economic development.

The Northumberland Strait is a body of water between P.E.I. and New Brunswick. On one side of that body of water the unemployment rate is 16.2 per cent and on the other side it is 12.1 per cent. The only difference is that P.E.I. has the disadvantage of the poor transportation system between the two.

I started to address some of the environmental concerns that have been brought up over the years. I had mentioned that it had gone through seven environmental studies, the most complete of which addressed the ice-out situation. It recommended that, based on an estimate of a seven-day delay due to ice-outs, the project not go ahead.

A more specific study was done on that problem which addressed it based on a generic type of fixed link that is being proposed now. It arrived at the conclusion that that type of bridge would well meet the criteria of a two-day delay ice-out period. In fact, the period under the present plan is considered to be substantially less than the two days required by the environmental process.

The way they plan to build the bridge is interesting. They plan to build as much of it on land as possible and then take the assemblies out and place them in the water. There will be some dredging taking place during construction but there will be little. There will be less than there is now in the Northumberland Strait over a two-year period, and the bridge will be constructed over five years. Therefore, in terms of upsetting the fishery or the environment, there will be far less dredging than is being done now.

Again the design is very unique. It is very interesting that they have decided to build almost all of it on Prince Edward Island.

The impact on fishing will be addressed. During construction there will be a small impact on the fishery. There have been offsets put in place for the fishermen. A subject that nobody talks about is the advantage to the fishery when it is completed. There is a good chance the fishery will be enhanced. Anywhere there has been a man-made structure like the fixed link with a large amount of construction being done under water as in Canso or Bar Harbour, Maine the fishery ends up being concentrated on these structures. It creates a natural habitat for lobsters and other fish after completion of the project, which runs contrary to the argument that it may upset the fishery.

Another point that is not understood is that the ferries that go between New Brunswick and P.E.I. are allotted a wide swath from P.E.I. to New Brunswick in which there is no fishing allowed at present. It is a large area and it will be eliminated. When the bridge is completed that area will be given back to the fishery again.

There probably will be a small negative impact on the fishery during construction. However a lot of people, including myself, think there will be a much larger positive impact after the project is completed. Some people suggest there will be a battle among the fishermen over the 44 abutments of the bridge. They will each want to have one or two. I expect that will be an interesting procedure.

I have attended many presentations by the president of Strait Crossing Incorporated. Mr. Giannelia has gone out of his way time and time again to meet with people in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and P.E.I. He will meet with anyone, he will answer any questions or concerns and he accepts advice and direction at all of his meetings. I am impressed by the way he handles questions. There is no time limit. He will take as much time as is required and is not afraid to touch any subject. He has thought this out, is very determined to go ahead with it and is determined to meet the time guidelines as outlined. Every aspect of the project has been addressed from an environmental perspective and every part has had its environmental impact addressed. It will be considered at the time of construction.

I live in one of the communities that is closest to it on the mainland side, Amherst, Nova Scotia. It is a very big and important project for us. Many people are skeptical that it will ever get started because we have had so many starts in the past. However, it now appears that it will go ahead. To say the least, we are excited. Our business communities have come together to make sure that we have the best possible facilities to address the needs of the people and the companies involved in building the project.

The project has met all the standards demanded by the environmental review process. It has met the standards of the P.E.I., New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and federal governments. It has passed the referendum process in Prince Edward Island. It is extremely important to people in the area. It is a win-win situation for everyone as we see it.

One member said it had a one-two punch a little while ago. I would like to add a few more punches to it. He said it had one punch as a construction project, that is true, and a second punch as a tourist attraction.

Probably the most important punch is that it will be a key to our transportation infrastructure in Atlantic Canada. It will be a very integral part of the over-all transportation system and it will help us as a region to be competitive, and help Prince Edward Island specifically to be competitive.

Certainly the over-all economic impact will be substantial. We have heard figures today of $800 million and $850 million, and we have heard figures even higher than that. By the time it is done the peripheral impact and all the housing, supplies, and services and goods that must be supplied to the people will be over $1 billion. That is very attractive to us in our area.

The people of the region are most excited and anxious to see it go ahead. I appreciate this opportunity to speak on it and I certainly hope it moves along as quickly as possible and is as successful as we think it will be.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker in his remarks referred a number of times to environmental assessment and said that the project has undergone a number of environmental assessments.

That is true. The environmental assessment recommended that the project not proceed. How does he justify supporting a bill that the project proceed when the environmental assessment said no?

Mr. Casey: Mr. Speaker, the environmental assessment said the project should not proceed if the ice-out was going to be a seven days delay as it predicted.

When the specific environmental assessment on the ice-out was done this generic plan came up with the criteria that it would only limit the ice to two days a year. The original reason for recommending it not proceed was that the environmental assessment panel predicted that it would take seven days for the ice to go out. That was just an assessment, and based on that assessment it should not go ahead. However, the panel said if it could meet a two-day ice-out it could go ahead. The present plan more than meets that criteria.

Mr. Nowlan: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been in this House from the first minute of this debate. I am from Atlantic Canada and have an unusual interest in this debate. I have been taking count of the different members and have no hesitation in putting my time in purgatory for the normal switch in rotation between government and opposition members.

However, there comes a point of no return when members who are not even in the country when this debate started, let alone in this House, take priority over a member who has been here from the first minute of this debate.

With all due respect to my friend from British Columbia, whom I respect and used to enjoy when he was out in British Columbia, this is the fourth NDP member that has spoken. There have already been three. There have been three to four government members and two Liberals, and I have been here since the first.

Mr. Speaker, I would like some explanation of why you have been blind to this seat in the rear. Are you following a list? Of course you most likely are not because you do not follow a list in the theory and mystique of this Chamber.

I would like a clear explanation.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member you just recognized was not even in the House today when this debate—

Mr. Barrett: Oh, come on.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants had to say, and I realize he has a particular interest in this bill which has an impact on the area he represents. When recognizing members, however, the Chair must consider the number of members representing each party.

I have been in the chair since the beginning of this debate, and we have now had four members on the government side, two Liberal members and two NDP members speak to the substance of the bill. I also recognized the hon. member twice during the period for questions and comments. In accordance with the traditions of this House, I believe the Chair will again have to give the floor to members of the recognized parties before switching to an independent member. That being said, I can assure the hon. member that I am very much aware of his interest in this debate and that at the first opportunity, I will be delighted to recognize the hon. member as a speaker on the substance of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is just a suggestion. You are a kind man, but the suggestion you use is the fallacy in the whole procedure. You talk about recognizing parties. If you check the rules, you will find that individual members and parties per se are not mentioned. The numbers you talked about of members taking part in the substance of the debate, with respect, is incorrect. There were three NDP members recognized before your recognition of the last member.

I would like to know for future reference, and I am serious, about people who have participated in this debate who were not even in the country. I understand how the system works. I have been around here for a few years.

I do not mind putting in the time waiting when other members are here and you take the natural rotation, whether you use a list of parties or whatever, but there has to be an order. I am asking you as Speaker, do you mean to tell this member and other members that the time you sit in this Chamber makes no difference as to recognition by the Chair?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not think there is anything in the Standing Orders about speaking time being allowed on the basis of the amount of time members spend in the House. I believe I am acting in accordance with parliamentary tradition by giving the floor to members of the various recognized parties who then speak for a certain time. As for independent members, I think it is only fair to wait until a certain number of members have spoken before giving him the floor. That being said, so far I have recognized the hon. member's special interest in the subject by giving him the floor several times during the period for questions and comments, and I believe I am entirely fair in recognizing once more the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. And I should be delighted to give the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants the floor at the earliest opportunity.

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must say that I have deep respect for the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. I know that he will participate in this debate. However, to suggest that others have not been in the House is factually incorrect.

Having said that, that is against—

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It just so happens that the hon. member is not stating facts. The member for Fundy—Royal who spoke this morning was not in the House when this debate started. The parliamentary secretary was not in the House when this debate started.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. As an experienced parliamentarian, the hon. member will appreciate that a member does not refer to the presence or absence of a colleague in this House.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you again for recognizing me for the third time. I hope I will be able to participate in this debate and I hope that others will also at the behest of the Chair.

At the outset let me say that I am opposed to the spending of taxpayers' dollars on this boondoggle. Let me further say that the government is spending $42 million a year for 35 years for this missing link. The missing link is supposed to bring Prince Edward Island together with the rest of Canada, while at the same time we are currently spending $21 million a year for a ferry.

This is typical Liberal and Conservative thinking. If you want to save $21 million a year, spend $42 million a year to do it. How dumb can they get? They are spending $42 million a year to correct a problem of spending $21 million a year. The government and the opposition spend all their time talking about there not being enough money for the unemployed, for unemployment insurance and no new money to create out there off the so-called money tree for projects. However, here we have a massive megaproject designed to spend $42 million a year to correct a $21 million a year problem. It is just as simple as that and I think the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants also has the same position on this issue.

We hear every single day from the Tories and from the Minister of Finance about how they are responsible for fiscal matters of this country. They say that this bridge is needed to Prince Edward Island to save money. I repeat, they are spending $21 million a year to run a ferry and now they are going to spend $42 million a year for 35 years to save twice as much money as they are losing.

Mr. Lewis: Bridges do not go on strike.

Mr. Barrett: Now this is the good thing. The Solicitor General—

Mr. Lewis: Bridges will not break down.

Mr. Barrett: Bridges do not go on strike. Now is that not interesting. This is very genius-style Tory thinking.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you.

Mr. Barrett: Bridges do not go on strike. Therefore if we spend $42 million a year to save $21 million a year we will be avoiding a potential strike. Genius at work. Tory genius supported by the Liberals in this House.

My dear friends, they talk about Tory economics. In the province of British Columbia we have the Lions Gate Bridge that needs maintenance every single year. As a matter of fact, over 50 years they have probably replaced the capital value about five times in simple maintenance.

My dear friends over here, be serious. How serious can you be if you are so dumb as to spend $42 million a year to save $21 million a year? Do you think I am exaggerating? Just look at the figures and the justification and he says: "Bridges do not go on strike". This is the same kind of stupidity that is putting up all that money for Hibernia so that the American oil companies can benefit.

Who was the consortium that is going to get the money that is being spent? Seventy per cent of the consortium is owned in Great Britain and in the United States.

Prince Edward Island has a population of 125,000 people. If you give them an option of $8,000 per person and promise not to build the bridge they will take the money. Why give this money to a consortium that is not even in the country to build a bridge—

Mr. Crosbie: Is that the NDP policy? Is that your policy?

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend, your policy is to spend $42 million a year to save $21 million a year. You are an ex-Liberal who is now a Tory. You speak out of both sides of your mouth because you both support it. Both the Liberals and the Conservatives support this dumb bill, this missing link policy and it is not going to solve their missing link.

Here are these so-called calm, intelligent, rational, fiscally conservative cabinet ministers screaming at me simply because I am exposing the stupidity of spending $42 million a year to save $21 million a year. I have never seen the minister of fisheries so worked up since he last kissed a cod. The minister of fisheries, who finds more ways of going around and getting into trouble, has found another one today and that is he is not attacking anybody. He is throwing money away.

I find it interesting that these so-called responsible Conservatives actually go around the country saying: "Oh, we cannot spend money on day care". No, that goes towards kids. "Oh, we cannot spend money to create jobs", although it goes to men and women. "Oh, yes we would like to help the native people", but they do not have any money for that. As for old age security they have to have a clawback. It has to save all this money so it can spend $42 million a year to save $21 million a year. Suckers like that were what P.T. Barnum described as an abnormal birth rate. This unbelievable stupidity manifests itself out of this government with support of the Liberals. This is the tacit coalition that goes along in this country. The Liberals and the Tories have no monopolies on dumb-bells. They have a common interest in them.

Why are they spending this money? What are the economic benefits? Reveal the environmental studies. The company that is going to benefit is 70 per cent owned in Great Britain and the United States. If you are going to rip somebody off, in other words, the Canadian taxpayers, at least rip them off for the benefit of Canadian companies. However, the government does not even do that.

I can hear them down in the United States saying: "Do you know what we got those dummies to do in Canada? They are going to build this bridge from New Brunswick to P.E.I., spend $42 million a year and we got a piece of the action in the company". In the board rooms of the same construction company in Britain they are saying the same thing: "We could have given them tunnel technology, but no, they wanted a bridge. Whatever they want, we will give it to them if the suckers want to spend that kind of money".

It is $8,000 per person in Prince Edward Island. If we give the people in Prince Edward Island the option to vote on whether they want the $8,000 per person or this bridge, guess what they will go for. Give them the vote. Let us see what they go for.

Mrs. Sparrow: They have already had a vote.

Mr. Barrett: They did not get a vote on the eight grand. They did not get a vote on the money they could make. They do not own the company in Prince Edward Island. They are not going to get sweet boom all on Prince Edward Island except the chance to sell postcards of this long 13-kilometre bridge which probably by the time it is finished, with the amount of money and the costs going up, will be a single-lane one way.

An hon. member: Oh, get off it.

Mr. Barrett: Get off the bridge, she says. You explain to the people in Alberta why you are going to spend $42 million a year to save a $21 million problem. I will go to Alberta with you and we will go up on a platform together, along with my good friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants. We will stand up and say: "Okay, you tell us why we should spend the taxpayers' money on this".

It is so dumb, they take it seriously. I thought this was all a joke. I thought this was started on April fool's day and got carried out of whack. But they are serious. They really intend to do this.

We have heard of horses on the payroll, we have heard of the boondoggles that this government has put up over the years and what do they say to me? "Oh, you're going to lose votes in P.E.I." If they want to buy votes, they can do it a hell of a lot better and a lot cheaper than this kind of buy-out. How many votes are they going to get in Britain from the construction company? How many votes are they going to get in the United States? If they want to buy votes, just do it right up front. Give them the money up front. Be honest about it.

Is this a matter of buying votes or is this a matter of sensible fiscal responsibility? Bridges do not go on strike, said the minister. Ding dong, it does not mean a thing.

Is there anybody in this Chamber who has got $42 million a year worth of projects they would like built in their riding? Just stand up.

An hon. member: What about the deficit?

Mr. Barrett: Never mind the deficit, my dear friend. This is politics. The deficit does not count when we are talking about regional voting. If we throw money at the bridge, maybe they will vote for us. I think this is an insult to the people of Prince Edward Island. I think it is an insult to the people of New Brunswick. It sure as hell is an insult to the people of Canada who have to pick up the bill for this boondoggle.

Mrs. Dobbie: You are picking on little Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Barrett: Picking on Prince Edward Island? Its people think it is a joke. They think it is a great deal of fun to pull the wool over Canadian eyes, saying we can spend $42 million a year to save $21 million a year. This is the new Tory-Liberal thinking.

I challenge the members from New Brunswick and P.E.I. to stand up on the platform and say: "This is the way we are going to get this country out of the financial mess. We will spend twice as much to save half as little". Will they get up on a platform and explain it that way? No, they will not. But that is the reality.

That is the absolute reality. How do they justify the Great Britain and United States company's 70 per cent consortium owned offshore? Why are we spending the money to enhance contractors in Great Britain? I do not know. Why are we spending the money to enhance contractors in the United States? I do not know.

I want to let you in on a secret. I know this project is dumb. I know there are politics involved and I know they are seeking votes, but there are no votes for this government in England. Those members have not even figured that out. There are no votes for this government in the United States. They have not figured that out either.

If you are going to sell out, if you are going to do something for political reasons, at least do it where you will get some votes. You are insulting the integrity of the traditional honour of buying votes by going offshore. You are buying votes in Britain and the United States. That is dumb.

Now for the Liberals, why are they agreeing with this? Do they think they are going to get votes out of it? They already have seats in P.E.I. What are they going to get out of it? Are they going to say: "Look at us. We have an edifice complex. We helped build this bridge. We can have our name on a bronze plaque" right at the level where the sea salt water will erode the quickest, we hope.

There will be all the sitting members of Parliament cemented into this bridge. There they are for posterity, every one of them. Do you know what? They are hoping that everybody in P.E.I. will come, look at their names on the bridge and say: "Mmm, I am going to vote for that guy".

They are insulting the people of P.E.I. They are insulting the people of New Brunswick and they are insulting the rest of us Canadians. I thought this kind of pork-barrel politics was over.

Mrs. Dobbie: What do you suggest?

Mr. Barrett: I suggest that if you can find an extra $21 million a year, you can start spending on people who are hungry.

Spend it on kids who can go to school and have a hot meal inside their stomachs. Spend it on the education of people in P.E.I. Spend $42 million a year on university and technical schools in the maritimes. Upgrade those schools that you blab about over there all the time.

Spend money for the seniors. Spend money for the pioneers who built this country, but not $42 million a year to provide some offshore corporations with money that they can profit from to save $21 million a year.

What do I suggest? I will tell you what I suggest. Your mathematics are stupid. The project does not make sense. Also, anybody who gets up in this House and supports it by saying: "We can solve a $21 million a year problem by spending $42 million" needs their head examined by the Auditor General.

I challenge this government and the opposition to call in the Auditor General and have him do a study of this. I challenge them to say the Auditor General can show how you can save $21 million a year by spending $42 million a year.

It is the same kind of mentality as spending all that money on Hibernia to provide the Americans with offshore oil. Even the ships and the infrastructure for Hibernia are being built offshore. I do not understand it. If it is good politics, then let the people of New Brunswick and Newfoundland decide if they want the money directly in their pockets. Do they think it should be diverted through the consortium that is owned in Britain and the United States?

What are the economic impact studies? Who has done them? What of the environmental studies? Many more need to be done. What about the way of life on Prince Edward Island being the same as British Columbia? We have Vancouver Island. Do you want to spend $45 million a year to solve our ferry problems? You have not given the province of British Columbia one single penny to pay for transportation between the mainland and Victoria, not one penny.

Since W.A.C. Bennett brought in the ferry system between Vancouver Island and the mainland, not one cent of Canadian taxpayers' dollars has gone to help British Columbia's need for intercoastal ferries, not one penny. Those ferries are built in B.C. by B.C. workers in union shops. They are not on strike.

I am not here to lament the failures of past Liberal and Tory governments. I want to put that on record but how can you keep that up and deny the rest of the Canadian people an option for the same money? Is it politics? It is stupidity, absolute stupidity.

I challenge every single Tory cabinet minister who holds a seat from Manitoba west to come on a public platform with me and justify this project financially in western Canada.

I challenge the cabinet ministers from the province of British Columbia to have a public meeting in Vancouver, stand up on a platform and say: "Yes, we have decided on a new way to save money. We are going to spend $42 million a year to save $21 million in P.E.I. and you still do not get a penny out here in British Columbia".

Since 1960 we have built and run government owned ferries in the province of British Columbia, paid for by the taxpayers of British Columbia and not one cent came from Ottawa. We never once complained about the subsidies given to the maritimes. Now we are complaining that the subsidies are misdirected.

Ms. Mitchell: And they took away the Polar 8.

Mr. Barrett: The Polar 8. We never even got that.

I agree with those critics but my agreement is something more uncomplicated. This is sheer vote buying at the stupidest level that one can think. If you want to do some vote buying, give the money directly to the people, not to a consortium offshore and not for a fixed link that makes up for the missing link that does not go with the thinking both of the Liberals and of the Tories.

You cannot justify this financially. You should all be ashamed of yourselves in supporting this, every single one of you.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who commented about insulting the people of Prince Edward Island that the majority of people in Prince Edward Island voted for the fixed link to New Brunswick.

We have heard the NDP with its high moral pronouncements for some time now. The previous speaker just alluded to what a thin veneer that actually is.

I will go back to Hansard of February 8, page 15591, when the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands stated at the beginning of her speech: "The population of my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands in the 1991 census was 122,051 and the population of Prince Edward Island is 129,800 people. The people of Saanich—Gulf Islands might very well ask where their billion dollar project is when you are talking about per capita dollars".

That means if a private corporation wanted to spend $1 billion building a bridge across to Vancouver Island, these people would be all for it. They would not be up here saying what a vote buying thing this is. We have four seats in Prince Edward Island. That is not a lot of seats in a 295-seat house.

The fact remains that if the federal government or a private corporation was willing to build a bridge to Vancouver Island, this party would be all for it. Now in British Columbia they are saying what a terrible thing this is that the people of Prince Edward Island may have good transportation but for the rest of Canada we should make it more economically viable. This is sheer hypocrisy.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, if this gentleman is saying this is not to buy votes in P.E.I., if the hon. gentleman is saying that four seats do not count, let me remind the member that politicians count every single seat as important. If they think that it is going to be a close election, this sounds like a good deal for New Brunswick and P.E.I. and for the governing party.

He did not address the specific problem that I raised. Why spend $42 million a year to solve a $21 million a year problem? You are a Liberal and you support it. You are up every single day in your front benches attacking this government for not spending money on the unemployed, not spending money in terms of education and not spending money on the environment. I hear hon. members from your front bench every day get up and complain as the Official Opposition, but on this deal you are in favour of it. It does not make any fiscal sense and it shows the sheer shallowness of the Liberal Party.

You are so shallow it is all surface, $42 million. That is pretty shallow, but they are at it. This party that is leading the polls and says trust us is willing to go along with that dumb boondoggle to spend $42 million to solve a $21 million problem.

You come out to British Columbia, I will go to P.E.I. and we will both state our positions. Tell me how you can justify demanding that the taxpayers of British Columbia pay 100 per cent of those ferry charges for the link between Vancouver Island which was a Crown colony and because as a Crown colony it tipped Confederation into Canada.

We will talk about the railroad and how you and the Liberals have taken their responsibilities for what they signed over 100 years ago and you have subsidized them too.

You have caved in on every single responsibility from the private sector and now you are going to use public money for this boondoggle.

I find it absolutely amazing the tortuous route both the Liberals and the Conservatives find to waste taxpayers money on stupid things like this. If you think you are right come out to B.C., stand up in British Columbia and tell all British Columbians why we should pay a share of this dumb idea when we do not get a single penny for our transportation costs from the mainland of Vancouver to Vancouver Island. You come out and tell us that. You come out and tell us why you should double the amount.

Mrs. Dobbie: Are those real tears?

Mr. Barrett: I do not mind the heckling. I enjoy it but there does reach a point where stupidity is so transparent it even exposes the Liberals and the Conservatives.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I was driven to my feet by the logic of my hon. friend.

For years the province of British Columbia has argued that the Government of Canada should run a railroad train up and down Vancouver Island on the basis that it was in the original agreement whereby B.C. came into Confederation.

My hon. friend should obviously know that in the original agreement whereby P.E.I. came into Confederation it was guaranteed access to the mainland. What we are trying to do is give them better access, access that does not break down.

My hon. friend is not from the province of Ontario where we have tourists going to P.E.I. all the time. The biggest problem is the wait for the ferry. My hon. friend does not know anything about that. In your party you maybe do not have to wait for ferries but in our party you do.

An hon. member: You can wait for hours in B.C.

Mr. Lewis: I think my hon. friend has to get it right. If he wants to apply the principle when it comes to B.C. he has got to apply the principle when it comes to P.E.I.

Mr. Barrett: Do you think that the Tories recognized the principle of the E & N railroad when CPR closed it down?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Barrett: No. We had to go to court. We did not get any help from the federal government. You are the ones that allowed the railroads to be disbanded. The passenger service that was promised when the CPR came in, it was the Liberals and the Tories that took the CPR off the hook, and never took back one single Crown grant. They gave them forest rights, they gave them mineral rights in this country, they gave them land 10 miles on both sides of the railroads and as soon as the railroad said "Oh, we are going broke" the government said "We cannot stand this. You poor railroads. We will take it over and pay for it out of taxpayers money".

Do not give me that humbug that this government or the Liberals ever stood up for the Canadian people on the original deal on the railroads. We had to go to the Supreme Court of British Columbia to get our rights to get the railroad back.

The record of both the Liberals and the Conservatives is one of consistent sell out, not only of the west but every single taxpayer in this country. To suggest that there is any difference between this government and the Liberals is absolutely a fabrication. The people of this country are getting hosed again by stupid deals that do not even have a reasonable payout to ordinary people in this country.

I cannot make it plainer than that. I challenge my good friends to stand up on any public platform in any city of this country and argue this stupidity. I will argue against it and we will see what the audience thinks.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am really very surprised at the vehemence the hon. member is showing today with respect to this question of a land transportation link to Prince Edward Island.

It is certainly not induced by political gratitude on the part of the government since the government did not receive any support by way of seats in Prince Edward Island in the last election and it may or may not receive seats in Prince Edward Island in the next election. This project is being put forward and supported by us because it is something that was felt to be good for Prince Edward Island and the maritimes generally for the last 100 years, and it is now physically possible to do it. It is possible to do it on an economically sensible basis because it is not going to cost the people of Canada anything to operate this structure once it is up, other than what we are already paying for the costs of ferry services that now go from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island. It is a perfectly sensible proposal on its own feet.

• (1600)

Mr. Barrett: You never give us a penny.

Mr. Crosbie: Alice in Wonderland would be boggled to hear the hon. gentleman get up from the other end of Canada with wrong information and damn a project in another part of the country because we are not building a bridge at the moment from Vancouver to Vancouver Island or whatever silly, picayune objection he is making.

This is what is wrong with our country. We have so many people like the hon. member who are jealous about whatever any other section of the country gets. Gentlemen like the hon. member are jealous about it and try to create and foment trouble about it.

You are an enemy to national unity with the arguments that you presented in this House: jealous, narrow-minded, picayune, selfish arguments that you are not getting something out in British Columbia—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. In fairness I give two minutes to the hon. member.

Mr. Barrett: Not only, Mr. Speaker, would I ask the member to withdraw personal insults but I feel complimented by the minister from Newfoundland. I am not a woman so he could not go all the way.

Let me say this: He can attack me personally all he wants. He can say anything he wants about me. It does not hurt. I have been in this business just as long as he has.

They still have to justify why they are spending $42 million a year to solve a $21 million problem. If that makes me a bad Canadian then his logic is all screwed up. I am fighting for the taxpayers, not for some jingoism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, I recognize the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased as an Albertan to be able to participate in the debate on Bill C-110. I have to say I was quite appalled at the previous speaker with regard to how Canada works together to help its brothers and sisters from coast to coast.

This bill takes us into the future. We are not going to continue to live in the past. We are going to move forward so we can be more competitive and give the people in the Atlantic region of Canada the ability to have upgraded infrastructure to promote their agriculture and their tourism and allow them to get on with things that you and I, Mr. Speaker, take for granted because they have been in our provinces for quite some time.

The positive economic factors of this bill are far greater than any of the negatives my friend from Esquimalt has been talking about. As a matter of fact it is probably one of the greatest opportunities that P.E.I. has ever had. I congratulate P.E.I. and its former premier, Joe Ghiz, as well as the former premier of New Brunswick, who worked very diligently and hard with the federal government to see this come to a reality.

I have had two or three questions with regard to the environmental review. I have to say that environmental reviews are very important with regard to all projects. This one was submitted to an environmental review. There were certain qualifications put on it with regard to the ice flow. With all due respect the government did appoint a very special committee of ice experts who said that if a bridge or the fixed link could be built with less than two days ice-out per year it would be all right with EARP or the Environmental Assessment Review Panel, which of course was done.

Let us just back up a bit and talk about this. This is not something new. It has been going on now for pretty well seven years and has been through the various environmental studies. I have to say that a plebiscite was held in

P.E.I., I believe in 1988, and the majority of people on the Island voted in favour of the fixed link.

We all recognize there were some who voted against it for various reasons. A lot of them would have to do with their feeling of becoming too modern or taking them into the next century where they do not want to move. It was a fair vote. It did win the majority and we will go ahead with it. As I said, the ice flow has been taken care of which then means that the environmental review does stand approved.

With regard to the subsidy of $21 million the hon. member from B.C. discussed a few minutes ago, every year it costs to operate ferries between New Brunswick and P.E.I., something in the area of $21 million or $22 million.

An hon. member: It was $27 million in 1988.

Mrs. Sparrow: In 1988 it was $27 million. We also have a problem with regard to the age of the ferries and the mechanical upkeep and repair that need to be done. There have been proven documents set forth with regard to the need for four as a minimum and perhaps five new ferries. Each new ferry would cost between $110 million and $140 million. If that is prorated with the operating costs and the capital expenditures over the 35 years then we come to the $42 million in 1992 dollars. It is not a gift of the taxpayers of Canada. Indeed we are building the capital expenditures into the operating expenditures and putting out some pure facts.

I want to speak a bit about the call for proposals. Three proposals were accepted. On the final review the winning firm was Strait Crossing Incorporated with its head office in the city of Calgary from whence I come. While it is a consortium, it is a Canadian company with its head office there. Not 100 per cent but 95 per cent of the work is going to be Canadian content, with most of it coming from the Atlantic coast, which is right. Of course the engineering and design of the fixed link will be done in Calgary.

It is a private sector responsibility. The private sector designs it. The private sector engineers it. The private sector finances it. It is constructed by the private sector. It is operated by the private sector for 35 years, after which time it will revert to the government. It is all private sector.

In these specific issues the private sector assumes all the risk and the government subsidy or the $42 million is what we would pay annually anyway over a prorated 35 years. It is environmentally sound. It met the ice review committee recommendations. There will be less than two ice-outs a year. It will bring a lot of regional benefits to P.E.I., to New Brunswick and to the Nova Scotia area.

Built into the costs will be the toll rates. We will utilize the costs of the fixed link when it is completed. The toll rate will be based on the ferry crossing, increased with a CPI or an inflationary indexation period. That is all laid down specifically in the contracts.

Strait Crossing Inc., the company from Calgary, has also built in costs with regard to constant maintenance and constant upkeep so that we do not run into difficulties 10, 20, 30 or 40 years down the road, which certainly could happen. However these are the built-in costs that will be paid by the toll rates that will be instituted when the bridge is completed.

Also a performance bond has been posted by Strait Crossing Inc. and there is insurance with regard to the fisheries. It was quite interesting to hear some of my colleagues on the other side of the House worry about any negative effect it could have on the fishing industry, which of course as we all know is a major industry for P.E.I., as well as for other areas.

If we take a look at the offshore rigs down on the gulf coast or where there has been offshore activity with different types of industry, it is surprising to see how the fishing industries have not really been hurt in any way. It has been very positive with regard to the habitat and the increase in availability of the product. There is not any factual evidence showing that there will be hurt or damage done to that particular industry, but there has been a bond posted in case of a problem.

I have to say with regard to selecting the company in Calgary that this gives benefits right across the country. There will be designers and engineers in Calgary who would be working on this issue. There is a range of products and services.

There is the supplying of the cement which will probably come mainly from the Atlantic provinces and the aggregates of steel. There is the selling and leasing of the heavy equipment. There is the construction of roads and the facilities for the on and off ramps. There is a whole variety of other services that will come out of P.E.I. or New Brunswick. Some of these smaller local businesses in existence in Atlantic Canada will forge ahead. The response we have had from industries in P.E.I., which will be producing most of the work has been extremely positive.

One of the key requirements for the project is that the developer maximize the use of Atlantic Canada. Why not? This should benefit those people. SCI is currently preparing an industrial benefits plan which is to be submitted to the government. I know my colleague in the NDP will be interested that SCI is currently producing an industrial benefits plan that has to be submitted to the government, and indeed the Minister of Public Works, and has to meet certain criteria that have been set down before the federal government will give its final approval to sign the contract and move ahead.

There are jobs for P.E.I. There are benefits for P.E.I., New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, as well as the western provinces. This is part of building Canada. This is when the east helps the west or vice versa. This is part of how our country was built in the very beginning. Those who have a bit more than the others share. This represents not only an economic move forward for P.E.I., but it shows what Canadians can do right across the country.

Turning to the operating period, once the fixed link is up and operating what are the tolls? The tolls will be based on the cost of the ferry crossings, as I said, increased with the CPI or the inflation rate. There will be an agreed upon amount of capital for the repairs and maintenance of the plan. That is to be independently reviewed outside government to make sure that it meets the criteria set down. There is to be no payment made to the developer until all the criteria are outlined and have been proven.

What is most interesting is to see colleagues, one might say from both sides of the House, who appear to agree on something that is so necessary to move P.E.I. into the 21st century. It also brings P.E.I. up to some of the increased trading arrangements.

When I look to the agriculture area, as well as the fishing area and tourism, I think that P.E.I. certainly deserves all this. Indeed, we will be watching very carefully as we go through the years waiting for the bridge to be opened.

As a member of the House on the government side from the province of Alberta I truly support this bill. It brings Canadians together. It moves us forward. We are not going to sit and keep looking at the past. This is where everybody can work together to make this country work.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have received some criticism from people in Prince Edward Island who do not take kindly to a member from British Columbia "interfering with their business".

I take exception to that analysis of this. I am an islander. I see this as a union of islanders. The fishermen and the ferry workers on Prince Edward Island, the friends of the island, consider that I am speaking out for them. It is certainly not their Liberal representatives who are speaking out for them.

I also think it is my duty as a member of Parliament. When $42 million a year is going to be expended on a project, I am not interfering. I am doing my job in criticizing that project. I am also doing my job when the environmental assessment integrity process is so sullied by this government in putting forth this idea. That is doing my job as a member of Parliament.

What we have seen is that the Liberals and the government are prepared to put forward a bill which they think will guarantee their votes in the maritimes. As a member from British Columbia, a member from an island, I have a duty to respond and a duty to speak out against this project.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, like each and every one of us the hon. member was elected by the constituents in her riding. She certainly has the right to speak of their views and their wishes within this particular House. I would hope that while she does that she takes the views of all of Canada because when we come here as elected members we are representing Canada as a whole.

While it is very important to know the views and concerns of her local constituents and make sure that they are heard, a lot of the decisions we make here have to reflect all of Canada. Some parts of Canada are more blessed with certain resources than other areas. Since the beginning, long before 1867, it has been part of the Canadian way to help each other.

I have no problem with the member expressing the views and concerns of her people. However, I also hope the member realizes she is here representing not only her constituents from the island of Vancouver but she is also here making decisions for all of Canada.

It is very important that the hon. member look at the people of P.E.I. as well as the people of New Brunswick. Allow them the infrastructure for them to get ahead and promote their industry, be it fisheries, tourism, forestry, potatoes or agriculture.

I think it is incumbent upon the hon. member to speak for all of Canada as well as her own specific constituents.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my friend. Not too long ago in this House we listened to the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. I for one would love to be his speech-writer because he only said three things. It would not take me too long to write that.

One of the things he said was that the rest of the members who are in favour of this particular piece of legislation obviously are stupid. We are not intelligent enough to be able to see the writing on the wall. He also said that we must be trying to buy votes.

The only piece of information he gave us throughout the whole speech, which I found quite interesting, is that at present it costs roughly $21 million to transport people back and forth between the island and the mainland and it would cost roughly $42 million a year throughout the whole cost of the project and the continuous time it would take to pay it off.

What he failed to mention should be brought forward in the House. I would like to ask the hon. member if she could elaborate on this. What are some of the other economic development spin-offs created by these kinds of projects, which when added is a cost factor in itself, would help the islanders with better access to the mainland and entice businesses to want to move to the island because of the guaranteed access?

It is important for us to put some of those different issues on the record. Therefore, we do not give the impression the only thing we are doing is being stupid and buying votes but that we do have some understanding of the economics of this issue.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and the comments from my colleague.

With regard to the $42 million a year in subsidy for the 35 years, that includes both the operating and capital expenditures.

The previous member of the New Democratic Party from Esquimalt kept harping on $21 million, $22 million plus a giveaway of another $21 million of taxpayers' money. This is not true. When operating ferries there are operating costs and capital costs. There is repair and maintenance every year and every once in a while a ferry has to be replaced. So what is built into the 35 years on the $42 million subsidy each year is capital costs as well as the operating cost. It is very fair and legitimate.

Second, it was said the project did not meet the EARP, the Environmental Assessment Review Panel. It did. There were certain ice-out conditions that the EARP panel brought forward. These were reviewed and certain criteria were set down by the special ice committee that was formed. The winning contractor has indeed met the specific criteria.

The infrastructure for P.E.I. is extremely important. It is for every city and every province, but specifically in the Atlantic and in P.E.I. We deal mainly with the agriculture and fisheries industries of which time and weather plays a main role. In order to get the product to market fresh and quickly obviously a fixed link, which is 100 per cent reliable, is the best way to go.

I believe tourism is the second major industry for the province of Prince Edward Island. People can come and go at their own time. They can cross over or cross back when they want to. It makes it a lot easier.

With regard to improving the infrastructure and the highway systems on both sides, be it in New Brunswick or in P.E.I., this has been taken into consideration. In fact it met one of the 10 proposals the former premier of P.E.I. set down before he would sign the particular proposal.

Sure we are building infrastructure. We are taking it into the next century. It is going to make P.E.I., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and indeed Newfoundland, more competitive. Is that not what this country is all about?

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about the support among the fishing community for the fixed link. However, she will know that on February 6 at its annual general meeting the P.E.I. Fishermen's Association voted unanimously against the link. In fact it argued that a full environmental review should take place to assess the environmental consequences of the fixed link.

I wonder whether as a result of the unanimous opposition by P.E.I. fishermen the member would care to rethink her indications that there is so much support across Prince Edward Island for this link.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, the fishing industry certainly has been taken into very serious consideration because it is a major industry for the island. We recognize that.

Looking at other places throughout the globe where there has been activity, be it construction or engineering, in the areas where there is a very prolific fishing industry indeed it can be seen that it can be more of a benefit than a negative.

Also built into the trust fund by Strait Crossing Inc. is a $10 million fund specifically for the fishing industry. It is not that we are taking this lightly. We are taking it extremely seriously. None of these things have been overlooked. Therefore rest assured that fishing is a major industry and has been taken into consideration.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), I would like you to designate an Order of the Day to consider the notice of Ways and Means motion tabled earlier today.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in this debate today.

Unfortunately earlier we got into sort of a regional debate between east and west. Having practised law in the west and having children in the west and being a member from the east, I bring a very real Canadian perspective to this.

I am from the east. I am a maritimer, an Atlantic Canadian and a member from Nova Scotia. I want to declare my bias right at the start that philosophically I am against a fixed link to P.E.I. That is my philosophy. Knowing a little about Atlantic Canada and P.E.I. I fundamentally believe that a fixed link will change the character of the island. Those who think this is going to be such a boon to the island are very misguided.

The boom—and there is going to be a boon and a boom—is that obviously jobs are going to occur on the mainland. Amherst, Moncton, the mainland area is going to perhaps develop beyond the construction jobs. That is where some of the suboffices are going to be. You will be able to scoot on to the island over the bridge. You will be able to drive on and off all within a day.

This could be such a fundamental shift in the whole social order of the island that the fabled Anne of Green Gables is going to become the witch of Cavendish. She very well could because of the change that will occur.

I have declared my bias. What a lot of people are missing, sincerely, I believe—we always sincerely debate in this Chamber even though we sometimes get a little political. What a lot of people are missing is that the environmental panel created by the federal government legislation assessed all the impacts, both plus and minus.

The plebiscite on the island was not for the bridge that this bill is for. It was for the vague term fixed link. It could be a bridge or it could be a tunnel. The environmental study finally was concluded and was referred to before. It was the Northumberland Strait Crossing Project report of the environment assessment panel dated August 1990.

It reviewed all the pluses and minuses and then came out and said: "The panel agrees that there is a need for an improved transportation service between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. After careful consideration, however, the panel concludes that the risk of harmful effects of the proposed bridge concept is unacceptable. The panel recommends therefore that the project not proceed".

This is the latest in the federal environmental panel. Subsequent to that there was a subsidiary ice panel that is not under the federal act which did the total survey.

The federal environmental panel itself says that improved access is needed. I am all for improved access to P.E.I. However the bridge was not approved.

• (1630)

In the summary it says: "The panel concludes that subject to a favourable independent environmental review a tunnel concept might be an acceptable transportation link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. The panel further concludes that an improved ferry service might also be acceptable".

A bridge is not the only alternative to improve access to the island to maintain the constitutional necessity of a link to Canada. This is what is being lost in this drive to start this project.

Mr. Speaker, you are too young in the chair, and some of the members of the House are too young in the chair to remember but the concept of a fixed link with the island in the east is as old as the Chignecto canal. It is as old as linking the Fundy tides that could provide renewable power in an awesome way.

We have been through all that. I think the former member for Moncton and the mother of the present member for Moncton has a golden shovel in her basement for digging some of the foundation for the causeway back in 1966. We can actually still see some of the roadwork and/or the mudwork of what was going to be a causeway.

My point in saying no to this bill is that even though it takes time the study should be complete. I know there have been hundreds of studies but not in this modern age of technology. In effect the federal government's own environmental panel said no to the bridge and said it is for some of the alternatives. My philosophical bias is against a link. I am not an islander but I love the island. I think an awful lot of people come to that island because it is the way it is. A fixed link, especially the bridge, is fundamentally going to change it.

I have tried to be easy on this because obviously as an Atlantic Canadian, as a maritimer, I want to see jobs in an area that is in dire straits in so many ways. Obviously anything that can help in the construction itself is going to be a pump-primer. It may be for political purposes, and that is not unreal and certainly a surprise. Perhaps that is the reason we are trying to move the thing along.

I really tried to be as rational as I could. I tried to give the benefit of the doubt, to take care of my bias, and determine if the project, the fixed link and/or the bridge, will be financially and economically feasible.

This is the other general objection. I admit my bias but I am trying to resolve my bias. What I fundamentally criticize the present government for is not coming clean. My objection to this bill would not be so fundamental and I might even go along with it to get it into committee if the government came clean and did not pretend it was going to cost only $800 million when we all know it is going to cost much more.

I only have to look at the most meaningful study that was commissioned on the fixed link and the bridge by Woods Gordon in 1987. It estimated that the bridge would cost $1.3 billion, not the $800 million that the minister talked about when he introduced this bill on February 8. If that was the estimate in 1987 just imagine what the estimate is today. If members who vote for this bill are honest with their taxpayer constituents—this place is in such disrepute because we try to play with figures and smoke and mirrors. How can anyone say the bridge will only cost $800 million? That is the figure I looked up while I was waiting to be recognized by Your Honour. On February 8 the minister said $800 million and that is in the press release.

The parliamentary secretary today said $850 million. What is $800 million or $850 million? That is a long way, millions, hundreds of millions, from the $1.3 billion estimate in 1987.

Members in favour of this bill should admit that it is not going to be $800 million; it is going to be $1.5 billion. It was $1.3 billion in 1987. Let us use our common sense. Let us look at another crossing linking mainland with an island, the chunnel in Europe from France to England.

Is it not interesting that in 1987 the estimate for the chunnel, that is the tunnel, was $9 billion? Yet, in actual fact today the cost is already $16 billion. That is private enterprise. It is not supposed to involve taxpayers' money. They are having some real difficulties because of contractor fights, and I do not have time to get into that.

The point is that a $9 billion estimate in 1987 has become a $16 billion cost today with overruns along the way. Who believes that the $1.3 billion estimate of Woods Gordon in 1987 will not grow in like fashion to not the $1.3 billion suggested in 1987 but closer to $2 billion if this thing ever goes ahead?

The other area in which there is a lot of misinformation is—and the hon. member for Calgary Southwest touched on it. The member for Esquimalt–Juan de Fuca made one of his typical and very bombastic contributions to this debate. It certainly was very interesting but I do not know how much light it shed. We can play with the figure of a $42 million subsidy a year for 35 years and say that is balanced against a $21 million subsidy that is actually paid to the ferries, and some years it is $21 million. However, the evidence really is that Marine Atlantic estimates that, using capital and operating costs that the member for Calgary Southwest mentioned, the figure for subsidy amortized over the 35–year period is $29.5 million. In other words, it is $30 million.

Let us assume that its figures are correct. We should not use the $21 million that is sometimes the subsidy in some years. Marine Atlantic has been great, the subsidy has been coming down and $21 million to $22 million has been the figure for the last few years. Using operating and capital costs and Marine Atlantic's own figures we get up to $29.5 million, or let us call it $30 million. Even $30 million is still $12 million less than the $42 million figure. There is an extra payment to help private enterprise of over $400 million.

There must be some frankness and openness here. Let the members who support this bill admit that the estimate is woefully low, that in 1987 figures it was $1.3 billion and it is going to be even more six years later. Let them admit that there is taxpayer money in this, that it is $42 million for 35 years, of which at least $12 million is extra and above whatever the subsidy is, so there is going to be a cost.

What happens at the end? After 35 years, after it has been built and run by the consortium, it is then given back to the Canadian taxpayer. I am not an engineer. However I certainly know about Lions Gate Bridge in Vancouver, British Columbia. Other colleagues have perhaps other ideas and knowledge about other bridges. A bridge over salt water, not to mention the salt that drips off the vehicles that are going to drive across it, has horrendous maintenance problems. While the life of the form of the bridge may be 100 years in Parliaments ahead when we are long gone the maintenance costs on an annual basis will be very close to the subsidy that is presently being given to the ferry.

That is something that should be considered as members consider this bill.

This bridge is almost like a Trojan Horse. There are a lot of nice things about it. It is going to create jobs. It is going to speed up some traffic. Let us take it in like the people of Troy did before their city crumbled. This is not a Trojan Horse but it is going to be a Trojan bridge. There are a lot of deceptive things that come with this bridge that will not do all the good things that many of the speakers here in this House, in their honest belief, have said it will.

• (1640)

Something that I am very concerned with, and that no one has touched on concerning this link to expedite traffic back and forth, is how the bridge is going to operate. It is very interesting that in all the studies done on the subject only part deals with how this bridge is going to operate.

The Department of Public Works has a document entitled Investigation Into the Effect of Wind on Vehicular Traffic. There are some pretty sobering statistics in it as to how fast people are going to go across that bridge in view of the wind on the Strait, compared to even waiting for the ferries.

The Public Works document points out that due to the height of the bridge—63 metres or around 200 feet at its highest point—and the fact that it is over a large body of water where strong winds prevail much of the time: "At 50 metres winds of 40 kilometres will occur 84 per cent of the time; winds between 40 and 50 kilometres will force traffic to slow down to 40 kilometres, extending crossing time from 13 to 22 minutes. As winds increase from 50 to 70 kilometres more drastic measures are required, including conveying empty trucks at low speed thus slowing all traffic. Winds over 50 kilometres exist over 40 per cent of the time. Winds of 70 to 100 kilometres will see traffic slow to 30 kilometres, and empty trucks will not be permitted to cross until the winds die down. Winds over 100 kilometres will see all cars conveyed at 20 kilometres, taking 39 minutes, or conversely the bridge could be shut down".

The time that has been mentioned in this debate so far about the expeditious crossing because of a bridge, 13 minutes, is only for ideal conditions. When the winds get over 50 kilometres, which is over half the time, then traffic starts to build up behind as cars funnel onto the bridge. It is not going to be quite the whizzing over and getting off, even though it is obviously a little more permanent than a ferry boat.

I believe the member for Egmont would know, but I think the ferry was only really closed down—I admit it has been delayed—about five days a year on average. I do not know if it is even five days but that is roughly the figure. Obviously people do have to wait in the summertime. The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca pointed out that people also have to wait for ferries in British Columbia to get to Vancouver Island; two or three sailings sometimes.

In any event, that is where the notion of the Trojan Horse comes into the picture. After all the debate up and down, and it is a mammoth structure, no one really knows just how much that wind over the ice pack and the Strait is going to slow down traffic.

I have tried to be reasonable and get other justifications for it. In my own hometown there is a professor of economics who is an expert on large megaprojects. He has done a study on the bridge and did a study of the Public Works study which was the justification for proceeding with the bridge. That was the Fiander-Good study of 1987.

Professor Townley, at Acadia, questions the very fundamentals of the economics of the bridge. He argues that one of the main economic feasibility studies done for Public Works by Fiander-Good in 1987 was seriously flawed. He says, among other things, that: "The economic feasibility of the fixed link has not been established". Further he says that: "Construction of a fixed link would impose a net loss on society. From this perspective a debate concerning the magnitude of any ensuing environmental damage would seem moot. Any damage at all would simply magnify this social loss". That is what Professor Townley says on page 18 of his article called "The Weakest Link" in Policy Options of July-August 1992.

Let me mention that because of Professor Townley's article there was another economic study commissioned to look into the economic feasibility of the bridge. Just recently another group has come out supporting his conclusions. I believe as a mainlander that the social order of P.E.I. will be fundamentally changed in a negative way, when it is all shaken out, which very well may have some negative impacts on the tourism industry that attracts people there by the droves in the summertime. Anne of Green Gables is going to become the witch of Cavendish if we do not watch out. We cannot really fully assess that. Then we look at some of the outside facts—starting with the environmental panel study that is fundamental if we believe in our own laws. You do that and it says not to go ahead. It says canvass some other alternatives and they have not been canvassed. Then you look at the fake figure of $800 million being used by the minister. Yet in 1987, six years ago, the figure was $1.3 billion. Compare that to what happened to the chunnel in 1987. It went from $9 billion to $16 billion. You are going to have the same ratio of increase. Then there is this figure you really can play with, the $42 million per year of subsidy.

In conclusion, because I know my time is just about up, on the $42 million I said you could be very reasonable. You cannot deny that $29.5 million or $30 million is the amortized subsidy. Therefore it is a $12 million difference. Politically and not getting into the buying of votes, what concerns me seriously as an Atlantic Canadian along with other Canadians, be they from British Columbia or elsewhere across the country who have been kind and good to Atlantic Canada, an area of regional and economic disparity, if I were just an ordinary taxpayer tuning on the television national news or prime time or whatever it is called now and saw that at this time of financial restraint when we are all supposed to be tightening our belts that the Government of Canada was proceeding with a fixed link that has been talked about since Confederation and proceeding against some of these reports, I as a taxpayer would have difficulty believing other things the government has said. To me in terms of Atlantic Canada which needs Canadian help it is something we should consider before we go any further with this.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the fixed link crossing to P.E.I. is something we have talked about over the past number of years. In fact, when we look at the province of Prince Edward Island and how it came into Confederation, it was predicated on that promise of assured linkage. We have gone from the steamers that originally crossed between P.E.I. and the mainland, the province of New Brunswick, and now we have resurrected the question of a fixed link. As I have alluded to, it is not the first time we have discussed this in the House. It had been discussed long before I arrived.

Hopefully we have come up with a plan that will work and one that I think most of us can accept once we have a chance to go through the numbers and find out what we presently have, what we are going to propose and whether or not it is a real alternative.

I will start by mentioning that in my riding of Carleton—Charlotte, there are three islands in the Bay of Fundy. As any member who has islands in their riding knows, it is quite difficult most of the time to visit them as frequently as you would like. Of those three islands I have Campobello Island, Deer Island and Grand Manan Island. One of those does have a fixed link now. Campobello Island is linked actually to mainland United States. Indeed, if you are a Canadian travelling to Campobello and you want to get there by automobile you have to travel through the continental United States to get there.

I can remember when that bridge was being built. It was something like the debate we are carrying on here today in the House of Commons. There are some interesting parallels between the debate to build a bridge to Campobello Island 30 years ago and the debate we are having here today. At that time there was mixed opinion as to whether there should be a bridge to Campobello Island. Of course, some of the arguments and some of the things we are hearing here today were suggested back then, such as the impact it would have on the fisheries and whether we could engineer a bridge to Campobello Island. But it was built. As I said, there was controversy at the time as to whether or not the people would accept it.

At the time, going back 30 years, I was just a very young boy, but I can remember there were some pretty strong arguments against it. At the end of the day, obviously the strong arguments for it won out.

It is interesting to note that the member of Parliament at the time who supported the construction of the bridge was defeated in the next election. Maybe the opposition members will take some comfort in that. It was a very emotional project at the time. If you visit the island of Campobello today, you will find that the people of that island support it to the tune of 95 to 100 per cent. It has been good and necessary for the island.

When we look at P.E.I., they are going through somewhat the same debate today. One of the things that was done in P.E.I. was to seek support from native islanders as to whether it was something they desired. Most of us accept the level of support given on the island for a fixed link. If my memory serves me correctly, 60 per cent of the islanders are in favour of a fixed link.

The argument in regard to cost is interesting. I believe that some members in the House are not putting forward an intellectually honest argument in the sense that there will be a burden of cost on the federal government if we proceed with the project. That has to be cleared up because indeed there is a cost to the Government of Canada today. When I talk about the Government of Canada , of course I am talking about the taxpayers. As we know, these are the people who really pay the bills.

Today there is a cost of maintaining that linkage to the mainland with the ferries. That amounts to about $27.5 million per year every year. That is the annual subsidy to maintain that link today but it is not the total cost. The total cost has to consider such things as the replacement ferries. As we all know in this House, any time you are operating a boat or a ferry, at some point you have to replace it.

We are told that the replacement cost on those ferries, and the member next to me can clarify this because I know that he has done some research on that, is in the order of $50 million in the next number of years.

Mr. Casey: $500 million.

Mr. Thompson: Five hundred million dollars. It is $50 million per vessel.

Mr. Casey: For half a vessel.

Mr. Thompson: For half a vessel. So he is saying $100 million per vessel.

This means a $500 million replacement cost, half a billion dollars. There is indeed an added expense at the end of the day when the present vessels get to the end of their life span. They are very close to that now.

There is one point I wish to pick up on, and I know that the minister of fisheries mentioned this in relation to some questions from the other side of the House coming from the member from British Columbia.

This is a project that normally the opposition would be screaming for. How many times in this House have we heard the opposition talking about putting money into infrastructure? How many times? We have heard it many times in this House, talk about kick-starting the economy. Let us get some public works projects off the ground and let us get this economy moving, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

That is exactly what this project is doing. If you wish, it is going to be a kick-start. I hate to use that word kick-start because it sounds as if you are just hooking jumper cables up to the economy and off it goes, as we often have to do with our automobiles here in the heart of winter. It is not quite that easy. Nonetheless, this project will be somewhere in the vicinity of $800 million. That is not an insignificant amount of money but it is going to be money that is raised through the private sector and put to work. It is not as if the Government of Canada is going to write a cheque for that $800 million. That is coming from the private sector, so it will be a project that will sustain itself.

The annual cost to the Government of Canada will not exceed the cost that we presently have today, $27.5 million, because there will be upkeep costs and other assorted costs in maintaining a structure of that kind.

I cannot understand the opposition members' argument or opposition to this project because they want megaprojects, they want money injected into local economies and particularly the poorer parts of Canada. This is a big project. It is one I do not think they should fly in the face of.

Again it is moneys being put up by the private sector, not the Government of Canada. It is important to lay that out very squarely. Our costs will not exceed the fixed costs that we presently have to maintain the ferry service.

The other argument I think is a very unfair one. As I mentioned before, the fisheries minister did speak on this and took up the clinical argument that this was a political project with a political agenda behind it, the re-election of Conservative members of Parliament.

We do not have any members of Parliament sitting on this side of the House from Prince Edward Island. I wish we did. There are some members from the other side that I see here today from the Liberal Party who represent that island. There are four seats on P.E.I., none of which government members hold. There is one vacancy there and maybe we will have a shot at it but we are not doing it for that reason.

An hon. member: You do not have a chance.

Mr. Thompson: The member across is suggesting we do not have a chance at it. Maybe he is right, but time will tell. It is like a baseball game. You really cannot tell until it is over. Yogi Berra told us: "It's not over till its over".

That political argument is very shallow. I see the member over there nodding his head. He agrees it is a very shallow argument. We are doing the project and putting it together because it is the right thing to do for P.E.I. and it is the right thing to do for Atlantic Canada. We as New Brunswickers have a very keen interest in this project and want it to go ahead.

I want to step through about 10 points and these are key points that the P.E.I. government agreed to. It wanted it settled and agreement on it before it would agree to go ahead. I will go through those 10 points. I think I do have time.

An hon. member: The Ten Commandments.

Mr. Thompson: The member from Nova Scotia is suggesting the Ten Commandments. The P.E.I. government was pretty rigid in these and we did give the government and the people of P.E.I. reassurance on each and every one of these.

One, an assurance that the P.E.I. highway system would have the capacity to handle the extra traffic that will be generated, and indeed there will be extra traffic generated. It should be a big boon for the island economy.

Two, an assurance that the Wood Island ferry service would be maintained. That has been given.

Three, the right to consult with the federal government on the establishment of tolls. That has been agreed to.

Four, fair treatment of displaced ferry workers—very important—including job training, relocation assistance and early retirement benefits because many of those workers are concerned and legitimately so, especially in an economy where there are not a lot of options. That is something we have considered. It is nice to see that assurance has been given.

Five, the federal agreement to study further development opportunities for the Borden area to offset any negative effects of the project because their economy is based on that ferry run, or a degree of their economy.

• (1700)

Six, the assurance that the economic benefits to Atlantic Canada during the construction phase would be maximized. We all want to see that.

Seven, assurance that the project would meet the strict environmental criteria under the federal environmental assessment and review process. We are working in that regard.

Eight, compensation for fishermen whose livelihood may be adversely affected. That assurance has been given.

Nine, assurance that the fixed link will include a utility corridor at a reasonable cost to the province.

Ten, the Government of Prince Edward Island wished to ensure that the interests of its people were taken into full account before it would agree to proceed. It did agree to proceed in December. In December 1992 the province was satisfied that the conditions it had stipulated—those that I just outlined—had been met. As far as I am concerned they have been met and it will be a green light for this fixed project.

In conclusion, all I can say is that if they are going argue, and I do not think they are arguing too strenuously on the other side of the House, particularly those from Atlantic Canada, please argue on the basis of the project. Let us not float around some of these phoney numbers in regard to the cost to the federal government because there is no cost over and above the costs of maintaining those very ferries today.

I am proud to support this project. We would all like to see that it goes ahead.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the member indicated he supports this bill. I wonder whether he has consulted with the Micmac people in New Brunswick as to their position on the fixed link because I understand from my sources that they are not in favour of it.

I would also like to ask him if he is aware that the environmental assessment of the generic project recommended that the project not proceed. If he believes in the laws of Canada why does he now think that it is all right for the government to proceed?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I have not had any correspondence with the Micmac people regarding this project. If the member does have correspondence and concerns raised by that particular group, if I could have a look at it I could understand the basis of her argument. However, I have not had any correspondence in that regard.

Concerning the environmental aspects, there is some misinformation with regard to the ice-out factor in the construction or the use of that facility. I think that has been clarified by the federal government and environmental experts who have looked at the project.

The record clearly indicates those considerations have been looked at. I do not believe it creates a problem that would jeopardize the structure at all. In fact the life of this structure—it is important that we put this on the record—as engineered is 100 years. It is important to state that because obviously it is a cost factor to be considered, the replacement of an existing bridge. Therefore, a 100-year life span is something that we can all take some comfort in, knowing it is not an expense which we will have to look at down the road in 25 or 30 years as some are suggesting.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in this debate as a Canadian who supports efforts to ensure that weaker regions of the country have investment in their infrastructure and investment in their economies.

I also speak as a Canadian who spent 12 years living and working in the maritimes, and feel some appreciation of the particular problems of that region. I was in Prince Edward Island last week and among other things heard from ordinary citizens in Prince Edward Island of their opposition to the fixed link.

I am pleased to support the suggestion of my colleague, the member for Skeena, that rather than go ahead because of the ineffectual and faulty environmental assessment which has taken place, we refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Environment so we can fully investigate the environmental implications of the link.

At least a couple of hoaxes are being perpetrated on some Canadians and on the people of Prince Edward Island. I will go into them in more detail afterwards but first of all, the government has said an effective environmental assessment review process has taken place when in fact that is not the case. To the extent that a environmental review by independent assessors has taken place the link has been shown to fall short of an appropriate environmental response.

Second, the hoax of the economics of the issue is being portrayed as advantageous and economically a good deal for Canada, a good deal for Prince Edward Island. The fixed link falls short on this basis too as I will relate.

The fixed link is being portrayed as being something that Prince Edward Islanders want. If we look at the question that was asked Prince Edward Islanders regarding the transportation issue between the island and the mainland, we will see that it is by no means clear that this fixed link is what Islanders chose.

We have, as we so often do, a situation where the Liberal members of Parliament, in this case from Prince Edward Island and from elsewhere, support a project proposed by the Conservative government. Both Liberals and Conservatives, two peas in a pod, are arguing the same points, ignoring the environmental implications of such an important project and the economic implications of such an important project. They are ignoring warnings from their own people in Prince Edward Island about the effects of the link.

My New Democratic Party colleagues and those whom I spoke with in Prince Edward Island last week are opposed to this plan for a fixed link because we are just talking here about a bridge. We are opposed because an appropriate environmental assessment review process was never carried out. We are opposed because the company which has the most interest in ensuring that this goes ahead, SCI, has really had phoney information sessions across the province to come up with the answers that it wanted in support of the link.

I want to speak a little about the issue itself, about the problems of the ferry service. Seven hundred ferry jobs are at stake. If we take the ferry away and if we add others affected, perhaps 1,200 people will lose their jobs as a result of this project.

While there may be 1,000 or so jobs involved in building the fixed link, there will only be jobs while the link is being built. They will not be long-term jobs.

Many have asked questions about a better ferry service, an improved ferry service, rather than a fixed link. Across the world there are hydrofoils, hovercraft, as well as conventional ferries making fast, comfortable journeys for commercial and recreational purposes, making journeys further than those which are involved in Prince Edward Island. Somehow they get by without wasting billions of dollars on a bridge.

It is well recognized that the purchase of two additional ships would deal with the present problems of delays by those attempting to use the ferry service. Two new ferries would cost infinitely less, I think around $4 million, and would provide a service without the waiting for those going to and from the island. That is a far better investment than the over $1.5 billion which is being suggested for this link.

If we were really serious about dealing with the transportation issue on Prince Edward Island, we could solve it by providing a couple of extra ferries. We could save those 1,200 jobs and provide a service which would be satisfactory to those on the island.

I would like to go on to talk about the environmental impact. Clearly we would see increased environmental impact in a number of ways. If all those cars drove across on the fixed link, the environmental impact would be far greater than the impact of the ferries crossing over. That alone should be reason for concern.

The studies which have been done concerning the environment have given rise to serious concerns which have never been answered by the federal government except to the extent that the federal government has ignored them and set them aside. Never at any time did it provide extra information, facts or back-up for the arguments and the concerns raised by the environmental assessment which has taken place.

There are problems with ice being trapped and there are problems with the fishery. They cannot be ignored. It is not clear at all from the research which has been done that the ice problems can be solved and that they will not give rise to serious environmental damage.

The studies point to serious problems. The only response the federal government could make to the federal environmental assessment panel which recommended against building the bridge was to conclude that these ice problems were manageable. There was not any effective justification for that conclusion.

We should be concerned when the fishermen of Prince Edward Island unanimously oppose the fixed link on the grounds that it will harm their fishery. We heard a great deal today how this fixed link will not harm the fishery. Why then would representatives of the 773 island fishermen resolve at their annual meeting on February 6 to oppose the construction of the bridge until effective environmental assessment has been conducted and the true impact of the bridge could be assessed.

Surely we cannot ignore the views of those who work and live off the fishery in the vicinity of where the link will be built. Why would we want to do that? Why would we want to fly in the face of their advice with regard to the potential problems to the fishery?

In 1990 there was an Environmental Assessment Review Panel. It was the federal government's own panel. It rejected a fixed link for a number of reasons, such as the marine ecosystems and agricultural micro-climates arising from the potential for delayed spring ice melting. There is the risk of damage to spawning grounds. We have limited knowledge of the Northumberland Strait ecosystem which makes it difficult to predict the environmental impact of such a link.

The review panel opposed the construction of a link because it was regarded as being incompatible with sustainable development and because inadequate consideration was given to the cumulative impact of building such a link.

The panel also opposed the link because of the difficulties in finding socially acceptable work solutions for displaced ferry workers and fishermen and because of inadequate consideration of the environmental and ecological impact on Prince Edward Island as a result of increased patterns of tourist growth. There were also problems concerning land use issues in Prince Edward Island.

In its conclusion, the panel said there is a need for an improved transportation system between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, something we all accept. However, after careful consideration the panel concluded that the risk of harmful effects of the proposed bridge concept is unacceptable.

The panel therefore recommended that the project not proceed. Instead of taking notice of that review panel, the federal government basically ignored it, issued a report of its own and said the review panel's concerns about the construction and operation of the bridge were either mistaken, misguided or easily dealt with.

It is a hoax to say we have had effective environmental assessment of the fixed link. It appears to be the case that both the provincial Liberal government and the federal Conservative government are prepared to turn a blind eye to any harmful environmental impacts.

I think it is clear that there are enormous gaps in information, data and understanding of how this region works. It would be totally unacceptable to move ahead without a more effective environmental review of the situation. On the basis of environmental concerns, the fixed link just does not stand up. Prince Edward Islanders deserve better from their provincial Liberal government and their federal Conservative government as well as their Liberal MPs who do not seem to be speaking for ordinary Prince Edward Islanders but for the business community and are not at all interested in the true impacts on Prince Edward Island life and the sea around the link.

I would just like to close by making a few comments about the economics of this fixed link. At the moment Marine Atlantic, which is responsible for the ferry services, is one of the island's largest employers with a wage bill of almost $17 million. Over the 35 years, the time for which the federal government would replace the cost of running the ferries with a subsidy to this private corporation which will be building and running the link, that would constitute some $588 billion lost to Prince Edward Island. That does not include any increases in workers' salaries and wages over that time.

Prince County in Prince Edward Island experiences the highest level of unemployment of all the counties on the island. The loss there as a result of building this link rather than continuing with an improved ferry service, which would be entirely feasible and economical, would be 422 jobs or some $430 million over that period of time.

The economic impact on the region most affected would be catastrophic to say the least.

If the ferry service was improved it would be an economically sustainable method of transportation. If we maintained and expanded it we could address the concerns of Prince Edward Islanders and those who wish to visit there for both commercial and tourist reasons.

A study conducted for the Department of Public Works also makes it clear that the economic viability of this project is a serious problem. In a report by Gardner Pinfold in 1992, the conclusion is made that if economic viability is an important criterion for proceeding with the project, it would be advisable to conduct a more rigorous analysis.

The conclusion of another report by Professor Townley of Acadia University mentioned by my colleague earlier states that the economic assessments which have been done do not establish the economic viability of a fixed crossing.

There are serious economic and environmental questions about the viability of this fixed link. When Prince Edward Islanders were asked whether or not they were in favour of a link between the mainland and Prince Edward Island they were not faced with the question of bridge only, they were faced with a choice between a bridge and a tunnel. They were also asked whether or not more research should be done on the project.

• (1720)

The response from Prince Edward Islanders is ambiguous with regard to their acceptability of the link. If any members care to visit Prince Edward Island they will find many islanders opposed to the link for the reasons I have mentioned, primarily environmental and because they fear that the island's way of life will be destroyed forever.

It is unfortunate that none of the Liberals MPs from Prince Edward Island will speak out on behalf of those who raised serious questions about the impact of this link.

This is an attempt to improve the economic situation of Prince Edward Island and it is to be supported. We cannot go around this country building megaprojects which harm the environment. We cannot continue to treat the environment as if it does not count or cost anything, as if the implications on it do not have a major impact on our future way of life.

We know that our environment is in serious danger, yet the government and the Liberal Party are prepared to go ahead with this link in spite of those environmental concerns.

It would be foolhardy and environmentally dangerous, and economically it does not make sense.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is really puzzling to me why the NDP members are so opposed to development in Atlantic Canada and particularly in Prince Edward Island.

They drop in to my province for a few hours occasionally during the year and suddenly become experts on the province. They know very well that the labour unions in Prince Edward Island are in favour of the fixed link. I have letters in my office from the labour unions of Prince Edward Island supporting the link.

Officially the fishermen's associations would like to have an environmental assessment but many fishermen in Prince Edward Island support the fixed link. It is okay for the New Democratic Party to stand up and give all the reasons why we cannot have any development there. It is okay to support the St. Lawrence Seaway which ruined our ports in Atlantic Canada many years ago. We continue to support that seaway which goes to Thunder Bay and takes the prairie grain out to the Atlantic. It is okay to support weight subsidy for grain transport to British Columbia ports but it is not okay for Prince Edward Island to have a link to the mainland to facilitate the transport of its products to market.

I find it really incredulous that the NDP continues to harp and harp, in this manner, about a bridge across the Northumberland Strait. It is time to vote on this and take it to second reading so we can review what has been done. We can review the 92 environmental studies that have been done over the past seven years. We can review and question the economics of this proposal.

I am really tired of listening to this type of criticism from the New Democratic Party. We should vote on this and get it to second reading so we can bring in our expert witnesses from all sides. Then we can satisfy ourselves as members of Parliament whether or not this is a feasible project.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the member has not been listening to much of what has been going on in the House today because it is clear that New Democrats are not opposed to economic development in any region of Canada. Indeed, we fully support efforts to improve the economic situation of Prince Edward Island.

It would be foolhardy to ignore the environmental implications because in the long term that will not benefit Prince Edward Island or Prince Edward Islanders.

It would be foolhardy to support the legislation to implement the fixed link in principle without fully considering its implications. You cannot go ahead and ignore the economic and environmental consequences of such a major project. It makes much more sense to make our assessments first before supporting the issue in principle.

I do not want to suggest to the Liberal members of Parliament from Prince Edward Island how to do their jobs, even though they do not like us to criticize the environmental and adverse economic implications of this link. Surely they should be a little more holistic and concerned about the total impact of something of this magnitude. They should be asking more effective questions about what the impact of this link would be.

The member mentioned the trade unions in Prince Edward Island. He will no doubt be aware of a recent letter written to the newspapers in Prince Edward Island from the president of the Prince Edward Island Federation of Labour where serious questions were raised about the economic and environmental implications of the link. His letter says: "I only hope that the Islanders promoting the bridge are right because a lot of people will be hurt and hurt severely if they are wrong". That hardly seems to constitute support for such a major project.

Let us just stop for a moment and consider the economic and environmental implications. Let us not just go full speed ahead without considering these implications.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the ability to enter the debate this afternoon. I think it is important for someone from the middle of Canada to take the time to express the relevance of this specific piece of legislation to the House.

I know that this government and this cabinet minister, the Minister of Public Works, are very concerned about public transportation issues. He went to great lengths to resolve a very significant transportation issue within my own constituency.

There is a certain amount of hypocrisy coming from the NDP. When we were trying to resolve this issue in my riding the members opposite criticized the government for not moving quickly enough to resolve a transportation issue. Today the members opposite are criticizing the government for possibly moving too fast.

I would like to move into a little more reserved and detailed presentation. I would like to thank those who took the time to help me do the research on this particular piece of my presentation because it is quite detailed and it is quite important that it be added to the debate.

I first want to address the history of our transportation links to Prince Edward Island and how this incredible project will benefit the people of the island and the Atlantic provinces.

Under the 1873 conditions of union with Prince Edward Island, the government committed to, and I quote: "maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers".

Since the earliest days of Confederation the federal government has placed a high priority on meeting its commitment to the province to provide a transportation link to the island.

I would like to explain how we have met our commitment to the province to link the island with the rest of Canada over the years.

Prior to 1917 the routing of marine service for the carriage of passengers and freight to the island changed with the seasons. Ferry terminals were built at Borden and Cape Tormentime to coincide with the introduction of a new ice-breaking ferry, the SS Prince Edward Island. This ferry entered service in 1917 and provided the first capability to carry rail cars to the island.

In 1923 the Canadian National Railway began to operate this service. The SS Charlottetown was introduced in 1923 as a companion to the SS Prince Edward Island. However, in 1941 the SS Charlottetown ran aground and was a total loss.

The first diesel-powered vessel, the MV Abegweit was introduced to the service in 1947 and was capable of carrying both autos and rail cars. The MV Confederation was introduced to service in 1962 and later moved to the Wood Islands-Caribou route.

In 1968 the MV John Hamilton Gray was constructed for the service at a cost of $14 million at which time the SS Prince Edward Island was retired. The mainstays of the Prince Edward Island fleet, the MV Holiday Island and the MV Vacationland, have been serving the island since 1971. These vessels introduced navigational efficiencies to the service because they have a unique navigation propulsion system which has proven to be both efficient and effective. In 1982 the old MV Abegweit was replaced by a new MV Abegweit, a large modern ice-breaker. I understand it was a considerable expense to the government to build that particular ferry.

When Marine Atlantic was incorporated in the mid-1980s it was entrusted with the responsibility to operate and maintain the Borden-Cape Tormentine ferry service on behalf of the federal government. While it is financially dependent on the federal government, over recent years Marine Atlantic has made some improvements to the level of cost recovery for its ferry operations, to the extent possible, given the economic realities of Atlantic Canada. This has been achieved by reducing costs and increasing revenue levels wherever possible.

It must be kept in mind though that the cost of capital acquisitions for the ferry service is high. A recent estimate of the cost to replace one of the vessels in the Prince Edward Island fleet puts the capital costs of the vessel at $95 million. I think some of my colleagues have mentioned the high cost of investment earlier in the debate; in fact, there was one commentary where one of the most recent vessels added to the fleet cost in excess of $200 million. It is a very expensive venture.

The federal government has also provided financial assistance for the ferry service operating between Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island and Caribou, Nova Scotia. This has been operating since 1938. The operation of this service has been provided by the Northumberland Ferries Ltd. since 1941.

The House may recall that the government is investing over $60 million for the construction of a new ship for the Wood Islands run. This includes the construction of the terminals necessary and all the infrastructure to get this initiative up and running. This initiative has resulted in the creation of jobs in Pictou and Caribou, Nova Scotia and Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island, in addition to providing an important addition to the ferry transportation link between the island and Nova Scotia.

It is the view of the government that the transportation sector is part of the basic infrastructure of Canada. Transportation is essential to the daily economic and social life of this great nation by joining the many regions and moving goods and people from coast to coast. The construction of a bridge to span the nine miles from Borden, Prince Edward Island to Cape Tormentine on the mainland is one of the largest private sector engineering challenges ever to be undertaken in this country.

I come from Manitoba where hydroelectricity is a very significant part of our infrastructure and I know what the results are of these significant projects on the provincial economy. The fact that a new hydro development project in Manitoba is up and running has a significant impact on all the communities throughout Manitoba, and I would expect that this construction project will have a very significant impact on the economies of all the Atlantic provinces.

I am pleased to acknowledge the hard work of my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, in bringing this important project to its present stage. He has met the challenges of a complex public environmental review process and he has studied and complied with stringent environmental criteria related to the bridge design.

The unique approach to this project whereby the bridge will be financed, constructed, owned, operated and maintained by the private sector has been developed in an effort to minimize the cost to government. While the developer will assume all normal construction, operation and maintenance risks, in return it will receive an annual government subsidy for a period of 35 years.

It is important to note that paying a subsidy for 35 years will result in a bridge that for the remaining 65 years of its expected design life will require no government subsidy assistance at all. This represents a significant future saving to Canadian taxpayers. In addition the operation and maintenance of the bridge will be funded on a user-pay basis through the collection of tolls.

We have debated a number of times over the last while in the House on the user-pay theory that has been put forward by this government. This is just another prime example where user pay is the appropriate way to go and is in support of any one of a number of government functions.

It is important to note that an estimated 3,500 person-years of employment will be created in the Atlantic region over the five-year construction period directly related to the bridge project. We can also talk about the fact that there are significant spin-offs outside the bridge project itself.

We cannot and do not ignore the fact that there will also be an enormous impact on the present Marine Atlantic ferry workers. We hope it will be found that an acceptable compensation and adjustment package will be in place to assist these employees who have contributed so much to their communities.

Nonetheless we are undertaking this project because we firmly believe that this bridge will have an enormous effect on modernizing transportation access to the island. We certainly anticipate with optimism that the dramatic improvement in accessibility to the island will have a very positive impact on Prince Edward Island's tourism industry.

A modern Canadian transport system is important to Canadian consumers and to our industrial sectors. Efficient transportation access is directly related to the competitiveness of Canadian goods and services on markets at home and abroad. For these reasons the federal government has always been and will continue to be committed to the future of the transportation industry in Canada.

In closing, it is my hope that all members of the House will join me in supporting Bill C-110 so that we may proceed with this important and historic national undertaking. I look forward to the question being put and the vote being taken.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to enter into the debate on the fixed link project.

The $900 million bridge proposed by Strait Crossing would replace federally subsidized ferry service between the two provinces. The government is willing to provide the developer with an annual subsidy over the next 35 years which would otherwise go to the ferry. The subsidy would then disappear with the government assuming ownership of the bridge which has a design life of 100 years.

This sizeable project of $900 million has not undergone the proper environmental studies, the proper socioeconomic studies. The ferry workers are also stating that they are unhappy with the lack of information coming from the premier's office on a compensation package should they lose their jobs to the link. They want answers and they want them soon. These are the kinds of things to be done before and not after a project is undertaken.

I come from British Columbia where there are many of these big megaprojects. I was the mayor of the city of Revelstoke when the big hydroelectric dams went in there. We had virtually three years of studies on the socioeconomic impact and how it affects communities. Where will the gravel come from for the massive amount of cement that is going to be used? What kind of environmental effects is that going to have on those parts of the country? What kinds of effects is it going to have on the communities close by? What will be the social impact on those communities? None of these questions have been answered.

In November the finance minister came in with a megaproject just before an election, a $900 million project for P.E.I., a link from P.E.I. to the mainland. He came in with this massive project. One of the main contractors is based in Calgary. Someone comments about the political impact of those four members of Parliament.

• (1740)

I would ask the political question: What about the donations to the federal parties? What about political donations to the governing party? A project of this magnitude is interesting. We will not find that out until the election is over and we look at the Election Expenses

Act to find out who contributed to the Conservative Party and who brought forward these kinds of funds. There is a long list of items.

I also want to talk about what happens when projects of this size come on stream, how they affect the communities, how they affect the hospitals that are needed, how they affect the services, the ambulance services and various other services that are required.

A community needs some time to know where the gravel is coming from, where the social base is coming from, where the education is coming from, and where the structure is going to be set in place to bring this about. Evidently the Liberals and the Conservatives have no concern about that. The main thing is to get the project on stream.

There is a ferry service in place that is handling that service, that transportation. There is no need for rushing on the part of the government to push through a project like this one. There is a need for people to go to work and the social impacts of that. We have called for infrastructure programs with municipalities. We have called for training of employees to get workers back. Why is the government not looking at these kinds of programs rather than this hare-brained idea of a fixed link to the mainland? If the government were to look at these kinds of projects, I would give it one.

There is a piece of highway from Banff National Park to Golden, British Columbia. It can only be described as a cow trail. I have been in contact with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance stating that the highway should be upgraded. We have a four-lane highway from Calgary to Banff. It goes down to a two-lane highway and then hits Field, British Columbia, and can only be described as a cow trail.

There is a court case going on in Golden right now, or in the Kootenays, with regard to serious accidents that have taken place on that piece of highway which was never built to number one TransCanada Highway standards. There is 18 per cent unemployment in the Kootenays. Here is a project the government could have gone into if it wanted to bring about programs to upgrade our transportation systems and meet the needs of the future.

I do not want to say to P.E.I. that it should not have its projects or that it should not have its methods. However, surely to goodness when we have the debt structure this government is talking about there are ways to upgrade ferry services such as we have done in British Columbia, to bring that about and to look at the other programs available to us.

Infrastructure in Canada, our sewer systems, our water systems and various other systems in our municipalities, can only be described as deplorable in many areas. The municipalities want to go, in many cases the provinces want to go, and the federal government says no, that it will not participate in those kinds of programs.

We do have a problem. We have a government that is trying just before an election to come out with some megaprojects, not only to create one of its dreams in the Atlantic provinces but to provide some funding for its next election campaign from big contractors who bid on these projects and donate to the government of the day. It uses those kinds of projects to get itself re-elected. It is in a kind of dream world with regard to these types of projects.

The project will not bring about the fiscal responsibilities that should be in a transportation act. It will not provide the kind of employment that is needed across Canada. It will not provide competitiveness. Some members over there like to use the word competitiveness: "We need some competitiveness in this government to be able to be competitive in the world market". Where is it going to bring about the competitiveness? While this link is being built, Canadian Pacific Railway is talking about tearing up its tracks.

Here is the government using government money to subsidize a bridge while the railways are saying they are going to tear up the tracks. The railways should be paying for that bridge, if that is what they are going to do. If they are going to tear up that track, with all of the lands and all of the assets they were given, the railways should be the ones that are providing the fixed link so that the transportation can come by truck, if that is what the railways are deciding.

Why is the government taking the—

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 108(1)(a) and (b), the order of reference of June 13, 1991 of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, and the order of reference of February 17, 1993 of the House, your subcommittee has considered matters relating to the recodification of the general part of the Criminal Code and your subcommittee agreed to make recommendations for a recodified general part of the Criminal Code.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109 the subcommittee requests a comprehensive response to this report within 150 days.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-408, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (maternity benefits for adoptive mothers).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, this bill would give women who adopt children the same rights to maternity leave as women who become pregnant. It would also permit a claimant to take an extended period to care for a child with a physical, psychological or emotional condition when a child is less than six months of age upon arrival at the claimant's home.

Today the current system financially penalizes adoptive parents even though they provide very useful roles and service to our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Pagtakhan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this petition is hereby certified correct as to form and content. It contains 28 signatures but represents over 3,000 signatures which I have received on behalf of people who are opposed to the importation of the killer cards.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of central British Columbia who are dedicated in their opposition to the plan to divert part of the North Thompson River in an effort to sell the water in the San Diego, California area.

The petitioners are of the opinion that the North America free trade agreement will facilitate this. This concerns them obviously and they ask that the government take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that Canadian waters will never be diverted into the United States.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Val d'Or, Sullivan, Barraute, La Motte, Saint-Dominique-du-Rosaire, Saint-Félix, Villemontel, Senneterre and the Senior Citizens Club of Val-Senneville, all in the riding of Abitibi. Your petitioners say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that the freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting on acts of violence, and that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels and on radio may act as a stimulus for similar violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have several thousand signatures to present today on petitions. This will make over 1,400,000 signatures we have received from across Canada from people who are in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers. They feel that many people in Canada are vulnerable with little protection under the current criminal justice system, the Criminal Code, and that women, children and disabled persons are particularly at risk.

These signatures request that Parliament recognize crimes of violence against the person as serious and abhorrent to society. They ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present this petition on behalf of Canadians from Winnipeg, the maritimes and other areas. Apparently meningococcal disease has taken many lives of children in Canada. A test kit that can detect all types of this disease in its early stages now exists.

These petitioners pray that Parliament call upon the Department of National Health and Welfare to ensure that this test kit is fully developed so that our citizens may fully benefit from it.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present this morning. The first comes from people in my constituency who are most concerned about the question of child poverty in this country.

In their petition they note that the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion in 1989 expressing its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty. They also note that the House of Commons established the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petition indicates some of the continuing realities of poverty for children in Canada. It concludes with the petitioners who have signed it praying and calling upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm that 1989 commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from people in the town of Essex in my constituency who organized a series of events including a petition last year to promote pride in being Canadian.

They indicate in this petition that they believe it is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada. They suggest that through the "Proud to be a Canadian" project brought forward by Kinsmen and Kinette clubs throughout Canada an opportunity should be provided for Canadians to nurture a strong relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too have pleasure in presenting a petition from my riding that reminds the House that we unanimously passed a resolution on November 24, 1989 expressing concern for the more than one million Canadian children living in poverty and setting the goal of eliminating child poverty by the year 2000.

The petition reminds us all that child poverty represents increasing costs in the health care system, the justice system, social welfare, school dropouts, loss of productivity and, more important, loss of human potential.

The United Nations convention includes a moral and legal obligation to do as the petition asks and to implement plans to eliminate child poverty in the next seven years as we have said we would do.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I too have two petitions reminding the House of the unanimous resolution of November 24, 1989 that the House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and resolve to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

• (1020)

The petitioners remind the House of the enormous cost for Canada of allowing unalleviated this poverty to continue. They ask us to work toward achieving the goal of eliminating child poverty by the year 2000.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting for consideration to the House second reading of Bill C-92, a bill that proposes to amend the Income Tax Act and various other acts.

This bill will implement a number of important measures that were first announced in the February 1992 budget. It delivers on a key undertaking of this government to cut spending so that we can cut taxes and foster growth and competitiveness. As well, the bill includes a number of technical amendments to the Income Tax Act.

I see my hon. friend across the way grinning because it seems like we never stop introducing and implementing technical amendments. While this package is rather comprehensive in that light we hope that it will remove quite a backlog that has accumulated over time.

The budget measures in many respects reflect the views of Canadians in the very comprehensive cross-Canada consultation process that I conducted prior to the February 1992 budget. In the course of that the message that I received very loud and clear was the fact that Canadians expect their governments to cut spending. They want the deficit controlled. They want measures taken to stimulate growth and encourage job creation. They want to see investments made that will produce wealth and in a productive way stimulate and generate growth and wealth for the economy.

Most of all, they want a lower tax burden because Canadians believe that they have been overly burdened with the level of taxes. This bill reflects that and reflects those principles outlined in the budget of February 1992.

As well, the technical amendments contained in the bill reflect the constructive input which we have received from taxpayers and their advisers over the past few years. The aim of these amendments is to maintain and enhance the equity and efficiency of the tax system. This represents an important element of the tax system and our commitment to strengthen the Canadian economy by removing impediments and distortions caused by the tax system.

As I said, while this is a fairly large package it does remove a backlog that has accumulated for quite some time. Our hope is to proceed with this on a more regular basis so that we will not have to deal with such a large number of initiatives and perhaps will deal with it on a more frequent basis in a much more manageable way.

In outlining the measures in this bill I would like to begin with a description of some of the tax reductions that are being proposed. First, Bill C-92 would give legislative approval to the 1 per cent reduction in the surtax on the personal income tax that came into effect on July 1, 1992.

As well, there is the additional one percentage point reduction that came into effect on January 1, 1993. With these measures announced in the budget, the surtax declines in two stages from 5 per cent of the basic federal tax to 3 per cent.

In this connection, all 14.6 million Canadian taxpayers will benefit from these reductions. For example, the single taxpayer earning $30,000 would receive a reduction of federal tax of $76 in 1993. A one income couple with two children and earnings of $50,000 would receive a reduction of $162 in federal tax this year.

These steps are expected to reduce federal revenues in this fiscal year, 1992-93, by some $500 million. The total impact over the period 1992-93 to 1996-97 is expected to amount to $6.6 billion. I should point out that these reductions are being covered by cutting expenditures elsewhere in government consistent with the theme of what we heard as we travelled across the country.

As well, these tax reductions reflect a central aspect of the government's philosophy on how best to foster growth. We believe that Canadians can make better and more productive use of their money than governments can. Our philosophy is that the more money we can leave in people's pockets the better it will be for our economy. That is a constant theme that we have followed and will continue to follow to the very best of our ability.

In addition a number of changes are implemented here for Canadian business. The goal of these initiatives is to assist companies in the manufacturing and processing sector as they restructure their operations and take advantage of the opportunities presented by the new age of globalization and the challenges presented by the increasing competitiveness in world markets.

The manufacturing and processing sector, as we are all aware, accounts for about one-fifth of Canada's domestic product. The economic health of this sector is therefore vital to the over-all health of the Canadian economy. It is also a sector that has perhaps been exposed more to international competition and adjustment in restructuring than any other sector.

All sectors of course have been exposed but this one has in a particular way been exposed. As a result of the exposure it is expected that the manufacturing and processing sector must become more productive and more competitive. In the course of that it means the challenge of producing more goods with fewer people.

That is an adjustment we have seen witnessed in the agricultural sector. We now see it happening in the manufacturing sector. That is part of the evolution of a vibrant world economy. Our goal and our aim is to assist in the process of facilitating that adjustment process. It is also to ensure that our Canadian industry is competitive, that it can compete in world markets, because so much of our vitality depends upon the export sector.

This exposure can only grow as trade and investment barriers continue to fall throughout the world and as technological advances make it possible for companies to have increasing flexibility as to where they locate their production facilities.

This does indeed provide challenges and opportunities for Canadian firms to expand and grow, building on their success to date and building upon our ability to compete. Currently 40 per cent of the manufacturing and processing output of these firms is exported. That clearly demonstrates the importance of the export market. It also forces a discipline on Canadian industry and governments to ensure that they have the appropriate structure, the appropriate financial environment and the appropriate investment environment in place so that companies engaged in this very important sector can extract the maximum of productivity and efficiency.

It is with this in mind that we propose to reduce the tax rate on income, the income tax on corporations derived from the manufacturing and processing, from 23 per cent to 21 per cent in two stages. The first decline takes effect on January 1, 1993. The second one is scheduled for January 1, 1994. The tax reduction complements two other measures announced in the budget. The first is a commitment to negotiate with other countries with respect to the deduction of withholding taxes. The second is an increase in the allowable capital cost allowance for manufacturing and processing equipment.

• (1030)

In that case we reduced effective budget night, February 25, the capital cost allowance. We increased it from 25 per cent to 30 per cent. When taken all together, the three corporate tax measures would mean that a Canadian manufacturing company not subject to the withholding tax would be subject to a significantly lower statutory tax rate in Canada than its competition in the U.S., 35 per cent versus 39 per cent, again demonstrating the thrust of this budget to improve the competitiveness for the Canadian sector.

For a company that is a subsidiary of the U.S. parent, total income and withholding tax would be less in Canada than it is in the United States.

We took these steps to provide incentives that would encourage investment and build a healthy economy and of course to create jobs, to secure the stability and the strength of those existing companies and to nurture and encourage other companies to become involved and take advantage of the newly emerging economy.

We know that from time to time we have to adjust our investment measures to ensure that they reflect the fiscal reality of the government, that they respond to economic conditions and that we get the best value for the taxpayers' dollars that are provided through these incentives.

To this end Bill C–92 proposes to target the lifetime exemption for capital gains toward more equity investment. In other words it will try to encourage more investment in firms that produce well, that generate jobs and generate economic activity.

The Income Tax Act therefore will be amended to no longer provide the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption on real estate purchased after February 1992 and to restrict it on real estate purchased before March 1992.

For the greater certainty of this particular measure, I would like to clarify some important points. First, this change does not apply to real estate used in active business. Second, it does not affect the $500,000 exemption for qualified small business shares and qualified farm property. Third, it does not affect the exemption on capital gains from the sale of principal residences and I think that is very important. The thrust of the lifetime capital gains exemption is left intact. What we are doing here is providing a measure which would hopefully encourage more investment in equity, more investment in productive enterprises that would generate jobs and generate growth.

The bill also proposes to modify the rules of the labour sponsored venture capital corporations, which are investment funds set up by labour organizations to purchase shares in small businesses. These changes include an increase in the maximum credit for investments in these funds from $700 to $1,000, an increase in the size of the company in which the funds may invest and a relaxation in the eligibility criteria for the fund sponsorship.

I should say that this too has been a very useful and encouraging kind of measure which brings ordinary workers more into the opportunity of investing in their own corporations.

There are some other measures I would like to refer to such as the home buyers' plan. As we have seen, economic growth has been strengthened by the home buyers' plan which was announced in the 1992 budget. This measure allows home buyers to withdraw up to $20,000 in existing funds from registered retirement savings plans and to use the money to finance the purchase of new or existing homes.

Where the home is being occupied as the buyer's principal residence, there is no tax on the withdrawal. The withdrawal is repayable to the home buyer's RRSP in equal instalments over a 15-year period.

Since this plan was announced, the response from Canadians has been impressive and so far there have been some 130,000 withdrawals under this plan. This initiative together with the reduced CMHC down payment requirement from 10 per cent to 5 per cent has helped in increasing housing starts in 1992 by some 7.7 per cent over 1991.

This has been an initiative that has been utilized. It has certainly helped people to get into homes. There is perhaps nothing that generates more economic spin-off than the home building industry. We not only have the activity of the building of the home, but indeed we have the spin-off in terms of equipping the home with furnishings and appliances. It does have a very positive impact in improving domestic demand. A one year extension of the plan was announced in the December economic statement and legislation to implement this extension will be introduced shortly.

Another change that was proposed in this legislation is to modify the tax system so that it treats common law couples in the same way as married couples. The broader definition of spouse that is currently used in the Income Tax Act for provisions relating to pensions and other retirement plans will be extended for all other purposes under this act. Under this broader definition the term "spouses" will include both married and common law spouses.

I would like to now turn to some of the technical amendments of the Income Tax Act that we are proposing in Bill C-92. First of all we propose to reverse the ordering of the credit currently provided for the large corporations tax in the special Part VI tax on financial institutions against the corporate surtax and income tax. This will allow foreign parents of Canadian companies to obtain recognition abroad for a larger portion of the Canadian taxes for which they are liable and provide an added incentive for them to continue investing in the Canadian economy.

Second, we propose to amend the Income Tax Act so that once the bill is enacted the government can collect a portion of taxes in cases where there is a dispute. This provision will apply only to disputed taxes of companies that are liable to the tax on large corporations. Individual taxpayers and small companies will not be required to pay over disputed taxes until a court has ultimately ruled on the question of liability of those taxes.

As well, we are proposing certain changes to the 21 year rule for trusts. These changes were initially announced on February 11, 1991. One measure will ensure that the 21 year period cannot be refreshed by transferring trust assets to new trusts. Other changes would ensure that capital gains consequences will be substantially the same whether individuals make a gift of property directly to their children or make the gift to a trust for the children's benefit.

In this connection there are a number of issues and misunderstandings that I would like to address because there has been, even on the floor of the House of Commons, some questions raised about this issue and some interpretations about it which are not correct. These misunderstandings essentially fall into three categories. First, it has been suggested that wealthy individuals are able to avoid taxes by setting up trusts. This is simply not the case. When property is transferred to a trust, any capital gains which have accrued on property must be recognized at that time.

Furthermore, trusts or their beneficiaries are subject to income tax each year on income generated in the trust just like any other taxpayer. Gains accruing while property is held in a trust are treated as accruing for the benefit of the trust beneficiaries, an approach which reflects the legal reality of these arrangements.

Second, it has been suggested that the distribution of trust property to beneficiaries within the 21 year period results in an unintended tax deferral. Again, this is simply incorrect. This is not the case. Such distributions are treated on a roll-over basis, recognizing that trust property is being held for the beneficiaries and should be treated in the same way as if it had been transferred directly to them. The 21 year rule was never intended to prevent this treatment of trust distributions.

Third, it has been suggested that substantial sums of tax revenues will be forgone as a result of these changes and this too is unfounded. Most trust property in the absence of these changes would have been distributed to beneficiaries before the end of the 21 year period and in such cases capital gains would be payable by the beneficiaries when the property was sold or ultimately on their death. The proposed changes will not alter this result.

I think this is very important because it is an important mechanism in terms of administering estates and administering people's holdings. Some may not have the capacity to do it on their own and so the set-up in the trust of this nature is very important.

There are a number of other technical measures which I do not intend to go into in detail. The explanatory notes provided by the department will clearly explain these measures. For hon. members who wish to become more familiar with these, I would suggest that they refer to the explanatory notes prepared by the Department of Finance. That includes the Net Income Stabilization Account program which was established in the Farm Income Protection Act; the disposition of capital property on death; the evaluation of employee stock options after death; the tax status of employees of the United Nations and agencies; the filing of information returns by non-profit organizations; rules for amateur athletes; trust arrangements and, finally, regulations permitting supplementary pension plans to be treated as retirement compensation arrangements.

To conclude, the tax measures which were announced in the February 1992 budget, including those before us today, form a key and integral part of the action plan of the government to implement an economic agenda supported by Canadians in every part of the country. This plan includes action to bolster economic activity by cutting personal income taxes, action to boost the housing industry through the home buyer's plan and action to encourage productive investment that will create jobs and provide for incentives to the manufacturing and processing sector, to provide further incentives for R and D and to provide and improve investment instruments and facilities so that more people can invest in productive enterprises that will create jobs and create wealth.

This bill gives legislative effect to measures that will directly benefit Canadians and to strengthen the economic recovery now under way. As well, we are moving second reading of the bill at this time to give taxpayers and their advisers the assurance of the government's commitment to these measures. I think that is a very important signal.

With these measures in mind and in the interests of all Canadians, I hope and I urge that all members of the House will support this bill.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak on this bill, Bill C-92, which as you can see is an extremely complex and thick piece of legislation. It has an awful lot of technical changes and an awful lot of provisions in it, many of which, by the way, we support. We think there are many good things in this bill.

The problem we have is with the complexity of the bill, the length of the bill and with the innumerable measures. I have to be very honest with you, Mr. Speaker, it is very much a question of trust. When you look at a bill like this and you realize the vast implications of some of these measures, you have to wonder if you trust this government to be telling you absolutely everything up front? I have to be very honest and say to you that I know the Canadian people have lost a lot of their faith and trust. As a result of that, they are not sure they want to support all of these initiatives, as I am not sure that I want to support all of these initiatives. If I had a lot of faith, perhaps I would.

I also would like to remind the people sitting in this House today that in 1982 when a Liberal government introduced a complex bill such as this, the then Conservative opposition filibustered. If you recall, Mr. Speaker, the bells rang for a full two weeks in this House because they felt they could not support one bill dealing with that many complex issues. At that point the bill was split up into a number of more digestible parts.

I want to remind this government of this. It took such drastic measures to ensure that things were dealt with in a clear and open manner, insisted upon it and for that matter paralysed this House for a full two weeks. As one of the finance critics I follow those bills more closely than I do some of the others. I am sure the government is doing it with many of the other bills we see before this House.

