Second, and more important, Mr. Chairman, there was an admitted breach of necessary procedures. This was admitted during the evidence before the committee and is indicated in the report of the broadcasting committee, which pointed out that there had been for more than one year an unwritten understanding between top management and the producers that no member of a production team would be fired, turfed out in any way, without consultation with the producers or executive producers. Captain Briggs admitted to Mr. Keate that that was so, as Mr. Keate points out in his report, and Mr. Ouimet admitted in evidence before the broadcasting committee, as did Mr. Walker, that there was this breach of necessary procedure in the corporation and that top management entirely ignored the breach and refused to do anything about it.

This was not a formal matter. The line of communication which had been created between top management and the producers was not merely a formal procedure that had to be gone through step by step. It was seen, as one reads Mr. Keate's report and as one reads the report of the broadcasting committee, that a need for communication existed, and that it was of the essence of the possibility of creative people doing their job at all. Indeed, there was not merely an understanding between the producers' association and the corporation. The contracts for executive producers which were filed with the broadcasting committee made clear that such contracts contained the provision that the executive producer or the producer, as the case may be, had the responsibility for the selection of scripts and principal artists.

The line of communication to which I have alluded was not merely an understanding but was actually a requirement of the contract with, in this case Douglas Leiterman. Yet what happened? Mr. H. G. Walker himself, without speaking to Mr. Leiterman, without assuring himself that Mr. Leiterman had been consulted—this is in the evidence—jumped over Mr. Leiterman, spoke directly to Mr. Watson and told him that his contract with "Seven Days" would not again be renewed. Everyone who has dealt with this matter, and particularly Mr. Keate, has expressed regret that this breakdown in communications took place.

Without taking time to read any section of Mr. Keate's report, may I say that any hon. member can satisfy himself that he expressed regret that this had happened, as also does our committee's report.

Third, Mr. Chairman, and this perhaps is the serious part of the mismanagement of the whole affair, if management was dissatisfied with "Seven Days", if management felt that something had to be done about the content of "Seven Days", then obviously it had to discipline, if it was going to discipline anyone, those responsible for the content of "Seven Days", namely, the producers. What did management do? Instead of doing anything about Mr. Leiterman or Mr. Hoyt or Mr. Lefolli or the director or anyone of those responsible for the content of "Seven Days", it fired the two hosts. Yet the evidence before the broadcasting committee was clear that every word Patrick Watson and Laurier LaPierre spoke as hosts was scripted for them. They did not write a single word. They did not say a word that was not written for them. When they were conducting their interviews, in every case they were pre-taped and were later edited by the producers. Again, those two men had no responsibility for what appeared on the screen.

When these facts were pointed out to Mr. Ouimet and to Mr. Walker, they gave different reasons for firing LaPierre and Watson. They said it was not as a result of any attempt to improve "Seven Days" at all; it was because they felt that LaPierre was not a good interviewer, because he wore his feelings on his sleeve and conducted interviews to the detriment of the person interviewed. So far as Watson was concerned, they wanted to separate him from Leiterman and that was why Watson was fired. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that never in my lifetime have I heard so weak and indefensible a defence of an action that could not otherwise be explained. If anyone was to be disciplined for "Seven Days" it should not have been Watson and LaPierre. The management which did what it did is clearly guilty of extreme imcompetence.

I will return to that in a moment, but I turn now to my fourth point concerning the most astonishing piece of mismanagement of all. The evidence is clear that when it was suggested to Mr. William Hogg, the director of news and public affairs, and to Mr. Haggan, the supervisor of public affairs, that something should be done about Watson and LaPierre they said in effect,—I am paraphrasing, but it is all in the evidence and I am paraphrasing accurately—"let us not do it now; let us wait until the season is finished or almost finished, because if we do it now it will interrupt the work, it will do harm to the program, it will create a fuss; let us wait four or five weeks until we are near the end of the season." It should be clear to a schoolboy that if top management had had the elementary common sense to wait until the season was almost over, say until May 7 or 8 instead of April 6, and then had said that in the fall the program would begin again with whatever personnel they chose, all the fuss and bother which has occurred would never have occurred.

Surely it did not require a genius to see that the request of Mr. Hogg and Mr. Haggan that the matter be left alone for a few weeks was reasonable and sensible. But not Mr. Walker. Whether or not Mr. Ouimet or Captain Briggs were responsible for Mr. Walker acting like a bull in a china shop, as he did again the other day, I do not know. But I do know that any management which times its action so badly, which takes action against the two people who were identified in the public mind with the program but who were innocent in regard to the results of the program about which management was being critical, any management which does that shows an incompetence, indeed, a recklessness of which this parliament must take note.

It also seems clear to me as a citizen who has never had occasion except in friendship to deal with men and women of creative talent—I have had the pleasure of knowing many of them—

Miss LaMarsh: And dealing with them professionally.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, I have dealt with them professionally, as counsel for ACTRA in particular.

Mr. Prud'homme: Ah, ah. That is interesting.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member says that as though he did not know it. I made it clear to the broadcasting committee and I make no apologies for it either.

Mr. Prud'homme: I just said it was interesting.

Mr. Lewis: I am glad something I say is interesting to someone. As I say, I have known many of them and dealt with them, but I have never had occasion to direct or supervise or have that kind of association with them. But I do know it is obviously impossible to deal with creative people in an organization like the CBC, as it was suggested though not proven before the broadcasting committee that a management person had declared, the same way as you run a canning factory. The reason for the requirement of constant communication between producers and top management is not merely for formal purposes but because it is impossible to get the best out of creative people, whether they be reporters for a newspaper or producers for a broadcasting corporation, if they are treated as mere units, if their ideas are not carefully considered and if they are not carefully consulted about their program and their work.

The objection, therefore, to Mr. Walker jumping over the shoulders of the producers to go after Watson and LaPierre in the way he did is not merely an objection, as Mr. Walker and Mr. Ouimet tried to make out, because certain formal procedure had been abridged. It is based on the fact that an important part of the work was ignored and an important way in which to make the work effective was entirely disregarded.

Everybody agreed that the "Seven Days" program should continue. Mr. Ouimet told the committee on many occasions that he wanted it to continue, but improved, cleansed, if you like. Mr. Walker emphasized that he wanted "Seven Days" to continue. Mr. Keate in his report said by implication that "Seven Days" is an important program and should not be lost. The broadcasting committee report says by implication, as I read it, that such programs as "Seven Days" ought to be on the screen this fall by asking the corporation to make sure that adventurous public affairs programming will be carried on this fall.

Indeed, the C.B.C. board of directors itself in a statement issued on May 27, 1966, which is an appendix to No. 18 of the committee's proceedings, says, as found on page 1098, that the board supported management's position with regard to Watson and LaPierre out of a deep concern for the maintenance of C.B.C. policies and to continue with the program "Seven Days".

Everybody wanted "Seven Days" to continue. But what was the result? The result is that "Seven Days" is now dead. It will not continue. And I cannot escape the suspicion that when Mr. Ouimet and Mr. Walker told us and when Mr. Ouimet told Mr. Keate, as Mr. Keate says in his report, that they wanted "Seven Days" to continue, they were talking with tongue in cheek and had no intention of letting the program continue this fall. They were playing a game with the parliamentary committee and with Mr. Keate and were being less than honest both with Mr. Keate and with us. This is a shameful thing, I suggest, for important executives of an organization like the C.B.C. to do.

May I also point out that everybody concerned agrees that Leiterman and Watson are brilliant producers. The board of directors of the C.B.C. in the same statement at page 1097 says:

> In management's view, both Mr. Leiterman and Mr. Watson are very able and highly talented.

But these very able and highly talented men have now been forced out of the corporation. One was, in effect, fired and the other was forced to resign. The directors go on to say as found on the same page:

> "Seven Days" was largely their creation and together they gave it a character and thrust which were to some extent at variance with C.B.C. policy. In an effort to overcome this management decided to separate them. It might have moved either one. After considering the alternative, it decided to leave Mr. Leiterman with "Seven Days" and to give Mr. Watson a new assignment.

This was intended at one time to be called "Quarterly Report". Whether or not it will appear in view of recent events is a different story.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Keate, at page 19 of his report, quotes President Ouimet of the C.B.C. as saying when asked, "Why did you fire Watson and LaPierre—why not Haggan and Leiterman":

> We recognize that Leiterman is a brilliant producer an we believed in the show. We felt that it could be improved. When we took a firm line, the show improved and its ratings climbed steadily upwards.

This is the man, speaking to Mr. Keate as he spoke to the broadcasting committee, who is responsible for getting rid of Leiterman and forcing the resignations of Watson, and Beryl Fox who produced the show in which he said he believed.

It is the same with regard to Mr. Haggan, and I think it is important to put these things on the record. At page 17 of his report Mr. Keate, a publisher of a newspaper and a man whose writings suggest he has a highly subtle mind, says:

> The C.B.C. Toronto public affairs supervisors, Hugh Gauntlett and Reeves Haggan, impressed me as highly intelligent and dedicated corporation people who felt it their duty to express their disagreement with C.B.C. policies which led to the non-renewal of Watson and LaPierre.
> In so doing, they have clearly laid their jobs on the line. Mr. Haggan, in particular, has stated that it is virtually impossible for him to conduct a reasonable and intelligent conversation with his senior officer, Mr. Walker.

Without intending to be more offensive to Mr. Walker than the circumstances force upon me—I put it that way because I do not want to sound hypercritical—I have yet to read any favourable remarks about Mr. Walker's contribution in this situation. But

Mr. Walker is still there, I understand at present on holidays, while Mr. Haggan, this highly intelligent and dedicated corporation person, is out. This is what has happened in the C.B.C. during the last little while.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Miss LaMarsh: Let him continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member shall have leave to continue to speak?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prud'homme: How much longer will you be?

Mr. Lewis: I think if I finish my notes it will take 15 minutes. If that interferes with someone else I can return to the subject later.

I want to deal very briefly with the problem of broken communications related to the present mess that occurred only in the last few days. Instead of taking time to quote I shall simply refer hon. members to pages 10 and 23 of Mr. Keate's report. I also ask them to look at page 1096 of volume 18 of the broadcasting committee minutes and the statement of the C.B.C. board of directors. I also invite hon. members to look at the proposal which management agreed to with regard to communication. From all these they will find that without exception everyone, including the members of the broadcasting committee, underlined the fact that there had been a breakdown of communication between top management and the producers. This fact was underlined not only by Haggan, Leiterman and Watson of the English speaking network but also by Thibault and his associates in the French speaking network. Yet what happened very recently, Mr. Chairman?

I am informed, and I am certain this is the case, that the Toronto public affairs department presented top management of the C.B.C with a memorandum containing a proposal to end the difficulties and to come to some understanding that would promote the work of the public affairs department. I am not interested whether they were right in their proposal or not, but I understand that in it the Toronto public affairs department, with the understanding or consent of the Montreal public affairs department, made concessions to management.

For example, they agreed that LaPierre should not come back as a host. They agreed that Watson be taken off the editorial board and any other agency connected with "Seven Days" which had anything to do with policy, the execution of policy and the programming of "Seven Days". They made other concessions of that sort. It does not matter whether their proposal was good or bad. I am not here to judge that. What matters is that right up until this moment Mr. Ouimet and his associates have not found it necessary to hold any discussions on this proposal with Mr. Haggan, Mr. Gauntlett, Mr. Thibault or anyone else representing the public affairs department.

Despite the admission of Mr. Ouimet that communications had broken down, despite the statement of Mr. Keate, and despite the statement of the broadcasting committee, Mr. Ouimet and his associates, Mr. Walker and Captain Briggs, continue to ignore the breakdown in communications. Even when given an opportunity to hold discussions with the people concerned to see whether or not they could arrive at some kind of solution that would retain this talent for the corporation and for the program "Seven Days," and thus improve the general morale, the breakdown in communications persists.

As is indicated in various reports, and particularly in an article by Christopher Young in last Saturday's Ottawa Citizen, Mr. Leiterman was first given until five o'clock on Friday to decide whether he would accept a proposal to renew his contract under certain conditions and, if not, whether he would head up a new "Document" series which the corporation would let him produce, but suddenly the Friday five o'clock deadline was brought forward to four o'clock on Thursday. Further, when he was given a new condition for his contract, as Mr. Young points out, and asked management whether he could have 24 hours to discuss it, management said no.

Again, all the requirements of communication were broken, undoubtedly because Mr. Ouimet and his associates, not the board of directors, it seems to me, but the top management on Bronson avenue, had decided Leiterman had to go, that "Seven Days" had to go, and they did not care what the consequences were in terms of the loss of talent to the C.B.C.

I should like to quote from the article by Christopher Young in last Saturday's Citizen:

> It seems transparently clear that this elaborate trickery was designed to get rid of Leiterman without actually firing him. It was typical of head office methods throughout the dispute. Regardless of what one may think of the "Seven Days" program or of its producers, these methods surely demonstrate to the public and to the government why the C.B.C.'s management is not trusted or respected by its working staff.

The result of all this can be summarized in the following, and I rush to my summary so as not to take more time than I said I would. First, the C.B.C. lost, and it may be that Canada will have lost, a group of talented people. No doubt there are other talented people on the staff of the C.B.C., and I have no doubt other talented people will develop and come to the C.B.C. No person, no group of people is indispensable to the C.B.C. or to any other organization, but in the meantime this group of highly talented people is lost to the C.B.C.

To what purpose? What has the corporation gained? I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman—again I choose my words carefully, even though they are strong—nothing except obviously the vindictive satisfaction of some members of top management in hitting back at those they probably hold responsible for causing them some discomfort in the last few weeks.

The second result of all this terrible behavior of top management is that the most important and most popular program of the corporation, "Seven Days", is lost. It is not to be improved as Mr. Haggan said it should be improved. At page 498, No. 8 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts, Mr. Walker quoted Mr. Haggan from a memorandum prepared by the latter and presented to top management as to the ways in which he would like to improve the program "Seven Days" and Mr. Walker ended by saying he could not have said it better than Mr. Haggan put it in his memorandum. Yet Mr. Haggan will not be there to improve it, Mr. Leiterman will not be there to produce it, and the program will not be there. What will we have in its place? Some bland, unexciting and probably quite unuseful, if I may use a word less offensive than "useless", program such as some hon. members may have seen last night in place of "Compass".