The government continually brings in a whole mish-mash, a whole host of measures, some of them extremely complex. Some of the bills we support whole-heartedly. However, there are others which the government is trying to sneak in so it can say to the people of Canada: "We offered them what they wanted but they voted against it". We honestly have to oppose the things we think are wrong.

It has been a method of this government to continually bring in a number of measures which would not be supported by the majority of Canadians and to include them in a bill, perhaps such as this one, that a number of Canadians would support.

I say to the people of Canada there are many things in this bill that I personally support but I want many more explanations before I will whole-heartedly support it. I am sure there are many things in it that I would not support were I to know expressly what they meant in the long run.

Therefore, I will be forced not to support this bill. I think it is a question of absolute honesty and ensuring that all details included in this package are absolutely transparent and for the good of all Canadians.

Some of the measures included in this bill are things we ourselves had been pushing this government to bring forward. I remind all Canadians that we had been asking for quite a while that Canadians be allowed to use their RRSPs to purchase homes. That measure of course is included in this particular bill. That is something we believe in and which has been brought forward. It has helped. It has caused some stimulus, perhaps not as much as we would have liked it to.

We believe that the recession has been such that some of these measures were not as efficient as they might have been had the recession not been so deep, had people not been quite so worried about whether they would have jobs tomorrow. Therefore they have put off buying homes. In that particular instance I hope the date is extended so people can use their RRSPs to purchase their first home.

When it comes to reductions in the individual surtax from 5 per cent to 3 per cent I really do believe this government was honestly trying to give Canadians a break. One of the things this government fails to take into consideration whenever it brings in such a measure is the fact that more often than not other levels of government move in and take over the vacated place.

Over the last years this government has consistently reduced transfer payments to the provinces and the provinces are also in a terrible cash crunch. In the case of Ontario no sooner had this reduction been announced than the NDP government moved in and took it over.

In effect Canadians have not had a break—at least the people in Ontario and I cannot speak for other provinces but I would suspect it is pretty well happening in other areas. Ontario took up the slack and absolutely moved in and that is the end of the benefit to the people in Ontario. I was wondering if there were other provinces that did the same thing.

An hon. member: British Columbia.

Mrs. Marleau: British Columbia is doing the same thing.

While we have the Minister of Finance before us I would like to determine whether there is any way before bringing in measures such as this that he could work in tandem with the provinces to ensure that the benefits flow to those intended to receive them.

• (1050)

It is absolutely important when we bring forward such a measure that we know it will actually happen. This is not happening. It is true that our coffers will lose that much but the provincial coffers will take it up. It is not to say the provinces do not need the money. I am sure they do, as we do for that matter.

We are all battling the deficit. Perhaps we should have kept the tax room instead of giving it to the provinces. That is a consideration when realizing that they move in right away. It is extremely difficult to negotiate with the provinces. I understand that. Somewhere, somehow we have to get our act together. When we do something at one level we have to ensure it is supported by other levels of government.

I am going to get off base just slightly here because I like these figures. I realize the NDP has just come out with its policy on replacing the GST. One of the things it said was that it would increase the tax on wealthy Canadians.

I notice that Canadians who would have the reduction in the surtax over a five-year period would have had a saving of $6.6 billion. What that says to me is if the surtax is increased by 2 per cent, the supposed windfall a tax on wealthy Canadians would bring in is perhaps not as large as might be necessary to replace the GST.

If this is something that would bring about a cost, in this case of $6.6 billion and if it is reinstated, then it would stand to reason that the only moneys found would be $6.6 billion approximately over the next five years. The GST net is now bringing in close to $16 billion and that is only for one year.

An hon. member: $15.4 billion.

Mrs. Marleau: It was $15.4 billion for 1991-92. I just want to remind the NDP there is a very wide gap between what it has said and what it has to replace. It is very important that people realize this.

One of the other measures the NDP talked about was that it would bring back an inheritance tax. I am not sure if I have my figures correct but I know the United States has these kinds of taxes. The population of the United States is much bigger than ours and its wealth tax or inheritance tax brings in approximately $500 million a year. If I am not mistaken that is about the sum total it brings in.

I want to again remind the NDP that the odds of bringing in a vast amount of money from an inheritance tax are not there. One of the reasons it was stopped was that the cost of collecting it was far greater than what actually came in, especially when the capital gains tax was brought in.

In essence, that is a tax on wealth. I am not saying that an inheritance tax would not bring in some money. It certainly would. The amount would certainly not be of the magnitude of $15.4 billion, absolutely not. Therefore we would have to look even further to bring in that kind of revenue in one year.

One of the things that happens when an inheritance tax or a wealth tax is brought in is that a lot of jobs are created for estate planners. If the NDP members are friends with the estate planners and lawyers then they should feel free to bring in all of these estate taxes. They would be their friends for a long time.

I do not believe that is exactly what the NDP members had in mind. I think what they had in mind was to bring in a tax which would bring in some revenues.

I am going through these things because it is very important to realize there has to be a reasoned assessment of how much cash will be brought in. That is because we do have a debt and as Canadians we have to be responsible for tackling that debt.

Another thing the NDP has said is that as a first step it would close loopholes. That of course would bring in billions of dollars. I do not know how much it would bring in. I really cannot say.

I have to give some credit to the Conservatives. As much as it pains me I do. They also have been trying to close loopholes. As soon as a new tax change comes into play lawyers and accountants quickly find a way around it. It is almost a whole industry and it is difficult to control. We absolutely have to continue to close those loopholes.

On the other hand, I do not believe that $15.4 billion in taxation will be found after closing those loopholes. I may be wrong but I would be very surprised if that happened. As a matter of fact if revenues of that size were involved in closing loopholes I have a feeling that this cash-strapped government would have found a way of getting a hold of those moneys by now.

As much as they like big business and trans-nationals, I think they are also concerned with our debt, at least this is what they say. I have to believe that this is true because it is something we all face together.

I digressed a little bit because but I thought it was essential to explain this.

I also believe that the NDP plan touched upon the 21-year rule on family trusts. I must thank the minister for explaining the 21-year rule and for making it so clear that there are really no vast amounts of money hidden.

I have seen some of the householders which have been sent around. I have one here which gives an example of a trust of about $70 million established for someone in 1969. Today that trust would have a value of over $600 million. If it had been kept in very conservative investments such as Canada Savings Bonds then it would have gone completely tax-free for those years. This was in a mail out one of the NDP members sent out to the riding. I have to say that is false. Obviously the minister explained that trusts pay taxes so let us not mislead the Canadian public. Trusts do pay taxes.

We are trying to get at the capital gains. Capital gains happen to either a piece of property or for example shares in a corporation that one may hold for 20 years. Obviously that piece of property or those shares may have appreciated in value.

For example, a house is bought for $20,000. Ten years later the house is worth $200,000 and 15 years later it may be worth $150,000. No taxes are paid on that until the house is actually sold and it is not taxable if it is your principal residence. However, you could own an apartment building somewhere and it would appreciate in value that much. Obviously you would not be taxed on the increase in value until that asset was disposed of.

The same thing happens with trusts. The question I have on trusts is as to why we are extending the 21-year rule. That is not clear in my mind. If I trusted more perhaps I would believe it is simply to allow for some trusts to look after disabled individuals for example, but there has to be more to this than meets the eye.

I know if we had not announced that we were extending the 21-year rule these trusts would have been split up and dispersed. There would have been no capital gains taxation by the way because capital gains are not paid on a trust when the assets are disbursed to the beneficiaries. It is as if they had held them and had owned the stocks the whole time.

The only time capital gains comes into play on these properties is when the beneficiaries die or if the assets are left in that trust. At the end of 21 years then obviously the capital gains would come into play. Knowing the people who would have charge of these trusts, I do not think they would want to pay the taxes. Therefore, had we not extended the 21 year rule, these trusts would have been distributed to the beneficiaries. A few would have sat on the assets and insisted on paying the capital gains taxes.

I have worked enough in the field to say that nobody likes to pay taxes. Whether you are rich or poor, you will do your utmost to ensure that you plan ahead so you do not have to pay these taxes.

Why are we extending the 21 years? I realize it is an arbitrary number. Somehow I am not clear on why we are doing it. I really wonder if it has to do with control.

I want answers to those questions and I will ask them in committee. I have very grave reservations about why we would leave it. It has been opened up for an extended time, until the last beneficiary dies which could perhaps be another 40 years. Why are we doing this?

Again I remind the House that if the trust is distributed to the beneficiaries and they live another 40 years, they do not pay capital gains on it for the next 40 years, or until they sell or die. I think it is very important to make it absolutely clear that these things must be understood. You can really mislead people into believing there are vast amounts of tax dollars we are not tapping. There are not, unless the government is keeping things from us, which it may well be doing. I have already said that it is a question of trust.

An hon. member: That is an unfortunate statement.

Mrs. Marleau: I have to agree that it is an unfortunate statement, Mr. Speaker. However, there is an unfortunate state of affairs in this country. We no longer trust what is happening in our parliamentary institutions and I do not trust the government. I am an elected MP, here to represent my people and I worry about sleight of hand. I am worried because of the complexity of some things.

Why are all these measures in one bill? Why wait so long after the budget was presented to actually bring this bill forward? I have to wonder if it is in the hopes that we will forget what it contains and will be so busy with other things that we will just pass it without asking questions. There is no hope of that.

I will outline some other things which are included in this bill that we should be considering, such as the expansion of the definition of marriage for income tax purposes to include common law relationships. I think we should expand that definition. However, we have no way of knowing really if it is going to happen or not. We are saying to Canadians: "You can now file as married and we trust that you will". I trust that many will. However many will not because they may not even be aware of the changes in the legislation for one thing. I am of the opinion that the legislation may not be definitive enough about how it will be applied. Again, these are questions that I will have to clarify.

There are measures that will assist Canadians with disabilities. I think that is a very laudable endeavour and we should assist Canadians with disabilities.

The reduction of the manufacturing corporate income tax rate is a good idea. Our industries have been decimated. They need all the help they can get. I hope that the provincial governments will not come in and undo whatever measures we have brought forward at this level. In this way we hope to help the manufacturing sector compete and be able to expand its base and operations because we absolutely, desperately need the jobs in this country. The healthier our manufacturing base is the better it is for us.

One of the other measures that really irritates me is the disallowance of the capital gains exemption on capital gains accrued after 1992 on real estate held for investment purposes. There will no longer be that $100,000 capital gains which could be used against this particular kind of purchase.

A person investing in foreign bonds or foreign shares will be able to use the $100,000 capital gains exemption on the sale of them. We should ensure that the moneys we allow under that $100,000 capital gains be investments made solely and completely here in Canada. This particular policy should not penalize Canadians who are investing locally and purchasing an apartment building or something of that nature versus someone who is investing offshore. It is absolutely essential that we continue to encourage Canadians to invest in Canada in every way we can.

I hope when we go through this bill that some amendments can be made to ensure that Canadians invest their money here. It is the only way we can ensure a viable corporate infrastructure. If we do not invest in our own companies and ventures, how can we expect others to invest in Canadian ventures? It is essential that this be looked into.

The reinstitution of the small business development bond program is certainly a good idea and I support that initiative. We wonder what form this government will continue to take. There are so many technical changes in this particular bill that I am forever worried about it. All you have to do is read any one page and even the explanations. The Minister of Finance said to read the explanations and I would like to read some to you. They are very complex.

This is just one and it concerns the trusts. "Every trust shall on each of the following days be deemed to have disposed of each property of the trust that was capital property other than depreciable property, or land included in the inventory of the trust for proceeds equal to its fair market value on that day and to have reacquired the property immediately thereafter for an amount equal to the fair market value and for the purposes of this act those days—".

It goes on. It is written in very small text and it is extremely complex.

One of the other measures in here also deals with trust. The government is stating it will tighten up the rules so one trust cannot transfer assets to another trust.

I want to ask something that is very important to me. I was under the impression that now, before this legislation is passed, trusts could not dispose of an asset by transferring it to another trust without incurring capital gains. Perhaps this is a loophole it is closing but I was under the impression this was not possible and any kind of transfer of asset would call the deemed realization. It would be as if it were sold, capital gains would come into play and it would be taxed.

Not only are trusts taxed but the trusts that are set up by someone who is alive, that is not an estate trust, are taxed.

• (1110)

Any incomes they have are taxed at the top rates. They do not have the graduated rates. Only estate taxes would be taxed at the graduated rates. That is where a trust was set up at the behest of someone who has passed away.

I am extremely anxious to go through this bill and ensure that everything being said to us is really included in it. It is going to a very long and difficult process. I worry that it is going to be rushed as with everything else that happens in this House. We wait and wait to introduce a bill and then we bring in closure. We say "we absolutely have to have this bill today. We cannot go five minutes past this time". Even though it was introduced in the February budget and here we are at the end of February 1993, a full year later, this government will come and say: "Rush, rush, rush, we have to have it".

Again it is a question of trust. Why would the government wait so long to introduce a bill such as this if it contains only good things? It would not even have to worry about rushing people if the bill is as good as it is reported to be.

The government could and I am sure members of a committee would be quite happy to facilitate the discussion and hurry the bill through if it is as good as it says it is.

The government waits and waits. The first reading of this bill was on November 26, 1992 and the changes were introduced in the budget of February, 1992. The government will say we did not sit during the referendum.

We could have sat during the referendum. There was nothing preventing us from sitting here in the House of Commons, one, two or three days a week. Perhaps we could not have sat full time but we certainly could have spent more time looking after the affairs of the nation during the referendum campaign. The opposition would have been willing to spend some time in the House of Commons during that time. Of course we do not say what happens in this House. That is always in the hands of the governing party. In this case it is in the hands of the Conservative government.

Why did we wait so long? Please do not bring in closure. Do not rush this bill through committee. Just recently I had the opportunity of sitting on a committee where exactly the same thing happened. Rush, rush, rush, we had to have this bill out of committee within two days. There was next to no time to hear witnesses. We had to cut back on everything because we were in a big rush and had to hurry up and get the bill through. The government wanted to bring in closure and ram everything through because, as the government says, it controls everything.

If this bill is the bill the government says it is, then do not rush it through. We should be given the time to really study some of the clauses in here so we will know exactly what the effects of them are.

At times there are many things we wonder about. We wonder whether we should be going ahead with some of these tax cuts in light of what has happened with the provincial governments. Maybe we should question that. It may be too late but these are things we really have to consider. We cannot act independently as if we live in a vacuum here in Ottawa. Many things happen across the country while we stand here deliberating or sit here listening.

We must work in tandem. I say this over and over again. I have worked as an accountant most of my life and have been involved in the financial aspects of many organizations, including municipal governments. I have always been very conscious that debt is a bad thing. When I was at the municipal level I helped bring in some policies which really enhanced the position of our municipality. These kinds of problems are really near and dear to my heart, but I insist that this level of government stop behaving as if it were the only one.

Recently this government announced it would freeze grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities. The municipalities really count on these grants in lieu of taxes. The government is going to freeze them to the same rate as they were in 1992.

Mr. Speaker, if you are sitting here by yourself and not worrying about what happens around you, you might say: "Well, it is not so bad. You know, it would not be that bad. I mean, we are cutting back expenditures", but municipalities are facing not only cutbacks from the federal government, but cutbacks at the provincial level. The municipalities have nowhere else to go. A taxpayer is a taxpayer. He or she is a Canadian.

We can cut back and say: "Look at the good job we've done managing our debt". Meanwhile the municipalities are burdened with these excessive taxes and responsibilities which many of them are going to find more and more difficult to meet. Have we then done our best for the people of Canada?

I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, we have not. We must work in tandem with all other levels. I cannot stop talking about what has happened in Ontario and British Columbia and will continue to happen probably in other provinces. As soon as we give one group a tax cut which it asked for and desperately needs, another level moves in. If we cut back on transfer payments then the province has no choice but to cut back to the municipalities or cut spending.

Ontario obviously has not cut spending despite the allegations of the treasurer of Ontario that its deficit would be under $10 billion for the year. I am saying deficit. That is only for one year, ladies and gentlemen. A deficit is the amount spent over and above what is raised in taxes.

I read just recently that the province of Ontario is looking at a deficit in the neighbourhood of $13.9 billion. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, shame. I think it is absolutely a horrendous amount of debt to add to the already heavily burdened people of Ontario and Canada because everyone pays, not only the people of Ontario. It affects the economy across the country.

I know the government consults with a lot of people from single interest groups. They say: "I want, give me and let go of the other ones". The government should consult not only with these single interest groups, because we must consult with everyone, but with all Canadians and other levels of government to ensure that whatever is brought forward in the next budget we do not have the kind of scenario that is happening now.

The debt is the debt of all Canadians, whether it is held at the federal, provincial or municipal level. One may say: "Well, municipalities are not allowed to run deficits". No, they are not, but they do borrow for capital projects. Many municipalities have borrowed quite heavily for municipal capital projects. I think it is important to remember that.

We can no longer afford to behave as if we are one level and the others do not count. We have to sit down together and work together to solve this economic crisis.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for being so patient with me. I will say to you in ending that I wish it were different. I wish I could trust this government and believe everything it is saying, but I must respond and say this government has lost the faith of all Canadians. Therefore I cannot support this piece of legislation at this point.

• (1120)

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, we were just treated to a delightful rendition of what is wrong with the Liberal Party as far as trying to figure out where it stands on things. The member who just spoke with respect to the private family trust tax changes began by praising the minister for making it absolutely clear that what the NDP had said about these tax changes was not true. She then went on to say that she did not trust the government and that she had some doubts herself about whether this was an appropriate change to this legislation.

Whatever your position, if you are with the government you had something there that you could take from the Liberals and run with; if you are suspicious of the government and do not trust these changes, you also had something that you could go with. This, of course, is characteristic of what we see time and again from the Liberal Party when it comes to this issue as well as many other issues. I am thinking particularly of this but there are many other examples such as the North America free trade agreement and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and the need to abrogate the one and not get into the other.

Bill C–92 is a bill about tax changes. I would like to speak to what is in the bill. I want to concentrate first on the whole question of the changes to the tax laws affecting trusts. Changes to the legislation concerning the taxation of private family trusts were first proposed by the Minister of Finance in draft legislation on February 11, 1991. Despite considerable criticism from the professional community, these changes were then included in draft legislation of technical amendments, released in December 1991. The legislation was introduced into the House by notice of a Ways and Means motion on June 19, 1992.

Current legislation covering private family trusts goes back 21 years to the 1972 tax reform when the federal estate tax was eliminated and the capital gains tax was introduced. This change left a potentially enormous tax loophole. Capital gains taxes are levied only when gains are realized, usually when a property is sold or at the time of death. Because trusts never die, this meant that private family trusts could entirely escape paying taxes on assets held within the trust. So the Liberal government introduced a 21-year rule which required that private family trusts would be assessed capital gains after 21 years and pay tax on their increase in wealth. Income tax is, of course, paid by the beneficiaries when property is distributed to them from the trust.

No capital gains tax has ever been levied under this 21-year rule. All private family trusts which existed on or before 1972 would be subject to tax for the first time in January 1993.

The government is now proposing to essentially eliminate the 21-year rule. Trusts would be allowed to defer the 21-year rule until all the exempt beneficiaries have died. An exempt beneficiary can include a child, spouse or parent of the trust settler, but not any individual of generations subsequent to that of the child. This means that a trust set up for a young child today could go tax free until that child died, which could be 80 years from now. It means that the billions that are presently sheltered in private family trusts will not have to be subject to tax until the last exempt beneficiary dies.

This constitutes a tax loss of billions of dollars. While trusts will be allowed to accumulate wealth tax free for many more decades, the government will be deprived of those revenues to reduce the debt and the deficit.

What are private family trusts? One thing on which I would agree with the Liberal member who spoke earlier is that there is a great deal of confusion and uncertainty about this whole issue and that it is sometimes difficult to understand. I would like to take the House through it in so far as I can and explain how I understand this issue.

What are private family trusts? A private family trust is a legal instrument used to pass on assets to the beneficiaries of the trust who are often the spouses, children or grandchildren. Even a simple private trust I am told costs thousands to set up. I would not know because I do not know anybody who has one.

How much in assets are held in private family trusts? There is almost no public information available about the amount of wealth held in private trusts. Tax privacy laws prevent Revenue Canada from providing information about any single trust, and this is probably as it should be. It also does not provide any information about the aggregate amount of assets held in private trusts.

This would certainly be useful information for the public and for Parliament in particular when we are trying to debate this kind of issue. We do not really know the amount of money that we are talking about.

Sources in the financial industry have estimated the total value of assets held in such trusts at $70 billion. This estimate seems fairly reasonable as it represents only 3 per cent of the $2.4 trillion in total assets held by persons and unincorporated businesses in Canada.

The member before me referred to NDP householders that cited this $70 billion. We are certainly not suggesting that there is $70 billion in revenue to be garnered by the government. The $70 billion figure is, as I have said, an estimate of how much money is tied up in these trusts.

What are some examples of private family trusts? Again, we are not really able to say because tax privacy laws prevent information being released about any individual trust. I am told that court records show the trust established for instance by Mr. Bronfman for his daughter had a value of $70 million in 1969.

That is the trust that is referred to in the literature that was quoted by the hon. member previous which would have a value of over $600 million if it had been kept in very conservative investment since then.

How much tax revenue will the government lose from this change? With so little information available, it is difficult to estimate just how much tax revenue the government will lose. A very cautious estimate demonstrates what potential revenue is at stake.

If only 1 per cent of the $70 billion in trusts was subject to tax next year, a marginal tax of 30 per cent would raise over $200 million. That is not to be sneezed at, especially when times are tough.

What do trust tax professionals say about this change? "There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts." This is from Sydney Goldstein of Goldstein and Goldstein, Ottawa.

Another quote from Katherine Bush of Blake Cassels: "A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation".

From Neil Brooks, the Associate Dean of Osgoode Hall Law School: "The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars".

From Arthur Drache of Fraser and Beatty: "If legislation now before Parliament is not passed before the end of the year, thousands of trusts could be hit with massive tax bills".

Why is the government proposing this change? The government argues that these changes are necessary for a number of reasons. First, it has argued that the existing 21-year rule might interfere with trusts established by parents for the benefit of their disabled children.

Exploitation of the needs of disabled children is immensely cynical and makes little sense in this context. Anyone structuring a trust for a disabled child would design it so that the child had an ongoing income and not a lump sum payable at some point in the future as would be the case with most of the trusts affected by the 21-year rule.

As tax lawyers Sydney Goldstein and Katherine Bush have argued, if the government was really concerned about the needs of disabled kids a better solution would have been to declare a special exemption for the disabled. This argument about the disabled is just so much political cover with the government grasping at some compassionate looking straw in order to justify what it is doing for other reasons.

Second, the government has argued that unless the rules were changed some trusts may not be able to pay the taxes without the selling of assets, perhaps including a controlling block of shares in a private company.

• (1130)

This argument has some validity but it still falls short of the mark, it seems to me. Private trusts have had a full 21 years to plan for this tax, much more than ordinary taxpayers get. Besides, taxpayers in this situation could still utilize the $500,000 small business capital gains exemption to avoid selling assets.

The government says it is closing a loophole with this bill by preventing rollovers from one trust to another. It is true that a clause in this bill does close a potential loophole and we support this, but it does not mean that the government is justified in creating another massive loophole. There are other ways that this could have been dealt with.

Why was the 21-year rule set at 21 years, you might ask? The period of 21 years was apparently chosen in order to be consistent with trust tax law and to be consistent with the then current age of majority.

Will not application of the 21-year rule be hard on widows who do not have funds to pay tax, for instance, on income producing real estate held in a trust? Although it may be onerous for the beneficiaries of some trusts to pay taxes in one shot after 21 years on their capital gains, there is a provision to pay taxes from a 21-year deemed disposition in up to 10 annual instalments in subsection 159(7) and 159(6.1) of the act. This will provide some relief for trust beneficiaries with modest incomes who do not wish to dispose of the asset at this time.

Again, I repeat, it is not uncommon for Canadians of all walks of life to experience difficulty in paying their taxes. Why this particular difficulty should be addressed when the difficulty of so many ordinary Canadians in paying their taxes is not taken into consideration at all is what mystifies us.

Twenty-one years is an arbitrary amount of time. Do these changes not make trust tax more consistent with the taxation of capital gains which is only collected upon disposal or death of recipient? People might ask this question about our position on this legislation.

It is true that the 21-year rule is an unsatisfactory and relatively arbitrary rule which is inconsistent with taxation of capital gains and was probably designed to fail. It is not hard to imagine that when the Liberals brought this in in 1972, they at the same time figured that at some point the very people who were concerned at that time would bring concerns to them in the future and have this changed. If the aim is to make trust tax more consistent with capital gains tax then realized capital gains should be taxed when the trust settler dies as well as when the last beneficiary dies. However, such a change would eliminate many of the tax advantages of setting up family trusts.

In addition and perhaps more important, all the substantive changes which affect the taxation of private family wealth have allowed substantial tax breaks because they have not been retroactive. Change may be needed to improve poor legislation, but why have the transitions resulting from the changes always allowed big tax breaks by grandfathering?

Financial officials argue that there will be no revenue loss because if these changes do not go through, most trusts will dispose of their assets through rollovers or other mechanisms to avoid the tax anyway. Is this true? This is a hypothetical argument because these measures may or may not be easily available depending on the type of trust, but just because there are avoidance mechanisms does not mean that the government itself should roll over and play dead by opening up a big loophole.

Instead, the government should use the anti-avoidance provisions of the tax act or act to close these loopholes. It is not enough to simply argue that these people will find other ways not to pay taxes. That may be an unfortunate truth about our tax system, that a certain class of people will always find a way not to pay their taxes and that lawyers will always find ways to exploit whatever changes are made. However it has more to do with original sin than it has to do with tax law and has more to do with lawyers than it has to do with tax law. Surely the government could find some way to address these problems without simply conceding defeat in the manner in which it has in this particular bill.

Financial officials say that trusts are not used to avoid tax because in many instances there are measures that individuals can take outside setting up trusts to only pay capital gains taxes when an asset is sold or upon death of the owner and therefore avoid the 21-year rule. How valid is this argument?

Trusts provide many advantages that these other mechanisms could not provide. If the 21-year rule is so onerous and inequitable compared to other mechanisms, why would thousands of people who have set up trusts since 1972 and before these changes were proposed, if the existence of the 21-year rule presents such a tax disadvantage? This argument defies common sense and the logic of our experience with this particular provision.

I hope the hon. member in the Liberal Party had an opportunity to listen to what I said. Perhaps I have helped to clarify the situation for her. For all these reasons the NDP has tried consciously to bring attention to bear on this particular change. We think it points out the basic moral flaw in the government's approach to deficit reduction, that not all Canadians are being asked to bear the burden of deficit reduction equally and that some Canadians have a special access to the government, that they have the ear of the government with respect to their particular tax problems.

In this case we see that those who have had a concern about the 21-year tax rule have successfully gained the ear of the government and have had this exemption extended by virtue of the legislation we now have before us in the form of Bill C-92.

We take offence at that because we think this simply illustrates the larger picture of how this government has proceeded with respect to tax reform. Tory tax reform has meant more taxes for ordinary working Canadians, for low and middle income Canadians, and has meant special breaks for big business and for wealthy individuals. This particular measure we are debating today says that louder than any other particular measure this government has taken.

I would like to speak to some of the other elements in the bill. One thing that struck me, again talking about the capital gains tax but in another context, is the elimination of the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption with respect to real estate and leaving it in place for equity investments.

We are not in favour of the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption in any event, except of course with respect to the question of principal residences. We continue to favour the larger capital gains tax exemption with respect to the sale of farms, for instance.

However, there may be a way in which a lot of ordinary Canadians have been blind-sided by this particular change. It is not something that I think there is a particular policy on within the NDP, and I have not heard anybody else raise it for that matter. For a lot of working Canadians that I know the only other investment they have in their lives apart from their principal residences may be their summer homes, their cottages at the lake, and this particular bill subjects the sale of their cottages to a capital gains tax.

I wonder whether that is what the government really intended. I know that it has received a great deal of mail on it from cottagers and it has not seen fit to change the bill. It strikes me as unfair within the larger context of our tax system.

• (1140)

If we are not going to treat all capital gains equally and if we are to leave equity investments alone so that people can invest in business, make money and not have it subject to capital gains at the same time as dinging a whole lot of ordinary working folk whose only other investment in life might be their summer cottage, there is an inequity that ought to be addressed either by trying to treat all capital gains more equally and not making exemptions which create injustices by leaving some things taxed while other things are not, or by considering this one particular problem a lot of people have and finding a way to give a tax break to people who are not speculating in recreational real estate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise a point of order. Due to the length of time the first two speakers for the other parties had, I wonder if might beg the indulgence of the House to have a few more minutes to finish my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend the time of the hon. member?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, we have no objections to giving a few more minutes to the hon. member. However we would not want that to be seen as an indefinite time. I am sure he gets the message.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Some minutes for the hon. member.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, of course you realize that when the time is extended it is indefinite, but I will not take advantage of the House. I just have a few more things I want to say.

I want to finish up my point about the way in which the particular capital gains tax change in this bill affects a lot of people in my riding, for instance those who have cottages and who are very concerned about it. When we stack that up against the break the government is giving to people with these large trusts it is pretty hard to defend and I have no intention of defending it.

There is another thing I feel I must respond to. The member from the Liberal Party, obviously not wanting to take too much time to elucidate Liberal Party policy on these matters because there tends never to be any, spent a lot of time attacking the NDP. It seems only just, in the course of natural justice, that I should be able to respond to our accusers.

The member did something which I think is typical of people who have been critical of our over-all approach to tax reform and deficit reduction, particularly when it comes to eliminating the GST, and that is to pick one thing we have listed as a total package that should be brought in to replace the GST and say: "This is not going to replace the $15.4 billion or $15.6 billion that the GST brings in".

The Liberals do not like to talk about the GST, except in the context of the NDP, because they do not have a policy for how to replace the GST. They had one for about 48 hours when they were considering the business transfer tax and a tax on groceries, but that has been deep-sixed. Now we are just supposed to wait until a Liberal government is elected and there will be consultations. Then we will find out what will replace the GST.

We have come forward with a plan for replacing the GST and it is a multifaceted plan. As the member rightly recognized, no one measure is going to replace all that money. But when we consider a number of loopholes that could be closed and the economic growth that could be generated by the elimination of the GST and by other measures to stimulate employment and therefore raise revenues and take people off welfare and UIC, when we consider the expense the GST is to the government both in terms of the cost of collecting and the money the government pays in GST, it all adds up. We believe it is sufficient, along with some of the other tax changes we have proposed, to cover the cost of eliminating the GST.

I have raised a couple of things in the House time and again that I can never get any answer to. In fact whenever I raise these things it is as if I am in the Bermuda Triangle of Parliament. I asked the Minister of Finance a question about a specific tax loophole and he answers a question I have not even asked. I cannot get him even to acknowledge the content or the substance of my question. This happened to me just last week after President Clinton had made his statement with respect to tax reform and I asked the Minister of Finance if he would consider eliminating or reducing the business entertainment tax deduction. Many times before I asked him to do so and he or his predecessor has always risen and said that we have to stay competitive with the United States, that we cannot do that.

Now that the United States is looking at eliminating that particular exemption, I thought this might be an opportunity for the Minister of Finance to reflect on whether or not Canada could now move in this direction and collect some of that $1.1 billion forgone in revenue every year as a result of that particular tax loophole.

What did the minister do? He got up and said: "I know what the NDP wants to do. It wants to get rid of the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption for small businesses". Does this have anything to do with what I asked, anything at all to do with what I asked? Absolutely nothing.

I guess we know our place. The Minister of Finance stays and listens to the Liberals respond to his speech but when members of the NDP get up he takes off. The Liberal member said all those nice things about the Minister of Finance and how he cleared up all the misgivings about the trust tax exemption. It is no wonder he stayed to listen. He probably felt good. He did not expect to feel so good when NDPers got up.

There are ways in which the GST could be eliminated. We have laid them out in a paper we are making available to Canadian people. We would finally like to have a policy debate in this country, not just speculation about who is who in the polls. We would like to have a debate on just exactly what are some of the possible solutions to our problems.

With that, I will not abuse the good will of the House any more and I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I heard many things during that speech but one thing struck me and I want to know exactly where the NDP stands on it.

The member spoke about how their party was against the $100,000 capital gains exemption being given to Canadians but then he said that he really wanted the capital gains exemption to be in place for people who own cottages. Now that it is being cancelled he would like it to stay in place, because in the past if one owned a cottage and sold it one could use up some of the $100,000 capital gains exemption. This particular piece of legislation closes that loophole.

I thought I overheard the member say that he really wanted the $100,000 capital gains exemption in place. Does that mean that he really approves of the $100,000 capital gains exemption, or what? I would like that clarified because in my mind the NDP has not been in favour of the $100,000 capital gains exemption. I believe it was in favour of the $500,000 capital gains exemption on sale of family farms and those kinds of things, but I did not think it was in favour of the $100,000 capital gains exemption. I wonder if he would clarify that point for me.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I am quite glad to answer that question. One of the peculiarities of the rules of the House—perhaps it is something we should look at, at some point—is that the first speakers for the government and the Official Opposition do not get questioned on their remarks but we get questioned. We welcome the questioning because we like to make clear what we are saying.

I am sorry the hon. member misunderstood me. The point I was trying to make was that what the government has done with respect to the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption was take a measure which we were critical of, as she rightly pointed out, and make it in some senses more unjust.

• (1150)

It has changed it from a policy we object to in principle to a policy we object to in practice because it is so selective with respect to who benefits from it and who does not.

Traditionally, we have been more in favour of capital gains taxes than any other party in this House. That is not a secret. We have always been willing to make exemptions where we thought it was just. Certainly the exemptions we always defended had to do with the family farm and principal residences.

I am asking the government to consider, as I am asking others who have policies with respect to capital gains tax, whether or not the blind siding of the family cottage in this recent change is against the spirit of the kind of exemptions the NDP has always defended when it comes to family property.

Maybe that cannot be done. I do not know. In the context of what is now exempt and what is not, it strikes me as unfair that people have to pay that kind of tax on the family cottage when people who are making equity investments and other things the government regards as economically productive do not have to pay that kind of tax.

As with so many other things let us have a system which treats everything equally as much as possible. If we are to get down to picking and choosing what is exempt and what is not, I am simply saying that when we consider what is exempt, including family cottages strikes a lot of Canadians as unfair. I cannot blame them for seeing it that way.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the previous speaker a serious question. I cannot believe what I heard could possibly be the truth. I want to seek clarification.

I understand by listening to the hon. member that back in 1977 the Liberal government of the day introduced legislation to give a special tax break to the wealthiest families of Canada. The assumption was that not paying taxes would allow them to make other investments and therefore help other folks indirectly. It is commonly known as the trickle-down theory or what I like to call the tinkle-on theory.

That was introduced by the Liberals. For years and years the wealthiest families in Canada were able to benefit from it. This is what I am hearing. This tax provision was to expire in 1993, but the present government has decided this should not be stopped now. This incredibly lucrative tax gift loophole to the wealthiest should be extended for a period of time.

The government wants to extend it until the person in whose name the family trust is arranged dies or, in other words, for an entire generation for the wealthiest people of the country. I am sure people listening to this debate cannot believe this is accurate.

I want to ask my hon. friend who obviously has studied this bill carefully and knows the provision we are discussing if this is actually true. Have the Liberals, followed by the Conservatives created the ultimate crass tax loophole where the only beneficiaries will be the very wealthiest people of Canada?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, it is true. The hon. member for Kamloops points out that there has been a certain kind of collaboration between the Liberals and Conservatives on this issue as there often is when it comes to legislation or policies which benefit the corporate elite in this country, either institutionally or individually. At a certain point there is very little difference between the Liberals and the Conservatives. There may be a kind of feigned difference from time to time for electoral purposes, particularly when it comes to the Liberal Party. It likes to sit a little to the left of centre prior to election time to help give the impression of being an alternative to the Conservatives. But when push comes to shove on the free trade agreement, NAFTA, the trust tax exemption and a variety of other issues there is no difference. The record speaks for itself.

To those Canadians who find the extension of this 21-year rule offensive, not once was the existence of this exemption and the legislation to extend it raised in the House of Commons by a Liberal member. Not once did this matter cross the lips of a Liberal member until today when the legislation was before us almost as a fait accompli. Even then the member who spoke praised the Conservative Minister of Finance for clearing up all the misleading information that the NDP has allegedly been spreading in its householders about this particular legislation.

What more could we ask for in terms of helping us understand who is who, and on whose side particular parties are in this country? It was clear today when there was this sort of—I am trying to think of a polite way to describe the relationship between the Liberal member and the Minister of Finance—cosy mutual admiration society when it came to putting down the NDP version of what is going on here.

I can tell you what is really going on. The Liberals and Conservatives, and not for the first time in Canadian history are once again joining forces to make sure the people with money who really run this country are looked after.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to speak on second reading of Bill C-92 I have to begin by saying this bill, as presented by the government is an example of how the Conservatives approach governing and the public process. They do so in a way that can only create cynicism and distrust for themselves and, unfortunately, for large parts of that process itself.

If you look at this massive bill you can see that within it are measures that can justify a large degree of public support and I am going to talk about some of them. But there are other measures, the 21-year trust rule in particular, for which the government has not made a case and for which one cannot in my view make the same arguments for public support.

In the Liberal emergency program for economic renewal that we announced in January, 1992 the Liberals called for a change in the law so people could use their RRSP funds toward down payments for homes. The obvious purpose was to encourage the building of more homes and help give a kick-start to the economy. For that purpose we also called for the allowing of a lower down payment for homes.

In this emergency economic renewal program the Liberals called for the creation of an immediate major national infrastructure program. The federal government, together with the provinces and municipalities would provide funds to enable our towns and cities across this country to immediately begin thousands of projects of renewal of national and local infrastructure to improve sewage, water and pollution control systems, roads and bridges. The projects would repair and improve the fabric of our country as a way of contributing to the improvement of our over-all competitiveness while at the same time put thousands of people back to work.

In the budget of February 1992 we saw that the government had accepted some of these Liberal proposals. It said it would ask Parliament to amend the law to allow the expenditure of RRSP funds toward the purchase of new homes, thereby encouraging a renewal of active home building in this country. The budget statement also said the government would allow the lowering of down payments for homes.

Other things we had proposed in our emergency economic renewal program should have been in that budget but unfortunately were not. The budget did not include a national infrastructure program. If that program had been set out in the budget of February 1992 it would be well under way by now. Tens of thousands more people would be working than is the case today, on projects of renewal of infrastucture in towns and cities across this country. Thousands more people would be working to produce the raw materials and equipment needed to carry out these projects of community works and infrastructure renewal.

This has not happened because the government absolutely refused to include in its budget of February 1992 the kind of national infrastructure program and national community works programs we called for in the emergency economic renewal program we announced in January 1992.

In the December economic statement the government adopted some of the language but unfortunately not the substance of the kind of infrastructure program called for by Liberals in their economic program of January 1992. Liberals talked about it back in 1988 in their election platform.

In the December economic statement the government talked about bringing forward certain projects that had been discussed for many months previously, programs that might have been undertaken earlier but about which nothing had been done such as the expansion of Pearson airport. Another example is the upgrading and renewal of highways in Atlantic Canada and in particular New Brunswick.

The other day we saw an announcement by the Minister of Transport that runways would be extended and added at Pearson airport. However, there is no date for the commencement of that work. More startling still, there is no indication of where the funds would come from to enable that expansion of runways at Pearson airport to be carried out.

When it comes to the very necessary renewal of highways in New Brunswick, as far as I can recall there still has not been any final agreement to move forward on this project. There has been no final agreement by the Conservative government to provide adequate financial support to the provincial government of Premier McKenna. When it comes to the projects talked about in the December economic statement, as far as I am aware not one of these projects has actually gotten under way in the sense that there are shovels in the ground, cement being poured and more people working.

If, even in December, the government had adopted the Liberal program of community works, by now many of these projects I have talked about that communities have on the shelf across this country would be under way with people working. Instead they are condemned by the Conservatives to nothing more than the unemployment line, the welfare line and the bread line. Our towns and cities across this country have thousands of projects on the shelf which have been developed and have had environmental reviews, but cannot be proceeded with because they do not have the funds. If we had had a community-based program, as I have already said, then there would have been people working, projects would have gone ahead and the recovery from this Conservative induced recession would be a lot further along a lot more vigorous and a lot stronger than is now the case for many months to come.

The government, in this bill, is trying to implement some tax cuts it talked about in the budget statement, but these tax cuts are extremely modest to say the least. That is why, in replying to the February budget, I talked about these tax cuts being such that the Minister of Finance could be described as two-buck Maz for all they amounted to for the ordinary citizen in this country.

These tax cuts do not even begin to offset the more than 36 tax increases put into effect by this Conservative government since it took office in 1984.

We know that the average middle income family has been hit by close to $2,000 in tax increases by this Conservative government since 1984. By the way, to the extent that there are some very modest tax reductions in the February budget that this bill is supposed to put into place, these have likely been largely wiped out by provincial tax increases unfortunately. These tax increases have been caused by the cutbacks such as the capping of transfer payments by this Conservative government to the provinces and the cutbacks in amounts that would otherwise go to maintaining adequate standards of education, medical care, health care and other basic provincial services.

This Conservative government, in offloading its responsibilities to the provinces, has caused them to either cut back in services or increase their own taxes, or both, in a way that is certainly unfair to average Canadians but can be attributed in terms of blame directly on to the shoulders of this Conservative government.

One of the proposals in Bill C-92 is to extend the rule with respect to certain trusts and the exemption of the assets in these trusts from capital gains tax, which was a rule that was initially to be in place for 21 years.

If one studies the history of this measure in Bill C-92, I think one will see something very questionable and suspicious about the way this government has proceeded. This measure, the extension of the 21-year rule, was not in the budget of February 1992 that this Bill C-92 is supposed to implement.

The measure instead was announced by itself in a press release that came out in February 1991 that at that time received very little attention. As I have said, it was not mentioned in the February 1992 budget but it is found in this Bill C-92 which is supposed to be for the purpose of implementing this February budget. It is presented in a way that buries it behind the many other measures in this Bill C-92. Some of these I have been talking about and deserve a measure of support.

When one looks at the press release that the government issued at the time it tabled the Ways and Means motion, which is the basis for this Bill C-92, one will see something rather peculiar. This press release, entitled: "The Explanatory Note for the Notice of Ways and Means motion" talks in brief about the terms of the budget measures which the Ways and Means motion includes and says that it is for the purpose of implementing the budget of February 25, 1992. It then goes on to say that the Notice of Ways and Means Motion also includes a large number of income tax measures: "primarily of a technical nature which were released to the public in draft form on December 20, 1991 and in a number of other releases over the last year". Presumably, in this case, this refers to 1992.

There is no reference whatsoever to this complex and potentially far-reaching proposal to extend beyond the initial 21-year period the special rule regarding the taxation for capital gains purposes of the assets in certain kinds of trusts.

Why was this was not mentioned? What is the government trying to hide here? It did not refer to this proposal in the budget, it did not refer to it in the press release describing the Ways and Means motion. This proposal that was first mentioned in a separate release in February 1991, turns up in this Bill C-92 hidden behind dozens of other measures.

If this trust proposal had been in the budget, I submit that it would have received a lot more attention and scrutiny. If this measure had been in that budget—I am talking about the budget of February 1992—the government would have been obliged to set out information on the revenue effects of extending this rule.

The Minister of Finance has not in the press release of February 1991 or in the notice accompanying the Ways and Means motion and not even in his speech today, if I am not mistaken, given any information whatsoever about how much revenue the government would obtain from taxing the assets in these family trusts if the 21-year rule is not extended. No information is been provided about how much revenue is being lost to the government by extending beyond the 21-year period these special provisions for family trusts.

Surely this is a basic, fundamental and necessary piece of information in order for Parliament and Canadians generally to make up their minds on whether this measure is in the public interest. In the absence of that information, I do not see how this measure can be supported by this House.

We tried to get this information directly from the Department of Finance. It could not or would not give it to us. As I said, by not having it in the budget, it was not set out as was the information about the tax implications of all the changes in the February 1992 budget.

Why has the government not done this? What does it have to hide? Does the government expect us to believe that it did not consider this aspect, that it did not work it out in deciding whether or not to proceed with this measure? The information is there for the public to look at, although sometimes it is hard to obtain. It is there on all the other proposals in this bill but it is missing when it comes to the extension of the exemption for capital gains purposes of assets in these family trusts.

Why is this? The government is certainly giving the appearance of trying to hide something. It gives the appearance of trying to sneak something through and avoid full and proper scrutiny.

The government is not acting in a way which deserves the trust and confidence of this House or the Canadian people. We need to know the tax implications of this measure. As I have said, without it I do not see how this measure can be supported.

The government has not made the case it must make in order to command the support of the House for this measure. That is so even though it is contained in a very large omnibus bill that may have in it other proposals that deserve to one degree or another the support of this House and the public.

By proceeding in this way this Conservative government has tainted all of Bill C-92. We are talking about a basic question of fairness to people who have not been able to avail themselves of these family trust provisions, to ordinary taxpayers who have had their taxes raised some 36 times since this Conservative government has come to office, to unemployed people who are having their unemployment insurance benefits and their eligibility for these benefits cut by this Conservative government and to Canadians who are not getting the levels of services from their provincial governments they deserve because of cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces by this Conservative government. On the basis of fairness the government should have given us answers and it has not done so.

We have heard also about the changes in the capital gains exemption in this bill. The government has not explained why it has changed this exemption so that people have to pay capital gains tax on their cottages, but others who are able to trade and make capital gains on foreign stocks or bonds still have that full $100,000 exemption.

I say again that this government is proceeding with Bill C-92 in a way that invites cynicism and suspicion. Certainly on that basis I do not see—whatever else there may be in it that is worthy of support—how the bill as a whole can be supported. What we need more than anything else is an election to have a new and better government for this country. I say that it will be a Liberal government.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague on his remarks concerning Bill C–92.

I honestly believe that he is absolutely right that Canadians no longer believe that this government is always being open and fair in its information insofar as it will tell us or disclose exactly what it is doing.

We tend to be faced with a large amount of what I like to call bafflegab or creative accounting in some instances that leads us all to worry and to feel as if somehow there has been a sleight of hand and that we have no idea really what is going on.

Many of the provisions of this act would obviously hurt certain ordinary Canadians. As my colleague mentioned the removal of the capital gains exemption on family cottages. For many people that is perhaps the total amount of their savings. When they sell this they can no longer claim that first $100,000. It is hitting a lot of average Canadians.

Let us be fair. Most wealthy Canadians have had the opportunity to claim that $100,000 exemption already. This particular kind of clause does not affect the wealthy Canadians. It affects the average family groups and Canadians who may have a cottage that they have held in the family for maybe 20 or 30 years and it will cost them dearly. On the other hand, others may be able to apply for this exemption. Perhaps my hon. colleague would like to add to this.

Furthermore, I made the point that this government must start co–operating with other levels of government and not just act as if it is in a vacuum and the problems that are faced here are not faced at other levels. Perhaps the hon. member would like to add to these particular points.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague has made some very useful points. The government operates in such a way that even when it says it wants to help the ordinary person, it ends up by giving the ordinary person the back of its hand.

I do not think that ordinary people who wanted to see the wealthy bear a fair share of the tax burden expected that in responding to this concern they would find the government saying that they had to pay capital gains on the family cottage. At the same time they did not expect to see large family trusts under the guise of being dealt with more fairly being put in a situation by the government whereby it is quite possible that amounts that otherwise should be liable to tax would not have to face tax.

• (1220)

As I have said, even when this government claims to be operating in a way that restores a greater degree of fairness to the system, when you get beneath the surface it is found not to be doing that at all.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest as always to the speech by my hon. friend from Windsor. I want to ask a question of the hon. member, who was presumably intimately involved in 1977 when this provision in the tax law was first introduced, the 21–year exemption. I direct this question very seriously. I am not trying to make a political question out of this, but a serious fact finding mission.

I stand to be corrected, but it is my understanding that when this provision was introduced it allowed wealthy families to place money in trust that would not be taxed until the 21–year period had expired. I would call it a 21–year tax loophole or tax break for, again, some of the wealthiest families in Canada. They would be the obvious ones who would take advantage of this.

Is it what I say it is? If so, how does my hon. friend say it was justified at the time? It seems to me to be such a boondoggle but there must have been some serious logic behind it when it was introduced in 1977.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I cannot assist my hon. friend to the extent he would like because I was not a member of the cabinet in 1977 and I was not as closely connected to the subject as I might otherwise have been.

The issue we have to deal with is what do we do now? Whatever justification there may have been for an initial 21–year period, I submit the government has not made the case it should have for its extension. I presume that those people who availed themselves of this 21–year rule did so with the expectation that at the end of that period the tax would apply. Again, as I said, the government has not made the case I think it should have.

I think the issue today is what we do in light of the expiry of the initial provision. I only repeat that the government has not made the case it should have in order to deal with something which could have quite far–reaching consequences.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Windsor for his contribution to this debate. It seems to me that from an historical perspective as he alluded, we have to go back to the Carter royal commission that the Liberal government set up in the 1960s when they tried to treat a dollar as a dollar. Part and parcel of that was giving some people a chance to adjust to this concept.

Of course there were tremendous battles against the Conservatives in the late 1960s and early 1970s to make taxation more fair and perhaps giving a lenient period of time for a number of families to adjust to the new taxation system. As my hon. friend has pointed out very appropriately, we have now reached the point where families with large amounts of money have had an opportunity to adjust. The time has come now to make capital gains a part of the over-all taxation system.

I would like to ask the member from his experience in opposition and in government to perhaps comment on the concept of a dollar is a dollar for taxation. There are a number of issues facing us as Canadians with the high rates of taxation. It seems to me that in the discussions we had on the child benefits package, the government was quite delighted to point out the fairness of targeting people and to make sure that only those in need received it. On the other hand we have this quiet piece of legislation which the Official Opposition has been very vociferous about and very determined. The government has backed away from this principle of allowing taxable dollars to flow into the system appropriately and to be taxed as it is for other families. I think we have to keep our eye on this particular issue to ensure there is tax fairness for everyone.

I wonder if the member could comment on tax fairness for families nowadays.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has opened a subject about which one could speak at great length in ways I am not sure you would permit.

When we look at the tax system and tax reform, a basic concept we have to keep in mind is fairness. Here we are talking about fairness as between families who were able to avail themselves of these trust positions and those who did not or were not able to do so.

In that context we are talking about something which is a form of estate or wealth tax, the deemed capital gains tax on death. As members of the House know, under our tax law, when somebody passes away it is considered in that tax law as if all that person's capital assets had been sold as of the date of death at fair market value thereby creating a tax liability. So even though that property in fact had not been sold and even though the deceased person's estate may not have the liquid assets within it to pay the tax, it thereby requires the property to be sold in ways that might cause some degree of hardship for the heirs.

Therefore I think we have to bear in mind, with this deemed capital gains tax on death already in existence, what the acceptance of the government's proposal will mean as between those who have availed themselves of extensive family trust provisions and those who have not or are not able to do so. A basic issue as with all aspects of taxation is the issue of fairness.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I sat here today doing duty, as most members have to do once a week, I had some thoughts on some of the information that has been given by the other side.

I felt I would take a few minutes and try to set the record straight on some of the information presented that has implied that this government since 1984 to the present has really not done anything in order to change Canadian taxation.

I would like to start off with a comment that was made by the previous speaker in regard to infrastructure.

Prior to coming to Ottawa in 1982 I had the opportunity to be a municipal councillor in a community of about 2,000, involved in an industrial commission for a number of years and the Chamber of Commerce. With an election upon us this year I find it interesting to hear that through the wisdom of our friends from the other side they will cause the infrastructure problems of Canada to be reborn.

I find that quite interesting because if we go back in history to the time when they were sitting on this side of the House, they were the party at the time that cancelled the tripartite position between municipalities, provinces and the federal government.

If we go back over time we see some of the ways they tried to generate or stimulate the economy in the early 1980s. Industrial parks were built. The money that was put into these parks was supposed to stimulate industries and create diversification in the economy across this land.

You can see now why we are sitting with the deficit that we have in this country. Those parks that were set up with those dollars spent on infrastructure are still sitting there. The only thing they have today is 10-years worth of growth of trees and shrubs and grass.

That is one reason why each Canadian today is paying for the deficit and misspending of this previous regime over the last number of years. I can tell you that that is the type of spending that Canadians are not interested in.

I wish that the Liberal Party would be straightforward with Canadians. It should really try to tell us where it is going to get the hundreds of millions of dollars that are out there that it wants to put into infrastructure. I believe if municipalities and provinces want to set their priorities and their priorities are infrastructure, then it certainly should be part of the priorities they are setting out and setting some of their other concerns off to one side.

• (1230)

I just want to put on the record today some of the pieces of legislation that we have been able to put forward working with both the previous Minister of Finance and the finance minister today and working with our colleagues. When we got started in 1984, while much of the deficit reduction initiatives had been taken on the expenditure side, over two-thirds of the improvement in the operating budget between 1984 and 1991 was due to program expenditure restraints.

All tax bases have increased in order to bring the revenue and spending into line. Over-all federal government taxes have increased from 16 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 17.6 per cent in 1993.

I would like to just take a few minutes and go through some of the specific tax increases and the areas to deal with. On the personal tax side there is movement to partial indexing, imposition of a general surtax, imposition of an additional surtax on high income earners, elimination of federal tax reduction and an increase revenue from 6.6 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 8.2 per cent in 1993.

On the corporate side, there are revenues from base broadening under tax reform greater than the cost of rate reductions, imposition of a new large corporations tax raising an additional billion dollars annually, paid by large corporations regardless of their profit position. Revenues have declined from 2 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 1.3 per cent in 1993 due to lower corporate profits.

With regard to sales and excise tax, increases in the manufacturers' sales tax rates prior to the revenue neutral switch to GST, net revenues collected from GST by law must go directly to the public debt and ultimately to reducing the debt.

Let me just take a moment to say how important that is. We have a tendency in governments whereby individuals like to hide if they have the opportunity. Let us hope that in a very few months this same management that is in place today will continue. One of our greatest concerns with the tax that was raised through the GST, in the sum of roughly speaking $15 billion, some other party in power could come in and act like a bunch of drunken soldiers. Rather than taking this money and putting it against the debt, it could end up spending it in areas where I do not believe taxpayers want to see their dollars spent at the present time.

The other part, Mr. Speaker, I should tell you about is changing from the manufacturers' sales tax to the GST. We hear that the Liberal Party is going to scrap the tax. Very good, it is nice to hear. What are they going to do? Are they going to go back to the manufacturers' sales tax?

Let me tell you this, Mr. Speaker, as someone who has come out of the industrial hardware industry where I had to rely on either importing or exporting products. From the manufacturer's side of it and the opportunity and enhancement that has taken place since the start of the GST, it has certainly been able to give our competitors outside of the country a much more severe period of time in order to invest in products that are constructed here in Canada. For our exporters it certainly has increased and figures will show where the increase affects exporting of manufactured goods has certainly been a benefit to Canadians.

On the other side of it, I think Canadians are fed up with dealing with the old federal sales tax where a government on budget day can come in and say: "We are going to increase the federal tax by 1 per cent. Thank you very much". In the first two days after a budget people say: "Well, there they go again" and then they have a tendency to forget about it.

Doing it this way with a tax that is shown, Canadians have an opportunity to see whether or not the government manages the tax dollars the way it should. I think the vast majority of Canadians still may not be happy with the GST, but at least they know what they are dealing with. From the other side, all we can hear is: "Give me two years after I am elected and maybe I will see what I can do".

Whether we are talking about companies or whether we are talking about individuals, I do not think Canadians want that uncertainty.

I remember a number of years ago when we were in opposition. We were talking about the fact that maybe it was a time for Canadians to look at wage and price controls. Most Canadians will remember that Mr. Stanfield, our leader at the time, mentioned that we would be looking at a six and five wage and price control.

During the election we heard from the other side: "Don't worry, be happy. We would never do anything like that". Going back in history what happened within a very few months of the Liberals being brought back into power? Wage and price controls.

I also remember in 1980 the federal election was fought on gas pricing. The minister at the time from Newfoundland brought in an 18 cent a gallon hike. Furore hit the country. How could they ever think of increasing the price of gasoline by 18 cents? If we go back over history it was not 18 cents they increased it by, it was not 20 cents, it was not 25 cents, but the meter kept running to well over 30 cents.

Members of the party on the other side are going across the country today stating they are going to do something with the GST. What frightens me, my constituents and many Canadians is that we know the track record of the gang on the other side. They will bring in either a hidden tax or a higher tax. Canadians are not prepared to listen to that.

I would like to move on to some of the other areas of increased economic efficiency such as reform of all the tax bases designed to increase economic efficiency, thereby increasing growth and output.

Elimination of sales tax embedded in business inputs and the tax bias which favoured imports improves the ability of Canadian businesses to compete in both domestic and foreign markets.

With respect to corporate tax, elimination of investment tax credits and fast write-offs for specific investments allows for a lower rate of tax which is the best incentive of all. It has led to greater neutrality between different business sectors which allows businesses to make investment decisions based more on market criteria and less on tax considerations.

With respect to personal tax, elimination of tax preferences, conversion of many deductions into credits and lower marginal rates means decisions are guided by market criteria and not the tax system.

With respect to fairness, there is the introduction of an alternative minimum tax to ensure that wealthy individuals pay tax; the introduction of a large corporation tax to ensure that all large corporations pay tax regardless of their profit position; the lowering of tax rates as a result of tax reform; the conversion of many personal income tax deductions into tax credits; and restructuring of the child benefit system;

I heard the hon. member from the other side complaining earlier about the fact that someone who is on pension and bringing in over $120,000 a year should not be taxed. I have a real problem with that. The system should be there to help those in need. That is certainly what we are trying to do in this country: help those who require help. That is the fairness Canadians want to see in this tax system, a system that is going to be fair to those who need the support.

There is also the enhancement of the refundable sales tax credit to Canadians with modest incomes with the introduction of the GST in 1991. My constituents and Canadians in general are certainly not too pleased but they know they have the opportunity of having a cheque from the government on a quarterly basis and they certainly look forward to that. I can say they call my office if the cheque happens not to be there on that given day.

However, enhancement and competitiveness is something that has to be dealt with realistically. One of the problems we seem to face on the other side is that competitiveness is something they are not that concerned about. The fact is that they feel as an old government with old policies they want to go back to those days.

It is a competitive changing world out there that we are dealing with today, whether we are talking about the United States, Europe or Asia. This government has been ensuring that the opportunity is going to come through tax reform. Enhancing that competitiveness is the income tax reform, lowering the statutory tax rates to keep in line with the rate reduction in other countries.

The 1992 budget announced reductions in the tax rate of manufacturing and processing profits and raised the depreciation rate of equipment used in manufacturing processing to help the sector readjust.

• (1240)

I want to talk about that for one moment. One of the key factors we are facing in our country is the restructuring of our industries through modernization, upgrading, new technology. Coming from a resource sector in northern Ontario, let me say that we have gone through some very difficult restructuring times.

We must ensure we can be competitive. For example, in the forest industry—my colleague behind me has a very keen interest in the forest industry in his region of British Columbia—it is important when suddenly the purchase of a new debarker machine for a sawmill operation can be considered. That is going to enhance the opportunity to lower the over-all cost of operation.

That is really what this is all about, being able to help individuals but also being able to help the corporate side to ensure there is a profit. Some people in this House believe that profit is a bad word, that a company should not be making profits.

In order to remain sustainable and develop and enhance the opportunities for a single employer, profitability has to be ensured with the opportunity of that profit being put back into the company in buying new equipment and enhancing the opportunity of steady employment. This is the very key portion of what we should be looking at.

The other part is encouraging individuals in risk taking by the introduction of lifetime capital gains exemption.

If you happen to be in the agricultural business, if you happen to be in small business, most of those people work seven days a week, 24 hours a day. They are the key factor of the future of our country. Whether there are two, five or 25 employees, whatever it may be, the small individual companies are the heart and soul of the country.

After years of dedicated work those businesses should have the opportunity to gain a capital gains for the number of hours they have worked. A lot of times it is the husband and wife, or a ma and pa operation. They have worked years and raised a family. Then all of sudden they decide either through normal retirement or because of health or whatever that they want to move on and start a new way of life.

A key factor we should be looking at for Canadians is the opportunity for doing what they believe is correct in investing in and for governments investing in small business.

The other part is the introduction of tax credits for labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. We all recognize we can no longer afford to have labour sitting on one side and management on the other and government sitting in another separate area.

These days, it is critical in order to ensure the opportunities for our children and grandchildren that the enhancement of all sectors be working together. Looking around the world it is certainly taking place in other countries. Labour, management and government are sitting down and looking at joint ventures.

Some have been recognized already in northern Ontario and other parts of the country. It is going to be imperative that government, labour and industry look more at this type of co-operation ensuring that there is stability and also the opportunity of ensuring that jobs are going to continue to be enhanced in Canada.

There is the tax assistance to small business. Canada continues to have one of the most preferential tax systems for small business in the industrialized world. In December 1992 the economic fiscal statement included short-term measures to help small business create jobs and create investment.

One of the contentious issues we seem to be facing here on an ongoing basis is that all of a sudden we have made some major adjustments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

My riding of Timiskaming is going through some difficult times. We are facing about 30 per cent unemployment in my area. From those announcements in December until last Friday, I have had one call. The vast majority of people on unemployment are those seeking employment and they are saying: "Well, it is about time".

It is about time that changes were made. This would assure the small business side and those out looking for employment and those who are employed that we can no longer afford paying for people taking holidays in Florida, paying for people to go moose hunting or paying for people who are just tired of what they are doing and want to sit home and receive unemployment.

Unemployment insurance was never intended to fill in when people decided they no longer wanted to work. It is a safety net that is there to help the individual Canadians who need help. That is really what we are trying to do. We are trying to ensure there is a safety net for Canadians who need help.

When a person who has been working for a small business gets up in the morning and decides that he does not really feel like going to work, he is going to quit, thank you very much, the dollars that have been gone to help train that individual always come back on that small business.

It also means that the small business will be very reluctant to hire new people. Perhaps it has had one or two bad experiences. It has hired people, trained them at a cost of thousands of dollars. All of a sudden the guy says: "I don't like it any more. I am gone". That is the message we are getting.

If you look at the small business investment tax, if you look at the RRSP eligibility investment and changes of the $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption to small business shares, these helped firms and the public.

I have tried to give members an overview of what the government has tried to do. It is difficult when you are put in the position we were in 1984. You walk in and the cookie jar is empty. You have everybody wondering how you are going to help people.

The only way we are going to continue to have a country that is viable is for Canadians to come together. Nobody likes to pay tax. Nobody wants to pay tax. However everybody in this House today and a vast majority of Canadians are very fortunate. Our lifestyle has been great. If we are going to continue to give a comparable lifestyle to our children and our grandchildren, we must get our house in order.

I really hope that Canadians will question in the next number of months those who are going to be campaigning and offering all these goodies. Exactly how are Canadians going to pay for these goodies? Are they going to slash or are they going to tax? That is the question that Canadians should be asking any candidate who is making promises.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the hon. member for Timiskaming talked about the unemployment insurance bill more than he talked about this particular income tax bill.

I know the riding that he represents as I was born and raised in it. I also know of the high unemployment rate that people are suffering there. To be very honest, I do not know too many people who would quit their jobs because they feel like spending the winter in Florida collecting unemployment insurance.

Furthermore, if anyone does that and if the Unemployment Insurance Commission finds out about it, there is an extremely heavy fine right now in place. The fine runs as high as 200 and 300 per cent of whatever money that was paid out.

The money paid out by UI has to be returned over and above the extremely heavy fine. Let us quit trying to make Canadians believe that there are hundreds and thousands of people who are quitting their jobs because they can afford to go south to Florida.

Yes, there are many people who can afford to go to Florida and that is their choice. I do not know that many of them are the ones who are quitting their jobs to go there, certainly not in the riding he represents. There are not a lot of very wealthy Canadians in that particular riding. It had some very tough times over the last 20 years or 30 years. It is not just in the last few years that those people have been having difficulties.

On another track, I want to ask the hon. member whether he has considered the fact that the government of which he is a member has decided that ordinary Canadians who purchased a cottage 20 years ago for perhaps very little money, when they sell this cottage they can no longer claim the $100,000 capital gains exemption.

I know that in his riding there are many examples of ordinary Canadians—not wealthy Canadians, although there are wealthy Canadians who own cottages—who have not made a lot of money. They have paid a lot of taxes and continue to pay a lot of taxes.

Those people may have purchased cottages for next to nothing because there are many of them in those regions. I know some people who bought cottages 20 years ago for $400. Now the cottage may be worth $25,000 or $75,000. They will no longer be able to get a capital gains exemption when they sell their cottages. These are people who have not made vast sums of money or profits at any other venture. They have not been able to claim the $100,000 capital gains exemption, whereas wealthy Canadians by and large have already arranged their affairs to take advantage of this $100,000 capital gains exemption.

What does the member tell the people in his riding, those same people who bear the brunt of all taxation? What does he tell them?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I do not have many constituents in my riding who have $100,000 cottages so I do not think that is much of a problem.

There are people in my riding with cottages that they bought. Maybe they are second and third generation. Maybe some of them bought them for $8,000 or $12,000 and are very fortunate today that those cottages may be worth $50,000 or $60,000.

They may say: "I do not like paying tax. Maybe I hate paying tax". They also look at the fact that the government does not have too many avenues by which it can afford to tax Canadians. They may not like it, but Canadians also recognize that this government or any government today does not have too many options. One of the options may be taxing a cottage at $75,000 but the return, it having been bought at $12,000, will still be sufficient. The fact is many cottages in our area are transferred in families.

I think that is a boondoggle. Over all Canadians recognize that the government is in difficulty. Canadians recognize that we can no longer spend for tomorrow. What we are now doing is paying for the errors of the last 25 years.

That is a greater concern of Canadians. They want to make certain that the fiscal management of this country is in shape. They have greater concerns about where we are starting. Whether we are talking about municipalities, school boards, provincial or federal governments, all governments have to start to get their taxation in order. Canadians can see debt that is sitting out there. That is what Canadians are more concerned about. They do not want to pay more tax, but they want to ensure that their children have the same opportunities that have been given to them.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the member from Timiskaming is providing a fantastic set of answers. He is suggesting that the legislation is somehow motivated by a desire to bring down the deficit.

At the heart of the legislation is a massive giveaway which tax experts have estimated is billions of dollars of money that would have been received this year by the federal government if it had not moved as it is moving with this piece of legislation to permit family trusts to continue to be exempt from taxation for years and years into the future.

I have a question for the member on something that does not come from myself but from The Financial Post which is normally quite supportive of the government. On this particular scandalous giveaway of tax moneys the government should be receiving, resulting in other Canadians having to pay more taxes, The Financial Post has been very blunt. It has indicated that there could be substantial sums at stake in allowing trusts to defer capital gains taxes further. "Taxpayers should be told how much revenue is at stake and who will benefit most by allowing trusts to defer capital gains taxes for many years beyond the 21 years presently allowed".

I ask the member to stand in the House of Commons and tell us how much money is being lost to the finance department of this country. How much extra taxes will have to be paid by Canadians as a result of the government's legislation in front of us today that will extend for up to 80, 90 and 100 years the period during which family trusts do not have to pay a penny in capital gains tax, regardless of how much extra value the assets they hold accumulate during that timeframe? How much money is the government giving away?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I do not have those figures in my back pocket. I can tell the hon. member that in 1985–86 my colleague from Mississauga chaired the finance committee. We heard from Canadians from coast to coast, from companies and from unions with regard to tax reform. The finance ministers between 1984 and the present have certainly done everything they possibly could to tie up, snag, stop or gag tax evasion, tax adjustments.

I guess I should say that the hon. member was part of the finance committee. I would imagine that somewhere in his briefing notes he has that information.

I believe the department is doing everything it possibly can in looking at ways to get tax dollars from Canadians. I would imagine over that period of time it has certainly looked at that area and at this time is not in favour of moving forward.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, could we agree to call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 12.56 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRIFOOD SECTOR

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa and Quebec have just signed an agreement under which $40 million will be used to promote sustainable development in the agrifood sector.

The agreement will provide financing for a number of programs involving research, technological innovation and training. The minister and member of Parliament for Bellechasse said it was now up to the farmers to submit projects to the regional committees. After all, they were familiar with the problems.

According to Quebec minister Yvon Picotte, the regions would be in charge of the programs, since agricultural conditions vary from region to region. The minister said this was an example of co-operative federalism, with duplication kept to a minimum. Administration was kept to a minimum, to ensure that funds provided under the agreement budget would be spent on the projects submitted by farmers.

Mr. Speaker, that is what Quebec farmers have been calling on the federal and provincial governments to do.

PARLIAMENTARY MAILING PRIVILEGES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, according to a secret Conservative Party document now being circulated to its campaign workers, top strategists are encouraging Tory members of this House to abuse their parliamentary mailing privileges.

Today's Globe and Mail reports that the document reads thus: "Using their mailing privileges means they, the MPs, could be in direct personal contact with all of their voters over the next few months. We still have some time so I would encourage you to encourage your incumbents to do as much as they can now".

What an absolutely disgusting and morally bankrupt use of taxpayers' funds. Mailing privileges are just that, a privilege and not a right for government members for their own personal election campaigns.

Canadians are fed up with the despicable antics of this government perpetually lining its pockets at the taxpayers' expense. I am quite confident that the people of Canada will severely punish the Conservative Party for this act of thievery in the coming election.

IMMIGRATION CENTRE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that we have in our country a sinking ship, the Mulroney government.

Aboard the ship sails the first mate, the Deputy Prime Minister who happens to come from Vegreville, Alberta. Coincidentally Vegreville will also be the home of the newest national immigration centre, a huge electoral lifeboat.

The name for this style of politically inspired public policy is called pork barrelling of the worst kind.

Transferring the immigration centres across Canada to Vegreville would reduce face-to-face access by citizens and their advocates to government service and would put in peril through the mail-in approach for applications the safety and security of the immigration system itself. It would uproot the employees and impose undue hardships on their families.

I call on this government to rescind this ill-conceived plan. Public policy should be based on what is right for the citizenry and not what is politically necessary to re-elect the Prime Minister's deputy.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, in discussions about implementing the North American free trade agreement I urge this government to insist that the Government of Mexico implement an acceptable environmental green plan so that its future economic development will be in harmony with all that is considered necessary and desirable for the future well-being of the entire North American continent.

In that way Mexico would answer those genuine concerns that are being expressed here and in the United States about the possible undue exploitation of Mexico's people, its resources and its ecology.

The North American free trade agreement offers a greater future for all the participating countries but it must be accompanied by environmental commitments that will ensure proper sustainable development.

LABOUR RELATIONS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the 15-month lockout by Nationair of its workers has been lifted. Members of the Canadian Union of Public Employees are voting as we speak in this House.

The commitment and solidarity of these CUPE members in the face of an employer that is more interested in busting the union than in finding a fair collective agreement is to be admired and applauded.

One has to wonder just how much sooner this labour dispute could have been settled had Nationair not been permitted to use scab labour. Four hundred and fifty flight attendants stood on picket lines and watched as scabs took their jobs.

Months of negotiations and conciliation failed to persuade Nationair that collective bargaining is about fairness not union busting. It is obvious the use of scabs prolonged and embittered this dispute.

The ongoing dispute at the Royal Oak mine in Yellowknife also demonstrates that without a ban on the use of scabs in this country unscrupulous employers will never come to the bargaining table committed to finding a fair settlement.

The only result from the use of scab labour is a poisoned labour relations climate.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, Canadian university and other post-secondary students have been facing some very difficult financial problems in recent years due to the constantly increasing costs which they as students have been experiencing.

Moreover, the opportunities which they traditionally have had to finance their studies through summer employment have diminished due to the economic recession which has impacted on so many countries. Many, if not most students, depend to a significant degree on government guaranteed student loans to finance their studies, loans plus interest which must be repaid after graduation.

Regretfully, however, the maximum amount which can be loaned annually to students has not increased since 1984 despite the huge increase in cost which they have had to incur since that date.

Consequently, I would urge those who are currently reviewing Canada's student aid program to increase significantly the maximum amount which can be loaned to post-secondary students. I would also urge that the 3 per cent administration fee be abolished.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the introduction to the green plan the Prime Minister said: "As Canadians we are the trustees of a unique, beautiful and productive northern land".

Where is that sacred trust now as the government prepares to dilute, dissolve or dismember environmental regulations if they interfere with competitiveness or cut into profits? Where now is the 1990 green plan promise to review and update regulations that did not do enough to protect the environment?

Protecting clean air, water and land is important to Canadians. The environment however is obviously on the chopping block of short term economic gain, blind to the duty we hold to future generations.

This government is showing clearly that it does not understand the message of sustainable development, that conserving our resources is the only way we can have prosperity. It cannot even read the balance sheets of corporations that are saving hundreds of millions of dollars by cutting their use of water, energy and chemicals that they flush down the drain.

The government has put an urgent priority on cutting environmental regulations but no priority on improving them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS PAGES

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, last night 10 of the fittest members of this House put partisanship aside and accepted a challenge from the pages to compete in a game of basketball.

Although the pages are younger, stronger and in far better physical condition, experience, pride and a desire to win kept the MPs in the game. Indeed, the MPs would have won except that an unnamed member was intimidated by the enthusiastic verbal support given to the pages and he missed two free shots at the closing of the game and it ended in a 38-all tie.

Mr. Speaker, your office has always done an outstanding job selecting young Canadians to serve as pages. Without exception in my memory they have been a credit to themselves and to this House. They are intelligent, articulate and hard working. This year they also appear to be outstanding athletes.

On behalf of all members, I want to indicate what a privilege it is to know them and how satisfying it is to be able to compete athletically and not to lose.

UNITEL

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate our friends in Madawaska—Victoria on Unitel's choosing Edmundston as the location for its customer service centre.

I want to thank Bob DeGrâce and the task force that prepared the submission of the Chaleur region and the Acadian peninsula and presented it to Unitel.

[English]

Purolator, Federal Express, Camco and now Unitel, another chapter in the New Brunswick success story.

Four hundred new jobs in the telecommunications sector is a tremendous breakthrough and is really a tribute to the competent, highly motivated bilingual work force that is available in northern New Brunswick.

As Bathurst Mayor Ken Frenette said: "All the applicants have learned a lot from the Unitel exercise". The experience we gained will serve us well as we continue to work together to demonstrate that New Brunswick indeed is open for business.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you about a development project that will generate 1,000 permanent jobs in my riding. Intrawest Corporation, the largest Canadian resort developer, which owns the Blackcomb ski centre in British Columbia and has owned the Mont-Tremblant ski resort since August 1991, will invest $413 million over the next five years to make the resort into an international four-season tourism centre.

I am pleased to announce to my constituents in Laurentides that this project will create 5,500 full-time jobs during construction, which begins in April, and 1,000 permanent jobs after that.

I close by pointing out the managers' enterprising spirit and the $20 million in government money under the Canada-Quebec tourism development agreement. This project will stimulate the economy in the region and in Laurentides.

FEDERAL TRANSFERS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is being something less than honest when it talks about cutting its expenditures, controlling them by cutting back on federal transfers to the provinces. The bulk of these transfers go to post-secondary education, health care and social assistance.

• (1410)

Every one of those programs is important. They are similar from one province to another throughout Canada, although not necessarily equal. These are all very important parts of what it is to be a Canadian, that we have these services available.

The government says that it is saving taxpayers' money when it knows full well that every dollar that is cut back from the provinces has to be raised by the provinces by raising taxes or some other method.

It knows there is not the flexibility there to cut back on expenditures. The federal government in saying this is called saving the taxpayers' money is being something less than forthcoming.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT BRIDGE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in the debate yesterday about the fixed link, one of the members in opposition suggested that the construction benefits would all be realized in other countries.

In fact the bridge will be constructed mainly on Prince Edward Island and a staging area will be established at Borden. It will be built in components and floated into place. Construction will be of concrete and by far the majority of labour and materials will go to people in the maritime provinces.

The main benefit will be on completion when the unemployment rate will begin to be equalized with the mainland maritime provinces.

Currently the unemployment rate on the P.E.I. side of the strait is 35 per cent higher than the New Brunswick side. This will change when the bridge is complete, the impediment to trade is eliminated and thousands of new jobs are created.

MUNICIPAL TAXES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the city of Nepean condemns the announcement of the Minister of Finance that the Conservative government will no longer recognize the municipal formula for grants in lieu of taxes to Canadian municipalities for municipal services to federal facilities.

The chairman of the RMOC said: "This change in policy not only violates the longstanding federal practice of honouring municipal tax rates, but it also represents intrusion into the municipal domain of setting property tax rates. This action contravenes the fundamental principle of fair and equal taxation treatment for all property owners receiving identical municipal services. The Government of Canada as a property owner proposes to disregard its responsibility for paying its fair share of costs associated with providing municipal services. The result of this action will be to shift the tax burden to other property owners within the municipality".

By refusing to adhere to the municipally set rates, this government is clearly demonstrating its dishonesty, its treacherousness and its arrogance. The federal government should pay equal taxes on its properties the same as all other property owners.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the environmental assessment for Pearson International Airport was completed in November 1992 but not released to the public until last week.

Then the minister advised that he was rejecting virtually every recommendation from the environmental review panel. In particular, the environmental review panel suggested a short 4,500-foot runway parallel to runway 33 for small aircraft.

The minister rejected that proposal and is going to build a full runway. The environmental review panel suggested sound-proofing to retrofit residences and schools and other such buildings. The minister rejected that recommendation. Indeed, the minister has refused to compensate anyone or assist anyone for substantial increases in air noise.

There is no point in the Government of Canada financing an environmental review of a project if the Government of Canada is not going to be bound by that review.

CANADA SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of last week an hon. member from the other side rose in this House to praise his government for the success of the Canada Scholarship Program.

In the heat of the moment and possibly overcome by emotion, it seems the hon. member lost sight of some of the facts. He failed to mention that not only will students be forced to pay income tax on their scholarships, but they have been robbed of the six month interest free grace period. That adds six months of additional interest to those financially strapped students who must borrow to access post-secondary education.

[Translation]

To top it all, the hon. member, who was obviously in a state of uncontrollable excitement, forgot to mention that his government had decided to break its promise to eliminate the 3 per cent tax on student loans in exchange for six months more interest.

The Conservative government will take nearly $60 million from students of modest means.

[English]

Will this government stop erecting barriers for students, our young men and women, and start doing something about it now?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, scientists say that human activities accelerating the natural greenhouse effect could cause future climatic changes to occur 100 times faster than during the last ice age. We can do something about this by becoming more energy efficient.

This is an environmental citizenship message from Environment Canada. Yesterday was the commencement of the environmental citizenship messages program.

This new green plan program is designed to use Canada's existing network of 60 weather offices and the Canadian Meteorological Centre to deliver daily educational messages on issues like global warming, waste reduction, water conservation and spaces and species to the media and the general public.

I know that Canadians will listen to these messages.

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the current government and its Liberal predecessor have created a tax system which favours those of wealth and privilege. For example, the government has decided to extend the most famous of all Liberal tax loophole, the one protecting Canada's most wealthy families who have family trusts.

This means that billions of dollars presently sheltered in private family trusts will not be subject to tax until the last exempted beneficiary dies. A fund set up today for a young child would go tax-free for 70 years or 80 years. In our judgment this is very wrong. This is another case where the Liberals created the loophole and the Tories are now widening it. The Liberals feigning ignorance are now crying foul.

Unlike the two old time parties, the New Democrats believe Canadians deserve a fair tax system. Our plan should raise revenue for necessary government investment in services without overtaxing working Canadians. It would help to provide proper incentives to stimulate the economy.

Providing a special tax which helps only the wealthiest of families in Canada is wrong. It is time for a fair tax system for all Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. We have been informed that the government intends to present the bill on the North American free trade agreement tomorrow, although parallel negotiations with the United States and Mexico are not to begin until next month.

Could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why they are in such a hurry, when the American government does not intend to proceed with legislation until it has obtained parallel accords on the environment and employment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, Canada and the United States have begun the legislative process on the parallel accords. We have opportunities to discuss the parallel accords with the Americans and the Mexicans. This process is to begin in mid-March and I think that both processes will proceed at the same time and may not end until the summer.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, why is the government in such a rush to table a bill that obviously will be amended? In his statement last week the President confirmed to the Congress what Mr. Kantor had said before, that they would not proceed unless they had agreements on manpower and the environment.

Why would the government like the House of Commons to pass the bill right now when we all know that there will be changes? If there are no changes the Americans will not proceed and we will have lost all our bargaining chips at the table.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend must realize that all three countries have signed the North American free trade agreement. What my hon. friend is talking about is what will be the components of the parallel accords.

The free trade agreement itself will be legislated by all three countries as it was signed last December. There may be some variation in what the different countries would like to see in the parallel accords. That process, as I said, will commence in the middle of March and it will proceed in parallel with the work that is going on in legislating the agreement.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister.

The minister is admitting that there will be some negotiations starting next month. Last week he suggested that we should have a North American environmental commission to deal with the problems of the environment. He realized that there was a change in the position of the Americans because there was a change in the administration in the United States.

In Canada there is a very good chance that before this bill is approved by the Americans there will be a change in government here and that will change the policies.

Would it not be fair, in the fifth year of its mandate, for the government to slow down a bit and wait to see what the Canadian people will decide about the government? If you are elected you will go all the way, but we know that you will not be elected and there will be some major changes to this deal.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the drool coming out of the corners of my hon. friend's mouth is not becoming of him. He is not going to win the next election. He will not have an opportunity, as he says, to renegotiate the agreements.

As I have said before, what is it that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is going to renegotiate? If you are going to renegotiate you have to give to get. The Americans are looking to see some changes in the supply management system. They are looking for changes in the cultural exemption which we have negotiated.

Which of these is my hon. friend willing to give up, because he has to give if he is going to get.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the United States, as the minister knows, does not hesitate to put forward its values and its ideas in parallel accords.

The three parallel accords to which the minister has referred may not alter the NAFTA text itself but will certainly change the way in which the NAFTA agreement will operate.

Will the Canadian government, not the U.S. government, for its part take this opportunity to propose a parallel accord on subsidies and anti-dumping so as to protect Canadian interests and to prevent the sort of trade harassment that we have suffered from the United States in recent months?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me take my hon. friend back to February of a year ago when it was the Canadian government in the negotiations in Montreal that put forward some specific proposals for trilateral agreements on labour and on the environment. It was the Canadian government that put these forward.

We were not able to get agreement from the other parties at that time, but now that the Americans are coming back and looking more productively at this, it has given us a new opportunity to carry forward the proposals we put forward a year ago.

My hon. friend is asking about the countervail and anti-dumping elements. He knows we have a very good proposal on the table right now in the Uruguay round. I know that he and I are both in agreement in hoping that we will see some successful conclusion of this in a very short period of time. That I think will provide the answers he is looking for.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the best way for the government to proceed would be to embody the GATT text on subsidies in the North American free trade agreement.

The minister knows that it was his government which took the intellectual property provisions and particularly the drug patent requirements out of the Uruguay round text and put them in the NAFTA.

If that is good policy, why is it not equally good policy for the government to take the subsidies text out of the GATT and put it in the North American free trade agreement, either in the text itself or in a parallel accord?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in a perfect world I would be inclined to agree with my friend. However, you have to get agreement from the other two parties. The other two parties are saying: "Let us complete it in the Uruguay round". On that basis what is included in the Uruguay round will be included as part of the disciplines the North American free trade partners must follow as well. That is the approach we have decided to follow.

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we know where the Conservatives stand on the NAFTA. It would really be helpful to the debate if we found out where the Liberals stood on the NAFTA.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance who will know—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): No one cares where you stand. You are irrelevant.

Mr. Riis: They seem a little bit irritated. I wonder why.

The minister will remember back in 1972 when he sat on this side the Liberal government brought in the family trust loophole to the tax system. He will remember days and days of railing on against this unfair provision.

Now that there are probably $70 billion wrapped up in family trusts and now that his government has extended the Liberal program to provide a tax-free holiday for an entire generation, for the wealthiest families of Canada, can he explain if it was wrong back in 1972 how can it be right today in 1993?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should really do his homework on this issue.

What we are doing in the current legislation is indeed closing a loophole which allowed the prevention of taxes being paid on capital gains. That is precisely why this measure will improve that and make it more fair and equitable, as I am sure the hon. member would want us to do.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that many people who know what they are talking about have called this a very significant tax break in the millions of dollars for some of Canada's wealthiest families. Yet the Conservatives want to extend this Liberal loophole as they have done with so many other things, just showing the similarity between the Conservatives and the Liberals when it comes to things that affect the very powerful in this country.

I want to go back to a question I asked the Minister of Finance last week which he did not answer. It has to do with the business and entertainment tax deduction, another loophole which many in this country use to finance their box seats at hockey games, Expo games or whatever the case may be.

Previously the Minister of Finance said to me that he could not change it because we had to remain competitive. The Minister of Finance now knows that the Americans are looking at changing it. I asked him in the House last week if he would look at changing it and he did not answer the question.

Will he now answer that question? Will he look at changing that deduction?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is influenced by what the Americans do, I should ask him whether he is now in favour of a national sales tax, a GST or a value added tax which the Americans are considering as well.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, you just cannot get the Minister of Finance to answer the question with respect to the business and entertainment tax deductions.

Why do we not try again? The business and entertainment tax deduction, is the government thinking of changing it now that it can do so without harming our competitive position with respect to the United States?

While he is at it, if the Minister of Finance is concerned about loopholes, could he explain to the House why the Canadian government voted against Interfirpol, an organization suggested to deal with the way in which other countries become tax havens and put countries like Canada at a disadvantage? Why did the Government of Canada vote against creation of that?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is not a great supporter of the small business community and I know he is not a great supporter of the Canadian Restaurant Association.

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Mr. Mazankowski: He will just have to wait and see what the budget holds.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday in response to the report that Transport Canada is failing to collect landing fees owed by some air carriers, the President of Air Canada said:

> If that is the way the game is played to keep the field level we would like to play it the same way.

Thousands of Canadians in financial difficulty would dearly love to forgo their taxes as well. Why has the government been discriminating among air carriers in the collection of these fees? When did it become government policy to let businesses off the hook for unpaid taxes and fees owing to the Government of Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government has never let any airline off the hook in collecting its taxes.

Because the airline industry is a cyclical business, we have from time to time accommodated some airline companies that were experiencing problems. We have accommodated some airlines in other ways. Each airline has been treated fairly.

We will continue to do so by being prudent and at the same time compassionate for the jobs of the thousands of people employed in the airline industry in Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, lots of Canadians would like to see some compassion from the government when it comes to collecting taxes.

[Translation]

The minister's policies are in complete disarray. He has reduced them to some vague statements about capacity and about offering financial assistance through the back door. If he is unable to formulate a policy, why does he not table the review panel report that has been on his desk since January 30?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather difficult to follow the hon. member's logic. Some time ago he worried about what we were going to do to ensure that a major company did not go bankrupt before all these avenues had been explored. We did what was necessary to give the company ample time to examine the situation and I think that so far this has produced satisfactory results.

As for the report by the National Transportation Act Review Panel, it has been submitted to us. We are now examining the report and we intend to table it in the House as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about satisfactory results. But this Minister of Transport is presiding over the disintegration of Canada's airline industry.

The president of Canadian Airlines is asking Ottawa to order reductions in passenger capacity. The president of Air Canada is asking for deferrals in landing fees. The president of Nationair is asking for federal cash assistance from the national government.

The question Canadians are asking is: What is this minister doing? When is this minister going to produce a plan to stabilize, to resurrect, to save the Canadian airline industry from a government-made disaster?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, over-all, the airline industry is going through a very difficult period world-wide.

In other countries, for example the United States, many companies have gone bankrupt causing the loss of many jobs in the industry. However, Canada has been able to maintain all the airline companies in a living situation by applying the policy of being compassionate to the people and at the same time being fiscally prudent.

[Translation]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this government's policies are killing our airlines. Unless the minister thinks he is Pontius Pilate will he immediately take all necessary action to prevent a disaster in the industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, airlines throughout the world are going through a very difficult time. Airlines in a number of countries have gone bankrupt and many jobs have been lost. I must repeat that Canada is very proud of having managed to keep all its airlines alive and protect so many jobs in an important industry that is having a hard time restructuring but is doing so just the same.

We have seen the positions taken recently by the major companies who are starting to realize they had better reduce their capacity because, as they have admitted, there is overcapacity at the present time.

ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): My question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Our children are inheriting a country which is sick and diseased compared to our country only a generation ago. Canadians do not want to see this environmental deficit grow like the financial one. Under pressure last year, this government passed environmental assessment legislation to ensure a process that is fair, efficient, transparent and allows for a high level of public input.

Why did this government choose a cosy, cursory, internal review of the North American free trade agreement that fails these tests? Why is this government determined to ignore its own environmental legislation to ram through the NAFTA?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions for a certain time within the government and with opposition members on how to proceed to environmental assessments. In fact, I think the members on the opposite side, including the member next to the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, participated in some very detailed discussions on how we should proceed.

It was made clear from the outset that the policy development within government would be dealt with on a separate track. In fact I think it was in 1990 the government announced a process by which we would do such an environmental assessment.

NAFTA is probably the first major policy initiative to go under such a process with very good and comprehensive results which we have since made public to the hon. member and to other Canadians.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): We have heard the government's repeated assurances. The government is obviously too afraid to undertake a real environmental assessment of the North American free trade agreement.

The record of the government is clear: broken promises, cuts to the green plan, environmental legislation completely bypassed. Now in the name of competitiveness, in a ruthless levelling of the playing field, there is a review of environmental regulations to ensure they do not hinder trade.

What mandate does this government have to dismantle the few protections we have when Canadians have expressed their desire for more rather than less protection over this dangerous chemical cocktail in our—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put her question.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, one thing on which I can agree with the hon. member is the fact that the government's record in this regard is very clear. It is one of the best in the world, as described by Mostafa Tolba, who was the director of the UNEP until he was replaced by a Canadian. It is one of the best records in the world as described by President Clinton only a few weeks ago.

Environmental review of the regulations is happening in about 20 government departments, including Environment Canada. It is something that governments must undertake from time to time. We have done it with a view to upholding and protecting health and environmental standards. I have made that very clear from the outset.

To give the issue some perspective, I can say to the hon. member as I had the opportunity of saying to the executive of the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers at a recent meeting that in this area the government expects in the next few years to be regulating more rather than less. However, we want to do it more efficiently and in a way that meets Canada's environmental competitiveness, and its over-all competitiveness.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for metropolitan Montreal. Yesterday in the House, the Minister of Employment and Immigration admitted that the changes affecting unemployment insurance would take practically half a billion dollars out of the city's economy. My question is therefore directed to the minister responsible for that area. What action is he considering to deal with a situation that is intolerable in a city where 250,000 people are out of work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is completely erroneous. It is based on the conclusions of an erroneous study which attributes this short fall to the proposed changes Bill C-21 and Bill C-113.

• (1440)

However, the study fails to consider that the people of Montreal will have received more than $4 billion in unemployment insurance benefits during the period from 1990 to 1994. Montreal will receive additional amounts totalling $800 million to finance training and re-employment activities throughout that period, and this does not include, for instance, parental benefits for women in Montreal.

New spending on training will do more for Montreal's economy than the passive spending on unemployment insurance touted by the Liberal Party. These measures were not considered in the study, so the premise of her question is false.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the premise of my question is based on the fact that the unemployment insurance changes being proposed and trumpeted by this minister will take $2 billion out of the hands of those unemployed Canadians who need help.

The mayor of Welland is here in the House today seeking help from this government for an unemployment rate of 25 per cent in his community. Communities across the country are reeling. They are asking this government: "Why are you taking money directly from the hands of unemployed Canadians who can least afford to pay?"

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, according to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the maximum insurable earnings were going up by 5 per cent on January 1. Find me many Canadians who have had a 5 per cent increase in their salaries today.

In December the government imposed a freeze on the salaries of members of Parliament, judges, the Governor General and ministers of the Public Service in trying to contain the deficit of UI. I know that Liberals do not care about deficits. They mounted one that we still have to pay for today. However, the fact of the matter is that even with these changes Canadian employers and workers will have an accumulated deficit of over $7 billion by the end of 1993 which ultimately they have to pay.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in response to my question to her on peacekeeping deployment and training, the Minister of National Defence said that I ought to correctly quote her cabinet colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I am sure she has had a chance to check the "blues" and the minutes of the standing committee on external affairs. She will now know that the information she was given was false, the quote was correct and that she was wrong.

On the subject of peacekeeping operations, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence: Why at a time when the government claims it has excess base infrastructure in Canada for every kind, size and description of training does the government see fit to deploy 800 soldiers for training for a month in California at a base that I am told is due to close in the near future?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I believe General Mackenzie pointed out when he was asked publicly about this—I use him since he seems to be the authority that hon. members on the opposite side trust most—the facilities at Fort Ord are not replicated anywhere in Canada. They have two advantages for this training mission.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They are in California.

Mr. Chrétien: The beach boys.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I do not think the safety of Canadian men and women going on missions is a matter of humour.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member interested in an answer to this question? I think it is an important question.

The facilities at Fort Ord have two advantages. They allow Canadian men and women who are training to be deployed into Croatia to train in a built-up area. It is a facility that replicates an urban landscape. That is where our people will in fact be deployed. It enables them therefore to acquire the appropriate skills.

Right now in Canada we do not have a facility that enables them to train in the climatic conditions they will meet when they are there, namely springtime conditions. Alas I have to confess that even in British Columbia it is not springtime.

It is important when we send Canadian men and women into dangerous circumstances that they are trained to meet the conditions of those circumstances and not those in the imaginations of members opposite who have not the foggiest clue about what is really involved in peacekeeping.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the minister is right. This is a serious subject and I suggest there are some on this side who do have a clue as to what is going on.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mifflin: Speaking of clues, I would like to ask the minister about the situation. Peacekeeping has reached an unprecedented level for Canada.

We have two generals with vast peacekeeping experience who are showing concern over the nature and the size of our operations. The Chief of the Defence Staff last November stated grave concern and now one of her cabinet colleagues, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in her testimony to the committee last Wednesday said that she had concern about overloading the personnel resource system.

When will the minister stop wallpapering her lack of knowledge about what is going on in her department? She should stop giving these weak and arrogant answers, find out what is happening and properly manage defence in Canada.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that hon. member knows because he was a member of the Canadian Armed Forces that Canada has never developed its policy with respect to the size of the forces based on meeting peacekeeping requirements.

The size of the Canadian Armed Forces and the equipment is based on what is required to meet our own security needs and our own domestic needs such as the support of the civil power.

When we have a request from the United Nations for peacekeeping, we review the kinds of services the United Nations is looking for and if we have available people who can meet those services, we make them available to the United Nations.

Clearly there is a limit on how much we can do. I agree with many who have spoken on this subject that we are reaching the limit of the kinds of facilities that we are able to make available to the United Nations.

The question then remains for Canadians to decide where they wish to increase the size of the Canadian Armed Forces, increase our defence budget to meet additional requirements of peacekeeping.

I would be very interested to know whether it is the position of that hon. member's party that we do that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Auditor General found in 1989 that there was an inconsistent application of UI penalties right across Canada. This is a great injustice, which continues today, for claimants when a reason for quitting is considered just cause in one employment centre but not in another.

Before proceeding with Bill C-113, will the Minister of Finance call upon the Auditor General to do an audit of UIC having particular regard to quits and fireds?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are attempting to administer the UI regime in a fair way in order to protect the taxpayers of Canada, the workers and the employers who pay into the fund.

I know the NDP stand is that we should pay benefits to a person who voluntarily, without cause, quits his or her job but that is definitely not the position of this government.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the minister's position on wanting to be fair with all Canadians but let us make sure that he is fair with all Canadians, all those employed and unemployed.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. We have been unable to obtain statistics from UIC on reasons for quits and fireds. We suspect that the government has never kept these statistics that are so relevant to Bill C-113.

I would like to ask the minister how he can predict savings to the UI program on such sketchy information. Also I would like to ask again if he will consider authorizing an audit on this aspect of the UI program.

• (1450)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-113 is presently before the House.

According to our parliamentary process, the bill will go to a legislative committee. At that time members will have a chance to ask questions of the officials as to the situation of the UI account, of the bill and everything pertaining to it. I invite him to do just that.

TAXATION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Presently Canadian corporations are experiencing the lowest profit margins in history, including the Great Depression. In fact approximately 50 per cent of our corporations are operating at a loss.

Recently the NDP proposed to increase the minimum corporate tax. Could the Minister of Finance explain what effect this tax increase will have on the current business climate and the current unemployment situation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the level of corporate profits is at an all-time low. It is true that it is important to maintain in place a competitive tax regime that is consistent with the competitive norms in the industrialized world. While Canada is about in the centre of the G-7 countries, it is still somewhat higher than the United States.

I agree with the hon. member when she asks what the result of an additional corporate tax burden will be. I can only refer to what is happening in Ontario.