As have other hon. members, Mr. Chairman, I have followed with interest the work and development of the C.B.C. I have observed it now for at least 35 years and I believe one of the major contributions of the C.B.C. always has been in the development of greater unity in Canada through the dialogue between English and French speaking Canadians. One of the major parts of this contribution was a program to be developed in 1967, our centennial year, and to be called "Quarterly Report". It was to have been a bilingual and bicultural program. Whose idea was it? According to the evidence before the committee it was the idea of Mr. Haggan and Mr. Thibault, Mr. Pat Watson and some French network producers. How was it to be produced? It was to be produced by the group which produced "Seven Days" and the group that produces "Le Sel de la Semaine" on the French network. But Mr. Haggan and Mr. Watson are gone; the "Seven Days" group is gone. I venture to say that the program "Quarterly Report" is gone despite the fact that it was to be not only one of the major contributions to the dialogue between English and French speaking Canadians but, as it were, a merging between English and French speaking parts of the country. This is but one result of the insane, vindictive behavior of the management of the C.B.C. in the last few days.

The ills of the corporation to which I refer are recognized not only by the members of the broadcasting committee. These ills of the C.B.C. were recognized, indicated and described by the Glassco commission report, by the Fowler committee report and, most important of all, by the president's own study group headed by Mr. M. A. Harrison who gave evidence before the broadcasting committee. I suggest that by implication the white paper of the Secretary of State and the government also criticizes these ills in the C.B.C. All of these things were before top management, the Glassco commission report, the Fowler committee report and the report of the president's study group, as well as the parliamentary committee report and the white paper. All these things were ignored by Mr. Ouimet, Mr. Walker and their associates.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Secretary of State that while I agree entirely that neither parliament nor the government should interfere with the internal administration and day to day operation of the corporation, the management of the corporation is a government responsibility. The persons who head the corporation are appointed by the government. It does not matter whether it is the present government or a previous government. The government has responsibility for those who are appointed to manage the corporation. I suggest that neither the Secretary of State nor the government nor the members of this committee can ignore the irreparable damage which has been done to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by those who have been entrusted with making it work and making it work for the benefit of Canadian people.

Unless steps are taken now to redress the wrong which has been done to the people of Canada by the loss of this roster of important talent to the C.B.C., and unless steps are taken now to get rid of the top management of the C.B.C. and their recriminations in dealing with the creative and production people of the corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will become, as my leader the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested the other day, a corporation with a great number of executive people and no talent. That is the dangerous position in which the whole behavior of top management of the C.B.C. has placed the corporation.

I think it is time we ended all these illnesses in the C.B.C., the failure of communication between top management and the producers, the lack of confidence from the top to the producers and from the producers to the top, and the unhappy situation at the middle management level. All of these illnesses in the C.B.C. have been pointed out for years now, but the intelligent, durable head of the corporation, the president of the C.B.C., Mr. Ouimet, goes on ignoring these reports and remains durable to the detriment of the corporation and to the detriment of the development of Canadian talent and Canadian creativeness.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Lewis: Certainly.

Mr. Prud'homme: Does the hon. member think he has helped—

Mr. Lewis: Just a moment, I cannot hear you.

Mr. Prud'homme: Does the hon. member think he has helped find a solution for the benefit of all Canadians by what he has just said?

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I think so. I think the Secretary of State and the government ought to take steps in respect of the president of the C.B.C., who is an appointee of this parliament and this government, and when I say "this government" I do not mean the one in power at the moment but the government of Canada. In my submission, Mr. Ouimet should be spoken to by the government and told, not asked any more because he has ignored suggestions, that the situation in the C.B.C. must be reviewed and that the talent which the C.B.C. has lost must be gained back in order that the purposes of the corporation for the benefit of the Canadian people may be fulfilled.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I rise to deplore a situation which has developed in the conduct of the affairs of the C.B.C., as the hon. member who preceded me deplored a situation. I deplore it from the opposite side of the chamber and indeed perhaps the opposite side of the Canadian national political spectrum from that on which he stands. I deplore the situation of rebellion and threat of anarchy that has crept into C.B.C. operations in the past few weeks arising out of one of the most colossal displays of petulance and temperament that it ever has been our misfortune as television viewers, newspaper readers and broadcasting listeners to experience in our lifetime.

I do not for one moment defend the action of management in the events leading up to the "Seven Days" chaos. I do not defend this action of management because, although management has the unquestionable right to manage, as all of us have insisted from time to time, it does not have the right to botch and mismanage; and this is what happened in the "Seven Days" situation. Furthermore, I have little sympathy for a management that got itself into trouble by placing in positions of authority over creative people narrow-minded bureaucrats who have no comprehension whatsoever of the creative mind, the creative spirit and the creative temperment.

But having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would also say that I have no patience either with creative people who deliberately set themselves upon the path of obstructionism and rebellion for the sake of obstructionism and rebellion. And this is what happened in respect of the latest situation regarding the C.B.C. public affairs and "Seven Days" crisis.

The hon. member for York South has talked about creative people whom he has known. I have known some creative people too, and I dare say that everyone in this chamber has known and worked with creative people in their jobs outside this chamber either prior to or since coming here. The creative spirit is a spirit that all of us admire and desire in this country. It is probably the single indispensable spirit in the world. The artist certainly makes us what we are. But there is a difference between a mature artist and an immature artist.

The producers of the C.B.C. "Seven Days" unit and other producers from the public affairs area have enjoyed considerable public sympathy in the past few weeks, both at the outset of their dispute and subsequent to the height of the "Seven Days" crisis. They enjoyed a sympathy which was generated in their behalf because of the C.B.C. management's aptitude for ineptitude in the business of managing a broadcasting operation. But I have no hesitation in suggesting that such individuals as Messrs. Leiterman and Watson, Miss Beryl Fox, and the rest in that group of eight or nine, dissipated all the good will they had acquired, by their petulant, precipitous outbursts of last week when they all resigned.

Someone has said that the difference between an immature man and a mature man is that an immature man wants to die for a cause while a mature man wants to live for one. This proverb best expresses, in my view, the thing that is wrong with the temperamental rebels of C.B.C. public affairs who are pouting on the sidelines voluntarily this week.

The problems of the C.B.C. are problems that go a great deal deeper than those that revealed themselves in the "Seven Days" crisis. As the Secretary of State said, the "Seven Days" situation was just the tip of an iceberg. The iceberg, I suggest, is far more serious than many Canadians imagine. The biggest thing wrong in the C.B.C., in my view, is that irresponsible producers have been allowed their heads too long by a management that is either blind or hamstrung by politics.

The hon. member for York South said that Messrs. Watson, Leiterman, et al are brilliant producers, and he quoted many references which used that term. I think I need hardly remind the erudite member for York South that brilliance is no excuse or justification for immaturity and irresponsibility. At the least these producers have only been guilty of irresponsibility and immaturity. At the worst they have been guilty of the insidious spread of destructive propaganda.

The hon. member for York South quoted editor Christopher Young of the Ottawa Citizen to buttress his argument in defence of the C.B.C. producers. I suggest that editor is a rather questionable oracle and a questionable source. Mr. Young has never made any secret of his own political philosophies. They do not run perhaps as far to the left of the spectrum as those of the hon. member for York South, but certainly they run substantially to the left of the position that I and several other members of the broadcasting committee hold. The hon. member quoted from the Ottawa Citizen and Mr. Christopher Young so perhaps I can be permitted the indulgence of the committee to quote from an oracle which I think in this context is considerably more authoritative. I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press.

Miss LaMarsh: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sherman: I agree with the sentiments inadvertently expressed by the Secretary of State. She is doubtless aware that the Winnipeg Fress Press and I do not always see eye to eye, although we both stand for Winnipeg and what can be good and great about Winnipeg. I suggest, however, that in this context the Winnipeg Free Press is a substantially reliable authority precisely because its political philosophy is inclined to the left of that philosophy to which I and some of my colleagues on the broadcasting committee adhere. I refer to the stand we took in respect of management's rights in this situation.

Mr. Lewis: The same position as Christopher Young took.

Mr. Sherman: The hon. member for York South suggests that it is the same position as that which Christopher Young took. I doubt if the positions are precisely the same, but I will accept the hon. member's remarks because I think he will find this editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press of July 5 instructive and provocative. The editorial under the heading "C.B.C. News" reads as follows:

> Recently, at the centre of a bitter C.B.C. dispute, the question of editorializing by the corporation's hired hands became an issue. That is, as distinct from the hands the corporation is bound to hire to do some editorializing in their own behalf, as professional commentators.
> How long must we wait before the C.B.C. restores its new broadcasts to news reporting and leaves the comment to the outsiders it invites to take the air?
> In reporting on the difficulties faced by Mr. Wilson with respect to his support of U.S. policy in Viet Nam, Mr. Michael Maclear in London but formerly of the Far East, betrays the gift of sight and dwells on the inner intentions of the Red Chinese. According to the stand taken by the C.B.C. executives, the C.B.C. and its staff have no such insights and ought not to have. The job of a reporter, even a C.B.C. reporter, is to report.

Mr. James M. Minifie from Washington, puts more editorial opinion into his tone of voice than any other C.B.C. reporter, but he excelled himself as the filterer of meaning when he reported that the National Council of Churches in the U.S.A. "representing 41 million members" of its constituent churches, had called upon ministers to protest the Hanoi bombings.

The National Council of Churches does not in fact "represent" anything. It is an ecclesiastical body that exists for certain practical purposes in the areas of consultation and co-operation. Its opinions mean no more than that they are the opinions of the people who expressed them. Yet the import given by Mr. Minifie to their resolution was that 41 million American churchmen had joined the hue and cry against the bombing of oil depots and other military targets in North Viet Nam. The impression spread abroad in Canada, that the American people are increasingly hostile to the U.S. commitment in Viet Nam and to the way it is being carried out, is due in considerable part to people like Mr. Minifie of the C.B.C. and to the slanted choice of Canadian and American commentators who seem to represent almost constant hostility to the U.S. position in Asia.

The C.B.C. was once a reliable and unbiased reporter. That cannot any longer be said of it and it is time the matter got the attention of whatever vice presidents have any mind left for their jobs.

The hon. member for York South will now perhaps appreciate the implication of my suggestion that this is a provocative report considered in the context of that journalistic oracle from which it came. I doubt that even Mr. Young of the Ottawa Citizen has ever taken that honest, conscientious, introspective and objective a view of the malaise—if I may borrow that term again from the report of the broadcasting committee; and I refer to the true malaise—that affects the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and through it the moral fibre and fabric of this country.

I suggest that over the past few years a cant has been allowed to develop in C.B.C. public expressions and articulations that is damaging and dangerous to this country, and the very reputation of the C.B.C. is at stake. I cite once again the editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press to which I have just referred. I have heard quite frequent references in discussions with journalists whom I know, and with some of whom I have worked in the past, on this particular subject of C.B.C. news, news reputation and news integrity. There is no question in the minds of some of them that the manner in which C.B.C. public affairs programming, programs like "Seven Days" and certain interviews have been conducted has been damaging and detrimental not only to C.B.C. news but to the news profession in general.

I do not think anyone in this chamber can deny that in certain instances public affairs interviews on C.B.C., particularly on "Seven Days", have been little more than exercises in verbal assault and battery and bludgeoning of the interviewed subject. In consequence, a number of young reporters—and I have spoken to some of them of tender years—men and women of conscience, who were trying to learn their trade, have come to the conclusion that this is the way interviews should be conducted—that this is the way one goes about getting the facts of a story. Anyone who has had any passing acquaintance at all with the profession of journalism knows that this is arrant nonsense and, worse, it is destructive nonsense.

I think the very integrity of C.B.C. news is at stake in this issue. I know there are certain legitimate newsmen in the C.B.C. who are very concerned with the deleterious effect that C.B.C. public affairs programming in the interview field has had on their work and professional reputations in this country and the United States.

The reputation of the C.B.C. as an international broadcasting operation, and more than that, as a news-gathering operation, was once one of the highest to which anyone could aspire in that field in the world. I do not think anyone would deny that in our lifetimes the C.B.C. developed a reputation and a name beyond reproach in the field of public affairs, news interviews, general broadcasting operations and the general field of story coverage. I suggest that this reputation, this stature, is now facing considerable threat and is in danger as a consequence of some of the techniques which have been allowed to develop, which have been allowed to come to fruition by weak management or hamstrung management in the C.B.C., and which have been expressed and articulated through this production group which was at the root and core of the "Seven Days" crisis this spring.

So what there is wrong with the C.B.C. basically, in my view, is a loose rein in management's hand. I suggest that the country will be better, that the reputation of the C.B.C. will be better, that the news fraternity and the journalistic and broadcasting professions in general in this country will be better, and everyone will be happier, if the eight producers who resigned last week from the

C.B.C. are allowed to remain resigned, and if the C.B.C. gets on with the job by delegating production responsibility for those disputed programs to other production centres and units in Winnipeg, Halifax and Vancouver if need be.

I think the opportunity is at hand to strike at the heart and the root of the C.B.C. problem, and if we attempt to exercise it now the C.B.C. will be restored within a very short period of time to the stature and level of estimation it has always enjoyed. I suggest that this is the course that members of this house and the broadcasting committee in general should take in the weeks ahead. The browbeating, the petulant rebellion, the immaturity has gone far enough. At this point, although I have attempted in my services on the broadcasting committee to remain objective—and I do not think I am the only member of that committee or the house making this confession—as far as the C.B.C. producers of the "Seven Days" unit are concerned, I say goodbye and good riddance.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will of necessity be very brief. I am rather surprised, as a matter of fact, that so late in the session we should be discussing, in a period of time as important as interim supply, the problems that have confronted C.B.C. not only for the last few months but, as the previous speaker mentioned, for the last couple of years. I would have thought that in view of the report brought down by the broadcasting committee, in view of the Keate report, in view of the White Paper and in view of the report tabled by C.B.C. management, we would have exhausted the subject of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in general and "This Hour has Seven Days" in particular.

Reference was made earlier to the political leanings of the hon. member for York South as opposed to the political leanings of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, and I wonder just where I stand when I say—and I hope someone does not say "on the fence" —that I agree with both hon. gentlemen in their appraisal of what has happened in the C.B.C. First of all, very early in the committee meetings—and there were 22 or 23 of them—I expressed the opinion, in examination I believe of the president, Mr. Ouimet, that I was rather surprised that management had waited so long to manage. I expressed the opinion and the dismay that Mr. Ouimet had waited so long to rectify what must have been for management an intolerable situation.

I think it was obvious to all of us who sat on that particular committee that management was incapable of managing. I think this was well documented in the 22 or 23 sessions we had and in the reports that have now been printed and are public knowledge. When I heard the president of C.B.C., or some of his vice presidents, talk about up the line and down the line, it brought back pleasant memories of the days I worked with Canadian National Railways, and it seemed to me that somewhere between top management and the producers the up the line and down the line ceased to function; in fact, there seemed to be a strong case that could be made for derailment.

In this respect I share the opinion of the hon. member for York South in his criticism of management, and I very strongly share the opinion of the hon. member who has just finished speaking, that these young, articulate, brilliant producers took full advantage of the chaos that existed within the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I expressed the doubt early in the committee meetings, as a result of my questioning of Mr. Watson, that "This Hour has Seven Days" could properly be considered as falling under the department of public affairs.