I read from the Stoney Creek News a headline which says "Ron Foxcroft temporarily relocates to the United States". It goes on to say:

> "We moved to North Tonawanda temporarily until the Bob Rae government is defeated," said Foxworth.
> He is shocked with what he calls the detrimental business practices of Ontario's NDP government, he said—
>
> "The day after the Bob Rae government is defeated, I'll be back".

AIRLINES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The minister knows that prior to Christmas when an advance was made to Canadian Airlines, Canadian Airlines cut back on the services provided. After that Nationair, which is an airline that does not even pay landing fees and apparently owes the government in excess of $7 million, was allowed to institute service between Toronto and Ottawa, and Toronto and Montreal.

Why did the minister allow those services to be instituted when Nationair owed the government money? Why is that service allowed to continue as long as Nationair owes money to the government?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the member knows that we have a policy of making sure that competition exists in the airline industry.

The travelling public has benefited from the reduced rates. We cannot know in advance whether a company is going to make money on a certain route or not.

BILL C-91

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

This morning Winnipeggers found out the true meaning of Bill C-91. Instead of the much-promised new money for research, they found out that Apotex, a Canadian-owned generic drug company was cancelling a major project in Manitoba.

Will the minister now admit that the legislation is devastating to the Canadian generic drug companies and that changes must be made immediately to the legislation to protect them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I caution my friend to read carefully what the Apotex people said.

They have not cancelled that. They have shelved the thing temporarily. They have said this at times before and we have learned to listen very carefully because we have confidence that the project will proceed.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the minister of western diversification.

Apotex was sponsored in this project by a grant from western diversification to the tune of $6.2 million. How can one minister recommend a project for government expenditures to the tune of $6.2 million while another minister presents legislation to the House that defeats that project. What exactly are the plans of the government for the development of a technical and sophisticated Winnipeg economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend misses the point again. The legislation he referred to has brought forward some $650 million worth of investment in various parts of the country.

Manitoba has a $100 million project that is going to be very important to its economy. I think my hon. friend should look at the broad picture and not jump to fast conclusions which have not been borne out in the past.

FOREIGN AID

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

On Friday Canada will participate in a NATO meeting to discuss an airlift for Bosnia but other countries are also in crisis. For example, the Prime Minister received an urgent request for help from the President of Armenia. Unfortunately our response is very limited.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister to increase Canadian aid. Moreover, will he instruct our NATO ambassador to raise this issue so that the international community will establish an airlift to transport food and energy supplies to Armenia?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not in the House today. I will take note of my colleague's question and I am sure that the minister will answer him as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Deputy Prime Minister and to the Minister of National Defence, Armenia is a forgotten country. People are starving and freezing. The CSCE has not been able to solve the war. The UN is not taking any interest whatsoever.

Will this country take some leadership, bring this matter before the UN Security Council in an emergency meeting and ask for an end to the economic blockade? Talk to our allies, the Turks, and say that a corridor has to be opened. We have to find some way of bringing about a cease fire.

Is it not time for Canada to stand up for the poor people of Armenia and show we are prepared to offer leadership to the world?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just repeat in English what I said in French on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I am not aware of what steps she has taken to raise this particular issue either in the United Nations or with other countries. She is in Japan today. She has been travelling a great deal. I know that she will be very pleased to respond to the hon. member's question as soon as possible on her return.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Will the minister take all necessary steps to persuade the Government of Mexico to adopt an environmental green plan to ensure that its participation in the North American free trade agreement does not cause undue exploitation of the country's people, resources and ecology.

Further, will Canada offer Mexico to help it enact such a green policy, a portion of the funding proposed at the earth summit through the United Nations Development Fund?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the Mexican government has already put in place a national program in the area of environmental protection with a certain number of fixed objectives.

It may be of interest to members of this House to know that Canada signed a bilateral agreement with Mexico in March 1990 in the area of environmental protection. We have since spent $1 million in co-operation with them in different areas, including training. It is a forerunner to the many opportunities there for Canada in the area of environmental technologies.

To complete my answer to the member's question, Canada will participate with many countries in developing green plans around the world. Since Mexico already has one and we have a bilateral agreement we will not use the UNDF plan for that purpose.

AGRIFOOD SECTOR

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture.

A $40 million agreement has just been signed with Quebec to promote sustainable development in the agrifood sector.

How can the minister ensure that the regions will control the programs under the Canada-Quebec agreement for sustainable development and how can he ensure that there will be as little duplication as possible in implementing these programs?

• (1500)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the member's question is interesting because our government has indeed signed a $40 million agreement with the Government of Quebec. What is especially important is that it covers the environment and agriculture, which are important fields for all provinces, including Quebec. In fact, it was the fifth Canadian province to conclude an agreement with the federal government.

The decisions will not be made in Ottawa or Quebec City but in each region. In each region of Quebec there will be committees made up of representatives of the provincial and federal governments and farmers belonging to the UPA; those people will receive project submissions from farm groups and approve them. I think $40 million for agriculture and the environment is a good thing.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On January 13, 1993 the minister removed silicone breast implants from the market. However, the minister said it would be permissible for women to obtain breast implants on compassionate grounds.

Is it compassionate to put an object that we know is unsafe into the body of woman? Would the minister tell us what his definition of compassionate is?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the only answer I can give to the member is the one I gave when we discussed this.

Compassionate grounds have been defined very strictly by the medical profession and it will be assessed case by case. Each case will be referred to the department based upon very stringent rules. If there is no relationship to the rules it will be turned down.

I believe we can provide requested information at any time concerning the nature of the rules that will apply. I absolutely would not worry about how it will be dealt with by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-101, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

• (1550)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address hon. members on the second reading of federal labour legislation which will reduce administrative and cost burdens, increase efficiency and competitiveness and enhance labour-management co-operation.

The proposed amendments to the Canada Labour Code are in a balanced package. They benefit employers, employees and government and are also timely. With the support of this House we can move forward together to increase our investment in people and the ability of Canadian enterprises to be more competitive.

The majority of the amendments I am proposing relate to federal labour standards contained in the Canada Labour Code. These proposals were developed over a two-year period in partnership with federally regulated employer and employee representatives, the very parties affected by the changes. Some 700,000 working Canadians will benefit from these changes to federal labour standards.

The issues addressed in this proposal include streamlining modifications to standards, clarifying the relationship between minimum labour standards and collective agreements, more effective collection of unpaid wages, provision of wage and employment protection for workers injured on the job, greater flexibility in the timing of parental leave and maternity related reassignment.

I am also proposing the addition of a provision to the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act. These amendments will serve the public interest by providing an additional mechanism which could assist in the settlement of collective bargaining disputes.

[Translation]

I will give a few examples of the ways in which the proposed amendments to the Canada Labour Code will benefit employers and employees. Streamlining the procedure for modifying labour standards such as duration of work, annual leave and statutory holidays will benefit the employer.

Clarification of federal powers concerning wage and unemployment protection for workers injured on the job and the relationship between minimum labour standards and collective agreements will help save time and money and prevent overlap and duplication.

Pregnant and nursing workers will have the right to request reassignment, a change in their tasks or even a period of leave if their health is at stake. Employees injured on the job will benefit under provisions that guarantee wage protection, maintenance of social benefits and resumption of employment. New parents will be able to take parental leave at the time they see fit, during the first year in which they have an infant in their care.

All these changes clearly benefit Canadian workers and testify to the federal government's commitment to investing in the human resources of this country.

These changes will greatly enhance the harmonization of labour legislation in this country. The Canada Labour Code will be more compatible with provincial labour standards will be increased, and employees across Canada will be entitled to similar levels of wages and benefits.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, these very substantial changes are intended to streamline federal labour legislation and help Canada prepare for the challenges of economic globalization. I would now like to offer some examples that will illustrate the tremendous progress we will all be able to make as a result of this bill.

[English]

As an example let me briefly describe our amendments with regard to collective agreements and minimum labour standards. These modifications will exempt unionized work places from annual vacation, general holidays, bereavement leave or minimum wage standards where the collective agreement meets or exceeds the legislated standard.

Currently the complainant, subject to such a collective agreement, may call on both the grievance process and Labour Canada for redress. The new amendments will ensure that only the collective agreement prevails for those employees who have access to a third party grievance process. This will eliminate unnecessary duplication.

At the outset I referred to proposed changes in the industrial relations area of the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The changes will protect the public interest by providing an additional mechanism which could assist in the settlement of collective bargaining disputes in federal jurisdiction. These amendments will allow a vote to be directed among employees in a bargaining unit on an employer's last offer when the public interest is affected.

Housekeeping amendments to the Canada Labour Code will also be made to redress certain discrepancies between the English and French texts. This will ensure clarity and uniformity in the provisions.

In conclusion, I think it is clear from the outline I have provided hon. members that the amendments before this House will have an extensive and beneficial impact on efficiency in the work place while promoting greater co-operation between employer and employee.

These amendments will also help propel Canada into a more progressive economic climate and foster a more equitable and harmonious work place environment. I trust that with the support of both Houses and the support of my colleagues from the opposition parties we can get this piece of legislation through the House quickly.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the Minister of Labour on introducing Bill C-101 and making so many necessary changes to the Canada Labour Code.

I have some amendments and suggestions to make to what the minister is proposing, as will my Liberal colleagues who will be speaking on this bill. I have already sent them to him for his perusal. Over all my party and I are prepared to support the bill in the anticipation that our recommendations will be received in the same spirit as we give this support.

The federally regulated enterprises to which the code applies include privately and publicly owned industries engaged in interprovincial or international rail, road and pipeline transportation, shipping and related services, air transportation, interprovincial and international communications, broadcasting, banks and various Crown corporations.

I will deal specifically with sections of the bill which I think can be improved. Clause 42 would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act, also known as the PSSRA, by adding a heading and a proposed subsection 19.1. I am suggesting that this clause be amended by striking out lines 6 and 7 on page 28 and substituting the following: "that it is in the interests of the employees of the effective bargaining unit that those employees be—."

After line 20 on page 28 the following should be added: "1.1 For the purposes of determining the interest of the employees under subsection .1 the minister may take into consideration the following: (a) whether the rules of the trade union give the employees an opportunity to vote, to accept or reject an offer of an employer, and where there are no such rules whether this is likely to be prejudicial to the employees; (b) whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that a significant number of employees wants a vote to be held, and (c) whether a vote is likely to end a labour dispute that in the opinion of the minister has lasted for an inordinate length of time."

I would leave that timing to the opinion of the minister and his advisers who would be involved in this.

Clause 2 seeks to amend Part I of the Canada Labour Code by adding a heading and proposed subsection 108.1 regarding a directed vote on the employer's last offer. This is where there seems to be more of a problem than in other sections of the bill because this was not discussed at any length with the people involved in the negotiations all along. Where notice to bargain collectively had been given and the Minister of Labour felt that the public interest would be served by such a vote, the Minister of Labour could consider or could order a vote among employees in the affected bargaining unit. Employees could vote to accept or reject the employer's last offer received by the bargaining agent on all matters remaining in dispute.

• (1600)

What I am suggesting is that clause 2 of Bill C-101 be amended as follows: by striking out lines 18 and 19 on page 1, and substituting the following: "interest of the employees of the affected bargaining unit that those employees be given the opportunity"; by adding after line 10, page 2, the following: "(1.1) for the purposes of determining the interest of the employees under subsection (1), the minister may take into consideration the following: (a) whether the rules of the trade union give the employees an opportunity to vote to accept or reject an offer of the employer and where there are no such rules, whether this is likely to be prejudicial to the employees; (b) whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that an insignificant number of employees wants a vote to be held; and (c) whether a vote is likely to end a labour dispute that, in the opinion of the minister, has lasted for an inordinate length of time".

Certainly the idea that bargaining unit employees may vote on the employer's last offer is not new in the Canadian labour relations system. Legislation exists in several jurisdictions on this issue. In Alberta, any time after bargaining proposals have been exchanged, either party may make one request during each dispute for the Labour Relations Board to conduct a vote on the most recent offer.

If most of those voting accept the offer, then it is binding on the parties and must be included in their collective agreement.

The British Columbia Industrial Relations Act provides that before the commencement of a strike or lockout the employer may make one request for a secret ballot on its last offer to be held among bargaining-unit employees. The commissioner of the Industrial Relations Council then orders such a vote.

The act further allows that during a strike or lockout the commissioner may direct a secret ballot vote if he or she considers that it is in the public interest to do so.

Finally, British Columbia's bill 84 includes a provision that would authorize the Minister of Labour to direct a vote on the employer's last offer. I would note here that in this particular case where this act was passed, it was a New Democratic government that passed it. This seems to be the group that is going to give the greatest problem with the passing of this particular section.

I see my colleague is all ready to jump in here and I am waiting to hear what she has to say. I am sure she will have a lot to say and I hope most of it will be substantive.

In Ontario, which is also led by a New Democratic government, after the commencement of a strike, the Minister of Labour may direct a vote among the bargaining unit employees on the employees' last offer if he or she feels that this would be in the "public interest".

For example, in 1991, a legal strike by Toronto Transit Commission employees ended when the Ontario Minister of Labour, a member I believe of the New Democratic Party, directed a vote among the striking employees. A majority of the voting employees agreed to accept the employer's last offer. Further, the Ontario Labour Relations Act allows that before or after the commencement of a strike or lockout, the minister, in response to a request from the employer, will order a vote among the bargaining unit employees on the last offer.

Finally, there is the Saskatchewan Trade Union Act—where there is also a New Democratic government—that allows it sometimes when a strike has continued for 30 days. A time limit is put on it. The trade union, the employer or the employees involved in the strike representing at least 100 persons or 25 per cent of those in the union, whichever is less, may apply to the Labour Relations Board for a vote on the employer's final offer.

Every affected employee who has not secured permanent employment elsewhere is eligible to vote. The vote is held at the discretion of the board. It may be ordered only once for any strike.

The minister suggests that the amendments proposed in Bill C-101 would serve the public interest through providing—in addition to what I believe he said was conciliation and other mechanisms available under the legislation—a means that would assist in the settlement of bargaining disputes. I agree with him.

I believe that his interpretation of the bill coincides very closely with mine and that, generally, of my party. Nevertheless, neither clause specifies what person or body other than the Canadian Labour Relations Board, the CLRB, or the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the PSSRB, as the case may be, might be charged with conducting the last-offer vote or for what reason or on what basis an entity other than the relevant board would be selected.

The proposed amendments should be entered into the record so that there is no misconception on either side as to precisely what we are dealing with:

> B. Proposed Amendments to Minimum Employment Standards.
> 1. The Relationship Between Collective Agreements and Part III of the Canada Labour Code: Clause 13.
> Clause 13 would amend section 168 of the CLC by adding proposed section 168(1.1). This proposal would require that Divisions II, IV, V, VIII (Minimum Wages, Annual Vacations, General Holidays and Bereavement Leave, respectively) not apply to parties to a collective agreement that provided employees with rights and benefits at least as favourable as those provided under the stated Divisions of the Code in respect of length of leave, rates of pay and qualifying periods for benefits. Further, such employees would access the grievance and rights arbitrations provisions of the collective agreement for the settlement of disagreements related to those matters.
> It is a generally prevailing principle that minimum employment standards are exactly that—minimum standards. Further it is generally understood that these standards provide a "floor" from which unions often negotiate relatively more generous benefits. The proposed change would clarify that collective agreement provisions would prevail over select legislated provisions of part III of the Canada Labour Code in cases where the terms of the collective agreement at least met the code's requirements or annual vacation entitlements, general holidays, bereavement leave or minimum wage rates. Generally, collective agreement provisions exceed legislated provisions in these areas.
> The grievance procedure would be used in seeking redress in disputes related to these benefits. However employees in a non-unionized work environment who lack access to a grievance procedure could seek redress through either Labour Canada or the courts.

The modifications for maternity leave as outlined in this bill would cover approximately 700,000 men and women across Canada. We believe in this party that a fairly substantial group, nearly 200,000 additional women, could be covered through an amendment to clause 26 of the bill simply by adding immediately after line 8 on page 17 the following: "Section 206.2 Notwithstanding any provisions in this Part, sections 204 to 206.1 apply to a department within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act".

My colleagues, the MPs for Ottawa West and Kenora—Rainy River, will be joining in this debate. My colleague for Ottawa West who is the Liberal critic for the Public Service will deal with this question more clearly and in more depth.

I am quoting the minister: "Bill C-101 in its original form seeks to increase efficiency, competitiveness and prosperity for Canadian workers and also would extend the role of the federal government in fostering a productive and more aggressive labour-management climate." These are all very worthy goals to which I lend my unqualified support.

In general terms, the proposals, most of which were developed over a two-year period through consultation between employee, employer and the Canadian Labour Congress, which spoke for the unions are broadly acceptable. I say that they are broadly acceptable to all parties.

Organized labour however feels that there ought to have been consultation over the issue of the vote on an employer's last offer. I think that possibly if there had been more consultation, we might have been able to arrive at an agreement which was just about like the one that is in here but that option was taken from our hands.

Organized labour through the Canadian Labour Congress also feels that ministerial direction for a last-offer vote would constitute unwarranted interference with labour-management relations and the international affairs of the union. My colleague will argue further that there could be the spectre of conflict of interest.

At least at this point in the debate on second reading I think that the bill is generally acceptable to my party and that it should be allowed to proceed into committee for further study and clarification and hopefully for the inclusion of the friendly amendments which I, my colleagues and my party are suggesting to the minister today.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise first to say that I am pleased this bill is before the House, but I would like to make a correction.

My hon. colleague, the labour critic for the Liberals referred to the CLC as being concerned about the impact of the clause 1 amendment on the international workings of the affiliated union. I think he meant to say the internal workings of the affiliated union.

These amendments to the Canada Labour Code are ones that certainly this caucus can support and, as my hon. colleague the labour critic for the Liberals said, that the Canadian Labour Congress can support.

What we most support is the proposition of consultation and working together to come up with amendments to the Canada Labour Code that are good for the workers, good for the employers and certainly good for the Minister of Labour. When two groups have come together and come to a consensus conclusion, the likelihood of both sides being willing to work within the system, and the system working, are much enhanced.

Unfortunately the amendments to part I of the code and to the Public Service Staff Relations Act were not the result of consultation. After seeking and getting support for all the other amendments, the minister without warning dropped the part I amendment, the same amendment, into the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The previous speaker has alluded to what is in it. I would have liked to have been able to refer to the explanatory notes normally attached to a bill because they probably would have been in lay language and much easier for Canadians to understand than the legalise of a bill. Unfortunately all it says is "New", which suggests to me that it was a last minute addition to the bill and there was not time to work through it.

Essentially it says under "Vote on Employer's Offer":

> 108.1(1) Where notice to bargain collectively has been given under this Part, and the Minister is of the opinion that it is in the public interest that the employees in the affected bargaining unit be given the opportunity to accept or reject the offer of the employer last received by the trade union in respect of all matters remaining in dispute between the parties, the Minister may

It goes on to set out the conditions. It has been noted that several governments already have this clause in their legislation. The previous speaker referred to Alberta which I found quite fascinating because Alberta probably has the most retrogressive, old-fashioned labour legislation in the country. I found that rather fascinating. I am quite pleased for the workers in Alberta that there is one little sign of light at the end of the tunnel.

He then referred to British Columbia. I think he was referring to the same labour code that the Liberal opposition in British Columbia held up in the House for seven months because it was felt that it was not a fair labour code. Ninety-four per cent of the clauses in the labour code were reached by consensus with labour and management but the Liberals did not like that labour code because it was far too progressive.

It is interesting the hon. member would refer to those items. The Ontario labour code, also introduced by an NDP government, has proven to be and has been called by labour relations experts everywhere one of the most progressive pieces of labour legislation in the world. Both British Columbia and Ontario codes, I might add, have anti-scab legislation along with the legislation in Quebec.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that you and the people out there will understand that while both British Columbia and Ontario have this clause in their labour codes, the difference is that the labour movement and the employers were consulted about the wording, about how it would work.

In this instance we have a clause in the legislation that was introduced without any consultation. It is not so much the merit of the clause but the failure to discuss and the sort of high-handed—I am sure the minister was not high-handed; we have our suspicions about where this clause came from—introduction of legislation without so much as indicating that they were planning on doing it and it being forwarded to the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Federation of Labour and CCU unions.

It is important to remember that if the same level of discussions had gone into part I amendments we would have had a much better bill. It would have been worded in such a way that it would have met the needs of employers and met the needs of the labour movement.

Much like the amendments proposed by his colleague, the minister of employment, with respect to UI, we have a clause that is flawed. The Liberal labour critic has suggested that clause be amended by changing, and correct me if I am wrong, lines 18 and 19 to remove "in a public interest" and include "interest of the affected bargaining unit".

Now we are talking about allowing an employer not only to bully and frighten workers. We are now saying that the test will be those frightened and possibly harassed workers and their desire, whether they think it is in their interest to have a look at that collective agreement and not the test of the public interest. Anyone who has been at the bargaining table knows that those at the bargaining table are not likely to be intimidated either way. For those who do not know what is going on at the bargaining table, some employers have been known from time to time to intimidate workers.

While I look forward to this bill going to committee and the opportunity to discuss amendments, I would think my colleague could come up with an explanation of why he thinks his amendment is not flawed. I am most concerned about it.

Getting back to the part I amendment, the amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, it is very evident that this amendment did not come from a demand of the employer's group. It leaves one to wonder therefore whose agenda is being served by this amendment.

The federal government abandoned negotiations with its own workers with the passage of Bill C-29 one and a half years ago. We now have before the House Bill C-113 that would end the government's obligation to bargain with its workers and impose a two-year wage freeze. This is not collective bargaining. This measure gives the employer the upper hand. It need only put out the pretence of bargaining and then sit back and wait for the legislation to go into effect.

This does not improve the collective bargaining relationship. It only adds to the distrust of the motives of the employer by the workers. At a time when morale is at an all-time low in the federal public sector, one would hope that the government would be looking at ways to increase productivity and to improve and create an effective collective bargaining relationship rather than make a bad situation worse.

Unions are an integral part of the collective bargaining process, particularly in the case of the amendment to the PSSR act. The amendment we find in the bill serves notice to that employer that the government through Treasury Board does not trust or respect the bargaining agents of its workers.

To me there seems to be a major conflict of interest when the employer can set the parameters of collective bargaining in law and at the bargaining table. The situation will be one where cabinet will determine the best offer it is going to present and then call on a minister of the Crown to order a vote of the union membership on the offer.

This provision is open to great abuse particularly in the public sector, but it is not confined to the public sector. When this bill was introduced the minister said that he would not abuse it, and I believe him. However the Minister of Labour is not the minister responsible for Treasury Board and the Minister of Labour may not always be the Minister of Labour. Some time in the not so far distant future the Minister of Labour may go on to be the Deputy Prime Minister and somebody else will take his place. This is a cause for concern.

By permitting these types of votes, the government will be giving the employer yet another weapon to break the union and avoid its obligation to bargain with its workers. That is where the greatest concern is in introducing this amendment under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. One can easily imagine the type of public relations campaign an employer could mount to persuade that its last offer was the best it could do. We certainly saw that last week with Nationair. It was the best it could do. The union was being unreasonable; the bargaining committee did not truly represent the interests of the membership; and in fact when push came to shove Nationair was able to come to an agreement.

This is an unwarranted and unnecessary invasion by the government into the collective bargaining process. I would ask, if it is going there, the very least there should be is consultation and discussions with both employer and the unions affected by the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

By tagging on the part I amendment to the code the minister has undermined the consultative process and cast suspicion on his commitment to reform the labour relation system at the federal level.

The minister also missed an important opportunity to bring an end to one of the most disruptive aspects of labour relations, the use of scabs. We are amending the Canada Labour Code with two major disputes in the country where the use of scabs has exacerbated the situation, has been vicious and violent, and the minister has not included anti-scab legislation. There are three jurisdictions in this country that have anti-scab legislation. We have no evidence that shows that the use of anti-scab legislation in any way interferes with or makes worse the collective bargaining process.

The major amendment that both the governments of B.C. and Ontario implemented in their labour code amendments was that of a ban on the use of scabs. The minister is fully aware of the consequences of the use of scabs. In both the CASAW-Royal Oak dispute in Yellowknife where nine people died, who would not have died if scabs had not been underground, and the CUPE-Nationair dispute in Montreal, the use of scabs has only served to prolong these disputes and to permanently damage, not only the bargaining relationship between workers and the employer, but in the case of Yellowknife to permanently damage relationships in a very isolated and what was a very closely knit community.

I would say that real reform in part I would be to follow the lead of Ontario and B.C. and add a section outlawing the use of scabs.

In part III of the Canada Labour Code the minister has addressed conditions of working life, hours of work, minimum wages, vacations and holidays, leave for sickness and injury, termination and unjust dismissal. All of these are fundamental to a fairer and more equitable work place.

In effect, this part of the labour code is the collective agreement for those workers who are in the unorganized sector. It is their only assurance of a safe and secure work place. It is the minimum standard. For all Canadians the labour code ensures that myopic and unscrupulous employers cannot take advantage of temporarily hostile economic environments to exploit workers.

The code is a statement of the Canadian commitment to minimum standards of security and dignity in the work place, standards which are necessary to the development of a trained, healthy, motivated and productive work force.

For the most part what we see in this bill reflects this underlying belief in the need to strike an appropriate balance of power between worker and employer. For that I applaud the minister. The bill improves on existing provisions so that they are more closely attuned to the realities of the modern Canadian economy.

Greater flexibility for parental leave reflects the reality of today's working families and the commitment of many women to the work place.

Maternity related reassignment puts the rights of the worker to continue her employment ahead of those of the employer to force her on unpaid leave. While this provision does not go far enough in our view as it extends for only a 24-week period, it is a very important step. The recognition in law of the health effects of the work place on the pre and post-natal child are very important and we applaud them.

There is improved wage and employment protection for those workers injured on the job. We applaud that amendment.

Curiously enough, there is a statement in this bill about the primacy of collective agreements where provisions of those agreements exceed those of the code. That is the part that we find rather odd, that this bill speaks of collective agreements, the result of the collective bargaining process, that it will prevail on issues of leave, rates of pay and qualifying period. But in this same bill we have amendments to the code and Public Service Staff Relations Act that effectively allow the minister to nullify the collective bargaining process, amendments which shift the balance of power to the employer.

On the one hand the minister is acknowledging that yes, the collective bargaining process can protect the rights of workers and employers. On the other he says that he can intrude into that at any time.

The wage recovery amendments set up a non-criminal procedure and will hopefully be administratively more efficient than pursuing these matters through the courts. Corporate directors will be made liable for the payment of wages owed. This is a fine amendment to this code and an important recognition that the contribution of the worker is as valuable as that of the director and the latter should not be able to walk away from a failed business with a severance package not available to other workers.

• (1630)

It is with great sorrow that my caucus and I are forced to oppose this bill that is mostly built on consensus. After the minister had done his work and done it very well, in our view, someone else has come up with another agenda and drafted amendments to part I of the Canada Labour Code and Public Service Staff Relations Act without consultation and in fact taken what was a good, positive step in industrial relations under the Minister of Labour and made it into something that is less than positive in that on the one hand we said we want to consult and on the other hand we said we want to abandon that consultation, putting the minister in a position of having to bring forward a bill that was supposed to have been built on consultation.

I would urge that the government consider the positive possibility of consulting with the labour movement, with employers in this country, so that we can come up with amendments to part I and the Public Service Staff Relations Act and come to third reading of this bill with a bill that everybody has been consulted on and everybody is feeling positive about and indeed, open a new era in industrial relations in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Fisheries; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Refugees; the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River—Taxation; the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—The Economy; and the hon. member for St. Boniface—Transportation.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it is with great satisfaction that I rise in the House today. The minister and member of Parliament for Verchères has just tabled a bill which includes proposals for amending the Canada Labour Code will allow for temporary reassignment of pregnant or nursing employees when their state of health so requires.

Hon. members may recall that I proposed a similar amendment in the House a few years ago following presentations Joanne Moisan made at my office in Val-d'Or in November 1989.

Today, according to the rules applying to all federally regulated employees, an employer may oblige a pregnant employee who is no longer able to perform one of the duties of her position to go on maternity leave.

In other words, today a pregnant employee who wants to go on working does not have the right to ask for a change in her tasks or for reassignment. She may be forced to quit her job unless she is entitled to sick leave or paid annual leave or can start her maternity leave.

Quebec is the only province in Canada that has specific legislation to protect pregnant employees on the job. Some collective bargaining agreements also provide that protection. This bill meets the provisions of the Quebec program and goes even further.

In 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Quebec program did not apply to federally regulated companies. Consequently, pregnant or nursing employees working in federally regulated industries located in Quebec are not eligible for the Quebec program.

So my question is: why should women who work in a federally regulated sector in Quebec not have the same right to be reassigned which would allow them to stay on the job during their pregnancy?

The proposed changes will help correct the imbalance between the rights of the employer and the rights of a female employee. The employer will have to make every reasonable effort, either to change the tasks of a pregnant or nursing employee or to reassign her if the employee's physician is of the opinion that her present state of health so requires.

Today's bill proposes more flexible conditions to determine when an employee may take parental leave. For instance, employees may choose the timing of their parental leave. The purpose here is to help parents find the best way to combine work with family responsibilities.

Further changes will ensure wage protection, maintenance of social benefits and the return to work of injured employees when possible, while at the same time clarifying federal powers and releasing employers from the obligation to engage in costly legal proceedings against the provinces.

As you know, most employers already participate in provincial workers' compensation plans or private insurance plans. These employers will not have to pay additional costs.

Those who are not in any insurance plan may be sued by workers injured on the job. The proposal would ensure that there is money to compensate workers involved in accidents.

To conclude, I would like to add that the people of my riding and of many other parts of Canada support this bill that will ultimately benefit Canadians. I have personally supported the Minister of Labour on many occasions in his efforts to bring forward this bill.

I wish to say to Liberal and NDP members that our government has the responsibility to better protect pregnant or nursing women employed in federally-regulated companies. Therefore we must legislate on this. Once again, I reiterate my support for the proposed changes and ask members on both sides of the House to support them also.

In closing, I thank all the women in Canada who for years have been asking the Canadian government for justice. I thank Renée Godmer and her staff; I thank Canadian employers and unions for their involvement in this issue and especially thank the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. Minister of Labour.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-113

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint. Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3) I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the second reading stage.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Danis that Bill C-101, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my colleague from Abitibi before I get my opportunity to speak on this particular bill.

I know that my colleague from Abitibi has been working very hard on the issue of the place of pregnant women in the work force and the difficulties that they face as it relates to their unborn child and in some instances their child that is an infant.

Would he be able to give us his government's analysis of why the minister put in the bill the employer's last offer amendment which deals of course with a grave infringement on the collective bargaining rights of workers and could he give us a synopsis because, as you well know, we are not allowed to ask the minister questions when he gives his speech. Maybe the member for Abitibi could give us an explanation of the government's rationale as to why this particular amendment is in the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, we all know that for years, many people, especially in Quebec, as I just explained, have known that Quebec is the only province that had what is called precautionary cessation of work. For years in our offices, especially since 1984 and particularly around 1989, women in banking, in some sectors of radio and communications and in transportation, in Canada and in Quebec, often in non-union positions, called us to ask what we could do to have the Canadian government put precautionary cessation of work in the Canada Labour Code. To answer the question of my Liberal colleague who has been involved in this issue since he came to this House, where he represents his constituency very well, we know that it has not been easy.

The Canadian government has had discussions with the unions on the Canada Labour Code. Today we know that several things can happen. Changes and amendments may be made, but it is mainly due to women in our ridings and women not represented by unions in banking and transportation.

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you that if the minister goes to the legislative committee, he can elaborate on the subject since he participated in the negotiations on the labour code with the unions. I want to tell my colleague that we will follow this very closely and I thank him for his question.

• (1640)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Abitibi a question. I suppose that he realizes that the compensation received by a woman who uses the right to precautionary cessation of work will be different depending on whether she is covered by the provincial or the federal code. In Quebec, the only province to offer this provision, a woman worker receives about 95 per cent of her salary without deductions, which is about 100 per cent of the pay that she normally gets. This will not be the case under Bill C-101. So there will still be two kinds of citizens with respect to the right to precautionary cessation of work, those who come under the Quebec code and those under the federal code. I would like to ask him whether he does not think it would have been better to adopt the provisions of the Quebec code in full and thus not penalize a worker because she is pregnant or nursing a baby. That is my first question.

Second, I would also like to know from the member whether or not he believes that an anti-scab provision should have been in this reform of the Labour Code, given the very recent long lockout at Nationair, for example. The Quebec law has led to greatly improved labour relations in Quebec, partly because of the anti-scab bill passed there over 15 years ago, and neither the Quebec Liberals nor the employers' association, the Conseil du patronat, challenge it. I would like to have his comments on these two points.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the Bloc Quebecois member who was always absent when I tabled a motion in Parliament. I am pleased to see you hear this evening, sir.

When he talks about 95 per cent, I remember—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I think that as the debate is beginning today and the hon. member is the fourth to speak in it, such remarks are somewhat ridiculous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must simply remind both sides of the House that it is contrary to parliamentary tradition and the Standing Orders to point out the absence or presence of an hon. member in this House.

The hon. member for Abitibi has the floor.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, you are a good chairman, but I only said that I was pleased to see him. I did not talk about absence or presence.

Mr. Speaker, the member just mentioned the 95 per cent. If I remember correctly, workers' compensation in Quebec was 90 per cent; that makes about $353 a week, which is non-taxable for the recipients. We know that it cost employers in Quebec about $78.4 million in 1990. I know that there are always things that can apply now. We know that the employee can be reassigned under two or three programs. All these things will be discussed in the legislative committee and I would really like to see the Bloc Quebecois member on it if he can come and serve there.

As for scabs, I tabled a motion concerning strike-breakers. I am not too familiar with the Nationair situation because Nationair does not serve Abitibi. But I did table a motion on strike-breakers and I am eager to win the draw to be able to discuss the issue more thoroughly. We still remember that the member who started the debate on strike-breakers is a Conservative who has been here for years. He did not present the bill a second time and I presented it on behalf of the Canada Post workers because I am against strike-breakers during strikes.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to be involved in this debate today on Bill C-101.

I would like to make some general comments and then get involved in some specifics. After that I will talk in general terms about some of the problems I see with the bill.

The government and particularly the Minister of Labour have placed us in a difficult position. The minister has introduced a bill which is not unusual to this place and most parts of the bill are good amendments to a particular piece of legislation that we in this House would like to see implemented. He has also put amendments in the bill which are hard for some of us to live with and I will deal with that.

I would like to talk specifically about the good parts of the bill: industrial relations; occupational safety and health and standards of hours, wages, vacations and holidays. I will save the labour relations portion of it for later.

Under the first two parts the government has implemented good pieces of legislation and good amendments to the Canada Labour Code. It is obvious to all who have been listening in this House for the last hour the majority of those amendments being put forward was done so with the consultation and agreement of all parties who were involved in this piece of legislation.

The hours of work part permits the averaging of hours of work over a period of two or more weeks where the nature of the work requires irregular distribution of work hours. Consultation took place relating to that amendment and all parties agree that is a good thing.

The substitution of holidays permits the substitution of any other holiday for a general holiday in certain circumstances. That is with written agreement of the employer and the trade union and consultation took place in that regard.

Maternity related reassignment and leave is a project that my colleague from Abitibi has been putting forward in this House for many years, as long as I have been here. It is one I have spoken on during his private member's motion in the not-too-distant past.

It is a good amendment because it protects pregnant women in the work force who are looking for maternity related reassignment because of the necessity of caring for their children and when they are in the process of having children. That amendment has been highly touted. It has been consulted thoroughly throughout the labour movement and agreed to by this House.

There is the issue of work related illness and injury. This is very interesting and should be looked at very carefully in committee. Work related illness and injury has always been a bone of contention and I will use the railway industry as an example. It is one that I know very well.

It is a known fact in the railway industry that when there are work related injuries and illnesses employees are subjected to discipline. It is very easy in the railway industry to suggest that an employee maintained an unsafe work practice which caused the illness or work related injury. An individual is given demerit marks in that situation and if enough are accumulated that individual is dismissed.

Under the proposed amendment the regulations of the work related illness and injury proposal are the keys. What are the regulations the Minister of Labour is suggesting? They are important. The possibility of reassignment for the employees and how that will be done in certain industries like the railway will have to be looked at very carefully.

We on this side of the House are very concerned that the Minister of Labour has come forward with an amendment to the Canada Labour Code without the consultation of the organized labour unions and groups in this country. We on this side of the House feel it is very difficult for us to support this bill without some very significant amendments. We feel very let down by the Minister of Labour because he has not given the consultation process an opportunity to work before slipping in the amendment he has referred to as a proposal for a directed vote on the employer's last offer.

• (1650)

Let me talk somewhat specifically about the employer's last offer and this amendment as it relates to the collective bargaining process. The collective bargaining process is a very precise science and there are times when it will break down.

I can understand the minister's frustration when we look at the situation that took place in Yellowknife in the mining industry when the minister allowed that particular volatile situation to fester for months and months. Of course we all know about the deaths of the miners in the shaft that particular day because of the lack of scab legislation and the replacement workers who were allowed to work in that particular mine.

The excess infringement on the collective bargaining process is really what we are talking about here. We are also talking about what is best for the public interest as it relates to strikes or lockouts in areas of federal jurisdiction. I have difficulty understanding why the minister is suggesting that he does not have the tools, the ability under the present system to allow the present collective bargaining process to go through its normal course. If the mediation, the conciliation breaks down and in the event of a strike he still has the ability under the current system to bring back to work legislation into this House, as we have seen on numerous occasions.

That is the ultimate test of the public interest and the necessity for the good of all Canadians. We are really talking about the collective will of the people of this House making a decision that a strike or lockout is not for the good of all Canadians and therefore a decision has to be made.

As has been alluded to in this House, there are jurisdictions that have a directed vote on the employer's last offer and there are some different scenarios. Let me just relate to two that I think are good examples of how we may be able to make amendments to this particular issue of a directed vote on the employer's last offer that the minister has thrown on the table for us today.

In Ontario if there is a strike the minister can intervene by requesting that there be a last offer vote taken by the employees. The intention of that particular piece of legislation in the jurisdiction of Ontario is not to intervene in an offer made by the employer before the continual process is done. It allows the public interest to come forward after there is a prolonged strike, a complete breakdown in negotiations and the public at large is unduly affected by it. There has to be a necessity for the government to react.

The Saskatchewan Trade Union Act and the Labour Relations Board allow for a vote on the employer's final offer after a strike has gone on for 30 days. That is not what we are talking about here. We are talking about the minister having the ability to circumvent the collective agreement during any open period of the collective bargaining process. The employer can say to him: "This is my final offer. We are not going to negotiate any more. We request that you put this to the employees to see what they will say about it". That is a very scary precedent for the government to want to set.

It will set back the labour relations process in this country 20 years if the minister has the kind of powers to infringe in the collective agreement process that has worked very effectively in the past. There is no reason why the minister now should have any more powers than he already has under the particular piece of legislation which deals with industrial relations.

This is a very fragile science, as I said before, if you tip the pendulum one side or the other. It can be argued in the province of Ontario that the provincial NDP has tipped the pendulum too far on one side for the employees which is a bad thing. Then you can take a look at the labour relations situation in a province such as Alberta where the pendulum is too far for the employer's benefit which again is not a good process.

The object of a good labour relations policy in this country is to make sure that there is fairness within the system for both sides. I do not suggest that this minister would use this kind of power, but there may be ministers who will come along and use this kind of power to the detriment of the whole process. I would think before this party could support this kind of legislation that this amendment would have to be looked at very strongly.

In conclusion, I would suggest to the Minister of Labour that before he would get support from all members of the House he would have to give us a good explanation as to why he would want this amendment passed.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the debate on this bill. As members and the public I presume have already gathered, what the bill does is make amendments to the Canada Labour Code and to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

There are many provisions to commend this bill with respect to the amendments to the Canada Labour Code. Regrettably the government has chosen to do what seems to be a growing pattern in legislation which is to take some very admirable provisions that have been worked on long and hard and discussed with all interested parties—the stakeholders in the government's jargon—and bring those forward. Then at the last minute without warning, without discussion with anybody, it throws in something which it knows is unacceptable and in essence hopes those affected by the legislation will swallow the poison with the sugar.

I do not think we are quite prepared to do that. It is regrettable because this bill, between the two acts it amends, affects one million workers in Canada. That is a sizeable proportion of our work force and deserves major attention from members of Parliament.

Up until the point where the government decided to add its bit of arsenic to the bill we had an approach that was a model of the collaborative co-operative approach that the Minister of Labour has been promoting, at least in the private sector. It was an example of the kind of approach that should mark management-labour relations in Canada.

There had been extensive consultation with organized labour, with employers, over the last two years and there had been full consensus around the kinds of amendments that were needed, particularly with respect to minimum conditions of work.

This hopefully is the kind of management-labour relations we are trying to foster in Canada so that we are able to be competitive, to have a functioning healthy management labour climate, so that Canada is going to be able to deliver on its commitments, whether they are government commitments or commitments to the private sector.

I want to particularly congratulate all those involved in the discussions that lead to those portions of the bill on achieving a model of how management labour relations hopefully will function in the future.

[Translation]

I want to congratulate the minister and the others for the proposed amendments which will give greater flexibility to the provisions concerning parental leave thus helping parents to strike a balance between work and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The minister of Labour, on a point of order.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I believe my hon. colleague for Ottawa West—

[English]

—is the last member to make a speech on this bill. I wonder if I could ask the House for unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Ottawa West, and I know we all want to listen to her speech, finish her speech. I am sure we would all appreciate it if she could complete it today and perhaps afterward we could proceed to a vote. I think particularly of the 6,400 women who could benefit from this bill this year if we had it as soon as possible. However, I leave it in the hands of the members of the House.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, how hypocritical. This is the same minister who just minutes ago stood up in this House and brought in time allocation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do believe that there is no unanimous consent.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations among the parties and independent members and I believe you will find that there is agreement to adopt at this point in our proceedings my private member's Bill C-371, an act respecting a national child day, at all stages, including committee of the whole, without debate.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this so I cannot give consent, but I am ready to check. However, at this time I cannot give consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did approach me to find out whether he could take time from my private members' hour to do this because there was agreement from all three House leaders. Therefore, I am wondering if the government side would reconsider and live up to its commitment of offering unanimous consent.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the question was asked, unanimous consent was not given. However, if the same hon. member wants to ask for unanimous consent again later, the Chair will entertain his request.

POSTAL RATE SUBSIDY

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON DIRECT MAIL ADVERTISING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of removing the postal rate subsidy for all firms using direct mail advertising and not using recycled paper.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in keeping with Canadian interests of implementing and putting into practice programs of sustainable development, I move:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of removing the postal rate subsidy for all firms using direct mail advertising and not using recycled paper.

This motion is a result of the complaints I have received from many of my constituents about the huge volume of junk mail placed in their mailboxes. The rules of the House of Commons prohibit me from using props although I hardly need to illustrate the huge volume of paper advertising left on the front doorsteps or shoved into mailboxes every week: flyers, coupons, contests. According to Ed McMahon, he can comfortably retire on the millions he has supposedly won from publishing houses.

I received another bundle of junk mail from a constituent, Alan Upton. With this package of junk mail he attaches a letter which says: "Dear Sir, the attached flyers represent 10 days of delivery, month in and month out, year in and year out, to nearly every household in this country. The decimation of trees and landfill required to hide it is monumental and criminal. When in the name of reason will something be done? Or is it beyond the powers of the House? That which is so obvious and so curable continues unabated. Signed, Alan Upton". As he said, this is delivered to every household in Canada.

The challenge is a very serious matter and must be addressed by all departments of government but especially Canada Post. Canadians are alarmed by the depletion of our growth forests and for what? We are cutting down valuable resources needlessly. Should we not be using recycled paper instead?

I am not saying that print advertising should be abolished. When you take into account the flyers carried in daily and weekly newspapers, I am aware that close to 200,000 Canadian jobs rely on printed advertising. It is an integral part of the free market process.

What I am saying is that we need to reconsider our priorities. In just a few short years there has been a tremendous effort to verse Canadian consumers in the three Rs of sustainable development, reducing, reusing, recycling. We should add another R and that is the R of rethink.

One of my constituents, an environmentally concerned citizen named David Alexander, suggested to me that in consideration of this motion we need to rethink our approach to advertising, rethink our approach to distribution. We need new, creative ideas.

How about giving a break to advertisers using recycled paper? A cheaper rate should be available from Canada Post for companies using recycled paper in their advertising materials. My constituents of Parkdale—High Park suggest that we take this idea one step further and provide a lower postal rate to companies using 100 per cent recycled paper products in their advertising, a higher postal rate for companies using less than 100 per cent, with the highest rate being charged for products using no recycled paper content, technically known as post consumer fibres.

Currently Canada's booming paper recycling industry must now import used paper from the United States just to keep up with the demand for finished recycled paper products. There is no shortage of public support for this kind of activity.

In all fairness I must mention that Canada Post is often singled out as the sole distributor of junk mail. This is not a fact. According to Canada Post, the corporation only delivers 25 per cent of all unaddressed print advertising. The remaining 75 per cent must find its way to our doorstep through private distributors. It may seem unfair to Canada Post but an example must be set by one of the largest single distributors in Canada.

This motion represents an excellent opportunity for Canada Post to become a corporate leader, a good corporate citizen, in the field of sustainable development.

Some people say Canada Post should be told not to deliver any junk mail. In response, many environmental groups have launched anti-junk mail campaigns. These groups encourage households to refuse junk mail by placing stickers directly across their mail boxes. This is a practical solution because what is junk mail to one householder is precious information to a neighbouring household.

Unfortunately Canada Post will continue to deliver junk mail regardless of any stickers. The corporation maintains that its role is only to deliver the mail and not to scrutinize its contents.

My rebuttal to Canada Post is that I have made the choice whether I want junk mail or not and if I put that sticker on my mailbox I have made the choice. I do not want the third class or the junk mail. The postperson does not have to worry about making that decision. These facts only reinforce the need for this motion.

• (1710)

I must congratulate the corporation, however, for taking the initiative of establishing the multi-stakeholder print advertising committee in June 1992. This committee consists of industry representatives, corporation officials and municipal authorities. According to my research, consumer representation appears to be missing. The mandate of this committee is to examine the environmental impact of waste related to junk mail. This is a worthy effort but it is time for action.

With this motion let us send a clear message to all Canadians that it is the will of this House to take steps toward preserving our environment.

Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent of the House to declare this motion a votable motion. I have given notice to the three House leaders that I intend to do this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park for giving me this opportunity to confirm the government's commitment to public support for the distribution of Canadian publications.

As for the hon. member's motion concerning the advisability of removing the postal rate subsidy for all firms using direct mail advertising and not using recycled paper, however, the answer is quite simple: postal rate subsidies do not apply to direct mail advertising.

Perhaps I may explain the purpose of the postal subsidy program which was created over 100 years ago. Its latest official title is the Publications Distribution Assistance Program. The program is used to subsidize postal rates for newspapers, magazines and books.

Under an agreement, the Department of Communications pays subsidies to the Canada Post Corporation so it can offer rates below the commercial rates to certain Canadian publications.

In other words, the losses involved in offering preferential postal rates to Canadian publications are compensated by the government.

These subsidies go back to the beginning of our postal services, when the government introduced preferential rates for newspapers and, a little later, for magazines. At the time, these publications were among the few means of communication and education, and the government wanted printed matter to be affordable for all Canadians. In fact, preferential rates existed before Confederation. Over the years, classes and rates have become increasingly complex.

As part of an extensive series of cutbacks initiated in December 1989 to reduce the deficit, the government decided to gradually phase out the postal subsidy program of $220 million annually and replace it with a $110 million direct assistance program.

On June 27, 1990, the then Minister of Communications announced the government's decision to phase out the Publications Distribution Assistance Program by the end of March, 1994. After that date, the postal rates for these publications will be the same as current commercial rates. However, new programs administered by the Department of Communications will replace the preferential rates.

The decision made at the time was twofold: first, to concentrate on supporting the most vulnerable sectors of the publishing industry, in other words, subscription-funded magazines, small community weeklies and the book sector; and second, to eliminate the support enjoyed by foreign-owned publications, dailies and small circulation publications.

When the announcement was made in 1993 the minister described two major implications of the new program. First of all, there would no longer be any distinction between paid magazines on the basis of content. Furthermore, publishers would no longer be obliged to use the services of Canada Post since they would now be able to use the distribution system of their choice. We are now engaged in consultations with the industry to establish the exact structure and eligibility criteria for the new programs.

Culturally speaking, the Canadian magazine industry is in good health. However, it still needs government policies that provide financial support. Because of the favourable climate created during the past 15 years, the Canadian publishing industry has been able to conquer an increasing share of our market. Today, that share is 40 per cent.

The postal subsidy program benefits this country's publishing companies, advertisers, retailers and last, but not least, readers. That is why it cannot be changed without giving due consideration to our cultural, industrial and social objectives. What are those objectives? To ensure that magazines, small community weeklies and books remain accessible to all Canadians and to maintain conditions that promote the development of Canada's publishing industry. The new programs will target companies that are owned and controlled by Canadians and which publish books, subscription magazines or small community weeklies.

Thanks to these programs, Canadian publishers will enjoy the support they need to survive and prosper during the 90s.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate this afternoon. I support this motion.

Last year 3.743 billion pieces of junk mail were mailed through Canada's post offices. That represents over 140 pieces for every woman, man and child and infant in the country.

Junk mail is trashing our forests. These unsolicited bulk mailings are a tragic and inexcusable waste of one of our most valuable resources. To make matters worse, Canada Post is engaging in an aggressive campaign to encourage businesses to pump out more and more junk mail and it is doing it with the blessing of the federal government.

My colleague, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, wrote to the minister responsible for Canada Post in June 1990, urging him to have the government introduce legislation to offer preferred rates only to advertisers using 100 per cent recycled materials.

There is no reason why the government cannot insist that preferred rates are given only to those using recycled materials. It is simply a question of political will.

Just to give an idea, unlike what the government member previously said, there is a subsidy for junk mail. We all know that it costs us 43 cents to mail a first class letter to any home in Canada. Canada Post ad mail rates allow businesses to mail a flyer to every doorstep in the same community for a mere 8.3 cents per flyer. If that is not a subsidy, I do not know what is. That is an 80 per cent reduction in costs. That is some subsidy.

This issue goes to the very heart of the role that Canada Post plays in our society. The Conservative government maintains that Canada Post should act as a private business and profit should be the bottom line. The New Democrats say that Canada Post should provide the best service it can to Canadians with a view to self-sufficiency and not to making a profit.

To give an example, I recently learned that any mail posted in Victoria on Friday or Saturday is not processed in our community. Oh, no. It is sent over to Vancouver for processing and then sent back to Victoria. We cannot even have next day delivery in our own community. This is a downsizing in service and a downsizing in jobs to the detriment of service in our community.

This is an issue that I, like the member who put forward this motion, get complaints about from angry constituents. It is particularly so in British Columbia where it is our forests that are being chopped down to provide this junk that arrives in our post office boxes.

There are alternatives. Sixty per cent of the revenue of Canada Post flows from this junk mail. This government could have a vision such as the one put forward by my colleague, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake when in April 1990 he put forward a 55-page vision of Canada Post's new role in Canadian society for generating more revenue. That means more service to Canadians and not less service, which is the way this government is acting.

• (1720)

He put forward some suggestions. To ensure that the corporation moves ahead with the development of more service to Canadians we recommend that additional new direction outlets be provided, new retail products be sold at the wickets throughout consumer's post and financial services offered at all counters, especially in rural and remote areas.

Those of us who represent rural areas of Canada are reminded frequently by constituents in those areas about the downgrading in service in Canada Post and how they feel like second class citizens because of the poor service Canada Post provides.

Offering packaging and wrapping services at postal stations and post offices is another service that could be provided by Canada Post. It could introduce electronic mail services, expand the contracted in-parcel distribution system and extend the hours of federal post offices.

The motion before us is an important motion. We support it as a means of encouraging Canada Post to take one little baby step to stop pillaging our forests to provide junk in our mail boxes. If that is not a wacko idea, I do not know what is.

It is only the beginning. I invite all the people who are watching today and listening to this to write to the New Democrats to find out about their vision of how Canada Post could not only improve service to Canadian consumers but also increase the revenues to Canada Post so that it could be self-sufficient and really serve the needs of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

It has been established with the associate House leader, the House leader for the Official Opposition, the House leader for the NDP and all the Independents in this House, after consultation on all sides of the House, there is agreement to adopt at this point in our proceedings my private members' bill, Bill C-371, an act respecting a national child day, at all stages, including Committee of the Whole, without debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to consider the request made by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre?

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, this is a very awkward moment for me.

I have been working with the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, as has my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, on this in good faith for a long time. No one has displayed more good faith than the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. He has a sincere desire to see this motion passed and so does every member of this House, I think.

The difficulty I have is this. I am given to understand that there has not been a formal consultation on this particular matter. I thought there had been until just a few minutes ago. I have to say to my friend and to the House that until that consultation takes place I cannot give the consent that he is seeking.

It is a bitter disappointment to my friend. I can assure him that I will do everything I can to make sure that this gets revived at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I spoke with both the government Whip as well as the associate House leader and both gave me their assurances—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think that all the Chair needs to know is whether there is unanimous consent. I see that there is no unanimous consent.

As for what else was said, asking for better co-operation and so on, I ask hon. members to consult one another and when they have come to some conclusion to notify the Chair and the hon. member can again present his request to the House.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I therefore suspend the sitting until six o'clock, the time for the adjournment motion.

At 5.25 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to a question I asked of the minister of fisheries exactly three months ago today.

That question related to scientific advice which was released by his DFO scientists concerning the crisis in the Atlantic groundfish stocks. That advice recommended deep cuts in the order of 70 per cent and in some cases as high as 82 per cent in the cod quotas in the zones in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the eastern part of the Scotia shelf off of the coast of Cape Breton, those zones which surround my constituency of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

The advice by the scientists in November followed similar recommendations which were released earlier in 1992 and which led the minister of fisheries at that time to impose a moratorium on the northern cod fishery off the northeastern coast of Newfoundland, accompanied by a generous program of compensation for the 20,000 fishermen and fish plant workers that were affected in those communities.

The November advice led the minister of fisheries a short time later to impose dramatic quota cuts in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the eastern part of the Scotia shelf to the tune of about 70 per cent which will throw a large number, hundreds, of eastern Nova Scotians out of work and will threaten the future of several fishing communities in my riding.

On November 23 I asked the minister to provide details of a compensation plan that he would put in place to assist the people and the communities affected by these quota reductions. The minister at that time did not have a compensation plan in place and he still does not have one today.

What he did on December 18 when he announced the 1993 management plan was to tell those people affected that they would have to be satisfied with the existing programs, mainly unemployment insurance, until such time as the seriousness of the crisis would be better known.

The existing programs were not adequate to deal with the cod moratorium and the crisis in the northern cod fishery in Newfoundland and they are not adequate to deal with the crisis in the gulf and the eastern part of Nova Scotia. They are not adequate to deal with the fisherman from Chéticamp who is facing the loss of his livelihood and who at 50 years of age has invested his entire life savings in his boat and in his fish quota which is now worthless.

They are not adequate to deal with the fisherman from Ballantynes Cove in Antigonish County who is a bona fide fisherman who followed that policy in good faith and is now facing the disappearance of his policy and facing the loss of his licence and again the loss of his livelihood.

They are not adequate to deal with the fish plant worker and the companies which employ people on draggers who are now obliged to guess at harvesting plans that the minister told companies and fishermen they had to put into place but which they have not received any guidelines about.

The compensation plan is not adequate to deal with those fish plant workers who are reaching 50 years of age and who are facing premature retirement because of the dissipation of the fish stocks as a result of this government's mismanagement of that resource.

What is needed is a comprehensive fish compensation and adjustment package that will combine a number of elements: income replacement for the fishermen and fish plant workers who are facing a loss of income. There are many more elements which if I had more time I would deal with.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a number of questions have been asked by the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. Let me reiterate what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stated when responding to the hon. member on this very question previously.

The federal government has been responsive in the past and continues to be responsive to the urgent needs of Atlantic Canada. Together with the province of Nova Scotia, the federal government has funded an early retirement program for older plant workers who have been permanently laid off due to plant closure.

The plant workers adjustment program provides income assistance to workers who traditionally have more difficulty finding work, that is those who are between 50 and 64. Similar programs exist with the governments of Newfoundland and Labrador and New Brunswick.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has made funds available on an emergency basis to workers who are unable to secure sufficient weeks of employment to qualify for UI benefits. Clearly, however, long-term solutions are required to achieve a better balance between the resource base and those in the harvesting sector who are dependent on it for their livelihood.

To achieve this balance, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has announced that beginning in 1994 only professional fishermen with a genuine attachment to the fishery will be eligible for licences. For this year, groundfish licences that were inactive in 1991 and 1992 will be frozen but may be reissued in future years pending consultation on new licensing criteria. These licensing measures are designed to ensure that professional fishermen who earn their primary income from the fishery are not denied a livelihood.

This spring departmental officials will consult with the provinces and territorial governments, fisheries organizations and the fishing industry to define the criteria for professional status upon which licensing rules will be based beginning in 1994.

For those who leave the fishery there are government programs available through CEIC to assist in the transition to other employment. The Atlantic groundfish industry must be rebuilt. This government is ensuring that this is done in such a way that the needs of those affected are looked after.

REFUGEES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, you have probably received an awful lot of calls and an awful lot of letters concerning Bill C-105, the former unemployment insurance bill that was debated in this House recently. I am sure you received a lot of those and I did as well.

I received far more calls and far more letters concerning a Somalian refugee claimant who is currently living in Toronto, one Kadinga Guran, the wife of General Mohammed Farrah Aidid.

According to a number of television reports the general is one of the most powerful and one of the most ruthless warlords living in Somalia right now. According to these reports he is, in fact, one of the primary people responsible for the horrible situation which we find in Somalia today. What we hear from these reports is that the general, this warlord, has two wives. One of them is the refugee claimant in Canada who is living in Toronto. Another wife is living in California in the United States.

The Toronto family is made up of the wife and four of the general's children. The California family is made up of another wife and another four of the general's children, one of whom apparently is serving in the United States Marine Corps at the present time in Somalia as an interpreter.

Again, according to one of these television reports that I happened to see called Current Affairs, the general, the warlord, is a United States taxpayer and he purchased a house in California as far back as 1983. On the other hand, the warlord's wife who is in Toronto is a refugee claimant who, along with her four children, is living in a three bedroom subsidized apartment receiving welfare in the amount of some $1,700 a month from Canadian taxpayers. Again according to these reports the Canadian refugee claimant in Toronto who is apparently here because she fears for her life if she ever returned to Somalia did in fact return to Somalia and visited her husband, the warlord, for about a four-month period, all the while collecting and continuing to collect welfare in Canada. While in Somalia this Canadian refugee claimant was recorded by reporters there making speeches and campaigning to keep the United Nations out of Somalia.

Is it any wonder at all that my constituents and I in fact ask the minister why in the name of heaven our tax dollars are being spent this way. Is this perhaps another Al-Mashat case? Why is it that somebody like this cannot be sent back, deported immediately without any further delay?

Can the minister really guarantee all Canadians, as he tried to when I asked this question in the House, absolutely and unequivocally that the new law, Bill C-86, is going to prevent this sort of thing from ever happening again? Let us hear from the minister tonight. All Canadians are interested in hearing the answers.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member as a former cabinet minister should be aware and I am sure is aware that privacy legislation prevents the government from commenting on a specific case in a public forum. He knows that. He is making cheap political hay with something he is much better equipped than to do.

The member is also aware if there are allegations made against persons in Canada regarding their immigration status, these are investigated by immigration officials.

With regard to the allegations concerning welfare fraud, I can only say to my hon. friend that it falls under the jurisdiction of municipal and provincial authorities.

TAXATION

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to follow up on the question I asked on February 10 which relate to grants in lieu of taxes.

The freeze announced on December 2, 1992 in the economic statement was done without prior consultation with Canadian municipalities. Most municipalities had already established their 1993 budgets. The freeze will mean to these municipalities $80 million in lost tax revenues for municipal coffers. Obviously that means municipal taxpayers will be on the hook for those lost revenues.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities recognizes that something needs to be done in order to address the rapid increase in grants in lieu of taxes. Of course the argument is that since 1987 the cost of the grants in lieu of taxes to the federal government have gone from $215 million to $438 million in 1992.

Any changes in how grants in lieu of taxes are calculated must be done in consultation with the municipalities. In the meantime I would like to see the government remove the freeze and lift the unnecessary burden on Canadian municipalities until the whole issue of the restructuring of the formula and the problems that this formula is creating as far as the federal government is concerned are addressed.

In the House the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization suggested that was not what the municipalities wanted. Of course he was misinformed. I would like to clear the record by reading the press release by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities:

> The Federation of Canadian Municipalities will continue to press the federal government to lift the freeze on its share of municipal taxes applicable to federal property.

The federal government has a legal and moral obligation to pay its fair share of taxes. The federal government has broken a 40-year tradition by arbitrarily imposing a freeze on grants in lieu of taxes. In the past the federal government resolved its difference with Canadian municipalities through consultation and negotiation. Further I would like to ask the government why it has not introduced legislation to amend the Municipal Grants Act when the department's own legal advice is that amendments will have to be made in order for the freeze to come into effect.

The government finds itself in a very interesting situation. On the one hand it is suggesting that there is a freeze to municipalities and that it will not be paying above and beyond what it thinks is necessary in its mind as the federal government which is a cost of $80 million to the municipality. On the other hand it has a legal obligation to change the Municipal Grants Act in order for the whole process to take place.

In order for us to get back to reality in this place, I would ask the government to consider lifting the freeze on grants in lieu of taxes as a sign of good faith and get on with working with Canadian municipalities.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for more than 40 years the federal government has voluntarily paid out grants in lieu of taxes on a wide range of federal lands and buildings. However, in recent years the cost of these grants has been escalating at a rate that is simply incompatible with our commitment to normal fiscal management such as seen in most Canadian households.

In the past seven years over-all government spending grew by 32 per cent. By contrast the cost of the municipal grants program increased by a whopping 78 per cent. This sort of continuous upward escalation is clearly not sustainable in the current environment when we are working very hard to contain government expenditures all across the board.

It was for this reason the Minister of Finance felt compelled to announce in his December economic statement that total grants for the coming year would be maintained at the current level of $424 million.

The Minister of Public Works who is responsible for administering the grants program is meeting with municipal leaders with a view to restructuring the program so as to make its application more equitable across Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I asked the Prime Minister about the economic policy of his government and pointed out that after almost nine years of Progressive Conservative government Canada has over 1.6 million unemployed, over one million children living in poverty, and over 2.6 million people trying to exist on social assistance.

In addition consumer and business bankruptcies are at record high levels and continue to grow, and the farming community is in the worst crisis in living memory.

My point was and remains that something is wrong when 16 per cent of Canadians are unable because of government policies to play a role in the economy and earn a dignified living.

We hear about a jobless recovery. What does that mean to those 4.2 million Canadians who have no job and have at the present time no hope of any job? What does it say about a government which can talk in terms of a jobless recovery without any pangs of guilt or unsettlement?

All these numbers are worse than those of other developed countries. Perhaps the only country we compare favourably with is the United States and then certainly not on unemployment figures. If we look at countries in Europe, particularly those with social democratic traditions, Sweden, Austria and Norway, for example, they have all done much better than Canada. They have much lower poverty rates, sometimes only 20 per cent of Canada's rates. They have much better rates with regard to inflation and interest. Their currencies are strong. They are experiencing problems but all those countries have records which are infinitely better than Canada's.

The Prime Minister in response to the question said the government would stay the course and we restated the government's old, worn-out nonsense. The government inherited a debt of $160 billion from the Liberals, generated mostly in good times, and almost tripled it. Of course the Liberals did not learn a lesson in Ontario where the last four years of the Ontario Liberal government were the best four years in Ontario's economic history and yet a huge deficit was built there too.

• (1820)

The Conservative government took a debt and almost tripled it. It inherited an unfair tax system from the Liberals who had already begun the shift in tax from rich to middle and low income Canadians, from income taxes to consumption taxes and from corporations to individuals. The Conservatives made it more unfair, adding about $4,000 in taxes to family tax burdens in Canada.

Adjusted federal-provincial funding arrangements to ensure that massive cuts to health and education were imposed upon the citizens of our province again was a strategy begun by the Liberal governments in the 1970s and 1980s.

We have increased deficits, increased taxes, reduced services, increased consumer and business bankruptcies and increased problems in the farm community. Yet the Prime Minister says, stay the course.

We know these are not easy issues with easy solutions. However this government wants to continue with a process which has given us such disastrous results. At least this government does have a plan, unlike the Liberals who have no plan at all. We may not agree with the government's plan but at least it speaks out with some plan.

New Democrats have a plan which puts people first. That is all that I ask, that we have an economic system and a government which when making economic decisions puts people first instead of putting people last.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is important to recognize that the government has set out a concrete vision and plan of action to promote economic growth and bring public finances under strong control.

We are continuing to follow that plan. Both the International Monetary Fund and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development strongly support the structural framework our government has put in place. In its most recent forecast, the OECD predicted that Canada will lead the G-7 nations in growth in both 1993 and 1994.

Canada has only recently emerged from a prolonged world-wide recession which shook, and in many instances continues to shake, the economies of the world's leading industrial nations. The recession was heightened by industrial restructuring, trade liberalization and accelerating technological changes which are changing forever the methods by which economic success can be achieved. Canada is not immune to these changes.

To meet the challenges of globalization, it is imperative that we raise our level of economic productivity. To do so, we must continue to invest in modern capital, new technologies and worker skills. It means continuing to implement policies which help to create a stable macroeconomic environment which is conducive to productivity enhancing investment.

For example, the low inflation rate we currently enjoy is a product, among other things, of a disciplined monetary policy and fiscal restraint. It has resulted in lower interest rates and is expanding opportunities for people to work, invest and innovate. We must also continue our efforts to bring our national finances under strong control.

Canada's experience has clearly demonstrated that higher spending and greater deficits will not create lasting jobs. They lead only to higher interest rates in the short term and higher taxes down the road. We remain committed to reversing the debt legacy left to us by the previous government.

Accordingly we will continue to invest in fiscally prudent policies. Both the February 1992 budget and the recent economic statement reflected our commitment to contain pressures on the deficit through spending restraint and spending reallocation.

Only by tightly controlling government expenditures can we expect to establish an economic climate that supports and rewards productive investment. However I want to assure this House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to question the government concerning a query I raised in the House of Commons some time ago on the Gemini workers in Winnipeg.

It is my contention that the government really has no sound approach to transportation. It has no logical, well laid out transportation policy. We all know that the airlines are in crisis and our rail industry is having serious difficulties as well.

My question was about those 800 Air Canada Gemini workers mostly in Winnipeg whose high-tech well-paying jobs were being threatened by the proposed merger at the time. This has not really been resolved and these people continue to wonder what is going to happen to them.

We need to realize as parliamentarians that one of our main jobs is not only to scrutinize the expenditures that are undertaken by government, but also to try to ensure that those who are working can remain at work. If they cannot remain at work, at what they were trained for, they should be able to go elsewhere and practice the trade or occupy the role or have the programs that are needed so that they can fit into Canadian society.

To me on that particular day, the minister's response showed a lack of understanding of my question. I asked what is going to happen to those Air Canada workers, to the Gemini workers, to Canadian workers? What kind of plan has the government got to make sure that they resolve this to the mutual benefit of everybody?

It also raises other equally important questions. What is it that a government might do in order to protect—and I do not say that in a pejorative or negative kind of way—workers, men and women with families who want to ensure that they keep their job? If they cannot, can they go elsewhere and do it? If they have the skills and training to undertake something else will it give them the remuneration they require in order to support their families and themselves?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that essentially is the most important principle for me: what will happen to those workers? Is the government doing something? If the government has not yet managed to find a solution, does it intend to find one soon?

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite dreams of saving the airline industry in one fell swoop. I wish it was that easy. All we have to do is tell the air carriers how to run their businesses or have further government interference in business.

The hon. member opposite is saying that any business should it get into trouble should not have to worry. It can count on the government stepping in and fixing everything.

Members opposite do not like to hear it but statistics are there to prove it. Deregulation in the transportation industry is working well in Canada. Deregulation brought about new and better service for consumers and Canadian communities alike.

The airline industry has been hit hard by the gulf war resulting in higher prices and an international recession. People stopped flying to the extent they had prior to the recession.

The airline industry throughout the world, not just in Canada, is facing a crisis now. We on this side of the House are working with individual carriers, companies on their individual cases.

The hon. member is fully aware of the number of programs that governments have established over the years in dealing with assistance to companies and also in dealing with individuals should they run into difficulties with their employment.

It is clear that the Department of Transport and the Government of Canada have a policy on transportation that is working well in this country. We are having some difficulty with the recession. These problems too will pass.

I would like to say in closing this means what the minister has been saying all along. We have to look at the issues facing the industry together and we have to work with the industry to help solve the problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.28 p.m.

TRIBUTE TO RIGHT HON. BRIAN MULRONEY, PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today with some emotion. I really wonder what snowstorms can do to our prime Ministers.

[English]

When there is a snowstorm, something happens to the Prime Minister of our country. This is the second time I have seen that.

• (1405)

I have known the Prime Minister for a long time. We have known each other since the early 1980s. Now that he has announced he is quitting it is not without emotion that I want to salute him.

Of course he has done great things for his party. The fact that he has won two majorities in a row deserves a lot of credit because it is extremely hard to achieve. It is something that I hope to achieve some day.

The tenure of the Prime Minister has been remarkable in many ways. He has brought to this country a lot of changes. History is always the best judge of these developments. We did not always agree with them. I have to say that the Prime Minister was truthful to his political doctrine and he tried to implement these approaches as much as possible in this moderate country of ours.

I have had some experience with coming to the House of Commons, quitting and then coming back, so I have to be a bit prudent today. However, when I quit I remember that the Prime Minister in 1986 said he had a lot of scars to prove he was a fighter. I have a lot of scars also to prove that he is quite a fighter.

The nature of politics leads to disagree very often but now we have agreed. We agreed especially about Canada in the 1980 referendum, the patriation of the Constitution in 1982 and we agreed last fall on the Charlottetown accord. Now that he is leaving we have to pay respect to him for the hard work and the dedication that he has shown because it is not easy to be a Prime Minister these days. It is not easy for the person involved as well as for the family.

I see Mrs. Mulroney and the children in the gallery today. It is a difficult situation today where they face not only us but the hard scrutiny of others. I want to say to the Prime Minister and his family that they have acted with great grace and class.

I would like on behalf of my party to wish the Prime Minister and his family a very good life together. It is a great family. They share great family values and they will be happy to see the Prime Minister have more time with them and peace of mind too.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I would particularly like to say to the people in the region of Baie-Comeau, his home town, who supported him that I want to congratulate them on placing their confidence in a son of their town who became the leader of his party and managed to achieve something which is very difficult in Canada: to win two elections with two consecutive majorities.

We did not always agree, as I just said, but what is important and what we find on days like today is that despite our political differences, everyone who sits in this House wants only one thing: to try to improve the lives of their fellow citizens. When someone who has led his party for 10 years and has been Prime Minister for eight and a half decides to bow out, we must thank him for what he has done for his party, his constituency and his country.

So on behalf of the Liberals, I would like to offer the Prime Minister and his family our best wishes. May you have very good years together.

• (1410)

I also hope that following the election which will be held in the coming months, Mrs. Mulroney will tell the Prime Minister not to do what I did and come back. Although the Prime Minister and I have dreamed for years of the big battle, it will always remain a matter of speculation. We will not have an opportunity to fight it, but in spite of that I would like to offer him our tribute and our best wishes for good health so he and his family can have very many years of happiness together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure today that we put aside our political differences. I have an opportunity on behalf of myself and my party to wish the Prime Minister well in his future endeavours.

Some hon. members: hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: Although we only rarely agreed, I wish to point out the years he devoted to public life. These years were not easy and the challenges were numerous, I am sure, but he often met them with courage and humour.

The House of Commons will no longer be the same. The contribution that the Prime Minister can still make in other fields will be appreciated.

[English]

I think all of us in public life realize that there is a great sacrifice. It is not to serve the public, which I know the Prime Minister has done with great pride and with great dignity, but certainly one's personal life must surely be affected by this.

I would like to wish Mrs. Mulroney and the family all the very best for the future, as well as the Prime Minister. I know that for the Prime Minister politics has been very much a family affair and it has brought great dignity to the Canadian people as well.

In thinking about my remarks today I thought that Prime Ministers are often remembered for grand gestures. Often the small kindnesses are not noted. I would like to mention something specifically about the kindness of this Prime Minister during the illness of our colleague Pauline Jewett when Mr. Mulroney took the time out to call her.

I know how much that meant to her. I know that it is not just for our colleague Ms. Jewett that the Prime Minister has done this. Those small kindnesses were taken by the Prime Minister. Sometimes it is not recognized by the public that politicians are even human beings.

On a very personal note, there is no one in this House who would not say to the Prime Minister that even when we did not agree, he did work from his political perspective in the interests of his country.

I want to conclude by offering my best wishes to the Prime Minister. My only disappointment is that the Prime Minister did not call an election today. I have to express that disappointment, Prime Minister. We do wish on this side of the House the very best to you and your family and thanks for the public service you have given to Canadians over the past 10 years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I too on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the House rise to pay tribute to an outstanding individual, an incredible person, a visionary and a dynamic leader who is the Prime Minister of Canada.

We express our deep gratitude for the decade of tireless effort on behalf of our party, Mr. Prime Minister, and for your leadership in piloting the nation in challenging and tumultuous times.

We always look at the personal side of these challenges and the way in which you have conducted yourself in meeting these challenges. As a person, those of us who know him know the Prime Minister to be a man of warmth, charm, compassion and wit.

• (1415)

He is always good natured and has never lost his sense of humour, not even in times of facing difficult challenges or the gruelling task of leading and governing.

For those of us who know him, he was always there to support us in times of need or crisis with a kind word or a generous act which provided that comfort and encouragement to friend or political foe. We appreciate the comments of the leader of the New Democratic Party because that is very much the style of the Prime Minister.

To his friends, colleagues and staff he generated an atmosphere of intense trust and loyalty because he touches people in a deep and lasting way. He does so because he values the worth of individuals. He respects their beliefs and their philosophies and he truly maintains a deep and abiding interest in their affairs.

His family has been and always will be his priority, his children his pride and joy, and Mila, his partner, confidante and most loyal supporter. We all know that they have stood with him in times of triumph and setback. His love for family also reflects his deep belief in family values and the family as the cornerstone of our society.

As a leader, and particularly as leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, he has been an unqualified success and a master at bringing men and women together. His ability to lead a caucus representing all regions of the country is unprecedented. His ability to use the talents of caucus members in the decision-making process was both unique and progressive. His ability to lead and to unite is a result of his profound respect for every individual in our caucus.

For his care and concern about their welfare, their families, their regions and their communities, we are very grateful for that caucus relationship which was really a family arrangement.

Not since Sir John A. Macdonald has there been a more successful leader of our party. Our Prime Minister travelled the country extensively to get first-hand knowledge of all the towns and cities along with the wonderful people who make up this great country of ours, Canada.

He often said that Canada was a country made up of small towns and big dreams. As others have indicated, his main concern and passion was always Canada.

Under his extraordinary leadership abilities, our party experienced its most productive period. The party's base of support was broadened to all corners of the country and all walks of life, east to west and north to south. He has truly made our party national in scope. He has presided over an organization that was always well tuned, well financed and well organized.

He is a bold leader who has the record to prove it and history will judge it; so I am convinced.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Today, as the fifth longest serving Prime Minister in Canadian history, he has presided over the affairs of our nation in challenging and changing times. He prompted key changes during a time of world transition in a country trying to find its niche in a new world order.

The changes that he has promoted have been as logical as they were difficult to achieve. The Prime Minister has always acted decisively in all areas of national life.

On the issue of national unity, he has gone where only angels have previously trod and his fostering of Canadian unity has been second to none.

He has also acted to build a sound economy through progressive tax changes and the opening of trade markets so vital to Canadian interests. He has tackled the federal deficit through controlling government spending, and interest rates through controlling inflation.

• (1420)

He has promoted a compassionate society through the development of new initiatives to protect children and to target assistance to those in society most in need of it.

By working to ensure equal access and the economic integration of the disabled and by providing greater justice for aboriginal peoples he has moved Canadian society as a whole to new heights. His efforts in developing a national AIDS strategy, a national drug strategy, the family violence initiative, the breast cancer initiative and a national strategy on tobacco use illustrate his unending compassion for Canadians and the health and safety of their families.

He has, in the words of others, created "a model for the world" by taking action on the environment through the development of Canada's green plan and achieving the acid rain treaty with the United States.

On the world stage he has provided consistent leadership by promoting peace through Canada's involvement in some 16 UN peacekeeping operations. He has fought aggression by ensuring that Canada's military stood shoulder to shoulder with its allies to expel Iraq from Kuwait. He has always played a leading role in G-7,

Commonwealth and Francophonie summits, at which he ensured the sovereignty and security of Canada.

He has overseen Canada's election to the UN Security Council, an entry to the OAS and our active role in Haiti. By all measures he is a leader among leaders, viewed by his world colleagues with respect and called upon for advice and counsel.

If politics is a debate about the future then leadership is the courage to make choices, defend them, and champion them.

Mr. Prime Minister, you have done all of these things. For that we are grateful, and for that we thank you and we thank Mila and your family. You have served us extraordinarily well and we extend to you our warmest, kindest and best wishes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, "As a member of Parliament and a colleague he was witty and compassionate. He was partisan and caring. He loves Quebec and believes very deeply in Canada and has a unique and thoughtful way of expressing that". Can you believe that I said that about Jean Chrétien?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: He must have been leaving.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: In fact I did say that about him, but he promised me he would be leaving. That was on February 27, 1986 and so I noticed both the eloquence of his remarks today, for which I thank him, and the important caveat that he has made about return.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: I would particularly like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his thoughtful and generous comments regarding my wife and children. The fact is, we are friends and our families have been friends for some time. However, he did regret the fact that he and I would not be facing each other on the front lines in the next election.

[English]

The Leader of the Opposition expressed regret that he and I would not meet in the great battle.

• (1425)

I just want to point out to him that I expect a convention of my party to select my successor as party leader to take place in the summer of 1993. I point out to him that one of his colleagues, Mackenzie King, in 1948 stepped down, resigned as Leader of the Liberal Party and then decided that he might not turn over the Prime Ministership and hung in there for months. So who knows?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to dampen any enthusiasm that might be existing over there.

I also want to thank my friend, the leader of the NDP, for her gracious remarks and her kindness in recalling a number of incidents, including one about someone we both cared for a great deal, Pauline Jewett, and the moments that surrounded Pauline's elevation to the Privy Council, about how proud she was of it, what a marvellous woman she was and what a tremendous fighter she had been.

The leader of the NDP not only did all of her job, but she was also looking after Pauline at the same time. This too is part of her quite wonderful human qualities.

I do not think I would be offending anybody by mentioning in regard to my friend, the leader of the NDP, one of the observations I have made after a decade here in Ottawa. The fact of the matter is that this is a tough business, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out. We do not get much gratitude. Of course in my case the press has been marvellous, but I know the rest of you have had a tough time.

I think there is en passant an observation that is probably appropriate. I watched the leader of the NDP come from a by-election into the House and to the leadership of her own party. If this business is tough on all of us, as it is, I think it is particularly tough and demanding on women. I have always thought that in Canada, in Ottawa and in politics women have to be twice as good to get half the credit that men do. I just want to congratulate my hon. friend on her tremendous accomplishments.

The leader of the NDP mentioned again that she regretted that I had not called an election. Audrey, I forgot to tell you, I have just come from seeing the Governor General.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: I also want to thank the members of this House, including my party colleagues and others I have had the privilege of meeting here, some of whom are friends from way back who unfortunately opted for the wrong side. Yes, Marcel, I forgive you. I see my neighbour and friend, Paul Martin. But if I say any more, they will fire me as leader of the Conservative Party. The fact is that as members we have a unique opportunity to create and strengthen ties of friendship.

What brings us together in most cases is our country, Canada. And that applies to our various political parties, the official parties in this House. Canada has always been my concern and my passion, and I would say that applies to many members here.

• (1430)

For 10 years I have concentrated all my efforts on maintaining and strengthening Canada's unity because I am convinced that without unity there can be no greatness for this country, no prosperity for its provinces and no happiness for its citizens.

[English]

All of us have been privileged to have inherited the most extraordinary country on the face of this earth and all of us, the best we can, contribute to making it a little bit better.

This is the finest forum for making this happen. This is where democracy, the collision of ideas, the collision of personalities and policies, comes into play. Its result is democracy in its purest form. I do not always like the result after I leave Question Period. Some of my people cry a lot, but I try to get them going again.

The fact of the matter is that vigorous exchanges like what occurs here are part and parcel of the best dimensions of democracy. However, most of all what keeps us here and what has motivated all of us to come here is our belief in and our love of Canada and all this magnificent country has done for every member of this House and will continue to do, God willing, for decades and decades to come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the disposition of the House to proceed with Question Period for the usual 45 minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION OFFICES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if it is correct that on Friday after the House adjourns for one week the government will announce the closing of 45 regional immigration offices in every part of Canada. This means that applications for work permits, visitor visas, student visas, family class and sponsored refugees will have to be made by mail and decided upon at some distant centre without any face-to-face interview.

I want to ask the minister why the government is proceeding with this plan when the pilot projects were a failure and when they showed that this system would be extremely inefficient and open the door to criminality? Why is the government going ahead with this crazy plan?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that members of the union of employment and immigration employees are circulating a list detailing the official list of Canada immigration centres which could be closed or would be closed following the reconfiguration exercise. Following my announcement earlier in the year about plans for Immigration Canada to attempt to better serve Canadians in a more efficient way and at a more effective cost, yes indeed, there will be a reconfiguration. But what is important for members and Canadians to know is that the only motive behind this is to try to better serve Canadians and do it in a more efficient way.

• (1435)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the pilot project showed that it would be more inefficient and would open the door to criminality.

[Translation]

This policy, this proposal to replace face-to-face immigration interviews in local communities with a review of documents in Vegreville, Alberta is an insult to common sense and common decency. It will make things harder for legitimate immigrants and easier for immigrants who are criminals.

Would the minister agree to postpone these closings and refer these proposals to the standing committee for consideration and recommendations?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all the Liberal Party of Canada is hardly in a position to criticize measures that would improve the Immigration Act and thus prevent terrorists and criminals from immigrating to Canada. The hon. member and his party have objected to every single measure we have proposed to achieve this objective.

As far as the reconfiguration exercise is concerned, its only purpose is to provide a better service to Canadians at the lowest possible cost. The demands of the employment and immigration union have absolutely no basis in fact, and besides, the recommendation to proceed with a centre for considering these applications came from the employees themselves.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): The Canadian people will decide what is efficient and what opens the door to criminality.

Canada is a large country with great distances between our towns and cities. It is not easy to travel from Kamloops to Vancouver on an immigration matter, nor from Sydney to Halifax, and certainly not to Vegreville, Alberta.

I want to ask the minister why he is punishing Canadians in this way by closing all these offices simply to save the skin of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Is the hon. member now suggesting to Canadians that people have to drive from Banff, Alberta to Bathurst, New Brunswick to get their social insurance number? It is done in a region of the country, northern New Brunswick.

An hon. member: It's called computers.

Mr. Valcourt: If the hon. member wants Canadians to believe that we are going to force people to travel to Vegreville, Alberta, let me tell him that is a total falsehood; it is not the case at all. It has been made clear that in those cases where it is important for an interview to take place between an applicant and Immigration Canada, it will be done in the towns and the cities of Canada, in the regions of Canada, not in Vegreville, Alberta.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, we have documents which show that the government is planning to close a large number of immigration offices across Canada. Sudbury is one of the centres targeted.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that Sudbury is the only office to service immigration clients across northern Ontario and services the huge immigrant population which has developed northern Ontario.

How does the minister expect to serve such a broad area if there is absolutely no immigration presence in northern Ontario?

Ms. Copps: Immigration by phone. 1-800-flip-flop.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Colleagues should not be surprised that the member is totally wrong. There is no question of cutting services to the people of northern Ontario. The people of northern Ontario, the people of Atlantic Canada, the people of the prairies, of British Columbia will continue to receive the services they require from Immigration Canada. If the hon. member keeps repeating those claims by a union which we all know is against this because it has not proven in the past that it was in favour of saving the taxpayers of Canada money, that is what we will be doing.

• (1440)

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the documents I have here are from Employment and Immigration Canada.

These closures really have nothing to do with efficiency. Why is the minister closing the Sudbury office with no concern for the vast population this office serves while expanding and enhancing immigration offices in the riding of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member is quoting from a document. As I indicated, the reconfiguration of Immigration Canada offices across the country relate to the amendments we brought to the Immigration Act. This reconfiguration will not deprive any regions of Canada of the services they should expect from Immigration Canada. Therefore, there is no point in the hon. member continuing that tempest. It is not true.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of trade. This government has always said that the NAFTA, the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade deal would not have a negative effect on the environment and would be good for workers. In fact, over the past year when I questioned the minister on what he intends to do in terms of taking concerns about the environment forward in the trade deal talks and concerns for workers, the minister replied that this is a commercial deal and has nothing to do with these other issues. Yet the government has now acknowledged that it would be prepared to participate in parallel or further agreements at the suggestion of President Clinton.

I would like to ask the minister of trade why NAFTA was good enough for workers and the environment last December, but now just two months later the government says it will negotiate new agreements. Is it admitting that NAFTA is a failure and has huge problems?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know I am never going to be able to convince my friend because on this particular issue she has blinkers on. The point is tremendous opportunities are opened up under the NAFTA in giving access to the Mexican markets, one of the fastest growing economies in the Americas, a market with a middle-income market of 25 million or 30 million people, a market where companies are already taking advantage of the opportunities with new contracts there.

My hon. friend is right. I have said it is a good deal and I continue to say it is a good deal. But we have also tried to inject some provisions through these side agreements on labour and the environment as we started last February, a full year ago. We will continue to do that. We will be participating with the other two countries in order to achieve that. Those negotiations will probably be starting in two or three weeks.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the minister. While the government clearly is about to bring legislation before this House to implement the North American trade deal, on March 15 as the minister has just said, Canada, Mexico and the U.S. are scheduled to begin negotiating these so-called side agreements or parallel agreements on the environment and workers that the minister formerly said were not necessary.

My question to the minister is this: Given that there will be parallel agreements negotiated and discussed, why is the minister persisting in bringing forward legislation which is clearly not complete without these agreements and why does the minister not simply withdraw this legislation until that process is complete?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the legislation is complete because it reflects the agreement that was signed by all three countries last December. It is important for us to allay any uncertainty to the private sector. We have to deal with the agreement, to get the agreement legislated and get it behind us. That does not say we cannot engage in the discussions on the side agreements on labour and the environment, if we can have some other elements where we can work in a co-operative way to improve labour arrangements or environmental conditions in the three countries.

I would say to my hon. friend that the United States is already into its legislative process; Canada will be starting on its legislative process imminently and Mexico will be starting as soon as it comes back from its winter break which will be April 1.

• (1445)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, clearly the minister is saying there are questions about the NAFTA agreement that are going to be addressed through other agreements.

[Translation]

We have seen the consequences of the free trade agreement, the loss of jobs, the results of deregulation and privatization and the impact of the agreement on economy, but we still have no information on the NAFTA impact studies. My question to the minister is this: Will this government withdraw the bill and let Canadians debate these issues during an election campaign? After all, that is the proper forum for this kind of debate.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Many studies have already been made and most have concluded that NAFTA is the best option for all three countries. As far as the FTA is concerned, last year we saw our exports to the United States increase by more than 13 per cent. These exports created jobs here in Canada.

POVERTY

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health and welfare.

During the reviled reign of this government the number of two parent families with children who must resort to food banks has doubled. Most of these families report going without food at least once a month. Yet according to the chair of the kangaroo committee on poverty, children would have to be naked, homeless or on the brink of starvation before being considered poor.

I ask the minister if poor Canadians will remain fiscal outcasts until this government is cast out.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to deal with the substance of the question. I believe that when the member talks about children we have to be very sensitive. She knows very well that child poverty is not acceptable but it is a reality and we are trying to deal with that.

In 1992 just for families and children we spent more than $3 billion and particularly at the child tax benefit level we have improved the situation for the low income workers. We have done the best we can in terms of the many problems facing families today.

Obviously we can always do more but it has to be done with regard to the capacity we have to do it. I believe just in terms of the money itself, $3 billion for one year is probably the most that any government has done in this country.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the government cannot hide the plight of the poor with a sleight of the hand.

The substance of my question is that nearly two million Canadians, 600,000 of them children, will need the help of food banks to survive this last year of Tory caucus curse. Members of that caucus want to write off poverty stricken Canadians as bourgeois free–loaders who are not poor at all.

I ask the minister to explain why the basic instinct of this government is to leave poor Canadians with nothing but fried green tomatoes.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is increasingly difficult to find the substance but I am going to try again. I have said what this government has done in terms of addressing child poverty.

• (1450)

I remember when her party was in power in 1975, 1980 or 1982. There were poor children in Canada and proportionally it was not necessarily better than it is today.

The problem with the hon. member's party is that it is good on the opposition side of the House but when it is on this side, it is bad on social policies and worse, it is also bad on economic policies.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This whole idea of changing the definition of poverty rather than taking the necessary actions to reduce poverty is the most ridiculous idea I have ever heard.

When the levels of poverty are at record highs in Canada, why is this government wasting time on new definitions rather than taking immediate measures to eliminate poverty in this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have not changed the definition of poverty. We have coped with the problem of children and poverty in this country.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Currently there are over 70,000 people in Winnipeg living on either unemployment insurance or social assistance. By any definition those people are poor.

Why is the government spending time on questions of definition of poverty when the real task of the government is to find jobs, to find training and to finally put together a development plan for Winnipeg?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I just answered that question to the other hon. member, who incidentally is also from Winnipeg.

I will repeat what I said. We have not changed the definition of poverty. As I said before, putting $3 billion for children last year in the Minister of Finance's budget is evidence that we are doing what we can for unemployment and poor children. That should be done first and foremost. The government is trying to give jobs and give opportunities to people to feed their children.

The hon. member knows very well that this will not come like the rain in the morning. It will come with efforts we do and will continue to do.

Once again that party's record was worse when it was in government. The hon. member was not there, but he should listen to his friends who were.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and it deals with the North American free trade agreement legislation which I understand he intends to introduce today.

The plant in Ingersoll which manufactures truck trailers has announced that it is shutting down permanently with a loss of 240 jobs. This is the fourth shut-down in this industry since free trade came into effect losing 1,300 jobs as all of its production has been shifted to the United States.

I want to ask how this government can push ahead with extending free trade to include Mexico when the present deal has wiped out entire industries like this one involving the Ingersoll plant.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, maybe my hon. friend could explain to me why it is that under the free trade agreement with the United States, in a period when the nominal growth in the American economy was around 5 per cent, there was a 13.5 per cent increase in exports to the United States market.

Who is exporting those products? Successful companies in the riding of the hon. member and in ridings right across Canada. Yes there are companies that will have some difficulty in a free trade environment, in an environment of globalization, in a recessionary environment. That is a fact of life.

My hon. friend must start to look at the broader picture. If he looks at the broader picture he will see that the market share of Canadian exports into the United States markets has increased significantly. Our exports have increased at double the rate of those exports from Japan to the United States market, of the United Kingdom to the United States, or of Germany to the United States. The sole reason for that is the free trade agreement with the United States.

• (1455)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board of Canada, which this government likes to quote, says that since the free trade deal we have lost manufacturing jobs at a rate three times faster than the United States. That is because of the free trade deal.

There is no question that in this case this entire industry has been hit because of the free trade deal since tariff rates have fallen from 15 per cent to 1.5 per cent.

Why has the government changed what was supposed to be a 10-year phase-out period for this manufacturing of truck trailers and instead accelerated the phase-out of these tariffs so that they have resulted in the wiping out of an entire industry and 1,300 jobs here in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend surely knows because he is the trade critic. I might add The Financial Post says that the leader of the NDP's trade minister would cut a lonely figure sitting at tables all by himself. If I were the hon. member I would want to change my responsibilities very quickly.

The point of the matter is that any time there is tariff acceleration in the free trade between the United States and Canada it has to be with the agreement of industries in both countries. On that basis, we have gone ahead.

I point out there have been two major accelerated reductions in tariffs amounting to some $8 billion of trade which my hon. friend forgets accrues to the benefit of consumers in the countries involved. The consumers are the great beneficiaries of free trade. They get lower prices as a result of elimination of tariffs and they get a greater variety of products to buy.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade will shortly introduce the North American free trade legislation.

He says that in the United States the government has also begun the legislative process. He knows, however, that the President of the United States and the United States chief trade negotiator have both said that the President will not present the NAFTA legislation to Congress until such time as the United States gets its three supplementary or parallel accords, one on the environment, one on labour and one on import surges.

Can the minister tell the House and the Canadian people why he is proceeding when he knows that those three parallel agreements will substantially modify the terms and operation of the proposed North American free trade agreement?

Why do the minister and the government not wait until such time as we are aware of the nature of those parallel accords so we can be certain of what it is this government is asking the Canadian people to adopt?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can say absolutely that the side agreements will not substantially modify the agreement signed in December by all three countries.

President Salinas, President Clinton and our Prime Minister have all agreed there will be no change to the agreement signed in December 1992. It will not be reopened. It will be implemented on January 1, 1994.

The side agreements are supplemental agreements. They are to add certain aspects in the areas of environment, labour and possibly import surges and will be ancillary to the free trade agreement itself. They will not change the substance of the agreement in any way.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, that answer contradicts what the minister said yesterday.

He said that a year ago he put forward on behalf of Canada positions on the environment and on labour standards which would have substantially changed the treaty itself. Those positions were rejected by the United States and Mexico.

Yesterday the minister said he is going to bring forward those positions again. Today, however, he says they will not change the agreement.

• (1500)

Let me ask the minister one specific question. The minister well knows that any agreement on import surges will change the nature of NAFTA itself. It will affect the nature of dispute settlement. It will change the nature of the clauses in the treaty on import surges.

Will the minister explain to the Canadian people what our position is? Have we any position in Canada on those three areas? What are they?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking questions which he should have put in the committee hearings when I appeared before it. I will be appearing again. I am sure we will have an opportunity to discuss them.

Let me be quite clear that on labour and on the environment the things we were proposing last February and since then is the establishment of two trilateral commissions. That has been accepted now with the environment. It looks like it could be accepted for labour matters and in that way develop a dialogue among the three countries on how we can improve our policies in those two areas. That is not in any way changing the nature of the agreement signed in December last year.

As it relates to import surges, let us see what the Americans have in mind. I do not know what the Americans have in mind. I do not think my hon. friend knows what the Americans have in mind. We do know they have confirmed many times that they are not going to reopen the agreement of December last year.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Currently there are 18 Americans working in a cement plant in Woodstock, Ontario. These Americans were given permits by Canadian officials to do mechanical jobs in an industry where there is a 50 per cent unemployment rate in Canada. In issuing these permits Canadian officials did not weigh the consequences to Canadian workers.

How can this government sit back and allow this to happen while badly needed Canadian jobs have been handed to Americans with this government's seal of approval?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member can stand up in this House and say this was done with the government's seal of approval.

Last December he brought this to the attention of the department. The officials at the office in question explained in detail in a letter to the hon. member how a mistake had been made. It was mentioned that only two weeks or days remained and it was explained to the hon. member that this had happened because of a mistake. He was assured by the officials in writing that steps had been taken to prevent this from happening in the future. That was last December.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want an assurance from a Canadian consulate member. I want an assurance from this minister and this government that they will not allow this to happen.

The Canadian consulate in Minneapolis, Minnesota admitted to a mistake in approving these applications, but this is unacceptable and it cost Canadian jobs.

I want to ask the minister responsible for international trade what he intends to do to prevent either the FTA or some ambiguous little clause in immigration policy from being used to provide foreigners with desperately needed Canadian jobs.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the member knows full well that this has nothing to do with the free trade agreement. An error was made due to misinterpretation by an officer of the department. I know that in a perfect world mistakes would not happen.

The hon. member wants to interpret the mistake as government policy when he knows it was not government policy, quite the contrary. We have a policy of hiring Canadians first and that is the way we operate throughout Canada. The mistake was explained to him.

Please do not try to mess up the free trade agreement with that. It has nothing to do with it.

ABORIGINAL FISHING STRATEGY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

When the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans last June announced his aboriginal fishing strategy for B.C., he said he was following the Sparrow decision of the Supreme Court. The fisheries committee asked the Minister of Justice to give a ruling on the Sparrow decision, about which many questions had been asked and arguments made in B.C. as to what extent it dealt with the commercialization of the aboriginal fishery.