As I said, the success of "This Hour Has Seven Days" is that it succeeded in arriving at a formula which was partly news, partly entertainment, partly sensationalism and a great deal of bias. The bias has worried me ever since I first became an ardent fan of this program. I have expressed on several occasions sympathy toward the abolitionists' cause in the recent debate on the death penalty, and I thought this program showed a definite bias toward abolition which was unfair to those viewers who were entitled to exposure to the other side of the question,—and indeed there was another side to it.

I felt a little concerned about the definite bias shown in the Viet Nam problem. Although I consider myself fortunate to have had the opportunity as a member of parliament to be exposed to both sides of this problem, I often wondered what happened to the hundreds of thousand of viewers who looked on "This Hour Has Seven Days" as gospel truth and who were unable, not necessarily because of lack of education but because of lack of opportunity, to be made aware of the fact that there were two sides to most controversies that "This Hour Has Seven Days" exposed from Sunday to Sunday.

Despite its imperfections and its bias, I was a great fan of this program and feel it should remain on the C.B.C. I think, Mr. Chairman, that it was well explained, well documented and well established; that this program, vital, interesting and exciting as it was, was going through a period of trial and error and that modifications would have to be made if the program were to continue. I feel these modifications would have to be outlined, introduced, implemented and enforced by management and nobody else. The guidelines for this type of program should not be outlined by the producers but should fall within the general policy of the C.B.C.

The C.B.C. is an organization of which all Canadians should be proud. I think in the main it is a wonderful example of responsible televising and responsible radio broadcasting. Programs such as "This Hour Has Seven Days" have a definite place in Canadian television, but I share the opinion of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South, that management must manage. The C.B.C. management has demonstrated its inability, ever since this program has come on the air, to control these articulate, eloquent and, if you wish to call them so, creative young producers who have had control of "This Hour Has Seven Days".

There is a malaise in the C.B.C. So far two speakers have emphasized the background of this problem. I share the opinion expressed by the hon. member for York South that the C.B.C. management is inept and should be straightened out and that steps should be taken—and indeed this is the government's responsibility—to see that the C.B.C. is properly administered. This can be done without violating the written rule of the House of Commons that we should in no way interfere with the internal management or dictate the policies of the C.B.C.

However, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the producers have had their day in court and that they realized the good will they had generated not only in the committee but among the public. Had they realized they had exposed the general malaise in the C.B.C., which was broader than that which affected their own program, and had they been satisfied to leave it there, chances are that this program could have been produced in the fall and that the majority of men on that program would have taken part in it.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the report which was recently tabled was slightly biased, not in the remarks it included but in those it excluded. I do not intend to get into a debate on that subject except to say that on one occasion some remarks which I thought should have been included and which would have created a little more balance in the report were unfortunately removed, quite legally, at the next meeting which, unfortunately, I was unable to attend. Events since that time have proven my point and I do not intend to belabour it.

I might say, in concluding my remarks, that I feel very sorry about the departure of Reeves Haggan. This man was a stranger to me when he first appeared before the committee, and he is still a stranger to me. I had never met him before and I have never met him since, but he struck me as a man dedicated to his job. He sided with his producers, he had the courage of his convictions and he resented top management's interference in this program. He was hampered by a lack of direction from a very wishy-washy board of directors and general manager. I do not think either C.B.C. or Canada can afford to lose the services of Reeves Haggan.

His plans for a program known as "Quarterly Report" which was to appear this coming season are badly needed as we approach confederation. It was to be a joint program that would have, perhaps for the first time, managed to show all Canadians that the cultures of the two founding races complement each other. This program would have been different, one in which the English Canadians would have been proud to participate and which the French Canadians would have enjoyed, because it would have shown them the best of another culture with which many people are unfamiliar. Should this particular type of program be a victim of this trouble and malaise within the C.B.C.? I am sorry if this is so, and I would appeal to the minister and to the present management of the C.B.C. that even if "This Hour Has Seven Days" does die, as certain pessimists feel it will—though I am not of that opinion,—then every effort should be made to produce the program "Quarterly Report".

I consider that one of the weaknesses of the C.B.C., despite its size, its almost unlimited funds, its freedom and structure, is that it has not been a strong and dominant force of unity in this country. It has not been either a force of unity or disunity: It has been neutral. Reeves Haggan and Mr. Thibault realized this fact and secured a mandate from management to do something about it.

That was one of the few bright periods in the 22 or 23 meetings we held with the C.B.C. management and producers. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South I should like to say I hope this chapter in Canadian broadcasting history will not be repeated. I sense the Canadian people are fed up with the subject. Indeed I and most hon. members in the house are tired of it. I am surprised this subject has come up because I do not think it is urgent and I do not even think it is any longer important.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to refer to the interim supply we are being asked to vote today, but I want to deal with a few different matters which also come under the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh).

There is a problem—

[English]

Mr. Johnston: If the hon. member for Lapointe wishes to speak on another subject, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether I might be allowed to speak prior to his remarks?

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Would the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) yield the floor to the member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) who has wanted to deal with the subject under discussion since early this afternoon?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to allowing the member for Okanagan-Revelstoke to speak on the same subject, but I do not want this to become a precedent, because if I let everybody speak for three days on end about the C.B.C., when my turn comes, I shall have no opportunity at all to deal with matters which might interest me on interim supply. Since the member for Okanagan-Revelstoke is anxious to speak about the C.B.C., I do not mind yielding the floor to him for the time being, but I hope that afterwards you will allow me to proceed with my remarks.

• (7:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the comments which have been made about the C.B.C. I too would question the raising of this topic at all at this time. I was one member of the broadcasting committee who questioned even the wisdom of rushing as we did to issue a report, when it seemed to me that we had already served the function that was asked of us, so far as the "Seven Days" controversy was concerned, of being a sounding board and a place to air the opinions of both sides on the particular matter.

The haste with which the report was assembled had something to do with this lack of balance to which reference has already been made in debate. It is also incidentally one more objection to the holding of committee meetings while the house is in session, because the fluctuations in the attendance of members on that committee as it drew up its final report were great, and the report as finally presented to the house was not the sort of report it might have been had the entire committee sat throughout its preparation.

I was interested indeed to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, and I congratulate him for providing in this afternoon's sitting a balance to the political spectrum that for far too long during the committee sittings was missing in the questioning of witnesses before the committee. Better late than never; and I think the hon. member in his remarks this afternoon has gone a long way toward correcting the balance.

In the opening remarks of the hon. member for York South I think we heard perhaps an unparallelled example of a plea for power to be handed out without control. This was the factor that was crucial to the entire discussion before the committee on the subject of "Seven Days", namely who was actually in charge, and what was the nature of the power that lies in modern communications, particularly in television?

I think a situation has been growing where the people who are actually working in the medium, the producers, have realized that they have been given power, and that the top management of the C.B.C., which has failed in the past to realize the power they have been handing out to the producers, has come only gradually to a realization of the immense amount of power it has distributed to the producers to shape Canadian public opinion.

In spite of all the professions of the hon. member for York South that he was striving for complete accuracy, a measure of the accuracy of his remarks can be found by observing his use of the word "fired" over and over again in his remarks. I think without exception that every time he used that word, it was not quite the fact in the particular case about which he was speaking.

I do not intend to air at any great length the pros and cons of the program or of the dispute. I too enjoyed the program on most occasions when I saw it. I was however very concerned on several occasions about the direction that it was taking and about the dangers of what seemed to me to be a lack of control somewhere along the line, whether by middle management or top management. The program did not always seem to be under control.

I mention this because I was the first member to raise in this house the question of the hour-long documentary on the drug "L.S.D.", which eventually resulted in a statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and some concern being expressed by the government over the dangers of this particular drug and its use among young Canadians. This to me was the best example of a program that lacked balance, in a situation where it is questionable whether even balance would be desirable in a program of that nature. Even after it was programmed on the English network the French network made further contributions along the same line which did nothing to solve the problem created by this drug in Canada. In fact, it probably aggravated the situation.

Always with public broadcasting we have the paradox that the taxpayers are asked to contribute to something of which they might not approve, which is a most delicate situation to be in. I do not accept the argument that creative talent can never be restrained, that somehow it must be allowed to run with absolute freedom. It seems to me that control is essential, particularly in public broadcasting. If the creative talent object to the very slight control that is placed upon them, then they have the opportunity to try elsewhere. But as long as they work with a public broadcasting corporation they are, in a sense, obligated to follow the lines that have been laid down for them.

The hon. member for York South referred to the long, long time during which the situation was allowed to develop. He found it a strange example and thought it might be the result of mismanagement. It seems to me that if anything the C.B.C. was too lenient, as evidenced by its lack of control over this particular program.

[Mr. Johnston.]

I have no brief at all for the measures that they ultimately took to bring the program into line. I think that they have acted foolishly, and on occasion weakly, in attempting to do something about the situation. But if the public is to be asked to finance broadcasting, at considerable public expense then we must have people in the corporation who can exercise some control, and we must expect them to exercise that control in the interest of the public.

I doubt whether any good would be done now by attempting to bring the program back. It is said that one never bathes in the same stream twice, and I think it would be an exercise in frustration to attempt another year to revive the program "This Hour Has Seven Days". We may be saddened by the fact that it has gone. However, if the government now acts with dispatch and insists that the C.B.C., not parliament, members of parliament or the broadcasting committee, has control over programming and if it exercises that control to produce programs of the sort that the Canadian public would expect, then I think that perhaps some good has come from the controversy.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Chairman: I am advised that the hon. member for Lapointe was about to speak but deferred to the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I will see the hon. member for Timiskaming later.

• (7:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak about a matter also under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State and I shall conclude my remarks with a statement of our views on the current dispute within the C.B.C.

I should like, today, to bring up a question of primary concern for the civic authorities of the city of Quebec. It is the matter of a detailed model of the Old City of Quebec which was made, carved and designed between the years 1806 and 1811 by a gifted engineer Mr. Jean-Baptiste DuBerger, including all the fortifications of the Citadel of Quebec, the very fortifications designed for the military defence of Canada when the Americans tried to invade the country in 1812. As I was saying, this model was prepared by Mr. Jean-Baptiste DuBerger, including all the fortifications of the Citadel of Quebec, the very fortifications designed for the military defence of Canada when the Americans tried to invade the country in 1812. As I was saying, this model was prepared by Mr. Jean-Baptiste DuBerger on the orders of Col. By, who is well known in Ottawa and who, in fact, is the engineer who built the Rideau Canal.

It so happens that this model is now in the Museum in Ottawa; it is owned by the federal government and it is on view in the Museum in Ottawa. But the authorities of the city of Quebec would like the federal government to show this model of Old Quebec produced by Jean-Baptiste DuBerger in the city of Quebec itself; this would be helpful in many ways: from the historical viewpoint, from the tourist viewpoint and it would also be helpful to the engineers, the architects and the town planners of the city of Quebec for the urban renewal operations of Old Quebec. The engineers would be most interested in having it to renovate one of the oldest cities on the North American continent, the city of Quebec. On that question, the mayor of Quebec, Mr. Gilles Lamontagne, wrote to the Prime Minister on March 1, 1966 the following letter:

Mr. Prime Minister

Some years ago, the municipal council of the city of Quebec officially asked to have returned the celebrated DuBerger model.

You are undoubtedly aware of the value of this work and it would be logical for your government to agree to its return to the city of Quebec where it would be most useful not only from a tourist viewpoint but also for the renovation operations of Old Quebec. Furthermore, should your government agree, it would be more logical to return this model to the city of Quebec rather than to the government of the province of Quebec, as suggested to us by the Historical Monuments Commission in a letter, copy of which is attached.

I trust, Mr. Prime Minister, that this matter will receive your immediate attention.

Please accept my highest regards.

Gilles Lamontagne
Mayor of Quebec

On March 11, 1966, the Prime Minister replied as follows:

Mr. Mayor,

I duly received your letter of March 1 informing me that Quebec City is interested in obtaining the "DuBerger" model.

I asked my colleague, the minister responsible for the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, to take your request into consideration and to inform you directly of her decision.

Yours sincerely,

Lester B. Pearson

That was on March 11, 1966. Six weeks later, that is, on April 29, the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) replied to the letter of March 1 as follows:

Mr. Mayor,

I regret not having replied earlier to your letter of March 1 to the Prime Minister, in which you ask for the return of the famous model of Quebec City, built from 1806 to 1811 by captain John By (later promoted to the rank of colonel), of the Royal Corps of Engineers, and by Mr. DuBerger, military surveyor and member of the garrison.

By the way, I wish to point out that in the Secretary of State's letter, there is a mistake which was corrected and which I shall correct myself later on, with the help of some notes provided by the Chamber of Commerce of Quebec City. The minister goes on to say in her letter:

In order to clear up the misunderstanding which seems to persist regarding this model, it might be a good idea to explain that it has never belonged to Quebec City or to Lower Canada. Up to 1910, it belonged to the British Department of Defence which first needed it to draw up defence plans for Quebec City against a possible attack by the United States. That is why it was sent to Great Britain when completed in 1811. In 1910, it was brought back to Canada as a gift of the British government to the Canadian government for all the Canadian people. You realize that it would be quite improper for the Canadian government to part with a gift received under such conditions.

I might add that without the help of this model, the Natural History Branch of the National Museum of Canada would be unable to do justice either to the history of your province and Quebec City or to the history of national defence in our country.

I am fully aware of your interest in this model and I realize that it would prove useful in effecting restoration work in Old Quebec. I shall be glad to send you pictures of the model, some of which are very good. It goes without saying that your architects can come to Ottawa to examine the model which is on view in the Daly building.

Yours truly—

This letter is signed: Judy LaMarsh, Secretary of State, minister responsible for the model.

It is safe to assume that the recipients were far from pleased with this letter and that several points could be taken up in the minister's reply. That is why, hardly seven or eight days later, or on May 6, 1966, the mayor of Quebec City, Mr. Gilles Lamontagne replied to the Secretary of State as follows:

My Dear Minister,

I am in receipt this very day of your letter dated last April 29, in answer to the letter I wrote to the right hon. Prime Minister requesting the return to Quebec of the famous DuBerger model.

I have noted your summary report of the history of the preparation and peregrinations of this work which, according to you, "would make it absolutely unconceivable" for the government of Canada to relinquish a gift received from the British government "for the whole of the Canadian people".

With much respect, I take the liberty of differing in opinion as to what you consider an absolute impropriety; the population of Quebec City is still Canadian, as far as I know.