Is the minister of fisheries aware of the importance of dealing with this question promptly?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hon. gentleman's question, I believe he knows full well that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans takes the advice of the Minister of Justice's department with respect to the interpretation and meaning of the Sparrow decision.

As a matter of fact I met in Vancouver yesterday with representatives of aboriginal groups, the fishing industry, the recreational sector and a representative of the Government of British Columbia to deal with these very issues.

I would very much appreciate the hon. gentleman telling me what his party's policy is with reference to the question of the Sparrow decision and the experimental sale of food fish that we now have under way. Does his party support it or not? Is it supporting the aboriginal groups in their attempts to be included in the fishery or is it opposing them? What is its position?

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Is the minister able to tell us wether he has a single watershed agreement for any of the main salmon rivers in B.C.? Is he able to tell us with confidence that he will have regulations in force regardless of race, creed or colour that will make sure the B.C. salmon industry does not go the way of the northern Atlantic cod industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I know we all get infected by the rhetoric we hear in this House and the hon. gentleman has probably caught the disease as well.

We are working with the aboriginal groups toward reaching watershed agreements on the Fraser River and the Skeena River hopefully by the middle of March. That is our target date. We expect to have agreements with well over 100 aboriginal bands dealing with habitat and fisheries management by the time the fishing season opens in the middle of May.

There will likely be at least three agreements, as there were last year, covering experimental sales of food fish in a regulated, understandable and enforceable way. Whether that will be expanded or not, I do not know.

All this work is under way and we hope to have everything in place before the fishing season opens.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Indian affairs.

It has come to my attention that the Ontario government may ignore the Williams treaty, ignore the current law, ignore court decisions and ignore the wording of section 35(1) of the Canadian Constitution with regard to existing treaty rights. The intention is to give licences in the form of interim agreements to the seven Williams treaty bands.

Has the federal government been approached by the Government of Ontario? If it was, would the federal government change regulations to give Indians covered by the Williams treaty the legal right to fish and hunt during closed seasons? Would it apply to migratory birds?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington shares with many residents of east central Ontario a concern about different regulations in regard to hunting and fishing as they pertain to the aboriginal people of the United Indian Councils.

Those who signed the Williams treaty in 1923 surrendered their right to special hunting and fishing privileges. The Ontario government seeks to reinstate those special privileges, but must do so only with the authority of the minister of fisheries under the Fisheries Act who ultimately must approve regulations.

However it is the delegated responsibility of the province of Ontario to consult widely with all interest groups and to ensure that there will be no negative reaction or no misunderstanding before such regulatory proposals are brought forward.

RAILWAY CROSSINGS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It is as a result of a fatal accident at a railway crossing in Stewiacke, Nova Scotia.

The RCMP wrote a report which said the Railway Safety Act is a federal statute enforced solely by the CN and CP police. In response to a petition to the Minister of Transport, the answer was that the RCMP does have the authority to enforce the provisions of all federal statutes, including the Railway Safety Act.

Which one is right?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has brought this matter to my attention. It would appear there is a conflict between what is said on the one hand in the report and on the other hand, in the answer to the petition.

It is a valid point to make. I will draw this to the attention of my officials and try to come back with a definitive answer.

AIRLINES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

On Monday the Minister of Transport said that overcapacity in the skies was up to the airlines to resolve. On Tuesday he said that he might legislate a resolution to overcapacity.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport, after dithering around for months while our national airlines have practically been driven out of business, what is his solution to the crisis in our airline industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in my statement in the House at the end of November I made reference to the fact that one of the major problems in the airline industry in Canada, as in the world, is overcapacity.

I indicated at the time that if the airline companies did not have the self-discipline necessary to bring down capacity we would legislate on it to recalibrate the situation. It is still our position.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the position is not solving the problem in the industry, is it? There is nothing being done for the industry.

While the national airlines continue to schedule these money losing, half empty flights the minister stands in his place and says: "Maybe I will do this and maybe the industry should have this intervention".

What is the policy of the minister and the government? When will the minister stop blaming everyone but himself and demonstrate some level of competence to resolve this destructive competition in the skies?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport did not invent anything. The CEOs of both major airlines, appearing at a recent hearing said they fully realized that their major problem was overcapacity. However, instead of doing it themselves they are waiting for the government to do it.

I said yesterday that we are working on legislation to put order in this industry if the owners and operators are not prepared and do not have the discipline to do it themselves.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. As though it were not enough to scare communities in St. Clément and elsewhere, Canada Post is getting ready to close the post office in La Rédemption.

My question to the minister is this: When will his government stop this policy of abandoning rural Canada? When?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, of course we are not abandoning rural Canada. We are opening retail postal outlets as opposed to corporate-run outlets. They stay open longer and are more accessible to the public. When we asked the public how they liked them, 90 per cent thought it was a good idea.

The hon. member was complaining about a couple of post offices left open in the Prime Minister's riding, inferring political privilege.

Mr. Boudria: Five.

Mr. Andre: Five. I just want to inform the hon. member that six were left open in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, that is kind of nice, I think, except there were 45 of them in my constituency and it is still closing them down as we speak today.

I want to ask the following question of the minister. This government is converting, rationalizing, reconfiguring and plain old closing down post offices, immigration offices and everything else right across the regions of Canada. When will this government end the policy of abandoning rural Canada?

• (1515)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated we are opening new post offices. We went from some 12,000 a few years ago and in the process, I might add, we went from a $400 million a year loss to a profit position and increased the on-time delivery from about 85 per cent to 99 per cent. In that process Canada Post has become the most efficient post office in the world.

When polled, of those affected 90 per cent plus have said they are happy with the new service. I think that is a pretty good record.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, young students in this country are a productive work force for Canada. Students want to work during their school holidays to gain experience and increase their income.

In the past, the government has encouraged young people with its summer employment strategy for students. My question is directed to the Minister of State for Youth. Does the minister intend to extend the Challenge '92 program this year to help young people who are looking for summer jobs?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I intend to extend the program, which will be called Challenge'93 this summer. In fact, I would like to inform members, students and employers that the budget for the Summer Employment Experience Development program has been increased from $83 million last summer to $88 million this summer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cadieux: Furthermore, the deadline for filing applications will be extended for one week, until March 19, 1993.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT BRIDGE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): My question is for the Minister of the Environment.

As the minister knows, the environmental assessment of the generic fixed link between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island recommended that the project not proceed.

Will the government honour its 1988 promise and do an environmental assessment of the specific project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know there has been an environmental assessment done on the project and the panel came forward with some recommendations. At the time the government took into account the recommendations made by the panel and when it asked for project submissions, it asked that the proponents take into account what the panel had come forward with.

I understand that is what has happened. Since then a court action has been initiated and is now being pursued, I understand, before the Federal Court. Given those circumstances, I think it would be wise to limit our comments to just that.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Last week in response to a question about gill-netting of salmon, the minister stated that the preference was to negotiate the reduction of gill-netting by agreements as opposed to court action. I agree with that direction providing we can actually conclude such agreements.

I would like to ask the minister if he can provide details of the number of agreements reached, for example with the 15 bands in New Brunswick in 1992. How are such agreements proceeding with respect to negotiations for the 1993 season?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I do not have all this detailed information available today to give to the hon. member since I just got back from the west coast. I have not yet had the chance to gather information on the east coast.

I do know that we had a number of agreements in New Brunswick this past year on the aboriginal fishery strategy. There were more than 64 person-years of native employment created in New Brunswick as a result of those projects. They all had to do with setting up native fishery guardian programs, fisheries monitoring, stock management, fisheries enhancement and assessment.

I will try to get the number of agreements that had to do with the kind of gear that should be used in fishing and conservation practices and what is planned for this year. I will pass it along to him privately.

PRIVILEGE

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my office earlier today, at about noon, provided notice to the Minister of Finance. I hope he has had notice of my intention to rise on this point. He has not? I know that his office has. In any event, I will proceed.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I appreciate what the hon. member said about giving notice to the minister. I am in the hands of both the minister and the hon. member. However, if it would make it easier to discuss the matter after the minister has seen the material, then that might be a useful course to follow. I will hear the hon. member on that.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, my office did make reasonable efforts to ensure that the minister had notice of this today. I think it is in the best interests of the issue that I proceed and dispose of it. The Speaker will then have an opportunity to rule.

I rise on a question of privilege in relation to the failure of the Minister of Finance to lay before Parliament an order made pursuant to subsection 59(2) of the Customs Tariff. It is my submission that this omission constitutes a contempt of Parliament.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on February 3 of last year, I rose on a similar question of privilege in relation to the order respecting the suspension of privileges granted under the free trade agreement, registered then as SOR-8954.

On December 29, 1992, the Governor in Council adopted Order in Council 1992-2715. It so happens that the purpose of this Order in Council is to revoke the order which gave rise to my earlier question of privilege.

Just as the original order was required to be tabled in this House, so is the revoking Order in Council adopted last December and registered as SOR-9314. The revoking order was made pursuant to subsection 59(2) of the Customs Tariff. Subsection 59(5) of the same tariff provides that the Minister of Finance shall cause a copy of any order made pursuant to subsection 59(2) to be laid before Parliament on any of the first 15 days after the making thereof that either House of Parliament is sitting.

The revoking order made on December 29 was legally required to be laid before this House by February 15, 1993, that day being the 15th day after its making that either House sat.

It is not my intention to repeat at length the arguments I made last February. They are applicable here and I would ask you to take them into consideration before you rule on my question of privilege. I do wish to point out, however, that I do not rise today in any capacity other than that of a member of Parliament seeking to uphold the collective right of this House to have a copy of any order made pursuant to subsection 59(2) of the Customs Tariff laid before it.

As on the previous occasion, I have no hesitation in stating my belief that the Minister of Finance has not intentionally disobeyed the statutory tabling requirement here. That being said, I must also reiterate that that intention is not relevant at this stage of the proceeding.

As I indicated last February, I can find no authority for the proposition that an act or omission only constitutes contempt of the House if it was intentional. The correct view seems to be that any act or omission that tends to diminish the authority of this House can be punished as a contempt, although it is likely that in deciding on a punishment, the intent of the party charged with the contempt would be taken into consideration by the House.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, your role at this stage is simply to decide whether the facts before you are sufficient to conclude that the conduct or omission complained of might reasonably be found by the House itself to constitute contempt rather than whether the conduct or omission amounts to contempt.

The substantive question here of whether or not the failure to table this Order in Council was a contempt of the House is a decision for the House to make.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there can be little doubt that the minister's failure to table a document required to be tabled by this House, whether intentional or accidental, tends to diminish the authority of the House of Commons and is something that might reasonably be held to constitute contempt by this House.

• (1525)

In this regard I have referred the House to the remarks made by you, Mr. Speaker, on February 5, 1992 in relation to my earlier question. At that time, Mr. Speaker, you warned those responsible for meeting any deadlines for the tabling of documents to reflect carefully on the possible consequences of ignoring tabling requirements. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that your advice seems to have fallen on deaf ears at the Department of Finance.

While I mention the minister's officials the fact remains that under our doctrine of ministerial responsibility the minister is accountable to this House for the acts and omissions of his officials. However tempting it may be to lift the veil of ministerial responsibility we cannot do so and the minister must accept, as I am sure he will, his responsibility for the failings of his officials.

Considering what took place in February last year it appears that decisive action by this House will be required if our collective right to be informed of the making of orders pursuant to subsection 59(2) of the Customs Tariff, within the time prescribed by Parliament, in this case 15 sittings days, is to be respected.

In closing, having mentioned that we went through this a year ago and that you, Mr. Speaker, gave a warning that the Department of Finance was put on notice then I want to indicate that in the event you accept my submission I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did listen with interest and I can only assure the hon. member that I will look into it and report back to the House as soon as I possibly can. I appreciate his raising it at this time, but not having had an opportunity to study it I am not in a position to respond in a definitive way. I certainly will look into it immediately.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to be sure that both the hon. member and the minister understand the position of the Chair in this.

I have heard the argument. I believe the minister has indicated that he wants to look more carefully at the matter and will come back. I will listen to the minister when that takes place and subsequent to that I will make a ruling.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

ASIA PACIFIC PARLIAMENTARY FORUM

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1) I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report on the inaugural meeting of the Asia Pacific Parliamentary Forum held in Tokyo, Japan on January 14 and 15, 1993.

This report is more than a report this time. In fact the report embodies several resolutions and structural comments that could be helpful to the House of Commons and the Speaker.

It has been determined that there has been a lack of emphasis on the interparliamentary activity in the Pacific Rim. In fact we have only one bilateral organization, which is between Canada and Japan. That is the only official organization despite the fact that the whole geopolitical shift is toward the Pacific and it is imperative that Canada should participate more strongly in that interparliamentary relationship.

Therefore we have suggested in our report that the new organization, which is an umbrella of Parliaments of the Pacific, should in fact become the umbrella, which along with the Canada–Japan Parliamentary Association will encourage the development of more friendship associations, such as Canada–China, Canada–Taiwan and Canada–Korea.

We suggest that we would spawn many friendship organizations under the one umbrella and that umbrella in turn would then help direct delegations to develop those relationships, which are lagging far behind our traditional European experience.

• (1530)

This report correlates very well with that of the member for Saint–Denis who will make similar suggestions in his bigger report to Parliament through the parliamentary committee structure.

We want to support that and emphasize this. We hope this report will not simply be received but that it will be a matter of study by the Speaker and by committee.

I would like this report referred beyond the House of Commons back through the structure. I would ask that that is done as our recommendations are considered.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Madam Speaker, on a point of order. This is the only way I can add a few comments. I must say that for members who would like to see changes in the Standing Orders that would give them a little more power, this is a prime example where it is not your fault or mine, but the fault of the Standing Orders. I certainly hope we can soon change the Standing Orders so when a document is tabled with which I am familiar and on which I worked at the request of the Chair—I know exactly what the hon. member wants to tell us—I wish that occasionally, not as notice to parliamentarians but as an indication of what Canada should do, we could take a good look at what these papers say. Unfortunately we cannot under our Standing Orders.

I think members who want more power for parliamentarians should support a request we will be making very shortly. It would make it possible for a number of parliamentarians who are directly involved in drafting such reports to add a few comments and not just sit there listening to what is said by the member tabling the report. In fact, we could say that the media, which are often critical about what we do, should at least read the document. We cannot do this under the Standing Orders but I hope changes will be made to allow that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Nor do the Standing Orders allow the Chair to listen to long speeches after tabling of reports by interparliamentary delegations, important and interesting though they may be. We will now proceed to presenting reports from committees. The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest.

BILL C–99

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another act in consequence thereof, with an amendment.

This is a most important piece of legislation. All parties support it. The size of the loans is going to be increased for small businesses from $100,000 to $250,000. Companies with revenues now of up to $5 million will qualify and we really hope that the banks of this country support and use this important piece of legislation to help small businesses which create over 80 per cent of the jobs in Canada.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-409, an act to amend the Criminal Code (threats and intimidation).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, I rise to introduce my private member's bill entitled an act to amend the Criminal Code (threats and intimidation).

• (1535)

This bill will pull together all the current provisions of our Criminal Code which could apply to stalking, puts them in the context of violence against women, and strengthens them.

I have examined the anti-stalking laws in the U.S. very carefully. I have introduced some of these principles and tailored my amendments to Canadian law and the Canadian reality.

In 1991, 120 Canadian women died at the hand of their male partner or ex-partner. Most often these murders were preceded by threats, intimidation and stalking. This must be stopped.

My bill is a step in that direction and I ask for the support, in fact I expect the support of all members of this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Ms. Black moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Belcourt, Senneterre, Barraute and Sullivan in Abitibi who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable, because they incite more violence.

They also say that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. These people point out that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society, protect our children more and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions on two matters today. The first is from a number of constituents who are concerned that the laws of Canada do not deal with materials portraying torture, rape and murder as fun, including something called the serial killer board game.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the second petition comes from constituents who are equally concerned about the North American free trade agreement and want the government to disband it.

VIOLENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present a petition requesting that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as serial killer board games be kept from being distributed in Canada.

ALCOHOL

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by almost 4,000 people in British Columbia.

They say that alcohol is a drug and many people are unaware of the health risks posed by alcohol because it is so widely accepted in our society. This is especially true of pregnant women, many of whom do not know that drinking may lead to birth defects.

Alcohol consumption has also been linked to impairment of a person's ability to operate machinery or an automobile, hypertension, liver disease, cancer and addiction. Warning labels on alcohol have already been put into place in some jurisdictions.

Therefore these petitioners request that Parliament consider requiring labels on all alcoholic beverages to warn consumers, including pregnant women, of the health risks that are involved in the consumption of alcohol.

LANGUAGE USED ON RADIO AND TELEVISION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, these petitioners ask Parliament to monitor very closely the language used on radio and television. They also ask Parliament to eliminate violent acts as much as possible. They point out that their efforts are often undermined by what happens in the media. They also emphasize that it is not necessary to use vulgar language or violence to inform or entertain people.

• (1540)

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, the petitioners ask that the government review its policies with respect to education, in particular the 3 per cent tax on student loans as well as the goods and services tax on books and reading materials.

They point out that we have never had such a tax and reading is the cornerstone of democracy and competitiveness. They ask the government to act forthwith.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from February 18, 1993, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–113, an Act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope, and on the amendment of Mr. Bevilacqua (p. 16117).

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate on Bill C–113. First of all, I would like to say that my colleagues did an excellent job of putting the facts before the members of this House.

I would like to consider the vision and logic behind the proposed amendments. Like survival, good government means adjusting successfully to new situations. The proposed amendments provide for reasonable adjustments in a program that Canadians support. Canadian workers depend on unemployment insurance to help them if they lose their jobs.

It is up to our government to ensure that the unemployment insurance program remains in place to help Canadians. The program must be sound, affordable and fairly administered. This bill is based on the equity principle. It also deals with responsible choices and the desire of millions of Canadians to achieve a reasonable standard of living by working in a positive and productive environment.

These proposals reflect an approach that is aimed at guaranteeing the solvency of the unemployment insurance account. The proposals reflect the fact that the unemployment insurance fund depends on contributions made by honest citizens and businesses across the country.

Just as we protect ourselves against certain eventualities by taking out life insurance, car insurance or fire insurance, Canadians contribute to the unemployment insurance fund to protect themselves against unforeseen periods of unemployment. If people become unemployed due to circumstances beyond their control, they have a safety net. That is what unemployment insurance is for. No reasonable person—

Mr. Plamondon: You are going to be on UI yourself.

Mr. Robitaille: The hon. member for Richelieu says we are going to be on unemployment insurance pretty soon, but I think it is he, quite frankly, who will certainly get his benefits.

As I was saying, no reasonable person would expect an insurance company to pay if he set his own house on fire. Unemployment insurance is not meant to be a source of income as such. It is a safety net for Canadian workers. The government is now trying to ensure it will remain available to those who really need it.

The unemployment insurance program works very well. Interestingly, 70 per cent of all Canadians who receive unemployment insurance benefits return to the labour market before exhausting those benefits. Most Canadians who become unemployed use their benefits to find new jobs. The challenge is to ensure we can continue to provide this assistance to Canadian workers. To do that, we intend to deny benefits to those who quit their jobs without just cause. Those who choose not to work will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

Furthermore, starting on April 4, 1993, the benefit rate will be 57 per cent. Benefits for new claimants will be frozen for the next two years, as is the case for all federal Public Service employees, members of this House, senators, ministers, the Prime Minister and the Governor General. This is a one-time measure that will last two years and is intended as a response to a one-time situation.

Now for a look at the other side of the coin: job creation and training. Premiums paid by small business will be frozen. Furthermore, small businesses which in 1993 pay more unemployment insurance premiums than in 1992 will be eligible for a refundable tax credit for the surplus premiums paid. This measure will encourage them to hire people and create jobs.

• (1635)

We will also spend more on retraining. In 1993, the government will spend $2.21 billion to help nearly a million workers receiving benefits return to the labour market. The budget for this is $260 million more than in 1992 and five times more than was spent in 1990 to train the unemployed. What workers really want is not UI benefits; they want to increase their employability and especially they want work and better access to the labour market. These measures meet their expectations.

As industry restructures, employers and workers agree on who will stay, who will go and what special arrangements will be offered to those who quit. Workers who leave make it possible for other workers to stay and help industries be competitive. Someone who leaves his or her job in these circumstances and looks for other employment will not be considered as having quit voluntarily. Another important point about the amendments presented in this bill directly concerns cases of sexual or other harassment. Arbitration boards will have the power to protect the privacy of victims of harassment. In cases of sexual or other harassment and at the beneficiary's request, the arbitration board can hear the testimony of both parties separately so the beneficiary does not have to be in the same room as the person who harassed him or her.

At the beneficiary's request, the board can conduct the first-level appeal proceedings behind closed doors or in private and exclude the public and media. Last week, the member for Hamilton East asked whether these were minor or major changes. She knows very well that in many cases, victims of sexual harassment hesitate to speak out because it is often embarrassing for them to do so and it is not always easy to talk about it. If the member for Hamilton East and others are really serious when they talk about sexual harassment and how trying an experience it is for the victims, I am sure they will appreciate these amendments for what they are and will support these measures contained in Bill C-113.

Two years ago, the unemployment insurance account had a $2.2 billion surplus. In 1992, this surplus became a $4.5 billion deficit. In fact, if we do not modify the unemployment insurance program, the forecast deficit will rise to over $8 billion in 1993. By making the proposed changes, the government can reduce this deficit to $7.5 billion. We had a choice to take these measures or increase premiums, which would have led to lay-offs, or borrow yet again and increase the deficit. We know very well that when we borrow to finance deficits it is your children and mine and future generations who will have to pay these deficits in the end. We had the choice to make the right decision, namely control costs by giving benefits to those who really need them. What the opposition proposes, I repeat, is to pass the bill on to those who will come after us and finance people who quit their jobs for no valid reason and abuse the system.

As the Prime Minister said last Tuesday, Canada's generosity to the unemployed is unmatched in the OECD countries, but I do not think we have to pay benefits, with money taken from one's fellow citizens, to someone who quits a job without reason, provocation or cause. I think the Government of Canada has made a good decision.

• (1640)

As I said earlier, these changes are based on the principle of fairness. I am the first to recognize that this principle takes precedence over budgetary restraints. The Canadian people should not be led to believe that UI benefits will no longer be available if they lose their jobs through no fault of their own. It is absolutely not true and it is very unfortunate that there is so much disinformation on this subject. We are told over and over that with Bill C–113 after April 4, Canadian workers will no longer be entitled to unemployment insurance. That is not true. Nothing will have changed. Canadian workers will continue to be entitled to unemployment insurance, with the exception of those who leave their jobs without just cause.

The choice facing us is clear. We must raise either premiums or taxes. The figures from the department are very clear. A 20–cent increase in premiums means 30,000 more people will be out of work. The alternative is to ensure that ultimately the system will be fairer to the people it was intended for.

Of course we could bury our heads in the sand and pretend that the deficit does not exist, act like the Liberals did and totally ignore this reality. We might even print more money, as suggested by the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau. Frankly, where does the opposition think that money comes from? The days when we could say that an extra million is no big deal are long gone. But it would seem that the opposition is not aware of that yet.

It is pretty straightforward. Those who quit without just cause, without a good reason, cannot expect to live off the Canadian workers. On the other hand, the unemployment insurance account deficit should not be increased simply because those who voluntarily leave their jobs want to benefit from the safety net put in place for people who lose their jobs for reasons beyond their control.

Last year approximately 225,000 Canadians decided not to work, including 40,000 who were dismissed for misconduct. They have cost the unemployment insurance program nearly $1 billion.

Now let us take a closer look at who does not fall in that category: workers who quit their jobs because of sexual or other harassment, because of dangerous working conditions, because of the obligation to move to another city where their spouse has found work, because of the obligation to care for a member of their immediate family, because of another employment, because of discrimination, significant salary reductions, excessive overtime or refusal to pay for overtime work, significant changes in work duties, antagonistic relations with a supervisor for which they are not primarily responsible, because of illegal or unethical practices on the part of their employer, because of discrimination for belonging to a workers' organization, because of undue pressure to take an early retirement to protect the jobs of co–workers when employers decide to make staff reductions or because of such other reasonable circumstances as are prescribed.

All people who leave their jobs for those reasons are eligible for unemployment insurance. Should a worker have to leave his or her job for any of these reasons, he or she would not be affected by the changes to the legislation because it would be just cause and he or she would collect UI benefits.

The proposed changes would not affect employees who leave their jobs with the consent of their employers to save the jobs of their colleagues when staff reductions must be made.

In the end, what are we left with? There is what we call voluntary departures when an employee quits his or her job without justification, when he or she chooses not to work. That person is no longer entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

• (1645)

Workers dismissed for misconduct will not receive benefits either. Assault and theft are both examples of misconduct. Those are the two groups for which the opposition is prepared to pay benefits. Madam Speaker, think about it: 225,000 applications, $1 billion, debt for those who will follow us, debt to pay people who abuse the system. Does the opposition have so little respect for my children, their children and those who come after us that they want to indebt them and make them bear the burden of a debt that will have to be paid later so that those who abuse the system can profit from it?

How do we know that unemployment insurance officers will make the right decision? That question is also asked. We know they will because they are guided by over 40 years of precedents with unemployment insurance and over 50 years of experience in administering the unemployment insurance program. I think it should also be mentioned that 75 per cent of the officers who deal with beneficiaries and make decisions on applications are women. If a beneficiary does not agree with the officer's decision that he or she quit voluntarily or lost his or her job for misconduct, that person can appeal to an independent board of referees.

Mr. Samson: They can wait two years.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, the member for Timmins—Chapleau says they can wait two years. I think he is somewhat mistaken about the process. The member for Timmins—Chapleau does not seem to know the process. Usually, and it is recognized, the average wait for someone appealing to the unemployment insurance tribunal is two to three months. I suggest that the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau check his figures before saying anything and spreading misinformation.

If the beneficiary does not agree with the decision of the board of referees, an appeal can be made with the umpire. If that is not satisfactory, the beneficiary can go to court, even to the Supreme Court. Think about it. In November 1990, sexual harassment was first introduced in the act. It was not introduced when our Liberal friends were in power. This Conservative government put it in the act. There has not been a single complaint on how employment and immigration handled such applications since then. No appeal has been made to the board of referees.

Unemployment insurance provides temporary help to workers who lost their jobs and are looking for other ones. Unemployment insurance is not an income support system for those who choose to be unemployed. Canadians have long been an adaptable people who keep up with the times. These changes are meant to harmonize the needs of Canadians who work hard for their living and those who want to work.

To slow the skyrocketing increase of the UI account deficit which threatens the system's very viability, we are imposing a freeze for the next two years, not a reduction as the opposition claims. We will be able to show that after April 4. We are freezing the amount of benefits just as we froze our own salaries and public servants' salaries, exactly as many Canadian companies have frozen their employees' salaries. We are all in the same boat. Benefits will not be reduced for those now receiving unemployment insurance. Despite the freeze, Canadians will still have a more generous and fair unemployment insurance plan than what Italy, Great Britain, the United States and many other countries offer their workers.

• (1650)

Finally, we are tackling the unemployment insurance account deficit and, as part of this process, we want to put an end to abuse of this system. In that way we are different from the Liberals who let things go. We are also different from the New Democrats who want to spend money to protect those who abuse the system, while trying to make us believe they want to limit expenditures.

This distinguishes us from the Bloc Quebecois as well. It is taking a stand motivated only by political opportunism. Its members are no longer free to make up their minds independently because they are in the pockets of the likes of Gérald Larose, Fernand Daoust and Lorraine Pagé. It is fine to object, but what alternatives do these people have to offer? None.

We are enabling a greater number of Canadians to retrain and we are sparing no effort to allow them to re-enter the labour force. We are making more funds available to ensure that Canadians who want to work find employment as quickly as possible.

Training and upgrading are one aspect, but the other is job creation. Small businesses are major contributors to both job creation and economic growth. This government recognized that fact in its recent economic statement. New employment incentives were added in the form of a refundable tax credit for small businesses where UI employer premium payments are above the 1992 level.

More than 900,000 Canadian businesses are eligible for this incentive program. These measures will allow small business to create real jobs, increase the number of hours worked by part-time workers or raise their employees' wages. How many workers will benefit from these measures?

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my speaking time is up, but just allow me to add this: Bill C-113 is of necessity based on fairness, job creation and incentive for our small and medium-sized businesses.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, it must be pointed out to the hon. member that many people oppose this bill, not only labour organizations, but also the Quebec Bar Association and the Conseil du patronat, and that goes for both versions of the legislation.

I would like to tell the member what the Quebec bar said: "The total disqualification of a claimant's right to benefit in all cases of unjustified voluntary departure as defined in the legislation, or of dismissal for misconduct would be unrealistic, given the conflicts which occur in labour relations". This opinion is from people who cannot really be suspected of being steadfast allies of the labour unions. I am referring to the Quebec bar and the Conseil du patronat.

I should also tell the hon. member that there have been suggestions. For example, if the government had said that from now on, to be eligible for UI benefits, any claimant would have to take a vocational training course, I think that all of us in this House would have applauded and supported such a reform of the unemployment insurance system. Not only is it not the case, but to be eligible for occupational training one must receive either unemployment insurance or welfare. Those who will be excluded under this reform will get neither.

There are people who will receive no vocational training and this is the main problem with employment, because Canada ranks about 22nd among the 24 members of the OECD in terms of occupational training.

I want to mention two specific cases to the hon. member and then I would like him to comment. Let us consider the case of cheaters. There are cheaters and one of the most frequent forms of cheating is in small business. Small businesses, in collusion with their employees, increase the employees' salaries and then lay them off for lack of work. We are not talking about voluntary departure or misconduct. Then, these people continue to work for the same employer while receiving UI benefits.

• (1655)

The bill does not in any way deal with this type of fraud which is one of the most frequent. A second example—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to remind the hon. member that he was not recognized for debate but for questions and comments, and he has already used up three minutes. I would appreciate it if he finished what he has to say.

After four years the hon. member also ought to know that he should take his seat when the Speaker rises. Thank you.

I strongly suggest that the hon. member finish his comment, give the hon. member who had the floor a chance to respond and let the Chair recognize someone else as well during this 10 minute period.

Mr. Duceppe: I will finish my second question. Take the example of an employee who has been with CIP for 25 years, becomes unemployed and happens to find a job in a small business. After three days, he feels the terms are unacceptable, leaves his job and goes to the unemployment insurance office and is told he is no longer eligible for benefits. Does the hon. member think this person will take a chance finding a job or does he think that person will say that he is not taking any chances, and will take his benefits? These are people who will no longer make the effort.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I will not thank the hon. member for his comments, because it is really incredible when you hear all the misinformation the hon. member has just given here in the House. He just said that the Conseil du patronat and the Quebec Bar Association were opposed to the bill. That is false. The Conseil du patronat expressed reservations when we tabled Bill C-105. I suggest the hon. member have another talk with Mr. Dufour. He would realize that Mr. Dufour, who is the president of the Conseil du patronat, has now expressed his support for Bill C-113, thus acknowledging that we made the necessary amendments in response to his concerns.

As for occupational training, it is targeted to those who are on unemployment insurance. Often, if you want to help these people get back into the labour market quickly, training requirements may be different so they may need extra training. There are thousands of people and as I said in my speech earlier today, over one million Canadians will have access to training courses because we have taken steps to provide the necessary funds to help these workers instead of simply giving them an unemployment insurance cheque.

I would like to answer all his questions, since he had several. The hon. member refers to possible collusion between employers and employees on completing termination forms. I would suggest the hon. member re-read Bill C-21, which provides severe penalties for employers in case of collusion. We have investigators who are constantly on the job. Last year, more than $280 million was recovered by investigators in cases of collusion and fraud.

As for the CIP worker who had worked for 25 years, I must say these points have already been raised. In this particular case I would suggest the hon. member take another look at Bill C-113 because it contains certain adjustments that deal with the type of case the hon. member just mentioned.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, what really surprises me in the speech made by the hon. member for Terrebonne is his insensitivity and lack of understanding of the issue. The hon. member essentially tries to interpret everything regarding the unemployment problem. We know that the unemployment insurance officer makes the final decision. This officer interprets the law and is both judge and jury. This, in my opinion, is a major flaw.

• (1700)

I want to ask the member for Terrebonne how he can guarantee fairness, understanding and sensitivity to the workers when the form which must be filled out to indicate why a person is leaving his or her job is completed and signed by the employer. The employee has no say in the process. He cannot see the form which is then sent to the unemployment insurance officer who, as I said, becomes both judge and jury. The employee who surely quit his job for a good reason is a victim in this process.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, which is much more interesting than the one from his colleague in the Bloc Quebecois.

I would point out to my colleague from the Liberal Party that it is totally wrong to claim that the officer who will deal with the case will simply base his decision on the employer's version as given in the termination of employment form. If my colleague bothers to check his documents and Bill C-113, he will see that from now on the unemployment insurance officer will have to take into account the written versions of both the employer and the employee. If the officer really cannot decide on the basis of these two versions, the employee will get the benefit of the doubt and that is clearly stated. I conclude by saying that it is insensitive to let the deficit of the unemployment insurance fund grow and put in debt those who will follow us.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa-West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak against Bill C-113. I will begin with this question: What is the situation in Canada during this long, cold winter of 1993? What is the reality which Canadian workers face? The reality is that 1.6 million people are without a job. More than two million people must rely on social assistance to survive and feed their families. There are some five million Canadians who suffer from high unemployment and the lack of jobs in our country, one of the richest in the world.

[English]

In light of the desperate situation for over five million Canadians what does this government want to do? It wants to make life harder for those living through this hard and miserable winter without a job. It wants to say to them that if they lose their jobs through no fault of their own it will be cutting the already miserable income they have to live on to pay their municipal taxes, pay their mortgage, pay their rent and buy food and clothing for their children. It is doing more than that. It is telling them that if they quit their jobs it must be their fault.

I would like to ask people on the other side of the House who have very generous salaries, as I do, if they really think that someone earning $18,000, $20,000, $25,000 a year is going to voluntarily quit a job to earn half that amount of money on UI. Do they honestly think someone earning that kind of a salary is going to quit a job and wait between two and three months to have any income whatsoever? Do they think Canadians believe that?

• (1705)

We all know that any system is going to have a few people who are going to take advantage of it. The members opposite who are bringing in this bill know how very small that number is. However, to change a whole system to punish those who are simply trying to survive this recession in Canada is unjust.

Obviously the government has forgotten the purpose of the unemployment insurance plan. Yes, it is to help workers through difficult times, but that is only part of it. Part of the reason for helping workers through difficult times is so when times get better—hopefully they are getting better now or are starting to get better—those people are still in their communities to work on the jobs that come back when the recession is over.

That is why this plan relies on the contributions of both employers and employees because it benefits both. It also helps communities. One of the big reasons for bringing in unemployment insurance after the Second World War was to avoid the tremendous disruption that happened not only to families and individuals but to communities across this country. Small towns and villages and rural communities across Canada were emptied out as people hit the rails looking for any kind of work anywhere they could find it. Businesses were robbed of their customer bases and closed down. Families broke up. Communities fell apart never to come back again.

We have an unemployment insurance scheme to help workers through tough times, help employers retain their employment bases for when the jobs come back and prevent the destruction of communities and families.

I had the privilege during the debate on Bill C-21, which was the previous round of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, to travel across Canada to listen to seasonal workers, women workers, transitory workers, people in the construction industry and people from all parts of this country. They talked about what the unemployment insurance scheme has meant to them and their families over the years. The unemployment situation was not nearly as bad then as it is now, but it was a matter of survival.

We have a country where it is cold and dark for a good part of the year. That means there are a lot of jobs that simply disappear for the winter. There are other jobs that simply disappear for the summer. For many people in many fields of endeavour, 12 months of work is simply not possible in this country.

There was an interview this morning about the construction industry and whether people who are out of work for the winter in this industry really should not be transferring to some other kind of work. I do not think the construction companies that want those employees there when the jobs come back really think that is a terrific idea, but they also know one cannot pour concrete in the middle of winter and one cannot lay asphalt.

The reality of Canada is that we are always going to have those periods when there are no jobs.

I want to talk briefly about harassment because I doubt very much that the people on the other side who are supporting this bill really understand what a woman experiences. They do not know how difficult it is for her to deal with in the work place, decide that she will sacrifice the economic well-being of her family to protect her dignity by quitting her job and then have to prove she was harassed before she can collect unemployment insurance.

• (1710)

The minister talked about training for employees who have to deal with claims of harassment in the work place, but did not talk about training for the referees who will make the final decisions.

As I look through the close to 200 appointments that have been made by the Prime Minister and cabinet in the last couple of months and I look at the appointments to the boards of referees under the unemployment insurance scheme, I see very few women's names among them.

We heard talk about how the unemployment insurance fund is in such a mess because of training. The unemployment insurance fund is not in a mess because of training. It is because this government chose to give up its responsibilities to train people and retrain them. Instead, it has forced employees, the unemployed and employers to pay for training.

It wants Canadians to forget that it cut $750 million for training at a time when we needed to be more competitive and productive. It increased unemployment insurance fees by over 30 per cent. It increased the burden on small businesses that are barely hanging on by their teeth.

Now it is saying to those same people who have seen their contributions to the unemployment insurance scheme increased dramatically along with decreased access and decreased benefits: "We are going to cut you off even further". It is a cruel and inhumane way to deal with Canadians in this harsh winter of 1993.

I want to go to the other part of the bill that deals with the freeze on Public Service wages. I want to remind the House that by the time this bill has run its course, for three out of four years, the quarter of a million people who work for the people of Canada will have had no salary increase.

That is on top of a decade of declining real income for the Public Service of Canada. This is a pattern where federal Public Service employees have consistently taken less than the rate of inflation, less than the private sector and less than the rest of the public sector in wage increases. They therefore have seen their real income decline dramatically.

What is the reward for trying to be part of the solution in this country? It is another two years of no salary increase. It is fine for the member for Terrebonne to get up and talk about how members of Parliament are not getting an increase and how judges are not getting an increase. We do not need all of our salary to pay for the essentials of life.

Let me tell you about some of the people who work for the Public Service of Canada because that is where this government made its big mistake. It forced its largest union in the Public Service into a strike two years ago.

That let Canadians see that we have a lot of people working for them and earning very little money. We have people working for the Government of Canada and the people of Canada risking their lives as rescue workers as part of crews on ships for less than $20,000 a year.

We have over one-quarter of the Public Service of Canada earning less than $30,000 a year at a time when the National Council on Welfare says the poverty line for a family of four is more than $30,000.

I suspect that if this legislation were challenged before the Human Rights Commission it would be struck down as contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because close to 70 per cent of the people earning less than $30,000 while working for the Government of Canada are women.

A bill that freezes wages and gives nothing to those at the lowest level who are already spending every cent of their salaries on the necessities of life puts people further into poverty. It hits those in the lowest income brackets the hardest.

• (1715)

The history of this government has been to hit hardest those who have the least. When we impose increases in the unemployment insurance scheme they only apply to salaries under a certain limit. When we impose increases in Canada Pension Plan contributions they only apply to salaries under a certain limit. Those earning more than that and who are already better off do not have to pay that extra penalty.

After three years of zero increase at a time when the federal government is also downsizing we are forcing people into permanent retirement for which they have worked and saved that is going to be more difficult than it needs to be. With retirement incomes based on the last six years of employment and earnings we are saying to people that for four out of those six years they are going to have an average of less than a 1.5 per cent increase. Their pensions for the rest of their retirement will be reduced by that amount.

Is that fair when the government says we are getting rid of tens of thousands of Public Service employees and forcing them onto pensions, unemployment insurance or the welfare rolls? We are forcing them onto pensions before they are ready to retire and we are also going to penalize them a second time by making sure their pension is calculated on wages that have been frozen for three years.

This government was criticized by the Public Service Staff Relations Board for bad faith bargaining when it did this two years ago. It was condemned by conciliation board reports at that time for bargaining in bad faith. Barely two months ago the International Labour Organization, a member body of the United Nations composed of employers, employees and government representatives chastised the Government of Canada for its failure to bargain with its employees.

I want to conclude with a statement from the Conference Board of Canada which clearly describes the economic measures in this bill and in the December mini budget statement by the Minister of Finance. It says: "The over-all impact of the measures will be slightly contradictory, lowering real GDP growth by roughly 1.1 per cent in 1992 and .2 per cent in 1993".

In other words, the recovery we are hoping for this year will be diminished by 10 per cent. Why do I tie that directly to this bill? I do so because the Conference Board of Canada said that consumer spending will be hardest hit as the most important cost-saving measures were cuts in unemployment insurance benefits and a freeze on Public Service wages. Those are exactly the two issues we are dealing with in this bill that is before the House today.

Contradictory and counterproductive is how the Conference of Board of Canada described these measures. It also went on to say: "Further, given the pressure on provincial government finances, partly caused by this government's cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, ceilings on transfer payments and increased dumping of people who are out of a job onto the welfare system, not the UI system"—and we see it happening again today—"if wage freezes are also imposed at the provincial level, and particularly if they extend into the schools and hospitals, this would again further substantially reduce purchasing power in 1993 generating lower growth than is currently forecast".

At a time when the people of Canada are trying to come out of a recession and are trying to reduce the more than five million Canadian men, women and children who are suffering the effects of unemployment, this government is introducing budget measures to dampen that recovery. We will be voting against this bill and I encourage others to do so as well.

• (1720)

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Clause 17 in part IV of Bill C-113 says "an amount equal to 57 per cent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings". We know that if someone earns $500 gross per week, 60 per cent of that is $300. As of April 4, the same person earning $500, with a 57 per cent rate will, according to the chart that I have, receive $285.

Can the hon. member tell me if it is acceptable that a man who has a wife and four children will now lose $60 per month of his purchasing power? Does the member agree with this bill and the rate going from 60 to 57 per cent, especially in the case of a family?

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I believe I clearly indicated I do not agree with this legislation.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa West, who is the Liberal critic for the Public Service. I have the honour of being her assistant on this issue. She always shows sensitivity toward civil servants, something I have seldom seen from the present federal government.

The member for Ottawa West referred to the insufficient salary increases and the detrimental effect this could have on the economy in general and on families in particular. A chart shows that over a four-year period, salaries in the private sector have increased by an average of 3 per cent while the salaries of public servants have gone up by an average of 0.75 per cent per year. On average, salaries in the private sector have increased 400 per cent more than in the Public Service.

I would like to give my colleague from Ottawa West an opportunity to comment on the fact that there seems to be a double standard. On the one hand, the government appears to want to help major companies and on the other hand, it takes advantage of its employees and uses them to supposedly control the national debt.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, in the time I have been in the House the national deficit has been used by this government as an excuse for literally every measure it has undertaken. It is punitive and it hits those with the least income who are least able to pay the freight.

I have now sat through four budgets and what do I see? I see a debt that keeps increasing. I see the amount we are paying in interest that keeps growing.

In my view what the economy needs is more jobs. Quite simply, that is why we have an unemployment insurance scheme that is overspent. It is why we have a social insurance system that is costing us more and more. It is because people do not have jobs.

The government seems to have a hard time comprehending that if people have jobs they do not need unemployment insurance and they do not need social welfare. In fact they pay income taxes. They go out and buy goods and services that create profits for small, medium and large businesses. That creates jobs for other Canadians who can then stop claiming unemployment insurance or drawing welfare and start paying income taxes and buying goods and services that create jobs for other Canadians. It seems to me that is the kind of upward spiral that would bring some sense of hope back to this country and to families and individuals in this country.

• (1725)

I did mention there has been a pattern of wage settlements in the Public Service of Canada that have been consistently less than what the private sector is getting, less than other areas of the public sector are getting, municipalities, provinces, hospitals, schools and so on, less than the rate of inflation.

Public Service employees have done their share of trying to contain government spending when it comes to sitting down at the bargaining table. All they ask for is the right to sit down at the bargaining table. They have done their share, have shown they are prepared to do it and they are prepared to do it again.

What do they get instead? What do they get for their willingness to be part of the solution? They get another two years of wage freeze. That is not fair. That is not the kind of thing that encourages Public Service employees to regard themselves as partners with government in running this country, that encourages them to be productive and contribute to the country.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Ottawa West for her speech. I think she did a very good job and she raised quite a few excellent points.

There is one thing I would like to ask the member. Over the last three weeks or so we have been asking the minister of employment over and over again to give us some statistics to prove that all these people he claims have quit their jobs are loafing around and taking advantage of the system are actual people. We have asked him time and time again to give us the proof, the numbers and the statistics. He has continuously said: "Ask for it on the Order Paper". He has done all kinds of neat little things in the House to avoid the question.

I would like to ask the member a question. We are speaking on the hoist motion of six months that her party has put forward on this particular piece of legislation. Given that in 1989 the Auditor General clearly identified severe inconsistencies across the country on the application of UI penalties and the application of UI legislation, is it far beyond the time for the Auditor General to now do a thorough investigation, paying particular attention to the quits and fireds, as it pertains to this new legislation?

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I think we have to look at two things. For people to do their job well there have to be the human resources. One area of government that has been hardest hit is the employment offices of Canada Employment and Immigration. People in those offices are frustrated because they are working long hours of overtime, often under very difficult conditions. They are dealing with people who do not have jobs, who are desperate, terrified, crying and who wonder how they are going to support their families. They are working under a great deal of strain. The number of people employed has dropped. They are no longer able to help unemployed people find jobs. They can only be processors of applications and advise people to take a look at the job board.

It is no wonder people who are unemployed are having greater difficulty accessing training and services they used to get in terms of finding new employment. The number, as I said, of cheaters in the system is so small that to administer the system to catch every one of them would cost many times more than the amount of money saved.

• (1730)

I do not know whether the Auditor General knows, but if the government knows there are cheaters in the system it should be doing something about them. It should be providing the resources in the department to do something about them rather than punishing those who it says are choosing to quit their jobs.

It is the most ridiculous statement I ever heard.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I have listened very carefully and I have to say that all of us have heard a lot of nonsense spoken in this House and, indeed, outside this House recently concerning these proposed amendments to the UI act.

We have been told that workers are going to be at the mercy of their employers, that employers can use certain clauses to punish the employees, even to curtail legitimate union activities, that under the changes fired workers will have to prove they were not fired for misconduct.

Members of the opposition have conjured up the spectre of people who say they have left a job to escape sexual harassment being subjected to some sort of humiliating public inquiry. We have heard that the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission staff is going to try to deny benefits to claimants who left their jobs with just cause.

We have been told the government is attacking the unemployed and proposing to cut people off UI.

The members of the opposition are frightening Canadians with inflammatory rhetoric in an effort to score cheap political points. That is not what this bill is doing and that is not what we are doing.

Let us look behind the facts, behind all smoke-screen and see how Bill C-113 works. It works to provide a fairer, more equitable unemployment insurance system for all Canadians. The government proposes to eliminate UI benefits to voluntary quitters. That means people who choose not to work will not be eligible for UI benefits. It is as simple as that. I ask the members of the opposition to explain in plain English, in plain French, in plain language just why people who quit work for no good reason or who are unemployed because of their own misconduct should be supported by the working Canadians and the employers. I ask them.

Let us not pretend that some people do not take advantage of the UI system working only as long as it takes to accumulate the minimum number of weeks to file and then quitting. It is happening and everybody knows it is happening. All we have to do is look at the numbers.

Last year the UI system spent almost $1 billion to support 225,000 people who decided either not to work or were fired for misconduct. Even though they do make up a small percentage of the total claims, they are making a big dent in that UI account. That $1 billion could be used to reduce the deficit in the UI account.

Perhaps members in the opposition will explain to Canadians why the entire UI system should be jeopardized so voluntary quitters can have a comfortable holiday.

Before members start telling me that in these times no one quits their job because they want to, let me clarify. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand people quit their jobs without just cause. There was no sexual harassment, no discrimination and no responsibility to look after a sick child, no reference to any of the 40 reasons to quit a job with cause. That is 225,000 people who just plain quit, despite the economy.

• (1735)

No one who has an interruption of earnings through no fault of his or her own has anything to worry about with regard to these changes. The term just cause was defined in the UI act to protect the workers who have legitimate reasons to leave their employment. The act already lists five reasons that constitute just cause.

Bill C-113 proposes eight additional reasons to be incorporated into the legislation. If you quit your job because you have been sexually harassed, are facing discrimination or hazardous working conditions, followed your spouse to another city or these needed to take care of a child or any other invalid, these are just causes and you will have access to UI. It is that simple. You have quit with just cause.

Members opposite should have known this before December 2. If they did not, they are going to know it now.

What about the people who thought they had just cause even before the system said they did not? Before Bill C-113, if a Canada Employment Centre agent determined that you quit without just cause or you were dismissed for misconduct and you disagreed, you could appeal to an independent board of referees. That still remains.

After Bill C-113 you will still have the right to appeal the decision. In fact, the bill before us will strengthen the protection provided to Canadians who appeal an insurance agent's decision. The bill gives the chairperson of the board of referees the authority to take the steps necessary to protect the privacy of harassment victims.

Let us look at some of the common misconceptions about the impact of the proposed changes. We have heard it said that employers will have greater power over the workers. First of all, the Canada Employment Centre staff members do not make decisions based solely on information provided by the employer. They try to obtain all the necessary facts from all the appropriate sources, including the claimant. They collect all the pertinent information available and make the decision based on the credibility of the statements and the testimony. If employee versions are dramatically different and no evidence is found to tip the balance one way or the other, they give the benefit of the doubt to the claimant.

The Canada Employment Centre staff's responsibility is to find out why someone quit and to determine whether it was a reasonable thing to do under the circumstances, in other words, whether the claimant had just cause.

Where sexual harassment is alleged, neither the claimant nor the employer will be subjected to intensive, possibly even distasteful questioning. Here again the benefit of the doubt will go to the claimant.

Some people have argued that there are legitimate reasons for leaving a job, other than those set down in the UI act. That is so. Other reasons are and will continue to be considered on the basis of their merit. They have also argued that Canadians should not be penalized from receiving benefits if they leave a job in order to preserve the job of other co-workers. We agree on that one. That is why workers who leave jobs to preserve the jobs of their co-workers as part of the work force reduction plan program will be eligible for UI benefits.

• (1740)

Since the Minister of Finance made his economic statement, some critics have alleged that the changes deny some workers their right to UI benefits. Let us remember that unemployment insurance benefits are not a right. They are insurance. They are insurance against, in most cases, the involuntary loss of a job. Unemployment insurance is designed to provide temporary help for workers who have lost their jobs. UI provides the income support they need while they look for new jobs. It should not be an income support system for people who choose unemployment. After all, no one expects to be able to deliberately burn down his or her house and then collect the insurance. Why should anyone expect to deliberately quit his or her job and collect unemployment insurance?

Would the members opposite suggest that a farmer who burns his fields and then asks for crop insurance should get it? I do not think so. As for the charge that the Canadian Employment Centre staff would actually try to deny benefits to claimants with just cause is an insult to those dedicated professionals who staff these positions right across our country.

Their job is to collect the pertinent information from all sources and make the decision. They are trained to understand the difficulties faced by the unemployed workers and to respond to the claimant as a human being rather than as a claim being processed.

Before the proposed changes go into effect the Canada Employment Centre will conduct staff orientation sessions to increase the awareness among the staff, particularly in the area of sexual harassment. These orientation sessions will be prepared with the participation of the status of women. We look forward to its input.

Specific training will now include how to process claims under the new legislation, how to focus on the relevant facts of each particular situation, how to apply the principles and practices of adjudication and how to evaluate information when making the decision.

Why is the government proposing these changes? I think it is obvious. UI was set up to provide people who lose their jobs through no fault of their own with a temporary income while they look for work.

Employees and employers fund the UI program by paying premiums. However, the premiums being collected no longer cover all the claims for UI benefits. From a $2.2 billion surplus in 1990, the UI account has gone to a $4.5 billion deficit. Even with these proposed changes, it is estimated that the UI account will be $7.5 billion in the red by the end of this year. Without the changes, it is projected that the account would be $8.5 billion in the red.

It is obvious to most Canadians, if not to the opposition, that something has to be done to staunch this flood of red ink. There are only two ways to tackle this issue, raise the premiums or cap the expenditures. That is our choice.

Premiums have already gone up by one-third in the last 18 months. Raising them again would put an unduly heavy burden on the employees and employers. That leaves capping the expenditures the government chooses to do by freezing benefits for new claimants and eliminating benefits for voluntary quitters and those who are fired for misconduct. These changes will reduce the UI deficit without raising the premiums.

• (1745)

Of course amid all the partisan criticism and hysteria there has been no mention of the government's training and job creation initiatives aimed at getting those people who are unemployed back into the work force as quickly as possible. In fact, the government's first priority is to get people back into the work force while helping those who are seeking jobs.

We are spending $3.8 billion on retraining so workers can learn the skills they need in today's work place. Using a period of unemployment to upgrade workers' skills is absolutely necessary. It is going to provide that worker with better skills suited to help him or her find a job in the market and help him or her get a stable, long-term job.

UI training programs offer more than an income between jobs; they offer a future. In total, more than one million Canadians are going to benefit from the skills training and retraining. This is the best way to help—and I have heard them speak of it—the unemployed people get back into the work force. That is $3.8 billion for training and retraining. Getting people back into the work force is an effective way of cutting the UI deficit.

In 1993, $2.2 billion will be spent in developmental uses funds under the UI Act to help UI recipients get back into the work force. An estimated 530,000 UI claimants are eligible for these programs. Spending on these programs is up nearly $260 million from 1992. That is almost five times higher than it was for training programs for the unemployed in 1990.

These programs will give displaced workers quick access to training and other re-employment opportunities.

The government has also increased the self-employment assistance budget from $25 million to $100 million. It has set aside $300 million to assist displaced, experienced workers who suddenly find themselves out of a job after working for many years. To help avoid lay-offs, the government has dedicated $130 million to the work-sharing program. This is done by shortening the work week by one to three days and paying reduced wages. For the days not worked, the workers draw a normal UI benefit.

Through the job creation program, the government helps unemployed workers get back into the work force by maintaining and enhancing their skills while receiving UI benefits when other employment is not available. We have seen a great use for this job creation program. I have been in the UI employment centre office at Centre 70 in Calgary. I must say that while one would always like more funding to be put into the system, what is there is being used extremely successfully.

I have to say that far from attacking the unemployed, this government is attacking unemployment at the root. We all know that Canada is going through a difficult transition and we are adjusting to changes in the global economy. It is not just here in Canada but south of the border in the U.S., in England, in France, in Germany, in Spain, in Sweden and even in Japan. Nobody wishes this on anyone.

We need every Canadian worker to continue working.

• (1750)

We need every Canadian worker to contribute to the economy unless he or she has a valid reason for leaving the job. We know we have to equip our work force with the skills needed to meet the demands of the new technology, and technology is changing.

This is only the first of the changes we really must undergo. I hope the Leader of the Opposition can forgive me for borrowing one of President Clinton's lines, but it is time we became a nation of producers rather than a nation of consumers.

It is time we recognized once again the value of work and the personal and economic freedom that a job brings. It is time we recognized the contribution each job makes to the national economy and the well-being of our nation. When we have people working we have a nation that is flourishing. It is time we stopped paying people who choose to be unemployed.

Canada does stand at the crossroads. If we do not sharpen our competitive edge we may lose the comfortable standard of living Canadians now take for granted. The government is not going to sit on the sidelines and it is not going to mislead Canadians. We are getting Canada ready to compete in the new global economy of the 21st century.

The hon. members opposite cannot lead, so what way are we going to go? Will they get in the way or will they follow Canadians to build a common prosperous future together? When we are all working we can maintain our standard of living and the social safety net and social services for those people who really need them.

We should not pay people who voluntarily quit, but we will help people who quit for just cause.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the rhetoric of the member for Calgary Southwest.

I am absolutely stunned by some of the things this member is trying to make Canadians believe. It is absolutely incredible that this member would stand in this House and try to tell us that 225,000 people in this country voluntarily quit with absolutely no just cause simply because they wanted to sit at home and become couch potatoes.

She cannot give us the evidence. She cannot show us in detail the number of people who quit with just cause, who cite sexual harassment, who want to move with their spouse, or who want to attend a sick child. She does not have those figures. She cannot tell us how many of those people appealed the decision to end their benefits, won, and then had those decisions reversed and overturned. She cannot give us any of those figures, yet she has the nerve to stand in this House and try to tell us that these people have to pay their share to get the deficit reduced. This is absolutely incredible.

The member misses the point that there are severe flaws in the system as it exists today. This legislation does absolutely nothing to rectify any of those flaws. It does nothing to rectify the inconsistencies in the decisions being made across this country. It does absolutely nothing to put people back to work.

I would like to ask the minister to give me the figures to prove that 225,000 people are quitting without just cause. It is absolutely absurd and she does not have those figures. I would like to ask her to prove her statement.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned in my address, there are 225,000 people in Canada who quit their jobs voluntarily. There was no just cause. It cost the employees and the employers $1 billion from the UI fund. These people did not have just cause, of which there are 40 areas listed. Why did they quit? They quit for no reason at all.

• (1755)

An hon. member: Not true.

Mrs. Sparrow: They had worked their entrance time. That is 225,000 people.

I spent quite a bit of time in the UI centre in my riding. I went in there to deliberately speak to the Canada Employment Centre staff. I have to say the staff members at Centre 70 in Calgary are superb. They go out of their way to assist people. They hear the claims from both the worker and the employee. Indeed, if there is any benefit of doubt I can assure you the ruling is in favour of the claimant.

One thing we have to realize is that anybody who quits because of sexual harassment, which the member mentioned, anybody who quits because they have a sick child to take care of, anybody who quits because their spouse has been moved, anybody who quits due to racial discrimination will be able to collect UI. They will be able to prove it. Now, do not fool Canadians.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker my question is for the member for Calgary Southwest.

I had the pleasure this morning of meeting the building and construction trades representative, Guy Dumoulin, who informed me the government did not approach the building trades of construction to ask their opinion or for any suggestions or recommendations on this bill. He deplores the fact that the government has no sensitivity toward construction workers.

I would like to ask the member for Calgary Southwest to comment on the following statement: Construction workers often leave employment near the end of a job and go through their union hiring hall to get better work prospects with another contractor. The worker leaves a job on Friday to work elsewhere on Monday. On Monday the truck does not show up, the builder goes bankrupt or the new employer found someone else. This happens all the time. The new job does not appear. How does the worker prove the case before winning the benefits? The first employer says the worker quit and the would-be employer perhaps cannot even be found or denies the story. We would hope the hiring hall would be believed but in some cases a hiring hall would not be involved. Finally, Bill C-113 may stop construction workers from taking the chance of a few extra weeks of work with another employer. Bill C-113 will hurt the construction worker's mobility and advancement.

The director of the building and constructions trade, Guy Dumoulin, has brought to my attention the question of mobility and advancement. I would ask the member for Calgary Southwest to respond to that.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, indeed every job is very important. Construction workers are very important right across this country. None of us would deny that.

UI was designed to help people who lose their jobs through no fault of their own. It helps them temporarily while they look or now train, and there are training programs, for other work.

This particular bill says if you quit your job voluntarily without just cause, the employees of Canada are not going to subsidize you or pay you to sit at home.

An hon. member: Right on, Bobbie.

Mrs. Sparrow: We cannot afford it. Furthermore, the UI program was not set up for that. As a matter of fact I think if you wanted to take time to check with a couple of UI offices, all you would have to do is make a few phone calls. You can make one to Halifax, one in Quebec, one in Ontario and one in B.C. You can find out the abuse that is in the system.

• (1800)

The UI account exists to assist people who lose their jobs through no fault of their own. We have a choice. We either increase the premiums, which puts pressure on the employers and the employees, or we start going after people who abuse the system.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am sharing my time with the member for Mission—Coquitlam today.

I am rising to speak on Bill C-113, which has three basic elements. The first element will freeze salary increases for cabinet, government officials, members and so on. The second will make some changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The third element, which I will be speaking on as well, will make some changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act, which is an effort by this government to back off from the commitment into perpetuity to the Crow benefit.

I would like to start by discussing the unemployment insurance changes. Essentially the government is proposing to take away the current safety net of a waiting period from 7 to 12 weeks that now exists for those people whose leaving of an employer is in some question. If an employee leaves for what he or she thinks is just cause or for the prospect of another job that does not materialize then the waiting period is from 7 to 12 weeks. If employees leave because they feel they are being sexually harassed they only have to wait from 7 to 12 weeks for unemployment insurance to cut in if they have been unable to find a replacement job.

We have just heard the member from Calgary talk about how this system is being abused. I wanted to spend a few minutes discussing a couple of cases I have had brought to my attention over the past year in which the employees quit for what they thought was just cause, and what I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, would think was just cause, but was not considered by the current rules to be just cause. While they only had to wait 12 weeks before the unemployment insurance would come into effect, in each of these cases they did get a job before that happened. However, with the 7 to 12 week safety net being removed with this proposal they would not be eligible for unemployment insurance.

The kinds of situations raised under the rubric of just cause include the following situation. A young man who had been cross-country trucking for 10 years from coast to coast all across North America recently shifted jobs to a smaller company. While he could survive in the summertime with the equipment, he found that as the roads got worse the equipment was less able to handle the icy, rough conditions of winter. He began to have brake failures. The heater did not work in his cab. He complained to his employer who said: "In the 1950s we never drove with heaters. Just put on some more clothes". So he did but the brakes did not get better. He began to find that the brakes were not adequate.

The rule of the road is that a driver of a truck that does not pass the road test, a spot test by the traffic board, is responsible for having that truck fixed before he moves it even if he is driving for someone else. He also must wait without pay until that truck is fixed. His employer expects him to have the load arrive at the destination so the driver is responsible for making that truck go. He is also responsible when he takes the vehicle out of the yard in the first place to make sure it is safe to be put on the road. When it was not he refused to drive it and the employer said: "You have quit and you are fired".

The employer gets to fill in the papers explaining the separation and he said: "This man quit". That man is now no longer eligible for unemployment insurance. The system does not permit the employee to file a reason for leaving the employment, only the employer's side is heard.

• (1805)

Under the new rules this person would be without any unemployment insurance even though he had been driving for 10 years and had been contributing all of that time to the fund.

A second separation involved a two-man crew with one man as the boss, the other man as the worker. The person who was in charge of the crew, of the drilling rig and the seismic operation got very drunk and was having problems with drugs. They arrive late because the foreman did not get up on time. They found that the truck, which had been left running overnight at the drill site had run out of fuel.

To indicate his level of competence on this particular day, he began ripping off fuel lines, allegedly to drain the air out of the system. Instead of pulling off fuel lines, he pulled out transmission and brake lines. This is how adept he was at his job on that particular day.

The other worker, who was going to have to handle dynamite with this man in a few minutes when they got the rig going, decide that he was not going to work with him on that day. The report shows that this man quit and he was denied unemployment insurance. There was no way that he could prove just cause because it was his word against the foreman's. Again there was no opportunity for the employee to provide his side of the story.

The rules are unbalanced now. The 7 to 12 weeks are a safety net for people to be kept off the welfare rolls. The changes in this bill will hasten the number of people going on welfare because they will be denied the unemployment benefits they have been paying into for all these years. The system does not permit a fair adjudication of the reasons for leaving their employment.

The government's regulations and instructions to the offices increase its image of hypocrisy among the users of unemployment insurance because of some strange things that go on with the literacy program.

The government says it is improving literacy and trying to train people to be able to read and write and go on to further training. Yet I have numerous examples in my riding of people in their early twenties who decide they probably should complete high school so they can go for further training. They are unable to get approval from the unemployment insurance system to take these upgrading courses.

They have access to a high school in their community. In order to go to a community college or a night course, they will have to drive 150 miles one way. So they enrol at the local high school to complete their grade 12 and are immediately cut off unemployment insurance. They no longer have any money to pay their rent or buy groceries so they have to quit school and go back to seeking employment.

It is a dead-end proposition. It is certainly no way to fight illiteracy if there are rules that do not encourage people to go back and get the kind of training they need.

For the balance of my time I want to turn to the proposed cut of 10 per cent to the Western Grain Transportation Act. This means $72 million less to the railways which will come out of farmers' pockets next year. The year after it will be $104 million. In my district, this means $2.80 a tonne more that farmers will pay because the government is backing off from its long-standing commitment which goes back to 1897 that this assistance would be there in perpetuity.

It shows the government's commitment is not that long-standing. It shows a breach of faith and it shows that this government does not really care about farm incomes. Farm incomes in Saskatchewan are the lowest they have been since 1938 in real terms. This government has decided in the face of those facts to cause them to pay an increased bill for freight in the coming year. It will mean a net loss of 8 to 10 cents a bushel, depending on the kind of grain grown.

• (1810)

This is unacceptable and I ask the government to reconsider because it is not consistent with its rhetoric when the Liberals were changing the Crow rate. It is not consistent with its alleged concern about farmers and farm income and it is not consistent with trying to keep rural communities viable. This is a proposal that will take more than $40 million out of the net income of Saskatchewan farmers in the coming crop year and it is simply not an acceptable action on the part of the government.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am really very sorry that the hon. member who spoke from the government bench prior to my colleague has left the Chamber because I think it would have been important for her to hear. I was anxious to ask her a question or at least put forward a question to the government. Possibly there are other members of the government who will take this question back to the minister responsible.

I am referring to the parts of Bill C-113 which refer to discharge. These are the unemployment insurance amendments that are in the bill. I had hoped the government member could have explained to us the meaning of the terms "discharged", "terminated", "dispensed with", and "severed". They are quite different. The interpretations under jurisprudence and industrial relations are quite different. Yet the act refers to discharge.

I was hoping the member could also talk about or explain the difference between culpable discharge and non-culpable discharge, in termination. It is important that this be raised because it is my understanding culpable discharge is when the employer has reasonable grounds to discharge an employee for his or her behaviour which he or she has control of. There are many examples in jurisprudence and arbitration of culpable discharge.

On the other hand, non-culpable discharge or termination primarily deals with the conduct of an employee over which he or she has no control, such as sickness which results in absenteeism from work, disability of too long a duration which may include alcohol or drug-related illnesses. The issue of non-culpable behaviour is subject to a form of punitive measure and usually is resolved in favour of the employer if the individual is unable to prove he or she can live up to his or her employer's expectations and continue to work on a regular basis.

The tests that are used in jurisprudence and in the whole industrial relations process in this country are not going to be in place under the UI act. In fact workers will not have the jurisprudence that is provided under industrial relations for proving his or her case under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

These amendments wipe out any existing jurisprudence that might have been used in the past to determine just cause, to provide a worker with some kind of jurisprudence to rely on, to build his or her argument. In fact these three amendments are worse than they were under the bill which is being superseded and was withdrawn from the House.

There was reference by the hon. member to the 40 reasons for quitting that were put forward by the Prime Minister. Those 40 reasons to quit without jurisprudence are no longer as straightforward as they first appeared to be. In fact I would suggest that if the backbenchers from Quebec who were taking umbrage with this bill are mollified by these amendments then they are being taken for a ride. Quite frankly these amendments are worse than what the government put forward in the first place.

My colleague, the New Democrat critic on unemployment insurance raised the question with the government about statistics. He said that we needed some kind of proof. Could the government not provide us with some kind of proof or evidence about the statistics that are being so carelessly thrown around here?

• (1815)

No, there has been no proof provided. The hon. member has been told to put a question on the Order Paper. With 45 days to answer, this bill will be locked in a dusty vault somewhere having been passed by the other place by the time anyone tries to answer the hon. member's question.

I would suggest that there are half a million people affected. There are 250,000 who will be penalized for quitting, approximately 38,000 who will be fired and penalized; and 100,000 to 200,000—nobody is sure—who have been or will be quit and not penalized. No one knows why or how many, who has or has not qualified, who will or will not qualify. I ask everyone to think about that.

If the Department of Supply and Services had a $2 billion expenditure for which it could not provide vouchers, I would suggest that the Auditor General would be called in immediately to undertake an investigation of the spending of $2 billion without verification. However, we have 500,000 people who draw unemployment insurance with an average benefit of maybe $250 a week times 26 weeks. That is $6,500 per person times 500,000 people. That is $3.2 billion in benefits and we do not know the reasons those people have been qualified or disqualified.

For example, suppose we placed an order for Bell helicopters that cost $4 billion. That is causing no end of controversy right now in this very House. If we did not provide vouchers for that but just spent the $4 billion, the Auditor General might have something to say about it.

The Prime Minister says there are 40 reasons to be disqualified. The government cannot produce one figure to explain that much less give us justification, having verified it with figures, why we need this policy shift.

Instead of bringing in these amendments the government should be going to the Auditor General and demanding an internal investigation if nobody can provide figures for $3.2 billion worth of expenditures.

My colleagues have said very adequately what needs to be said with regard to unemployment insurance. I wanted to add that part.

In the time remaining to me I want to zero in on another part of Bill C-113 and that is the amendments to the Public Sector Compensation Act.

This part of the bill freezes the wages of federal public sector workers for two years. It also extends existing collective agreements for a period of two years. The effect is to push public sector workers even further behind their counterparts in the private sector. Most important, it relieves the government of any responsibility to negotiate with its employees for another two years.

The bill once again demonstrates total contempt for the collective bargaining process in this country. It flies in the face of a decision of the International Labour Organization only last November. It is one of 90 decisions that have been found against Canadian governments for failure to protect the collective bargaining process for its workers.

The committee of the ILO urged the government to revert "to the normal system of free collective bargaining established by the Public Service Staff Relations Act and in particular, to a truly independent arbitration system". However, following that decision this government is introducing yet another piece of legislation that freezes wages with no consideration for the free collective bargaining process. It is absolutely critical that this government begin to bargain and not to abandon bargaining once again for public sector workers.

In addition, how about the record of the government on pay equity? It is still fighting pay equity in the courts and in front of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal after failing to pay up when found to be in contravention of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

• (1820)

I think it is deplorable. I think my colleagues will join me in saying that at the same time as this government is wiping out free collective bargaining for public sector workers, managers in the public sector are busy figuring out how to get a pay increase by reclassifying themselves.

It is time this government talked about, acted and proved itself to be fair not only to the people who work for the federal government but also the people who work for Canada in all occupations across this country who are victims of double-digit unemployment.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I know time is passing quickly and I am the fourth speaker this evening. But with the motion presented today, I would not have the right to speak on behalf of the people of Abitibi.

My comment and my question are further to the tabling of Bill C-113. In the news release of February 17, 1993, Mr. Dufour of the Conseil du patronat du Québec said that although he is not fully satisfied with Bill C-113, three points should be considered. The legislation should be reviewed if some of the problems anticipated by business and labour occur. Everything should be done so the details needed to handle cases submitted by workers are reduced to the minimum. The whole administration of the unemployment insurance program should concentrate on finding cheaters and not those who are victims of ups and downs in the labour market.

We know that in Quebec now there are 1,853 cases before the umpires. As of February 8, 2,300 cases had been submitted to boards of referees. We know the umpires go to Abitibi every 18 or 24 months. In the hon. member's riding, how many years does it take for workers to obtain justice in cases heard by the board of referees or umpires?

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague behind me said a heck of a long time. My riding of Mission—Coquitlam is the shake and shingle capital of Canada. It is a softwood lumber community. It is a community that has been totally decimated in terms of that industry as a result of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. It has taken over two years for some people to be able to appear before the board of referees and get results.

I am delighted with the question because it illustrates how hard hit and how badly hurt workers in Canada are going to be as a result of this bill. How will they feed their families? How will they survive when there is a downturn in the forest industry, where we are facing the softwood tariff in my community and there is huge double-digit unemployment?

The other important point emanating from the hon. member's question concerns the employers' organization in Quebec. I want to ask him where is the comment from the workers' organizations in Quebec? What about the QFL and the CNTU? What are they saying? How long are people suffering? How long are they having to wait? Then if they have to appeal, how long is it going to take to get through that appeal process? It already takes two years and now we are going to have another 250,000 to 500,000 workers appealing in the process. Where will they go? We will have backlogs longer than any refugee backlog in this country. In the meantime, those people will not be able to feed their families.

This government needs to come in with a full employment policy, not an unemployment policy that penalizes people who have worked to make this country work.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Just a short question, Mr. Speaker. I am interested in the point the hon. member made at the beginning of her address. I want her to verify whether or not the interpretation I am taking from this is correct.

She mentioned that the government members were citing 40, 50 or hundreds of legitimate just causes for thousands of cases. If I understand the member correctly, what she has said is that since just cause has been defined under the legislation of the Unemployment Insurance Act, all of the jurisprudence the government members were quoting from and the number of cases goes completely out the window since just cause was defined under the act. That is because prior to that the interpretations were given by the court and the board as to what a reasonable person would have done under similar circumstances. There were numerous cases.

• (1825)

Now all of that goes out the window. As the hon. member is also suggesting, the definition is now so restrictive that perhaps it will be even more difficult to prove just cause than it was in the past. Certainly the government and the Prime Minister have made a terrible error in citing the numbers of cases.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question because he is absolutely right in putting his question about the jurisprudence being gone.

The jurisprudence was based on former interpretations and definitions. Now we have new definitions and new interpretations. Not only do the UI bureaucrats and workers have to deal with new jurisprudence, but the poor person who is trying to put forward his or her case has nothing to rely on. It is brand new ground and it is all going to leave workers the victims because they do not have the means.

Unionized workers may be better off, but so many workers who are not unionized are going to be totally on their own in this.

Mr. Samson: Hung out to dry.

Ms. Langan: They will be hung out to dry, as my colleague says, by this government. It is shocking and deplorable. Quite frankly, I hope that some of the government members have to join the UI line in the near future and test out their Bill C-113.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, the matter before the House this evening is Bill C-113. What is this bill about exactly? It deals with three things. One part deals with the Public Sector Compensation Act, another with the transportation subsidies and a third with the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As far as the first two are concerned, I have no qualms as a member of Parliament to vote for such budgetary measures. As to the Unemployment Insurance Act, however, I have major problems that I would like to explain if I may.

In the past few weeks I have been lobbying both my party and the government to try to change Bill C-105, which was the bill to be voted on at the time.

What was in that bill that was a problem for me? In to take back certain amounts of money, this government was proposing that the benefits paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act for the next two years would amount to 57 per cent of the earnings instead of 60 per cent.

This government was proposing that employees who leave their jobs without just cause would not be entitled to UI benefits. In these two respects I have tried to change the way we would set about achieving these objectives.

I want to make myself clear. I have no problem with government wanting to limit abuse within the system. Not only do I not have a problem with that, I am actually all for it. But I do have major problems with the means to achieve this end.

Here is what we have suggested to several government members in an attempt to make this legislation more acceptable and more humane. We suggested, among other things, that people whose earnings were above average for the purpose of UI get only 57 per cent of their earnings in benefits, but those whose earnings were below average be allowed to receive the full 60 per cent in UI benefits because they are the ones who are affected the most. It will be argued that this is not a lot of money, but every little bit helps when you do not earn much.

As I told the Minister of Employment and Immigration, let us not forget that 500,000 people voluntarily left their jobs last year. Of that number, 275,000 qualified under the legislation because they met the five basic criteria. But 225,000 others did not meet those criteria and were penalized. The penalty was the loss of 7 to 12 weeks of UI benefits on top of the two-week waiting period. I think we should all realize that people do not quit their jobs without just cause, just for fun, when they are facing a penalty of 7 to 12 weeks without pay. This is a major decision. It is an important event and that kind of decision is not made lightly. Our government proposes to limit abuse by denying benefits to people who quit their jobs without just cause.

The basic premise of the Minister of Employment and Immigration is that these people are abusers. If I were convinced of this, I would have no hesitation in voting for this bill. To make sure my perception, interpretation and judgment were not mistaken, I checked in my community I called people who work in the field, our officers in the employment centres and their supervisors, in Dolbeau, Roberval, Alma, Chicoutimi and Jonquière.

I called these people in our employment centres and I asked the officers: Did the people who were given a penalty of between 7 and 12 weeks last year, and I am referring to people who did not meet their criteria abuse the system? Did they just want to put their feet up on the stove and let the government support them? Did they do it just because they felt like going hunting or fishing? Did they say: "It is no big deal, I quit my job and I only have a penalty of 7 to 12 weeks, which is not as bad as all that". Or were they people who had other reasons, what we refer to as extenuating circumstances?

They all answered: "No, Mr. Blackburn, they are not abusers. Only a tiny minority are abusers. These are people who quit their jobs and did not meet the five basic criteria, but there were extenuating circumstances, which is why we applied penalties of between 7 and 12 weeks". They also said that they very seldom imposed a penalty of 12 weeks, which is done only in really questionable cases.

Mr. Speaker, you will understand that under the circumstances I am caught between the party line and my constituents in Jonquière with my own knowledge of this legislation, especially since I travelled across Canada when we introduced unemployment insurance reform with Bill C-21.

Our colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, has tried to improve things. There are a number of improvements in the bill, including provisions on sexual harassment, such as the fact that these cases will be dealt with in camera. The provision dealing with massive lay-offs which ensure these people can receive unemployment insurance is also a very good measure.

I asked the minister whether we could include "other reasonable circumstances" in the bill, to cover people who do not meet the criteria. The minister responded by adding eight more items that were already covered under UI case law. So I went to my officers in the employment centres and I asked whether adding eight items meant that these people would not be considered as having quit voluntarily, and there would be no penalty. They told me: "Mr. Blackburn, that was already the case. When making a decision, we would consider the five criteria and case law as well. The minister is merely clarifying the legislation". That is fine. I am all for clarification. Unfortunately, it still means that last year's 225,000 still do not meet the criteria according to what I was told by officers in the employment centres in the region.

This evening there will be a vote on this bill and I want to say to the Prime Minister, who announced today that he was stepping down, that I have the greatest respect for him. I have the greatest respect for my government but I cannot vote for this bill this evening.

In truth, I cannot ignore what I know. However, I did say to the hon. minister: "If you really want to catch the cheaters, you could always increase the penalties. I am ready to approve an increase from 9 to 12 weeks. If someone is caught a second time, you will know you are dealing with a cheater and then you can cut off his UI benefits".

I put forward a series of measures to improve the act. I did what I could, but I respect my colleagues who do not share my views. I have no problem with that. However, in turn, I would ask my colleagues to accept the fact that I disagree with them because of what I know.

Mr. Speaker, if I may just add that on Monday I told my Whip: "If my government is in a spot because of my vote, I am ready to make the ultimate sacrifice". I did so to show how honest and professional I could be toward my government. However, tonight I have no reason to believe the government is threatened in any way so I will vote according to my beliefs and those of my constituents from Jonquière.

• (1835)

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for his excellent address to the Chamber and assure him that he is absolutely correct in his interpretation of the law as far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned. I will also point out to him that while investigating the ramifications of this legislation, I came across some cases from his riding of people who were refused unemployment insurance benefits within the past year. They were judged not to have just cause.

I just want to point out to the hon. member in congratulating him for his decision that most of the judges who have listened to some of the cases of his constituents agree with his assessment. In the most recent one that I have from his riding, the judge said in closing: "While I have the utmost sympathy for the claimant and respect for the undoubted sincerity of her religious convictions, I am nonetheless obliged to dismiss her appeal".

This involved a lady who had worked in the hon. member's riding and who had encountered difficulty with her employment because she did not want to work on her religious holiday. She did not want to continually work on Sunday. She quit. The judge said: "I agree. However, you have seven weeks of disqualification".

As the hon. member just pointed out, under the criteria this is not just cause. The hon. member knows that under this legislation all of those people will, of course, get no unemployment insurance at all because their reason for quitting although as the judge pointed out is justified, does not meet the restricted criteria under the legislation.

I want to congratulate the hon. member and ask him if he has anything further to add.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-92

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I would just like to advise the House that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and other certain related acts.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of our intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at second reading stage.

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-113, an Act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope; and the amendement of Mr. Bevilacqua (p. 16117).

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, in response to my colleague's comments, I would tell him that in practical terms when someone does not meet the criteria set out in the Act, it is evident that he or she cannot receive UI benefits.

• (1840)

There is also the issue of interpretation by the officers and the people who will go to arbitration. That is why I was looking for a middle of the road solution, a way to avoid penalizing people by giving no benefits at all, because it could happen that some people are above the welfare level. What will they do then? What will they live on?

I think after this legislation has been voted on it will be up to members from both sides of this House, to look at how it is administered and when we find a problem, be open and generous enough to make the necessary corrections if indeed it turns out to be a little too harsh.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking tonight on behalf of the men and women of Abitibi who I have represented in this House since 1984.

I had the opportunity to discuss Bill C-105 with my constituents during the Christmas holiday. I had the opportunity to talk with employers, nurses and other workers. I toured my riding of Abitibi in January and visited its largest towns as well as its rural areas. I learned that Bill C-105 would be very hard for workers, especially those quitting voluntarily in remote areas.

The reduction of benefits from 60 to 57 per cent is also very hard on workers. One has to realize that a worker in the North who has a gross of $500 a week will get only 57 per cent of his pay after April 4. This is a $15 cut. We were told today that reducing the benefits from 60 to 57 per cent is only a 3 per cent cut, but this is not true. If the calculations are made it will be found that a cut of $15 dollars on $285 is a cut of 5 per cent. For a bread winner with a wife and four children, a loss of $60 a month is not negligible.

Today I am fighting. I am not in revolt against my government; I am fighting for the workers of Abitibi, the men and women of my riding. Three cheers for the 40 just causes that were added in bill C–113. However, everyone knows these causes have been accepted for the last 8 to 10 years in the employment centres of Abitibi; these are not new.

I am happy that the Minister for Employment and Immigration added those to the eight others. I agree entirely, but I talked to people about this Bill C–113. I went back home to Abitibi and consulted them on Friday, Saturday and Sunday before coming back to Ottawa. I wish to say to those people at home today listening to me, to the miners and workers, to the people at James Bay, that when I vote against that bill this evening. I will not be voting against the government, but rather for the people back home, for the working men and women.

When you read paragraph 18(n), "such other reasonable circumstances as are prescribed", you know the door is opened for any amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, any day, any time. I am not rebelling against my government.

Do you know that if tonight I were to decide to quit after the vote as of April 4, I would not be entitled to unemployment insurance? And do you know why? Insubordination to the Department of Employment and Immigration. I would not be entitled to benefits.

We are in this House to defend our people. We are here to find solutions with the other parties as well as with my Conservative colleagues. I am a supporter of the Prime Minister. But today I am not rebelling. I am only trying to find a solution as I indicated on January 22 in a letter to the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration. I said: "I urge you to amend Bill C–105, now C–113, to make changes by simply abolishing clauses regarding eligibility". I was asking him to forgo the proposed reduction from 60 to 57 per cent of the unemployment insurance rates.

People have to be consulted, workers have to be consulted.

Do not forget that this bill will attack low–income earners, those who earn less than $6.75 an hour and those who work in the big areas.

I am sorry but I cannot vote for a bill such as this. I have many friends in the government, in the party in office—

An hon. member: You will have less.

Mr. Saint–Julien: Maybe I will have less, as my colleague is saying here tonight. Maybe I will have less tonight. But when I go back to my riding, my hon. friend, I will be less stupid than some members in this House. I will go back home with pride because I am defending the workers of Canada. I am not ashamed to be a Conservative member of Parliament.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Mr. Speaker: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved that Bill C-277, an act to amend the Income tax Act (air conditioners) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

She said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the House is addressing Bill C-277 which is an act to amend the Income Tax Act (air conditioners). This bill, which I first introduced in 1990, would allow an income tax deduction for the cost of an air conditioner when it is needed for health reasons and health reasons only.

Before I get into discussing the actual mechanics of this bill and talking about the thousands of Canadians suffering from debilitating diseases who would benefit from this legislation, I want to take some time to talk about justice versus arbitrariness.

It is traditional that government activities must be guided by justice, but what is justice? In his book entitled Theory of Equitable Taxation Johann K. Brunner wrote:

> The first and minimal requisite of justice is that nobody is treated arbitrarily, at the momentary discretion of the authority, but in accordance with the pre-existing rule. Concerning equitable taxation, this means that the tax payment of every individual must be derived from a general tax scheme, based on identifiable attributes.
> The establishment of an equitable tax rule can be seen as a special case of a very general task, namely how to make a social decision out of a given set of alternatives, where this decision should be based on the preferences of the concerned individuals.

Most Canadians would no doubt agree that the present Conservative government has been anything but fair, equitable and just in its tax scheme over the last four years.

The inaugural issue of Canadian Business Economics states that "middle income families, particularly those with children, have borne the brunt of the tax increase since 1984". The report goes on to state that "these results suggest that some deterioration in the equity of the tax system under the Conservatives".

The legislation we are discussing this evening is attempting to bring some justice to a segment of the Canadian population, mainly those with multiple sclerosis. Some 50,000 Canadians are affected by multiple sclerosis. MS is a chronic disabling disease of the central nervous system and affects people in numerous ways, both in terms of its severity and in the course of the disease.

One of the few things that all persons with MS have in common is that exposure to high summer temperatures with its accompanying humidity greatly exacerbates the symptoms of the disease and causes deep fatigue.

Persons who are normally only mildly affected by MS are reduced to walking short distances with difficulty. Those who normally walk with a cane are reduced to using a wheelchair and those who normally use a wheelchair are confined to a bed or sofa.

At this time I would like to read from a letter written to all members of Parliament by the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada. I would like to quote this letter almost verbatim:

"Upon the advice of their physicians, many people with multiple sclerosis have purchased air conditioning units which allow them to cool their homes and function much more independently. Those who cannot afford an air conditioner are at risk of being forced to go into an air conditioned institution at great expense to the tax-paying public. It seems logical to people with multiple sclerosis and to the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada that the expense of purchasing and installing an air conditioner should be allowed as a medical expense for income tax purposes. Being in an air conditioned environment allows people who have MS to carry on their daily activities and, indeed, can be said to 'assist a crippled person in walking' as stated in regulation 5700(i) of the Income Tax Act.

The MS Society of Canada has asked the Minister of Finance to consider changing the Income Tax Act to allow air conditioning for people with MS as a medical expense. He has responded saying that for a device to qualify as a medical expense, the device must be designed primarily for the medical condition and be used exclusively by a person who has that condition".

• (1935)

"This seems to us rather arbitrary". Remember when I say us, I am still reading from the letter of the MS Society. "Why should the origin of a device have any bearing on its use by a person with a disability? If a simple, readily available device, such as an air conditioner, can help persons with MS retain their mobility, then it seems logical that the device should qualify as a medical expense for income tax purposes if prescribed by a physician".

The MS Society of Canada goes on to say: "The concern that the device be used exclusively by the person with MS is met by the provisions in Ms. Gaffney's bill which reduces by half the amount available as a medical expense if there are others in the household who do not have MS".

It goes on to say: "The goal of people who are disabled from whatever cause is to live as independently and as productively as possible. At relatively little cost and in an administratively efficient manner, the lives of people could be greatly enhanced if this bill is approved. On behalf of the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada we would ask that you review Ms. Gaffney's proposed bill and give it your support".

We, as legislators in this House, each have a moral responsibility to take steps to ensure that discrimination of any kind is not allowed to exist in our laws. By arbitrarily determining for example that an air conditioner which can help people with MS retain their mobility should not qualify as a medical expense, then I believe we in this House and this government are being most unfair.

Justice should be allowed for all. In this regard those with MS should be allowed to claim an air conditioner as a medical expense. I believe this is the only equitable, fair and just way of proceeding on this matter.

In closing off my comments, the unfortunate part of Bill C-277, is that it was not deemed by the committee to be a votable item. Anyone who wishes to speak to this bill may speak to it, but unfortunately it is not a votable item.

I beg and pray upon this government to recognize this bill as a very important aspect in the life of a person who suffers from MS. I would ask all members of Parliament to please consider the importance of this bill.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to debate Bill C-277. This bill seeks to amend the Income Tax Act to allow expenses for air conditioners to be eligible for the medical expense tax credit.

The philosophy that has led the hon. member opposite to put forward this bill is a laudable one: to help Canadians with disabilities. While this philosophy of caring is one that we all share, indeed many people consider it a defining aspect of our national identity, the measures we take to give this philosophy effect must be carefully thought out and must pass an important test.

The test is as follows: Is the measure proposed the best way to achieve the goal in mind or do other measures, and in particular other existing measures do a better job? Unfortunately, Bill C-277 fails the test.

There are already two measures in the Income Tax Act that provide support to Canadians with disabilities. One is the medical expenses tax credit. The other is the disability tax credit. The proposed measure before us today would not improve on both of these measures.

Let me first turn to the medical expense tax credit. This tax credit is intended to recognize the effect of above average medical expenses on the ability of an individual to pay tax. Tax relief is provided through a tax credit for extraordinary medical expenses in excess of a certain percentage of net income. For 1992, this tax credit is available for qualified expenses in excess of $1,614 or 3 per cent of net income, whichever is less.

• (1940)

Preliminary taxation statistics for 1991 indicate that the medical expense tax credit provided tax benefits to more than 910,000 tax filers. The cost to the federal government for providing this tax relief came to about $200 million in that year.

Let me briefly deal with the criteria that determine which expenses are eligible for consideration under the medical expense tax credit. To qualify as an eligible expense for the medical expense tax credit a service or device must provide health benefits and be for the exclusive use of a person with a disability.

For example, expenses for devices or equipment that are designed exclusively for use by individuals suffering from a severe chronic respiratory ailment are eligible expenses for the medical expense tax credit. However, items that provide benefits to people with disabilities but also provide benefits to people who are not disabled are not eligible for the medical expense tax credit. Allowing such an item to qualify would effectively extend tax benefits to those who are not disabled. For this reason, items such as air conditioners, humidifiers, dehumidifiers, heat pumps or heat or air exchangers do not qualify as medical expenses.

Let me also point out that air conditioners are primarily consumer comfort items and are not normally considered medical devices. This is obvious to anyone who has spent a summer in a muggy climate, whether here in Ottawa or back in Cambridge in central Canada. The general consumer benefits of air conditioners are reflected in their widespread use. Air conditioners can be found in some 2.6 million homes, or 25 per cent of Canadian households.

Even when an air conditioner must be purchased primarily to improve the health of a disabled person it nevertheless provides benefits to other household members who are not disabled. In this regard one should keep in mind that almost half of all households with air conditioners consist of three or four persons.

There are some other practical difficulties with the measures proposed in Bill C–277. Air conditioners, especially central air conditioners, increase the resale value of a home. Consequently, the purchase price of an air conditioner will overstate the cost of its services to the purchaser. This situation is in contrast to other home modifications, such as alterations to make a home wheelchair accessible because these items provide benefits only to persons with disabilities.

Moreover, air conditioners have general resale value and as a result can be resold to individuals without disabilities, effectively passing on the tax benefit.

We should think twice before amending the income tax system in a way that might be seen to encourage the abuse of measures that seek to target benefits to those with real needs, real medical hardships or disabilities. Allowing air conditioners to qualify as a medical expense might also increase pressure on physicians to certify that the purchase of an air conditioner is necessary for medical reasons in situations that are less than clear–cut. This would make it very difficult to control costs and ensure that the measure is applied fairly.

These observations on the operation of the medical expense tax credit and the problems of extending this credit to cover air conditioners lead to only one conclusion. We cannot support this bill as it currently stands before us.

The Income Tax Act also provides a second form of support for people with severe disabilities, a disability tax credit. For severely disabled individuals the disability tax credit recognizes the cost of items that are not eligible for the medical expense tax credit. In 1992 this tax credit will reduce federal tax by $720 and the combined federal and provincial tax by $1,120. The disability tax credit originated in the special deduction for blind persons that was introduced in 1944. Five years later the deduction was extended to people who were confined to a bed or wheelchair.

In 1986 this government increased the deduction by $250 and broadened it to include all those with a severe and prolonged mental or physical impairment. In 1988, as a result of tax reform the disability deduction was replaced by the disability tax credit and further enriched. In 1991, the credit was again increased, this time by an additional $125. Preliminary tax statistics for 1991 indicate that the disability tax credit provided tax benefits to more than 450,000 tax filers at a cost of more than $195 million to the federal government.

• (1945)

In conclusion, at the start of my remarks I set out a test that a proposed measure must pass in order to gain support in this House. In considering Bill C-277, I have tried to apply that test with the special consideration of the existing measures in the Income Tax Act that aim to assist Canadians with disabilities or serious permanent illness.

Unfortunately, Bill C-277 fails that test. Consequently I find it difficult to support this proposal and I would urge other members of this House to vote against this bill.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to speak to this bill which the New Democratic Party and I support.

We have a growing concern in this country about escalating health care costs. This bill is designed to make it possible for people to remain within their own homes. We have a tendency to take too legalistic an interpretation of things within the tax legislation when it deals with ordinary Canadians. We find legalistic loopholes to allow big multinational corporations to write off all sorts of things within the tax system.

The reason the government does not want to allow air conditioning devices to be considered a tax expense is it says the definition that is now used indicates the device must be exclusively defined for a medical purpose. If it has any other kind of purpose, it is not acceptable. That is far too narrow a definition to meet the needs of ordinary Canadians who have multiple sclerosis.

British Columbia has just taken a major look at health care reform. The total thrust of its total health care reform package is called "Closer to Home". It allows people with health care conditions to receive service within their own home.

This bill, by allowing people to have a tax break for air conditioners, could in fact make it possible for a person to reside in his or her own home at a fraction of the health care cost of going into an intermediate care or long-term care institution.

The Multiple Sclerosis Society sets it out very clearly in its letter. It says: "Being in an air conditioned environment allows people who have MS to carry on with their daily activities". Indeed, it can be said to assist crippled persons in walking.

What we have is a very simple, very logical and very humane proposal that says when a person has a chronic illness and there is a device that will improve his or her medical functioning, he or she should get a tax break for it. I think that is eminently fair, particularly when we start looking at the concept of tax fairness that we have developed in our system.

The government is saying it will not allow the person with MS to have a tax break for an air conditioner but it allowed firms like Montreal Trust to earn $62 million last year and pay no tax. There were all sorts of tax write-offs for it on earnings of $62 million. In addition, it was given a tax credit of $1.4 million.

The person with MS cannot get a tax break for an air conditioner.

• (1950)

Coca-Cola earned $24.5 million, paid zero income tax and got a $1 million tax credit. Mountain Pipeline, that great pipeline company in British Columbia earned $16 million. It paid no tax and got a $100,000 tax credit.

That is this government's idea of tax fairness. We will not give the person with multiple sclerosis a tax break to install an air conditioner that will improve his or her life and possibly keep him or her out of an institution. We will give our tax breaks to our friends, Coca-Cola, Trustco and other big companies.

I feel this is a very fair piece of legislation that is designed to help the ordinary Canadian that is in a difficult spot. I urge the House to support it.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-277.

As has been pointed out, this bill seeks to amend the Income Tax Act to allow expenses for air conditioners to be eligible expenses for the medical expense tax credit.

In recent years this government has introduced and enriched a number of tax measures for people with disabilities. Since our time is short, I will just speak of a couple of items.

Since 1984, more than 20 items have been added to the list of eligible medical expenses. Over that time the number of tax filers has increased. The medical expense tax credit improves the fairness of the tax system by recognizing the effects of extraordinary medical expenses and the ability of an individual to pay tax.

For 1992, the medical expense tax credit reduces the federal tax of a claimant by 70 per cent of qualifying reimbursed medical expenses.

Any devices or pieces of equipment that are designed exclusively for use by individuals suffering from a severe chronic respiratory ailment already qualify for a medical expense tax credit. However, items such as air conditioners, humidifiers, dehumidifiers, heat pumps and many others may provide non-health benefits and are not intended for the exclusive use of an individual with a disability and are not eligible for the medical expense tax credit.

This is why we have Bill C-277 before us. Since an air conditioner has a general resale value, it can be resold to individuals without disabilities. As a result, allowing air conditioners to qualify may effectively extend tax benefits to those who are not disabled.

Consultation and co-ordination are links in the chain that lead to comprehensive government action. I believe that our government must continue to examine all of the issues surrounding the income, security and personal support for persons with disabilities. We must continue to help alleviate the disadvantages experienced by people with disabilities. We must continue to enhance the independence and employment opportunities of disabled persons, but we must do all of these things in a comprehensive way.

• (1955)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am really very honoured to rise to speak to this bill that reflects compassion and human kindness in an area of health care that would decrease the cost of health care to our system.

Bill C-277, an act to amend the Income Tax Act for air conditioners for people suffering from multiple sclerosis, is a model as I understand it.

It is of interest to note that the speaker who just preceded me, the hon. member for Wild Rose, was at a committee meeting yesterday accompanied by the chairman of that committee on human rights and the rights of the disabled, who is also sitting in the House at the moment. In the course of the discussion of the recommendations they were going to make to the Minister of National Health and Welfare both of them were looking at this very bill and using it as a model for the nature and kind of concerns that would be presented in their report for improvements and changes to the Income Tax Act.

It is quite true that this government did improve and add to the list of people and cases that could benefit from either the medical expense tax credit or the disability tax measures. There is no arguing that it has shown an improvement. As we know, the cost of medical care in this country is escalating to the point that it has become critical, and I would say the word critical would describe the serious concern.

If we can find measures to help people who are suffering and who because they cannot look after themselves cannot put into their homes the kind of support systems that will keep them in their homes, which gives them a sense of belonging and removes the need to institutionalize these people, to look after their care and their needs, are we not doing something that is much more helpful and far less costly to our society in the long run?

I do not know too much about multiple sclerosis, but I do know one friend who suffered from this disease. I watched the deterioration of a very bright mind and body. She ended up having to live in a hospital setting when it was no longer possible for her family to look after her.

Not everybody has a family and not everyone is in a position to afford what is perceived by many to be a simple luxury but in this case is a necessity. I heard an hon. member talk about people living in air conditioned homes and therefore how it should not be perceived to be a deductible medical expense. I do not know what world he lives in but everybody I know does not live in an air conditioned home.

This is a bill worth supporting. It is a recommendation to the government which I hope it will take into consideration. Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleague to add a few words if you do not mind as the clock does not yet say eight o'clock.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, in support of Bill C–277 I would say that it is a very simple case to make. If we examine the income tax structures of the countries we normally deal with, for example, the United States or Europe we will find not only air conditioning but swimming pools.

I have a list for the United States: Air conditioning, elevators, bedrooms added, swimming pool and sauna. Under the income tax act in the United States the Americans take the value of buying that particular thing and the amount of money that it would add to the value of the house and take the difference, which is approximately 50 per cent of the purchase price. That is what the deduction is.

As long as the condition exists for which it was approved in the beginning by the medical practitioner, the maintenance and operation of that air conditioning or swimming pool is deductible on the income tax returns in the United States of America. What better reason, as the member for Nepean has pointed out. Look at the other countries in this world that have similar systems to our income tax system and ask the question as to why we do not do what they do for people who are in need.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being eight o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

1993–94 MAIN ESTIMATES

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, this is the third time that I have had the privilege of tabling the Main Estimates before this House. Those that I am presenting today for the 1993–94 fiscal year detail the government's spending plans arising from the economic and fiscal statement made by the Minister of Finance before this House on December 2, 1992.

That statement announced certain initiatives to stimulate growth and employment, to rebuild the confidence of Canadians and to help them adjust to the new economic realities. At the same time, it sought to contain the deficit and I believe that we are clearly on target on all these points.

In keeping with our past efforts, the measures announced in the statement sought to stimulate economic growth and improve the standard of living of Canadians. They include a sound monetary and fiscal policy, an adaptation to the globalization of markets, a streamlining and renewal of the public sector, building on the strengths of Canadians and stimulating the spirit of enterprise and initiative in the private sector to sustain our economic progress.

In response to the statement, we are introducing a series of initiatives to invest in growth, invest in people, broaden trade opportunities and enhance competitiveness. For instance, we launched a Small Business Employment and Investment Package, we maintained research and development funds at their present level, despite our financial situation and we reallocated resources to focus on strategic investments for such things as highways, bridges and technology infrastructure and, of course, to optimize the results of those investments.

Along with these commitments, severe spending cuts had to be made to contain the deficit.

The major spending reduction program announced on December 2, 1992 will have an impact on the cost of programs delivered directly by the federal government on transfers to individuals and on grants and contributions to organizations and companies.

As everyone knows, the world economy has proven weaker than expected and the projections of growth for most countries have had to be revised downward.

• (1105)

In most OECD countries, governments have responded by implementing strict spending reductions. This was certainly the case in the United States, the United Kingdom, Italy and Sweden.

In the United Kingdom, for example, the recent announcement of a full-scale program review follows on the heels of the pre-Christmas announcement of major cuts in operating expenditures.

[English]

In keeping with the economic and fiscal statement of December 2, federal government operating expenditures including defence spending have had to be cut in relation to the February 1992 budget projections by $1 billion in 1993–94 and by $1.7 billion in 1994–95. Since personnel related spending represents two-thirds of the operating costs of the federal government, we have acted to reduce the total payroll.

As we announced, the wage restraint policy introduced in 1991 will be extended for an additional two years for all sectors of the federal government. This applies to the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers and members of Parliament among others. We are well aware of the heavy sacrifices that we have asked of our employees by freezing their salaries.

The government has also been forced to reduce other elements of departmental and agency operating budgets. As announced in the economic statement of December 2, these budgets will be reduced a further 3 per cent in 1993–94 in addition to the numerous cuts already imposed since 1984–85.

[Translation]

Nevertheless, the reductions in the cost of programs delivered directly by the federal government were not going to be enough. Reductions were also necessary in transfer payments. Among other measures, the December statement announced that grants and contributions to most organizations and special interest groups would be cut by an average of 10 per cent from the levels forecast in the February 1992 budget. I am pleased to say that Old Age Security, the Guaranteed Income Supplement, Spouses' Allowances, programs for people with disabilities, War Veterans' Allowances, Veterans' Disability Pensions and major transfer payments to the provinces will not be affected by this reduction. There will be no reduction in the famine relief that Canada provides around the world.

After taking into account the cost of initiatives to stimulate growth, program spending reductions in 1993–94 will result in net savings of some $2.2 billion. These actions will ensure a significant reduction in the structural component of the deficit and will bring the deficit down to $32.6 billion in 1993–94.

[English]

Moreover, the 1993–94 main estimates show clearly that spending will be kept within the limits set in the Spending Control Act. Budgetary expenditures will increase by only 1.5 per cent in 1993–94, one of the lowest rates of growth in three decades. In fact, we have significantly reduced this rate of growth.

In 1984, program expenditure represented some 19.5 per cent of our gross domestic product. In 1993–94 it will fall to about 16.8 per cent.

There are indications that the Canadian economy is recovering and a gradual improvement in economic activity is expected throughout the year. Prime interest rates have fallen significantly in the last three months. Canada's inflation rate in 1992 was the lowest among the G–7 countries. Although too many Canadians are still unemployed, the employment situation has been improving almost continuously since last April. In fact, more than 146,000 new jobs have been created since then.

Retail sales have been rising for almost a year and our volume of exports is increasing. The OECD predicts that Canada will experience the highest rate of growth of the G–7 countries over the next two years.

Since 1984 we have pursued an ambitious strategy of expenditure management to regain control of our national finances. Our strategy is firmly in place and the results have been positive.

Our first step was to get rid of waste and inefficiency. We then moved to eliminate activities and organizations that no longer served a social purpose and we concentrated on improving the management of the federal government.

The Public Service 2000 initiative launched by the Prime Minister in 1989 has changed the Public Service significantly. The Public Service is increasingly results–oriented and more responsive to the needs of taxpayers.

The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance in February 1992 announced other measures to provide more efficient delivery of services to Canadians.

[English]

The introduction of operating budgets in 1993–94 is perhaps the most important example of our new cost–effective way of doing business. Funds for salaries, operations, maintenance and minor capital expenses will be combined into a single operating budget for each federal department or agency. Departments will have greater flexibility in improving their efficiency and adapting their services to the changing needs of their clients.

I will conclude by repeating that our government remains firmly committed to sound management of public finances and to a comprehensive renewal of the federal Public Service. The action plan presented by the Minister of Finance last December supports economic recovery and proposes responsible ways of achieving that goal.

[Translation]

The Main Estimates that I am tabling today provide detailed information on how the government plans to spend $160.7 billion in 1993–94, in keeping with the economic and fiscal statement of December 2, 1992. In tabling the Main Estimates, the government is seeking authority from Parliament to spend $48.9 billion. As we know, the remaining expenditures are covered by legislative authorities previously granted by Parliament.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, intends to table a borrowing authority bill for 1993-94 when the House resumes sitting.

Madam Speaker, I thank you and this House for your attention.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, Canadians must have been surprised when the President of the Treasury Board made his presentation this morning, without so much as a single reference to the fact that we need to know how the operations of the Government of Canada will be managed on the revenue side. We have not had a budget since February 1992, and we have now been told that it will be the end of April or some time in May before we know exactly how the government intends to budget for its operations during the coming year.

[English]

I wonder how Canadians can be reassured, as the minister suggested they should be, by the approach the government is taking.

The government likes to pride itself on being a good manager. It has talked about responsibility and coming clean with the Canadian people. How many chief executive officers of companies could come before their shareholders and say: "We are going to spend $160 billion, but we are not going to tell you how we are going to budget for that. We are going to show you our expenditure plan but we are not going to deal with the revenue side of the equation".

This entire document is based on the economic and fiscal statement that was delivered in the House by the Minister of Finance in December of last year. This is a document that generally speaking was not very favourably received by Canadians faced with a long recession, the longest we have experienced in this country in terms of depth and duration since the 1930s.

• (1115)

It is going to be a tremendous problem for Canadians from all walks of life to try to plan their year's activities. We will now have a situation where Canadians will have to decide whether the economic policy is the economic policy of the minister of defence, the economic policy of the minister of external trade or the financial policy and the tax policy of the Minister of Communications. As the Titanic seeks a new captain, there is going to be a lot of shuffling of the deck chairs as we go through the next three months as the Conservative Party tries to get a grip on where it is going.

The unusual circumstance we are faced with is a government that is going to ask Canadians to take them on faith as it is going to spend $60 billion. Today, the government is able to come to the House with documents from the minister of external trade. There are 4,300 pages I am told in the documents that the minister tabled dealing with the North American free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico.

The President of the Treasury Board came before the House with some 90 documents such as this dealing with estimates and yet, with all the apparatus of government available to it, both in finance and in national revenue, this government has not seen fit to bring a budget before the people of Canada in the fifth year of its mandate. As it struggles along toward the end of its constitutional capacity to govern this country, it is not prepared to come to the Canadian people, not with statements, but with a full-fledged budget.

I always like to attempt to give credit where credit is due. Over the years the precedent was set that this government brought in a budget at an appropriate time, usually from mid to the end of February. It brought in estimates subsequent to the presentation of the budget so that Canadians as well as parliamentarians could deal in a substantive way with what the government had planned for at least the coming year.

It may be politically expedient because of the change in the leadership of the government to delay a budget, but it is not very satisfactory for Canadians to have to struggle along based on a budget that was put together at least two years ago, at least the beginnings of it were, a budget that was based on projections, conclusions and assumptions that in many respects now are quite a way off base.

I hope that members on both sides of the House will deal with the issues in the estimates as they are referred to committee. Surely the government has a responsibility to review its decision to delay the budget process for another two or three months.

The work that has gone into the preparation of the estimates has certainly put a clear picture before the bureaucrats and the political leaders of what they intend to do with the spending of the Canadian taxpayers' money. What is the purpose of all of this? We understand that in some of the programs, for statutory reasons and others, there is not much flexibility. There have been significant changes made in the moneys allocated to various departments and agencies,, but there is no budget document that provides us with what the government's thinking is with respect to those changes.

We to your left believe that if the government is going to respect its undertaking to be forthright and to deal in a businesslike manner with the finances of this country, we should have a budget, a clear statement as to what the government intends to do because of the uncertainty. Let us call a spade a spade. Over the next three months, as various individuals seeking the leadership of the Conservative Party go before Canadians, I doubt very much that all will be singing from the same hymn book.

Surely there will be a number of people who will want to distance themselves from the former Minister of Finance who I understand might be a candidate. Who would want to deal with the father of the GST without making some comments about where the country has gone as we have accumulated a debt in excess of $400 billion?

As we get these conflicting statements from various leadership hopefuls, it seems to me that it would be responsible for the government to give a clear and coherent statement to the Canadian people as to how it expects to raise the money that is going to be required to fund the expenditures that we have been made privy to today and how it is going to deal with the deficit that it has talked about for eight years and that is still running at $34 billion. It is talk, talk, talk, but no change in what it is costing Canadians in terms of the year to year increase that is the result of this deficit and the cost of financing our accumulated debt.

• (1120)

In closing, I want to reiterate our belief that it is absolutely essential to maintain the integrity of the system and the credibility of the system vis-à-vis the Canadian taxpayers that the government bring forth a budget telling us how it wants to deal with the problems facing this country. The government must tell us how it wants to raise the money required to cover these expenditures and how it is going to cover the shortfall between what it can raise and what it plans to spend according to these documents.

We look forward to hearing from members on the government side as to whether they share our view that it might be appropriate to bring a budget before the Canadian people as we lurch along in the fifth year of this government's mandate.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, we have in many respects reached a turning point in the life of this government. The Prime Minister has announced his resignation and the government is trying to renew itself. Yet a set of estimates has been presented which in fact demonstrates far too clearly the unfortunate, often I must say, dishonest approach this government has taken toward the public finances of this country.

It is possible however to probe with these estimates below the surface. The government tries to present a surface saying that everything is fine. This morning, people across the country heard the minister say: "We are in fine shape as a country. Everything is starting to move ahead as it should".

Let us look at some of the realities emerging from these estimates. Perhaps the most dramatic are the helicopters which were to cost $4.4 billion according to this government. It turns out in these estimates they will not cost $4.4 billion, but $5.8 billion. That level of extravagance and waste is simply unacceptable in this country.

Moreover, in the fine print of these documents is something which explodes entirely one of the government's major reasons for saying that this helicopter project should go ahead. It suggested that the new EH-101 helicopters would have lower operating costs and this would be a major benefit for Canada. In fact, I quote from part III of the more detailed documents relating to the national defence ministry. It indicates that the annual recurring costs represent "an increment of approximately $33.2 million annually over the combined total of recurring costs of the aircraft fleets which the EH-101 will replace".

In other words, these very helicopters that the government is trying to sell to the Canadian people as being cheaper are going to cost over $33 million more each year. This is the first piece of subterfuge the details of these estimates succeed in exposing.

• (1125)

These estimates also show that we are turning our backs on the poor and the hungry throughout the world. The suggestion was that we might see some cuts in international aid, but I do not think any Canadian realized that the bulk of the cuts that would be established would be in food aid to the poorest people who are starving in this world.

The amounts detailed in these estimates show that food aid directly will be cut by $10.6 million each year and food aid funnelled through other organizations will be cut by $25 million each year. We are talking of a total of over $35 million in cuts to food aid. That food aid would not only help many starving people in this world, but would also help Canadian farmers find outlets for the food they produce. That is what this government is cutting.

There are some other fascinating and sad details in this particular set of estimates. We are looking for national unity in this country. We are looking for economic development and fairness and economic growth across our country. I hate to say that in the details of these estimates there is a serious undercutting and sabotage of the national unity of this country.

In Atlantic Canada grants have been cut for economic development by $19 million. In Ontario, especially northern Ontario these grants have been cut by $1.5 million. In the case of aboriginal economic assistance these grants have been cut by $6 million. In the case of western diversification, development aid for the western provinces, these cuts are $16 million. However, for the province of Quebec there is no cut; there is an increase of $40 million.

We have economic problems throughout this country. For a government to come before this House with a pattern of expenditures that takes away from every part of the country and gives to a single part of the country is not just unfair, it is a devastating attack on our national unity. It is something that should not be permitted. That is one of the reasons this government must go and go quickly.

As well, there are cuts in this set of detailed expenditure outlines to environmental non-governmental organizations at both the national and international levels. Environmental organizations have been extremely useful and valuable in trying to increase the attention and concern of Canadians with respect to environmental issues.

There are cuts of over $300,000 to environmental organizations here in Canada. There are also cuts to groups such as the Canadian Energy Research Institute which is looking at alternative energy sources. There are cuts to the Committee on the Status of Endangered Wildlife in Canada. There are cuts to the chemicals control program of the OECD. There are cuts to the economic commission for Europe's co-operative program to monitor the long range transport of air pollution. These are short-sighted cuts which do not recognize the long-term impact and dangers associated with penny pinching on our environmental concerns for the future.

• (1130)

The reality is this government is spending $5.8 billion on helicopters as compared to the $4.4 billion it said it was spending. If it was not spending that $5.8 billion, if it was not spending more money each year to keep its fleet of helicopters going as a result of the replacement, it would be able to take a more enlightened approach to see that food aid got to the people who need it across this world.

The government would be able to see to it that we had a fair distribution of economic development support throughout this country. It would be able to see to it that environmental programs were supported.

Finally the government would have been able to bring to this House as part of its estimates, as it should have, a set of commitments to support AIDS research which the government has had to indicate in its news release it is not yet in a position to announce. This is much to the distress of AIDS organizations throughout this country. They desperately need the bridge financing to keep programs going to deal with one of the most serious epidemics this country knows.

This is a bad set of estimates. I hope this House in committee will reject it.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

We are dealing with a very important subject, the Main Estimates. My point of order is that according to Standing Order 81(4) these estimates being tabled today will be deemed to have been reported to the House by May 31 next. They will be deemed to be reported even though many committees of the House will not have had time to look at the estimates, seriously consider them and possibly pass judgments on the expenditure plan.

The public accounts committee and some members of this House have for many years said that the House should review the presentation of the information given to Parliament that in its present format—there were some 84 volumes tabled this morning—is sometimes indigestible and is not being used by members of Parliament.

If I look at the government's information, it says here: "The estimates document contain a wealth of information regarding the spending plans of the Government of Canada. Though primarily intended for members of Parliament, these documents will prove useful to groups and individuals".

I am not boasting here, but last year for example, the only standing committee that reported in due course was the standing committee that I chair, the public accounts committee. The finance committee, which looks after a lot of very important documents, met once last year to look at estimates. It met once, on April 9, and looked at the estimates for customs and national revenue.

My point is this. Yesterday in this House, I tabled a report dealing with information to Parliament. It was put forth by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I would like to put into the record just one paragraph of that report which says—

An hon. member: What is your point of order?

Mr. Gauthier: My point of order is that we should look at Standing Order 81(4), an order of the House under which we operate. My point is that we should take note of the voluntary will of the members of Parliament to enhance the information that we have before us to make sure that it is being used, that it has not become a farce.

I have a recommendation for the hon. member, a member of the public accounts committee himself, who actually seconded this report when it was tabled in the House yesterday. He was a member when the report passed unanimously. I pray that he will at least read it and maybe understand it.

• (1135)

The information Parliament gets has to be clearer, has to be more useful and has to be more relevant to what we are getting here.

PETITIONS

TUITION FEES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have only one petition today, but it is extremely important.

[English]

I have a petition from 7,000 students from Saskatchewan who deplore government policies in education and related matters.

They point out that the cutting back of transfer payments has been harsh on students, that taxing scholarships is inappropriate, that the 3 per cent tax on needy students who have loans is unacceptable and must be removed, that the six months additional interest on student loans should go, and that the government has an archaic student aid program that must be revised. They deplore as well the goods and services tax on books and reading material.

This particular petition represents not only the sentiment of 7,000 students from Saskatchewan but sentiment across the country.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that reminds us of the unanimous decision taken by this House on November 24, 1989. I repeat:

> That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

These petitioners state that poverty and Canadian children will yield ever-increasing costs to the administration of health care, justice and social welfare; that the sound financial management of any country demands the prevention of poverty; and that child poverty is the fundamental reality of family poverty.

The petition ends by humbly praying that Parliament take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children of Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan of the implementation and that commitment.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Malartic, Rivière-Héva, La Motte, Val-d'Or, Lac-Marois, Joutel and Matagami, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and make our communities a safer place to live.

CANADA POST

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from my constituents in the towns of Spaniard's Bay and Tilton. It is particularly significant that the number of signatures, roughly 1,200, represents practically 50 per cent of the population.

They are concerned about the reduction of postal services in rural areas. They are concerned that Canada Post intends to systematically close an important number of post offices in small municipalities. They are concerned that the population is firmly opposed to this systematic closure in rural Canada and they cannot seem to do very much about it.

They want to register their concern loudly. I met with them two weeks ago on February 12 and they are asking Parliament through this petition that the rural communities already badly affected by reductions will recover the complete postal services to which they were accustomed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing members for debate I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a), because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 30 minutes beginning at one o'clock p.m.

When Bill C-92 was last before the House the hon. member for Burin—St. George's had been recognized for debate.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, yesterday with the announced resignation of the Prime Minister that he is stepping down as leader of his party must mean that today is a completely new day, a new beginning. Everything has changed. That is the rhetoric. The unpopular PM has thrown in the towel.

Mr. Loiselle: Be nice, be nice.

Mr. Simmons: I am just setting the stage for the benefit of my good friend, the President of the Treasury Board, who has had a rough day so far. I do not want to make it any rougher for him.

I was just about to say that with the decision of a very unpopular PM to step down, we would expect this morning, if we believe the rhetoric, that all had changed. We would believe that all the bills where the rich were being looked after at the expense of the poor, all the bills such as Bill C–113 where the poor were being pummelled to help the rich, were no more because the whole landscape had changed. The rhetoric of yesterday was that all the bad things the public of Canada has come to associate with this regime are no more. It has all been exorcized from the public domain. The arsonist has run out of matches. He is tired of lighting the matches. He is throwing in the towel.

This morning when we stand and sit here and see this bill, what really has changed? We are still debating the legislation, which I suppose had the concurrence of the retiring Prime Minister but certainly had the concurrence of the cabinet.

• (1150)

Let us understand how bills get before this Chamber. They do not come at the whim of one person, be it the Prime Minister or somebody else, they come here because a party, a government caucus, in its wisdom feels this is the kind of legislation it wants to promote.

We are getting that on the record because we are going to see some interesting two-steps over the next few months. The category of speech from my friends such as the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Communications will be: "The devil made me do it. I really did not agree with this GST. If I were there it would have been different". They were there, and when this bill was agreed to they were there.

They agreed to set out and look after some family fortunes in Montreal, Toronto and other places across this country. They were there when Bill C–92 was concocted. The ministers of environment, employment, international trade, defence, and communications were there.

They were there when Bill C–113 was concocted, when it was decided to label all people who quit employment because of sexual harassment or other forms of harassment. They were there when it was decided to pummel those people. They were there when it was decided in Bill C–92 to look after the Bronfmans in Montreal. I wonder if the Bronfmans will be affected by Bill C–13. If they quit their job without notice will they have to line up to be told they do not qualify? Not likely.

Let us talk about Bill C–92. The Bronfmans of Montreal will rest easier once this amendment gets shoved through the House by the Prime Minister, retiring though he is, and by the ministers of employment, environment, communications and trade.

Mr. Blenkarn: Why?

Mr. Simmons: I hear the voice from Mississauga South. I am not the first Newfoundlander to hear that voice with some apprehension. Others in Newfoundland have heard that voice before. What they cannot do is get their hands on the carcass.

Mr. Blenkarn: Last summer I was there.

Mr. Simmons: The last time he went to Newfoundland he went incognito. My advice to him is to either not go any more or to go incognito a second time. I am not the first Newfoundlander to hear that voice and to hear it apprehensively. He can insult me all he wants. I am paid to take his insults.

Mr. Blenkarn: Well that is good.

Mr. Simmons: He cannot insult the people of Newfoundland, as he did several times, without some retribution. I advise him for the sake of his own carcass not to go there any more or to go there incognito like he did last summer and not tell anybody he is there.

He asked a question and I will give him the answer in a minute. Let me first list off the names. The Bronfmans of Montreal, now there is a poor family who needs the legislative help of this particular Chamber.

Mr. Blenkarn: How are they affected?

Mr. Simmons: How are they affected? They own Seagrams.

How about the Steinberg family, the Kofflers who founded Shoppers Drug Mart, or the Billes family who founded Canadian Tire?

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: They are a tender lot this morning, but I would be tender too 24 hours after seeing my last hope go down the drain. I would be tender too. I would be verbose as well.

Mr. Blenkarn: You are verbose.

• (1155)

Mr. Simmons: I do not think I could be as verbose as the member for Mississauga South, but I would be verbose if I had the legs knocked out from under me yesterday with the resignation of my leader.

Mr. Blenkarn: How are they affected?

Mr. Simmons: The member for Mississauga South asks how. Well, let us have a look at it. I think he knows the answer.

Mr. Blenkarn: Tell me how the trust works?

Mr. Simmons: No, I am not going to take the time to tell the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will be delighted to recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South the next time around. I think that a conversation across the aisle is not the way that debates are done in this place.

Mr. Simmons: I thank Madam Speaker for her protection. I am a coward.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member really needed it.

Mr. Simmons: I am a coward, I am absolutely shaking in my shoes as a result of the thundering verbal attacks from the gentleman from Mississauga South.

No, I do not know nearly as much about those family trusts as he does, so I am going to leave it to him to tell this House why the Steinbergs are out there waiting for this amendment. I am going to leave that to him. That is something he knows a lot more about than I do. I will concede that to him at any moment of the day.

Unlike him I was not sent here to plead the cause of the Steinbergs and the others I have mentioned. I was not sent here to plead their particular cause. They can look after themselves nicely, thank you. I am here to plead the cause of the people who that member wants to pummel under the other bill they rammed through here yesterday, Bill C–113. They are people who under the changes to unemployment insurance will never get to be a Steinberg because this government, whoever leads it, will keep them under its thumb, aided and abetted by the right wing of the party as epitomized by the gentleman from Mississauga South.

I am not surprised that he yelps, screams and bawls this morning. We are used to that. However, it is useful. It is instructive to ask why he is doing it this morning. Why is he so aroused this morning, as opposed to other mornings? Why is he aroused at all so early in the morning?

What has changed since yesterday, since we heard the resignation of the gentleman's leader. Has the GST suddenly been cancelled? Is that all behind us now? Is that gone? Is that exorcised from the landscape? How about the 325,000 manufacturing jobs we have lost since that man became leader? Have they all been restored? Have we undone all the pain of the 200,000 personal and corporate bankruptcies? That must be a really amusing thing for the member for Mississauga South. There have been 200,000 corporate and personal bankruptcies since 1989. Have we undone all that pain? Is that all water under the bridge now?

No, today is very much as it was yesterday. Today the country is in the grip of a government that foists this kind of legislation on the people of Canada, that says that after 21 years these people need to buy another few years, maybe another 60 or 70 years until all their offspring are deceased. That is why the Bronfmans, the Steinbergs, the Billes, the Kofflers, and the Beaverbrooks are facing some fairly troubling money decisions these days. They will not have many difficult decisions to make if this government rams through the bill.

With the new dawn we are part of now, with the leader about to step down over there, maybe we will have some new twinges of conscience. Maybe there will be some second thoughts on that side of the House about Bill C–92 and Bill C–113. Those are the twin bills that cater to the rich and sock it to the poor. Maybe there will be some changes of heart over there.

• (1200)

There is going to be a bunch over there looking for votes across the country. They are going to need more than the votes of the five rich families I mentioned. They are going to need some of the votes of ordinary people, of people who do not drive around in limousines, of people who have to agonize from season to season whether they are going to get enough money to keep them through the winter through seasonal employment opportunities.

Maybe they are going to need that kind of person to support them in their leadership bids. If they do they better have a look at this kind of legislation because it has helped the rich of Canada shelter billions of dollars in assets in family trusts and postpone paying taxes.

Yes, the original bill in 1972 allowed that to happen for 21 years. They have had 21 years to get their house in order. Do they need another 60, 70, 80 or 90 years?

Let us have a look at what others are saying on this particular bill. Look at what the dean of the University of Victoria Law School is saying on this particular issue. The impression here is somehow that I am the only person who takes this position. Maureen Maloney, dean of the University of Victoria Law School, says: "It is nothing more than an interest free loan from the government to Canada's wealthiest families". It is an interest free loan to whom, to the people on minimum wage, to the 40 per cent of the people working in the service sector whose wages are below the poverty level? For 40 per cent of all the people working in the service sector their wages are below the poverty level.

We know the answer from the member for Don Valley North. She said: "Let's rewrite the rules" if there are too many poor people out there. She said the other day that she can solve that problem: "Let's change the definition". If there are too many poor people under the poverty line then move the line down. That should buy a lot of groceries. How is that for a brilliant Tory solution? By a stroke of the pen let us tell them they are not poor.

The member for Don Valley North has got news for those who live in Calgary; Edmundston, New Brunswick; Mississauga; Welland; or Halifax. She has figured out their problem. If they are poor then she has the solution to their problem. She is going to rewrite the definition. They can go the grocery store and tell them what the member for Don Valley North said. She says they are not poor at all. They are not poor. The government just wrote the rules the wrong way so it is going to change the rules for them.

What is it going to put in their pockets? We know what the government has put in the pockets of the Bronfmans because I have just been through that in discussing Bill C-92. There is no question about that. Do not take my word. The lady from the University of Victoria Law School says: "This is an interest free loan to Canada's wealthiest families". How many of the not so wealthy families in Canada would like to have an interest-free loan so they could buy some groceries, fix up the house, fix the roof on the house, or pay to send their young fellow or young girl off to college or university?

There are a lot of Canadians out there who would like that kind of leg up from the government. The government is not particularly interested in those people. What does it spend the time of the House doing today? We are discussing a bill to benefit a few people who can afford those family trusts. That is what this is all about today.

I had to get up and debate it and put on the record my party's position, and my own position on behalf of the 85,000 people I represent in Burin—St. George's, but the whole bit of legislation is a pure waste of time.

• (1205)

The explanation that came out is interesting too. One of the people who will probably be running for the leadership actually sponsored this piece of legislation, the former Minister of Finance. It is interesting that the other piece I kept mentioning, I say to my friend from Gander—Grand Falls, Bill C-113, was sponsored by another would-be prime minister of this country, the minister of employment.

I will be interested to watch the news as it unfolds during the next few months to see how these two guys explain that. How do they explain that their names are associated with two bills, one to pamper the rich, this one, and the other to pummel the poor, Bill C-113?

Do they want to be prime minister of this country? We have just been through that kind of prime minister, thank you very much. One is enough for the next hundred years or so.

This bill first of all is a waste of the time of this House. There are more important things we could be doing here.

I started to say that when the former Minister of Finance explained the reason for this bill some months ago, he indicated that without it things would be very complicated. Is that not awfully tough? Can you imagine those poor old Bronfmans down there? Can you imagine them having to shell out a few more bucks on another legal bill to straighten out their family trust?

Would you not like to be in the kind of situation where you had a trust that was so rich and so complicated that you had to get a lawyer to straighten it out for you? Is that not a rough tough position to be in? Do not worry.

Your ever-trusting former Minister of Finance is coming to the rescue. If you rich people out there are having trouble with your legal fees, with your complicated family trust, he is coming to the rescue. He who wants to be the prime minister of this country, there he is, aided and abetted by the minister of defence and the minister of employment. There they are ready to see that the Steinbergs of this country do not have undue agonizing over their legal problems. He will straighten it out. Do you have problems? We will pass a new bill for you, folks. There is no problem at all.

If only the ordinary people of this country had the same access to this Chamber, if only the ordinary people could get that kind of action, if only those 325,000 people who have lost their manufacturing jobs over the last nine years since the gentleman from Baie Comeau became Prime Minister had that kind of responsiveness from this House, what a great country it would be. What a great government it would be.

The question is, should we pass this rich man's bill. Should we help the former Minister of Finance in his quest to make things legally simple for the richest in this country? I do not know about the rest of them here, but we in this party are against this bill. We are against Bill C-92. Not only is it a waste of time, but it unfairly gives an advantage to those who need it least.

I am looking forward to hearing from my friend from Mississauga South. He is panting over there. He is all ready to get up. He is going to explain to us the fine points of this bill. Unlike him, I do not have the financial training that he does. I did not come here to represent that sector of society. I came for a completely different reason altogether.

He too has an opportunity to rise in this place and tell us why it is he is so chafing at the bit to see to it that the Bronfmans and the Steinbergs are properly protected. They should be as long as their protection is no more gilt-edged than the Smiths, the Levines, the Jones, the Leblancs and the others in my riding and across this country.

We do not stand here to oppose the concerns of particular people, but only to ask that those concerns be dealt with in a way that does not trample on other people. That is why during my few minutes, and I realize that my time is up, I talked about the two bills together, Bill C-92, which in my view is a rich man's bill, and Bill C-113 which pummels the poor, the unemployment changes bill.

• (1210)

These two have to be taken together because it puts in stark relief what this government is doing to various groups of people in this country. That I deplore and that is why I am so opposed to this particular bill.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, yesterday we heard of the departure of the Prime Minister. My leader has described him as brother Daryl and we know that the opposition is led by the other brother Daryl. I am really puzzled by this debate.

We heard the member from the Official Opposition raking the government over Bill C-113 which cuts unemployment benefits from 60 per cent to 50 per cent. This is the same party that cut those benefits from 66 per cent to 60 per cent. Now he rakes them for this tremendous gift to the very rich, the Bronfmans, the Reichmanns and so on.

I ask him who was the first to give those rich people this gift back in 1972? Who provided the shelter for the trusts in 1972? Why, if it was so good then, is my other brother Daryl raking the government for doing the same thing in 1993?

Brother Daryl and this other brother Daryl, as most Canadians know, stand for the same thing. We hear great eloquence condemning what is given to the rich and taken from the poor by the Official Opposition, but they seem to forget that so much was taken back from the poor and given to the rich when they were in power.

My question to him is how does what the Conservatives are doing now differ so dramatically from what the Liberals did in 1972 when they created the shelter that is being extended by the Conservatives today?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, today I am wearing my very special suit. It has a pocket in here and a pocket in here. I call it my NDP suit.

You see, if I want to be against Hibernia I put my position in this pocket. If I want to be for Hibernia, I put it in this pocket. That is how they treated Hibernia. That is how they treated most other subjects.

My friend from Windsor—St. Clair, one of the acolytes in the "McLaugh-in" economic choir, that funny money choir you heard singing last week, has the audacity to get up and talk about somebody with two positions on an issue. Talk about the pot calling the kettle black. You talk about it.

I could take him through a dozen examples in this House where that party has been on both sides of every issue, where everybody in that party should wear a suit like this with at least two pockets.

The member asked a question and he will get the answer to his question. I tell the acolyte in the "McLaugh-in" economic choir that he will get his answer. I gave the answer in my speech. I said yes. In 1972 it is true the government—

Mr. McCurdy: Now you have changed your mind.

Mr. Simmons: Now he says I have changed my mind. Does he not know that yelling by itself does not mean much unless you are saying something. Does he not know that?

I said in my speech about 15 minutes ago and made reference to the fact that this was brought in in 1972. There are two things. One, I said I thought 21 years was enough to allow these people, the Bronfmans, and the rest, to get their house in order. Two, I say to him that neither I nor he were here in 1972. Do I take responsibility for everything that happened decades ago? No.

• (1215)

I will tell him this and he had better be governed by the same principle. While I am here in 1993, if I see something that is wrong, I will get up and say so, whether or not somebody in my party did it or somebody in somebody else's party did it.

This whole idea of my party, right or wrong, is an NDP idea. It is not a Liberal idea. It is an NDP thing. He should not get trapped into it because if he does, he is going to have to be in Newfoundland telling the people that he is for Hibernia, but when he goes to Toronto he is going to have to tell the people that he is against Hibernia like his leader has done on several occasions.

He should make up his mind whether he is going to preserve the credibility that he is known for or whether he is going to say my party right or wrong. If he does the latter, he is on a very sticky wicket.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I have a question and a short comment.

Since 1972 and even prior, the political party that voted against the great budgets of Allan MacEachen which closed every loophole and even more, the great budgets that were presented by Liberal administrations and the great tax changes that cannot be denied by anybody because it is a part of our history, were opposed by the NDP and the Tories.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: It was the Liberal government that brought in the closures of the loopholes that they now so vehemently brag about.

Let me ask a question of my—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a moment. My ears have been asking my head, where are we? Are we in a school yard or in the House of Commons? The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, exactly. The NDP member from Windsor who spoke should stick around because I am going to tell him the historical facts on tax changes in about 45 minutes. I have now decided to have a few words to say in this debate because of what he just said concerning the NDP and the Liberals.

I want to ask the hon. member for Burin—St. George's if he has any opinion at this moment in time regarding the fact that the number of people making over $200,000 a year, as reported on their income tax returns, and who pay zero income tax in this country has doubled? According to the latest figures from Statistics Canada, the numbers have doubled on their reported gross earnings on their income tax returns year over year from 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend from Gander—Grand Falls. He is perfectly right. The numbers have doubled. He is not surprised and I am not surprised. I am not surprised because that has been one of the objectives of this administration, to see to it that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

The statistic that I keep quoting is this. Since 1984, if you earn $100,000 or more, your total federal taxes have gone down by $1,200. If you earn $20,000 or less, your total federal taxes that you pay have gone up by $1,600 a year.

As I said with the two bills, they are pummelling the poor and pampering the rich.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have been listening with great interest to the exchange between the hon. member for Burin—St. George's and the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

I am still not quite clear what the intellectual process has been that the member for Burin—St. George's has gone through in arguing that in 1972 it was totally acceptable and in fact necessary for a government that was starting to pile up deficits at that point to preclude any payment by the wealthy families of this country to the public revenues of this country through this family trust. Why was that such a good idea and such a necessary measure in 1972, and is now so abhorrent in 1993?

• (1220)

Mr. Simmons: It will not be difficult to answer that particular question. First of all, I said I was not here in 1972 and I have no idea what the rationale for it was. I also said that if it needed any time at all, 21 years was surely enough.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I am not going to deal with the entire bill here. The bill is a rather extensive annual bill dealing with income tax amendments that have been found necessary as a result of the activities of the department of revenue. There are necessary changes that have to be made from time to time to clean up problems in the act. One of the problems we have in the Income Tax Act is the question of the capital gains to be realized on trusts as a result of an amendment, change or provision actually made in 1971 when we created capital gains in the Income Tax Act.

To refresh everyone's memories, as of January 1, 1972 we brought capital gains in to Canada. Today when a person dies his entire assets are subject to capital gains tax as if he had sold the assets on the public market at the date of his death, the instant before he died. So today when a person dies, one takes the value of his assets from the valuation date of January 1, 1972 and determines what gain has been made on those assets to the date of death and tax is paid at that time on those assets.

The whole problem of trust is a situation that is often misrepresented. Trusts are very, very necessary. As a lawyer in a small town I invariably put a trust provision in most of the wills I drew for families. The reason was very simple. The assets in a family would go from the mother to the father and if both were dead, then the children would have to be looked after. People usually wanted to look after the children equally, but some children would be under 21 or under a certain age and they wanted them to have the assets. A trusteeship would be set up in that case to look after the assets for the children until it became an appropriate time to divide the assets. We almost invariably drew trust wills to make sure families looked after their children.

The objective of this particular series of amendments is to tie down and straighten up, codify and clean up some of the problems that result from the original provisions of the Income Tax Act dealing with trusts.

One of the problems we have right now is that while a trust has to realize its capital gains after 21 years in existence, there is nothing to prevent the roll over of the trust. So you can now roll over a trust to the next situation and then go for another 21 years. Under the current provisions of the statute trusts can be rolled over and rolled over. The consequence of this amendment is to make sure a trust can no longer be rolled over.

The other amendment is to make sure that when the first beneficiary of the trust in the next relationship to the settlor, testator or whoever set up the trust dies, the trust has to be wound up for the purpose of capital gains tax and capital gains tax must be paid. Even though the trust itself might carry on beyond that point, the trust would have to pay all its capital gains at the time on the death of the last person in the first generation. We are trying to clean up what is currently a bit of a mess in the Income Tax Act. The previous speaker mentioned various very wealthy families and how they were going to benefit, but at no point did he specify how they would benefit. He just listed a bunch of names of a lot of people who presumably have wealth. I do not know if they have wealth or not, but I do know what the situation is with many of my own constituents.

• (1225)

Often family members will come to a lawyer because they believe a member of their family is a spend-thrift, incompetent or incapable. They want to set up some asset for the benefit of that person for the length of his or her life. That is very frequently the situation. The problem is that under the current statute the trust either has to be rolled over or terminated in 21 years. Frequently that creates a real problem because it causes the forced sale of an asset in order to get the money to pay the capital gain, if any. If it cannot be rolled over it is a real problem. If it can be rolled over then there is still a great legal problem. Therefore we have said the trust can be carried on until the particular beneficiary of the trust passes away. Then it has to be wound up as far as the capital gains tax is concerned.

Now remember, we are only talking about the capital gains tax and the gain made on the asset. Capital gains tax is paid on all the assets of the settlor that go into a trust, whether it is an estate or an inter vivos trust.

Suppose there was no trust. Suppose that instead of putting the assets for a crippled daughter, for example, in trust she was just given title to the assets. She would receive title and the capital gain would have been paid by the estate. She would not have to pay capital gains tax on that asset again until she either sold the asset or died and there was deemed realization.

Why should the matter be any different with the imposition of a trust? There is really no difference at all. We make a grant to a trust the same as a grant to an individual. In the case of an individual, the capital gains on the second sale, if there is a further gain, is paid either when the asset is sold or when there is a death and that creates what is called a deemed disposition. We say the same thing ought to apply on the trust. When the asset is sold by the trust or the beneficiary of the asset dies, the capital gain must be paid. We are trying to make the matter equal for everyone. There is no attempt to create any massive tax shelter for the rich, the poor or anybody else. We are trying to clean up the question of the deemed realization of capital gains in a trust.

I would like to say that trusts are very common. They are not deemed and dreamed up to bury money for tax purposes. This government, through a whole series of loophole-closing devices has stopped virtually every conceivable use of trusts or powers of attorney or splitting of assets or cheap loans and deductions and so on with one change in the Income Tax Act after another. There is no use in a trust to save tax. When assets earn a profit in a trust they pay income tax exactly the same way an individual pays income tax on the profits every year those assets earn income. A trust pays income tax and files personal income tax returns the same as an individual files personal income tax returns.

If money is paid out of a trust then the beneficiary of the trust has to pay the income tax. The trust can deduct the money it pays out and the beneficiary pays the tax. If the money stays in the trust then the trust pays the tax. On cumulative trusts that is exactly what happens. The trust pays the tax on the income from the asset and the cumulative income from cumulated savings the same as you do. There is no magic in these systems.

Trusts are set up to control the ownership of assets to prevent them from being disposed improperly, to prevent the beneficiaries from having the control of the asset and to make sure the beneficiaries have the income from the asset. They are set up as control mechanisms in estate planning by people who want to transfer assets to people and retain the control of those assets. They are not designed for any other purpose.

There is no rationale to say they are somehow tax saving schemes. They are not tax saving schemes. They are planning schemes. They are designed for families who have people within the family who the testator or the settlor believes cannot handle his or her own affairs. It is in the best interest of the family that the asset we are talking about be held in trust. When it is held in trust it is protected in trust so the beneficiary cannot dispose of it, sell it, mortgage it or do a lot of other things beneficiaries might want to do, particularly beneficiaries who have great capacity to spend money but not earn or save it.

This whole concept is to put a trust law in place vis-à-vis capital gains that is identical to the trust law or the law in place with respect to capital gains made by ordinary individuals.

It has been said that there are a lot of trusts outstanding that have been outstanding since prior to 1971. Well most of those have been wound up but there are some still outstanding. The statute will prevent any roll overs of those trusts and make sure that on the first generation removed from the settlor or testator, those trusts pay capital gains tax and for that purpose they have an extension. The capital gains tax they will pay will be the same capital gains tax you and I would pay if we had something we had given to us or inherited or bought prior to January 1, 1972. We would pay the gain from January 1, 1972 to the date of our sale or our death.

There is no tax sheltering or hiding here. There is no loophole here. We are cleaning up a very difficult situation for people who are planning the affairs of their families and trying to look after their children by giving them assets they cannot sell or dispose of during their lives. When those children die then the trust will be wound up or forced to pay the capital gains tax on any gain. This, I repeat, is not a scheme to try to defraud the revenue or cheat on revenue or save or eliminate tax. This is strictly a statute provision designed to clean up what is a legal nightmare for a great number of people right now.

• (1235)

It is to clean up the problems so that those in future who create these trusts will know the rules and we will impose these rules on existing trusts. There is nothing to be gained here by getting nasty about it. We are going to have witnesses and hold hearings on the matter.

I have been asked to make a motion before I sit down. Madam Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to refer Bill C-92 to the Standing Committee on Finance instead of to a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion as presented by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: So ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the member would tell us how many trusts are involved, what the size of these trusts is and what is the exposure of the treasury if this bill is passed.

As the member from Newfoundland indicated earlier it is not people who worry about the end of the month who are interested in this bill. It is people who, and perhaps the member can give us some facts and figures to show otherwise, have large amounts of money which they want to pass on to their children who are interested in this bill.

I wonder if he could tell us something about the nature of the people or the assets of the people who are asking for this bill to be passed.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the detail of what is anticipated to be affected by this bill will be set forth fully in committee. We certainly will have witnesses on that.

In my experience as a practising lawyer I can say that generally the people we are talking about are not necessarily wealthy. They are often people who have a member of the family who is not competent to handle their affairs. They want that member of their family and their kids to have a house.

They buy a house and put the house in trust with a provision to make sure there is money to keep the taxes up so that family member will have that house for his or her lifetime. The family member cannot mortgage it and cannot sell it. He or she cannot do a damn thing except live in it, and usually on certain terms and conditions of maintenance. That is the kind of thing that happens.

We have here a provision concerning the capital gain that would be then payable on that house, because it would be a trust house and would not be a private dwelling house owned by a homeowner. It would be owned by the trust. The capital gain on that house would have to be paid when the death of the family member for whom the trust was set up occurred.

That is the provision of this act. The trust cannot be rolled over or anything like that for another period. It has to be collected at that one point. I drew two or three of those types of situations in my law practice before I came to this place. There are a lot of these types of situations.

Another situation that often occurs is when there is a family business and it is felt that in the interests of the family that the shares of the business stay in one block. The consequence is that the shares are held by a trustee in a block for all the family members. Under the provisions of this statute the trust would have to be wound up and the capital gains on the assets in the trust would have to be paid on the death of the last family member.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is such a thing as an anti-avoidance rule. The hon. member knows that if people are trying to get around the 21-year rule they have to go before a judge and prove that they are not just trying to avoid paying taxes.

I want to ask the hon. member this question since we gave unanimous consent for this bill to go to his committee. I want to ask him this question. There are going to be witnesses. The associate dean of Osgoode Law School said that in his opinion the number of trusts involved represent not only most of Canada's billionaire families, but multi-millionaires, your basic millionaires and those who certainly earn more than your average household income. They can afford to pay those taxes now and the country certainly needs them. By letting the trusts off the hook the government is allowing a substantial amount of tax revenue to be deferred just when it needs it most.

• (1240)

The dean of the University of Victoria Law School in British Columbia, Maureen Maloney—the hon. member wants to talk about lawyers—says that it is nothing more than an interest free loan from the government to Canada's wealthiest families.

A tax expert is quoted today in the paper. The paper says: "Toronto tax lawyer Kathryn Bush has reviewed the legislation in draft form for her clients and said yesterday the government's replacement for the 21-year rule may be more generous than intended. It is entirely wide open. It could have been less generous".

Is the hon. member prepared to call these witnesses, these experts who certainly know more about trusts than a great many members in this Chamber, who have expressed their opinions and have talked about Canada's billionaires benefiting? Will the hon. member give a commitment that he will call them as witnesses before the committee?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I would think that it would be absolutely imperative that we have the benefit of Professor Neil Brooks. He has made all sorts of allegations that this particular provision is a tax avoidance scheme. It is imperative that the members of the committee hear from Professor Brooks. I did not know there was another dean in Victoria but we could call her too. I think it is imperative that we have Professor Brooks before us.

I want to assure my friend that if Professor Brooks is right we will have to make sure that the statute does not go beyond the committee. However, I suspect that we are going to find that Professor Brooks is so full of New Democratic Party logic that his testimony will be of that nature.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has made a somewhat disparaging remark about the associate dean of Osgoode Law School. I also mentioned the dean of the University of Victoria Law School in British Columbia, Maureen Maloney, who is recognized as being an expert on tax law in this country. The other lady I mentioned is a recognized tax lawyer in Toronto, Kathryn Bush.

Is the hon. member saying that these experts, the dean of the Victoria Law School and the tax expert that I just mentioned, are associated with a political party in this Chamber? Is that what the hon. member is saying?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I do not have any knowledge concerning the lady from Victoria or the lady who writes in the newspaper, though I usually find newspapers not all that accurate in this country. I think that even the hon. member will agree that the day they get it right will be a frosty Friday.

I certainly do know of the professor at Osgoode Hall about whom he speaks, from the law school at York University. I do know of his credentials with a certain political party. I want to tell the member that while the other people may not belong to that party, certainly the one I mentioned does.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to follow in this line of questioning, having Maureen Maloney, the dean of the University of Victoria Law School, as a personal friend of mine. Her political affiliation is not relevant in determining whether she would be a good witness before the finance committee on this very important issue.

The same also goes for the dean of the law school at Osgoode Hall, which is a very prestigious law school.

• (1245)

Both Dr. Neil Brooks and Dr. Maureen Maloney may elevate the debate in the finance committee on this important issue. I ask the member whether he wishes to call them as witnesses before the committee.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I think they would both be excellent witnesses. I indicated to my friend from Gander—Grand Falls that we would certainly call Neil Brooks. He is close at hand. If Dr. Maloney would also like to come we could certainly call her.

I want to say very clearly to this House that there is no intention on the part of the government to in any way do anything more than to correct this current situation that was created in 1971 so that we treat trusts in the same fashion as we would treat transfers to individuals in an absolute form. There is no attempt to try to give an advantage to any one group of people.

I know what has been said and it has surprised me. I certainly will want them to be able to present evidence that there is some kind of huge advantage being given to anyone because in my view and in the view of the government there is not. I give her the undertaking that if they can show that some huge, advantageous loophole is being given then we will not be able to pass the statute the way it is written.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words about this legislation given the responses of the government, of the chairman of the committee, of the minister in introducing it and of some members in this Chamber.

This is tax time in Canada. Many Canadians are preparing to fill out their income tax returns. Of those people who have gone to what are called discounters, companies like H & R Block and several others who advertise, to get an advance on what Revenue Canada owes back to them a great many of them right now have discovered that there is an attachment on their returns.

These are ordinary Canadians. There are 14.6 million Canadians who fill out income tax returns. The vast majority of them are what we would call ordinary Canadians and a great many of them look forward to getting a rebate or refund on their income tax return.

The government claims that times have been so bad in Canada that it has had to go back over its books and try to find out which taxpayers in Canada probably owe it money. There are tens of thousands of people finding out today that they somehow owe money to the federal government for student loans in the 1960s.

Further tens of thousands of people will discover when they fill out their income tax returns this year that they will not be getting any rebate because the government says they owe for student loans back in the 1960s.

What has happened is this, and it is not only student loans. The government has approved a measure so that if people are listed by any government department as possibly owing money from years and years ago it can then just be sent to the income tax department and it will put an attachment on their refund. That is what is happening in Canada. These are tough times. We have to address the deficit. Ordinary Canadians are trying to struggle with that and they say: "We are in a bad financial bind in Canada. We do have to pay more taxes. Perhaps the government is right to try to collect money that is owed". In a great many cases with regard to student loans it finds that these people do not owe a penny in student loans from the 1960s. Their names are showing up on the computers at H & R Block and every tax discounter in Canada with orders to call the regional taxation office. That office will then tell them to phone the Department of Secretary of State to find out about student loan money they owe.

• (1250)

That is reality in Canada today. We have a new income tax return in Canada today. Ordinary Canadians will no longer get the T1 General. Do you realize that, Madam Speaker? That is a massive change.

How does the government decide that 13 million of the 14.6 million taxpayers should only get this little tiny guide, the little tiny T1 Special? It looks back over its records to see if they have been involved in things that are more complicated than a simple T1 Special return. It does not want to waste money sending out the T1 General form.

The government announced today that the province of Newfoundland now owes it more money in equalization. In fact six provincial governments owe it $600 million that now has to be paid back because the government says they were overpaid. These are hard times. Historically Tory times are hard times and Canadians are realizing that.

What are we doing in this Chamber today? We are passing new laws on income tax. What is the subject under discussion here today in this Chamber? It is about an aspect of this particular bill that involves a change that will mean people will not have to pay taxes to the federal government that are due this year. That is what this bill is all about.

To put it in context, in 1971 Canada had what was called an inheritance tax, commonly referred to as an estate tax. That tax was levied prior to 1971. It was done away with in 1971 by the Government of Canada under Pierre Elliott Trudeau who was the Prime Minister and sitting to his right was the present Leader of the Opposition.

They sat there when that law was changed. The inheritance tax was done away with and replaced by the capital gains tax. I think that is generally accepted by everybody. The capital gains in a way replaced the inheritance tax because upon death, as the hon. member just noted, the property is deemed to have been sold for purposes of capital gains. Of course capital gains are at only half the normal rate of taxation.

When the government said it was going to do away with the inheritance tax and bring in the capital gains tax in 1971, there were an estimated 10 billionaires in Canada. In fact most writers claim we have more billionaires per capita of any industrialized country in the world. That has been repeated and repeated. The government knew that the most wealthy people in Canada would probably find a way to avoid paying it. I am not talking about a loophole. The word loophole has been used loosely in this Chamber by the Tories and the NDP. A loophole is an unintentional error in the design of the tax law. We are not talking about unintentional errors here. These are intentional errors; so-called incentives built into the Income Tax Act. The government sat down and it decided: "All right now, ordinary Canadians are going to have to pay capital gains, but perhaps some of the wealthiest people in Canada will try to get around paying the tax bill that was normally referred to as the inheritance tax, the estate tax because they will probably put it into a trust which does not die". You can die but your trust does not die.

• (1255)

The government passed what is now called the 21-year rule which said all taxes that would have normally become due to the Government of Canada by the replacement of the inheritance tax with this capital gains tax upon death would become due in 21 years. That started in 1972 and in the intermediary period of 1971 and 1972 most people analyzed it and said in that one year, by giving a tax break there, it is worth $66 billion. Now what does 21 years from 1972 add up to 1972 plus 21 years? Seventy-two plus 21. What year is that? Is that a year we have tough times in Canada? Is that a year when we have the GST? Is that a year when we have people filing income tax returns in my riding of Gander—Grand Falls and all around and learning they are having their income tax attached. Is that the same year? That is this year because 1972 plus 21 is 1993. It is this year that all of this money would have come due.

That is why the dean of the law school in Victoria is saying that billions of dollars are involved. The government's answer in this bill is: "No, we are going to change the 21-year rule until the youngest member of the family dies". How many years is that? Is it estimated at another 30 years, perhaps? "We are going to defer what the 21-year rule did so it will happen another 30 years down the road".

This rule was put in place to make sure the wealthiest people in this country pay the taxes normal Canadians have to pay. The big businessman will pay his capital gains like the little, tiny business man does.

Today in this Chamber we are passing a bill that will no longer have these taxes due, as these experts have claimed. The 21-year rule will no longer be there. It will be extended now. We will try to get our money out of ordinary Canadians. We will stick them with the GST. We will tell them their income tax return has been attached, but we will give a break to the wealthiest of the wealthy in this country.

I do not blame wealthy families. Some members have stood up in this Chamber and blamed the wealthy families. My goodness if the law is there, is it not there to be taken advantage of? Let us not blame people who are wealthy. Let us blame the members of Parliament who passed the laws. These are the people we should be blaming not for loopholes, as the NDP calls them, but for intentional changes to good law that were put into effect by the present Leader of the Opposition and Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau in 1972 to close a possible loophole for very wealthy Canadians.

Sometimes I am amazed at what ordinary Canadians will put up with. Do you know that when this government announced this change for the wealthy people of Canada, it changed the law in this Chamber regarding what some people can claim as entertainment on their income tax returns? Do you realize, Madam Speaker, in the midst of the GST clamping down on all ordinary Canadians and demands for repayments from widows and people who cannot afford it who were losing their homes, what the government did in this Chamber? In the last two years it changed the law relating to what can be claimed as entertainment expenses. The CBC discussed it one morning. An expert from Revenue Canada said that now under the recent changes to the act it is perfectly legal for someone to claim the services of an escort service, masseurs and masseuses as long as they have receipts. The taxpayers of Canada—14.6 million Canadians—are paying 80 per cent of the bill under entertainment and meals.

That is the change it made. Prior to this, one accounting firm would say this and this could be claimed while another accounting firm would say no. Some direction was needed. Revenue Canada gave them direction all right through this government. Now anything can be claimed that does not contravene the Criminal Code—if it enhances your business opportunities.

If everything was great and if everybody was getting a tax break in this country some of these measures might be all right, but certainly the claiming of escort services by wealthy taxpayers should never be allowed. That is what the Government of Canada has done.

There are 570 people in this country today making over a quarter of a million dollars a year who filed income tax returns and pay zero income tax. There are 13,000 Canadians today who are getting the GST rebate and make over $150,000 a year. How is this possible? It is possible because of the law and not because of a loophole in the law. It is possible because one may deduct such things as investment in foreign oil and gas developments in Colombia, Vietnam and other countries before arriving at your net income.

It is amazing what ordinary Canadians put up with in Canada when one looks at our Income Tax Act.

Let me make one further reference that some of the Tories are not going to like but I am going to say it anyway. In the Prime Minister's speech yesterday he repeated one sentence. The sentence he repeated was that the Conservative Party was very wealthy, it had a great war chest and oodles of money. It had loads of money, buckets of money, barrels of money, truckloads of money. At least that was the suggestion that the Prime Minister made yesterday.

• (1305)

The changes we are debating in the House today are going to be put through by the majority government. That does not surprise me at all. It is the very wealthy in our society who will benefit from these changes. It is the very poorest in our society that go to H & R Block today and say: "I want to get a refund on my income tax early and pay you 10 per cent or 15 per cent in the bargain to give me an advance on my income tax". Up on the screen for the first time comes the name of that person and then it says: "Refund attached, call Revenue Canada".

That poor woman turns around and calls Revenue Canada before she calls her member of Parliament. Revenue Canada says: "According to the Department of the Secretary of State in Ottawa you owe them money from 1960". The lady says: "Well I didn't hear anything about that. I didn't receive a letter". They say: "Well, no, that is the law, madam. Once they notify us that you owe them money we have to attach your entire rebate. We cannot do anything with it". The lady says: "Well what am I going to do?" The fellow says: "You can call the Secretary of State Department in Ottawa".

Today thousands and thousands of Canadians, many like this widow I am talking about, are calling the Secretary of State Department and getting a busy signal for the past two weeks. That is reality. We sit in this Chamber and debate a bill that is going to put off the payment of taxes by some of the wealthiest people in this country today, some people who do not pay the taxes that normal, ordinary Canadians pay.

I suggest to the Government of Canada that it withdraw this bill, saying it was a mistake. It should try to fix the Income Tax Act so that it is a progressive act and not a regressive act. It should try to defend the position of the people in this country who cannot afford to pay the over-burden of taxes that they have to pay today, so that people will put up with a government that has taken some terrible decisions in the past. This bill should be defeated.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend earlier made a reference to the history lesson he would include in his speech concerning the MacEachen budget of 1980.

I wonder if the member would be so kind as to give us that lesson because that is really the only reason I hung around. As I recall the 1980 MacEachen budget, before it even left this House in the fall of 1980 it had 18 changes made to it by the government and in the course of the next two or three months several changes were made. They had to withdraw the whole budget.

As I recall, the deficit forecasts were exceeded by 250 per cent. They went from $12 billion to $26 billion in one year; just a small miscalculation.

I was sitting here on pins and needles. If the member wants to take additional time why not include the Lalonde budget as well? The SRTCs—

Mr. Blenkarn: Scientific research tax credit that he voted for.

Mr. Oberle: The scientific research tax credit that he voted for. Finance minister Lalonde was sitting over here and he said: "This will cost $100 million". When I inherited the portfolio, I had to clean up a $2.5 billion mess that they had just shovelled out.

• (1310)

I was travelling around the country visiting some of these people who had taken advantage of this fraud. One guy said to me: "Look, I want to be reasonable with you. If somebody invites you to the mint to look around and just to visit to see how money is made and while you are there he hands you a big garbage bag and a shovel and says help yourself, what would you do?"

Why do you not give my hon. friend just a minute to give us his version of that particular history lesson.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I presume there is unanimous consent to allow me to do this?

Mr. Siddon: On the MacEachen budget?

Mr. Baker: Let us start first with the scientific research tax credit. For those people who do not understand what the minister is talking about, let me say that it is commonly referred to as the quick flip. The quick flip was brought in in 1984. You will notice the year that I said, 1984.

Mr. Siddon: In the spring of 1984.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member who is now a member of the government sat in his place when the Department of Finance notified the Minister for International Trade, who at that time was the Minister of Finance, that there were problems. The finance department in fact had approved it so that was the way it worked.

For example, there was the idea of building miniature submarines in Mississauga or some place close to there. I think that was one of the ideas put forward. Another one was that you could send a message from Vancouver to St. John's, Newfoundland without plugging anything in the wall. If you had any kind of an idea, the way it was structured you could go to the tax department and the tax department would judge whether you were to be given a tax credit. Say that it was for $5 million but you had to pay half of it, 50 per cent.

The hon. gentleman asked for unanimous consent which he got for me to do this. You paid half of it. Then you found some other way of getting the other half. The person would go and get a loan. There was a transaction made in a lawyer's office with an accountant, a lawyer and the bank representative. The bank was making its money on the transaction. The lawyer was not making too much. They were not very smart in the beginning because they were only making something like 2 per cent. Then they caught up to the accountants who were claiming 10 per cent and that is the way it went.

A lot of these projects never got under way. For example, the one big project costing $30 million that was approved was to find out why black and white cows were different.

Mr. Siddon: $2.5 billion worth.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member keeps repeating $2.5 billion. Here is the point and the hon. member should listen to this so that he will understand it perfectly. This measure was brought in in 1984 to try to encourage scientific research.

An hon. member: By the Liberals.

Mr. Baker: The PCs took over in 1984. I thought the election was 1984. Finance told them there was a problem. The Minister of Finance stood up in the Chamber and said: "We have a problem here so we are going to grandfather it. We are not going to end it, we are going to grandfather it". The hon. member knows. He was the minister. That continued until the end of 1985. It was not $2.4 billion as the hon. member said. The most recent estimate is $3.2 billion. I will tell him the $2.6 billion of it was while he was the minister of the very department concerned. They grandfathered it. It was grandfathered for all of 1985 and finally in the month of January 1986 it came to an end.

• (1315)

I hope that answers the question on the scientific research tax credit program. I know it intimately. I was here and I remember it intimately too. I have been looking at the waste of the present government. It was the Tories who allowed $2.6 billion of the $3.2 billion that was lost under the program. They are totally responsible.

Let us get back to Mr. MacEachen's budget. Looking back on it, I think I know what the mistake was. The MacEachen budget looked at the Income Tax Act and who was not paying their fair share of taxes. It looked at the mechanisms that were used by tax lawyers and accountants. We have them in this Chamber.

Mr. MacEachen brought in a budget that closed all those loopholes. In my language, I suppose you could say that the mesh size of his net was perhaps a little bit too small. What happened? It was defeated all right. The NDP led the charge. Its members led the charge to the closing of the loopholes that had to do with all of those, I was going to use some tax terms, but nobody would understand them.

Anyway he looked at it and said: "Look, this is what is fair for all Canadians". Then the NDP, and the record shows it, led the charge to give the wealthiest Canadians their tax breaks. That is what was included in that budget supported by the Tories.

Lo and behold, we ended up with a revision of the Income Tax Act. I can assure the hon. member that as I stand in this Chamber today representing perhaps some of the poorest, not some of the poorest but certainly representing people who have a very low income on the coastline and people in the central part of Newfoundland who are finding it hard to make ends meet.

I can honestly say that I would support every single measure brought in by the MacEachen budget if it were reintroduced in the Chamber today.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I will be brief.

This certainly has been a breathtaking tour de force in historical revisionism when it comes to tax policy in this country. It should well be compulsory reading for students of that black art.

The member reflected on Liberal tax policy going to 1972 and this particular odious provision which opened the loopholes for the wealthy in contrast to his contention that it closed loopholes, a very interesting contention.

The 1974 Turner budget which I witnessed from the gallery because I was a candidate at that time was a tax measure that opened all kinds of new loopholes. Then there was the attempt by MacEachen to close those and the Liberals chickened out.

I was just wondering, should this country be so unfortunate as to enjoy the tenure of another majority Liberal government, would the current Liberal government continue the same tax policies and philosophy of taxation as previous governments?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Can we have a short answer from the hon. member? The time has expired.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that it will be a priority of the new Liberal government to substantially revise tax policy in this country.

It will give adequate notice of any changes and seek the opinion of all groups affected. I would like to point out to the hon. member once again in closing that when his party talks about loopholes, it is not loopholes they are talking about. As I think I have mentioned in the House before, a loophole is defined as an unintentional error in the structure or design of the law. Most of what the NDP talks about is intentional change to the structure and design of the law. It is what the Auditor General should be investigating, that is tax expenditures. That is what the hon. gentleman is referring to.

• (1320)

The Liberal tax policy will be vastly different from the policy today. I can assure the honourable House and Canadian people that the number of people making over $250,000 a year who will be paying no income tax at all in this country is going to go down and not up like it is under this administration.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent of the House to call it 1.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 1.30 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

RIGHT HON. BRIAN MULRONEY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in light of yesterday's announcement by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, I would like to say a personal thank you to him.

As a new MP from a part of Nova Scotia with lots of challenges, I appreciate that he has always been accessible and approachable. He has always addressed my concerns quickly and effectively. Whether the problem was a factory in trouble or just a request to call my daughter on her birthday because I could not be there, he always responded.

I am proud to be part of his government that made record strides on behalf of women, minorities, natives and the disabled.

I believe that some day he will be credited with anticipating the effects of globalization and for creating a successful strategy to prepare Canada for it.

I would like to say to the people of Cumberland—Colchester that we have been well served by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. Personally, I am truly very grateful to him.

AGRICULTURE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the residents and constituents of Northumberland county wish the Prime Minister and the government had been as attentive to their needs.

Emergency assistance for cash croppers of corn and soybeans in my riding of Northumberland need help. Presently federally supported insurance programs have not provided the help needed. However, in today's estimates we see that instead of filling the program gaps we have further cuts to these programs.

In Northumberland county the weather conditions during the summer and fall of 1992 devastated corn and soybean crops. Approximately 80 per cent of the grain corn and 20 per cent of the soybean crops were not harvested. The direct income lost to county farmers is estimated at $7.8 million with spin-off economic losses of up to $78 million.

These farmers in Northumberland need help now. Some 16,000 people in my riding work in the agricultural sector. The government so far has failed not only to recognize the importance of their contribution to the economic health and security of Northumberland but the importance of the Canadian agricultural sector to Canada in general.

Estimates which cut back on agricultural sector funding cannot be supported.

RIGHT HON. PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my family and I were very sad to hear our leader's decision, but in politics there are often difficult choices and decisions to make.

Today, speaking on behalf of my constituents and on my own behalf, I wish to thank our Prime Minister for always being there when times were hard for the Abitibi region and for helping me deal with economic and social issues, always in the best interests of the people of our region.

I want to say how grateful I am for the exemplary courage and integrity he has shown since the electoral victory in September 1984. I want to express my admiration for both him and his family, and finally, I want to say that I appreciate the way he has defended the interests of Quebecers in Ottawa.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last April and last December in this House I called for the establishment of an international criminal court which would initially serve as an ad hoc tribunal to try war crimes in the former Yugoslavia.

Just this week the Security Council of the United Nations decided as follows: "An international tribunal shall be established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991".

This is a significant step forward for the world. I would like to congratulate the MPs from Parliamentarians for Global Action and MPs from all around the world who lobbied their governments for support. This is a unique effort.

In three weeks from now Simon Fraser University and the University of British Columbia with The International Centre for Criminal Law and Criminal Justice Policy will bring experts together in Vancouver, B.C. to put some meat on the Security Council proposal.

The next step is a permanent international criminal court so that we have in place a body that will help deter future crimes against humanity.

Finally I would like to thank the minister of external affairs and her officials for their support in this matter.

VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I know that you and all members of this House and the many Canadians who supported my private member's bill calling for the restoration of the Victoria Cross will share my pleasure today.

This morning I had the honour to announce on behalf of the Prime Minister that Her Majesty has signed letters patent adding three military medals to the Canadian honours and awards system.

The decorations for which members of the Canadian forces will now be eligible were formally approved by Queen Elizabeth on February 2. They include in ascending order, the medal and star of military valour and the Victoria Cross will be the premier award for military bravery in the Canadian award system.

• (1405)

I appreciate the Prime Minister acknowledging my role by allowing me to make this announcement.

I want to thank members on all sides of this House for their support and their encouragement. It is gratifying as a private member to know that you can have an impact on such a significant decision.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, a recent study shows that almost two thirds of Canadians would start their own businesses if it were possible.

The biggest impediment to becoming self-employed in Canada today is lack of available funds from lending institutions. Additional studies predict that the job opportunities of the future are more likely to be with small companies rather than with megaprojects or the multinationals.

When is the government going to address the problem of lack of working capital for new and small business men and women so that small business entrepreneurs can help in a meaningful way to make taxpayers out of Canada's 1.5 million unemployed?

GALA FOR CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, today's child is tomorrow's hope. We all have a special responsibility to children to ensure that their lives are as full of health, security and opportunity as possible.

As chair of the subcommittee on poverty, I would like to commend the Fund for a New Generation, a group of young leaders from Ottawa's public, private and university sectors who have organized the Gala for Child Poverty to be held on February 27, 1993. You, Mr. Speaker, are honorary co-chair of this event which hopes to raise over $10,000 for programs designed to help disadvantaged children.

The communal meal and early education programs to be assisted can help children to obtain not only good nutrition habits but also can address the social and sensory deprivation frequently experienced by poor children.

If parents are involved and contribute, it helps to achieve the dignity and sense of control important to well-being. Helping children means a better future for us all.

GALA FOR CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, 1989 this House unanimously passed a resolution expressing concern for more than one million Canadian children living in poverty and setting the goal of eliminating child poverty by the year 2000.

How well are we doing here in our nation's capital? Little has changed. In Ottawa-Carleton alone, the Ottawa Food Bank reported that of the 29,000 people it assists each month close to half are children. Shepherds of Good Hope saw on average over 1,000 children a month, an average of 60 per day. Research from the Community Foundation of Ottawa-Carleton shows us that at least 19,000 children are living in poverty in Ottawa-Carleton.

The Fund for a New Generation is a group of young leaders from the public, private and university sectors determined to bring hope to Ottawa's poor children. On Saturday, February 27 it is holding the Gala for Child Poverty to raise money at the World Exchange Plaza for the Ottawa-Carleton child poverty fund. The goal this year is $10,000 for breakfast for children, the Collective Kitchens Program and the Headstart Nurseries Program, all designed to assist disadvantaged children.

I commend these young people for their initiative and hope that it serves as an example of what we can do together to improve our children's future.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canada needs voluntary national standardized testing in education.

A recent Angus Reid poll found that less than 20 per cent of Canadians believe Canada's education system is doing a good job. The same poll revealed that 76 per cent of Canadians would support standardized testing in our education system.

Canada spends one of the world's highest proportions of GDP on education. The Economic Council of Canada ranked us 11th out of 18 countries in education. In another study, Canada placed third for percentage of GNP spend on education.

However, our students came in only ninth in math and science testing. These results give Canadians reason to worry about the effectiveness of our education system. Standardized testing has been proposed by provincial education ministers but not all of the provinces will carry out the tests.

I call on the federal government to take the lead in this area. Although education is a provincial responsibility, the federal government can help to evaluate the results of our education system nation-wide. With national standards, all concerned can work together to develop an education system which prepares our youth for the challenges of tomorrow.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, for nearly two years residents near Pearson International Airport have hinged their hopes for protection against even more aircraft noise on the report of this government's environmental assessment panel.

This report recommended that residents be compensated for the cost of aircraft noise and that the proposed north-south runway not be built because its meagre benefits would be far outweighed by the social impact on area residents.

The government's new runways will be paved with devalued homes. This report flew right over the head of the Minister of Transport. His government has turned a deaf ear to the noise concerns raised by its own panel and has left residents in the dark about restrictions on the airport's fly-by-night operations.

More aircraft noise will land on area homes but residents have been told to take off.

The Tories should stop wasting taxpayers' money on environmental panels if they are not going to pay any attention to the results.

GASOLINE TAX

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, last week's announcement by the President of the United States of a proposed BTU tax represents good news for the communities along the Canada-U.S. border. These communities, like my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, are still feeling the pinch from cross-border purchases of gasoline in particular.

It has been reported that this energy tax could raise the price of U.S. gasoline for Canadian cross-border purchasers by a substantial amount. As such this measure would lower the Canada-U.S. gas price differential and help make it less attractive to cross-border shoppers.

However, I rise today to insist that the governments on this side of the border not move to squelch this positive news. It is not time for the federal government nor the province of Ontario to think that we now have room to increase gasoline taxes.

A proposed increase in U.S. gasoline taxes will help take some of the lustre off the lower American gasoline prices so let us leave it that way.

GRAMMY AWARDS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, k.d. lang has done it again. Along with Céline Dion, la chanteuse merveilleuse du Québec, Alberta's queen of country pop has been granted the most prestigious award in western popular music, the American Grammy.

Both lang and Dion richly deserve their respective awards. Lang won best female pop vocalist for her single Constant Craving and best pop performance by a duo was won by Dion for her work on the duet Beauty and the Beast.

These triumphs were further augmented by Grammy awards to other outstanding Canadian artists Rob McConnell, Walter Ostanek and Daniel Lanois. Truly Canadian artists rank with the best in the world.

All Canadians are wonderfully grateful for the enrichment these artists bring to our lives with their work. All Canadians are wonderfully proud of their tremendous accomplishments and international recognition.

Well done, k.d. Bravo, Céline. Congratulations, Rob, Walter and Daniel. You bring joy and honour to Canada.

SAINT-HYACINTHE DISTRICT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, February 24, the Chamber of Commerce of Saint-Hyacinthe district celebrated its centenary. Over the years it has become a dynamic, prestigious, and influential organization. It was instrumental in creating the economic and industrial development corporation, the tourism and convention office and the MERCI evenings dedicated to recognizing the business persons of the year.

According to the president of the chamber, lawyer Guy Cordeau, the centenary festivities will pay tribute to those who built the organization and their achievements. The theme—100 years of commitment—conveys the chamber's history but also indicates a new focus on innovation and renewal.

I am proud to be among the 600 active members of our Chamber of Commerce. This year we commemorate our past and we will continue to strive to successfully meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for letting their Deputy Speaker rise in her seat on this historic occasion in the life of the community where she was born and which she represents in this House.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications admitted yesterday that he and his cabinet colleagues have to get off the backs of small businesses. This is after nine years of Conservative government neglect in this vital sector of the Canadian economy.

Small businesses will have few regrets at the departure of Prime Minister Mulroney. Although the Conservative government does not realize it, most other Canadians understand the importance of small business to our country. It is the backbone of our economy.

These businesses have been badly hurt by this Conservative government. Tens of thousands of small businesses have gone bankrupt or closed in recent years. Free trade, the GST, deregulation, high interest rates, the high dollar and savage restriction by the banking system have all contributed to killing entrepreneurship in Canada. These hard working Canadians need assistance now.

• (1415)

We all know that in order to help small businesses we will have to do more than change the Tory leadership. We will have to change the government.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, over the past 90 days I have received petitions and letters from over 6,000 citizens regarding our justice system, particularly the way in which we deal with violent criminals and dangerous sexual offenders.

They wish to see our current laws amended to ensure that such offenders are not released into any community when they may pose a threat. They call upon the government to enact legislation to see that this is accomplished.

I have long been a supporter of stiffer sentences for those who choose to commit crimes. I believe that as parliamentarians we have been given the responsibility to review the negative impact of these offenders on our society and to act accordingly.

To paraphrase my constituents, the time has come for us to protect the rights of victims of violent crime rather than those who commit it.

LEADERSHIP CAMPAIGNS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, at long last the Prime Minister has announced that he is stepping down and the Tories will now hold a leadership convention.

In 1989 the member for Comox—Alberni presented a motion that was debated and passed unanimously in this House. The motion read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider establishing spending limits and strict rules of disclosure listing all campaign contributions by source and amount for all Canadian political party leadership races.

I hope the powers that be in the Tory party will remember that in Canada political parties are partly supported by public money through the income tax system. Therefore the Tories are morally obligated to impose spending limits on their leadership candidates.

At our leadership convention the New Democrats voluntarily set candidate spending limits of $150,000. Moreover, we did not issue tax receipts for contributions to the leadership candidates' campaigns. The winner, the hon. member for Yukon, spent $129,000 to become leader of a national party.

By all means the Tories should avoid the hideous example set by the Liberals for their 1990 leadership race where candidates were allowed to spend $1.7 million subsdized by the taxpayer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MAIN ESTIMATES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Last July when the EH-101 military helicopter program was announced we were told that the total cost was to be $4.4 billion. Today in the estimates we have learned that the total cost will be $5.8 billion or $1.4 billion more than before.

Why is the government persisting in implementing this impossibly expensive program that is not a priority for Canadians at all?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to know whether in fact $4.5 billion is okay with the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Is he against it completely? Are we talking numbers here or are we talking philosophy?

The hon. Leader of the Opposition will know that in fact the cost of this procurement purchase is $4.5 billion, but it is a program that goes over 13 years. Unfortunately the requirements of public accounting require the Government of Canada, as he knows as a former President of the Treasury Board, to make a budgetary allowance for possible inflation.

If there is no inflation over the period of the project and if there are no significant shifts in currency fluctuations, in fact the final cost will come in at $4.5 billion. But the accounting requirements of the Government of Canada require us to make allowance for possible inflation so that we do not wind up having overruns in the cost of these projects and get into the kind of fiscal pickle the hon. member and his government got us into without good accounting requirements.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the program was announced last July, this additional cost of $1.4 billion was not mentioned. When the contracts were signed in October, it was not mentioned. Two weeks ago, when Liberal members received a government briefing, it was not mentioned.

Why were Canadians not told the whole truth? Why does the government persist in this absolutely unnecessary spending when there are so many problems in Canada?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not an unnecessary expense; it is very important for our Canadian forces. The reason we have the estimates is to show Canadians what our projects actually cost.

We have to make allowance for possible fluctuation in interest rates. We cannot predict exactly where interest rates will be in the future, but we must make those allowances to protect Canadians against unforseen expenditures. That is the purpose of this process of tabling the Main Estimates in the House of Commons.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why, when she was Minister of Justice, she opposed the program and today she defends the program.

Canadians do not want this program. The Americans have decided not to go into this expensive system, this Cadillac system we do not need now that the cold war is over. The minister, who I hope would like to have a new approach to politics, should realize that we are not in the cold war any more and we need that money for Canadian problems right away.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not true that when I was Minister of Justice I opposed this project.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I think hon. members have an enormous difficulty with candour in government. As a participant in the process of developing government expenditure restraint guidelines I asked questions about this project. I was extremely satisfied with the justification given for this project, which is why when I became Minister of National Defence I was so comfortable defending the project and so quick to attack that hon. member for criticizing it and committing himself not to spend the money.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence.

The estimates show that funds for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency have been cut. Funds for the Western Diversification Program in the minister's own region have been cut. Funds for health and funds for social housing have been cut, yet there is $5.8 billion for Cadillac helicopters.

I want to ask the minister whether or not she agrees. If she were to take herself and her ambitions seriously and see them soar, perhaps it is time to take herself and these helicopters back down to earth and cancel this extravagant program.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that funds for the Department of National Defence have also been cut in these estimates. All departments have participated.

I would like to make sure that Canada has the capability in the long run—not over five years but over forty years—to patrol the area of that hon. member's constituency, to be able to patrol our fisheries and to be able to guard our coast. These helicopters, far from being Cadillac helicopters, are simply technology of the nineties. Right now, in the words of our own military, we have technology of the fifties built in the sixties.

I think Canadians deserve the technology of the nineties to serve them into the 21st century.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the only cuts in the Department of National Defence are the wages of the men and women of that department that have been frozen by this minister.

[Translation]

If the minister is a serious candidate for the leadership of her party, she should start paying attention to the 50,000 people who marched in the streets of Montreal and who know the country has more important priorities than spending $5.8 billion on helicopters.

What are the minister's priorities: outrageously expensive helicopters or Canada's unemployed?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these helicopter contracts will create 45,000 person-years of work for Canadians, especially in industries that are important for our future and that are on the leading edge in terms of knowledge, technology, computers and so forth.

I feel it is important to support these industries. If we cancel the contracts, it will mean a loss for Canadian industry, not just a loss of search-and-rescue capability.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

According to the government's estimates today it is clear that Canadians who are suffering from unemployment should be going to retraining. According to this government's priorities they should either go for retraining in spy school, judges school, helicopter pilot school or space school, because these are the priorities the government sees and they are the only growth industries that the government sees. For everybody else, it is off to the unemployment line because there is nothing in the estimates to create jobs.

• (1425)

Will the Deputy Prime Minister seriously look at creating jobs in this country, not just jobs for more judges and higher salaries for judges and more spies for Canada but jobs for people throughout this country in every region, and attack unemployment now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, and yes, we are. The economic statement outlined a number of initiatives to enhance the small business sector which has generated 80 per cent of the jobs over the last 10 years in this country.

Investments and further enhancements in research and development, further investments in training and skills upgrading, and investments in infrastructure to improve the competitiveness and the productivity of our country, in addition to the 161,000 jobs created since August of last year, are good indicators of what we see occurring.

All the economic indicators with respect to growth in the GDP, housing starts, retail sales, investments and export sales are leading in the right direction. Those are the indicators that reflect the buoyancy of the economy that is occurring. It is not as robust as we would like, but we are also going through a restructuring and adjustment process which the economic statement tried to deal with in terms of facilitating that adjustment for people and for industry.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister says that we are going in the right direction. The direction for most Canadians is still the unemployment line.

In the estimates the minister says that he is looking at adjustment programs. In fact this government has cut funding for the Program for Older Workers' Adjustment. How is that increasing adjustment for Canadians?

The government in these estimates has cut regional economic development. That is certainly not increasing jobs. The government has cut funding for farmers, for young people, for aboriginal peoples, for aboriginal groups, for older workers and for retirees. All these programs provide not only jobs but an infrastructure in a community to support those volunteers.

Having chosen these priorities and yet spending $5.8 billion on helicopters, will the government stop spending money on attack helicopters and attack unemployment instead? That is where the priority should be.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we do not see how we can spend $100 billion over five years and reduce the deficit by $8 billion or $10 billion as the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has suggested. That kind of economic nonsense is laughable.

We are trying to invest in people through enhancements in the training program; $3.8 billion is being spent on training. We are encouraging the private sector to become involved more in training. We are encouraging the small business sector to create new jobs. We have advanced on an infrastructure program that is not the $15 billion or $25 billion program the hon. member has suggested.

I say to the hon. member in all sincerity that the economic program she released last week is laughed at around the world. It does not make economic sense. It certainly does not make fiscal sense.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to me that when a political party brings out a job plan that will create jobs in this country and reduce the deficit, this minister feels it is laughable.

This is a government that has discouraged more Canadians in the employment market and discouraged more Canadians in every region of this country who have lost hope than any other government before it. This minister should be ashamed of what he is setting out.

[Translation]

Even worse, although according to the government these helicopters would be less expensive to maintain, they will cost $33 million more annually in operating costs than those we have now. Just imagine what the government could do, all the programs it could finance.

Why does the government not drop this crazy helicopter program?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the recipe that the hon. member outlined in her statement last week would result in a bigger deficit, higher inflation, higher interest rates, less investment and fewer jobs created.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who just indicated he is concerned with deficits. The COSICS, now SIGNET, system computer contract, which was originally to cost $111 million for external affairs has now jumped to $208 million. Today in the estimates it is $224 million.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, who just indicated how interested he is in cost reduction, how he can continue to pour money into a scandal plagued scheme that costs $224 million and does not even work? How can he do this?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services and as a former Minister of Supply and Services, I do not for one moment accept the preamble of the hon. member's question.

The facts speak for themselves. Tenders are always very open, very clear cut and allow businesses to compete evenly and fairly. It is my understanding that this contract is being applied according to normal procedures and regulations.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I will let the courts decide on that part of the answer of the minister.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who said he wanted to cut the fat out of government spending. Today, we have the example of a contract which costs $224 million, and although experts have said the system is already obsolete and does not work, the government continues to spend money on the project.

How can the government, in good conscience, spend and waste taxpayers' money in this way?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I disagree entirely with what the hon. member just said. First of all, the COSICS program is over. We are now in a new communications phase, called SIGNET, and everything is proceeding satisfactorily.

[English]

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of Treasury Board.

On several previous occasions I have asked this minister to look into incidents of sexual harassment in the Public Service in Halifax. The minister responded that as an investigation was under way, his hands were tied.

The final report has now been released. Sexual harassment was found and it was also found that management did not correct matters. Why is the minister refusing to take the necessary steps to correct this horrible situation?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that we are indeed looking at that and the Public Service is taking the proper action.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Treasury Board guidelines state: "Harassment is an offence subject to disciplinary measures up to and including discharge".

Again, the report found the offences, including retaliation. Nothing has been done. A single mother has been thrown out of work and a mother of two small children has been thrown out of work. Nothing has happened to the perpetrators. Why will the minister not move to discipline the offenders?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing here with the Public Service Commission. As the President of the Treasury Board, I have to deal with this matter with some care because the Public Service Commission, as the hon. member knows, is awaiting the final report of its appeal investigation branch. They are still awaiting it and they will be acting upon that report.

ABORIGINAL ECONOMY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Indian affairs. In a letter written before Christmas, the Prime Minister set the goal of doubling aboriginal businesses over the decade from 5,000 to 10,000 businesses.

How can the government keep that promise when the minister has slashed his department's economic development programs by almost $21 million in the current estimates and an additional $6 million from the aboriginal economic strategy in ISTC? Does the minister not understand the connection between cutting economic development programs that encourage employment and self-sufficiency and the $52 million increase in his department's projected welfare budget which will increase dependency?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this year the Government of Canada will provide through the three departments almost $350 million of assistance to economic development on behalf of aboriginal people. As well, the over-all budget of my department has grown more rapidly than that of any other department in the last eight years. This year it will increase by $350 million, if we include the northern program.

• (1435)

This year we will be spending over $1 billion on education for the first time in the history of this country, all of which indicates that in terms of the health and social well-being of aboriginal peoples, this government has been more forthcoming and more beneficial in assistance to aboriginal peoples than any government in the history of Canada.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the economic recession has hit all parts of Canada very hard, so we are pleased to see regional development help for Quebec increase by some $40 million in these estimates.

My question for the government is this: Why has this government at the same time cut regional funds by $36 million for Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario and the west? Does the government not realize that increases for Quebec and cuts for every other part of the country harms national unity very badly?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it would if it were true. I would like to tell the hon. member that we are comparing names on mains. Last year when the number was established a series of agreements with Quebec had not come to fruition so they could not be put in the Main Estimates. Therefore, when he compares the numbers he is not comparing the right numbers at all. I could list the agreements: Montreal Development Fund was not ready for the last Main Estimates so they were not included, nor was the Canada-Quebec Industrial IRDA, so all regional development funds including Quebec were cut by the same amount.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence why our peacekeeping operations have doubled, yet our financial resources allocated to it in the last year have increased by only 30 per cent?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are paying our peacekeeping bills. I am sorry if the hon. member is disappointed that we are not over-paying them. However, the amount of money in the budget is the amount of money it costs us and that is what we are spending.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, that is not an answer.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs in her testimony last week said that peacekeeping had overloaded our personnel resources. The estimates show that our financial resources to the rest of the Canadian forces in operations and maintenance have had to be cut severely in order to cope with the peacekeeping operations.

The point is and the question I would like to ask the minister is whether the government is going to continue to commit our forces to every peace operation, no matter what the size, no matter what the scope, no matter what the risk, no matter what the cost, without prior consultation in Parliament or is it going to show some balanced perspective in how we commit our young men and women abroad?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no, the Government of Canada will not continue to commit our forces, our resources, to peacekeeping without careful consultation on what our resources are and what we can afford to do in the context of our other defence priorities and what we can afford fiscally.

Peacekeeping cost $171 million in 1992-93 and $226 million was budgeted in the 1993-94 incremental costs. In addition, the Department of External Affairs is paying an additional $7 million this year as part of our assessed cost of peacekeeping operations. We pay that whether we participate or not.

The hon. member knows that costing peacekeeping is much more complex than he is suggesting. Many of the costs are ones we incurred already in terms of having people on salary and some costs are incremental.

As I have said, we continue to pay our bills and we continue to evaluate our peacekeeping resources in terms of the size of our Armed Forces, the equipment we have and the ability to sustain those incremental costs.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the government is ready to spend billions of dollars to buy military helicopters for a country with no known enemies, as far as I know, and in its budget estimates, this same government is cutting the budget of the Department of the Secretary of State by some 13.7 per cent for promotion of official languages and by 11.3 per cent for education in the official languages in our schools.

My question is for the Secretary of State. How does the minister intend to respect her obligations to the provinces, individuals, families and official language minority groups with reduced budgets? Do our children not come before weapons?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know how interested my hon. colleague is in promoting official languages and of course the support we give our official language minorities in education or in the community. Since it took power, this government has done much in recognizing and supporting official language communities. My colleague surely knows that we passed the Official Languages Act and since then other measures have been put in place to support school management in French-speaking communities, for example. I think there is a way within the budget restrictions to continue to support the communities and provinces so that we can help the communities really develop a complete learning program in their minority language.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the former minister, the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, promised official language minority groups the funds to manage their own schools and to have their own post-secondary institutions.

When will the minister follow up on this promise? When will the government put its money where its mouth is?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has just given me an opportunity to mention what has already been done in the area of school management. I recognize the importance of supporting the communities so they can develop an appropriate education by managing their own schools. An example I would like to give the hon. member, who is from Ontario, is that in 1990, we signed an agreement with the Government of Ontario to support the development of community colleges with $50 million. I think we have already given tangible evidence of our commitment and I am sure that we can follow up with other important projects in the near future.

TRADE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government assured this House last week that it intended to begin negotiations with Mexico and the United States to set environmental and wage standards for the North American free trade agreement.

With such low salaries, one ninth of ours, the Mexicans can threaten jobs in Canada, as the minister knows better than anyone.

I therefore ask the government to tell us what guarantees Canada will demand in this area and how the government will try to put them in the parallel accords?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that salaries have been lower in Mexico for many years and I do not see Canada invaded by Mexican products. The products on our markets come from high-wage countries like those of the European Community, especially Germany, and the United States. The problem he raises is not a real one in that an economy with such low wages is weak. Through trade, we must help them develop their economy. They are building an infrastructure of roads, hospitals and communications facilities and that is what we can sell them. The free trade agreement will give us access to that market.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, we see clearly once again that the government is trying to use empty rhetoric to hide the reality that is hitting us. The reality is that Canadian and foreign investors will be attracted to invest and manufacture in Mexico where salaries are one ninth of ours. I think that this government owes it to Canadians and Quebecers to tell us what it will do to protect these jobs. I ask the minister to tell us why he is not making the commitment to submit his objectives in negotiating these parallel accords to public consultation with the provincial governments.

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we should listen to what some Europeans are saying about this particular arrangement. The NAFTA agreement, according to recent European studies, should open new markets in Mexico for Canadian-based companies, but also new markets in Canada for Mexican-based companies.

• (1445)

They point out, and I quote from The Financial Post, February 17: "Productivity in Mexico is one-tenth lower than it is in Canada in most industries. It can take up to 200 workers to produce what 20 in Canada can do. Mexico's labour turnover was much higher, education levels lower, the work ethic poor. It isn't easy to produce there efficiently". This is a European speaking.

It is probably not fair to say that is true with all Mexican labour, but our productivity is higher. This is why they are looking at Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Canadians resent being taken advantage of by those few visitors, refugees or landed immigrants who come to Canada and then commit serious crimes here.

Can the minister tell the House and all Canadians that criminals convicted of a serious offence, such as drug trafficking, upon serving their sentence will immediately, in fact on the same day, be deported to their country of origin regardless of the possible consequences in that country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have introduced and passed in this House and it has now become law, amendments to the Immigration Act. Those measures were intended to protect Canadian citizens against individuals whose admission would be contrary to the best interest of this country.

The amendments relating for example to criminality and security allow us to effectively turn back or deport rapidly individuals who clearly pose a threat to our communities, but who have no record of criminal conviction. We now have a law that expands the inadmissibility provisions in the area of criminality and threats to national security.

I think that when these are implemented they will greatly improve the security of Canadians.

TELESAT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

Last year the government sold Telesat, Canada's space based telecommunications carrier, to a consortium of telecoms. At the time the minister proudly boasted, and I will quote from committee records: "The sale was completely in the interests of the public and certainly meets the test of my own department's telecommunications policy".

I would like to ask the minister if he is aware that Telesat's new owners are now poised to gut the company's marketing arm, to take it out of the picture as a competitor and throw up to 400 Telesat employees out on the street?

Does the minister support feeding Telesat to the lions as government policy and does he suggest that the loss of up to 400 Canadian jobs is in the public's interest?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the NDP still clings to the outdated notion that the best way to provide services in telecommunications is for the government to own them.

I have just come back from Vancouver at Intercomm 93. I can tell the hon. member that throughout the world, governments are turning to the private sector to provide these services because the private sector can provide them more efficiently, more effectively and at a lower cost to consumers.

Only the NDP would continue to drive into the future with their eyes focused firmly on the rearview mirror.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue.

Telesat was sold to its new owners for $154.8 million. At the time of the sale Telesat held approximately $350 million in tax credits, known in the industry as tax loss carry forward.

Will the minister confirm that part of Telesat's restructuring plan involves an application to his ministry to allow $350 million in tax credits to be transferred to the new owners and applied to their profits? Does he recognize that if he allows it to proceed, the government will allow Canada's major telecoms to recover the full cost of their purchase, to throw 400 Canadian workers out of work and to pocket no less than a cool $200 million of taxpayers' money as a thanks for their efforts?

Will the minister do something to stop this unprecedented sell-out of the Canadian taxpayer?

• (1450)

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the New Democrats have nothing better to ask so they are fishing. However, they are fishing in the wrong pond.

The question that the hon. member asks is totally hypothetical. Under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, it would be inappropriate for me to give out specific information.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: I can confirm—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: Do you want to hear the answer, or do you want to just keep on yapping?

I can confirm that Telesat has come to Revenue Canada to ask for an advanced ruling. This advanced ruling is being looked at under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, under the normal, regular, fair provisions of the Income Tax Act. Once a decision is made, it will be made public.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the person answering for the Minister of Transport.

I was wondering if the government could advise the House why it went ahead with a very expensive environmental review process at Pearson International Airport when it knew that if the environmental process was against the government, it would go ahead regardless of the cost of the environmental review process.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we certainly did not ignore the advice of the panel.

It provided the government with useful input into our decision-making process. It is, however, the responsibility of the government ultimately to make the final decision.

We have incorporated many of the concerns of the panel, on the environmental aspects and impact. I would like to quote from the report: "The impact of the proposal on the natural environment would be at most marginal and mainly temporary". The longer term effect in fact proved to be less harmful than the present situation.

We had to reject the recommendations of the north–south runway for safety reasons and will not be proceeding with the east–west parallel runways until capacity requires it.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade said yesterday that the three accords proposed by the United States "will not change the substance of the North American free trade agreement in any way".

President Clinton has refused to introduce NAFTA legislation until the accords have been negotiated. Clearly the accords which the Canadian government regards as unimportant are being treated as very important by the United States. They are being treated as so important in fact that the United States will not implement NAFTA until it has its three accords.

Could the minister explain why the government is rushing ahead today with an agreement whose operation will be profoundly affected by the demands of the new U.S. administration for parallel accords?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, when we talk about rushing, in fact what is happening is that President Clinton and the U.S. administration is catching up to Canada.

We proposed changes to the environmental framework and the labour framework over a year ago. The United States is just catching up to requests that we have made.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister answers in that fashion today whereas yesterday the minister of trade said: "I do not know what the Americans have in mind by their proposals". Which is it?

Does the minister know what the Americans are proposing? Did the minister for trade yesterday have a different impression and now does not know what the Americans are proposing? If the government does not know what the Americans are proposing, as the minister said yesterday, can this minister at least tell Canadians what this government wants?

I want to know from the minister, is the government simply prepared to accept whatever the United States puts forward in the parallel accords or will it now tell Canadians what its own objectives are in the parallel accords?

• (1455)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the government is not going to just accept what the Americans want to do in a parallel accord. That is for further discussion.

I am glad that we have finally got them to talk about things such as environmental protection, where we have taken the lead. I am glad that we finally got them to talk about certain labour standards, where we took the lead over a year ago.

The hon. member wants to know our objectives in NAFTA. Our objectives in NAFTA are as follows: We want to increase our access to the Mexican market; to improve still further our access to the U.S. market; and we want to make sure that the provisions of the FTA which have been so effective for Canada are extended to all of North America.

FRANCOPHONE COLLEGES

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Last June, the Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities confirmed that his government would pay part of the cost of establishing a francophone college in northern Ontario. Nearly three years ago, the federal government made a similar commitment, but francophones are still waiting.

Could the minister explain the reasons for this delay, which by now has become unacceptable, and tell people in northern Ontario what the government's intentions are in this respect?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question, and I am aware of his interest in a matter that is so important to the minority communities in his region.

Of course, as I said earlier to his colleague, this government recognizes the importance of education for minority communities. We have already done a great deal in this respect, and I am thinking of one example where we financed an initial envelope with the Government of Ontario, which made it possible to proceed with the Cité collégiale here in the Ottawa area. I can assure him that this particular issue is one of my priorities.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State referred to Ottawa's Cité collégiale. There are rumours that funds earmarked for a francophone college in Northern Ontario were diverted to the Cité collégiale in Ottawa, which is crowded with students from northern Ontario.