If I may digress, I wish to say that the minister must have been flabbergasted by that answer, when she received this letter. I read on:

I really wonder why "without the help of that model, the Natural History Branch of the National Museum of Canada could not do justice either to the history of our province and of the City of Quebec, nor to the history of this country's national defence", if that model were to be exhibited in the City of Quebec, the oldest and most historic city in Canada.

That an outright grant of the model to the City of Quebec seems improper to you, is conceivable to me. But, I really do not see any serious reason which would prevent the government of which you are a member from exhibiting the model on premises located in Quebec City, under the control of the Natural History Branch of the National Museum of Canada.

Are the Battlefields Park, the Citadel, the harbour facilities and the post office, to cite only a few examples, not federal property, belonging to the whole of the Canadian people, although they are located in the City of Quebec? I sincerely believe that as much can be said about the historical works found there.

The Grande Hermine, which the federal government recently decided to rebuild for anchorage in the limits of Quebec City after Expo '67 will remain the property of the Canadian people. I sincerely believe that the Canadian government has given proof of its wisdom in deciding to exhibit it in Quebec City; in that sense, the government of which you are a member has understood that that historical reconstruction "belonged" to Quebec.

In the same sense, I believe that the DuBerger model "belongs" to Quebec City. If only for the sake of exhibition to our own public, in the city of which it represents a section very dear to us, it would be, in my humble opinion, a sufficient reason for the return of that model from Ottawa to Quebec City.

But we have more serious reasons. Indeed, when, in co-operation with the provincial Department of Cultural Affairs and the members of certain intermediary bodies, we are starting the development of a program for the restoration of Old Quebec, it is obvious that this model would be extremely useful to those who have undertaken to carry out rapidly this restoration which is necessary not only for us, Quebeckers, but for all the Canadian people. We consider that Old Quebec occupies the first place in our national heritage.

For that purpose, only the model's photographs which you offer to us would naturally not suffice. Moreover, the possibility for our architects to come to Ottawa for consultation according to your suggestion, cannot be considered as convenient. The great distance between Quebec and Ottawa would make the consultation costly and certainly less frequent, hence less effective.

Finally, for the centennial of the confederation, it is important that the model be exhibited in Quebec City, true centre of that national constitution.

After that account, I hope that you will reconsider your decision and that you will recommend the "return" of the DuBerger model. I am sure such a transfer can be brought about without disrespect toward historical proprieties; it would even improve on present conditions.

Yours truly,

Gilles Lamontagne
Mayor of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few remarks made by the Chamber of Commerce in that connection. After reading all the exchange of correspondence, the Chamber of Commerce thought it proper to make a few remarks in its official organ Réalisons.

In answer to an argument advanced by the Secretary of State, we can read this:

Even though the Quebec model was carried out under the orders of Major By, he is not the designer and even less the sculptor. As a matter of fact, Major By has taken no part at all in the creation and the making of the model even though, until 1831, the work was attributed to him by error. The controversy over the origin of the Quebec model has lasted long enough during the last century that it is useless to raise it once again in 1966, when in 1831, a copper plate was affixed to it, attributing it to DuBerger only. The idea was to pay a post mortem tribute to the inspired engineer who died in 1821.

• (7:40 p.m.)

The Chamber of Commerce adds:

We do not ask the Canadian government to give up this precious relic, but rather to give it a place of honour in historic Quebec to which it belongs.

Further, it says:

It must not be forgotten either that during two centuries the destiny of the country was directed from the Château St-Louis. The orders of the Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria, and those of a good twenty French or English governors general of Canada were given from the Château St-Louis.

Under the circumstances, the right place for the DuBerger model would, again, be the historic ruins of the Château St-Louis, at least partially restored. Concerning such an initiative, we appeal to the patriotism—

And I add, for the information of the hon. lady, if she will listen to me—

Miss LaMarsh: I am a Canadian patriot.

Mr. Grégoire: To continue:

Concerning such an initiative, we appeal to the patriotism, understanding and generosity of the Canadian government.

Finally, placed in historic Quebec under the custody and protection of the federal authorities, that model would constitute not only a lesson in legitimate pride and preservation of historic Quebec for the people of Quebec, but also a splendid history lesson for the thousands of Canadian taxpayers and American tourists who visit us every year.

Respectfully submitted on May 17, 1966.

The Chamber of Commerce of the district of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the facts, I would like to ask the Secretary of State the following questions: First, since there seems to be a difference of opinion with regard to the history of the model, would the Secretary of State be willing to have a real study made about the history and the peregrinations of the DuBerger model?

Second, would she be ready to reconsider with the members of her department and the director of the National Museum of Canada, the advisability and possibility of repatriating the DuBerger model to Quebec City?

I think that the minister could have that study of the history made and could also ask her senior officials to reconsider that matter.

There is a whole sector of the population who would like to see the DuBerger model transferred to Quebec City for tourist and historical reasons. The municipal council of the city of Quebec would also like to have that model on view in Quebec City, in order to make it easier for the Quebec engineers to restore Old Quebec.

I hope that the Secretary of State will take this request into serious consideration and will see to it that it is complied with. Since I am able to do so, I act as the spokesman in the house for the mayor of Quebec City and the Chamber of Commerce to ask the minister to reconsider the matter. Knowing her great understanding and patriotism, I hope that she will return that model to Quebec City.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that, when considering interim supply, we are allowed to talk about all kinds of things, I would also like to take this opportunity to discuss a particular subject, while the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is in his seat. Not so long ago, that is on June 24, 1966, we received from the office of the Minister of Finance, a news release about the Small Businesses Loans Act. It gave statistics about the loans made under the act to small businesses between January and March 31, 1966 and I would now like to quote a few figures.

The small businesses in British Columbia secured in the three-month period covered by the news release from the Minister of Finance loans amounting to $846,292 out of a total of $5,091,885.

In Ontario, loans amounting to $2,066,159 were made to small businesses, while in Quebec they amounted to only $760,977, approximately 12 or 13 per cent of $5,091,885. On the other hand, in a small province like Alberta, $497,039 were loaned.

I would ask the Minister of Finance to find out from his department why there should be such disproportion. Why is it that, under the Small Loans Act, three times as much can be loaned to Ontario as to Quebec? Not that I am against Ontario being given $2,066,159 in loans; but I should like to know why so few have been granted in Quebec. Still, we know many requests are made for loans by small businesses in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to know why that federal enactment does not allow for granting as much in loans in the province of Quebec as in Ontario or in British Columbia? Indeed, the latter received $846,292 in loans, while Quebec got only $760,977 in loans. In other words, a small province like British Columbia received 80,000 worth of loans more that a large province like Quebec. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to look into the matter and tell us why the disproportion is so great.

I notice, for instance, that in 1965 the difference was not as marked: British Columbia received $879,616 and Quebec, $1,467,205, out of a total amount of $5,550,933. That is approximately 25 per cent. It has been diminishing lately. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether we could have an investigation?

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) is not in the house now but I wonder if the minister would convey to him certain remarks I wish to make about his department.

I have here a letter sent by the Department of National Revenue to parishes, to parish priests, to churchwardens, to vestry boards and concerning:

Re: 1966 T4 Information Return.

That letter was sent in English. I have here a letter sent to the cathedral of Hauterive, on the north shore, county of Saguenay.

Mr. Béchard: It is a mistake.

Mr. Grégoire: The cathedral of Hauterive received that letter in English. If this is a mistake, I will read a few others to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State. He will notice that there are many mistakes.

Mr. Béchard: A few.

Mr. Grégoire: I hear the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard), I think—

Mr. Béchard: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: —who says that there are a few mistakes. I could mention several and I will quote others.