Could the minister deny this rumour and confirm to the House and to francophones in northern Ontario that a decision will be made about our college before dealing with the problems of the Ottawa Cité collégiale?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must realize that establishing colleges is in provincial jurisdiction. In fact, Ontario now has a new Minister of Education who I hope to meet very shortly, so that we can decide what to do about Ontario's colleges. I am confident that with the investments made so far, we can proceed to meet our commitments in this respect, but with the Government of Ontario. I would urge the hon. member to put some pressure on his colleagues at Queen's Park as well.

PRIME MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, recently there has been a surge in patronage appointments and a lot more are coming. There are 28 judges, 11 senators, and we understand from the Privy Council Office that a number of appointments are going to be announced tomorrow, I guess in the hope that nobody is going to notice.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this. Would he not table those appointments today? Is it the intention of the government to break the Liberal record of 1984 of 229 patronage appointments in one month in order to prevent the next prime minister from having to say "I had no choice"?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Is the hon. member worried about his application, or has he not yet got it in?

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, with that weird answer I suppose I am able to go on.

In his role as the finance minister the hon. member said that funding will be increased for the highly successful industrial research assistance program. My question to him is why did he not keep that promise; why did he leave the IRAP funding where it was before and where it has been for the last two years, without an additional penny?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I think my hon. friend is going to regret that he asked that question. Here is what has happened.

• (1500)

An hon. member: Today they have to regret every question they ask.

Mr. Hockin: In the estimates tabled by my colleague this morning, there is an increase of over $14 million for science and technology.

SEXUAL OFFENDERS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, The Globe and Mail reported on Tuesday that the Solicitor General had cut funding in Ontario for programs that treat sexual offenders. I understand that a reallocation of funds will occur in the next few months.

I and many Canadians are concerned about cuts to these programs. I ask the Solicitor General if he will assure Canadians that treatment programs for sexual offenders will continue to be a high priority for his department and will not be subject to funding cuts.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take this question on behalf of the Solicitor General who is out of the House on business.

There will be no cuts in funding for sex offender treatment programs for 1993–94. Indeed, treatment programs in Ontario will be expanded to offer additional programs such as relapse prevention programs at Frontenac, Beaver Creek and Pittsburgh Institutions and Portsmouth Community Correctional Centre. All four programs are expected to be operational by April of 1993.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise the House that notice has been brought to me that members would like to rise and pay tribute to our deceased colleague, Chuck Cook.

THE LATE CHUCK COOK

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in my close to 14 years in this Chamber, this is the first time I have risen on an occasion like this. I do so with a sense of sadness and yet a sense of anticipation.

Chuck Cook has been a good friend of mine since 1961. For most of us, the friends we encounter in this Chamber are people who we encounter upon our arrival in the Chamber or maybe slightly before. It is unusual that you have a friendship that goes back so far.

Charles Henry Cook was the director of the School of Business Administration at Mount Royal College, the United Church college in Calgary, Alberta in 1961 when I arrived as the director of student affairs. I used to tease him a little. He was a bit older than I was and he seemed to me at that point in my life a little bit wiser than I was and that was probably true. He had a law degree and masters in business administration from Western University. He was putting together a program of academic studies in business education at the university level that began with no acceptance anywhere except among his students and ended up as credit courses accepted by most universities in North America.

The tribute to that part of his life is the reality that the school is bigger, stronger, has more programs and he was the person who began it all. It was long before we had our own university in Calgary and long before we had a school that specialized in any kind of business education. He was indeed a pioneer.

However, the part of Chuck Cook's life that preceded my time with him, and it has only come to my knowledge in recent years, was that he was famous in the city of Winnipeg by 20 years of age. He had achieved the kind of fame and fortune in his local community perhaps that we aspire to in the Parliament of Canada and in our home communities. He was well-known. He was the most popular disc jockey in the city of Winnipeg by the age of 20. He was a lawyer by the age of 30 and he was a politician in this Chamber by his early 50s.

Chuck Cook is survived by his wife, Dale. On behalf of my wife I would like to say something about that relationship. As luck would have it, when our paths crossed at that community college, within a year we became neighbours of the Cooks, just down the street. Our children are of similar ages. My wife and his wife became friends. It was not inconsequential in our early days as parliamentarians that you had somebody who you had known for a while who understood your life and your lifestyle, the difficulties that were caused in your family, somebody who you felt comfortable talking to because of that earlier association. We have thought a lot since Tuesday of Dale Cook and their three children, their sons Kenneth and Colin, and Colin's children Michael, Trevor and Sean, and of their daughter Kimberley.

I think the House would like to know that as a family they were together in the last few days of Chuck's life. I think the House would like to know that the death was not sudden. It was the result of cancer, a disease which can exist over a long period of time.

Perhaps it is at least partially the mark of the man that I do not think anybody in this Chamber knew the severity of his illness. I was his Whip. I knew there were days when he found it difficult and sometimes impossible to get on an airplane to come from Vancouver to Ottawa and to go back. There was pain involved. There were other complicating factors. It was not Chuck's way to talk a lot about those kinds of things. Throughout the time I knew him he simply got on with life.

He is probably the person in my life who had read the most books. There was no such thing as paint or wallpaper in a Chuck Cook house, it was just books everywhere, tables, floor, bookshelves. Everywhere you went in Chuck's house were books and lo and behold he had read them all time after time.

That is probably what made him turn his talents to radio when he was at military college, I suspect in part to pay off a mortgage. In 1962 he became the very first talk show host. Talk radio came to Calgary in 1962 and Chuck Cook was the host. His program was from ten o'clock at night until midnight.

I became the semi-permanent guest. Chuck was a neighbour. At 9.15 the phone would ring and he would say he had just lost his guest. I put my coat on, he picked me up and told me what we would talk about in the car on the way down.

In retrospect I cannot think of a better background for budding politicians. You got on the telephone; people told you what was on their minds; you listened; you responded; you talked about it; together you sometimes came up with suggestions or solutions and you moved forward to try to implement them.

That is what talk radio was about in the early 1960s. The big city of Vancouver is what took Chuck Cook away from Calgary. In western terms, at least, it is our big city in western Canada. It beckoned with little richer radio stations. He had great ratings and off he went to Vancouver where he continued that talk show career.

He practised law. He was an entrepreneur. Ultimately he achieved something that had been on his mind for a while and that was an entry into politics. He succeeded in the election of 1979 as I did in Calgary and, lo and behold, here we were together, neighbours, same building, running around doing what the Whip told us, going from this committee to that. It was a minority government as members might remember. That is an awful shocking way to arrive in this place, as a member of a minority government. Believe me. You learn and you learn fast. Just when you thought you had learned something, you were back in an election. Both of us were lucky enough to come back with slightly increased majorities.

We experienced the thrill of opposition, the critic's role, Question Period, all those good things that so many members of this House are enjoying these days. It was kind of a good world for talk show hosts to have those roles. They fit quite well with past patterns and past backgrounds.

By 1983, in the middle of it, Chuck became the opposition Whip and subsequently, our first government Whip in a majority government in quite some time. He set some patterns and got us started on some paths in what was indeed a very big majority Parliament.

After the 1988 election, he concentrated more on the committee side of things and chaired not only the privileges and elections committee but the liaison committee which deals with all committee chairmen.

He made his contribution always in this place without seeking the limelight.

Members may want to read today the column by John Warren.

• (1510)

Many years ago, John Warren was a third member in our triumvirate, in the same period of time and in the same community college in top broadcasting. Chuck Cook hired him. In John's testimonial today I thought the words were really appropriate. I would like to put them on the record.

The words from John Warren that I would like to put on the record are as follows. In describing Chuck, he said:

> He could be serious but never took himself too seriously. "You do what you can, love your family, do not hurt anybody and hope for the best."

A simple credo but one which Chuck lived by. If you know his family, his wife Dale and the children, there is a piece of that credo in all of them.

You could disagree with Chuck Cook. In our very first meeting there was a rather serious disagreement between the two of us, but there was never an element of personal animosity in the disagreement. It was a clash of ideas from somebody who took the responsibility of learning seriously and adjudicating wisely. He never put you down. He expected you to do the same. If you came to a different conclusion, it was simply because your analytic processes were a little different. Your knowledge base might be a little different but there was certainly never anything wrong with thinking differently.

From time to time he had the courage in this Chamber to express that in a voting situation. He always had the courage in a committee situation.

One of the finest tributes that can be said of him is that when he chaired a committee, opposition members felt comfortable and government members felt comfortable. All were valued and all would have an opportunity to make a contribution.

He will be missed. Our thoughts are with his family. We wish them well. They know as members of our parliamentary family that if any of us are in a position to help them, if our help would be valuable, all they have to do is call.

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add some words at this time about our colleague Chuck Cook.

Our constituencies adjoin each other, Capilano—Howe Sound and North Vancouver. After the last election, Chuck took over part of my constituency. We worked very closely together. We represented a lot of the same people. We were involved in a lot of the same issues on the north shore of Vancouver. Our staffs really got to know each other very well over the past eight years.

I was really shocked yesterday. I was not prepared for the news of Chuck's death. It really made me think that we are indeed only here for a very short time. I still find it hard to even accept that Chuck is not here.

Chuck and I did not always agree. That would be of no surprise to anyone in this House. Chuck had this way of putting across his points. My colleagues in the British Columbia caucus know this very well. He would come in to a meeting and he would just go right at it. Whether it was in caucus, in this House or a committee, he could be gruff. He could certainly be uncompromising and he certainly stood up for what he believed in.

That is a real mark of a representative of the people in this House of Commons.

One incident last fall that I will always remember is indicative of the larger family that we are all part of in this House. It was during the referendum debate. Chuck and I were on opposite sides of that debate. That was not easy. On a number of occasions I had to argue with him on television programs and in forums in my riding. I am sure, as we would all agree, that was not an easy thing for either of us.

Our local newspaper tried to make it a real fight between us. It tried to really pit us against each other. You know how they take glee out of that kind of thing and try to make it a permanent animosity. After the referendum was over, Chuck obviously reflected well the views of his constituents once again. Very shortly after he had an occasion to address the members of his riding at a meeting and he made some very kind comments about me. That meant a lot to me because it really buried the hatchet and the difficulties we experienced over that particular issue. When Chuck was back in Ottawa I had a chance to share my thanks and feelings with him.

• (1515)

For all of us it is a difficult time when we lose someone who has worked so hard on behalf of Canadians, first as a lawyer and then a broadcaster, on all the different issues with which he was involved. Perhaps his greatest love was horses. That was a very special part of his life.

He will be missed but he will be remembered by his friends here in this House and by the people of North Vancouver and the north shore for what he contributed. He gave himself to the service of his country.

I would also like to add my thoughts at this time to Dale who has been so supportive all these years, it is very difficult to be the spouse of a parliamentarian, and to his children, Colin, Ken and Kim. We are indeed with them in our thoughts today.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words to the tributes we are paying to our colleague Chuck Cook.

Someone I once knew told me that he had written a book on banking law and was making a tour of talk shows across the country. Among those he appeared on was Chuck Cook's, when Chuck was in north Vancouver. He discovered to his enormous surprise that Chuck had actually read his book and they engaged in an extraordinarily intelligent and interesting dialogue. He said it made a profound impression on him that this was someone who had actually taken the trouble to research the work of the person he was interviewing. This was not "fly by the seat of your pants" entertainment. It was a serious effort to provide to his listening public ideas, discourse and dialogue that would give them something lasting.

The member for Calgary West pointed out why that was so. It was because of Chuck's love of learning and his insatiable capacity to read and explore ideas.

When I think of Chuck Cook I also think of his sense of humour, occasionally at my own expense I might add. However, Chuck was always somebody who could enjoy a good joke. He smoked way too much and he was not an advertisement for healthy living. When we would come into caucus or the parliamentary dining room Chuck would always have a big plate of fries in front of him which he would then finish off with eight or nine cigarettes.

I think of Chuck and I see smoke coming out of his nose and mouth but he was full of pleasure and joy, and had an ability to love life.

Another impression of Chuck which I would like to share on this occasion was his enormous pride in his children. He had a daughter whose name is also Kim, who is a lawyer. I remember a couple of years ago at the Prime Minister's dinner in Vancouver, the pride with which he introduced me to his daughter and talked about her aspirations as a young professional. Of course it was a great pleasure for me to encourage her. At that time I was the Minister of Justice.

He had that wonderful air of a father who seriously suspects that his children may have outstripped him in intelligence and that delightful deference that parents have when they look at their children who have launched into wonderful careers.

He was a truly well-rounded human being. Like my colleague, the minister for western diversification, Chuck and I were not ideological soul mates on a lot of issues. However a lot of us realize that what is really important in this life is to have genuine dialogue and a genuine clash of ideas with people who are intelligent and well informed. I do not think any of us want to be surrounded by people who only ever agree with our own positions because those positions can then become flabby and ill-founded.

Chuck Cook was always a very important part of our caucus, and kept us on our toes. As others have said, our hearts go out to his family. We will miss him, because the very bottom line is that Chuck Cook was good company.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sure other colleagues will understand why members of the British Columbia caucus mourn the loss of Chuck Cook so deeply. He was a friend to all in this House.

• (1520)

Some of us knew Chuck Cook very well. As my colleague, the member for Capilano—Howe Sound has said, he could be gruff. Perhaps that is why he was successful as a pioneer in open-line radio. It was perhaps Chuck's manner, but those of us who knew him came to discover that Chuck Cook had a heart of gold. He was always very concerned about each one of us, as our colleagues have indicated, and was always ready to offer a compliment and offer positive and helpful advice.

Chuck came to Ottawa shortly after I arrived here and took an office across the hall from me. I remember the long nights he used to work. There are two things about Chuck Cook that the House should remember. He was a consummate politician but a classic servant of his constituents in the best possible way.

Some people used to wonder how Chuck Cook could be elected and re-elected as often as he was. Those of us who knew him know he did it the old-fashioned way, by wearing out shoe leather door to door. People could not understand how some of the giants, such as Iona Campagnola and Gordon Gibson Jr., could fall to defeat to Chuck Cook, but we knew Chuck Cook. We knew what a dedicated British Columbian, and Albertan by birth, he was.

Something else that the House may not know is that Chuck Cook was—I know his family is very proud of this—the first supporter of our Prime Minister in British Columbia. In 1982 he invited the Prime Minister and Mila to come out to British Columbia where the Prime Minister spoke on the first occasion and won over friends and supporters in British Columbia.

The friend who he won first and to whom the greatest loyalty was shown was Chuck Cook. He was steadfast and dedicated to his party and to this government, and especially to the Prime Minister. For that we will always respect him.

Dale and his family, now grown up as all of our families do while we come to this place and fly that horrendous distance between British Columbia and Ottawa almost weekly, know the sacrifices he made and they too made sacrifices. Our hearts go out to Dale, Kim, Colin and Ken at this time of their bereavement. We will miss him greatly.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to speak on behalf of the Liberal Party about the late member for North Vancouver, Chuck Cook.

The respected journalist John Warren's tribute in today's Hill Times captures well what a lot of us in this House, across the prairies and British Columbia, and elsewhere felt about our colleague.

I have three short quotes from Mr. Warren's piece:

> He understood he'd pass this way only once and there wasn't time to waste bearing grudges or regrets. Unlike any politician I've known, he was totally free of vanity or envy.

The second quote is:

> He had enjoyed careers, or at least supplemented his income in all these pursuits (in politics, law, education, broadcasting, business, and horse-racing). It made for an unpredictable, often bumpy ride. And one Chuck often conceded he could not have taken without his loving and devoted wife, Dale.

The third quote is:

> He read more than anyone I know but laughed at being branded as an unschooled boor for telling publishers they weren't producing the kind of books Canadians want.

Chuck Cook and I entered this House together after the 1979 election. Serving for a decade together in the same caucus I grew to admire him greatly.

He was absolutely straight. He had strong views on many subjects, developed in the cut and thrust of debate, law practice and talk shows in all four western provinces, and he feared no one and nothing in expressing them. Whenever he spoke in the Conservative caucus most listened very carefully. Not a word was wasted. He said what he meant and meant what he said. There was no double talk, no lawyer's sophistry, no blarney, and no apple-polishing. He gave only the unvarnished truth as he saw it, and many people loved him for it.

• (1525)

This unique but quintessential westerner loved risks and he took them, from being a party Whip, with all of that risk, to horse racing, sailing or poker. I am told today that he kept the real state of his illness from his family until only late last week, presumably betting he might still beat the odds.

Although Chuck Cook both supported the leadership bid of the Prime Minister in 1983 and served him as Whip after 1984 he broke with his party, as is well known, over the Charlottetown accord. That was the first time he differed with his party in 13 years.

Why? After he cast his dissenting vote he said: "I don't care about the eastern press any more than they care about the voters of North Vancouver".

He believed the accord left western Canada even further under central Canadian dominance than now, and I quote him again: "I represent the people of North Vancouver. In the final analysis that takes precedence over my caucus or my leader". That is a statement that all of us in this House should reflect on very carefully.

Late last year he announced that he would not run again for Parliament because he and his wife wanted to "enter a new stage in our lives".

The North Shore News in North Vancouver said this about Mr. Cook last fall:

> Chuck Cook is that rarest of political birds: one who speaks his mind rather than simply mouthing the party line—They (his views) have always rung with personal conviction and sincerity, characteristics virtually extinct in the modern political arena.

In writing about this country's 125th anniversary celebration he wrote:

> One of our great strengths is the fact that we are a nation of minorities. There is no 'majority' in Canada. We are a collection of minorities, each learning tolerance from the other groups. . . To be Canadian is to have a very quiet pride and knowledge that you are extremely fortunate.

Mr. Speaker, as a British Columbian you will probably know that all of his family called him FB, Father Bear, including friends of his children. For his wife Dale's 65th birthday he flew everyone to North Vancouver for a surprise party for her. Over the past Christmas he spent many hours teaching his favourite indoor game, chess, to his six-year old twin grandsons, Trevor and Michael.

I would like to give two other short vignettes about our colleague's unique personality. When he was a 20-year old broadcaster in Winnipeg he announced that he would throw $100,000 off the roof of his radio station. There were the predictable traffic jams as he pitched the money from the building. It was Monopoly money. It made the national news.

Later in B.C. he took his family sailing. Being from the prairies I guess he did not know about tide waters and anchored near Bowen Island. At 5 a.m. they were all awakened by a rapidly approaching ship. He had anchored in the B.C. ferry lane.

Our colleague leaves behind him his wife, Dale; his children, Ken and wife Deborah, Colin and wife Lorraine, and Kim; and grandchildren Trevor, Michael and Sean. The funeral will be held on Saturday at St. Catherine Church on Ridgewood Drive.

As others have mentioned, the sympathies of all the members of this House go out to the entire family. We will remember and honour Chuck Cook in this House.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, the New Democratic Party, as a fellow member of Parliament for British Columbia and as a friend of Chuck Cook I would like to add to the eloquent words of my colleagues who have already spoken.

The hon. member for Calgary West spoke eloquently about the friendship he had with Chuck and his family. The minister from Capilano spoke about how Chuck stood up for what he believed in, and that is certainly true. The Minister of National Defence from Vancouver Centre spoke of Chuck's sense of humour, and I saw that as well.

The minister of Indian affairs, my colleague from Richmond, spoke about Chuck having a heart of gold. The member from Edmonton spoke about his admiration for a colleague who was a straight talking person. There is not a lot I can add because I think it has been covered, but I would like to say a few things.

Charles Henry Cook was born in Regina, Saskatchewan. He was educated at Northwestern University, the University of Saskatchewan, and the University of Western Ontario. He was well educated.

He was a lawyer, a broadcaster and a member of Parliament. At least in British Columbia being a broadcaster is well thought of, though I will not mention being a lawyer or member of Parliament.

I recall his hotline show. I was on the show. Many of us were on the show. I recall him being outspoken and controversial on the show. It is not unusual to be a member of Parliament and be a former hotline reporter. The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca did that as well.

• (1530)

It is very important, especially in British Columbia. Chuck and I were elected together along with many others in the House in 1979. Our ridings touched just a little bit. I represented Vancouver—Kingsway then as you know, Mr. Speaker, since you represent the next riding down, Vancouver South. Our ridings all went together: your riding of Vancouver South, my riding of Vancouver—Kingsway with a little touch of Burnaby and North Vancouver.

I remember in 1984 debating with Chuck on the Jack Webster Show. I remember being surprised at how strong Chuck's views were and what a keen debater he was. I should not have been surprised. I saw it again in the House and on different occasions.

He was the government Whip, which is a tough job I am told. He did it well. I was surprised that he was the government Whip in a way because he was so independent. Whips are not traditionally that independent and outspoken but Chuck certainly was.

I recall that during the little incident where the Mace came up and hit me in the House of Commons that he was one of the few people who got up and defended me. I do not think he was defending my actions which were not really defensible, but I think some of the members were getting a little holier than thou in their speeches. Chuck got up and corrected that.

I remember sending him a note saying: "I owe you one. I will send you a bottle of whiskey," but being a Scotsman I never got around to sending the whiskey. I regret that. Chuck, wherever your spirit is, I want you to know I am thinking about you. I owe you one and I am thinking about you now.

Outspoken, a sense of humour, a good human being: What more can one say about someone? I think that is a great tribute to him.

I wish to give my condolences to his wife, his children, his friends and his constituents. He represented his constituents and Canada well.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in May 1980 Prime Minister Trudeau appointed a task force to look into the issue of regulatory reform in Canada.

I had the honour of being the chairperson of that task force and Chuck Cook was one of the Conservative members. Chuck Cook was always constructive. He worked hard. He worked very precisely. He had a finely tuned mind when it came to looking at the issues.

What I remember most was the way he focused in and said: "I am not going to accept this report", and this was in the final days, "unless we get equality for western representation on our national institutions." CBC, the transport board, CRTC and things like this are what he fought for. He fought for them strongly and effectively.

Chuck was a strong advocate for what he believed in. Of course, he was right and he made his imprint. I was happy to work with Chuck and also to know his wife, Dale, who was a very supportive, decent, kind person. I know that Dale will miss him greatly. We will miss him here.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can ask a question of the government House leader with regard to the business for tomorrow.

While the government House leader is on his feet, can he indicate what arrangements have been made with regard to the special committee relating to the North American free trade agreement, which is to sit and travel the country?

Also, I wonder if he can indicate to the House perhaps something to do with his own personal plans. Does he intend to stay in the great constituency of Calgary Centre in the months ahead?

An hon. member: In the leadership.

Mr. Speaker: I would point out that the hon. minister does not really have to answer that if he does not wish to.

• (1535)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. minister is trembling in his boots at the thought of an opponent who thinks there are votes to be gained by giving out T-shirts in Cape Breton—at least votes in Calgary to be gained.

Hopefully this afternoon we will get around to second reading of Bill C-101, the labour code act, and then get on to Bill C-109. It would be nice to get to second reading on that and get it to committee. It is an issue upon which I think there is a fair degree of unanimity in the House.

On Friday we would like to complete report stage and third reading of Bill C-99, the Small Businesses Loans Act, which again is anticipated in many quarters and then get on to Bill C-73, the Canada Post Act.

As you know, the House adjourns tomorrow for one week. At this point I am not entirely certain what the business for Monday, March 8 will be but I will commit to both opposition parties to let them know by the middle of next week what the business will be for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of the first week back.

In terms of a committee study of the legislation related to the North American free trade agreement, we are certainly favourably disposed toward getting the legislation to a committee as soon as possible so it can organize and arrange for hearings and witnesses, both here in Ottawa and in other parts of the country. Perhaps in discussions later this afternoon or tomorrow we can firm up plans in that regard. I would rather do that before we complete second reading, simply because scheduling of second reading and the nature of the debate we will have is such that if everything is done sequentially it may be some time before we can get the material to committee for proper study.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): In the estimates of the Ministry of Transport, reference is made to legislation dealing with drug testing of employees. The document suggested it would be tabled and receive Royal Assent in 1993.

I wonder if the minister can advise this House where that legislation is in the process and when we can expect it to be tabled.

Mr. Harvie Andre: I am sorry I do not have that information offhand. I will have to look into it, discuss it and find out just where it is and I will get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): This morning I sent the government House leader a letter suggesting a very prompt, quickly dealt with motion of congratulations for the Canadian winners of the American Grammy awards yesterday. I was just wondering if the House leader or another member of the Privy Council has any intention of bringing forward such a motion today or tomorrow.

Mr. Andre: I could not get it on the cabinet agenda this morning. You can understand we may have other items of some significant import to discuss.

Like everybody else, I am proud of these two Canadian singers for their awards. As an Albertan I am proud of k.d. lang and as an Albertan I am proud of Céline Dion because she eats beef. However, I do not know if we need a government decision to express that pride.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I wonder if the government is contemplating a statement in this House by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on the aboriginal fisheries strategy, which has become an extremely important issue on the coast of British Columbia. With the adjournments that are planned in the House it looks like there will be no opportunity to provide a debate on an extremely important issue to aboriginal people in British Columbia and to all those involved and dependent on that fishery.

I wonder if this has come up on the government agenda and whether it might be possible to have the minister make a statement on progress on the work on the aboriginal fisheries strategy.

Mr. Andre: My understanding is that it is more likely to get a statement out of the minister than to get a policy position out of the NDP.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Question Period under the protection of parliamentary immunity, the member for Mississauga East stated, as is reported on page 16386 of Hansard:

> According to the chair of the kangaroo committee on poverty, children would have to be naked, homeless or on the brink of starvation before being considered poor.

This is a slanderous, bald-faced lie which impugns not only me but also our committee which has undertaken an important study designed to improve government accountability on the important issue of poverty.

Failing an immediate apology, I ask that you refer this matter to the appropriate House committee for disciplinary action.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, when a committee of the House, established ostensibly for the Canadian poor is under the leadership of someone who questions the motives of food bank operators, disputes the necessity for food banks and does not believe Canada's poor are really poor at all, I would say that Canada's poor are ill-served.

As someone who has experienced childhood poverty firsthand, I find the member's attitude and behaviour certainly like that of an idle spectator who really does not understand poverty at all and whose head and heart are mesmerized by the Ivy League in the United States.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened carefully to the intervention of both hon. members. The complaint of course is that one hon. member has been described in an uncomplimentary way and in reply the hon. member who made the original remarks is carrying on what is obviously a difference of opinion between the two members.

I hope that both the hon. members can resolve their differences. However it is not a question of privilege, it is a matter of debate. There seems to be some concern that the hon. member bringing the complaint said that what was said about her was a lie. Under the circumstances, what she means is that she does not believe there is any truth in that and it is not appropriate to say those things.

I am not going to go further with the matter. I would ask hon. members when they are referring to each other to always try to keep the debate on the subject matter and try not to personalize it because these things do wound on both sides of the House.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Danis that Bill C–101, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak again on Bill C–101 so that I can continue the comments I made on Tuesday, February 23. I said at the beginning of my remarks that Bill C–101 is a good example of the government's malicious tendency to present bills that combine poison and honey.

[English]

A number of provisions in this bill, changes to the Canada Labour Code which establish improved minimum conditions of work are certainly progressive. They represent a great step forward, reached after many, many months of negotiation among the government, employers and employees representatives.

Without similar consultation the government has chosen as well to include provisions in this bill that have no acceptance among its employees who are affected by this bill or among other labour relations. To the best of our knowledge they have not been discussed with anybody.

• (1545)

Let us talk about some of the provisions we support because they are substantial and they are to the benefit of employees.

[Translation]

In particular, I would like to comment on the proposed changes that would make parental leave more flexible, thus helping parents balance work and family responsibilities. As with the changes made to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1990, parents can have continuous leave for the year following the birth or adoption of a child.

In particular, also, the changes concerning maternity–related reassignments are in line with women's right to stay at work during pregnancy. Employers must make all reasonable arrangements to modify the tasks of a pregnant or nursing employee or to reassign her.

[English]

These are some of the provisions we certainly support in this bill. Others clarifying the relationship of minimum standards within the Canada Labour Code to other negotiated conditions in contracts between workers and their employers and provisions relating to the obligations of the employer to an employee who becomes disabled or ill as a result of the work situation, as I said, are progressive steps which we applaud.

Regrettably the drop of arsenic the government cannot seem to resist putting into a good bill at the last minute gives us substantial concerns. That bit of poison is in fact a substantial provision of great concern to workers. I am going to address it particularly in the context of Public Service employees because this bill as well as amending the Canada Labour Code includes amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The provision to which I am referring and to which others who have spoken on this bill referred is the one that says where negotiations are not going well the employer can ask the Minister of Labour to refer an employer's offer to a vote of the employees.

I want to put this provision in the context of good management–labour relations. When two parties sit down to negotiate it is essential to maintain the balance of power between the two. There has to be a comparability of the rights of each in the process. Certainly in committee we want to look at how that balance of power is affected by giving an employer the right to come to the government and ask for a directed vote on the employer's offer. It is important not to put anything into the negotiating process that will discourage negotiations, that will discourage the parties from coming to a mutual agreement, a negotiated contract.

Although the bill refers to the public interest, there is very little in it that defines the public interest and under what kinds of circumstances the minister may act to take what is quite an unusual step.

• (1550)

Let me address the Public Service situation because the government as an employer of Public Service employees has substantial powers that a private employer does not have already. The employer as government has the power at any time to override collective bargaining, to legislate a return to work and to legislate the terms and conditions of a contract.

The present government has used its legislative power three times in just over three years. Essentially with Bill C–113 that was passed yesterday we will have had in the Public Service of Canada a four–year suspension of collective bargaining. I do not think that is a terribly good example to set for the private sector wherein we are trying to encourage more co–operative relationships, not more confrontation.

This present government, as I said, has used its power three times: in the strike by ships crews workers and hospital services workers in 1989; in Bill C–29 to end the Public Service strike, to impose back–to–work legislation and to impose a wage freeze; and again just yesterday on second reading of Bill C–113 which continues the suspension of collective bargaining and the wage freeze for a further two years.

[Translation]

In 1991, the Public Service Staff Relations Board declared the government guilty of negotiating in bad faith. Concilation board reports criticized the government for its negotiating tactics. The International Labour Organization, a United Nations agency, criticized the federal government of Canada just two months ago for no longer negotiating with its employees.

[English]

Of course we are concerned about the government's intention in wishing to introduce yet another weapon in its arsenal against its employees since it has not shown itself entirely responsible. In fact it has shown itself to be quite irresponsible in how it uses the tools it now has to control rather than to negotiate.

I raise a second concern. This bill makes a minister of the Crown the arbitrator of a dispute between management and labour whether or not it is a strike or whether it is just in the midst of negotiations, if the minister decides it has gone on a little too long. It makes the minister of the Crown an arbitrator to decide that negotiations are not working and he or she as minister has the right to take stronger action to put an end to collective bargaining.

I argue that since the government is the employer no minister of the Crown can be an impartial arbitrator because that minister is the representative of the employer, the Government of Canada.

We certainly have concerns about that provision in the bill as well as about the basic fundamental principle. At a minimum a party separate from the government would have to be designated to make such a determination, and we will be putting forward amendments to that effect.

There are numerous beneficial provisions being added to the Canada Labour Code. We applaud those. We think they are a tribute to what can happen when government, labour and management work together.

However I have to point out that we can only ask why the government has not chosen to give the same legislated minimum standards of employment to Public Service employees. At present those who work for the Government of Canada, those work for the taxpayers of Canada, must go through a variety of Treasury Board policy manuals, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Government Employees Compensation Act and the Public Service terms and conditions of employment regulations under the Financial Administration Act to find out what their rights are.

• (1555)

We will certainly be exploring in committee why the government has chosen not to provide to its own employees, 250,000 of them, the same minimum working conditions as it provides to those in the private sector.

Once again we have a situation where the government is saying that federally regulated private sector employers have to do thus and thus but as a government is exempting itself. That approach has not been well accepted by organizations that represent employers across this country in labour standards and in issues like employment equity.

We want to explore whether the government is prepared to include the same provisions for its own employees as it requires for others. We frankly think that a public sector worker who is pregnant or nursing has the right to the same protection as a private sector worker who is pregnant or nursing. We happen to believe that a disabled worker in the public sector who happens to become ill or injured on the job deserves the same protection as a private sector employee; not just at the whim of the employer and by policy manuals of the employer.

Perhaps we will have answers to these questions when the bill is in committee. Certainly good management–labour relations require balance between the two parties to the relationship. It is in Canada's best interest to continue to work toward a more co-operative, more collaborative approach to management–labour relations if in fact we want a competitive and productive economy and a sane society.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the speech very much but there were a couple of significant omissions. I guess my question would be: What exactly is the Liberal position on wage controls?

We remember in this country and in this House the kinds of complaints about the wage controls the Conservative government has placed on the Public Service over the years. The Liberal Party stands in the House regularly and criticizes them. We all remember Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the entire Liberal Party when they imposed the six and five program on the Public Service. We all remember the 1974 election in which Pierre Elliott Trudeau stood and said: "Of course we will never impose wage and price controls on the public sector".

That is the first interesting recollection the member forgot in her speech. What exactly is the position in the Liberal Party on wage controls?

Second, I remember when the Trudeau government was in the House and time after time after time it refused to bargain in good faith with the employees of the Public Service of Canada and simply ordered them back to work. There was all kinds of controversy.

The hon. member talked about good management practices. Good management practices for a Liberal government was that the hammer fell on the employee again. In many cases there was no attempt to put in place rudimentary dispute resolution processes. The government simply hammered the employees back to work with take it or leave it agreements.

Although I enjoyed the principles outlined very much in the hon. member's speech, I have seen previous Liberal governments smash those principles to pieces under an iron boot. I wonder if she has a comment.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do. I will admit that the hon. member's recollection in this House is much longer than mine.

I did not hear the member putting forward his own party's position on these issues. I am not sure that gives him any right to ask anybody else to do it. However we already know a bit about the NDP's policy on these issues. I heard speakers from the NDP yesterday speak against the provision for a legislated right to order a vote on the last offer of the employer.

• (1600)

However, we all know that Bob Rae, the premier of an NDP government in Ontario used that provision in provincial legislation very handily to terminate a strike by TTC workers to have a settlement reached and to have them back to work.

Major revisions to labour legislation in Ontario are causing severe concerns among businesses about the economic soundness of the policy of the Government of Ontario for that matter. Premier Rae, the NDP premier of Ontario has chosen not to remove the very provision that his party has spoken against in this House.

Against all that background, I will say to the hon. member that when back-to-work legislation has been imposed in the past, it has always been imposed by a Liberal government with provision for arbitration to continue the collective bargaining process, not to discontinue it. It is a measure that has been taken reluctantly only because of the public interest.

That is in fact a legitimate role of government. It is one that should be used rarely and with the greatest reluctance. It should be used not to suspend but to allow the continuation of collective bargaining.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the member looks at the history of her party in this place definitely through rose coloured glasses.

There were omissions of the Liberal Party in power as it herded the employees of the Public Service back to work. I guess the caution to those who watch her speak in the House on behalf of the Liberal Party is certainly beware of the wolf in sheep's clothing. The workers have been roughly handled by that government before. Clearly the promise is that this will not be imposed and then it simply turns around and imposes it. The question of putting people back to work with imposed settlements and without an opportunity to bargain was in many cases the order of the day.

Of course in Ontario, the TTC workers requested a vote on the offer. I think her view of things is certainly somewhat distorted by the rose coloured glasses and the effort to sell to the Public Service a message which really does not reflect the principles of this party with its likely prediction for the future.

That is of course on the GST, the trade agreement and all the other things that those members are preaching these days.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I do certainly want to reply to that.

We only have to look as far as this evening's news to see how good the NDP is at living by its principles and keeping its promises once in power. We only have to look at that as a classic example of a party that would rather be in opposition because it is so much easier.

I think the positions of the Liberal Party on these issues stand up better to scrutiny than the record of the NDP government in Ontario.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I too take pleasure in having an opportunity to add a few comments to the record about the treatment of the Public Service of Canada.

I am concerned about the fact that both the present Conservative government and the previous Liberal government have treated that Public Service very badly. The morale in the Public Service is extremely bad in many areas because of that treatment. I think the dedication and commitment is there, but certainly uncertainty and difficulties have come up.

We can start with pointing out in one area the kind of betrayals that have occurred with the Liberal Party and the absolute classic betrayal of Pierre Elliot Trudeau who during the 1974 election promised Canadians, the workers of the Public Service and all workers that there would be no wage and price controls, that the order of the day would be fair collective bargaining. He did that while campaigning against Robert Stanfield.

• (1605)

To the credit of the Conservative Party, it may not be palatable and certainly Robert Stanfield went to the sword for his sins, but the Conservatives stood up and said exactly what they believed in. The Canadian people responded accordingly, as we do in a democracy. They believed the Liberals. I think by 1975 they clearly regretted that decision.

The government of the day was so extremely unpopular it was forced to go a full five years right to the end of its mandate before it lost to the Clark government. It did so by betraying people I think principally on that six and five issue. You cannot trust Liberals.

The Public Service of Canada has learned that today and it has learned it through the years. The Liberals prior to an election will tell you anything you want to hear. Ultimately when the day draws near, when the election is over, those promises on the election platform are betrayed.

The Liberal Party also began the process of cuts to the Public Service. Prior to making the cuts in the Public Service the Liberal Party adopted a process by which it criticized the Public Service first. The Liberals thought it would be much easier and they could gain public support. This was again during that period from 1974 to 1979 when they began a process of saying the cost of government was too high. They believed Stanfield's lines.

The Conservatives and the Liberals simply believed what the Conservatives had said and then they tried to convince the public of the fat and the inefficiency of the Public Service. Nothing could be further from the truth. They began the process which we see today with the cuts to the Public Service, attempts to convince the public that these are legitimate because the Public Service is inefficient and the private sector is much better. That is nonsense.

Through the years we have had tremendous loyalty and great service to the people of Canada, commitment and dedication from that Public Service and it has been very badly handled by both the Liberal and the Conservative governments, right to the point of the bill before us today.

The process of the cutbacks has been so deep and so devastating at this point in time that the uncertainty and difficulty in carrying out the tasks within the Public Service create a great demoralization.

Labour relations in the post office are catastrophic. There is systematic harassment by management. Thousands and thousands of grievances are dragged out on to arbitration. The privatization process is throwing people who are making reasonably good wages out of work and replacing them with the low wage category of workers on contract.

It is interesting how in many cases the Public Service and the labour legislation that protects them has seen this take place. Incidents from some of the employees within the post office who are very apprehensive about the security of the mail are saying that low wage contract workers have been given keys and access to a security system. Regular employees have been laid off and moved out. This has created an enormous problem.

I mentioned before the case of the Transport Canada employees on the west coast, the Canadian Coast Guard. We had a situation with light keepers on the coast of British Columbia, a tremendously dedicated group of people, who work in isolation, whose sole purpose is the protection of the travelling public and of mariners and aviators on the coast of British Columbia. That group owes a great deal to these people.

In two enormous battles, first with the Liberal government and then with the Conservative government on the destaffing of these light stations, automating them, turning those people out, those battles were won. There seemed to be a political commitment that they would not in fact destaff the lighthouses. That is what the political end from the minister's office indicated.

Yet at the same time the operations side of it is completely replacing the equipment in the lighthouse system so that they will have in place the ability to destaff these lighthouses.

• (1610)

Can you imagine being an employee working within the bargaining process and the grievance process and having an absolute betrayal of commitments that are being made?

The interesting thing is the political decision not to destaff them. Yet on the other side of the coin they are preparing for destaffing. They are talking about technological changes so they can destaff. Equipment is being upgraded for automation, changing air horns to electric horns on the light stations. They are changing to a new type of light that is tremendously expensive to taxpayers and will facilitate automation. They are talking about reworking the radio system so that it can transmit automatic data from lighthouses.

Information has been dropped from the continuous marine broadcast reports. The barometric pressure has been dropped from the manned lighthouse stations but not from the automated ones. As you move forward on the issue the government has given a political statement that lighthouses will not be destaffed. Yet an enormous amount of taxpayers' money is being spent to put this process in place. Imagine how your employees are going to feel, or would feel, with that kind of betrayal.

There is another thing with the Public Service on the coast of British Columbia. There is a certain pride in providing the kind of service it does yet at the same time the government refuses to provide the capital equipment and the operating budgets to make these services effective.

It is interesting that there is a hovercraft station at Vancouver airport operated by the Coast Guard and there is another one in Parksville. The hovercraft station in Parksville is where my brother the hon. member for Comox—Alberni is the representative. He is working hard to retain that facility. However, the service is not only in his area but covers the whole northern end of Georgia Strait, which is in the area I represent.

This absolutely critical service cannot be replaced by conventional ships. The travelling public is put in tremendous jeopardy with the removal of that simply because the government wants two of them in Vancouver. It does not want to provide effective search and rescue services to the people on the northern part of Georgia Strait, a tremendously populous area, with a tremendous number of people on the water.

The people providing this service are extremely demoralized because of the continuation of the cuts. These cuts are not only demoralizing on the Public Service, creating enormous problems in gaining from it the kind of support it is capable of giving but they are also presenting an enormous danger to the travelling public.

Another example of these cutbacks is the removal of two Coast Guard vessels from the coast of British Columbia. We had been promised a major improvement in the ships on the coast of British Columbia to provide offshore protection to upgrade the aids to the navigation program and the lighthouse servicing program but how did this government handle that? It decided to take the two vessels that would have fit the bill, the George R. Pearkes and the Martha L. Black to Quebec.

What did the government do? It gave us in return an old beater by the name of the Norman McLeod Rogers which is tied up because it is full of asbestos. I guess no decision has been made whether the government is going to spend the money to clean that ship out even if it is not appropriate for the kinds of tasks for which we need it.

Obviously the Minister of Transport has made some decisions that really affect the Public Service on the coast of British Columbia and the conditions of work in an asbestos-ridden ship. It is a difficult situation. We should have proper ship equipment there so that people can carry out the kinds of tasks for which they have been trained and the experience they have to deliver to the public.

However, at the same time these cutbacks are occurring. The ship program with the Coast Guard on the west coast is abysmal. The Narwhal which is an old buoy tender really is not an acceptable vessel for outside search and rescue on the Pacific Ocean but that is its function now that the main resources have been taken away and sent to Quebec.

It is interesting in the area of aviation. Because of privatization people are booted out of their jobs in the Public Service in order to give them to the private sector. It is often so that friends of the Conservative government can benefit from a position at the public trough.

• (1615)

There is a lot of talk now that the flight service stations are going to be privatized and they are looking at a proposal to take Transport Canada employees and turn over those flight service station positions to privatization. They of course went through a number of cutbacks which again created demoralization in the Public Service. To my way of thinking, this is really a tragic situation. We need quality service aimed at safety for British Columbians who must travel in difficult areas and this government seems not to care that there is an arbitrary rule to do those cutbacks in spite of the consequences.

The other thing is the Coast Guard helicopters. Again, friends of the Conservative government come along and make a suggestion saying: "Wouldn't it be great if we privatized and took over the operation of Coast Guard helicopter services". The employees who fly and service those helicopters are extremely concerned about their future. There is an uncertainty involved with this wrong-headed approach.

What happens is if you are out doing a medical evacuation or you are doing search and rescue work, the bottom line is the bottom line. If a private company has it then you get to a situation where it will say: "Well, maybe we will not do the kind of upgrading that is needed, we will not do the kind of training that is needed and we will not put on the equipment that is needed". The thing then begins to fall down.

They can also work it the other way, and this has been happening in many departments where you get a cost plus situation, where friends of the government move in, a very lucrative contract has been obtained and they virtually work at cost plus.

We have an extremely effective Public Service. We have a very good Coast Guard helicopter service. The employees themselves have recommended many upgrades that could improve the efficiency, effectiveness and cost picture of operation, but the government continuously turns a deaf ear to those suggestions because of the philosophical fixation that I think is really leading to the destruction of our Public Service and in many cases irreparable harm to the country. This is creating an enormous problem.

There is the shutting down of the Cape St. James weather station. This is one of the most important weather stations on the Pacific coast. You cannot travel from one end of that coast without travelling through an extremely bleak area in which there are very few resources and the Cape St. James weather station. All kinds of promises were made about automated facilities that would give good weather briefing, but there is no replacement for a good set of eyes and an Environment Canada weather briefer or meteorologist to give you an indication of what you are going to be facing three hours from now when you arrive right in the middle of that cauldron with no information about what is happening.

They took the weather ships out of the Pacific many years ago. They figured they would put two buoys out there that would transmit weather information. My information is that those buoys are out there but they are floating around and they are really not sure where the heck they are. They break down. The Coast Guard has to use its limited ship resources to try to keep them up on behalf of the atmospheric environmental weather service people. I gather one is floating around broken off the north end of the Queen Charlotte Islands right now. That was a Liberal government contribution to safety, to the travelling public and to the Public Service in Canada.

We have watched a whole litany, and I have focused on the area of transportation safety, closing the Cape St. James weather station, two serious attempts by both governments, the previous Liberal and the present Conservative, to de-staff those lighthouses, and then a political commitment to keep the staff in the lighthouses and upgrade them. No upgrades, but the upgrades that have been going in are designed to facilitate an implementation of a de-staffing scheme which will automate them. This is just ludicrous.

We then have the cutbacks of hovercraft where they decided they wanted them both parked in Vancouver and leave the whole of the Straits of Georgia, with all its reefs and shallow waters, where ships cannot penetrate to look for people out there who are lost. The hovercraft goes to Vancouver and it leaves the area I represent totally left out of that very valuable hovercraft service.

We then watched the suggested privatization of Coast Guard helicopters. A bad idea. We are now hearing things about the privatization of flight service stations. This is a worse idea, if you can get worse. We get to a situation where over and over and over again they are prepared to demoralize the Public Service, to cut that service and cause enormous harm.

While I have the opportunity, in my closing remarks I would like to talk about fisheries and oceans.

On the west coast of British Columbia we are currently going through a process by which the Government of Canada is working on an aboriginal fisheries strategy. We understand how that strategy has come into place because of requirements of the Supreme Court of Canada, but the implementation of this has been catastrophic. You could summarize it, as I guess the provincial government has done, by saying no conservation, no consultation, and no compensation.

On the conservation aspect, with the cutbacks over the nine years of this government, cutbacks to staff within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the bad treatment, mistreatment of people in the Public Service in fisheries and oceans, we have a situation where there is an enormous change, one that has to be carried out. Yet with that enormous change it does not have the resources to protect the fisheries resource on the coast of British Columbia.

We want the minister to stand up in this House and explain why there are no stream counts for escapements. It is a blind guess. Why can they not do stream clearing? Why can they not do a whole effective amount of things, not only on the Fraser River where it is extremely important, but along the coast of British Columbia where there are areas that are just absolutely untouched by fisheries and oceans. That is because of the cuts to the Public Service which this government has carried out over the years. It is extremely proud of this, but in being extremely proud of them, it has put that resource in jeopardy.

Those people cannot do surveillance, they cannot do enforcement, they cannot do proper habitat protection, they cannot do stream clearing, they cannot do proper counts. It is important that there be a guardian program so that it can be extended at critical times. It is going ahead. What we really need in this House are not the stupid remarks that are made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about what the Reform Party policy or the Quebec bloc's policy is on the aboriginal fisheries strategy, but what he is doing with extremely limited resources in the Public Service to protect the valuable Pacific fisheries resource.

I am absolutely sick of the kind of thing that is going on in this House where, instead of providing information to the public of Canada, he is playing the fool in the House of Commons by failing to give those people the understanding of what he is doing and the kind of resources he is prepared to put in place to protect the Pacific fisheries resources. It is the same with the House leader being a smart ass here this afternoon by failing to deal with this critical issue.

We need that presentation by the minister. I do not think there is another option for the aboriginal fisheries strategy. You either have a fisheries agreement by agreement or you have fisheries by chaos. That appears to be the line taken by the Supreme Court of Canada, which this House cannot overturn.

There need to be agreements. If aboriginal people are prepared to put interim agreements together until proper consultation and full fair involvement of all stakeholders occurs, we are prepared to support that. In the meantime, we are getting no guarantee that that valuable resource is protected. They almost lost it in the previous year.

I see time is drawing to a close. There is no need to lose the fishery. If we could get the proper resources and the assurance from the minister that the government is not just going to continue to cut out fisheries officers but it will put those kinds of resources in place, I think people's minds would rest easier. They would be more able to accept the kind of major structural and operational changes that are going on. In fact, politically this government would stand to win instead of losing continuously.

Hopefully the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will see the wisdom and the merit in coming before this House and sharing the information, not only with other members of Parliament who are willing to hear him out and support moves that would protect that resource, but with the people of Canada, giving them a fair shake on his fulfilling his responsibility and this government's responsibility to the protection of that resource.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, before offering a question to my hon. colleague, I would like to just briefly say that I understand it is your intention, sir, not to seek re-election. I would like personally to say how much I have enjoyed the time I have spent in this House when you have been in the Chair and how much I wish you well in the coming years.

With that bit of brown-nosing, Mr. Speaker, let me first of all say that I found the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1625)

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I would like to thank the hon. member for North Island—Powell River for his erudite and informative comments over the last 20 minutes. Clearly his grasp of the fishery and the problems besetting the fishery, especially as those problems relate to the continuing incorrigible actions of the federal government, can be bested by no one in this House.

At the commencement of his remarks he made a couple of statements that I found particularly compelling, having to do with the record of previous Liberal administrations. He mentioned in particular the six and five program of the early 1980s. That got me thinking and sent my mind back even further to the so-called anti-inflation program of the mid-1970s.

I remember at that time literally hundreds of thousands of people from coast to coast rallying against those particular policies. I remember the famous day of protest when literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians were out on the streets from coast to coast. I seem to remember at that time that among the things most vigorously protested were the actions of the federal Liberal government in literally grinding down the Public Service of the time.

In fact, a great deal of the problems in terms of morale, under-staffing problems, and in terms of simply not having the Public Service we otherwise would have today can find their origins, the germ of these problems, in those years, the mid-1970s.

I was wondering if the hon. member would care to reflect briefly for the further edification of this House on his experience in those days and what he thought at the time and, perhaps, what examples he can extrapolate from that which might be applicable today.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, first of all it is very difficult to add to the well-rounded comments of the member condemning the previous Liberal government which in all seriousness was a terrible record and a real betrayal. It is amazing that the Prime Minister of the day could present himself in this House with such a betrayal of Canadians and of the Public Service.

One thing I would like to add is that I was certainly not aware that you, Mr. Speaker, had decided not to run again. I wish to identify myself with the remarks of one of your seatmates from the city of Edmonton on how much I have appreciated the support and fellowship and the great job you have done. I will terminate those remarks and wish you very well in the future. You have done a very good job here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Thank you.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You wish to debate?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): That was my hope, yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no problem with that. I thought the hon. member for North Island—Powell River was the last speaker. However, I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East on debate.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for any confusion this may cause. I certainly do apologize for any disappointment this may cause on the other side of the House. I will attempt to keep my remarks pertinent.

We in the NDP caucus would like to support Bill C-101. We would like to come into this House and say the process that led to the contents of Bill C-101 was an admirable process, that the consultation between employer and labour groups facilitated and undertaken by the government was an excellent process and that the results of that process are uniformly commendable and ought to be implemented.

We would like nothing better than to do that. In fact, with regard to many aspects of the bill we can do that. There are those amendments to part III of the labour code that provide for such things as protection for nursing and pregnant women in the work place, improved parental leave provisions, greater protection for injured workers and administrative improvements, which most working people would never have cause to come into contact with but will facilitate the process of labour relations in federally regulated work places. As well, there are those provisions that create new protection for worker's wages, especially in the event of company wind up. All of these things are commendable, praiseworthy, and eminently worthy of support.

• (1630)

If there were a way that we could vote on these elements and these alone then we would happily vote with the government in favour of the bill. These are elements worthy of support, worthy of passage, worthy of adoption and putting in place to govern labour relations in federally regulated work places.

We cannot in conscience do that, and not because of any of the matters I have mentioned thus far but because of an amendment to part I of the code which at a stroke renders the entire bill insupportable.

In addition to all of those good things, the bill seeks to place into the hands of the minister the right and the ability at any time by caprice to call for a vote of the bargaining unit on the last offer of the employer.

This means that when a bargaining unit is in the process of collective bargaining, when in other words the union representatives of the workers in a given work place are negotiating a new contract or amendments to an existing contract with an employer, any time that employer has made an offer, the minister at her or his discretion may decide for whatever reason that the employees represented by the union will now vote on that employer's offer.

This constitutes an astonishing, alas not unprecedented but nonetheless insupportable intrusion into the process of free collective bargaining by the government. Further, it is difficult to understand why this provision is even presented in what is otherwise a commendable bill. It is so remarkably out of place that we really have to ask ourselves what it is doing there at all.

This provision allowing the minister at whim to tell workers with a perfectly legitimate bargaining agent working on their behalf that they have to ignore that bargaining agent and vote on an employer's offer does not come to this bill by virtue of the process that I praised earlier. That was the process in which virtually all of the stakeholders in federal labour relations got together and came up with the other proposals that we find so worthy of support.

This provision appeared out of the blue. It is as if the hand of some labour relations god came down out of the sky and touched the ministry of labour, which then so gifted with revelation, decided that this would be the ideal provision to slap into the new amending bill, Bill C-101. There is no other explanation for its presence because it does not come out of the same process that gave rise to the rest of the bill.

I cannot believe in charity that the government, on its own volition, for no good reason and to satisfy no legitimate constituency, would decide at the last minute to put something as odious as this provision into the bill by itself.

Let me be charitable. Let me just say that it is a poorly thought out amendment and one which runs counter to the spirit and practice of consultation which resulted in the amendments to part III of the code.

It is evident from the two years of consultation that went into this bill that neither the employers nor labour proposed this addition to the code. What is being served by this amendment is the hidden agenda of the government.

When I said earlier that it was perhaps the hand of some god of labour relations coming out of the sky and touching the department I was being facetious. For this I apologize, because what we have here is the further service of this government's hidden agenda. This is an agenda which gives the employer yet another reason to avoid good faith bargaining and which invites the corruption of the properly constituted free collective bargaining process in the interests of employers who simply cannot be bothered to undertake that process in good faith. They cannot deal with their employees and the representatives of their employees as social equals. In other words, they cannot conduct themselves in a fair and business-like manner.

• (1635)

This is yet another escape hatch from good behaviour that employers have been granted by this government, and that is a shame. I know in Alberta, and I suspect elsewhere in Canada, that for many years we who toiled at the provincial level had been able to point to the Canada Labour Code as an example of good labour legislation that ought in many respects to be emulated by our provincial counterparts.

I know when I used to work for the New Democratic Party caucus in the Alberta legislature and when I worked for the late Grant Notley, many were the times that he would have occasion to rise in the Alberta provincial legislature and inform the Conservative government across the way that it could do far worse than take as a working example the provisions of the Canada Labour Code.

Unfortunately, that advice was almost never taken to heart. But now, perhaps more unfortunately, with amendments such as those proposed to part I of the code in Bill C-101 we are taking that example and tarnishing it. We are making it less useful.

In fact we are slowly accreting a series of changes around the code, a new crust of poor legislation that has had the effect over time of rendering the Canada Labour Code, once the premier legislation in the country, a sorry and sad second cousin to the more progressive codes that now exist in places like Ontario, B.C. and Quebec.

This bill simply continues that process. It gives employers the ability to evade the collective bargaining process. That means that many of the provisions of current collective agreements that were the result of protracted bargaining would never have come to pass in the first place.

When faced with a determined bargaining agent, an intractable employer could simply have said: "That is all very interesting but I do not want to bargain any more. I think you guys can be crushed so I am going to call on my buddy, the federal Minister of Labour. He is going to make your unit vote on my offer. I am going to make it clear, by the way, that a no vote on this offer means I am going to shut down the plant", or some such thing as that.

Do not think it cannot happen because it happens all the time. It is central to our collective bargaining process that the government sets the parameters of the bargaining process and then leaves the two sides of that process by themselves to reach an agreement.

This measure of government interference into the process that we find in the proposed amendment to part I of the labour code tips the balance in favour of the employer. It puts the government, rather than in an impartial third party position, into the position of what amounts to an arbitrator. Depending on the circumstances in any given individual dispute, the government could perhaps be in the position of an arbitrator that loses its impartiality.

Let us think for a minute of any major labour dispute that has happened in this country in the last few years. For example, there was the Gainers dispute in Edmonton. I understand that Gainers was within provincial jurisdiction. I am just offering this as an example with which I am particularly familiar.

If the first offer from Peter Pocklington to the Gainers workers had not been rightly rejected, and with every last dram of justice we can imagine, those workers could have been compelled to sign a contract that not only would have been as bad as the one it was eventually able to salvage but it would have been far worse. The forcing of a first vote could have compelled that.

Within federal jurisdiction I think of the most recent strike at Canada Post. The compulsion of a first vote on the employer's first offer would have resulted in the workers at Canada Post accepting a contract far inferior to the one they were eventually able to get from that employer.

• (1640)

What is granted in the proposed amendments to part I of the code in Bill C-101 puts the government, in the person of its minister, in the position of potentially becoming an agent of the employer in labour relations.

This will be an invitation to employers within federal jurisdiction to harry and hound ministers of labour, seeking at every step of the way the compulsion of the vote on the first offer.

The inclusion of this amendment in the bill, if passed, will result in a situation in which, regardless of who that minister of labour may be and regardless of the party that minister may serve, the minister is placed in the position, if she or he is to continue to be fair, of continually saying no to those petitioners within federal jurisdiction who will be coming to that poor minister and saying: "Well, we have this offer on the table and we want you to force it to a vote".

It may be difficult, oh it may indeed be difficult, for a minister of labour from time to time to say no to a company that has been generous to that minister's party in the past and that gives every indication of intending to continue to remain generous to that party, all other things being equal.

It may be very hard for a minister of labour to say no to a company that can marshal resources in that minister's riding or in the riding of friends of that minister for the purpose of making that minister's further political life much less comfortable than previously had been the case.

We are setting up a minister of the Crown for ongoing, unreasonable pressure from interests within federal jurisdiction which will want to use this new provision of the code as a stick with which to beat their workers further into line.

I suspect that the Minister of Labour in the current government will not find that a particularly difficult prospect. I suspect, given the actions of the government of the day, that the idea of this new element of the code being used to further subjugate Canadian workers causes no trouble whatsoever to the current labour minister or indeed any labour minister who may prove to be that hon. member's successor.

I suspect this because in truth these provisions seem little more than an extension, another instalment, in what has been a long and consistent record of anti-labour legislation and conduct by this government in its dealings with its own employees and in its dealings with workers generally in Canada. It has been so, right down to such things as the way it has refashioned the Canadian economy to a degree that has been, and bears the potential of being, a boon to Canadian employers but a positive disaster for Canadian working people. It has done so to the point that we are now talking in serious tones, even hushed excitement, about the grand coming economic recovery.

We are talking about a circumstance in which, by all sorts of indicators, the economy will recover and unemployment will remain at or above 10 per cent. For the first time in our nation's history we are talking about a jobless recovery.

This in itself is bizarre. It is the clearest evidence that the current government's policies in total, while exceptionally felicitous for segments of the Canadian population, have been exceptionally harsh for most of the Canadian population, certainly that majority element that works for a living.

• (1645)

It is in that light that we have to see the amendments to part I of the labour code contained in Bill C-101. It is in that light that we have to understand that the good parts of Bill C-101, the parts that amend part III of the code and bring in such admirable elements as protection for nursing and pregnant women in the work place, improved parental leave provisions, improved protection for injured workers, improved administrative procedures and improved wage protection come despite the general program of the present government.

What comes in consequence of the application of the principles of the program of the current government is that amendment to part I of the code will put a whip hand over workers into the hand of the minister of the day to be called upon whenever it is wanted by employers who could not otherwise get what they want through free collective bargaining.

It is with some considerable sadness that I conclude by saying that that is why we in the NDP must vote against this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—Agriculture; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Employment; the hon. member for Western Arctic—Health care—the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Peacekeeping; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Economic statement.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (for Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C-109, as it includes two specific provisions related to privacy which I believe this country needs. The first deals with electronic surveillance and is used by the police. The second is the interception of radio-based telephone communications.

The changes being proposed by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, to part VI and part XV of the Criminal Code respond to a series of Supreme Court decisions which significantly affect the way police and other agents of the state can do their jobs.

The first decision involved an undercover drug investigation. An informant and an undercover police officer rented an apartment which they equipped by placing audio-visual recording equipment within one of the walls. Both the informant and the police officer gave their written consent to the interceptions of their conversations, but the court later held that the interception by the state of private communications without the consent of all of the participants was contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This decision is important because it limits the police in using not only this technique, but also body packs to help undercover agents deal with suspected criminals.

The second case arose out of a suspected gambling operation. A pin-hole video camera was installed in a hotel room. It produced evidence which allowed police to conduct a raid on illegal gambling activities. The court decided that video surveillance and locale, where there was a reasonable expectation of privacy without prior judicial authorization, was also contrary to the charter.

The court also noted that as there is no explicit statutory authority for video surveillance, Parliament should provide for it.

The third case involved the tailing of a suspected serial murderer by using an electronic tracking device installed in the suspect's car. The suspect was eventually charged with blowing up a $2 million communications tower based on evidence collected this way.

• (1650)

The court ruled that an unreasonable search and seizure had occurred because police used the tracking device. However, it also indicated that legislation should be drafted to allow judicial or statutory authority to police to engage in these practices when criminal activities are suspected.

The fourth case arose in a trial for conspiracy to import cocaine. Much of the evidence was based on intercepted private communications obtained by the police after receiving various authorizations. During an appeal, the court held that section 7 of the charter entitled an accused to have access to the material used to obtain an authorization. It noted there was a procedural quagmire to establishing this in an orderly fashion. It called on Parliament to eliminate these difficulties through legislative amendment.

As a result of these four cases and the recommendations made by the courts, the Minister of Justice is proposing the following amendments to the Criminal Code: first to provide for a statutory authority for an electronic lifeline to permit police and others in potentially dangerous situations to have their conversations surreptitiously intercepted by backup teams; second to provide for a warrant procedure for police and others to intercept communications with the consent of a participant to a conversation, to gather evidence or information relevant to suspected criminal activity on reasonable grounds; third, to provide for warrant procedures so the police and other enforcement officials can use video and other surveillance technology such as electronic tracking devices; fourth, to provide protection from civil or criminal liability for individuals assisting in the execution of authorizations or warrants; fifth, to provide for warrants and orders to engage in activities or obtain information or co-operation which would otherwise constitute an unreasonable search or seizure; sixth, to streamline the evidentiary and procedural regime applicable to evidence gathered through electronic surveillance.

[Translation]

The primary purpose of these amendments is to permit the use of technology by police forces in the performance of their duties, but only in a way that does not contravene the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The amendments would have the effect of simplifying the rules of admissibility of evidence. They would also increase the effectiveness of both the police and Crown prosecutors, in accordance with the recommendations of the Supreme Court.

We are talking about the resources police officers need to perform their duties satisfactorily.

[English]

The second amendment included in Bill C-109 is close to my own heart and deals with the issue of cellular radios and personal privacy. Not long ago The Financial Post conducted an experiment listening to cellular conversations on an easily obtainable inexpensive scanner. In a brief period of time the Post intercepted calls made by stockbrokers, real estate agents, federal bureaucrats, police and others. The subjects varied from the mundane to the illegal, everything from what to serve for dinner to where to conduct a drug transaction.

The Post gained access to all kinds of confidential information from personal and corporate finances to intimate personal conversations. When you think about it, the potential for damage if scanned information were to be misused is staggering.

What might happen to the woman when her car breaks down on a lonely highway and she transmits her location to thousands of eavesdroppers? What could happen to the real estate agent who gives out confidential bidding information over a cellular? What would happen to someone who calls a pizza parlour and gives out his credit card number over a cellular phone?

Although we have all heard stories about public figures caught transmitting sensitive information by cellular, it is ordinary citizens and businesses that are most at risk across this country. During one two-hour session The Edmonton Journal heard one caller give his credit card number over cellular, one woman give her address to a date, several intimate conversations and numerous business telephone calls. Another caller mentioned by name a man recently diagnosed with terminal cancer. It is possible the Journal reporter knew about this before his next of kin.

We know there are hundreds of thousands of people out there with a potential to listen. There are a million Canadians with cellular phones and almost as many with scanners capable of monitoring their calls. Privacy is disappearing and Canadians are worried about it.

I know this for several reasons. The first is that my own department, in concert with several other interested parties from government and industry, has just completed the first comprehensive national survey on privacy.

• (1655)

The results were very interesting and confirmed a few things I had suspected. We found that the majority of Canadians feel they have less privacy today than they had a decade ago. There is a sense that personal privacy is under greater pressure today than used to be the case. We found that Canadians believe new technologies pose increasing threats to personal privacy. Two out of three of the respondents told us that they did not know who to turn to if they wanted to do something about an invasion of their privacy.

Finally, we found out that Canadians hold very strong views that something must be done. While they recognize the need for individual responsibility, they want the government involved either on its own or in partnership with business.

[Translation]

Canadians are worried and they hope their government will do something about this. In fact, I think there is a great deal the government can do.

One of the first things I did when I arrived at the Department of Communications was to ask departmental personnel to look for new ways to deal with protection of privacy in telecommunications. The problem was so new and opinions so diverse that I decided we should first set the ground rules. We had to reach a consensus on what Canadians expect in the way of protection of privacy.

I asked the Department of Communications to draft a set of principles on protection of privacy. We submitted this draft proposal to a committee of informed people representing industry, consumers, the academic world and government for improvements. We then published the results which were submitted to the public last fall. In December, I was able to disclose a set of six principles that those providing telecommunication services are expected to observe.

[English]

Briefly, the principles are as follows. Recognition: privacy is a right, respect it. Informed choice: users must be aware of privacy implications of services they are offered. Fairness: where services are introduced which erode personal privacy, privacy should be restored at no charge. Control: personal information should not be used without the customer's permission. The right to be left alone: unsolicited telecommunications must be subject to clear ground rules. Review: as technology in society changes, privacy principles and protection methods should be reviewed.

If these principles had been in place prior to the introduction of cellular services, we might have been able to avoid a lot of grief which has occurred since. A large part of the problem is that people who use cellular radios think they are using telephones, enjoying the same degree of privacy they expect from their regular telephone service.

The truth is a cellular phone is not a telephone at all. Every conversation is a radio broadcast transmitted into the air on radio waves and is very public indeed. Therefore the first part of our strategy has to be public education and we have started that already.

We have also asked my department to release a simple brochure to the public which explains the issues and ways to improve personal privacy. I have also asked cellular service providers to take leadership in informing their customers, ideally through brochures or messages attached to the bills themselves, about the safest way to transmit confidential information. I have also asked my department to work on a media campaign which will help to transmit our message.

The second element is equally important and that is protection. I will ensure that cellular service providers offer effective and affordable encryption services to their customers. I have asked the Communications Research Centre to co-operate with them to help refine and implement these technologies. I am pleased to see that Bell Mobility Cellular has already cut its charges by almost two-thirds.

Encryption alone is not enough. What about the individual who uses a land line and, believing the conversations to be private, receives a call from a cellular? I have asked the Communications Research Centre to explore the technical feasibility of inserting an audible signal on the line which will indicate whenever a cellular is involved.

I am pleased to report we found that there is little to prevent the cellular companies from introducing this new technology.

This brings me to the third crucial element of our strategy which is prosecution. There is nothing particularly damaging about listening into someone else's conversations. However when a third party uses that information or passes it to another party, irreparable damage can take place. Radio-based communications are not specifically addressed in existing legislation because when it was drafted cellulars were not yet on the market. The result is a loophole. Canadians need to have legislative tools to defend themselves against invasions of their privacy. Give them these tools. The Minister of Justice and I are proposing complementary amendments to the Criminal Code and the Radiocommunication Act.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker, I see that it is almost five o'clock. Perhaps I could pursue this at the next sitting of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You may or else I will not see the clock. We are anticipating Royal Assent and I am expecting Mr. Speaker to come in very shortly. Maybe the hon. member would like to carry on until Mr. Speaker returns to the Chair.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to my colleagues in the House.

First of all, these amendments will deem all encrypted radio-based telephone communications to be private and protected by the full strength of the law.

Second, the proposed changes to the Criminal Code will prohibit malicious and profit-motivated interception of any radio-based telephone communication. Anyone who deliberately intercepts communications with the intention of harm or any other motive of securing a financial advantage would be subject to prosecution.

Third, with a limited number of exceptions, the disclosure or subsequent use of any intercepted radio-based telephone communication would be prohibited without the consent of a party to it.

Anyone who contravenes these provisions can be punished on summary conviction with a fine of not more than $25,000 and/or one year in jail in the case of an individual, or with a fine not exceeding $75,000 in the case of a corporation.

Finally, the Radiocommunication Act will be amended to allow private right of action. Any victim of such wrongdoing will have the right to take the perpetrator to court for damages. This provision will give a clear civil recourse for individuals who suffer damages because of unauthorized interception.

I am convinced that these provisions for protection, prevention and prosecution, when taken together will offer the most effective solution to the complex issue of privacy.

Not everyone agrees with me. A writer in The Hill Times wrote recently that Bill C-109 was an Orwellian bill which "will stifle everyone's freedom of expression" and that "journalists and all citizens would be vulnerable to prosecution for activities which have never been considered to be immoral or unethical".

I do not believe this to be true. If you write something down on a piece of paper and someone else reads it when you have not given them permission, that is considered to be immoral. If someone intercepts your mail, even if it has been sitting untended for hours in your mail box and opens it that is illegal. If you say something on a telephone and someone else uses a wire tap to intercept it they could go to jail. Eavesdropping and using other people's private information has always been considered immoral and unethical. The difference is that technology has outstripped the law and so interception and divulgence of cellular phone calls for malicious or harmful purposes is not yet considered illegal.

Bill C-109 will protect Canadians by giving them legal recourse if they believe their privacy has been invaded by people who intercept or wilfully disclose a radio-based telecommunication for gain.

The words maliciously and for gain are key. We are not interested in the inadvertent scanner, but the deliberate focused eavesdropper who intends to use other people's private information for his personal gain or for harm.

New technology has promised to speed up and add to the different ways we transfer personal data. It would be irresponsible for the government to ignore this technological revolution and allow open season for anyone wishing to intercept and use information sent this way for their own malicious purposes.

Most people, including journalists, recognize this. As an editorial in the December 12 issue of The Montreal Gazette pointed out: "Had those conversations of Diane Wilhelmy and Bud Smith taken place over conventional phone lines, any authorized person who divulged the contents by tape, transcript or even orally would have been liable to charges. Users of cellular or cordless phones have no such legal protection of privacy".

That is what the federal legislation aims to fix. Clearly, strong measures are needed to discourage scanners from divulging information, blackmail, industrial espionage, credit card fraud or any number of illicit acts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. minister.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB TRAINING PROGRAMS

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

That in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of substantially increasing federal funds available for job training and retraining programs.

He said: Madam Speaker, I hope to get a start here before we are summoned to the Senate.

I put a motion before the House today to call upon the federal government to spend more money in terms of training and retraining in this country. I believe it is a very important issue. If we look around our country today, 11 per cent of the work-force is unemployed. Many other people are on social assistance across the country and many more people are working part-time at odd jobs here and there, drawing very low salaries. All that has a tremendous effect on our economy in terms of driving down government revenues, driving up the national debt and driving up the deficit each and every year. Since 1984 the debt in this country under the present government has more than doubled.

One reason for that is we have a very weak economy in Canada. The economy of our country has been going down instead of up and I think we have some long-term structural problems that we have to deal with as a nation. One solution is to spend more money on education, training and retraining of our work-force. Another is to spend more money on research and development.

These are two reasons why our country is not doing as well in many aspects as the Europeans, the Americans to the south of us or the Japanese. We can look at all the statistics and find we are lagging further and further behind.

Years ago theories about labour and capital were important. Today I think knowledge has become the most important thing. Countries that are good in knowledge, information, training, skills and research and development are the countries that will really go ahead.

I would just like to place on the record today a couple of statistics that really paint a very stark picture as to why I moved this motion today. In The Financial Post of March, 1991 I read an article about training and it compared our country to other countries around the world.

In Japan, for example, the average worker gets 200 hours of training per year. In Sweden the average worker receives 170 hours of training per year. In our country the average worker receives 7 hours of training per year. I think that tells us why we are falling further and further behind.

[Translation]

It is a big problem, because in Canada only seven hours a year per employee are spent on training compared with 170 hours in Sweden and 200 hours in Japan. This means there is a big difference between us, the Europeans and the Japanese.

• (1710)

[English]

According to Statistics Canada, the government's own agency for gathering statistics, only 5.3 per cent of Canadian workers in 1987 received any training. If we go to the European countries, to Japan or to the United States, we find that more and more of their workers are receiving training compared with what we have in this country. That is one reason we have tremendous problems of unemployment today.

The other reason is that we are spending less and less on research and development. We are spending less on a per capita base in research and development than the French, the Germans, the Swiss or the Swedes, than indeed most European countries. We are spending much less than the Americans and much much less than the Japanese.

For those kinds of reasons we are falling further behind. I suggest today in my motion that the federal government should start spending more on training and retraining our workers for the challenges that lie ahead.

I believe we have a great country. We have a great future in Canada. We can be second to none in the 21st century. But we are only going to be second to none if we start to make some of the structural changes to be more competitive on a global basis. If we do not do that we will continue to lag behind.

I call on members of the other parties to start doing some thinking about what we can do in terms of putting more money into training. For example, if we look at the private sector we find out that it spends a lot less money training its workers than does the private sector in Europe, Japan or the United States. A lot less money is spent by our corporations, by our business community. It is in their interest to start spending money on training workers in Canada for long-term jobs and in terms of building our economy.

When people are working they are paying taxes. When they are paying taxes, the country is stronger and the deficit is lower. We have more money for social programs, more money for economic development, more money to help poor people and more money to help aboriginal people. We have more money to do the things we want in terms of building a strong country.

When people are not working the reverse is true. More people are drawing unemployment insurance. More people are starting to draw welfare across the country or assistance in other forms from the federal and provincial governments. It is not only the federal government that has a fiscal problem. It is now being transferred to the provinces with more and more people being on the welfare rolls.

My province of Saskatchewan is a prime example of that. The unemployment rate for the first time since 1966, when they started keeping statistics on a provincial basis, is 10 per cent despite the fact that it has a net population loss and an aging population. We are in a province that has seen a government debt grow from only $3.5 billion in 1982 to $15 billion today after nine years of Conservative government by Grant Devine.

Yet we see an economy gradually grinding down in comparison to what is happening around the rest of the world because we have not had the foresight at the national level to make ourselves more productive, to spend more money on training and research and development so that we can start producing more things in this country.

There is no reason in the world why we should not be the top-notch people in the world in producing a number of things that are natural to a country like ours. We are the biggest, most vast country in the world. There is no reason we should not be first and foremost in terms of communications and transportation. We have a tremendous resource base. We should be first and foremost in terms of resources, mining machinery, mining equipment and things of that sort. In many cases we are not. We are tremendous agricultural producers in Canada, yet we import a lot of our farm equipment, farm machinery. Research investment dollars in terms of development and technology are spent in other countries around the world. Then we import the technology, the machinery and those devices into Canada.

• (1715)

These are things that should not be ideological. These are the kinds of things done by governments of the social democratic stripe, Conservative stripe or Liberal stripe in Europe or Japan. These are things that should be done here.

If we were to spend that money it would not be a short-term investment or a short-term cure. It would be a long-term cure. If we were to spend that money today it would pay dividends in five years, ten years and fifteen years down the road. There would be tremendous dividends in terms of dollars and cents and more important dividends in terms of ordinary people on the street who are suffering today, lining up at food banks and unemployment insurance offices or facing the humility of applying for welfare when they have the ability to work and support themselves and their families.

That is the problem. What can we do about it? I suggest two or three things can be done. First, if we had a proper day care system we could start providing more and more children with skills, with a bit more training and education at a very early age. That is something we have talked about in our party for a long time in terms of a national child care policy.

Second, in terms of our schools and universities I get the feeling we are lagging behind many countries in the world as far as teaching our children, our students, the kinds of new skills they need going into the 21st century.

I know it varies from province to province. I have talked to many people who are saying: "We do not think our children are learning what they should in school. They are not getting the kind of information they need compared to what is happening elsewhere". This is something that is under provincial jurisdiction, but once we get to the universities it is the federal government that pays much of the bill.

I hear a knock at the door. After royal assent I will continue with my remarks.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB TRAINING PROGRAMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nystrom (p. 17495).

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief because my friend from St. John's East is champing at the bit. He wants to make a long speech and announce what a wonderful motion this is. My motion is to spend more money on training and retraining in this country.

An hon. member: An excellent idea.

Mr. Nystrom: It is a very good idea in terms of what we should be doing. We call it an investment, investing in our future.

I have already suggested we should do more in our educational system; in our schools, our universities. I believe the private sector has to do a lot more.

One thing we suggested in a recent document, our job strategy, is to phase in a 2 per cent levy on corporations and businesses that have more than 10 employees. If that were done we could raise, on a 2 per cent levy on their payroll, about a $7 billion fund for training and retraining. We believe that could be phased in over a number of years and would be an investment in the future of Canada.

Firms that were already doing training in their own right would not have a levy imposed on them. Those that did not have their own training programs would pay into a fund where there would be training programs set up on behalf of the country in general. These are some of the things that could be done.

The other thing that could be done is the federal government itself could spend more money on training, retraining and research and development in the country. Those are some of the things that should be done.

I wanted to move this motion today to try to move the debate along. It is important to look at long-term solutions to the problems we have in this country. These are some of the things which will solve some of the problems that we face in restructuring our economy, making it more competitive, putting more people to work and allowing more people to make a contribution. If we do that I think we have a tremendous future.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on this motion from my very good friend from Yorkton—Melville who, as quite often is the case in this place, makes some very good sense.

The essence of the motion and the comments that we have just heard is that the commitment to training in this country is something that we must recognize as an investment, partly in our present but more particularly in our future. It is a responsibility all of us share. It is a benefit that in the long run all of us will share. A country whose work force is trained has a capacity to take on more knowledge and more training, is a work force that is adaptable, that is flexible and can modernize itself as the demands of the economy dictate and change.

• (1730)

To my mind one of the unfortunate conditions of education and training in this country today is that we do not see education as a life-long process. The attitude of many of us is that we go to school, graduate from an institute of secondary education and then many of us, who have been lucky enough, go on to post-secondary education but that is it.

My friend talks about the fact that the private sector spends so little compared to other countries. That is quite true. Every dollar that the private sector spends on training—I think it is $2 in the United States, $5 in Japan, and in Germany about $8—says an awful lot not only about the attitude of our economy but the attitude of this country toward education and training.

There are a number of comments that come to mind in that area. I have long been very concerned about our attitude in the comparison of an academic education to a technical education. Far too many of us, be we legislators or public servants or educators or students, often give less value to a non-academic education. It is a loss, it is a tragedy and it is unfair and based on nothing. I would suggest it is an attitude we must overcome as we face a very technical world and a world of very great challenge in terms of our capacity not only to deal with technology but to manufacture and process technology.

The question is, should we be spending more? Yes, we should be spending more and continue to spend more.

In 1992-93 Employment and Immigration Canada is investing $3.55 billion in training for over 900,000 Canadians. Next year Employment and Immigration Canada will spend about $3.8 billion in training for over one million Canadians.

What is it spent on? There are a number of programs I can talk about: $110 million for self-employment assistance; skills training for 326,000 Canadians, 164,000 of those are courses purchased by Employment and Immigration Canada for $430 million; another 162,000 will arrange their own training under the fee payer program; $120 million budgeted for job creation under the unemployment insurance job creation program where 31,000 unemployed workers will get back and $130 million for the work-sharing assistance program.

I want to take the opportunity to comment on a couple of things that are happening in my constituency and province. I am told that one of the highest expenditures by a constituency on training in this country is in St. John's East. Frankly that is not as much a testimonial to my ability to get funds as it is to the academic institutions in my community and constituency and the number of community groups that have come forward and said that they have a contribution to make in the training of others.

Memorial University is recognized as one of the best medium-sized universities in this country, with a whole variety of very specialized and very important international faculties. The Cabot Institute or Cabot College was what we used to call a trade school and is now a technical institution in my constituency. It has a number of campuses: three in St. John's, one on Belle Island which is in Conception Bay and one in Seal Cove. They are important contributors to the community. They are providers of education. They are sources of innovation.

We are telling young people that the education they get not only helps them take advantage of opportunities and creates opportunities in the future, but the process of education and training is in and of itself valuable. It gives the opportunity not only to learn from books but to see the world from a different focus and a different function.

• (1735)

I want to very quickly mention the business school at Cabot where they have tried to take practical opportunities to learn about trade in terms of what Newfoundland and Labrador businesses are doing in pursuing their opportunities and exposing their students to them. The initiative of the faculty, such as Dan Mosher and Dean Baker and others, to ask government and companies if they could take these students and expose them to opportunities that they may see for the future, gives their training more relevance and more practical application.

We are aware of the Pathways to Success program which is important for aboriginal people. I want to refer to a couple of others that have been particularly important. We have two WISE programs. One is Women Interested in Successful Employment and one is Women Interested in Science and Engineering. They have very different focuses and functions. One is very much a grassroots community program that is I think sponsored under the job entry component of the Canadian Jobs Strategy. It provides women who have been out of the education milieu and out of the work force for a considerable period of time not only the tools and skills to get back into the work force or into the work force for the first time, but self-confidence.

People ask why we are spending all this money on self-confidence. I have never seen anything like the transformation those women go through having completed those courses, and the contribution they make not only to their families and their communities but to the economy of which they now want to become a part.

Women Interested in Science and Engineering and another program known as WITT are designed to expose women to science, engineering and also the technical opportunities that developments like Hibernia provide. They are driven by the recognition that not only non-traditional occupations should be pursued but also that women particularly have the capacity, the capability, an interest and a desire to pursue them. They not only should be looking at non-traditional occupations for women but women want to be able to develop a knowledge of technology and an exposure to technology to open up all sorts of new vistas.

I think that approach of putting the academic community together with the business community together with two levels of government and going forward in partnership is providing training opportunities the likes of which we have never seen before.

I can mention numerous other projects that have been developed to provide skill training, to enhance the training that people have or to bring job opportunities to allow the skills that are already in possession to be able to be maintained as job opportunities come along.

One of the biggest components of the fisheries program for which we in this country will spend approaching $1 billion is saying to those people that through the moratorium are either not fishing or not working in fish plants that they will have the opportunity for training either inside or outside the fishery.

The work of the Fishermen Food and Allied Workers Union in developing these training programs under the directorship of Father Des McGrath will prove that while people have not been working, they have been taking advantage of the opportunities provided through these programs.

As we deal with the opportunities of oil and gas, hands-on training, specific skills reinforced with basic skills training is a particularly critical component.

If there is any approach that we need to take as we go into the 21st century as my friend says, it is to have the basic capacity to continue training and education. It is that life-long process of training and education that we must adopt in this country if we are going to have the flexibility to take advantage of the opportunities of the next century.

• (1740)

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate because I am a firm believer that training is indeed important in establishing this country as a leader in the 21st century. I believe that training is crucial to young people who need it to succeed in the global marketplace and it is important for older workers who must adapt to our changing economy.

As we all know, our economy is going through a period of profound transformation. While in the past we were able to rely on our abundant natural resources to pay for our standard of living, that is no longer the case. Many of our forefathers could expect to get work in the forestry, fishery or mining industries and have a good job for life. Others could look forward to long careers working at an automobile plant, a textile factory or a steel mill. That kind of job security is a thing of the past. The era of well paying, low skills jobs has ended for Canada.

In order to compete against Germany, Japan and the United States, not to mention South Korea, Taiwan and Mexico, Canada must focus on creating a high skills, high wage economy. To do that we must invest in training.

As we move from a resource based economy to a knowledge based economy, we must help Canadians acquire the skills they need to prosper in the new global marketplace. The fact is that training is not a luxury, it is a prerequisite for prosperity in the 21st century and beyond.

Throughout its term in office I have called on the government to increase its commitment to training in recognition of that fact. Unfortunately, the government does not seem to realize how urgent the question is. While it talks a great deal about the establishment of a learning culture, the present government does not reinforce its words with actions.

For example, on February 7, 1992, the minister of employment said in this House: "This government has shifted the priority from make-work projects to training in order to help young Canadians obtain jobs that can last". That is simply not the case. The fact is that while the government has shifted funds in order to train UI recipients, it has consistently cut the amount it spends on training for Canadians who do not receive UI.

Last year the government cut $200 million from its general training budget. Gerald Docquier, co-chair of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board called those cuts devastating. He also said that increases in training funds from the UI fund should not absolve the government of its responsibility to ensure that Canada has a well trained work force.

This is because most Canadians do not have access to training funds earmarked for UI recipients. Many students graduate from university and cannot find work. They are ineligible for training programs funded through unemployment insurance. Many women, immigrants, disabled Canadians and aboriginal Canadians do not have access to these training funds.

People who have exhausted their UI benefits, and there are many in this situation after a three year recession, cannot apply for these training programs.

A case was recently brought to my attention where a training advisory board has money for training but cannot spend it because the money has been allocated for UI recipients and all the people who might benefit from these training programs have exhausted their UI benefits. That is unbelievably sad.

• (1745)

At a time when so many Canadians need training in order to find work, it is unacceptable that people are excluded because of the neglect this government has demonstrated on the training issue.

We in the Liberal Party understand that if the government does not get serious about training, Canada is going to be left behind by our foreign competitors. Liberals understand that without a real commitment to training, we cannot hope to help the 460,000 people whose jobs disappeared in the recession. Liberals understand that without a commitment to training we cannot promise a future to our young people.

As a member of Parliament, I have spent the last four years listening to the voices of young people throughout Canada. Many young people are worried about their prospects. Many have lost hope and have given up on the possibility of ever finding a rewarding career.

As co-chair of the Liberal Senate and House of Commons committee on youth, I was pleased to present a number of recommendations on training to our party. In a major policy speech on January 27 our leader outlined what a Liberal government would do in this area.

He said that a Liberal government would work in partnership with business, labour, educational institutions and other governments to create a national apprenticeship program. He also said that a Liberal government would put in place a tax based incentive to encourage on-the-job training.

Another aspect of our program for young people would be the establishment of a Canadian youth service to help young people develop the skills and work habits that are much required in a competitive society.

A Liberal government would take these steps because we understand the importance of training. We understand that we cannot afford to waste 100,000 high school students who drop out of high school each year.

Anyone who questions whether or not the government should be doing more in this area should remember these two figures: First, there are 1.6 million Canadians who cannot find work. Second, there are approximately 600,000 good jobs that cannot be filled because we lack people with the skills needed to fill them.

Those numbers reflect a great injustice toward the unemployed. The government has a responsibility to address that injustice and see that unemployed Canadians find work. The best way and the only way to help these people is through training.

Therefore, I call on the government to take immediate action and address the urgent training needs of Canadians.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the youth critic for the Liberal Party for having noticed some of the recommendations that the New Democratic task force on youth wrote in the year 1985.

He might expand upon that and perhaps study the proposition of a youth opportunity program that would show no bias among choices with respect to colleges or universities or with respect to training or entrepreneurship. He would be aware of our recommendations with respect to work experience, co–operative programs and all levels of education.

He would know something about the grant levy proposal for training in industry which was a part of that document. It is a part of the document that the New Democratic Party released last week with respect to the creation of jobs in this country based on a solid economic plan in order to accomplish that.

I would like to congratulate the Liberals for reviewing history and catching up with it. They have not yet achieved the detailed proposals for actually doing something about attacking the inadequacy of opportunities for lifelong learning not only for youth but for all Canadians.

• (1750)

I found the discussion that was introduced by my colleague up until this point a very edifying one, but I think there is still a tendency to have a relatively narrow perspective. I agree with the hon. member when he says that the global economy has changed substantially and that the focus in the new economies is on knowledge, skills and learning. For this country to compete, it is obvious that we must enhance the opportunities for training and education at all levels so we can be more competitive.

However, I think that our analysis has so far been based on a rather narrow construction of what is really at issue here. Not only does a new global economy require a higher skill level to achieve higher wages and increase higher value added, it implies an absolutely different structure and organization of the work place.

No longer, as the hon. member mentioned, are we going to have a situation in which workers can depend upon access to jobs which are dependent upon a routine, standardized, low knowledge based assembly line process in which management gave commands to the workers and where there was a strict hierarchical structure. Instead there would be a work place in which the success of a corporation, the successful production of goods and services is going to depend upon a great deal of mutual respect for the particular skills and knowledge that every worker, described as management or otherwise, is going to be a precious, necessary thing. It means that the status of the worker is going to improve in terms of his or her contribution.

In other words, I am trying to say that the worker of the new economy is going to be an empowered worker. It will be someone who has the confidence that he or she has something to contribute that everyone else in the work place is bound to respect because he or she has it.

That is why the New Democratic job strategy, although described as an attempt to deal with the deficit and all of those things is, in fact, a strategy for the empowerment of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for St. John's East alluded to this empowerment when he described the reaction of women who had an opportunity to gain more training. If we have missed the point, the New Democratic job strategy is focused on empowering the people through skills and knowledge and it recognizes that for all we may say about improving training and all we may say about lifelong learning, we have not yet got to the core of the problem.

In the new global economy, if there is one thing that we as government can affect in a significant way, it is the capacity of our work force to contribute to the creation of wealth, the prospect that the workers will be empowered economically, socially and politically because that new worker empowered by education and training is not going to be the worker who is going to take the guff of the sort this government has handed down any more than the guff employers too often impose on workers. But then the employer of the future will also be a very different employer, one who recognizes that inherent quality of the work force which can, through its creativity, knowledge and capacity, create wealth and success for this country.

We must start at the very beginning. We talk about those who are being trained through UI and through the Canada Jobs Strategy, but what is being ignored is the 35 per cent of the population who still remain functionally illiterate. Any program to address the issue of training and education that does not include an urgent attack on that level of illiteracy will fail the country, fail our prospects and fail the many people of this country.

• (1755)

We cannot miss the fact that there is a changed social environment in which many children are confronted with the reality that in their lifetime 65 per cent of them will sooner or later have a single parent struggling to raise them and if they have both parents in most situations both of them will be working. So the kind of educational preparation that we can usually assume is going to exist in a home and which has been traditional in the past can no longer exist.

We talk about investing $2 billion in day care. Yes, that is to the benefit of parents, but fundamentally it is aimed at starting at the very base of the issue by providing every kid in this country with the kind of educational preparation that will be necessary to succeed in the schools of the future.

Yes, it is true we spend more on education than virtually any other industrial nation. However, it must be clear that it requires dramatic reform and national leadership if our educational policies are going to be in accord with the economic future we intend to achieve for this country.

My hon. colleague has brought forward a motion that we should all support, which is that there needs to be more investment in training and retraining. In our job strategy we propose a grant levy tax system on industry so that industry that does not train its workers would be taxed and industry that does train will not be taxed.

Mr. Speaker, I only have 10 minutes. I can see that you are waving your hands and saying: "I know that you should go on, but the time limits do not permit you to do so". However the substance of it is that if we are going to develop as a successful economic player in this new world global economy it is not going to be by talking about resources as human resources or any of this sort. It has to be based on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I love to hear the hon. member in debate, but I must cut him off. It has been a little over 10 minutes now.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to say as much in 2 minutes as my colleague has in more than 10 minutes.

It would appear to me that the first thing we must come to grips with when we talk about education, training and retraining is a sense of vision of where the country is headed. We must know exactly what it is that we want this nation, Canada, to become and know the kinds of relationships, trade and others, that we are going to undertake with other nations.

It is only logical that it is only then that we can address two basic questions. What do we need in terms of education, training, retraining, and research and development, to continue to provide those individuals who will make sure what we have working in our country today will continue to happen? We have people who will be taking retirements and people who will be going to other jobs so we need a certain group of workers to make sure that what is happening today will continue.

We need to address another question that is much more difficult. What are those new jobs of the future? Those jobs of the future can only be determined if we know where we are going as a nation, if we understand the kinds of relationships that we are going to have with our trading partners and if we have insights into what will happen. Otherwise, we are educating and training in a void.

I would also like to suggest that we need appropriate support for colleges and universities. That absolutely must be a priority. We also need an enhanced apprenticeship program.

I am delighted that my leader has made that a priority. We need to focus on the importance of learning in the work place. Learning in the work place is an area that has been underestimated and has not been sufficiently appreciated.

• (1800)

We also need to make awfully certain that there is a better co-ordination of the relationships between the learning institutions and the work place. This is of critical importance.

Finally, I believe that we have not appropriately understood the importance of having programs to respond to the needs of older workers. Retraining them will be a major priority in the future because, as a number of my colleagues have said, learning is going to be a lifetime undertaking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask again the question that I asked the Minister of Agriculture on November 26, 1992 regarding the changes being pushed by this government in terms of the method of payment of the Crow benefit to the railways, and the removal of barley exports to the United States from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The background to this question is that the net worth of Saskatchewan farmers has fallen $8 billion since this government was elected in 1984. The average projected family income of Saskatchewan farmers next year is going to be $4,000, which is less than they would make on welfare. It is also a startling statistic that there are more farmers in Saskatchewan over 70 than under 30.

It is against this backdrop that the government is pushing changes to the Crow benefit, which would change the method of payment from the railways, where it has historically been paid, to the producers.

As well, since the time I asked this question the government has made a 10 per cent cut in that Crow benefit, which in my constituency alone represents a drop of more than one million dollars in income to farmers and in the money they have to spend with businesses there.

Why is the minister pressing ahead with these changes when it will have an impact on the value of farmland, cause a drop in farm income and further unravel the social and physical infrastructure of prairie Canada? Why is he pressing ahead with these changes when over 70 per cent of Saskatchewan farmers said they did not want them and when the one thing that the 13,000 farmers at the farm rally in Saskatoon on January 26 were unanimous about was that they did not want changes in the Crow rate?

Second, why is the minister proposing to take barley exports out of the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board when his own figures indicate that since the government has taken oats from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, exports of oats to the United States have been cut in half while the export of grains that have been controlled by the Canadian Wheat Board has virtually doubled in that period of time?

Why is the Minister of Agriculture continuing to treat agriculture like the black knight in the Monty Python movie by lopping off one limb at a time until finally agriculture is left dancing around on bloody stumps not able to get anywhere?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I must indeed give the hon. member credit for presenting his argument in a colourful fashion. However I regret to say that the basis on which the argument is made is not well founded.

In fact, the Government of Canada has not proposed to change the method of payment nor has it proposed to take the sale of continental barley out of the control of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Government of Canada has addressed these two important issues as ones which require further study, consultation with producers, and consultation with the industry in general. That consultation is now under way.

We provide some $700 million annually to the grain industry to assist with the costs of movement of grain to export points. The question is how to most efficiently use that $700 million or so. That is the issue that is being discussed, and it is being discussed in consultation with all the players.

With respect to the question of the method of sales of barley to the continental United States market, I want to stress that the discussion and study which is now taking place relates only to that portion of barley sales, and that it is a consultation which has taken place. Unfortunately, the hon. member is very wrong when he implies that there is a set government position because that is just not the case.

• (1805)

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have come here this evening to speak on a subject which is of great concern to my constituency, namely unemployment.

On February 19, 1993 I posed a question to the government with regard to the consequential effects of a bill it introduced with amendments to unemployment insurance. At that time I asked what these changes to the unemployment insurance would do for the people of my constituency.

We have an unemployment rate of 26.4 per cent. That is the last recording we have from Statistics Canada. My constituents in Glace Bay, New Waterford, Reserve, Gardiner, Dominion, Louisbourg, Sydney River, Mira Road, South Bar, Grand Lake Road, L'Ardoise, Framboise, East Bay, Ben Eoin and all other parts of Richmond county as well as Cape Breton county are feeling the effects of the government's actions and inactions over the last number of years.

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary who will respond on behalf of the government will understand that these regressive measures, as contained in the piece of legislation making changes to the unemployment insurance, will do absolutely nothing for those individuals who find themselves without work or, worse still, who find themselves having to go to municipal and provincial welfare.

As I have said repeatedly in this Chamber through you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members opposite, my constituents do not wish to be on unemployment insurance. They do not wish to be on municipal or provincial social assistance. They wish to have the opportunity to have a meaningful job. I suggest that this government has been grossly negligent in bringing forward policies which would have a positive effect on the Canadian economy, in particular the regional economies of this country.

I find it unsatisfactory that the Minister of National Defence would proceed with the program of putting billions of dollars into helicopters when in fact we have such high unemployment in the areas I have just previously mentioned. It is not fair. It is wrong. It is stupid. It is idiotic. It represents a government which has lost touch with the ordinary Canadian.

I have come forward tonight to speak on their behalf, to get the opportunities and jobs so they can provide for their families and make a contribution to the society we all hope they want.

In conclusion, I urge the parliamentary secretary to stand in his place and tell the people of my district what these unemployment insurance changes are going to mean for them and how he will create the kinds of jobs we need in the great district of Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration of Canada, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the government is fully aware of the economic difficulties in certain regions of the country including Cape Breton.

EIC offers a wide range of programs and services to all Canadians, the unemployed, the employed, the underemployed, employers, and communities. The type of assistance offered depends on a number of factors such as what type of assistance is needed. Sometimes this means counselling or a service needs determination test. It may mean one of our training programs.

We have recently streamlined all of our services into four programs. This was done so that we could better serve our clients. These programs in the 1992–1993 budget are as follows: information and special initiatives for all clients, $43 million; employability improvement for worker clients, $865 million; community development for communities, $122 million; labour market adjustment for employer clients, $273 million. We believe these four programs make up an effective way to help Canadians find and keep meaningful employment.

I can assure the hon. member that Cape Breton has and will continue to receive its fair share of funding. Last year Employment and Immigration Canada through the Canadian Jobs Strategy provided Cape Breton with over $32 million.

There are now several programs and committees in place to deal with the situation in Cape Breton. For example, the community initiatives fund, community futures committees, business development centres, and industrial adjustment services agreements are in place.

I see my time is running out. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for his concern.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare specifically to explain how the department's new health policy to hand over the administration of non-insured health services of First Nations people to Blue Cross, a private corporation, would further the cause of self-government.

I did not think his answer was satisfactory so I would like to raise the issue again. The minister stated that the process of implementing this new policy had been done normally. The appropriate consultations, he said, had taken place and despite the resistance in Manitoba the phasing in of this new policy would continue.

I do not believe the minister fully understands or is listening to the position taken by the First Nations people of Manitoba.

Simply stated the First Nations people of Manitoba strongly object to the unilateral redefining of their health services by the federal government. The minister must realize and accept that it is a long time historical and traditional belief by elders and all First Nations people that quality health care services and non-insured health benefits are a treaty right.

First Nations people have asserted this right since treaties were first signed with the Crown in 1870. The federal government believes health services are provided only as a matter of policy. Why then will it not provide an explanation for this position? Why will it not enter into nation-to-nation dialogue to examine the assertion that health services are a treaty right?

It is constitutionally, legally and morally wrong for the federal government to make unilateral changes to health services without the agreement of the First Nations.

Is the minister aware the Supreme Court has ruled the federal government may not modify policy which impacts on treaty rights without first seeking the concurrence of First Nations? Why does the minister and his government speak of the right to self-government but act differently? The contract for non-insured native health services was given to Blue Cross by selected tender. Why were First Nations not offered a chance to bid?

In giving the contract to a non-native corporation the government is taking away from First Nations people the opportunity for employment, decision making, accountability and self-determination.

Administering this new program will provide employment opportunities. First Nations communities experience 90 per cent unemployment. Of the 125 employees employed by Blue Cross in Manitoba two people, 1.5 per cent, are aboriginal.

The minister believes that the Blue Cross administration will better serve aboriginal people in Canada. Surely then he must admit that this new policy is not without its own shortcomings. How can he unilaterally determine what is best for aboriginal people without having their full support and participation in any decision-making process? He has also stated that his department will continue in collaboration with aboriginal people.

In closing I ask the minister to consider that a number of Manitoba First Nations and tribal councils have willingly put together plans for managing this package of non-insured health benefits. This would be self-government in action. He should make public to the First Nations people of Manitoba, as they have repeatedly asked, the Manitoba Blue Cross contract document. Why is the federal government holding back?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, non-insured health benefits or health services are provided to registered Indians and Inuit in Canada by the medical services branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Some services include the provision of prescription drugs, medical supplies and equipment, transportation for medical reasons, vision care services such as eyeglasses, and dental care. The non-insured health benefits program is designed to help registered Indians and Inuit reach a level of health comparable to that of other Canadians.

Non-insured health benefits of various types have been paid for and provided to registered Indians and Inuit by the federal government for many years. In 1979 a variety of policies, practices and guidelines were replaced with a new Indian health policy. This was based on three principles of community development, the traditional relationship of the Indian people to the federal government and the utilization of the existing Canadian health system.

Since 1979 national non-insured health benefit program expenditures have increased from $36 million to over $400 million in 1992-93. Eligible beneficiaries have increased from 325,000 registered Indians and Inuit in 1979 to 560,000 in 1992.

• (1815)

Because of criticisms about the lack of adequate management and control of non-insured health benefits programs, Health and Welfare Canada was asked by Treasury Board and the Auditor General to make concerted efforts to implement administrative improvements.

This has been accomplished by the development of directives and administrative procedures coupled with the development and implementation of a health information and claims processing system under a contract with Ontario Blue Cross.

First Nations were informed of the changes and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare met on numerous occasions to describe the changes and inform First Nations leaders and communities of the program. Workshops have been held in many regions at regional, tribal and community levels.

The Manitoba First Nation leaders have taken the position that the directives are an attempt by the federal government to define treaty rights unilaterally. Manitoba chiefs have also claimed that implementation of the automated claims processing system by Blue Cross is a move to transfer federal responsibility to the private sector.

The position of the federal government is that the program is derived from the Indian health policy and changes to it in no way prejudice or are intended to prejudice treaty rights. The federal government retains full control of the non-insured health benefits program and Blue Cross is merely providing administrative support for an automated system to process claims and provide information on benefits utilization.

The system is operating and functioning well in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Quebec. Health and Welfare Canada did not have the capacity to operate the automated process and pay the bills. It decided to identify a company with the capacity to develop and operate the system through the normal Supply and Services Canada tendering process. Open tender was called from the companies with experience in the area of health insurance. A significant number of companies indicated interest and attended the bidders conference. Four of those companies or groups submitted tenders from which the successful bidder was picked. Blue Cross was the successful bidder.

Health and Welfare Canada is committed to self-government and has approached First Nations leaders to discuss the development of a framework with which non-insured health benefits can be considered for transfer. One of the prerequisites of central agencies prior to approval being given to the transfer of this program is that the costs should be within control.

The automated system allows the department to demonstrate the real costs of the program. This information allows for accurate forecasting expenditures and the development of a formula or formulae for allocations upon transfer.

As soon as these parameters are developed and agreed upon, transfer authority will be sought.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a follow-up to a question I raised with the Minister of National Defence on February 16. It concerned peacekeeping.

The tenor of the question was based on the concern and observation that there are a number of red flags being thrown up regarding the manner in which we deploy our troops, the risk that is under way and the strain on personnel resources and operational maintenance resources for the remainder of the Canadian forces. The fact that these operations take place without consideration in Parliament I believe is the overriding concern.

Another reason for the concern and the real reason I am here tonight is that I see the Canadian forces participating in peacekeeping operations because of their excellent record in this regard and because of the understandable desire of any government, including our own, to participate and continue to participate given the condition of the world today.

There is a point when I believe discretion has to be used. Peacekeeping in the last four years has more than doubled. In fact more peacekeeping operations have taken place or been generated in the last four years than in the past forty and I do not see that decreasing. I will tell you why. There are 179 countries in the world today speaking 4,000 languages. I think 60 of them have a population of one million or less and 40 of them have a population of less than 200,000. More importantly, less than 10 per cent of these countries have a homogeneous ethnic population and less than 5 per cent have an ethnic group that accounts for more than 75 per cent of the population.

Therefore what you are in fact seeing is an explosion of nation states downward to the point where they are really comprising the smallest ethnic or religious groups.

• (1820)

In fact it is tribalism. These forces of tribalism and nationalism are intractable forces. I think you are going to see more and more of it as time goes by.

If you add to that the low level of tolerance that seems to be dominant in the world today for religious, social and ethnic differences, then I think that is another nail in the coffin for more peacekeeping operations.

I should really call them peace operations because, Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, the United Nations is now responding to peace operations in many ways, not just peacekeeping in its traditional sense as we know in the Cyprus operation in which we have been involved for many years.

There are things like humanitarian assistance as we have in Somalia, guarding food convoys as we have in Bosnia and indeed such things as election monitoring as we have in Cambodia. None of these operations, despite the heroic efforts of the men and women in the field, appear to be moving with a great deal of success. That is another reason why we have concerns.

I merely want to follow up on the minister's response which touched on the business of some time in the future being discretionary only because we will have run out of resources. I trust that my remarks will have some influence on the minister and indeed on the government as they make future decisions on committing our forces to peacekeeping operations.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to reply on behalf of the hon. Minister of National Defence, particularly to my hon. friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. You may not know this, Mr. Speaker, but our ridings are side by side at least for one patch of about 30 kilometres.

The point that my colleague makes is one that I guess should have been obvious to many of us over time. It is one that is only becoming evident now as Canada continues, by the force of its tremendous reputation, its tremendous commitment and tremendous quality of her forces to be asked to participate in the variety of operations that my colleague referred to earlier.

The point he makes that should have become evident and is now very much becoming evident is that it cannot go on forever. Canada cannot be everywhere all the time. That I think is clearly understood in a number of ways by national defence.

For instance, in Somalia, while we are part of the enforcement action, we have made it clear to the United Nations that we are not going to be able to be part of the subsequent UNOSOM II process. These are decisions one has to make.

It is clear that each operation must be evaluated not only in terms of risk but in terms of personnel, equipment availability and duration. For Canada to assess its position in any United Nations operation, it must be assessed in light of that capacity and also the impact that it has on the ongoing numbers and responsibility of the Canadian forces.

Another response involves obviously the ability of Canada to be more creative in the approaches it takes in meeting these responsibilities in these calls.

The minister while appearing at committee the other day said something and I will not go through the whole quote. She said:

> We are looking at a number of new ideas on how to participate in future peacekeeping operations.

One emphasis she would put is perhaps on our skills within our forces as opposed to simply people. The effort that we have made in developing the capacity of our reserves is particularly important. Our troops are very well trained. They are very well prepared. When the reservists are sent into these situations, they receive the same 90-day course that our regular forces receive.

There are 460 reserve peacekeepers serving on United Nations missions at present. They are constituents of mine as I know they are constituents of my friend across the way.

We must have a flexible general purpose combat capable armed force. The number of the reservists in our forces makes that possible. They have a number of roles to play.

It is critical that the Department of National Defence reinforce that with funding. That is important. I know my friend, even though his experience is on the sea, will appreciate that the land forces component of national defence will see a 12.3 per cent increase in expenditures over the last fiscal year.

• (1825)

Mr. Speaker, I see you giving the message that my time is up. I commend my colleague for raising a point that is important. I hope I have been able to shed some light on it. I certainly appreciate your endurance this afternoon as I go on far beyond my time, as is quite often the case.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the day after the Minister of Finance tabled his economic statement last December I rose in the House and asked the Minister of State for the Environment what the impact of that particular statement by the minister would be on the government's green plan, be it the number of programs that are involved with that, the Fraser River basin management plan, model forests and other particular programs. I asked that of the government because it was, as many people said then, a black day for the green plan.

We have seen further in the estimates today a new way of cutting funds. It is called reprofiling of funds for some very important programs.

I hope that tonight the parliamentary secretary can respond and shed some light on the nature of the funding of the green plan because I think it is fair to say that for many who have been following the plan, it has been very difficult to determine department by department, with the profiling or the reprofiling by the government of the funds in the green plan, where we actually are at when it comes to the funding under the program.

I note under the estimates that were tabled today in the House that the government is intending to release a progress report on the green plan in April. I would encourage the government, through the parliamentary secretary, to make a very clear outline of just exactly where we are going with the funding under this particular program.

It is very important to the country that we know what is happening with the green plan and many of the projects under that taking place in our ridings. I referred previously to the Fraser River program in my area. There is a model forests program taking place there as well.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary if he could address some of those comments and certainly take it to the minister. When this progress report is released, let us have some progress, let us have some light shed on just what kind of spending plans there are by this government for the green plan.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with my hon. friend when he talks about the importance of the green plan. As you know very well, Mr. Speaker, this indeed is the first long-term comprehensive environmental protection program put forth in Canada by any government. In fact, not only is it a first in Canada, but indeed it is a first throughout much of the world.

That is one of the reasons why Dr. Mostafa Tolba, who was director of UNEP prior to Elizabeth Dowdeswell, was so supportive of it.

On the other hand, the Government of Canada is facing some very harsh economic realities based upon the fact that we have a national debt which exceeds $400 billion. We have annual deficits running in the $30 billion range due to the excessive expenditures which occurred at an earlier time and under different circumstances.

I want to stress today, and I think my hon. friend is probably aware of it, that while most departments in the federal government are either experiencing a freeze or in some cases even having to accept a reduction in the amounts available to them, the amount of money available under the green plan has actually been increasing on a year-by-year basis.

For example, the Main Estimates for 1993-94 total $351 million which, according to my calculations, is a 23 per cent increase from 1992-93. That is a very significant increase. Indeed, it demonstrates that the principal objectives of the green plan will clearly be met, albeit over a greater extended period of time than originally anticipated.

I think it is important for us to remember that the green plan is about a lot of things other than just spending. I think one of the dangers quite frankly is we tend to measure government programs only in terms of dollars spent. I think that is a false premise on which to evaluate.

The green plan is about decision making. The green plan therefore is about our ratification of the Convention on Biodiversity where we provided such leadership at Rio.

The green plan is about the Environmental Assessment Act that has been proclaimed into law and will soon be implemented.

The green plan is about the fact that the North American free trade agreement itself was subjected to environmental assessment, the first such major policy initiative so subjected in Canada.

It is about pulp and paper regulations which are very important in your province, Mr. Speaker. It is about a code of environmental stewardship.

Mr. Speaker, if you would give me additional time, which I know you cannot do under the rules, we would have a greater opportunity to discuss how this plan is so significant to decision making.

We must remember that the green plan is more than just spending. It is how decisions are made. That will be the ultimate value of the green plan in years to come.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved that the sixth report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade presented to the House on Wednesday, September 16, 1992, be concurred in.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin this debate by indicating my appreciation to members of this subcommittee.

I would like to compliment the chairman of the committee, the member for South Shore, the member for Drummond who spent many hours working, and the member for Victoria. I would like to compliment the hon. member for Don Valley West, the member for Northumberland and the member for Cambridge.

I say that because in my 14 years of experience in the House this committee was one of the most important inquiries undertaken by a Commons committee. It did not receive a great deal of publicity but it delved into issues that go to the very heart of the significant changes taking place in the world around us and the impact that those changes have in our own country.

It opened up for many of us a look at the arcane, confusing and dangerous world of the international arms trade and Canada's role in that precarious business. It made us look very seriously at the question of the defence industries in Canada and what was happening to them. It made us look at how they are being affected by the substantial shift in procurement policies and the whole nature of the development of high technology that was so much part of the defence weapons systems during the cold war. They are now being substantially altered and affected by a major shift toward a peacemaking capacity for Canada.

It made us come to grips with some very tough choices as Canadians. I do not in any way underplay the incredible, tough, realistic problems that are faced by many communities, businesses and Canadians in making decisions about whether we continue as we have been doing. We are a reasonably significant player in the production of arms in this country.

Can we make a turn in the road toward a different attitude, a different approach occasioned by the demands of the post cold war world?

Perhaps the importance of the work of the committee has been highlighted in the way that the estimates that were tabled in the House of Commons displayed a certain set of choices.

On one hand we know there are significant cutbacks for economic development for native people, promotion of cultural activities in this country, young people in education and training, health care and seniors. There is a whole list of Canadians who are being asked to sacrifice on the basis of restrained budgets and limited resources. On the other side of the ledger there is an increase of $1.4 billion to a helicopter project of $4.4 billion, bringing the total to $5.8 billion for a weapons system that is becoming increasingly irrelevant in terms of the changes going on in the world around us.

• (1015)

At some time there may have been justification for the submarine detecting helicopters it bought in terms of our cold war responsibilities as a member of the NATO alliance.

Surely in today's world when the submarine threat is no longer there and the Russians have downed tools in large part, for us to proceed with a massive expenditure of $5.8 billion while at the same time making substantial cuts across the board in a whole range of industrial, economic and social programs just shows how crucial it is that this country get its mind around, and get a grip on, the real priorities in Canada.

That is what this committee tried to do. It tried to understand that the weapons trade is not in the best interest of Canada. One of the most tragic sets of figures and facts presented to members of the committee showed how in so many parts of the world the billions upon billions of dollars being spent on arms work to victimize women, children and people who no longer have the means of the basic essentials of life.

Somalia is a good example. We are now mounting massive efforts in Somalia through the UN not only to keep the peace but to rebuild the society. In the 10 or so years up to the outbreak of the civil war a billion dollars worth of arms was poured into Somalia by the Americans, the Russians and others. Now the UN and Canadian troops are having to contend with those arms. There are enough weapons in Somalia to keep that conflict going for 100 years.

Now we are paying an enormous price for it in trying to keep the peace because of this vast haemorrhaging of arms exports.

During the gulf war one of the great declarations made by the Prime Minister and others was that we were fighting the war to secure the peace in the Middle East. One of the objectives was to suffocate the arms race in the Middle East and to suppress the vast amounts of money that went into places like Iraq with which we have to contend afterwards.

What has happened since then? One report I read recently said that in Iran alone over $100 billion is being spent on new arms. The United States of America has just finished in the last fiscal year exporting close to $6 billion worth of arms into parts of the Middle East. Regretfully and sadly, our own country is also becoming an arms supplier in this most volatile of areas.

It would be a foolhardy person not to know that some day those arms may come back to haunt us. We will be paying a much larger price in terms of the blood of young men and women because of the need to make a profit.

In southeast Asia last year alone close to $90 billion was spent on arms. That takes away money that would be much better used for the development of the human potential in these areas.

One of the sadnesses we have is the need for all of us to see how we can provide some leadership. My colleague from Nepean points out another very important and salient fact. The United States of America spent $1 million a day in El Salvador. Now the amount of money the international community has to put in for peacekeeping efforts must try to contend with that incredible arsenal which was built up over the years.

• (1020)

This committee tried to come to grips with that issue by saying that we know that Canada alone cannot do the job. We must do a better job than we are doing to give a message to the world that the proliferation of arms must come to a halt. That is the reason for the recommendation to have a much tougher munitions control register. It was designed to say that we would not be party to sending arms to any area, region or country in which there are human rights abuses, civil conflict, or dictatorships using those arms to suppress people or create violence or conflict.

It is a message and a signal to other countries to hopefully follow the lead. It does not mean to say that arms exports are prohibited because we recognize the reality that we do have allies and friends that we have some mutual interest in supporting, such as NATO, the United States and some other places.

We want to make sure there is a system in which there could be a clear requirement that exports would only go to countries on the list and that there would be a transparency to that list so we would know who they are. We want to make sure that it would not be decided inside the bowels of External Affairs and all of a sudden an announcement would be made and before anything could be done it would be over, as happened with the sale of light armoured vehicles to Saudi Arabia.

Furthermore, and it is a very important principle, we felt it crucial that Parliament have a role and that the elected representatives of the people of Canada should be given some opportunity to determine whether we want to sell arms to country A or country B. Therefore there is a requirement for tabling the name of any country that would go on this list to be reviewed by Parliament if we so decided.

We also understood that once that was done the system should be reasonably efficient in its processing. There is no reason to hold up companies unduly. Once the country was on the list then the processing could take place with some degree of effectiveness. The point of the matter is that we believed it was time for Canada to take some leadership.

We also recognized at the same time that it is not simply enough to put a prohibition or a limitation on the sale of arms. We have to look at the much broader and more critical substantial issue of how to convert those defence industries that have been creating arms to effective peacetime uses. This is a very important issue that is being faced by all countries.

It was interesting to see that in the campaign statements of President Clinton he talked about how to begin to transfer the enormous research and development capacity of the defence establishment into an effective reallocation to peacetime uses.

Our committee concluded exactly the same thing. It is important for Canada to begin to do the kind of analysis and reconstruction of its own policies to support and facilitate the conversion of our defence industries.

We came to that conclusion for a couple of very good reasons. First, our defence industries contain some of the best high technology minds in the country. It is on the high technology end that we have been providing parts and components over the years and we do not want to lose those skills.

Surely we should have learned from the example of the Avro Arrow that those people working in those industries have incredibly good skills that could be used for other purposes.

Let me give one very good example. We all recognize, at least on this side of the House, that the whole issue of peacemaking is becoming central to our security. The contribution to and involvement in international collective security initiatives, whether in Bosnia, Somalia, Cambodia or wherever, is really the security issue of the future.

We believe we have to shift our spending priorities in the defence department to meet those requirements so that Canada can fulfil its role as a peacemaker. It is totally ridiculous and unacceptable for the Minister of National Defence to keep standing up in this House to say we have to begin pulling back our commitments on peacekeeping because we do not have enough money to get enough troops and to train and equip them properly.

At the same time she condoned, supported and endorsed an expenditure of $5.8 billion for helicopters which have no use in peacemaking. It is an absolutely and totally ridiculous contradiction in terms.

• (1025)

We should understand the time has come for Canadians and the Canadian government to make tough choices as recommended in this committee. It is time to shift our priorities and understand that the world has changed. We cannot have a Minister of National Defence walking around in a fog buying into the old cold war strategies and stratagems. That simply does not do any good for our international reputation and what we can do in our own country.

One of the opportunities this new peacekeeping role represents is the need for new kinds of technology for verification, observation and monitoring to make sure that arms are not spread into countries and we can monitor what happens to nuclear plants in Iraq if need be. There is an incredible need at the United Nations level and other areas for a much more sophisticated international monitoring observation system. We are well equipped to begin making contributions in those areas, to help our industries develop a capacity to meet the world-wide need for those peacemaking technologies.

That is what the report talks about. It was a very important insight for us to see many of the plants. Our engineers and skilled technicians are anxious to get into those areas but unfortunately the fix of government policies in a sense almost prohibits it because we are not interested in supporting that. There is no conversion plan for Canada. The DIPP funds are not designed for conversion. They are designed to keep doing the same old thing.

An hon. member: Don't forget environmental technology.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I am going to come to that in just a moment. In the second dimension, the onus is not simply on the shift of military priorities to peacemaking. There is also an incredible opportunity to use technologies presently located in our defence industries for a wide variety of civilian uses.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood points out the incredible demand for new environmental technology. We met with officials of a company in western Canada that is now beginning to develop a technique for sensoring using technology which has been used for spy satellites. It will now begin to focus on how many fish there are in the North Pacific or what is happening to the glaciers in the north or what is happening to the atmosphere. It will use its sensoring techniques to detect the environmental changes occurring around the world. It is an incredible growth market. When asked to what extent the company can be assisted and helped in making that conversion, there is none. It is not there. It simply does not exist.

One of the most important and significant proposals contained in this committee report is that the question of conversion be made a priority for our government. The government should table a plan and restructure the DIPP program to encourage conversion techniques. It should establish a centre to help industries plan and develop to adapt to peacetime uses.

It is an incredible opportunity to reconstruct our industrial strength in this country. We can use our best minds and skills not in the production of weapons but in the production of new high technology jobs and products that the world is going to need.

This report should not go on the shelf. It needs to be read by every member of this House. It should be read certainly by government officials and ministers responsible. Certainly I recommend that the Minister of National Defence read it, if she is not too busy.

Maybe she would come to some understanding of the serious mistake she is making in not doing a significant reassessment, review and reallocation of the priorities within that department. Then we can begin moving into areas that would give Canada some real leadership and some real opportunities internationally to try to suppress the developments in the arms race. At the same time and in the same way we can come to grips with the need to change our own priorities at home and to begin to stimulate, encourage and facilitate a shift and change in our defence industries to meet peacetime peacemaking uses.

It was a great privilege being a member of that committee. The document itself will serve in the future as part of a blueprint. It is not complete, committees cannot do that. It sets the direction, it sets a way. It tries to break out of the old thinking and tries to look ahead. For that reason I strongly recommend that members of this House endorse and support this report and particularly that members of the government read it.

• (1030)

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I was not sure if we were going to have a period for questions or not, but I will commence my debate.

I was a member of that subcommittee. Indeed, it was a wonderful opportunity for myself, for my colleague from Drummond and for other members of the committee to look at this matter and put forward the report, Future of Canadian Military Goods Production and Export.

I want to take a few moments to put on the record some comments on the existing Canadian export control system which I believe is one of the strictest in the world. That is what the debate wrapped around. Canada as a nation probably has one of the strictest export control regimes in the world. I think that has to be understood.

The question is how to improve or why change something that is the strictest? It is important that people understand that export control permits just do not relate to guns. They relate to a wide range of items.

Canada has consistently advocated arrangements at the international level. These have been aimed at building security frameworks that effectively take account of both the military and non-military threats to security, that promote habits of dialogue and co-operation and that emphasize conflict prevention rather than conflict resolution by force.

Unfortunately, despite the great progress in the security and arms control field in recent years, we have not yet achieved the degree of success Canada wants and needs. For the foreseeable future Canada and other countries will still have to maintain a reasonable level of armed forces to deter, and if necessary, to respond to military threats to security and to participate in collective security and peacekeeping operations.

The need for countries to maintain reasonable levels of armed forces was fully recognized in the arms control initiative announced by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in February 1991. This initiative called for efforts to prevent excessive buildup of conventional arms. By excessive buildup of conventional arms Canada means a buildup that goes beyond reasonable defence requirements. Canada is not proposing to stop exporting and importing military goods, nor is it telling other countries to stop doing so.

At the global level Canada was a leading participant in the negotiations in the UN leading to the establishment of a global conventional arms register. Canada must now work to ensure effective implementation of that register and will seek to build on it with the view of increasing the scope of its coverage and providing further avenues of consultation.

At the national level Canada has for the past three years issued an annual report on the export of military goods from Canada. I know that the member from Winnipeg mentioned Somalia, Iran, El Salvador. If Canadians looked at the report that is issued annually, Canada has not sent $1 worth of items under the export control list to those three countries. I think he did acknowledge that Canada is not participating.

The matter they want to deal with is: "We have to take this export control list and apply it to countries rather than the process of each individual application being looked at".

What I would like to do now is read some comments I had put into the particular report. Again, I mention that the existing export control permit system is one of the strictest in the world. I will read directly from the report: "One committee member", which is myself, "strongly believes that the recommendations relating to establishing a munitions country control list will produce undesirable results".

• (1035)

I argued that to merge the items on the export control list group two with the rules to establish a country on the automatic firearms country control list would not produce a stable and transparent public policy environment and would place Canadian business at a competitive disadvantage.

The proposed munitions country control list would initially consist of only 10 countries, since only Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States have concluded intergovernmental defence research, development and production arrangements with Canada.

I want to digress for a moment. If we want to send firearms to a country we have to go through a lot of work in the development of arrangements. This is very difficult to do, and Canada has only set up 10 such arrangements with 10 countries.

The proposed munitions country control list process would establish a process that tells Canadian companies that they can expect a permit to be issued without delay to allow them to sell bombs, torpedoes, rockets and missiles to Denmark but they could be denied permission to sell transport aircraft spare parts to Kenya. For example, this could have meant that in 1990 exports to Brazil of underwater detection devices, to India of electronic generators, to Kuwait of bomb disposal suits, to Morocco of aircraft flight simulators and to Singapore of fire control systems would not have been possible.

Rather than the current system of examining each application on its own individual unique merit their suggestion is that once a country is approved then anything can be sent to that country. That is important to understand because this would have meant that in 1991 exports of military goods or components that come under the Export Control Act, and that includes things such as fire control systems and bomb disposal suits, to countries such as Australia, Japan, the Republic of Korea, New Zealand, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland, which represents about 30 per cent of the controlled Canadian sales, would not have been permitted.

As a result of this recommendation we would say to Australians: "You are not on this list and therefore we do not trust you". That is the impact of the recommendations that they are making.

I further argued that this formula process could not be used as each case must consider the present climate in the country of destination, the goods to be exported and the potential end use. The current export control system already addresses every application as having a possible unique circumstance.

Canada can take a lead at the world level, and it already has in the UN, but part of the recommendations in this report basically say to the Canadian industries involved in this area: "We do not want you to do any business. We want you to go out of business", because that is the stranglehold that they would put on these businesses.

There is also the question about whether we should help these companies to convert. I can assure the House, based on the witnesses who have come forward, that companies already recognize that the cold war is over and that countries are not buying the amount of military goods they used to buy. It is a changing world and the businesses in that industry recognized that many years ago. They have already started their own conversion programs.

Therefore this is best left to those sectors that are motivated by profit because they recognize that they are in a shrinking market and that they must diversify and use the skills and technologies they have. A lot of the products they make do have dual purpose uses.

• (1040)

I think industry has already recognized that. If industry is sitting back waiting for the government to put together a committee to go out and tell all these companies how they should convert then those companies will not survive. Those companies have already started to do that.

There are many things in this report that I like and I support. However, I do not agree with the recommendation to change the export control permit. It already issues reports, is very transparent and is considered to be one of the strictest in the world. I do not believe there is any evidence to indicate we should change it.

I could continue but I know that my colleague from Victoria certainly has his point of view. He expressed it in committee and I know he will do so on the floor of the House. I will now yield to him.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to support the motion that this House concur in the recommendations of this committee's report. The committee worked very hard to produce a constructive and useful report on this important issue and I think the recommendations are to be commended to the House.

Let me recall how this subcommittee came about. At the time of the gulf war the world became aware of the fact that the arms trade, which in the first sentence of this report is called a monument to cold war international relations, had turned the arms production industry which grew out of World War II into an export trade to developing countries. By 1977, 80 per cent of the world's production was drifting into developing countries. We saw the folly of that in the gulf war. There was a brief moment when it appeared that the world might be resolved to try to deal with that issue, to try to bring the arms export industry around the world, and the scandal of the arms sales, under control.

Our Prime Minister made a very eloquent speech during the gulf war calling on the United Nations to convene a world summit to deal with arms exports. However within weeks of the end of the cold war the government seemed to have forgotten the eloquent statements and brought before this House Bill C-6 which authorized the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia, contrary to previous government policy.

In the course of that debate the government conceded that the issue needed to be examined by Parliament. I was very pleased that the Minister for International Trade accepted my proposal that a subcommittee be established through the committee on external affairs.

In the summer and fall of 1991 the committee began its work. We travelled across Canada and heard representations from people throughout this country, from Victoria, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Halifax, Montreal and Ottawa. We also heard from experts and government officials. I believe that we have put together in this report a very useful examination of how the world got into this mess and of Canada's contribution to it.

It should be understood that Canada is the eighth largest producer of arms on the globe. It is the 14th largest exporter of arms in the world. We contribute to the problem and we have a responsibility to respond.

The committee report could be divided into a number of sections.

• (1045)

First, we emphasize the importance of Canada using its diplomatic energies in multilateral efforts to bring the arms export industry around the world under control. It is not good enough for Canada to get its own act together. We have to work with other countries, most particularly with the industrial countries, to come up with enforceable common policies to reduce and control the export of arms.

We also have to work with the developing countries to produce secure regimes. Many developing countries are forced by the arms sales to their neighbours to respond in kind. Others are attracted to arms as a means of keeping their own governments in power. That is one of our concerns about sales to Saudi Arabia.

We have to work with other countries to try to produce a secure international order. That must be at the heart of our work in this area. Without that any efforts we make in this country will come to nought.

However, we have a special obligation to get our own act together, particularly if we are going to push other countries in this direction. The committee report outlines some very specific recommendations to make that happen.

We recognize in the report that there may be legitimate reasons for Canada to produce arms. We may need to supply our own police and armed services. The United Nations peacekeeping efforts will require arms. Under appropriate circumstances there are legitimate requirements for military arms to deal with those who would break international law.

Therefore it becomes important that we establish an effective arms export regime. This committee report takes the current regime, which is totally internal to the government, and changes it into a statutory regime accountable to Parliament.

As things now stand the government has its own policy and whenever it wishes to make an exception it can do so. The only reason there was Bill C–6 was that because of a particular provision in the Criminal Code in respect of small arms the government was forced to come to Parliament to get a change. But for that the government would simply have changed its policy internally, without any accounting to Parliament at all. It is very important that the arms export system be established by Parliament and be accountable to Parliament.

The system should have two key elements to it. First, there should be a listing of countries to whom arms exports would be acceptable. All other countries would be outside the purview of the export system and exports to those countries would be illegal. If there was an interest in exporting to a country not on the list the government would have to come to Parliament and have the list amended. Second, each transaction would have to be reviewed and, in my view at least, subject to a parliamentary review.

The second element of the policy outlined by the committee is the conversion and diversification of the arms industry. As long as an arms industry exists there will be pressure, as we saw in Bill C–6, on governments and on Parliament to approve exports in the interest of maintaining employment.

Therefore for that reason alone it is very important that we begin to change the industrial structure of this country. In the period after the Second World War, and in particular after the cancellation of the Avro Arrow, the Liberal government of the day embarked on a policy of encouraging the Canadian defence production industry through subsidies and other programs.

• (1050)

So an industry has developed in response to government encouragement, yet it must now face the economic reality that not only are defence budgets beginning to decrease around the world but that the public is calling on governments to control and reduce defence production.

It is a bad, declining, and difficult industry to be in. Therefore from a strictly economic and social point of view it is important that the government encourage a change to civilian and other uses.

It is also important if we are to ensure the maintenance of an effective arms export regime that is not subject to pressure every time a company needs new markets.

We see now today a government which seems determined to ignore the wisdom of this parliamentary committee report. We still have not had a reply from the government. It carries on its policies as if this report did not exist, which is probably not a new phenomenon but continues to be a matter of disappointment. I wonder if the Minister of National Defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs have even read the report.

It would be very interesting to hear the views on this from the government itself because what happens is that the government gets advice from the bureaucrats who are administering the policy the way they would like to. It seems to me that the government should be ready to rely on the wisdom of a parliamentary committee report and on the wisdom of Parliament. After all this subcommittee went out to the general public in this country to develop a balanced policy that respects the interests of all who are involved, that fits within the over–all policy of this country, and that the public insists upon.

We now see the phenomenon of the government encouraging more sales to countries in the Middle East despite the government's statement that arms exports should not go to areas of potential hostilities. Next week in Ottawa the government is convening a session with its trade commissioners inviting the world to come to Ottawa to look at our arms exports and our capacity to export. What countries are invited? They include Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Iran.

The high tech conference that is scheduled for next week is in direct contravention of the will of the Canadian people as we heard it during the work of this committee and it runs completely counter to the government's own stated policy.

Let me conclude by congratulating the member who introduced this motion. He is the official spokesperson for the Liberal Party on this issue and I am pleased to hear that in that capacity he is endorsing this report. I would hope other members of his party would be equally enthusiastic.

During the travels of the committee across the country there was the phenomenon of there frequently being two Liberal representatives. When those who favoured a restrictive policy were appearing before the committee the official spokesperson for the Liberal Party was there and was very supportive of their briefs. When the industry was appearing another member from the Liberal Party would be there and would be falling all over the industry representatives and saying how encouraging the Liberal Party would be to arms exports around the world and to defence production.

There were two voices from the Liberal Party. It would be very encouraging if we could believe that the member from Winnipeg actually represented the view of his party. During debate on Bill C-6 the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce took leadership on that issue. However, I fear that they represent a faint voice within their caucus.

I am looking forward to hearing their leader over the next few months stake his colours as firmly to the mast-head as the member for Winnipeg South Centre has in this debate.

It is crucially important to world order that the countries of the globe come to grips with this issue, and we have a chance now with the end of the cold war. The countries in eastern and central Europe that have themselves depended so much on military production will be looking to the western world to change its ways.

This report offers a guideline to do that. I call on this House to accept the report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to an order made earlier this day the debate is deemed adjourned and the order is deemed transferred to Government Orders.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I believe the order said that the debate would end at eleven o'clock this morning. Is there not five minutes for debate yet?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The order said that there would be three people, one from each party, and that it would end at the latest, at eleven o'clock. So we will go with Orders of the Day.

Mr. Sobeski: Madam Speaker, I think you will find that there is agreement in the House that if we did finish early that we suspend for a couple of minutes until eleven o'clock because everyone is planning their agenda around eleven o'clock. I think there is agreement to do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I agree with the hon. member. If the House is willing I thought it would be in the interest of the House for me to read the decision on Bill C-99 at this time and then we can suspend for three minutes.

SUBSIDIES FOR DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, dairy producers in the Abitibi region object to Treasury Board's 10 per cent cut in subsidies for dairy products.

I think we should consider the consumer subsidy aspect. According to the arrangement between the Government of Canada, through Agriculture Canada, and Canada's dairy producers, the subsidy enables them to lower their selling price to the industry, which in turn reduces its price to the consumer by the same amount.

We realize that something has to be done about the financial situation of the Canadian Treasury. In fact, that is the purpose of most of the recommendations in the Auditor General's report. The Minister of Finance would be well advised to look at these recommendations and adopt a strategy for their implementation.

According to Rosaire Mongrain, president of the Abitibi dairy producers, their net income will be cut by 10 per cent.

DOWNSVIEW AIR FORCE BASE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the Metropolitan Toronto Hockey League, under the leadership of John Gardiner, has plans to build an international hockey and figure skating facility on 12 acres of land at the Downsview Air Force Base in Toronto.

This world-class facility will create instant construction jobs, long-term jobs in tourism, longer term jobs in fitness and amateur sport, not to mention the benefit to tens of thousands of figure skaters and hockey players, as well as a home for other Canadian cultural events.

The MTHL has raised the construction money from private sponsors and the government has declared the land redundant.

On behalf of all members of the greater Toronto Liberal caucus we urge this government to cut through the red tape and get this project going. It should remember its promise of jobs, jobs, jobs.

RIGHT HON. PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, speaking on my own behalf and on behalf of the people of Témiscamingue, I want to thank the Prime Minister of Canada for the energy and determination with which he served this country during the past eight years.

The people in my riding have always seen him as a true leader, whose tenacity, determination and courage are extraordinary. We will remember him as a man driven by a consuming passion for his country and as a man of great warmth and generosity who was sensitive and attuned to the needs of the regions.

Clean air, decentralization of federal services, regional development and a Ministry of State for Seniors are all initiatives that were welcomed by my constituents.

I therefore want to join my fellow citizens in wishing the Prime Minister and his family a happy and prosperous retirement, and once again, we want to say, loud and clear: Thank you!

GOVERNMENT WHARFS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, inshore fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence can be accused of feeling that this government and particularly this department of fisheries have it in for them. First it was the imposition of dockside monitoring fees which these fishermen have had to fight in court. Then it was the attack on the bona fide licensing program. Now there is the standoff at the government wharf at Lismore right in the backyard of the Minister of Public Works.

It is true the federal government is making much needed repairs to the government wharf. Unfortunately this has required the destruction of a shed owned by a small lobster buyer. The fishermen believe a modest payment to the buyer to help replace this facility is warranted. The amount is negotiable.

Instead, the government wants to provoke a costly court battle with the fishermen, a battle neither it nor the taxpayers of Canada can afford.

Why does this government not try accommodation instead of confrontation in dealing with its inshore fishermen whose backs are against the wall because of its disastrous policies?

THE LATE DANNY GALLIVAN

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Madam Speaker, we were all saddened today to hear of the passing of a great Canadian, Mr. Danny Gallivan.

All Canadians from coast to coast have lost an irreplaceable citizen and a friend. Danny Gallivan will best be remembered as a pioneer. He revolutionized sports broadcasting as we know it today. We will all remember the voice behind Hockey Night in Canada and the Montreal Canadiens. We will surely remember the excitement and the euphoria he brought to our living-rooms on Saturday nights. The scintillating saves and the cannonading drives were all synonymous with Danny Gallivan.

One could feel his love for the game but, more important, his love for his country. Although best remembered as an avid broadcaster, Danny Gallivan nonetheless contributed as much time and dedication to the greatest of his concerns, human welfare.

In fact his love for this country and its people may be best exemplified by the multitude of charitable organizations he supported and contributed to. As well, his love for the youth of Canada was unmatched.

We will all miss Danny Gallivan.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the Gwa'Sala and Nakwaxda'xw Indian bands at Smith Inlet and Blunden Harbour were forcibly amalgamated and moved to Port Hardy, B.C. in the 1960s.

This forcible amalgamation and relocation were exclusively for the convenience of the department of Indian affairs. Once the move was made the department of Indian affairs broke every promise it ever made to these people about housing, education, health and economic development. When they left it burned their traditional community so there could be no return.

The Gwa'Sala-Nakwaxda'xw sank into 30 years of hell, totally engulfed by social disintegration and social problems. One of the measures of these social problems was the fact that 300 children were apprehended by social services and taken out of that community. Some were adopted as far away as Europe, never to return again.

It is our hope that the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples would meet on the north end of Vancouver Island to hold sessions in the community to inquire into the impact of the policy of the department of Indian affairs concerning forcible amalgamation and forcible relocation of Indian people with no commitment to the promises made.

In the case of the Gwa'Sala-Nakwaxda'xw—

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, in a survey last year my constituents expressed concern about the integrity of our immigration system. The majority supported the need to tighten up immigration laws to filter out those who would abuse our system.

I was one of several members who gave up time in my riding last summer to hear witnesses on Bill C-86, the amendments to the Immigration Act.

We were told by Immigration officials of cases where immigration officers would see a passport sticking out of the pocket of would-be refugee but had no right to seize the document. The power to search, they said, would greatly assist them in their efforts to prevent abuse.

We learn from the paper today that already those new powers are having an effect. Since the beginning of the month immigration officials have been able to seize several fake passports and documents, in some cases simply by asking people claiming to have no documents to empty their pockets. In one instance the phoney documents led to an RCMP investigation into a smuggling ring.

Canada is one of the most generous countries in the world when it comes to opening its doors to those who seek to enjoy what it has to offer. We want to continue our tradition of compassion but, to ensure this, officials must have the powers necessary to uphold our immigration system.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

THE LATE DANNY GALLIVAN

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, it was sad to learn this morning of the death of one of Cape Breton's finest sons, Danny Gallivan.

The broadcast voice of the Montreal Canadiens for three decades, Danny Gallivan's high-pitched and unfailingly colourful description of the games transfixed hockey fans around the world.

For more than 22 consecutive years he did not miss a single game because of illness. His great contribution to the sport was recognized in 1982 when he was named to the Hockey Hall of Fame.

On a personal note, I count the Gallivan family among my friends and I want to express to them my deepest sympathies.

Danny Gallivan's Canadiens were undoubtedly the greatest hockey team in the world. Their heroes included Maurice Richard, Doug Harvey, Jean Beliveau, Guy Lafleur, Ken Dryden, and too many others to name here. But to me as a youngster, and even today, the greatest Canadien hero of all was the guy from down the road in Whitney Pier, Danny Gallivan.

VOLUNTEERS

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, on February 14, I had the honour and the privilege as the federal member of Parliament for La Prairie to give nearly 50 people in my riding the commemorative medal for Canada's 125th anniversary on behalf of the Governor General.

More than 650 guests attended this ceremony where I was very pleased to honour and thank publicly these volunteers who have worked for many years to help my constituents in the arts, social affairs, culture and sports.

Such tribute had never been paid to them publicly and, as several of them said to me, this will help them continue to work tirelessly and even more eagerly to help the most disadvantaged and those in greatest need.

Congratulations to every one of them on behalf of all my constituents and in my own name. Any well-organized community needs such volunteers and should thank them in appreciation for their good deeds.

Once again, thanks to all.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, yesterday's budget estimates brought good news for helicopter makers and spies but bad news for women and children.

Spending on military helicopters has skyrocketed from $4.4 billion to $5.8 billion and Canada's spy agency is richer by almost $12 million. Yet $1 million was cut from women's programs, $5 million was cut from the child care initiatives fund, and billions were lost for child care in dramatically reduced transfer payments to the provinces. The health and welfare branch, which funds family planning and health promotion, was cut by $20 million.

Funding to prevent unwanted pregnancies and their costly social and economic consequences began a rapid decline under the Liberals and is continuing under the Tories.

Why are military helicopters and spies more important than the women and children of Canada? This government continues to mouth a commitment to equality but takes our society in exactly the opposite direction.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, yesterday in Parliament the government introduced legislation to implement the North American free trade agreement. The NAFTA is the culmination of 14 months of negotiations and 6 more months of careful drafting of the text and the legislation.

In Canada the level of interest in the agreement is high. That is why the government strongly supported the all-party hearings which took place on NAFTA in nine cities across Canada and in Ottawa during the past four months. Over 100 presentations have been made.

It is now time to start the debate on the legislation itself. I am confident that informed and serious consideration will confirm NAFTA's rightful place as part of Canada's economic strategy.

The NAFTA is only one component of that strategy. That is why the government continues to press for successful conclusion of the Uruguay round of the GATT. Nothing could send a more powerful signal of economic confidence to all world markets.

I do not claim this agreement will produce economic miracles but it will create opportunities for business and in time contribute to solid job creating economic activity.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, the subcommittee on poverty is no joke. Child poverty is no joke. The fact that one million Canadian children are the clients of food banks is no joke either.

What is both tragic and laughable is the attempt of some hon. members to change the definition of poverty. It reminds me of a British farce entitled Don't Raise the Bridge, Lower the Water.

The philosophical meanderings of government members will be cold comfort for children on social assistance as well as the children of the working poor.

It clearly is time for the children of Canada to pull up their socks. Their government has just said to them: "You are not poor; you merely think you are poor".

It is interesting that today the justice committee tabled the unanimous report that deals far more sensitively and realistically with the whole question of poverty in this country. Perhaps government members on the justice committee could do some missionary work with their colleagues on the poverty committee.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, during Question Period yesterday I pointed out that regional development spending in Quebec was slated to go up by $40 million, and I welcomed that, while support for similar programs in Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario and western Canada were being cut by $36 million. The President of the Treasury Board claimed in his response that two programs, the Montreal Development Fund and the Canada-Quebec Industrial Development Agreement, had not been approved in time for the 1992-93 estimates so they were included in the new estimates released yesterday and this accounted for the difference.

• (1115)

In fact, the details of the new estimates show that regional development grants and contributions were $161 million in Quebec in 1991-92, $142 million the next year and slated for $206 million this coming year. Even the $27.5 million—

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Madam Speaker, I rise in the House today to express my concern and dismay with the decision by the government to proceed with new runways at Pearson International Airport.

I am expressing the concern of my constituents who must live with the constant noise generated by Pearson's traffic. My constituents have been plagued by noise from airport operations for years with no relief or sympathy from the federal government. This latest decision by the government will only make an intolerable situation worse for the residents in my riding.

The government's own federal environmental assessment on expansion at Pearson recommended against taking any action at this time. The report by FEARO said there was lots of time to look at alternatives before building more runways. The government has obviously decided to ignore its own advice.

I charge that this decision is unfair and I urge the government to reconsider its course of action. It is up to the government to make sure that the people who live in the shadow of Pearson do not suffer for it.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Defence came to Nova Scotia and stated that CFB Cornwallis would probably be closed. This statement was made without ever having visited the base, without having had time to see if it is cost-effectively carrying out its role for national defence and without ever having looked at the devastating effects such a closure would have on the area.

CFB Cornwallis presently trains and has trained since 1968 all English speaking new recruits for our Armed Forces. No matter what happens to this government, no matter which party is in power, we will need our Armed Forces. To sustain our Armed Forces we need new recruits.

Look at the difficulty this government has in meeting our UN commitments. Where would this government train new recruits? Why would it move this training base and incur massive new expenditures? Why would this minister say what she said without even knowing the facts?

I call on the minister to visit CFB Cornwallis before making statements that not only hurt the people in the area but which financially make no sense.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

At a time when more than 1.6 million Canadians have no jobs, at a time when more than one million children are feeding at food banks, the minister is promoting a helicopter deal with management fees alone of over $1 billion.

Yesterday we learned in the government's own estimates that another $1.4 billion had to be set aside for this deal. Can the minister explain why she is promoting a deal with management fees of over $1 billion when she does not have a penny for children at the food banks in this country?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, that is an extraordinary question.

There are enormous amounts of government money going from the federal, provincial and municipal governments to aid children in Canada. There is only one level of government responsible for national defence and that is the Government of Canada.

In establishing our priorities and investing in equipment that will protect Canadians in the future, that will enable us to participate in peacekeeping operations to preserve our own sovereignty, the Government of Canada, the Department of National Defence, has long-term plans for serious equipment.

As I have said many times, the equipment necessary for the Department of National Defence is not cheap. That is why when the government makes a decision to engage in a particular procurement policy we work very hard to make sure that procurement has the very best possible benefit for Canadians, not just simply in terms of the service provided by the ultimate equipment, but in the spending of that money.

That is why one of the things that is so important about this project is that $3.2 billion of industrial benefits come to Canada, 45,000 person-years of employment.

• (1120)

I was recently at a plant in Winnipeg where $260 million will be spent. Half of the members of that work force are women. This is a growing area of the economy which is important for all Canadians. Therefore—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister will have the opportunity to continue.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, we know that Montreal has 250,000 unemployed people. No more money has been provided for them; it is being cut. On the other hand the minister is promoting a helicopter contract with management fees of over $1 billion. The minister never told us that so much money from Canadian taxpayers would go into the pockets of foreign companies.

How can she justify giving over $2 billion from this contract to multinationals in England and Italy?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, $975 million from this project will go to Quebecers, in industries in the province of Quebec. It is important to point out, as I said in English, that this project will provide 45,000 person-years of employment for Canadians—men and women. Furthermore, this project will have industrial benefit, which are of the utmost importance for Canada.

It is an investment in the future of our economy which creates long-term jobs and long-term jobs are the best way to guarantee our children's future. It is not enough to educate Canadians and provide them with social services; they must have the chance to use their skills and education so that industry can employ them in the future. That is what we have supported with this investment.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, some children in Canada have nothing to eat today but the minister prefers to spend $24 million per helicopter in management fees.

[English]

According to the government's own briefing we are talking about a management fee for each helicopter of more than $24 million. We are talking about a contingency fund per helicopter of $10 million. We are talking about an amount of money going into foreign multinationals of $36 million per helicopter.

Now that the minister finally understands the outrageous nature of this expense will she cancel the contract?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, that is the most extraordinary arithmetic I have ever heard because if the management fee for each helicopter is $24 million, and I forget the other fee she referred to as being $10 million, we must be getting the helicopters themselves for free because the search and rescue version is $33 million and the naval version is $44 million. We are obviously getting a serious bargain.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on February 8, 1992, when asked in this House about the total absence of a fair public bidding process on the helicopter deal, the government House leader alleged that Boeing Canada had submitted a bid for search and rescue helicopters in June 1990 and that it had been rejected by the government.

Supply and Services documents state that this is not a bid solicitation but an inquiry for price availability.

I want to ask the Minister of National Defence if she will take the opportunity to correct the record and admit that there was never a proper bidding process for these helicopters.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, as a matter of fact in dealing with the process, the present helicopters were declared in 1978 by the previous government as not being able to meet the needs.

In 1981 it started looking for new types. In 1985 nine companies were asked to bid on it and in 1986 two companies did bid on it. In 1987 National Defence and the evaluation team picked the EH-101 as being able to meet the needs in Canada.

One of the major reasons for that is that the Boeing helicopter, even if refitted, would not have a de-icing capability. If you want to do search and rescue off Newfoundland and maybe take care of some of the fishermen, you need to have a de-icing capability. Otherwise you are looking for a second-hand, used aircraft and leaving your fishermen to the prey of the weather.

• (1125)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the government's helicopters expenditures will result in millions of dollars for management and contingency fees. Yesterday the estimates stated very clearly that an additional $1.4 billion has been set aside for this deal.

I want to ask the Minister of National Defence to confirm to the people of Canada that over $2 billion of the $5.8 billion contract will be going to E.H. Industries, the parent company, with plants in England and Italy. While the minister is on her feet, would she indicate to the House how many jobs will be created in those two foreign countries?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, since they are asking a matter of contract, I should tell the hon. member we have a world-wide mandate on all EH-101s, about 10 per cent, which will create jobs for all EH-101s that are made around the world. There are 45,000 jobs of high-tech nature which will be—

Some hon. members: Answer the question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A question was asked and the answer deserves to be heard.

Mr. Dick: The members of the Liberal Party indicate that they feel there could be more jobs created with the same amount of money. We have experienced their make-work programs that last for 20 weeks and then the people go on unemployment insurance.

What we are creating here is a world-class—

Some hon. members: Answer the question.

Mr. Dick: Obviously they do not want to hear the answer. They are only interested in their own rhetoric. Perhaps they could ask the hon. member for Bonavista, who was the Rear Admiral and Vice Chairman of Maritime Command, and who is one of their members who supports this because I want to tell you, Madam Speaker, none of them know what they are talking about.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, if I can get an answer from him, regarding transfer payments.

The minister knows that yesterday it was announced that because of the preliminary estimates from Statistics Canada on population figures that equalization for the small provinces of this country will be cut back. In fact, they will be asked to repay some $600 million over the next few years.

The Government of Quebec has said that it is inappropriate and unacceptable to use preliminary statistics in order to base this call for repayment of equalization payments.

I want to ask the minister the following question: why force the poorest provinces of this country to repay equalization based on preliminary figures? Second, why not use some time this summer to convene a federal-provincial conference on the equalization formula to try to adjust the formula which would help the poorest provinces in this country? Why not do that to help the poorer provinces?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to note that today the premier of Saskatchewan has been a little more attentive in his statement and said that what we are offering him is a fairly generous pay-back schedule.

That being said, these transfer payments are established by legislation. We are asking for money back but we are also giving hundreds of millions of dollars to the provinces, not because it is the whim of the Minister of Finance but because these are established programs that have an in-law regulation and it varies with population.

• (1130)

As for the legitimate concern raised by the hon. member, he said that they were based on preliminary estimates. We always do that but I can tell him without any hesitation that should these estimates vary and be made more precise in time, we will gladly make the adjustments.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, the minister and his colleague the minister of defence are anxious to spend billions of dollars on helicopters but will not spend a few dollars helping poor people in the poor provinces of this country. That is not good enough.

We have a debt crisis in this country. There is a debt crisis in Saskatchewan. Its debt has increased in the last 10 years from $3.5 billion to some $15 billion. In light of that emergency situation caused by Conservatives in this country, I want to ask the minister whether or not he will consider emergency assistance to Saskatchewan and to some of the other poorer provinces that need it now.

Why all the money for the minister of defence on helicopters and nothing to the poor provinces to help ordinary people?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the rhetoric of the hon. member sounds good but his numbers are wrong.

Let me tell him very briefly what we will be transferring to the provinces this year. On the Established Programs Financing, we will be transferring $21.358 billion. That is an increase of $1.3 million. On equalization to transfer money across the country as the needs arise, we will be spending $8.3 billion. On the Canada Assistance Plan it will be $8 billion. This is an over-all increase of $3.2 billion. We will be transferring to the provinces $37 billion this year. If this is not assistance to the provinces, I do not know what is.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question to the same minister.

In his first answer the minister said that the cuts are a result of legislation. Of course the minister is right. The cuts made by the Liberals in 1982 and the cuts made by the Conservative government in Established Programs Financing have hurt the poorer provinces of this country.

My province alone receives $280 million less in Established Programs Financing. Given that before this last cutback the province was already cutting funding to hospitals, to universities, to municipalities, to school-boards, what does he expect the provinces to do to provide services for their citizens?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I just indicated that the federal government was transferring $38 billion to the provinces. That is a vast amount of money. In many instances, the provinces can use these moneys pretty well the way they want.

This is a very generous proposal, a very generous system. Of course we would all like to go beyond this and give them even more money. But I would like the hon. member to tell me where we will get it. Will it be through higher taxes or borrowing more money?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister who asked where we would get the money. It is interesting in looking at the estimates that the cost overrun of the helicopters is $1.4 billion. At the same time, the government is retroactively clawing back close to $1 billion from six poor provinces: $293 million from Manitoba; $246 million from Quebec; $76 million from Nova Scotia.

Why is this government paying for the inefficient poor planning of the minister of defence causing a $1.4 billion overrun by taking the money away from the poorer provinces for their health and education systems which help the poor, the young and the sick?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, words, words. Yesterday when the Leader of the Opposition got up, I was very surprised that a former President of the Treasury Board was not able to understand the meaning of current dollars.

The press release where it was indicated that we were going to proceed with these helicopters was written in current dollars. It means that when tailoring them in over a period of 15 years changes which may occur in the markets must be taken into account. Looking at OECD with our own numbers we have factored that in.

The helicopters have not changed in price. It is just the factor and if there is no inflation there will be no increase. This is not a miscalculation. It is a good calculation. I suppose that is beyond the understanding of the Liberals.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the one thing we understand is that $5.8 billion is $5.8 billion too much for these helicopters. The President of the Treasury Board talks about understanding what is going on.

I want an explanation as to why the formula used by this government to justify these clawbacks does not meet the regular standards of Statistics Canada. It will not even publish the formula because it is beyond its margin of error. The same formula was rejected by the U.S. government in 1990 because the margin of error was too high. Yet this government persists in using that formula to take away close to $1 billion for poor provinces.

• (1135)

Considering that the government has already set up a $2.6 billion slush fund to use for election promises, is it not much better and much more moral to take the money and give it to the provinces for their health and education systems? Will the government change this deplorable policy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I suppose that the hon. member is referring to the $2.6 billion which is there in reserves and is in every budget. He says it is a slush fund because there is going to be an election. I will tell the hon. member that it is lower than the reserves we had last year.

The hon. member was asking questions a couple of days ago about the national AIDS strategy. We said that the minister will be coming forward and we will be funding it. We cannot fund it from thin air so we set aside reserves.

The member is aware, having been in this House longer than I have, that many times throughout the year there are supplementary estimates where additional spending is announced for programs that have not yet been designed. This is where the money goes. There are no secrets.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister speaking for the Minister of State (Youth).

Wednesday the minister announced that he would freeze the budgets of our Canada Student Employment Centres, just at a time when students desperately need their help.

Why is the minister, at a time when there are close to 500,000 young students looking for work and thousands of other students looking for jobs, freezing such a vital program?

The cost of one helicopter alone could put thousands of young people back to work.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to answer this question on behalf of the Minister of State (Youth).

The member will be very pleased to know with respect to the Challenge '93 job program we have set forth in the estimates that there is going to be an increase of some $5 million for that program for the summer of 1993. This is going to be very beneficial to young people in getting jobs.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I wish the minister were here because the minister knows he has frozen the vital program needed by students to help them get back to work.

This minister must be aware that in the past five months alone close to 100,000 young Canadians have been forced out of the work force.

What kind of government places a higher priority on helicopters than its unemployed youth? Will the minister make a commitment in this House today to revoke this outrageous freeze and increase the moneys spent on this very vital program for our young people?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am very proud of this government's achievements with respect to youth, whether it is the start-up program, the stay-in-school program, the SEED program of people starting their own jobs. The youth centres help young people begin their own jobs. It is a very important project in the area of metro Toronto where $178,000 has been put forth for young people in particular to start new jobs.

I am very, very honoured to be part of a government that has put so much emphasis on youth.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, yesterday in a question to the Minister of Finance I quoted from his economic statement which said: "Funding will be increased for the highly successful research assistance program which provides technology support and financial assistance to businesses". I asked him why the estimates showed no such increase.

Amid great hilarity, the minister of science said: "In the estimates there is an increase of over $14 million for science and technology". That was a deceptive non sequitur.

Today I ask the minister of science once more: why, instead of the promised increase was IRAP in fact cut by $1.333 million? This is the most successful technology program, the most successful job program the government has. Why the cuts instead of the promised increase?

• (1140)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I tell my hon. friend that we were both right yesterday. First of all, S and T funding is going to be up considerably over this year. Out of that we will back-fill the decrease of $1.3 million for IRAP. Therefore, we were both right.

He was right. He read the estimates which said that IRAP's estimates are down. That is right. But the over-all point is the S and T envelope is up and we are going to back-fill the difference for IRAP.

What he is interested in and what the House is interested in is government spending for S and T. That is up substantially.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, the estimates are conceived to deceive and this minister demonstrates it.

If there is a $14 million increase in the $5 billion science expenditure, will this minister table his numbers that yield that total? Will he tell this House why the promise was made by the minister, reiterated by the previous minister of science and technology, that IRAP will be the core, the real delivery mechanism for the government's technology diffusion policy? An increase was promised and it is not there. Why is it not there?

An hon. member: Watch your blood pressure, Howard.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, just because the member is endangering his blood pressure with his question does not make it a different question. The answer is the same.

The answer is that IRAP spending will be the same or up. This is a very important program. I agree with the hon. member. We are diffusing technology in unprecedented ways through this program. It is a core part of what we are trying to do under S and T and we will continue to do it in a major way.

TORONTO ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, reporter David Lewis Stein of the Toronto Star captured the feeling of metro residents when he wrote: "For four years the greater metro Toronto area has been sinking into a terrifying economic depression and Mulroney has refused to use the power of the federal government to help us".

While the Prime Minister has decided to leave, nowhere is his legacy of economic failure more real than in metro Toronto. Why has the government so consistently abandoned the metro Toronto economy and when will it show a change of heart?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I do not accept for a moment any accusation of abandoning metro Toronto. Indeed as I read the business publications in this country, all of which are out of Toronto, they seem to be suggesting a lot of the laws, regulations, tax rules and so on coming out of Queen's Park are having a very adverse effect on investment decisions and so on.

The fundamentals we have put in place and the opportunities presented by FTA and NAFTA are soon going to bring back restored vigour and growth. Toronto again will be leading this nation in growth. We may have to have a provincial election before that, but it will come.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister and the minister from St. Paul's said that they do not buy the economic malaise. I tell the minister that maybe she should visit the riding from time to time and the Prime Minister should visit Toronto and find out exactly what is going on in that city.

Last week at the metro economic summit the federal government through the minister of trade dumbfounded all participants with a speech devoid of any admission of failure and devoid of any meaningful solution.

When will the government finally recognize that by strengthening and making the metro Toronto economy more vibrant it will also be boosting a very fragile national economy? When will it act?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in his opening question, we were not challenging the fact that the Toronto economy at the moment is not as buoyant as it historically has been. We were challenging the accusation by the hon. member that it was a deliberate plan and policy of this government and there is no evidence for that.

Last week the Minister of Transport was there to announce expansion at Pearson airport and of course that follows on the terminal expansion announced a while ago.

However when he was talking about vacuous speeches in Toronto, I think he was referring to the one at the Empire Club a few days ago.

SENIORS' PROGRAMS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Seniors. In yesterday's estimates for the Department of National Health and Welfare the Seniors Independence Program has "made important and positive differences to seniors". Despite this, there is only $3.5 million in funding for this program.

How can the minister justify a 75 per cent cut in this important and positive program?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I really do not know where the hon. member got his information.

We met our commitments in the past five years, as we implemented our senior citizens initiative. I agree that New Horizons and the Seniors Independence Program are excellent programs which help retired seniors to remain independent and keep active.

The initiative is drawing to a close, being a five-year project. These issues are on the table, funding renewal is expected, and support for seniors and their initiatives will always be maintained.

I really do not understand your question and I object to giving seniors the impression that we deceived them.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Yesterday in a letter the Minister of State for Seniors indicated her government was committed to improving the quality of life for seniors.

Considering that the government can find $5.8 billion for Cadillac helicopters and not one red cent for seniors' health issues under the National Health Research and Development Program, how can the minister state that this government is committed to seniors?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I just said we have a five-year initiative that expires at the end of March 1993. I would therefore ask members opposite to be patient, since discussions are going on in Cabinet. At the appropriate time, we will announce certain investments and the renewal of certain initiatives, including the availability of funds for research on geriatic diseases.

As a government we have shown leadership in this area and our record compares well with what has been done internationally if we consider the social and economic measures we have introduced to protect the independence of senior citizens.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence on what must be becoming her favourite subject.

Yesterday's figures show that the $5.8 billion helicopters—that is $116 million per helicopter—make them the most expensive military helicopter in the world.

The minister persists in trying to defend these helicopters on their value as search and rescue helicopters. Was she aware when she approved the purchase of the helicopters that not a single other government in the world is going to use these helicopters for search and rescue purposes? Can she name a single government that is going to make that use of these helicopters?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, first of all it is important to point out that the hon. member is quite in error when he talks about the helicopters costing $100 million.

We are talking about a helicopter project, not simply the cost of the hardware. About half of that cost is for the helicopters themselves, a quarter of it is for logistic support and a quarter for contractors and government management costs and contingencies. In other words, the helicopters themselves cost about—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, it is not possible to have helicopters without having logistic support. In other words, it is a project and the figures have always been out front. They have been public. They were published in 1992 dollars and we have budgeted responsibly to make sure that there are no unforeseen overruns and that Canadians do not wind up facing the possibility of additional irresponsible financial policies by not having contingencies taken into account in the budget.

The hon. member is quite wrong in saying that these helicopters will not be used by others for search and rescue. He should also know that in our own province right now—and I say this because the hon. member is from British Columbia—we do not have the capacity to provide helicopter search and rescue north of the Dixon Entrance or Hecate Strait. These helicopters will, for the first time, provide adequate service. The Labrador helicopter cannot do it. You could spend a billion dollars on a Labrador and it will never be able to do it. These helicopters are going to save lives in our province.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, 80 per cent of the people in the minister's own province, the province from which we both come, have the wisdom to be against the purchase of these helicopters.

• (1150)

In yesterday's estimates the government conceded that the cuts in operational funding for the Canadian forces will lead to this state: "This will affect the ability of the Canadian forces to mount and sustain operations".

Why does the government persist in undermining Canadian peacekeeping and operational capacity and at the same time go on this huge spending spree for equipment that is no longer needed as a result of the end of the cold war? Why will the minister not accept the wisdom of the people of her own province and of a wide range of experts?

Why will the minister not consider the alternative which can fund helicopters at less than $1 billion?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, supposing for the sake of argument we cancelled this project.

We could upgrade the existing fleet of helicopters, Labradors and Sea Kings, for about $2.5 billion. That is the actual cost. It gives them an extra 10 years of life. Therefore we get an extra 10 years of life on 1950s technology. We do not get increased range because the additional technology will add increased weight to the helicopters.

As I say, you can spend all the money you want on a Labrador but you cannot upgrade it to take off in winds higher than 35 knots. Certainly where I come from there are a lot of winds higher than 35 knots.

After an additional 10 years of life, after you have spent $2.5 billion on the helicopters, you still have to replace them. You still have people flying in 50-year old aeroplanes.

That is why the House committee, of which he was a member, said unanimously in 1990 that the committee recommends that the Sea King helicopters be replaced as planned with the EH-101 and that this be done as soon as possible to avoid costly stop gap measures.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Defence. Lately the opposition parties have shown a great deal of concern about the helicopter contracts. Perhaps we should talk about those contracts. I would ask the minister to tell us about the costs involved and about the economic spin-offs for Canada's economy and especially for Quebec.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, the economic spin-offs for the Canadian economy will total $3.2 billion. This amount will be spread among Canada's regions. In Quebec, for instance, $975 million will be spent, especially in the hightech-sector, which is so important for Canada's future. This expenditure is an investment in the future of our industry in addition to providing services to Canadians.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. We know the helicopters will cost $3.2 billion in 1992-93 dollars. We also know that Marc Lalonde's Liberal project for scientific research tax credit was supposed to cost $200 million in 1983-84 dollars but ended up costing more than $4 billion in 1984. We also know that fraud was responsible for $1.9 billion of that amount.

Will the minister confirm to the House that today members of the Armed Forces are prepared to risk their lives to protect and rescue us, and to do so without the equipment they need for search and rescue missions in our Canadian provinces?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised another important point about the helicopters. The search and rescue capability of the new helicopters is so much greater than that of the helicopters we are using today.

The weather conditions under which our helicopters must operate are very demanding: ice, wind and storms. The new helicopters are able to carry out more difficult manoeuvres. Furthermore, they will be able to operate under those conditions. And last but not least, they will protect the lives of fellow Canadians.

LANGUAGE PROGRAMS

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. As you well know, the Government of the Northwest Territories runs one of the most comprehensive and progressive programs and services in the aboriginal languages in all of this country.

The proposed 10 per cent funding cuts will have an immediate, negative impact on both aboriginal language programs and the provision of French language services in the Northwest Territories. Without their language, aboriginal people are without a culture and identity.

I want to ask the minister why the government speaks out to the international community in support of the year of indigenous people and here in Canada does everything in its power to diminish their cultural and linguistic rights and existence?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, the minister is very aware and shares the concerns of the hon. member. I know that any cuts that have to be implemented will be done in a fair and equitable way.

One of the realities is that we are in very difficult times and we have all had to undergo the same kind of restraints.

What does she expect us to do? Raise taxes or go deeper in debt? We are fully aware of the importance of doing what the hon. member wants. I am sure that the Secretary of State who is away today on government business will be doing all she can to be helpful in her area of responsibility.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State. The fact is that taxes have been raised 36 times and the debt is no smaller, so I think that rests with the government.

Any unilateral reduction of the French language budget contradicts the terms outlined in the Canada-NWT co-operation agreement for French and aboriginal languages. Full implementation of services and programs cannot be carried out with 90 per cent of the funding agreed to.

I ask the minister not to renege on the federal responsibility to assist the NWT in implementing the law of Canada's two official languages policy.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, the minister understands her responsibility very well and will certainly do all she can, as I said, within her area of responsibility to make sure that she can do what the hon. member wants.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Can the minister explain to this House why there is $5.8 billion available for the purchase of Cadillac military helicopters while at the same time there is a $30 million cut for minority language education, $2 million being cut from literacy and much more that affects Canadians?

Why is this government's priority helicopters as opposed to people?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, the grants, contributions and subsidies of all departments have been reduced by 10 per cent. We have been particularly careful in making sure that this will be carried out in a fair and equitable fashion. We are very mindful of the need to continue to develop partnerships.

I know the hon. member has a specific interest in literacy, a program which has brought credit to all of us over the last five years. Under the very exceptional leadership of the National Literacy Secretariat we have seen growing partnerships from coast to coast, individuals, communities and associations that have participated in finding new sources of funding, making people far more aware of the debilitation of being illiterate. I know that we will continue to be able to reach out and have that kind of process in place.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister. An amount of $5.8 billion has been budgeted to buy helicopters. You had the choice but you chose helicopters rather than linguistic minorities, our illiterate, our elderly and native people. What are this government's priorities?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, as I said, our priorities have always been to develop partnerships. Throughout the country we have found people who want to participate. Next Monday I will participate with Peter Gzowski, who is himself trying to raise millions of dollars for literacy. The ABC Canada program is another example of business men and women who have been fully involved in helping us in this partnership.

• (1200)

The hon. member asks what we want. We want to help people in need of assistance. It is always the same taxpayers, whatever their taxation level, who do not want to pay more tax because their taxation level is already high enough and too much is already being spent. We will have to tighten our belts one way or another.

GUATEMALA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whose department and ambassador have magnificently helped many hundreds of Guatemalan refugees to return from Mexico to Guatemala.

However, as the minister knows, an international delegation, including Karen Ridd of the United Church of Canada, is now visiting displaced civilian communities in the jungle of northern Guatemala that the Guatemalan army now is harassing and threatening at a rising rate according to today's information.

Can the minister tell the House what action Canada is taking to persuade President Serrano of Guatemala to ensure the safety of both these displaced Guatemalans and also the international visitors, and can she tell us whether the Canadian delegation at the United Nations is pressing for item 12 and a rapporteur on Guatemala?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He has longstandingly been a member who is very sensitive to issues in Guatemala. I should tell him that our embassy has been instructed to determine just at what stage these attacks are.

We have not actually had confirmation of the attacks but of the preparation for attacks. The embassy will continue, as it has in the past, to do what it can to guard human rights in Guatemala. I do not feel I have the full facts at my disposal yet.

I appreciate the hon. member's interest and will get back to him outside the House if I have anything to add.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, further to the estimates presented by the President of Treasury Board yesterday, the government says that it is taking back some $230 million dollars in transfer payments from Quebec on the basis of population projections.

I ask the President of Treasury Board if he would agree to set up a federal–provincial committee with Quebec to study the data, which does not seem to correspond to those that Quebec has.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that we are in constant touch with all the provinces to discuss problems that can arise with transfer payments.

As for the population projection or census to which he refers, I said unequivocally that the census requires us to spend several hundred million dollars and we are doing so.

If we realize that some figures are inaccurate as we work with them and refine them we will correct them, so the provinces do not need to worry.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the minister's response to my question she quoted a report to the House of Commons from the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and she seemed to be reading from the report. It seemed to indicate that the committee not only recommended that the Sea King helicopters be replaced but that they be replaced by the EH–101 helicopter.

As the minister would concede, I hope, the report says no such thing. The recommendation reads in its entirety: "The committee recommends the Sea King helicopters be replaced as planned and that this be done as soon as possible to avoid costly stop–gap measures".

I am sure the minister would also concede that the conditions have dramatically changed since this report was tabled in the House.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would concede no such thing because in reading the report it is very clear that the plan was by this time, which was November 1990, to replace the helicopters with the EH–101s. In fact a discussion about concerns that might arise in delay of delivery of the Canadian–built EH–101s says: "Delays in the delivery of Canadian–built EH–101s may make it necessary to keep the Sea Kings in operation for longer than expected". Then the committee goes on to make the recommendation "as planned refers to replacing them with EH–101s". I am sorry that I cannot concede to the hon. member's point.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING OF REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1). These are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

POINT OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I wonder if the government House leader could indicate the status of possible negotiations with regard to the special committee which will hopefully be struck for the purpose of studying the North American free trade agreement?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we have not yet been able to reach an agreement on that but we are still endeavouring to do so.

Obviously it will not be possible for the committee to meet next week but the government is anxious to have it up and running as soon as possible.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, on the same issue. As the minister knows, I and the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca wrote him a letter stating a number of things that we would like the committee to do, including travelling across Canada, going to the United States and the Maquiladora to see the conditions of the workers and the communities in that area.

We also requested that the committee hearings be televised. I wonder if he has any response to any of these requests at this time.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, no, I do not have a direct response to that request but certainly we are most anxious the committee be in a position to offer Canadians an opportunity to appear and hear the debate.

We know there are thousands and thousands of companies anxious to appear and show how important this will be to their growth and job generating prospects.

I am a little reluctant to agree at this point that the committee should also go on a world tour. Certainly the final suggestion of the hon. member that the government not act on NAFTA until after an election is rejected.

PEACEKEEPING MEDAL ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–412, an act respecting the establishment and award of a Canadian volunteer service medal for United Nations' peacekeeping.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the concurrence of the House in the motion. I am very pleased to introduce this bill which will establish a Canadian volunteer service medal for United Nations' peacekeeping.

As it happens, there is no Canadian medal for those who have served on peacekeeping missions from Canada. The United Nations has established a service medal but we have failed to do so to date. This bill will fill that gap.

Over 100,000 Canadians not only within the military but in civilian life as well, including the RCMP, have served on such missions. Over 80 have given their lives in the course of these missions. I hope this bill will have the full support of all sides in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Brewin moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to table a petition which was found to be in order.

The petitioners would like to remind the House that it adopted a motion unanimously on November 24, 1989 which read as follows:

> This House expresses concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petitioners, after stating their reasons for this petition, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the action necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan with the implementation of this commitment.

• (1215)

MENINGOCOCCAL DISEASE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of Labrador West and some on the island of Newfoundland. This is in addition to the petitions that we presented some weeks ago. It has been signed by a total of 25,000 people all across the country.

The petition was circulated by Mrs. Wanda Quigley of Wabush, Labrador, who had a son die from meningitis some time ago. In view of the ravages caused by the meningococcal disease in the lives of children of Canada and that there is a test kit that will detect all types of meningitis at their early stages, Mrs. Quigley and a lot of other people across the country are calling upon the government to make sure the test kit is put on the market as soon as possible so that other children in Canada will not have to suffer the fate of her son.

VIOLENCE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have a duly certified petition to present. It originates from the New Westminster Presbyterian Church in my riding and is directed to the House of Commons.

The incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptable. Too often the abuser is a close friend, partner or spouse. The present social climate is such that many women feel intimidated or afraid to report incidents of assault or abuse. The present social climate is that when many women report incidents of assault or abuse they are victimized instead of helped. Aboriginal, visible minority, immigrant, disabled, lesbian and poor women face additional overwhelming barriers in reporting violence of abuse and receiving help. Women in the family law systems across the country are trying to protect their children and are suffering from maternal custodial victimization.

Therefore the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children, encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse, provide assistance and support for women and relief and support for women as mothers and children, emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation, concentrate special effort on the training of police lawyers, court workers and judges, and focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is more like a speech than the presentation of a petition. The hon. member for Abitibi.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Dubuisson, Rivière-Héva, Senneterre and Val-d'Or, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and make our communities a safer place to live.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions that have been certified correct as to form and content, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

[English]

The first petition is signed by 42 residents of Toronto, 14 of whom live in my riding.

They pray and call upon Parliament to adopt legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children and to encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse and other such matters.

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the second petition is signed by 71 residents of Toronto, 5 of whom live in my riding.

The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by several hundreds of residents of the constituency of Comox—Alberni in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was raped and then murdered in that community just a short time ago.

Noting that the present system of justice fails to protect children of our communities who are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault, they call upon Parliament to change the law in such a way as to lengthen jail sentences, to permit police to take DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and to keep DNA imprints of paedophiles and sexual offenders on a national police database.

The petitioners have a number of other suggestions that would assist in making children in our society safer from the possibility of sexual assault.

• (1220)

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I have a second petition, Madam Speaker, from thousands of teachers around the province of British Columbia. They note that teachers pay out a great deal of money from their own pockets to improve their own professional skills for the benefit of their students and that they purchase academic materials and supplies which are also for the benefit of the children they teach.

They also note that the Income Tax Act allows self-employed professionals to deduct operating expenses and materials but that teachers do not have the same deductions. The teachers are therefore asking the Minister of National Revenue to take action accordingly to change the Income Tax Act to allow teachers to deduct the cost of professional expenses and materials purchased in the course of their employment.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that was sent to me by Cathy Grasty of Coquitlam in my riding. It is also in memory of Dawn Shaw.

The petitioners say that the present justice system fails to protect the children of our communities who are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault. They outline a number of suggestions and urge Parliament in memory of Dawn Shaw to enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to assure conviction of offenders.

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by many of my constituents who are concerned about the refugee status of many people who are in Canada, in particular those from Third World countries.

These petitioners are calling on the House to urge the government to take all necessary action to ensure that compassion is exercised when dealing with those refugee cases.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from residents of my riding of York West to present. They essentially wish to bring to the attention of the House the advantages of the existing compulsory drug licensing system by which generic drugs allow Canadians an adequate, accessible and fair price for prescription drugs.

They are asking this government to repeal recent legislation unfortunately passed in this House that would do away with that compulsory drug licensing system and therefore increase the cost of prescription drugs to Canadians.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I too wish to present a petition that points out that the Income Tax Act allows self-employed professionals and business people to deduct operating expenses for improvement in the businesses.

Rhonda Lantz, a registered nurse, asks the Government of Canada to permit the deduction for income tax purposes of all professional development courses and peripheral costs such as child care, transportation, food and accommodation for registered nurses. Also professional development courses under $100 should be cumulative for income tax deduction purposes.

PENSIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians from Simcoe, Ontario, Edmonton, Alberta, Nelson and Procter, British Columbia, and other places across Canada.

They wish to draw to the attention of the House that hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line, that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible, and that the federal government has the primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of our Canadian senior citizens.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present before Parliament signed petitions from many of my own constituents and others around the city of Toronto.

They are calling upon Parliament to realize that the incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptably high. They are asking Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and especially make an effort in the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 425 and 456.

[Text]

Question No. 425—Mr. Karpoff:

Regarding the 25th anniversary of the TimberMart Corporation on October 3, 1992, was the Minister of Finance present at that celebration at the Four Seasons Hotel in Vancouver, B.C. and if so, (a) was public funding used for any part of the event and if so, (i) for what items (ii) what was the cost (b) did the minister arrive in Vancouver by commercial aircraft or on a government Challenger or by other aircraft (c) who paid for the flight to and from Vancouver?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The minister did attend the celebration since he was in Vancouver on other official business. In so far as Finance Canada is concerned:

a) i) No

ii) Nil

b) Commercial aircraft

c) Finance Canada

Question No. 456—Mr. Heap:

Since the formalization of Canada's refugee determination procedures, Immigration Act 1976, and the establishment of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, prior to its dissolution on December 31, 1988 did the RSAC ever review cases on the basis of belonging to a particular social group and if so, (a) how many people were granted refugee status based on belonging to a particular social group (b) how many people were granted refugee status based on being women as the particular social group and what were the countries of origin of these refugees?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Between 1979 and 1988, 8,374 persons were determined in Canada, on the recommendation of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, to be convention refugees. That represented an acceptance rate that varied from 20 to 39 per cent, considerably lower than the current acceptance rate of the Immigration and Refugee Board. The statistical data gathered during that time does not identify the rationale for these determinations. Therefore, it is not possible to advise the honourable member of the numbers accepted on the basis of membership in a particular social group nor the additional details that he seeks without retrieving each individual case file. Further, most of these case files are no longer retained by Employment and Immigration Canada.

Mr. Langlois: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-99 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 21 at page 3 and substituting the following:

"that did not arise more than one hundred and eighty days".

RECOMMENDATION
(Standing Order 76(3))

His excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in an amendment to Clause 3 of Bill C-99, "An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another Act in consequence thereof", whereby line 21 on page 3 is struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"that did not arise more than one hundred and eighty days".

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-99 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 1 at page 4 and substituting the following:

"(ii) at least fifty per cent of the gross revenues".

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I think you will find the amendments presently before the House have the support of all parties and actually reflect the excellent co-operation that has characterized the passage of Bill C-99 through the legislative process.

The amendments in group one are designed to improve upon the bill by increasing access to credit by Canada's small business sector. This first group includes two substantive and one technical amendment.

The substantive amendments increase the retroactivity of loans and increase the loan loss sharing ratio to 90 per cent. Both these amendments will have the effect of increasing the number of loans under the program and will increase the availability of working capital. Combined with forthcoming regulatory changes which will both restrict the taking of personal security by the banks and lending institutions and increase the maximum loan to 100 per cent of the value of the asset, these changes greatly enhance the availability of working capital. This initiative responds to the commitment made by the Minister of Finance in his recent economic statement.

On behalf of the government and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, who is unavoidably away from the House at this particular time on government business, I would particularly like to thank all members for their support of these very important amendments.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few short comments regarding the amendments to Bill C-99.

I agree with my colleague from York—Simcoe that this was an example of a piece of legislation where all parties co-operated and worked together for speedy passage.

I believe these amendments are in fact substantial. One problem for small business today is that Canadian banking institutions tend to be very rough on small business. This amendment that was put forward in committee increases the loan guarantee by the Crown from 85 to 90 per cent. It should give the banking institutions of Canada a lot of comfort when these bank loan officers make loans to small businesses, which is where our greatest hope for new job creation exists.

• (1230)

The other amendment was substantive and one that we on this side of the House totally support. It was something we were worried about in the bill, but the minister and the committee co-operated. It is an example of, when there is co-operation, how quickly things can move through this House.

In the first bill there was a retroactivity date of 90 days. The minister and the committee, capably chaired by my friend from York—Simcoe, increased that retroactivity period to six months. In layman's terms, that would mean a small business person that bought a capital asset during the last six month period. I say today because it will be passed in this House today. Retroactivity starts on Monday if we get Royal Assent from the Senate by Monday. The six-month period means that moneys put out on capital equipment can be refinanced and it then becomes a part of a small business loan. I applaud the government for accepting that amendment. I think it is really going to make a big difference to small business.

The last point that is so important to a small business person is the cap on the amount of the personal guarantee that is required. So often when a small business person tries to start or expand their business the banks want their life insurance policy, home, children or whatever else they may have. Banks have never been too shy in demanding all those personal guarantees.

I consider this third amendment a substantial one also. It limits the amount of personal security that a financial institution can demand. Therefore, we in the Liberal Party of Canada support all these amendments and we hope the bill can move to third reading quickly so it can become law.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in the absence of our member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, I am speaking on this bill this afternoon.

We support the thrust of the bill and the amendments, especially those that limit the ability of the banks to demand unreasonable security from small businesses.

While I have a chance to speak on the amendments I want to point out that the reason this bill and the amendments are necessary is that the banking community has been very reluctant to encourage small businesses. I, and I am sure many MPs in this House, could go through personal example after personal example where instead of being helped, small businesses felt they did not get the funding they should have got and when they got a loan from a bank they felt almost harassed by those same institutions. I heard an example of someone who was actually making his payments and the bank decided it wanted a larger payment and almost forced that person into bankruptcy as a result.

I have noticed that the government through one of these amendments is basically saying that it will not only provide 85 per cent insurance to the banks, but will provide 90 per cent insurance to the banks. So there is almost no risk to the banking institutions under this amendment. That is quite remarkable. We are asking the banks to do what they should be doing as a business and the Government of Canada has to almost completely insure those loans.

• (1235)

Why are we doing that? We are doing it because we want to help small business. We know that. It is really a culmination of the whole banking system. It almost leads us to question why we are using the banks at all for this particular process. Not to argue about nationalizing the banks, but if the Government of Canada is providing almost all, 90 per cent, of the security for any loans that go in arrears or if there is a problem, why do we have to use the banks?

Related to this is my understanding that through regulation the government is also upping the rate that is going to be charged to the lender. It is now going to be not 1.5 per cent above the prime rate but up to 1.75 per cent maximum.

This is a situation where interest rates have gone down for a number of years. Certainly they have been going down since this bill was introduced into the House of Commons. It seems again that the thrust of the government's actions, in this case under regulations, is to aid and abet the banking industry.

Again I have to wonder why we have to do so much work to ensure the banks do their work.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I would like to take just a moment. The hon. member's remarks deserve some sort of reply. He said that this alteration from an 85 per cent to 90 per cent guarantee has been done to help the banks. That is not so.

It is being done to make sure that the banks will vigorously promote. The banks in times past have not been vigorous supporters or promoters of this and so this is to make sure that they will promote.

They can still have a 10 per cent loss. That is really not a pay-off in my books. This is something we will be watching very closely. I personally want to make sure that the local banks in my home town are vigorously promoting small business loans.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 1. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Carried.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the House agree to apply this vote on Motions Nos. 2 and 3?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare Motions Nos. 2 and 3 carried.

Motions Nos. 2 and 3 agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will now put to the House Motion No. 4.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-99 be amended in clause 5 by striking out lines 24 to 27 on page 5.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, this amendment is very important. It is a consequential amendment as a result of the action of the committee members from all parties when we were discussing this.

This amendment has the effect of expanding further the eligibility of small businesses. Originally in the act it was a restriction limiting professionals, financial insurance and real estate businesses from taking part in this. By the actions of the committee in expanding the bill, it was necessary to amend clause 5.

This will ensure that there will be wider coverage, that there will be more benefits to more small businesses, businesses that contribute materially to economic activity. What I mean by that is that it is not a case for someone to purchase a piece of land to speculate or do something like that. It is those people who are actively engaged in a business that is going to expand, that can develop, promote expertise, promote effectively new jobs and purchase new equipment.

• (1240)

That is the kind of thing we wanted to make sure of, that every business would have access to these funds. I believe that these changes will dramatically change the way small businesses will have access to these funds.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few short comments on this motion.

My colleague from Thunder Bay, who is not here today because his sister passed away as a result of cancer, was very intent on making sure that this amendment was in the bill.

There are tens of thousands of businesses in rural Canada, small real estate firms, as the member for York—Simcoe mentioned, and life insurance businesses that sometimes are run out of the farmhouse or a small little office.

The way the bill was originally drafted, these people were not eligible. It discriminated against them. The original intention of having real estate firms and life insurance firms in there was to basically make sure that the large land developers and the large insurance companies could not use their techniques of shuffling paper around to get access to the loan. The minister and the members of the committee responded to this clause in a very constructive way.

The other point that will come through in the regulations was discussed in committee. It had to do with car dealerships. As members know, under the Small Businesses Loans Act a small business is defined as a business having sales of less than $5 million.

In a car business, it is the actual sale of the cars. You could maybe sell 20 or 30 cars and you would be over the actual amount of the sales of a small business. The regulations are being drafted to make sure that the portion of the transaction that is handled by a finance company is exclusive. It is not included in the gross sales of eligibility.

I believe that this amendment covers not only car dealerships which may fit the $5 million in sales but also the life insurance companies and the real estate firms. Once again I have to say that this was an example where the committee worked together. It worked quickly and it is going to make this a much better bill.

Now we just have to make sure that the 960,000 businesses that are eligible, those that have sales of $5 million or under, go out and test the banking system and make sure it reacts to it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, very shortly, we are also happy to see this amendment for reasons very similar to those of the last speaker.

We did not want to see this being a boondoggle for the land speculators, real estate speculators. I think this is a wise amendment in ensuring that those groups that need funding might be able to get it from the banks if the banks go out and advertise it. I hope it does not end up being a kind of loophole that is used by those who always seem to know whether it is a government program, whether there is a government tax dodge or something of this nature.

Hopefully the regulations that come out later will meet these concerns.

Motion No. 4 agreed to.

Mr. Weiner (for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, there have been consultations, and I think you will find there is unanimous consent for proceeding to third reading of Bill C-99.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, there is unanimous consent for third reading today.

[Translation]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that Bill C-99, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another act in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: Debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to begin by saying that I am actually just as excited as the government is today about getting this bill through the House.

I am excited about this bill going through the House today because this represents a tremendous opportunity for the 960,000 businesses in this country whose sales are less than $5 million. Many of them have tremendous difficulty in getting access to bank credit.

What has happened here today is that a law will momentarily be passed which will say to the financial institutions of this country that if small business people come into their bank and ask a loan officer for some credit to expand and grow their business or start a business and if that business plan which they present to the financial institution is right and makes sense then under this act the Government of Canada will guarantee 90 per cent of the loan. It will insure it to 90 per cent.

Businesses with sales of $5 million will have a loan limit of $250,000 at prime plus 1.75 maximum, and it could be less. When I say it could be less I would like to give a specific example of a banking institution that came to our all-day committee meeting on Tuesday. We worked into the night and heard witnesses from 9 a.m. right through. The Bank of Montreal was represented. One of the witnesses, Mr. Ronald G. Rogers, senior executive vice-president, personal and commercial banking, said: "The Bank of Montreal will do better than 1.75 per cent, in fact on loans for small businesses of $100,000 and under, it will be prime less 1 per cent".

If the prime is at 7 per cent—I realize that it is less than that today but let us just use that figure for discussion purposes. If a person has a small business and is only looking for $100,000 or less the Bank of Montreal will use the Small Businesses Loans Act, under which 90 per cent of that loan is guaranteed, and will only charge 6 per cent.

If this is used by the financial institutions of this country I really do believe it will get the economy of this country going again.

I have been standing in this House talking about small business and about getting capital for small business. I have asked questions in this House. I have participated in 50 different debates in this House during the last 3 years on behalf of small business. I have been pleading, practically begging this government to focus its energies on the small business sector because that is where the job creation potential is. That is where the greatest hope for new job creation lies in this country.

It is no secret to anyone in this House or anyone in this country that all the major corporations are downsizing, that they are laying off workers. My goodness, I think of a small city like Hamilton where Stelco and Dofasco laid off something like 1,200 people at a shot, or Oshawa where General Motors laid off thousands of people at a shot. Does the House know what that does to the hope and confidence of a community? We can go into a major mall, not just in Hamilton or Oshawa but anywhere in the country, after there has been a major layoff and almost feel the lack of confidence.

We can tell by the number of purchases in clothing stores, pet stores or, in my case, restaurants. On Danforth, Queen, Pape and Gerrard Streets in Toronto there are some of the nicest restaurants in all of Canada. Most of the time these restaurants have line-ups, but in the last eight to ten months it has changed. There are 300 restaurants in my riding. There are restaurants in my riding that represent over 40 different countries. There are a large number of Greek restaurants and a very large number of Vietnamese, Chinese, Italian and East Indian restaurants. They provide the largest number of restaurants, but there are restaurants from many different countries, many different cultures and many different communities. Collectively they employ 5,800 people; they are my Stelco, my Bombardier. In the last eight months people can walk into these restaurants and pick what seat they want because there are no line-ups any more. It is awful.

The confidence and the hope in our communities, no matter what part of the country, has been very low. We cannot get the hope or the confidence from the large corporations because they are all downsizing, they are all bureaucracies and they are all restructuring. Where do we get the jobs? We get the jobs from the entrepreneurship of this country.

I do not mean to be disrespectful but this is sort of like a deathbed conversion. The government is finally beginning to realize that small business is where the action is because there is no bureaucracy in small business. If a proprietor of a small business decides over a two or three-hour meeting that he or she wants to expand his factory or buy a new piece of machinery to be more competitive then he or she makes the decision in a couple of hours and goes forward.

• (1255)

Mr. Langlois: Call the bank manager.

Mr. Mills: The hon. member is so right. That person makes the decision about how he or she wants to move but then says: "Now we have to go meet our bank manager".

For the last two years the financial institutions of this country have been so rocked and shocked by the collapse of Campeau, the Reichmanns, Edper, and the list goes on and on and on.

What have they done during that period? They have put out the word: no more lines of credit. Cut those lines back. No more new loans. It has been small business which has received the brunt of that abuse from the major financial institutions of this country.

Now with this piece of legislation when small business people decide on a way of expanding their business or starting another facet of their business they can go happily and proudly to their bank manager. They can say that the Government of Canada just passed a piece of legislation called Bill C-99 and that 90 per cent of the money the bank gives them is guaranteed by the Crown. It is guaranteed by the taxpayers of Canada. That should make one dramatic difference in the attitude of that bank manager.

A few weeks ago I spoke about the responsibility of banks in helping us reignite this economy. I mentioned in those remarks that banking institutions have to be the only business that I know of where the customers are afraid of the person they are doing business with.

In other words, Madam Speaker, if you and I went out to dinner in a restaurant—whenever you come to Toronto you are welcome and I will take you to one of the nicest restaurants in all of Canada—I will tell you what would happen if we went into that restaurant. You should come to my riding some time. Visit your daughter and come into my riding and I will take you out.

What would happen would be that the maitre d'—is that the first time a Speaker has ever been asked out?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may answer the hon. member on that. If he does not blush neither will I.

Mr. Mills: Okay.

Madam Speaker, if you went into that restaurant on the Danforth the maitre d' or the person looking after the tables would wait on you hand and foot. That would happen in any business, such as a clothing or furniture store.

If someone goes into a bank the bank manager says: "We are doing you the favour". With this bill we can flip it around because if someone does not get service with the first loan officer that they meet, if they do not feel comfortable or if they do not feel they are being respected then they can walk across the street to another financial institution.

• (1300)

I received this advice to pass on to the small business sector from the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association. Helen Sinclair, the president, came to my riding a few weeks ago to speak to a conference "Women in Business". We appreciated her candor. She said: "If you walk into a bank and if you don't feel that the chemistry is right, if you don't feel you are getting good service from the person operating the bank, walk out. Walk across the street".

We have 50-odd financial institutions in this country and there are over 7,000 branches. We have a great banking structure in this country. The problem has been that the loan officers—not all of them, there are lots of great loan officers—act in a condescending way toward their customers.

I know that there are other members of Parliament that hear this as many times as I do. It does not matter whether we are Conservative or NDP or Liberal, we are all hearing the same complaints when it comes to financial institutions.

With Bill C-99, the small business person in this country can go to their financial institution and say: "I want some help and I would like you to get your Small Businesses Loans Act forms in place since I believe that my business plan qualifies me, because Mr. or Mrs. Bank Manager, 90 per cent of the loan you are going to give me is guaranteed by the Government of Canada".

I think this will make a dramatic difference. There are 960,000-odd businesses in this country whose sales are $5 million or less. Just think if each one of those businesses hired one person, we would move that unemployment insurance-welfare liability, which combined today is close to $30 billion including interest payments, down to about $8 billion to $10 billion. Overnight we would have productive people, people with their dignity back, people paying taxes again. Just think what that would do to the deficit and ultimately the debt of this country.

I have had some frustration with this piece of legislation. In fact, the Canadian Bankers' Association mentioned the same frustration. In 1986 it brought to the attention of the government amendments that were needed to the Small Businesses Loans Act in order to make it work. 1987, 1988 and 1989 passed and finally in December 1992 the Minister of Finance put it in his budget papers and it is through the House 60 days later.

I think the government missed a tremendous opportunity by not doing three years ago what it is doing today. However, we are going to focus on the positive today. The bottom line is that this act is in place.

I want to mention two concerns. Even though the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Credit Union Central, the Bank of Montreal and Fédération des caisses d'économie Desjardins du Québec came to committee and said that they liked this bill, they were going to support this bill and they were going to market this bill, I must say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government that I am nervous about that commitment. I want the government to be nervous about it as well because there is no time. I have said in this House at least half a dozen times that if this legislation is really going to work, if it is really going to do the job we all would like it to do, to pump some hope, some energy and some employment back into the system, we cannot rely solely on the marketing of the banks.

• (1305)

I appeal to the government, and I have taken this up with the Minister of Finance and the minister responsible for small business and I am going to repeat myself on this until it happens, to drive this act, not from the banks to small business, but from small business to the banks. The way to drive it is not by a few of us standing in this House today on third reading. I will definitely put it in my householder and I will promote this bill to all the 2,100 small businesses in my community. However, not all the small businesses in my community or I dare say in every other member's community read our householders.

We have to use the same principle on this bill that the government used on the "we can do it" competitive package. What is the package of the minister of trade called? The prosperity initiative.

An hon. member: That was a big hoax.

Mr. Mills: My good friend Jim Ramsay, using all his old marketing skills, spent millions of dollars on television advertising and sending papers to all households in Canada saying: "We can do it". If the government can spend millions on saying "we can do it", I beg it to use a little bit of the taxpayers' money to help the small business community of this country, not the ones that are already in business. You cannot just go to the Federal Business Development Bank and put it in their profits magazine. With the downsizing of large corporations in this country, there are literally tens of thousands of people right now thinking about starting a new business. We have to get this message into their hands.

I mentioned that there was a women in business conference in my riding three weeks ago. It was just a four and a half hour event. I expected 40 or 50 women to show up to hear how to start a home-based business, how to approach the bank manager and how to do a business plan. We had mentors, women in business who had succeeded, speaking to these women. The shock of the day was that not 40 or 50 women showed up but over 400 showed up.

Today the most credit-worthy customers of financial institutions are women in business. Did you know that? I was shocked, not that I do not think women are capable of running a business but that the banking institutions had such a favourable attitude. They prefer women customers, in business especially. They have a much better track record.

I appeal to members opposite to promote this bill. Take out some eighth page or quarter page advertisements and communicate to the people of Canada that this instrument is available.

• (1310)

If we have to spend $400,000 or $500,000 to let all the small business people, those thinking of getting into business, and those who are in business, know in order to get this bill moving—and I say this with respect to taxpayers who pay this—I think it is the cheapest and best money we could ever spend. If in the next 30 days 100,000 people knew of this bill, went to a bank and each hired one more person, just think what that would do to the employment numbers. As those employment numbers come down, just think of the ripple effect that will have on this economy.

Because the spirit right now is locked in such a state of depression and no confidence, I think anything less than a major approach with this bill is not going to work and we are going to miss a great, great moment.

I am happy today about this piece of legislation. I support this government initiative. I support all the amendments we brought through. One of the real flaws in this bill was the fact that in the past it never had a provision for working capital. Under this legislation any capital purchases that have been made on April 1 or prior, going back six months, can be refinanced under this Small Businesses Loans Act, which would mean that money would go back into their working capital. That is a pretty good instrument.

I conclude my remarks by saying two things to the government: it has one shot at getting some credibility back between now and the end of June, and the only hope it has for getting any credibility is with the small business sector. It has an instrument called the Small Businesses Loans Act. The only way it is going to work is if the government takes some advertising dollars and promotes it. I would also appeal to the government that in 90 days we review what happens with this bill and make sure in 90 days that we ask for a report from all 58 financial institutions in Canada on the number of small business loans each one has approved and how many people they will put back to work in the next 90 days.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is an honour for me to stand and speak today to Bill C-99. I would like to take this opportunity to compliment the member for Broadview—Greenwood who has just given an excellent speech. He talked about many aspects of this bill and certainly was a major contributor at the committee level. I do want to have that on record because I think it is important.

An hon. member: He might get pumped up if you continue.

Mr. Cole: We might even get him to move over.

This bill, as has been previously mentioned, was put in place to improve the access of small business to financing and really help increase that working capital, increase the availability of that working capital to small businesses, the entrepreneurs.

That is something to recognize. I believe when you talk to small businesses they want to get going. They feel they are being held back. They feel there are restrictions on their entrepreneurial spirit, on their financial capabilities and on their drive to make things happen. Most of these people have the kind of initiative that it takes, but sometimes they do not have the financial wherewithal to make that happen.

• (1315)

This bill presents a great many opportunities for small business. I think this is a very positive bill and a very positive step.

Someone mentioned earlier the excitement and the really good feeling a piece of legislation like this gives and certainly I concur with that. This is a real opportunity for businesses.

I think about the people back in my riding of York—Simcoe. I think about the Chamber of Commerce in Newmarket, East Gwillimbury, Bradford and the Georgina Board of Trade. In my riding alone there are over 7,000 small businesses that will now be eligible to take part in this program, a program that we could not even find an application for six months ago.

The program was sitting around but we could not get it. It was stuck in the bottom drawer, probably glued upside down to make sure that the loan officer, when he or she went in to get it, could not find the thing so it was not available and whatever happened after that happened.

Many of us in this House have heard those kinds of stories from businesses that have tried in their own way to help the economy. They have said continuously to us: give us some help, give us something. We do not want you to throw money at us. We do not want you to spend more money, especially when we know you do not have any, especially when we are in a deficit position, but just make sure that we have access to money. Put the boots to the banks and the lending institutions and force them to co-operate.

I believe this bill will do that. With the changes we have brought in, I think there will be improved access for these small businesses.

Mention is often made in this place about the importance of small business. I believe the number is rapidly approaching a million small businesses in this country. We want them to be successful because it is going to take them being successful to pay the bills. It is also going to take them being successful to hire more people because the big companies are not hiring people. However, the little companies have the ability to do something like this. What a wonderful opportunity.

Small business is really and truly the engine of this country. It can get things going, create jobs and do some very positive things for the economy and just for the general feeling and attitude of Canadians, whether they are in business or whether they are employees the fact that there is an opportunity there, that there just be a change of attitude by everyone involved with it.

I want to talk a little bit about some of the particulars in the bill. I know we get excited because we have been involved with it. The one other group it is important to recognize is the number of people who may be sitting at home today who do not have a job. Perhaps they received a golden handshake. Maybe they have a few bucks tucked away in their jeans and they are thinking: "Gee, I have always wanted to be in that kind of a business or I have always wanted to set up my business this way. I can manufacture whosits or I want to manufacture something else". This presents a real opportunity.

Think of the dreams of those people who quite often and very recently have had their dreams shattered because of the economy of the world and because of everything that has gone on internationally. Here is an opportunity for these people to take some of their assets, but not all of them, not to lock them up to buy that one piece of machinery to make a dream business start but to have the government back them to the tune of 90 per cent, putting in some of their own capital, again depending on whether the financial institutions are even going to insist on that.

One of the things that was very interesting was that we talked about limiting the personal commitment on these loans. It is in the regulations that the limit is going to be 25 per cent personal commitment as far as the financial contribution is concerned. There are obviously other things that are important like a game plan, the way the business is run, the structure and everything else, including competitiveness and ability to sell product.

• (1320)

We are not asking entrepreneurs to mortgage their houses to the limit, to mortgage their futures to the limit, to sell their car, to do everything else in order to get this one piece of equipment that will allow them to start the business.

We are telling Canadian entrepreneurs that if they have a plan of action, if they can produce a product, if they can convince the institution that this is a good idea, the Government of Canada is going to back this loan to the tune of 90 per cent.

That is going to leave this new entrepreneur, the man, the woman and even the young person today who has these ideas thinking they just do not have enough to buy the equipment and still have some money left over for working capital. Anybody going into business knows they need to have working capital. This plan is going to allow that to happen. I am really excited about this because this is a group of people we have not even tapped. We have not even thought about them. That is an area that certainly has to be addressed.

I look at some of the changes that are a little more technical but they are basic to the whole program. Changing the loan limit from $100,000 to $250,000 is a major step forward for businesses, as is increasing the size of the eligible businesses up to $5 million. We can all recognize that businesses are still small businesses and can still be doing $4 million worth of business in their gross sales. It is very important to recognize that. I think it is something that the business community can recognize and understand. Obviously the banks will recognize that.

The other thing that is important, and it was mentioned a little earlier, is it is terrible putting the limit of the rate to 1.75 per cent over prime. It is too bad that hon. member was not in committee because if he had heard the banking institutions it might be different. That is not the critical factor. It is not the rate.

We want to make sure that this entrepreneur can make this a success. We want to make sure that he or she has a product or the ability to do that.

That is not the key factor. It is important because the banks are owned by Canadians. They are not owned by some person sitting on Bay Street or sitting maybe in the Speaker's chair today. He does not own a bank. They are owned by Canadians. He probably has a lot of shares in a lot of banks, but he wants to see those banks successful.

We as Canadians want to see banks successful. If the banks are not successful we are going to have major problems throughout this country.

It is very important to recognize that we want the banks to be successful but not at the expense of small business and everybody else. That is the key point.

It was very interesting in committee to hear different bankers saying they really liked this program and that it was going to be interesting. All of a sudden there was one particular banker saying: "I think we can do a lot better than 1.75 per cent for most of our customers". There was another banker who said: "I can even do better than prime for a lot of our customers under this program".

There are a number of people who have to realize there is going to be major competition among the banks. It is not going to be a closed shop. It was mentioned earlier about the fear and trepidation of an individual going into a bank. We wonder what will happen when we walk into the bank.

Now small business people will have the ammunition. The facts will be available to them. They will be able to walk into the bank and tell them they have a plan. "I am going to be successful. I want to do something. I want to be an entrepreneur". We all have good days and bad days. Maybe the loans officer of one particular institution says he does not think someone is a very good risk and does not want to get involved. However that business person is now going to be able to walk across the street and maybe get a rate of 1.75 per cent, maybe 1.5 per cent, but that entrepreneur is not going to stop there. He or she is going to go to another lending institution and say: "Look, I am getting a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Program of x dollars because I have this program and I am going to go ahead with this. Can you beat that rate?"

• (1325)

We will see major competition among the lending institutions because they are going to want to take part in this. They really want to take part in this. This is a good program. It is a win-win situation, if you like to look at it in that regard among the lending institutions and the business communities of the country. If they both win, the country is going to win. People in Canada are going to do much better as a result of all of this.

Earlier we talked about some of the changes the committee had recommended and the minister has responded by changing the six-month retroactivity. We can all think of businesses that are struggling right now. Perhaps they bought some capital equipment maybe two or three months ago. As long as it is within that six-months prior to April 1 when this comes into effect they are going to be able to use it. That is a major change. Before it was 90 days. It was going to be too tight. The committee members recognized that and the minister responded by making this change. I think this is a major plus.

There is also protection for the government. We are saying to business, we are saying to the banks that it is a two-way street. We are going to make sure that a cost recovery fee is put in there to make sure that the people of Canada are not on the hook for all of this. That is an important aspect to keep in mind.

We have had some discussions concerning the eligibility of some businesses in Canada. As I said when talking to some of the officials, and I think they understood where I was coming from, in my riding there are about 7,000 businesses. I would bet that under the proposed legislation 20 per cent of them would not have been eligible. It was suggested that the bill could be fixed up and they could be made eligible in the regulations.

That is fine but you and I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are not too many Canadians and fewer businesses that have ever read the regulations of any act, let alone proposed regulations in this bill and understand, particularly after the bill has said they are not eligible.

I am very pleased that we were able to make these changes and the officials were able to understand where we were coming from. Now all these businesses will be eligible. A business that is active, that is manufacturing, maybe it is in the insurance business, maybe it is in the automotive business, and maybe it is in the real estate business, because those are very active businesses in my view.

We are not suggesting for a moment that a person could go out and purchase a piece of land under this program and hope it is going to go up in value. That is not an active business. That is not what we are suggesting. That individual has other ways of raising funds and it is certainly not to be going through the Small Businesses Loans Program. It is very critical that we recognize that.

It was mentioned earlier that there needs to be a commitment by the Government of Canada to promote this program. I agree. I could not agree more. I am not an expert in advertising and promotion but I know that by word of mouth, by communicating with chambers of commerce, boards of trade, we will get the message out.

I think quite frankly it is necessary for the Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism to work it into his budget, to advertise and promote this to businesses, but also to those individuals who might be thinking about starting a business. Those are just as critical if we look at this process.

• (1330)

I mentioned that to the minister earlier this morning before he unavoidably had to leave Ottawa. He agreed with me. He said that he will do everything in his power to promote this particular program. I believe that is the right way to go. I believe that if we can do this, if we can market it, many people will benefit directly and many more will benefit indirectly.

I think I have covered most of the bill. It is an important piece of legislation. I could probably go on for a lot longer, but it is Friday afternoon.

I do want to take the time to particularly thank the members of the committee, the witnesses who were very informative, very constructive and helped us quite a bit in making the changes and particularly to the staff of the minister's office who were able to accommodate the concerns we had by making the amendments and changes.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise on this bill. It is not often that the New Democratic Party supports a piece of government legislation. I must admit in the last eight years of this particular government it has been very seldom that we have actually supported a piece of its legislation.

I agree with a lot of the statements made by the two previous speakers. We really need to make sure that small businesses and those that are in small business know about this opportunity.

We do not want to see one of those fancy government ad programs where it is patting itself on the back saying: "We have done a wonderful job. Rah, rah for us". We want an informational campaign. It is hoped that whatever campaign is proposed by the minister ends up as an information campaign as opposed to one of those that might be considered a pre-election campaign, especially at this time.

I am very concerned there is no monitoring system to make sure that the banks are actually allowing their customers to use this program. We have heard many good words, many good intentions in this place and in the committees of the House of Commons. Quite often circumstances change, new opportunities develop and perhaps banks or other lending institutions, to be fair, may have other priorities.

We recognize that the government has gone quite far in insuring the risk for the banks. That should be enough to encourage them to promote small business in this country. However, I do have to disagree with one of the other statements made by the previous Conservative speaker. I do not believe that increasing the rate from 1.5 above prime, which was the government's original intention, to 1.75 per cent above prime is any indication of the banks' competitive spirit. It looks more like greed to me.

We heard the hon. member indicate that the banks say: "We can offer less than prime with this bill". If that is the case, why is the government amending the purpose of its own legislation through regulation? If it believes what the banks said in front of the committee that 1.5 per cent is probably not even necessary, that the banks will be offering loans to small businesses at a much lesser amount, then why is the government increasing the maximum?

I also do not believe it is the individuals with personal loans or small businesses in this country that have threatened the financial situation of our banks. Our banks had record profits after taxes year after year after year. It is only their own bad loans to very large institutions that have caused their financial plight as of late.

• (1335)

I think the previous speaker from the government side may have left a wrong impression. The problem is certainly not created by small businesses and individual borrowers. Most Canadians will pay back their loans. One problem that most small businesses have is getting the money in the first place. They have not been defaulters in great numbers, although I do recognize that with bankruptcies and all the rest of it there certainly have been some problems in that area.

This is a good measure which is supported by the three parties in the House today. The others are not here today, so I do not know what they think. We have said that we support the legislation. We hope it works. We hope the government monitors the situation. We hope the government advertises appropriately in this area and we hope it can report back to this House that there has been great success in this area.

When I was the regional and economic development critic for our caucus, it would upset me when I got the figures from DREE, the old Department of Regional Economic Expansion. When I looked at where the money from the government was going, it was going to large corporations. We asked: "How much are you getting when you give a large corporation $100,000 or $1 million?" The government would admit in the figures produced for me year after year that investment made by the government in small businesses was producing more employment. To be fair to the government, the Liberals were in power at that time. Using the government's own figures it was very difficult to understand why small and medium-sized businesses were not getting a larger share of government support through loans, grants or whatever.

It seemed that the government of the day and its officials, many of whom are still here in top positions, had blinders on which made them say: "We have to have the megaprojects. We have to go to the big schemes. We have to give a lot of money out". Maybe it was for political purposes, I do not know. But there was no focus on developing small business.

In an earlier intervention today I said that we have all had people come to our constituency offices. Some of these individuals are in business or want to be in business. They are finding it very difficult to get loans and support from the banks.

This legislation is a challenge to our banking institutions. They obtained the amendments they wanted. They are getting the improvements, the higher profit that they wanted through regulations. They said they would go out and sell this program. It is the job of the House of Commons and especially the government to make sure that happens.

While I have the opportunity to speak about small businesses, I will be very brief because I know there are others who want to speak and I understand that there is an assurance that this legislation will pass this House by three o'clock today, so I am not going to abuse this opportunity.

During the last trip I made to my riding I talked to small business owners. I would say that the great majority of those people, by nature, are not supporters of the New Democratic Party, although a few have made donations to my campaign in the past. I was still facing a great outcry against the goods and services tax. We have had hard economic times in this country. I heard from tourist operators, small machine operators and people in retail business who said that the GST was killing their businesses. Those are their words, not mine.

It is time that the government stopped listening to the large concerns. We know that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has always promoted the goods and services tax. We can understand why a number of the large corporations in this country, especially in some sectors, were very favourable to the goods and services tax.

• (1340)

However, from day one small businesses knew that the goods and services tax was going to hurt their businesses. They knew from day one it would be harder to attract tourists. They knew from day one it would encourage people to cross our borders and shop in other countries. They knew from day one it would add to their administrative costs. They knew from day one it would make attracting Canadian customers into their institutions that much more difficult.

Now some would say that Canadians have to shop somewhere and most will shop at home and therefore most small businesses will not suffer. The reality is they are telling me that they are suffering. They are telling me it is time to get rid of this tax.

Since the government has done one good measure today, a measure we support, I can assure you that if it moved to get rid of the goods and services tax we would support it yet again.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise and speak on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

As my colleague pointed out earlier it is one of those unique opportunities when we on the this side of the House have an opportunity to agree with and support legislation that this government has brought forward. This is certainly the case with respect to this particular piece of legislation. So I stand and give my enthusiastic support to see this legislation go through.

We have to recognize that our small business community is really the life–blood of our social communities throughout Canada. Small businesses are the major engines of growth in our economy. Eighty to ninety per cent of all new jobs created over the last decade have been created by our small business sector.

Over the past 10 years Canada's large corporations, many of them branch plants of U.S. companies, have fared very poorly in terms of job creation. The figures indicate they have not provided one iota of new jobs over the last 10 years. New jobs in Canada over this 10–year period have been created largely from our small business entrepreneurial sector.

Had it not been for our small business communities from Victoria to St. John's and their ability to create jobs and their ability to attempt to continue the stimulation of the economy, the job loss we have experienced as a result of the restructuring that has taken place with the free trade agreement would have been even greater than it has been. Much of the credit has to go to our small business communities in their demonstrated resilience and their ongoing ability to maintain job creation.

I am thinking back to a previous piece of legislation that passed through this House with the implementing legislation to allow the government investment in the Hibernia oil fields. I was quite upset at the time. I pointed out that the government had decided to spend millions of dollars to basically subsidize yet another energy megaproject.

I come from the province of British Columbia. A few years back in the old Bill Bennett administration hundreds of millions of dollars in taxpayers' money was spent in trying to develop the infrastructure for the export of north-east coal. That was another energy megaproject.

I said at the time with respect to north-east coal and also with respect to Hibernia that the number of jobs that can be created from such investment is really very limited. One has to spend over $1 million of capital investment in projects such as Hibernia and north-east coal to generate one long-term job.

• (1345)

If we take that $1 million of capital investment and, rather than apply it to the megaprojects that past governments have been so willing to endorse, put it into the small business sector we find that 40 to 50 times the number of jobs will be created: long-term jobs, lasting jobs, jobs that provide cash flow in our communities and tax revenues for the government. We find that 40 to 50 times the number of jobs can be created for every $1 million of capital investment in the small business community than can be created with capital investment in our energy megaprojects and our large business sector.

That is real bang for the buck. Getting back to the current legislation before us, I was very pleased to see the government has at least attempted to recognize the necessity to provide assistance for our small business communities so they can get on with the job of serving the public interest and creating jobs.

We all know that the 4,000 to 5,000 job loss directly or indirectly attributed to the free trade agreement has been very damaging to Canada's economy, particularly in the central region, in Ontario and Quebec. We need as much assistance as we can from our small business community to overcome the long-term damage brought about by the implementation of the FTA.

The amendments in the legislation, the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act, provide a greater flexibility to encourage the Canadian banking system to assist the government in its task of creating economic incentives for small business development.

Our banks have been very reluctant. If we go into our communities and talk to people in the small business sector, we find out that they are extremely frustrated with their inability to obtain financial assistance either to start a company, to expand a company or to invest in a company for future growth opportunities. They are extremely frustrated with the hard-nosed, hard-headed, almost pigheaded attitude of established Canadian banks.

I am pleased the changes brought about by this legislation will hopefully encourage Canadian banking institutions to loosen the purse strings and provide the opportunity for small businesses to acquire the SEED capital needed to run their particular businesses.

I understand there has been a number of amendments made to the legislation. One amendment would increase the interest rate charge to about 1.7 per cent above prime and liability underwritten by the Crown would increase to 90 per cent from 85 per cent.

Those changes have been made to encourage Canada's banking system to be a little more forthcoming in providing the necessary loans for small businesses. I am very pleased to see them. The increase in the size of businesses eligible under this amended Small Businesses Loans Act will go from some $2 million to $5 million in annual gross revenues.

I understand as well that loan limit will more than double from $100,000 to $250,000. These changes are positive ones. They are changes that are necessary. They are changes that will allow more flexibility in helping our friends in the small business community to fulfil their obligations and their desires to contribute economically to the growth of our communities throughout Canada.

It is one of those unique opportunities when as a member of the opposition I have an opportunity to agree with this government and to support this government enthusiastically. Small business people throughout our larger cities and our smaller urban centres need and desire the assistance this amended legislation could provide.

If I could summarize, we have to look very carefully at focusing what assistance this government can provide. We have to recognize that in future years we will have to provide the financial incentives necessary to generate the maximum amount of job creation that we can.

That is not coming from our large corporate sectors. Canada has seen a veritable haemorrhage of jobs from large corporate entities across Canada, jobs that have left Canada, have gone to other areas such as the United States and even Mexico, and are not coming back. This kind of restructuring is permanent.

In order to combat economic haemorrhaging we need to provide the assistance our small business communities require now and will require in the future so that we can hopefully re-energize the economy and create the jobs that have been lost over the past few years.

I am pleased this legislation has come forth and I am pleased to support it.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in having an opportunity to put a few remarks on the record concerning this legislation on small business.

I want to take a different tack. Small business is a very broad term. We tend to think in terms of small manufacturing organizations, retail outlets or service opportunities. One area of small business involves the fishers who participate in the Pacific fishing industry off the coast of British Columbia. These individuals view themselves as small business entrepreneurs. They are generally individuals who own a fishing vessel, who go out in pursuit of economic activity and who generally participate in the ebb and flow with the prevailing nature of the resource, the economy and the management plans of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

The impact of the combination of the chartered banks and the Government of Canada on fishers or that small business sector on the coast of British Columbia is interesting. I want to talk about what the government has done to fishers in the Pacific fishing industry.

First, just over 20 years ago along came a fellow named Jack Davis, a Liberal minister of fisheries, who decided the way to resolve the problem of overfishing on the west coast was to put in place a licence limitation program. I guess we can say that was the first government impact without any response to consultation. In this small business area many people actually advocated against the activity. The government forged ahead and imposed on these small business people a regime that was extremely harmful, contrary to the recommendations made by people in the industry and wise observers. This was the wrong approach. There was no consultation.

This licence limitation program created an enormous increase in fishing capacity. People went out, especially some companies involved in the fishing industry, and pulled every wreck off the beach in British Columbia and threw a fishing licence on it. They understood clearly how Jack Davis and the Liberal government had instantly created a source of enormous wealth. They pulled those wrecks off the beach, put licences on them and created an enormous increase in capacity. Some individuals became very creative in further increasing the capacity when they pyramided those licences and turned—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt but the hon. member for York—Simcoe has a point of order.

• (1355)

Mr. Cole: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is well-intentioned and is making some very valid points about the fisheries and fishing conditions on the west coast. I certainly appreciate his concern, but today we are debating Bill C-99 and his comments are totally irrelevant to the bill. I would ask that the member speak to the bill on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Knowing the member for North Island—Powell River, I am sure he will become relevant.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, one of the major problems is that the Conservatives do not in fact see the relevancy. There are thousands and thousands of people who view themselves in that industry as entrepreneurs dependent on the actions of government and the chartered banks which in combination have caused them harm over the years. If they listen they will begin to understand the correlation between the two items today. I thank the hon. member for presenting his point of view.

To continue the key point, people were able to pyramid these limited licences from gill-netters and trollers and create seiners. By pyramiding they created tremendous increases in overcapacity, further increases in overcapacity. The capacity to catch fish increased well beyond what the resource could ever tolerate.

The department responded correctly with its only weapon and reduced the fishing opportunity. The reduction in fishing opportunity set off a whole new range of capital expenditures. It forced these entrepreneurs, these small fishermen or fishers, to head to the banks under what the government had created, the fisheries improvement loan.

We should notice the small business protection procedures that are in place. In the beginning it was well-intentioned. It was to provide a source of guaranteed funds that the government would guarantee to the banks, if the fishers did not deliver on their payment program and they were able to increase the overcapitalization of those vessels.

In response, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans again reduced the fishing opportunity time. There was more and more limited time to fish in the face of the most efficient catching machine in the world in any industry, this enormous efficient capacity encouraged and fuelled by the management program, encouraged and fuelled by the licence limitation program, encouraged by the banks and a government that provided guaranteed loans.

All of a sudden it crashed. The resource in down-cycled years was not there. The fishing opportunity became even tighter. At the same time interest rates began to rise dramatically. People could not catch enough fish to make the payments on their boats. Then the cycle began of the banks seizing their vessels and people being driven out of the industry with a vengeance. There are all kinds of cases where the banks simply said: "We want to get rid of this loan. We do not care. It does not matter. We are worried about other aspects of the economy. We are going to yank your fish-boat anyway and put you out of business in order to get it off our books".

To give some credit to the Liberal government there was a policy that once the guaranteed loan had been dealt with, with the banks, that was it. They were not interested in taking their homes. They were not going after people who had co-signed the loans. They said: "Enough is enough. We have driven you out of the industry and that is it".

At one point there was a suggestion of putting a couple of hundred million dollars into a buy-back program to relieve these entrepreneurs, these fishermen; to get the capacity out of the industry so it simply did not move away from the bankrupt individual into the hands of another fisher who could be a dentist in Toronto, the way the government set it up; and simply to keep the capacity in the industry. They thought they would just let it bankrupt its way out. They did not go after the homes or the family members who co-signed.

Then we come to the 1980s. The Liberal government decides it has a fiasco and it hires Peter Pearse who says that the way to deal with it is to turn around and manage the fishing industry like they did the forest industry in British Columbia, to turn the whole thing over to 10 big companies, to increase the ability of a small number of people to catch fish and when they deliver the fish to charge a royalty, to get rid of people within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans who are no longer needed to police a small fleet, and to make the fishers pay for the landing and the landing inspection facilities. There is no need for enforcement.

Then we have the situation where these business people have been absolutely shafted by the banks and by the downturn in the economy, the increase in interest rates, the increase in fuel prices, and have been driven out. Along comes Pearse and says: "Let's drive them out even further". So we get a situation in which Pearse wants to model the fishing industry the same way as the B.C. forest industry so that there are a small number of extremely large fishing operators and the marginal ones are gotten rid of.

• (1400)

At that point in time that comes along. In come the Conservatives in 1984 and they say: "Oh, oh. We see quite a big pile of money that we would like to go back and recoup". They reversed the policy. The policy now was to go after those people who they guaranteed loans to the banks for. They hired a chartered accountant firm to go back and figure out how much money there was and how to put this in place. They then told the chartered banks: "You signed a clause in these agreements years ago to go back and shaft these people. We want you to go after the co-signers. We want you to go after their homes, their cars, and their assets, and clean them out even further".

That is exactly what they have done. They have revisited these people who have gone through a horrible period of time. They had rebuilt their lives after this catastrophic event which was a combination of government policy, banking, and a misguided approach to things.

All of a sudden these people are visited again, and it is going on today. They are yanking away homes and forcing extreme payments out of people. It has to change. There is a group called the Fishing Redress Committee headed by an individual named Jack Larson on the coast of British Columbia who lost his vessel and virtually lost everything. He is representative of a large number of people to whom this government owes the removal of this harassment a decade later. It went back after assets that they had because of an obscure clause in this thing. It is really a vengeance that has been visited on these people and it should be removed.

The second issue is the whole question of the advisability of the Pearse program. It is continuing. Its objective is to create a small group of bigger and bigger businesses in the fishing industry. It is driving small businesses out. We have a situation in which the government from day one—when the Speaker was the minister of fisheries I remember him campaigning in the riding I represent and saying: "We don't accept Pearse's program. This is the wrong way to go".

Yet this government for nine years has followed it as if it were the Bible. It has wreaked tremendous hardship against people in the fishing industry and the coastal communities of British Columbia. This is a small business sector of entrepreneurs who have been shafted by the banks and this government's policy, and it is continuing.

We now find that the government has involved itself in another policy, the aboriginal fishing strategy. It is interesting. Small business people are involved in this. I know the member has sat in front of a three-day committee and listened to their concerns but there is no response to the concerns.

The minister stood up and said: "Well, what is the NDP point of view on this particular sector that involves fishers?" It is that the Supreme Court has laid down the aboriginal right to fish. You can fish by chaos or you can fish by an agreement. We support an agreement for these individuals in the aboriginal community and the agreement with—

Mr. Belsher: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened with great interest to the hon. member and he has taken us all over creation with regard to the fisheries in B.C.

I do not understand the relevancy he brings to this bill at this time by talking about the current situation of the fishing industry in British Columbia. Would he please come to the point and speak to the bill that is in front of us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is the second time the hon. member has been interrupted as far as debate is concerned. I wish the hon. member would deal with the small business part of the fishing industry.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East does have trouble comprehending this issue. Short of sitting down and drawing him a picture I am doing the best that I can.

This is another government program that is really causing enormous hardship to that industry. The aboriginal fishery strategy is going to create allocations for aboriginal people. It is going to create opportunities for management in recognition of the years that there was a need for greater participation.

• (1405)

However, at the same time there needs to be protection and conservation of that resource, there needs to be decent and fair consultations with all stakeholders in the industry and there needs to be a fair buy-back program on the order of a couple of hundred million dollars, not a paltry $7 million, so that these people in the business of fishing who want to voluntarily leave the industry can hope to sell their boats. They were put in this situation by poor government policy and the banks.

We do not take objection to the need for responding to the aspirations of aboriginal people to fish and to have fair agreements but we do take profound exception to the failure to observe the basic requirements of conservation, consultation and compensation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to be able to speak on Bill C-109 and reply to the Minister of Communications who delivered the speech on behalf of the Minister of Justice.

For the most part this bill includes some very good stipulations. I look upon this bill as really being in two parts. The bill deals with the police use of electronic surveillance methods and introduces protection of radio-based communications and cellular phone calls.

First, we are dealing with the electronic surveillance methods of the police, and second, we are dealing with the protection of radio-based communications.

With respect to the police use of electronic surveillance methods, there really is not much of a problem. There really is a need to make some changes in this regard to allow the police to be able to do their work. Some of the problems I have are in the area of radio-based communications.

However, it is our hope in the Liberal Party that the bill will get second reading so that it can go to a legislative committee. Then we can have the witnesses and the expertise before the committee that we need to really answer some of our concerns, and certainly some of the concerns that I have.

I would first like to deal with the first aspect of the bill concerning electronic surveillance methods. This part was formulated in response to three Supreme Court decisions in 1990, the Wong case, the Duarte case and the Garifoli case, and the Wise decision in 1992. The Minister of Communications outlined these cases yesterday in his speech so I will not go into the details.

As a result of these decisions the police found that they were severely restricted in their use of electronic surveillance and have been urging government since that time to update legislation in such a way as to once again permit the use of traditional surveillance.

Bill C-109 does this in four main ways. First, it allows the police to use electronic surveillance where there is a potentially dangerous situation.

Second, it allows judges to authorize such surveillance with the consent of one of the parties involved in the surveillance.

• (1410)

Third, it allows judges to issue similar authorization in other circumstances where it is clear the request for authorization meets the tests prescribed in the charter.

Fourth, it streamlines the procedure in the Criminal Code for introducing evidence obtained by electronic surveillance.

Reinstatements, police and undercover agents use these electronic lifelines. Conversations are recorded and used from these lifelines only if the surveillance is for the protection of bodily harm.

There are limits that are placed upon the evidentiary use of such material. For instance, it cannot be used to prosecute other crimes. That is fairly straightforward and it makes a lot of sense.

I think the police are supportive of this legislation. They have been pressing for changes. They believe that electronic surveillance is vital for fighting organized crime and drug rings in particular, and there is a good deal of justification in what they are saying.

As well, authorized public agents and others who assist these police and undercover agents, for instance landlords who permit entry to a residence, would be afforded protection from civil and criminal liability. This is meant to prevent litigation chill from deterring law enforcement.

Judges can also authorize use of video surveillance and tracking devices in circumstances where audio surveillance would be permitted. One could say that with these recommendations in this part of the bill better use will be made of the judge's time with respect to issuing authorization warrants and evidentiary rules. This is in response to what the Supreme Court called the "procedural quagmire" with respect to the above.

The definition of private communication is changed in two ways. Either the originator or the receiver would have to be in Canada and scrambled radio communications would also be covered.

I would like to state a couple of things that the minister said yesterday in his speech which I think are important. He said that the primary purpose of these amendments is to permit the use of technology by police forces in the performance of their duties, but only in a way that does not contravene the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That is very significant. I can support what the police want to achieve if I feel that the charter is being respected.

I do not think anyone in this country wants to frustrate the police in their duties. Goodness knows, they are having a difficult time as it is. We have to ensure that while we are giving the police the means to be able to do this we are not interfering with the rights of the Canadian public. I do not think we are. If we are I do not think we have to. We can counteract that. I want to repeat, that is my concern.

The minister feels that the amendments would have the effect of simplifying the rules of admissibility of evidence. They would also increase the effectiveness of both the police and the Crown prosecutors in accordance with the recommendations of the Supreme Court. We are talking about the resources police officers need to perform their duties satisfactorily. I do not think anyone could quarrel with that.

We need good testimony to reinforce that. I want everyone to know that we in the Liberal Party support the police in this area. I think it is very important that we work toward that.

• (1415)

I would like at this point to move on to what I consider the second part of the bill, about which I do have some concerns. This part would create an offence of intercepting maliciously or for gain communications over cellular phones. The maximum penalty would be five years. It would also be an indictable offence to wilfully disclose the existence or contents of intercepted cellular phone calls without the consent of one of the parties to the call. A maximum sentence would be two years.

Under this bill it would also be an offence to divulge or make use of cellular phone calls, faxes and computer signals carried on certain frequency radio waves. It would be a summary offence with a maximum fine of $25,000 or one year for individuals and $75,000 for corporations.

Victims of divulged communications could sue the divulgers for unlimited damage. I think you can see where this is going. It is going into sort of a grey area, an area of concern. It is not that the idea of what the government may want to achieve is not laudatory, it is just very confusing and somewhat misled.

The bill tries to give radio communications similar protection as is now given to other private communications as required by recent technological advancements. These amendments recognize that radio waves can be used for more than voice transmission. They would eliminate the loophole in cases where intercepted communication is not a voice transmission.

There have been criticisms already of this part of the bill and I think with some justification. The Canadian Association of Journalists strongly opposes this because it believes the bill severely hinders freedom of expression. This particularly refers to sections which cover cellular phone conversations. They believe the government is trying to protect business interests of cellular phone companies that pay the government millions of dollars in licensing fees. I think that is an aspect which is worth considering.

These cellular phone companies are very prosperous and would have the money to lobby hard for such legislation. As people become more aware that conversations on cellular phones are happening via public radio waves, these companies may lose business.

It is to their advantage to protect the privacy of their customers. In that, the government is taking the ball and running in the direction pointed to by these companies. Politicians and governments are major users of cell telephones. You could say that perhaps it is a self-interest, that government and politicians simply want their indiscretions to remain confidential. I think that would be a little simplistic.

The media will suffer from a bad case of "libel chill" if such legislation is passed. I think that is of concern to them and I can see why it would be. They would be sued if they used information gleaned from conversations which took place over cellular phones.

The Canadian Association of Journalists argues that cellular phones are not regular phones and should not be viewed as such. They are simply sophisticated CB radios. As the Minister of Communications said, the cellular phone is not a cellular phone at all, it is a radio. Every conversation is a radio broadcast transmitted on radio waves. Every conversation unless specially treated can be monitored by anyone with a scanning device.

• (1420)

He said this last December and essentially he reiterated in his speech yesterday. What happened between then and now? What happened when he made this statement? One can only speculate as to the arguments, to the considerations and so on that is now making him a champion of the privacy rights of the cellular phone users.

In the United States, if I may look to that country for a moment, the situation has been handled somewhat differently. In the United States scanners are illegal. In Canada there are far fewer scanners than there are cellular phones and cordless phones, which by the way are also susceptible to interception.

The Minister of Communications has decided that it is easier to stifle freedom of expression than to ban radio scanners, perhaps because the owners of radio scanners are individuals who do not wield the clout of large cellular phone corporations.

As I have stated, the Liberal Party will support this bill on second reading because we want the information and the dialogue that the legislative committee can give. We want it very much to have good competent witnesses to give this the closer examination that we feel this bill needs.

For my part, my criticism of the bill centres around the sections dealing with cellular phones. The bulk of the legislation does address electronic surveillance. Police have been asking for such legislation. The latter is important and must be dealt with in light of the recent Supreme Court rulings.

The whole bill warrants close scrutiny. With respect to the cellular phones and the cordless phones, we have to examine this a little more at this time to bring forward more of the potential problems that can arise.

This bill will also allow victims to obtain injunctions and sue for unlimited damage in the civil courts. The bill not only prohibits disclosure of the contents of the cellular phone conversations to anyone under any circumstances, it also bans disclosure of the existence of those conversations even though it is perfectly legal to monitor unscrambled radio-based conversations.

While we can monitor radio-based conversations, the Minister of Communications is saying that cellular phones and cordless phones are in fact radio receivers. We are saying an orange is not an orange, an orange is an apple here. I have a little problem with that and I do not know how that is going to be projected legally in the courts.

I also feel that Bill C-109 would certainly protect the commercial interests of cellular phone companies that pay government millions of dollars every year for their licensing fees. I am also concerned that they are going to be shielded from the consequences of the indiscretions they commit on the airwaves and the lack of work that needs to be done if the right course of direction were taken.

• (1425)

We also have to look at a bench-mark here, and that is what we are trying to achieve with the restrictions on cellular phone conversations. First, we have to ask is this the right direction to take? Second, are we not asking a question here that the price is going to be far too high for what we want to achieve? I am concerned that we are doing just that, that we are really infringing on the rights of Canadians for the wrong reasons if there ever are right reasons for something like this.

It is very important to understand that there are one million cellular phone subscribers in Canada as well as several million cordless phones. They can be very easily monitored.

The Minister of Communications says it is unreasonable to ban the scanners. The Americans were able to do it. I do not agree with everything that the Americans do but I just do not see the unreasonableness of banning scanners.

We are saying you cannot listen in on cellular phone conversations, use the information that you hear in those conversations, transpose it or relay it to somebody else who can use the information but we should not ban the scanners.

I do not agree. Please do not get me wrong. I do not condone eavesdropping, I do not condone the infringement of privacy. I do not condone the malicious utilization of private information for public or private gain, but I do think we have to move in the right direction. If we do not, then we are not correcting the problem, we are misleading the public. I think that would be a very sad thing to do and certainly something I do not think the government is intending.

Once again I would like to look at what the minister said. As reported at page 16492 of Hansard:

> The second amendment included in Bill C–109 is close to my own heart and deals with the issue of cellular radios and personal privacy. Not long ago The Financial Post conducted an experiment listening to cellular conversations on an easily obtainable inexpensive scanner. In a brief period of time the Post intercepted calls made by stockbrokers, real estate agents, federal bureaucrats, police and others. The subjects varied from the mundane to the illegal, everything from what to serve for dinner to where to conduct a drug transaction.

He goes on to say in another situation:

> During one two–hour session The Edmonton Journal heard one caller give his credit number over cellular, one woman give her address to a date, several intimate conversations and numerous business telephone calls. Another caller mentioned by name a man recently diagnosed with terminal cancer. It is possible the Journal reporter knew about this before his next of kin.

Then he goes on to say that privacy is disappearing and Canadians are worried about it. There is no question that privacy is disappearing. I want to know whether the provisions regarding cellular phones are going to change that.

I do not know how many newspapers the minister has contacted about their listening in on cellular phone conversations. I do not know if there has been a program to determine this or what. I, frankly, do not appreciate the government cavalierly discussing this with newspapers as if this is some kind of survey. I think it is much more serious than that.

Whether you make it illegal or not, there is nothing in this section that is going to stop the abuse. Sure, you can say to someone that they cannot listen to another person's phone conversation, that they cannot benefit from it, that they cannot pass it on to somebody else, but how in heaven's name are you going to prove it? If something is picked up on a cellular phone conversation and used, chances are you are never going to know that it was picked up and, if you do know, you are never going to know by whom. Chances are that the person who picks it up is not going to tell everybody that they have done it. The ones who will be punished are the ones who somehow are known through their conversations with other people that this has happened.

The problem is that it is not addressing the abuse. There are many ways to get away from it. It will be done day after day after day. Those who do it, maybe for a reason much more bona fide than most, may be caught and charged.

What we want here, surely to heavens, is to give Canadians the sense that their privacy is not being invaded and that this abuse is going to be corrected. It is not going to be corrected by giving them the false sense of security that their cellular phone conversations are going to be secure because they are not going to be secure, not by a long shot.

Most people in Canada are not technically sophisticated on the operation of a cellular phone. They do not realize that every phone call they make can be picked up by scanners, of which there are 900,000 in Canada. A lot of people are just interested in what other people say.

The reason we got away from the party line was because we did not want people listening in on our conversations. You did not know if your neighbour was telling people what he or she heard, but you knew that he or she did hear your conversations. It was an invasion of privacy. This is going to be much worse than a party line because everybody is going to be your neighbour, everybody, and you are not going to know it. Moreover, with the party line you could at least hear clicking at the other end so that you knew somebody was on the line. I know how to do it, yes. I have been on a party line, I have got this down pat. The point is that you at least had a little tip–off. But here there is no tip–off.

People are being led to believe that this legislation is going to protect them. It is almost a legislative entrapment to put this forward in its present state. I think we are going to have to really examine this and make some changes.

I want to quote what the minister said: "We found that the majority of Canadians feel they have less privacy today than they had a decade ago. There is a sense that personal privacy is under greater pressure today than used to be the case". I could not agree more.

He also said: "Briefly, the principles are as follows: Recognition: privacy is a right, respect it; informed choice: users must be aware of privacy implications and services they are offered. The truth is the cellular phone is not a telephone at all. Every conversation is a radio broadcast transmitted into the air on radio waves and is very public indeed". He is reiterating what he said at first reading, that these are not telephones, they are radios and we are utilizing the radio airwaves which are open to everyone.

• (1435)

It is a radio but it is not a radio because the government says it is not a radio. It is like saying February in Ottawa is summer and it is not cold. You cannot just by legislation make reasonable designations that are going to be helpful to the Canadian public. I think we have to look at the reality and that is this is not going to work.

The minister also said: "I have asked my department to work on a media campaign which will help to transmit our message". I have a problem here in that the message that the government wants to transmit is not the correct message. It is going to say that you are not allowed to listen to a person's conversation and if you do, you can be charged both criminally and in civil court for unlimited damages. If you pass it along to somebody else you can be charged civilly for unlimited damages.

That is not the point. The real message here is that cellular phone conversations are not safe and nothing in this bill is going to make them safe. That is what Canadians need to know.

If it wants to pass on other messages, fine, that can be an ancillary message, a footnote or a matter of opinion, but that is all it can be, a matter of opinion. We are not acting in the best interests of the Canadian public by spending millions of dollars to tell Canadians about their rights on cellular phone conversations which are not effective.

The minister then went on to say: "This brings me to the third critical element of our strategy which is prosecution. There is nothing particularly damaging about listening to someone else's conversations. However, when a third party uses that information or passes it to another party, irreparable damage can take place. Canadians need to have legislative tools to defend themselves against invasions of their privacy. Give them these tools. The Minister of Justice and I are proposing complementary amendments to the Criminal Code and the Radiocommunications Act. First of all these amendments will deem all encrypted radio based communications to be private and protected by the full strength of the law. Second, the proposed changes to the Criminal Code will prohibit malicious and profit-motivated interception of any radio-based telephone communication. Anyone who deliberately intercepts communications with the intention of harm or any other motive of securing a financial advantage should be subject to prosecution".

It is not satisfactory to tell people that they are going to be prosecuted for something that is not going to secure their rights in the first place. It is awfully difficult to tell somebody they violated a law when everybody else who wants to do it, or 90 per cent or 80 per cent of those who want to do it, are getting away with it. Because they blabbed, because they could not stand that no one knew that they had committed the first perfect crime and had to tell people, they are charged.

We may get some transgressors but we are not dealing with the problem. We have to ban the scanners. We have to garble the message somehow. You have to at least be able to know when someone is intercepting your call and you have to tell people that this means that communication is not safe, at least not yet.

This is a very unsettling portion of the legislation with which I have some problems.

• (1440)

We will accept it on second reading because we want it to go to a legislative committee. It is not a good fact basis for law. I hope the government will consider this even before the committee meets and give consideration to making changes. If not then certainly our priority in committee will be scrutinizing this very carefully.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as justice critic for the New Democratic Party to speak on this bill.

My friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys is correct in that the bill is divided into two parts. The first part deals with matters of wiretap and so on and concerns police officers and a few others.

The second part deals with cellular phones and the like. It worries me a bit that this bill, which is such an important bill on such an important issue that affects so many Canadians, is coming at the end of a dying Parliament.

We have to get at it for some reasons. It is mainly because the courts and the police require it. The Supreme Court has directed us to make amendments and the police require them to make life safer for them. At the same time we should not go too quickly because there are some rather immense issues involved.

Let me deal with the second part just briefly, the matter of the cellular phones. My colleague from the Okanagan, who is our communications critic, will deal with this in more detail but I could not help thinking of an occurrence when I was listening to the hon. member from Cape Breton.

Brian Smith, the former Attorney General of British Columbia, got caught using the cellular phone to talk to his girlfriend of the day. She happened to be a journalist at the time. He would have liked this bill. I was thinking about the two civil servants in Quebec who were caught criticizing their boss, Robert Bourassa, the premier of Quebec over the Charlottetown accord. They would have liked the bill as well.

I told the hon. member that when I was on the gun control committee, a member of the public called me and said: "I want to give you a tape". I was sent the tape. It had on it the private conversation of a Liberal member, not the hon. member who is in the House, from the committee with his assistant. They were basically bad mouthing me in my position.

I found it shocking, quite frankly. It was not so much that he bad mouthed me. That is part of the game and I probably deserved it that day. What I found shocking was the fact that some unknown member of the public gave me this. I could get right into the private conversation of someone like that.

I did nothing with the tape. I got rid of it and forgot about it. I indirectly warned the member that he should be careful because what he says on a cellular phone can be picked up by others. That is what the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys was saying, that Canadians have to learn that these are radios. They are not really phones as we know them which are supposed to be private, even though they are wiretapped far too often.

I am particularly concerned about this. I read an article just a few minutes ago by Ms. Cristin Schmitz who is the Ottawa correspondent for The Lawyers Weekly and a member of the Canadian Association of Journalists. I am not sure which publication this comes from but I can let members see it. I think it is from The Hill Times. She says: "The Canadian Association of Journalists last week voted to oppose Bill C–109". She mentions this is a violation of freedom of expression. Here is the argument: "Bill C–109 will certainly protect the commercial interests of cellular phone companies who pay government millions of dollars every year for licensing fees", but will hurt people's freedom of expression, particularly the news media where there will be a chilling effect.

I quote: "We can anticipate future cases where reporters will receive highly newsworthy legally–intercepted information which they will only be able to print or broadcast if they are prepared to break the law".

• (1445)

The problem I see for the journalistic community, and I am one who has spoken loud and long for freedom of speech and freedom of expression, is that there have been a lot of abuses of intercepted cellular conversations.

In the Quebec case, that was in many ways an abuse. In the civil servants' case that was published, I think it was an abuse. Look at the conversations between Prince Charles and other people, Lady Di and other people and so on. There is a right to privacy. One of the problems that journalists are going to have to deal with is that they have in fact exploited for their own purposes, to sell newspapers and to make money or to broadcast and make money just like the cable companies make money. Have they gone over the line? Does freedom of expression run into people's violation of their rights to privacy? That is what we are going to have to look at in committee.

This is a serious matter and I anticipate some very lively debate. I hope that the Canadian Association of Journalists comes before the committee.

To summarize what the bill does in the second part, it is that the Criminal Code will be amended to enhance communications privacy over radio-based, that is cellular, telephones. In other words, it is going to treat the cellular phone like the regular telephone as a private communication. Second, it will prohibit the interception of radio-based telephone communications which are carried out maliciously or for gain. What is maliciously or for gain? They are pretty debatable words. They seem to be rather strange words to be put in legislation.

Third, it will prohibit the disclosure or other use of information obtained for the interception of communications between any remote unit primarily used for radio-based telephone communications and a base station. I gather that is the cordless phones and so on. It is indeed a problem. It is something that we will have to deal with.

I would like to deal now in some detail with the first part of the bill, which is the more difficult part. It seems less understandable to the average person. The second part is easier. It talks about cellular phones and people are instinctively interested because they know what is at stake.

This other one is important too. Let me try to put it in layman's language. Part one is responding to some court decisions. For example, the police hid a video camera to record illegal gambling in a hotel room. The court ruled that radio surveillance by agents of the state, that is by the police, without a judge's warrant or authorization violates section 8 of the Charter of Rights. The courts said that the police just could not do that. They needed to get a warrant in order to do it.

The bill permits electronic surveillance by the police where police and others are in potentially dangerous situations. It provides judges with the authority to authorize electronic surveillance where there is the consent of one of the participants and in other cases for serious crimes. It gives the power of the judiciary to issue a warrant in other circumstances where it is clearly indicated the request meets the test of the charter.

It changes the Criminal Code in a manner that streamlines and rationalize procedures necessary to admit in court evidence obtained from electronic surveillance. The bill deals with some of these cases.

Here is another case where the court instructed us to act. The police followed a man suspected of multiple murders. For several months, with the aid of an electronic tracking device hidden in his car, the police said that they used the device to gather evidence. They could hear what was going on in the car, and tried to prevent another killing. That is very important because there is a serial killer on the loose. You have a suspect, you put an electronic bug in the car and you might be able in that way to stop another killing.

• (1450)

The courts said yes, you could do that, but you had to get a judge's authorization. If you did not, that is an unreasonable search. While the courts want to allow the police to use the video camera, the electronic bugging and so on, they want to make sure that the police just do not do these things every time or any time they feel like it or with anybody they feel like. They want some control. That is why the police have to get a judge's authorization. They have to show to the judge reasonable and probable grounds why they should be allowed to do that. That in our society is the right balance; to balance someone's right to not be unreasonably searched, not to be spied upon, to have privacy, versus the right of the state and the police to catch crooks, to do what they are supposed to do, to enforce the law.

That is the balance we are looking for and that is why I believe we have to pass these provisions of the bill. I want to hear in committee from the Canadian Bar Association, defence lawyers and people who have day-to-day experience in courts and in the streets with electronic bugging and with wire-tap evidence. I think we need that information before this House can fully agree to this bill. That is why today, or whenever we have the vote on second reading, my party will let the bill go through on division to the committee where we will consider it clause by clause and we will consider these issues.

There is one other thing I want to mention. I do not have to refer to the individual cases, the Duarte case, the Wong case, the Garifoli case and so on. The hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys did that. I want to put the rather unusual position, which was put very well in an article in the Globe and Mail on November 17, 1992, by Peter Moon who was writing about this issue.

He said: "Ottawa wrestles with changes to electronic surveillance law, amendments made necessary by recent court rulings". He pointed this out: "While the court has barred police and other agents of the state from using the techniques (the electronic surveillance and so on) there is apparently little to stop private investigators, journalists or anyone else, even criminals, from using them. These techniques include secretly recording a conversation where one person involved in the conversation gives permission, clandestine use of video cameras and installation of tracking devices to follow and locate vehicles".

He quotes a policeman as saying: "This is a curious world. We are really frustrated because people who are not police, ordinary people, can use these devices now whereas the police cannot". It seems to me there is something wrong with the law and that is why we have to address it. Either they all can use it, or better still as should be properly put into law, the devices can be used by certain people under certain standards to make sure that it is not abused. That is what the law attempts to do.

I want to flag a couple of matters in the provisions. The electronic surveillance amendments boil down to the following: one, they allow police and others in potentially dangerous situations to have their conversations secretly monitored. Who are the others? What are the potentially dangerous situations? What does that mean? How dangerous does it have to be? What is the nature of the potential? It raises a lot of questions which I hope we can address in committee. Two, allow judges to grant authority based on reasonable grounds for police and others to intercept communications with the consent of a participant in a conversation in order to gather evidence or information relevant to criminal activity. I should ask the hon. member for Regina West this. He and I are familiar with electronic devices used at leadership conventions. I thought maybe you would have him speak on this but I will not mention that. Perhaps the Tory leadership candidates should think twice before they are asked to put a microphone in their pocket. I will stay away from that. That gets a little naughty and self-incriminating.

• (1455)

An hon. member: You can be a witness.

Mr. Waddell: Yes, you can call me as a witness before the committee.

Again, what are others as defined here? What kind of consent needs to be given and what are the reasonable grounds? Is it like regular wire-tap evidence or is it different?

Three, allow judges and justices of the peace to grant authority for police and others to use video and other surveillance technology such as electronic tracking devices. Again, some similar questions arise.

What is surveillance technology? We might want to hear in the committee about the future of surveillance technology. If we are going to give the police this power, how much power will there be? Does it mean a police car can park outside your house and with new devices hear every conversation inside? We have to balance this.

I am not saying the police do not need some of this and I do not want the House to get me wrong. When I think of the new gang activity in my city of Vancouver and other big cities I think of the drug matters. I want the policeman who is going under cover to be protected, to have a lifeline back to his colleagues, the other policemen. We want to make sure that happens. We want to try and get a balance and we want it defined properly in this bill otherwise some smart lawyer will come to court and get it thrown out again.

The next one is to allow judges the authority to issue warrants and orders to engage in activities or obtain information or co-operation which would otherwise constitute an unreasonable search and seizure. Again, we get to the problem of some of the definitions. What is an unreasonable search and seizure?

Finally, to streamline the process applicable to evidence gathered through electronic surveillance. Streamline is a big word. Does streamline mean that you lose some of the procedures that you must have so you can get a judge, a judicial officer or justice of the peace to properly examine why they want a warrant? You do not want to make it impossible for the police to get a warrant. On the other hand, you do not want to set up a system that is easily abused.

It is not easy. We have had a lot of experience with wire-tapping, some good, some bad. I would like to hear from some of the lawyers and the police who have been involved in that.

We do not intend to delay this. I know there are other members who want to say something on this. I will conclude there. As I say, I hope the bill goes to committee, gets fairly speedy passage but is actually looked at it in some detail.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have studied this bill and I have done an analysis of the bill. I have listened to two speakers, the justice critic from the Official Opposition and the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, who is the justice critic for the New Democratic Party. They are two people who serve on the justice committee with me for whom I have a great respect. I know they have great respect within their own parties.

Both of them said that they would like to see this bill with some inadequacies moved on division into committee. Therefore I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to seek unanimous consent of the House to have this bill moved into committee.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the hon. member's interest in the bill and I think there is a general disposition to pass it. On the other hand I think there are some members of the House who would like to debate the bill. Unfortunately the government leaves very little time for the opposition to have an opportunity to debate government bills. We usually get closure after an hour of two of debate. If there was a little more reasonableness in the amount of time that is allowed for members to do this we probably would have been through it. Unfortunately we have run out of time today. I would suggest we leave it and call the bill again the week after next when we are back and I expect that after an hour or two of debate it will receive second reading and be referred to committee.

• (1500)

I am sure it is not planning to have the committee sit next week.

Mr. MacWilliam: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is true there is general agreement in allowing the bill to proceed to committee.

I might remind the hon. member on the other side that the bill has essentially a twofold intent, and in that respect responsibilities in the bill are somewhat divided. Some of the areas of responsibility certainly come into the area of the Minister of Communications—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are going into the realm of debate now. I see there is no unanimous agreement. Therefore, it being three o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

EUTHANASIA

TERMINALLY ILL PATIENTS

The House resumed from February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally-ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is asking the government in his motion to consider the advisability of introducing euthanasia legislation, exempting from criminal liability those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die. He is asking the government in the name of compassion to legalize murder. I want to add my name to those who think that our compassion would be better served by expanding palliative care and pain relief rather than endorsing the killing of people.

It seems to me there are two questions that must be asked in responding to this motion. The first is whether there is a need for legislation on euthanasia, and second what affect such legislation might have.

It will be recalled that a 1983 report by the former Law Reform Commission of Canada recommended against decriminalizing voluntary euthanasia and was in favour of continuing to treat it as a culpable homicide. The commission also recommended that the offence of counselling, aiding, or abetting suicide should not be removed from the Criminal Code or revised.

The commission maintained its view in the 1977 report and continued to approve the prosecution of mercy killing as murder but suggested that it should not constitute first degree murder. The term mercy killing has never been defined.

In the time that has elapsed since these reports, there have been a number of developments in relation to terminally-ill persons, chronically ill persons and persons who are unconscious and in what physicians call a persistent vegetative state.

Public consensus is continuing to develop regarding issues related to cessation of treatment but most assuredly no consensus has developed on issues involving euthanasia and aiding suicide. In fact there are strong indications that apart from the special case of the Netherlands, most western industrialized nations are not prepared to legalize practices which currently constitute crimes.

These practices continue to be condemned by the courts and opposed on moral grounds. The medical profession and other health care workers have said they want nothing to do with them. Why we are asking for something for medical practitioners that they do not want astounds me. Doctors I have discussed this with expressed a concern and a local doctor that I talked to told me that well-meaning legislators could very well complicate professional judgment and treatment.

The case of Nancy B. in Quebec is known to all of us, an incurable but not terminally-ill woman who had failed to respond to treatment and who wished to have the hospital disconnect the respirator which was keeping her alive. The court found that under the civil law of Quebec the patient had the right to refuse treatment and that this did not conflict with the provisions of the Criminal Code.

Other similar cases exist around the world. We should not confuse the issues. No one is required to accept medical heroics to maintain life. That principle has been decided. This motion goes beyond that and asks that we open the door to legalizing murder. This is not about turning off respirators. This is not about artificially resuscitating and reviving people. This is not about forcing life into unwilling bodies. This motion asks for permission to kill patients.

• (1505)

What happens if we allow it? Let us look at the American example, the well publicized Dr. Death. I think his name is Kevorkian. He claims to operate on the basis of compassion.

Just today there are media reports that he is being investigated and possibly being charged with murder. Apparently one of his patients changed his mind at the last minute and the well-meaning doctor proceeded with his procedure anyway and killed him. Is this what we want to open the door to? I think not.

I love life and I respect the right of all people to live. I also understand suffering, not my own, but I have sat at the bedside of people who were sick and suffering. I have had a desire to help and felt the frustration in not being able to do anything. We all have compassion. We know what it feels like. Most of us have had that same personal experience with suffering and death. We felt helpless and wanted to help.

Surveys have been done in the United States and Canada that show conclusively that people are sympathetic to the situation that people find themselves in when they are suffering from incurable or terminal illnesses. But when referendums were held in those same areas, which specifically allowed voters to decide whether they wished to decriminalize euthanasia and aiding suicide, the voters were always unwilling to take that step. They may have remained unpersuaded of the need for such action. They may also have been concerned about the effect that it could have.

Nor has a case been made for decriminalization. Court decisions have made it increasingly clear that generally approved medical practices, such as administering palliative care for pain relief, even when it may also have the effect of hastening the death of terminally ill patients, is not murder.

Removing a respirator at the request of a patient is seen by most as an accepted practice. Withdrawing drugs from a patient in a persistent vegetative state at the request of that patient's family has been recognized as an extension of the patient's own right to refuse treatment. In all of these situations, treatment has not been successful and all that remains is to make the patient as comfortable as possible or to grant the request of the patient or his or her family to cease any further attempt to treat.

Is there a need for action? In 1991 when this House was considering a private member's bill to amend the Criminal Code in respect of terminally ill persons, I had the emotionally draining experience to serve on the legislative committee that studied Bill C-204. Among the evidence we studied were medical witnesses who explained the importance of palliative care for the relief of pain. They rejected the argument that Canadians are faced with a choice between a quick good death and a slow painful one.

Palliative care to relieve pain is intended to relieve symptoms, not to sedate patients and hasten death. A physician with great experience in the provision of palliative care in appearing before the legislative committee expressed his concerns in these words and I quote from the testimony: "At the present time, this option of full palliative care is not available throughout Canada. Instead of our present obsession with euthanasia we should invest more resources so that the option of palliative care is freely accessible to all Canadians".

In other words, there is a need, but the need is not to legalize euthanasia or aiding suicide. The need is rather to consider how best to promote a palliative care strategy which includes widespread education, research and bedside services to relieve Canadians' fear of pain and dying.

There is training in medically accepted methods of palliative treatment to relieve pain, but the sad fact is that there are some physicians who are not aware of this training and the methods of fine-tuning symptom control. Until they are made aware, it is premature to consider the advisability of decriminalizing euthanasia. The danger is that where physicians decide to practise euthanasia or aid suicide, the patients may not be aware of the option of appropriate and effective palliative care.

Similarly, there is little incentive for health care systems to promote and support effective palliative care where doctors are known to assist suicide or provide euthanasia service. There is a real danger that euthanasia will be regarded as a cheap substitute for palliative care. Those who would debate that last statement need only look at the recent Dutch experience.

There was another medical witness who appeared before our legislative committee in 1991. They compared the situation in the United Kingdom with the situation in the Netherlands. They used the following terms, and again I quote from the evidence presented to the legislative committee studying Bill C-204: "The United Kingdom has pioneered the development of hospices and palliative medicine and is known world-wide for the compassionate care and symptom relief its citizens are afforded. The Netherlands failed to develop hospice programs and as a result is known for its poor standards of palliative care and pain relief. In desperation it has turned to euthanasia as a cheap solution to suffering".

• (1510)

In conclusion, in Canada there has never been criminal responsibility where a palliative care treatment has had the effect of hastening death as long as that treatment is provided without negligence. There are alternatives society should look at before asking Parliament to legislate on euthanasia. We cannot let compassion overrule our moral values. Let us promote palliative care and pain relief. Let us not glorify murder.

I cannot support this motion and I hope no other members will either.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak in support of the motion of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally-ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

With deference to the previous speaker from the government side, I wish to put on the record alternate points of view to the ones he expressed. He said the courts are against this. The courts are really neutral on the question of euthanasia. Their hands are tied by the legislation of this Parliament. They do not make judgments about the moral acceptability or unacceptability, as my colleague sees it, they simply read the law and interpret it the way it is written.

We are proposing with this legislation that the government put forward legislation that we can examine and debate and then go to the public and allow it to discuss this in a rational way with a model before it.

The speaker says the medical profession is against this. This is not correct. The medical profession approaches death as an enemy to be fought. The interesting dilemma I think is that the medical profession has continuously encroached in this area. They have in hospitals what they call nocodes, individuals who are designated by family members as having reached the situation in which they will not use heroic intervention and if the individual is not capable of sustaining themselves they are allowed to pass away in dignity.

The question of murder is interesting. I guess we are talking today about the Criminal Code providing a definition of culpable homicide in providing somebody an opportunity to die with dignity. What my colleague is getting at is that he would like to see that area of culpable homicide removed from the Criminal Code so that terminally-ill patients, suffering tremendously and wishing to end their lives, can be assisted in a reasonable and practical way to do so. That is an element of compassion. It is not a matter that the courts are against and that the medical profession is against.

If we decide that it is not murder then it is not murder. In fact it is compassion and dignity that is being requested here.

The most outrageous thing I have ever heard is the suggestion that euthanasia is an alternative to providing quality palliative care. This is an outrageous statement and it is absolutely not true.

I read in detail the presentation of the the head of the Elisabeth-Bruyère institution in town. I could be mistaken because it was presented a couple of months ago, but I read the testimony in detail. The individual has a perspective on euthanasia that is hostile and, at the same time, is tremendously concerned about providing palliative care.

The government on the other side of the House has created an interesting situation in health care where it has limited the funds available to provinces. One of the things that has suffered is funding for palliative care. The individual when he appeared before that previous committee on euthanasia made a plea for increased sensitivity for palliative care. I make that plea now, my colleague makes that plea and every person in our party makes that plea. Let those funds go so that people do not have to die in pain and agony, so that they can make a choice of going to a palliative care unit where they get decent treatment and can end their last days in relative comfort and dignity.

• (1515)

That is the point the witness was making. The witness was personally opposed to euthanasia but was strongly speaking for palliative care. We strongly speak for that too. We need more resources in that area, but at the same time the door should not be closed on an individual who says: "I can no longer live in unbearable pain, with a lack of dignity and have no control over myself or my bodily functions. I wish to end my life and I wish to have medical assistance to do so".

It is interesting that we in the House can no longer use the murder argument no matter what our perspective is. This is not murder. These are individuals requesting assistance to terminate their lives. They are incapable of doing it safely and effectively. They ask for medical assistance and there is a willingness to provide that on the part of medical practitioners.

We wish to see more palliative care but we also wish to see options for those people who wish to have them. Of course the courts will carry out the law of this land. If this institution decides that it is not culpable homicide, the courts will read it that way too and people will not have to appear before the courts for assisting a terminally ill patient to die.

There certainly are standards. In the Netherlands it is an outrageous argument to make the statement that it passed this particular legislation because it was against providing palliative care. That is just unmitigated nonsense.

The Government of the Netherlands heard the message from its people. It passed into law a limited provision with plenty of safeguards so that there is no abuse to basically deal with the wishes of terminally ill patients. We have an obligation to do the same thing in this House.

If we let this motion go forward what will happen? We will not have euthanasia. We will move this debate one step further. I commend the hon. member for Fraser Valley West on the government side who put through the first private member's bill on this matter which produced a very positive debate on both sides. They were some of the best arguments I have heard for and against by witnesses who appeared before that committee.

It was an excellent presentation and argument on both sides. There is an obligation on the part of this House representing the people of Canada and those who are terminally ill, those suffering from AIDS or any of the other chronic afflictive illnesses that incapacitate people. We have a responsibility to bring forward and place before the people of Canada a proposal. Let it be limited but let it address the question.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the motion of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

This motion raises a number of difficult issues which must be resolved before the question of whether legislation can be considered. One issue is how to determine that the patient is terminally ill. As we know from the media reports, many persons initially diagnosed as terminal have continued to live and contribute to society in a meaningful way for many years.

Objections to the consideration of such legislation bring immediately to mind that the diagnosis of terminal illness could in effect have the consequence of labelling a patient as qualifying for euthanasia.

In the Netherlands the courts have approved guidelines which, if met, provide a defence to criminals charged with euthanasia. There have been reports from that country that elderly people fear pressure from society and families to submit to what has become an increasingly prevalent practice.

In this country we have gone a long way to combat the labelling of the disabled as being somehow different from the rest of society. Are we to reverse this practice by making an exception in the case of the terminally ill? A related question is why terminally ill patients should be singled out in this regard when some chronically ill persons may in fact be experiencing greater pain.

Recent reports of the passage of legislative guidelines on euthanasia by the lower houses of Parliament of the Netherlands indicate that this is not proposed to limit euthanasia to terminally ill persons. In practice it has not been so limited.

For the information of hon. members, the Netherlands legislation, which must still be approved by the upper house, is available to those experiencing unacceptable suffering. This is defined as follows: the patient must experience his or her suffering as perpetual, unbearable and hopeless. Although these criteria will always contain an element of subjectivity, the physician must reasonably be able to conclude that the suffering being experienced is unbearable.

• (1520)

If through some such definition euthanasia is made available to chronically ill persons, the same labelling process will result and may cause this group of citizens to fear pressure from society and family not to remain a burden on scarce resources.

There is danger of even more subtle pressure from those responsible for allocating scarce health care resources who may consider that the availability of euthanasia for certain classes of patients excuses them from trying to make scarce dollars available to the medical services that care for these patients.

In other words, the allocation of health resources would reflect the value put on individual persons by society's approval of euthanasia. In such an atmosphere our democratic respect for the intrinsic worth of every individual would be breached and we would not find it so difficult in future to weigh money against life.

I believe that the medical profession as well as other health care workers would oppose the legalization of euthanasia. Indeed medical associations in the United States and in England have already recommended against such a step. There are a number of reasons for their opposition.

In the first place it would effect the relationship between physician and patient because of the conflict that would exist between the common expectation that the doctor will advise what is best for the patient and the legal reality that some diagnoses will mark the patient as a possible candidate for euthanasia or assisted suicide.

A conflict of this nature could go a long way toward destroying the relationship of trust which the medical profession is attempting to preserve even in this era of more impersonal health care where fewer people have a family physician who has looked after them for many years.

A similar conflict would exist between patients and other health care workers. Nurses, for example, have in addition to their other responsibilities regarded themselves as advocates for the patients. If euthanasia was legal, they could be faced with situations whereby reporting their observations they would contribute to marking the patient as a possible candidate for euthanasia and to the resulting pressure on the patient to agree to euthanasia in order not to be a burden on the medical facility or on the family. This could lead to an undesirable conflict between the nurse's duty to the patient and his or her responsibility to carry out the instruction of the physician.

I am concerned that the decriminalization of euthanasia would result in undue pressure on patients to resort to this solution and that it would affect the relationship between the patient and health care professionals. I cannot support the motion from the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam for presenting this motion because it does allow us to at least debate the issue in this House. The intent of the motion is:

> That the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those willing to assist terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

I want to share with the House personal experiences with two different cases which could almost give both sides of this issue. One case is about a young man in his thirties who was walking home from a meeting with his friends. He was hit by a car, went flying into the air and crashed to the pavement. His head injuries were so severe that he was in a coma. He was taken to Queen Elizabeth Hospital in my riding. The young man was married and had two children, ages four and six. His wife and children would visit him every day, sometimes twice a day, in hospital. My wife and I also visited him because we knew him very well. As a matter of fact, he had worked in my first campaign.

• (1525)

Months went by and the man was still in a coma. One year went by and the man was still in a coma. Two years went by, the man was still in a coma. Four years and the man was fed intravenously. He looked quite healthy lying in his bed. It was quite heartbreaking to see the children bring cards they would make for their dad, saying: dad, please wake up, please come back to us.

After four years, this man finally passed away. How tough it was on this mother and the children to go through this for four years, disrupting the whole family. In that case you could argue that maybe it was better with modern medical advice to have disconnected the tubes after one year in a coma, or maybe after two years in a coma, because the doctors were quite sure that he would not come out of this coma. So it may have been a more humane thing to allow this gentleman to pass on in the first year and save a lot of grief and hardship for the family.

But then I have another case, a gentleman who was beaten up in the subway in Toronto about 20 years ago. He had brain injuries back then. But then about 10 years ago he had a heart attack and a stroke. He was rushed to Western Hospital in Toronto on Bathurst Street.

I found out about it through his family. So my wife and I went and paid him a visit and it reminded me of the first incident. Here was this gentleman, in a coma, hooked up with all sorts of tubes and being fed intravenously, and evidently just not hearing who was visiting him, who was talking to him. But we started talking to this gentleman and my wife started saying to him: "Takhur, Bhonjai is here". He called my wife Bhonjai, which in his language meant something like sister-in-law. My wife kept saying: "Takhur, Bhonjai is here, Bhonjai is here". And as he was lying on his side a tear rolled from his eyes.

We were there for about an hour and it was time to leave and the doctor happened to be by the desk as we were walking out and we asked him what his chances were of coming out of this coma. The doctor said: "No, there is no way that he will come out of this". But my wife and I said: "But his eye twitched when we spoke to him; surely he must be hearing what we were saying". The doctor said that no, it was just reflexes and he would not come out of it. We took the doctor's advice. We went home.

I will never forget what followed. It was in 1984. As we walked into the campaign headquarters to begin our 1984 campaign I thought I saw a ghost in front of me. Here was Takhur standing at the entrance, unshaven, skin and bones. This was three months after I had seen him in hospital, and I thought he was gone already. There he was standing, and the driving force was that he wanted to help me win the next campaign. He had such a will to live that he wanted to help me to win the next campaign. The medical doctor had said straight to my wife and I: "No, he will not come out of this".

• (1530)

Let us take the case where maybe this gentleman would have signed something that said: "Should this happen to me I want no assistance and I want a doctor to help me end my life without pain". That man would have been gone in 1984. He is still living today and quite active. He is not in the best of health but he is looking after himself. He cooks for himself and looks after all his needs.

An hon. member: Is he still supporting you?

Mr. Flis: Yes, he is still supporting me.

If we pass this legislation that could have been someone whose life would have been snuffed out in 1984, and yet he is living today. As a result of those two experiences I have to speak out strongly against any legislation that would assist taking someone's life.

I may be wrong or I may be right. However, after going through that kind of personal experience I am sorry but I must speak very strongly against this motion and any such legislation that would promote the enhancement of taking someone's life.

I have a third example. My own mother-in-law in Joliette, Quebec had a very severe stroke at 79 years of age and she was a vegetable. She could not speak, she could not move her limbs, et cetera. It would have been very easy had she said, as she did in her cultural ways: "Oh, it is time for me to go" before she had her stroke.

Well that woman, my mother-in-law, lived to be 89 years old. Again professional advice and her own will could have said: "I want to end it at age 79". She had a will to live. I remember when she was recovering and her hand was not working. She did not take any physiotherapy. She did her own physiotherapy. She kept slapping her hand. She would say: "You crazy hand, how come you are not working?" She got herself going to the point where she was walking. She saw more grandchildren grow up and she went on peacefully, but at 89 years of age not at 79 years of age. I am sure other members in this House have other examples of cases like this.

I thank the hon. member for introducing this motion because it does allow us to debate this calmly and intelligently in this House. I am getting a lot of direction from my constituents and I am sure other members are. I am sure this debate is going to come back to this House again. I hope it will because we do have to debate it seriously.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I understand why the member has moved this motion. I understand his concerns about dying with dignity. I understand his concerns about alleviating suffering. I understand his concerns about quality of life, but I have a concern that maybe things are being rushed.

I am not clear what the member is trying to achieve with this motion. The way I understand it the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is not asking the government to legislate on euthanasia but is asking the government to consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia. In a sense we may say that the member is not asking for too much. I am sure this debate will return to the House of Commons.

I would think that monitoring the criminal law is part of the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, and surely monitoring the criminal law means looking at areas in which the law needs to be changed. It means considering the advisability of introducing legislation in those areas which are in need of change.

• (1535)

In a sense the motion we are debating today is part of the ongoing duties of the Minister of Justice. I am confident that the Minister of Justice is fulfilling his responsibility.

I have chaired the justice committee for the past five years and I am confident from my experience with the Minister of Justice that he is monitoring the situation with regard to euthanasia, as he does with situations in other areas of the criminal law. I am confident that if he thinks it is necessary to consider legislating on euthanasia he will advise the government to do so.

So far I see nothing wrong with the motion of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam but I wonder if the motion was meant to ask the government to act too hastily or too quickly. Are we rushing into things?

I have consulted with my constituents. It seems strange to me that we are debating this motion in the House of Commons on the afternoon when the news story this morning was that in Michigan there is a case involving an assisted suicide. The allegation is that the chap changed his mind and now there may be murder charges. I do not want to get concerned about that. It happened in Michigan. I am sure it will be dealt with there. However, I would be very worried to see the government act quickly in such an important area.

We are talking here of a life and death issue. It is worth taking plenty of time to know what we are doing. Before we do anything I would ask the government to look carefully at questions which are of particular concern to me and my constituents.

In his motion the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is asking the government to consider the advisability of introducing euthanasia legislation to ensure that those assisting terminally-ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability. This raises the issue of how to determine that a patient is terminally ill.

We all know that sometimes a person who has been diagnosed as terminally ill continues to live against all odds for many years after such a diagnosis has been made, and we have heard of cases from other speakers. A person who would have committed an assisted suicide after hearing the news and becoming understandably depressed would in such a case have been deprived of meaningful years during which this person could have enjoyed his life to some extent and contributed to society.

If the rationale to assist the suicide of a terminally-ill patient is because that person is in pain, then what about the pain suffered by those who are chronically ill? In some cases, they may suffer as much pain as is suffered by the terminally ill. Should we allow them to receive assistance in committing suicide? I think not.

Should we make pain the criteria for assisted suicide? In that case, how do we define pain? What threshold of pain would qualify for assisted suicide? Is the threshold the same for everyone or is it adapted to the individual? Who would decide that a patient had reached the threshold?

There is another important issue that I am concerned about. If euthanasia is available to certain individuals will there be pressure on these individuals to commit suicide in order to be relieved from pain and to relieve their relatives from the burden they impose upon them, even if this burden consists only of making them a witness to their suffering? What about the danger of even more subtle pressure from those responsible for allocating scarce health resources? Would not the availability of euthanasia be an excuse for allocating these resources away from those who request euthanasia?

On such a life and death issue should we not take plenty of time to consult with those who deal with this issue as part of their daily activities? I am speaking of the medical profession. Are they not the ones to whom the patient will turn to get assistance in committing suicide? What if the medical profession and other health care workers are opposed to the legalization of euthanasia?

• (1540)

When the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam mentions in his motion "assistance to terminally-ill patients who wish to die" he raises the issue of consent.

What about children who are terminally ill and wish to die? When would they be considered old enough to consent to their own death? If they are too young who would consent for them? Should the consent be a written one? You would think it should be in a matter of this importance. What about the patient who is too weak to write or who is unable to write for reasons of physical disability? When should consent be given? If a patient has given advance instructions in what is called a living will should these instructions have legal effect after the patient has become unconscious? Or should we appoint a third party to give consent on behalf of the patient who is unconscious?

When the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam mentioned those assisting terminally ill patients who did he have in mind? Is it any individual? Is it a friend or relative of the patient? Or is it a member of the medical profession?

Whether protection against criminal liability for helping terminally ill patients to die should be limited to physicians or to other health care professionals is a fundamental issue that would have to be looked at before the government moves on euthanasia.

I believe there are a number of important and serious questions that will have to be answered before the government is in a position to decide on the advisability of introducing legislation on euthanasia.

I have a definite fear that we are moving too fast on this issue. We have to consult and we have to look at the issue very well before we come to any decisions. I believe this is the responsibility of the Minister of Justice and we should not rush into this.

I would caution on the desire to react emotionally to provide a hasty response in situations that we all agree are very sad. But that should not lead us to act without the wisdom appropriate to the issue.

For these reasons I believe that at this time we should not be moving on this motion and I will vote against the motion. I think it will return to the House. I think some day we will debate it on a government bill. However, at this time I will be working and voting against the bill.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I do not participate in a lot of debates any more unless something comes along that I regard personally as extraordinarily important. I want to speak to this today.

I want to congratulate the mover of the motion and the committee on motions that chose to make this a votable motion. I think it is an extraordinarily important item.

My friend the chairman of the justice committee has just spoken and indicated he would be voting against this motion. Let me be clear. I will be voting for this motion, perhaps not for the reasons that my long-time colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, has given in the stirring and moving stories of experiences he has had. I suppose we all can.

My wife if she were here would tell the story of her father and his palliative care experiences and how that made the end of his life a much more extraordinarily happy experience than it might otherwise have been. She probably would not be for this for many other reasons that others have spoken on.

I will never forget my mother's pleading to kill her when she was dying of cancer. I do not for a minute think I could ever have done it. However, when I was reading through the clippings on all of this I found the most stirring quote in an article that talked about the pros and cons of the matter before us in terms of primarily the notion of whether a doctor should be able to assist somebody who chooses to die.

• (1545)

One of the questions that was raised precisely in Euthanasia: The Doctors' Dilemma and struck such a chord with me was what if the doctor prescribes higher doses of morphine to kill pain even though a hastened death through respiratory failure is known to be a side effect.

I do not know if the doctor who prescribed the morphine for my mother prescribed such a dosage that it led to her dying sooner. If he did, bless him, because there was nothing being achieved in what she was going through, nothing whatsoever.

For a mother to turn to her son and ask him to put pillows on her face so she would die is something that no son or mother should go through. I listened to the testimony of Sue Rodriguez. Members may say that some day the justice minister will act or that Parliament should wait until the justice minister acts.

I do not think that is ever going to be reasonable to expect. If there was a thing that Parliament should do on its own as members, it is this kind of thing that it must discuss. We must find a way among ourselves to take this completely out of the partisan arena. I welcome the motion for that reason if for no other.

If we are going to deal with the issues of quality of life they are going to be the hardest issues we are ever going to deal with. They are the ones our people need us to deal with it seems to me. We are well past the issues of quantity of life. We are into the issues of what do you do for a population where we are going to see thousands more cases like my mother and Sue Rodriguez.

We know how to keep people living longer. We know how to make the quantity of life issues produce for us longer, healthier and hopefully happier lives. That means we have to begin to face quality of life questions. This is one of them.

I do not pretend for a minute that I want to be a doctor who would ever want to do what Jack Kevorkian is doing. I could not do it. I know I could not do it. In Dr. Kevorkian's case at least, with the greatest respect for him, if there is a case this morning where he has broken his word and gone back on it then that is awful.

I understood what he was trying to do was to say to people who needed the preparation of a solution that could be dripped through an intravenous tube by flipping a switch when you chose to do so. It is I presume assisting in suicide. It would be in the same way as if my colleague sitting beside me were incapable of getting a glass of water to take the pills he had to end his own life, which is legal. If I went and got that glass of water and put it there for him, would that be the aiding and abetting of a suicide? I suspect it would be.

Should that be a criminal act? Of course not. How can it possibly be imagined that it is reasonable to say to someone who dedicates his life to care giving that when the best care is to aid someone to get out of that misery that it cannot be done? Someone is in a situation which they want out of. You know they want out of it and there is nothing left in their hope. They have no hope left whatsoever and they choose to die. It is a horrible thing. Even if that glass of water created some peace on the way out, I do not know whether I could give it in that circumstance. I know whoever did would be doing a service, as terrible as that is to think.

I will never forget the day when I had to think through all these questions, ever. I suppose we all go through that in our families. We are going to go through it more and more.

Ms. Rodriguez' quotes are all here. We could read them into the record. There is a moving op-ed page she did. One of the other moving pieces was an article in The Ottawa Citizen quoting a book I had forgotten. It was called Man's Search for Meaning.

Victor Frankl wrote this book having survived the horrors of the Holocaust. He came out of it and talked about the experiences of all those he faced those things with. He said that if there is a purpose in life at all there must be a purpose in suffering and dying. No man can tell the other what this purpose is. Each must find out for himself and must accept the responsibility that his answer prescribes.

It goes on, in effect, to say that one has to choose everything now. We have to choose the way we will live and ultimately we are going to be choosing the way we die. We recognized that a long time ago when we said that if someone took their life they did not commit a criminal act.

I think the hon. member's motion is about the notion that if somebody assists someone to do something that he or she chooses to do then should that person be criminally liable, as horrible as in some ways people find that? I have had that experience and entirely accept the reaction the member for Parkdale—High Park had in terms of when there is uncertainty about the consequences. I do not debate one moment the notion of whether somebody should end a coma. I do not think that is the issue here and I do not think it is the issue the hon. member is referring to in his motion.

The motion is about when somebody has clearly defined for themselves the course of action. I accept all the questions that the chairman of the justice committee asked and it is entirely appropriate that he should ask them. However, I wish that the justice committee, when confronted with Ms. Rodriguez, had taken on the case and asked the questions there so that it could have defined something that would have allowed us to move as a Parliament, rather than simply pushing it back out and leaving us with only this way of getting the matter to the floor of the House. That is a shame.

I congratulate the member. As emotional as this issue will be for all of us it is the kind of issue we must deal with. I hope we will get on with dealing with those issues because only we can. It must not be left entirely to governments and oppositions. It will not get dealt with that way.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a sombre moment to stand and congratulate my good friend, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, on having the conviction and the courage to bring an extremely important motion before this House. That motion says that:

> The government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally-ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

This issue has been around a long time and it will continue to be. It is the responsibility of this government and of this Chamber, if we have the courage of our convictions, to approach this issue and debate this issue in its fullest context.

Euthanasia is not about murder. Euthanasia is about compassion, about an understanding of the needs of those who are terminally ill to face death with dignity. It is about an understanding of the trials in making that transference from life to eternity and an understanding that in many cases those individuals who are facing the end of their lives are doing so in great pain and great suffering.

Euthanasia is an act of humanitarianism. We have to realize that there are times when individuals with terminal cancer or other serious chronic diseases have prepared themselves for death. They have made their minds up that life is no longer worth living. There is the situation out in Victoria concerning Sue Rodriguez, who is rapidly losing her ability to make that decision for herself. It is not an easy decision to make by any means and those who have made that decision have great courage in reaching that point in their passage.

I am sure all of us have faced, either directly or indirectly through our families, similar occurrences. I faced that situation with my mom and dad. It was a difficult situation to see my mom, for many months knowing she was dying with Alzheimer's disease and knowing that as she was slipping into that terrible disease that she was losing her ability to make those decisions for herself. She was losing her ability to control herself and to control situations around her.

• (1555)

I remember her telling me before things got too bad that she hoped she would be able to face that time when she knew it was time to go. She knew that she had prepared for that. She hoped that the situation would not be such that she would be unable to face that choice and unable to control her future. But as we all know, in Alzheimer's disease, with the progression of that disease, it takes away the ability of the person to truly understand and to control the situations around them. Before she got too bad she said that she was ready to go and she only hoped that it would not be too long.

It was a long, long time. It was a very painful time for us to have to watch a person whom we loved very dearly slip away. What made it worse, and I guess it is why it takes me so personally, is that at the same time as my mom was facing that situation, my father was facing the spread of prostate cancer that had gone to the bone and had metastasized through the body. He was in great pain himself and he had the difficulty of being the caregiver for my mom. How much more difficult it was for him, facing his trial, knowing he was responsible for his loved one and seeing her slip away before him.

The most painful thing that I saw as the son after my mom had passed away and my dad was becoming very ill, was to see him, the proud individual that he was, lose the dignity that he had, and how it hurt him to lose that dignity and to understand that he had lost complete control over his own facilities, over his own bodily functions, and how terribly frustrated and embarrassed he was to have to come to that end. As he lay on his bed in his last days I could do nothing as a son except try to comfort him in his last very painful hours.

He did not ask me, as my hon. colleague from across had indicated the difficult choice that he had made. I did not face that choice of having to have my parents say: "I want to die and I want you to help me". I do not know what I would have done had that happened. All I can say is in having experienced that situation directly, that there are situations in our lives when individuals face that choice and want to make that choice, they have the courage of making that choice, because they want to have the chance of dying with dignity, of controlling their lives to the end.

I think it is reprehensible that we as a community, as a society, would deny that choice to our loved ones. So I am very pleased that my friend, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, has raised this issue. It touches my heart very deeply, as you can judge from my voice, but it is an issue that we have to face. It is an issue that will not go away. I only hope that we as a parliamentary Chamber, despite our political differences, can face this difficult issue with the courage and the dignity that it deserves.

PRIVILEGE

CO-CHAIR OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given you notice.

Over the weekend, the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada announced that it would hold a leadership convention in June and that the co-chair of the convention would be the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot.

The problem I see for the House of Commons is that the hon. member is our Deputy Speaker and the chair of Committee of the Whole House. I suggest, given contemporary usage and given the duties the Deputy Speaker now regularly performs, the office of Deputy Speaker is not properly compatible with that of co-chair of a national political party's leadership convention. In accepting those latter duties, the hon. member has shown contempt for her responsibilities as an officer of the House.

The parliamentary authorities—

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could assist the hon. member. First of all I want to thank him for giving notice of this matter. I wonder if it might not be the better course to hear this matter fully later on today at three o'clock. It might also be advisable, now that this is public, if the hon. Deputy Speaker be advised that the matter has been raised, as I am sure would be the appropriate thing to do.

I am seized with the matter now and of course I am going to hear it carefully. However, I would prefer to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond more fully at three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to put my intervention on the record now. We did give notice to the government House leader and I presume he has spoken with the opposition Whip, who is aware of the matter.

My remarks are relatively brief with regard to the subject matter and if the Chair needs time subsequent to my remarks to hear others, I would be more than willing to accommodate that. But I would prefer if the Chair would allow me to proceed with my intervention.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed this matter has even been brought to the floor of the House but since it has been and since the hon. opposition House leader has insisted on putting some points on the record in spite of your suggestion, Sir, I think a brief response is in order.

This would be to the effect that you, Sir, of course are the arbiter in this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Again in the interests of trying to be helpful, I suggest it might be appropriate to hear this more fully at three o'clock.

I am conscious of another matter. This is private members' hour and I wonder what courtesies the House wants to extend to the member who has a bill, as this could take some time. Perhaps the House could think about that as well. I am in the hands of the House, but my own feeling is that this ought to be pursued this afternoon rather than now.

Mr. Edwards: Of course I defer to your guidance, Sir. I respect private members' hour and so I will only take a few seconds.

Since the hon. opposition House leader had an opportunity to put his points on the record, I simply want to respond and ask him to reflect on this point before the ensuing discussion later on. The Deputy Speaker, by accepting such a position with a leadership convention, demonstrates her neutrality in that particular race and it is totally congruent with the neutrality which she traditionally displays in this House.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, this is a House matter and I would like to pursue it now unless the Chair so directs that I cannot pursue it at this time. I would prefer to make my intervention which I indicated earlier is very short, succinct and to the point.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a bit of a discussion about the matter. I think the hon. member has the right to proceed if he wishes.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary authorities in Canada are vague on this particular point. In Britain however there is no doubt. Once a member accepts a position in the chair of the House, any position, he or she abandons all partisanship, even refraining from voting in any divisions.

Canadian experience is less clear. With regard to the Speaker, Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 168, indicates how a Speaker must remove himself or herself from partisan activity. The most noteworthy quote is:

> Confidence in the impartiality of the Speaker is an indispensable condition of the successful working of procedure, and many conventions exist which have as their object, not only to ensure the impartiality of the Speaker but also, to ensure that there is a general recognition of the Speaker's impartiality.

• (1115)

Beauchesne goes on to indicate that there has been less stringent inhibitions put on junior chair officers with regard to partisanship.

Citation 184 reads:

> Deputy Speakers have not taken a consistent position with respect to attendance at their political party's functions. During divisions they have voted but have not attempted to participate otherwise in the debates of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that contemporary usage does now impose a stricter discipline upon chair officers, especially the Deputy Speaker and most especially the present Deputy Speaker. The Deputy Speaker is no longer merely an occasional substitute for the Speaker. The Deputy Speaker occupies the chair more often than the Speaker during most debates and it has become the regular practice of the present Speaker to permit the Deputy Speaker to take the chair for one Question Period at least one day every week.

In addition, the present Deputy Speaker is a member of the Board of Internal Economy, not as a representative of a party, but as a representative of the House as a whole.

I want to make it perfectly clear I am not questioning the performance of the Deputy Speaker, not in debate, not during Question Period. She has retained her membership in her political party but in accordance with that tradition has not made a great deal of this and I think all members recognize that.

However, the Deputy Speaker intends to make a very big show of her partisanship. She intends to be the co–chair of her party's leadership convention using, whether intentionally or not, the prestige and public familiarity that she derives from her office as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons to attempt to enhance the prestige of the partisan proceedings over which she intends to preside.

How can an officer of the House appear to be impartial or claim to be impartial when she undertakes so active a role in the partisan activities of her own political party? How can members of the House who belong to other parties put their trust in the impartiality of the Chair under such circumstances, especially in the heat of the most partisan part of the parliamentary day, Question Period?

There is no satisfactory answer. If the Deputy Speaker were to remove herself from this obvious conflict of interest, I think the matter would die. However, if the Deputy Speaker is unwilling to do so, I wish to inform you that I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, as I said a little earlier, I am disappointed that this matter has even been raised.

As my hon. friend for Cape Breton—East Richmond has conceded, the performance of the Deputy Speaker is not at issue here. I would submit to you, Sir, that is the only issue which could be before us. Her performance is not in question nor has it even been suggested by my hon. friend opposite that her performance would be degraded by this. I think what he is getting at is the appearance of the matter and perhaps that is where the debate ought to focus.

I would argue that in accepting the co-chairmanship of a leadership convention of a national political party, far from displaying partisanship or partisan activity, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot would be called upon to preside in a parliamentary role over the proceedings of the national convention. Her rich experience of presiding in this distinguished chair could in fact reflect positively on that activity.

There are two co-chairs in this particular proceeding. One is a retired former premier and distinguished Canadian statesman of my own province. No one I think would even accuse that individual of using the co-chairmanship of this leadership convention for partisan aims.

I submit that what the hon. Deputy Speaker would be contributing to in this activity would be to the parliamentary proceedings of a party event. I would submit that she will, as all of us would expect, conduct herself in such a way that her behaviour and comportment would only enhance the dignity and impartiality of the activities that she is called upon to perform in her duties as Deputy Speaker.

My hon. friend has mentioned that the Deputy Speaker is a member of the Board of Internal Economy. I cannot see the relevance of that point to the argument before us.

In conclusion, the citations which my hon. friend used go a long way toward supporting my side of the argument rather than his. I believe the House ought to find, and you, Sir, of course will be the judge of that, that this particular hon. member is proposed to accept an honour from her party that recognizes her impartiality and her fairness, in a party context in this instance, as she has demonstrated among all the parties here in the House.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think it is really unfortunate that we need to have this kind of discussion in this House today. To use the words of the hon. member who spoke before me, no one questions the Deputy Speaker's performance in this House. I think that is a fair assessment. I do not think any of us are questioning her impartiality or abilities in the House.

To use the analogy that the other co-chair of the Conservative convention is going to be a retired premier and no one is suggesting that he would be using the convention for partisan reasons is quite different from having a sitting Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, who is not retired, as the co-chair. Surely from among the ranks of the Conservative Party there could be found a woman to be the co-chair whose ability and prestige matches that of the Deputy Speaker and who would not raise the questions that are being raised here today.

Mr. Speaker, I recall the great lengths that you went to during the pre-election period and election campaign during the 1988 election to ensure that in your role as Speaker you maintained the impartiality, the non-partisan role required, probably far beyond anybody's expectations. I think people respected you for that imagery of impartiality. Everyone knew that you came from a political party but everybody respected the fact that you campaigned in the impartial way you did.

We are not only talking about the rules of impartiality but about the appearance of impartiality. The role of the Deputy Speaker in the House after fulfilling this role for the Conservative Party would be made very difficult. When she returns then the question of impartiality becomes a much greater question after people have witnessed her leading a convention for the Conservative Party.

While we have a great deal of respect for the Deputy Speaker, I would hope that she would do something to eliminate the possibility that she would be put in a position that would create suspicion about her impartiality.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have five brief points. My first point is that I said very clearly that I was not questioning the performance of the Deputy Speaker in debate or during Question Period, not at all. The key issue, which the chief government Whip has failed to recognize, is that we are talking about the office of the Speaker, the office of the Deputy Speaker of this Parliament, which is essential to the impartiality of the proceedings which follow.

Second, with regard to the Deputy Speaker sitting on the Board of Internal Economy, I raised that issue so that members opposite would understand that appointment, that position is there to represent the entire House and not one political party.

I sit on the Board of Internal Economy representing my party, as does the House leader for the New Democratic Party and as do members opposite. This particular appointee is not a representative of any particular political party but of the entire House.

Third, I want to remind the chief government Whip that we are not in the United States where the common practice has been in various conventions, both Republican and Democrat, to have members who have served as speaker or in the chair given some capacity to assume responsibilities at convention time.

Fourth, the chief government Whip is trying to inform the House and thereby the Chair that the neutrality that this present Deputy Speaker exercises in carrying out her responsibilities as Deputy Speaker on the floor of the House of Commons is the same and would be the same, and thereby she would be performing the same neutrality at a Tory convention.

Twenty-five cents and a cup of coffee, come on, give us a break. That is absolutely ludicrous.

My final point is that the impartiality of the Chair is the cornerstone of our deliberations here in the House of Commons. We are elected as commoners and come here to present our views, whatever they may be from whatever political ideology.

The impartiality of the Chair is first and foremost. I suggest to the chief government Whip that the perception of the impartiality of the Chair would be severely ruptured as a result of the Deputy Speaker assuming the responsibilities as announced by the president of the Conservative Party. For the chief government Whip to indicate otherwise or that this is somehow a mean trick against the Deputy Speaker means he is being less than candid with himself, with members of this House and with the Speaker who now occupies this Chair.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of such nonsense as 25 cents and a cup of coffee. The interest of this House has nothing to do with a Progressive Conservative convention that will not be held on Parliament Hill and will not be a matter of Parliament. Members of the opposition party have nothing to do with this convention. They are not going to be invited but will probably be there because they like a good show.

They do not have to come. They are not directed to be there. What members of this Parliament do in their private capacity as a member of a political party at a political party convention has nothing to do with this House whatsoever. This is not a matter of this House.

If they want to attack the Deputy Speaker in this House and say that she is not an impartial member then they know how to make that motion, they can move that the Deputy Speaker be dismissed if they want to. They can force a vote if they want to. But this Deputy Speaker is a member of Parliament and this member of Parliament is entitled when you are in the chair, Sir, to vote in this House. She is entitled to vote in a partisan matter in this House. There is no reason why, being given that freedom, she does not have the freedom to be at a political meeting somewhere else off this Hill.