The parish of Hauterive answered to the Minister of National Revenue under the signature of Roger Cantin, president of the churchwardens of the cathedral of Hauterive:

Sir, we acknowledge receipt of your explanatory letter on the income tax returns recently received, the original copy of which you will find enclosed.

Needless to say, we are ready to submit to all the requirements of the income tax so that everything may be conformable to the law. However, the letter you have just sent to us is unacceptable because it is written in English only and we demand, as is our right, that such a letter be written in French.

The vestry-board of the parish of the cathedral of Hauterive, having noted the letter, have refused to have it translated and implement, as long as it is not forthcoming in French. We are therefore requesting that you return the explanations to which we are entitled like everybody else, but in our own language.

You accept tax-money from French Canadians, you should at least have the decency to write to them in their own language.

We are then awaiting the information asked for in this letter and we expect it to be supplied in French. Perhaps you had none left, but it would have been easy to delay your reply for a week and have some printed. Copy of this letter is being sent to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of National Revenue, to the member for our constituency and to some members of the opposition.

In the hope that you will grant our request, we remain.

Truly yours
The Vestry Board of Hauterive per Roger Cantin, president of the Church wardens

I have another one, not necessarily in the same field, but again from the Income Tax Division.

This person receives the following reply from the Department of National Revenue:

Thank you for your letter regarding your income tax account.

As soon as we have reviewed your account, you will receive a reply.

The person writes and asks for explanations.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

I would therefore ask the Minister of National Revenue to see that those forms are translated—I know that there are some in French—and distributed. It is not sufficient to have them printed in French. It would be an excellent thing if the officials, who absolutely wish to act as dictators by reducing receipts for charitable donations, should at least write in French in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to deal with another department. I have before me a letter which might amuse a few members of the house; it concerns the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Please note that I have nothing against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; far from it, I think it does a good job and I gladly praise it when the occasion warrants. I congratulate the authorities for a recent improvement. For some time, I have noticed that the officers on the hill are bilingual and can easily converse with the french-speaking and english-speaking tourists. However, it might sometimes be useful to remind Commissioner MacLellan of certain facts, to keep him on his toes and encourage further improvements, things are looking up, but there is still a lot to be done. It may be the slowest department to get moving, perhaps because the R.C.M.P. is the slowest on the uptake.

I have received a letter from a school teacher, I shall quote a few excerpts. This fellow was driving to school to teach on Tuesday, June 21, 1966 and there is every indication that he was going a bit fast in the Gatineau parkway; he does not say he did, but a R.C.M.P. constable proved he was going a bit too fast. However, according to this letter, the R.C.M.P. officer did not stop the teacher immediately, but only 10 minutes later. He waited for the teacher to reach the school yard, and in full view of about 500 students, as the school bell rang, the R.C.M.P. officer made his entrance with his siren on; to make matters worse, that same fellow, a native of Hull, tracking down speed violators, did not know a single word of French. And this, in the province of Quebec, in Hull, at the Saint-Jean-Baptiste high school in Hull. I quote:

At 8.55 a.m., a young constable, W. D. Maxwell got out of his car shouting "What do you think you're doing?", or words to that effect, which sounded to me most arrogant. Hundreds of students were drifting toward my car. I politely asked him to repeat and apologized for not understanding English. Feeling a bit foolish, I imagine, and in spite of the students' jeers, he had the nerve to ask two of them to act as interpreters.

And I can very well see Hull high school students acting as interpreters for the Royal Canadian Mounted police.

And the teacher goes on:

I tell you all this as a protest against the unilingualism of the R.C.M.P. constables in Quebec territory, against the arrogance of the colonial greenhorn who stopped me, against the disturbance this officer created in a school, where even in ordinary circumstances, it is not easy to impart good education; he held me up to my own students, as a model of misconduct, and I feel that in so doing he undermined the very foundations of the educational system. If I committed an offence, it was outside the school property.

And that is not all; the same teacher goes on:

And that is not the end of the story. This afternoon I have telephoned the R.C.M.P. headquarters, to demand apologies for their way of enforcing law and order. Witnesses will confirm that I was referred to six officers one after the other, some of them apologized politely, others bawled me out, before I could get a single French word in edgewise. The little French speaking constable to whom I spoke promised he would take my complaints to his superiors (naturally he was in a subordinate position being French Canadian). A little later on, he called me back to let me know that only in court could I demand a review of the situation and a different approach to value.

And he adds:

—the stature of the R.C.M.P. is not enhanced by this business. And Ottawa will wonder why young Quebeckers are separatists . . . and anarchists—

Mr. Chairman, this took place in a Hull school, before 500 students, where the R.C.M.P. agent had to ask students to act as interpreters.

I believe a complaint should be made against such actions. Since the complaints made here against unilingualism of R.C.M.P. officers on the Parliament Hill were profitable, I think the same complaints should be made against this R.C.M.P. agent who was on duty in Hull and who, moreover, thought it proper to go and prove in a school of 500 to 600 students that, being on duty in the province of Quebec, he did not know a word of French.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I hope the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), responsible for the R.C.M.P., will take this remark into consideration in order to urge further the R.C.M.P. commissioner to see to it that this police body which can do a good job in certain fields, can also improve in other fields to give satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman, these then were a few desultory remarks I wished to make. I trust they will be taken into consideration and that a solution will be found fairly soon to the problems I have pointed out.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grégoire: But of course.

Mr. Béchard: I did not want to interrupt the honourable member, neither while he read his numerous letters nor during his speech; that is why I waited to put this question.

A while ago he spoke of the repatriation of the DuBerger model. Does he mean that that model once was in Quebec City?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, Mr. Chairman, according to the statement of the Chamber of Commerce I read here, it was there once; it was built there by one Jean Baptiste DuBerger between 1806 and 1811. It stayed there, at the seat of Government of Lower Canada at the time. It was only after the end of the war against the Americans that British troops took it to England. Those troops had not fought the war; as you will remember, that war was won at Châteauguay, near Valleyfield, by the troops of Colonel Salaberry, a good French Canadian of those days. The model came back to Canada in 1910, and today the citizens of Quebec would like it to come back to Quebec City for tourist and historical reasons, but most of all to facilitate the renovation of Old Quebec which the city of Quebec and the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs have recently undertaken.

I trust the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), whom I see in the house, will support my request and that of the authorities of the Quebec District Chamber of Commerce, the mayor and municipal council of Quebec so that that old model, now located in Ottawa, can be sent back home within the old walls of the city of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this probably is one of the problems in this type of debate where we keep moving from one subject to another, but I should like to go back to the C.B.C. difficulties. I suppose I could activate Jimmy in that regard; he will understand. I think the problems of the C.B.C. have always been really in the never-never land where the government is not supposed to interfere, and yet parliament is supposed to make the decision as to what the C.B.C. stands for. I do not say this in any policital party sense, but it is interesting to note that in the years that the C.B.C. has been in operation there have been many conservatives in this house. They appear to be on all sides of the house, on the left, on the right, and in front of me. I am sure that anyone who has been here very long will realize that the right and left wings of parliament do not necessarily stand with the political parties. I think it is true that there are many who say the C.B.C. is safe, for the simple reason that over the years it has been able to establish a status quo; it does not offend anybody and certainly does not step on any toes.

There are also those who would like to see the C.B.C. become a vibrant force, the developer of Canadian nationalism. For this reason I think in this debate there has been a lack of idealism. I think the major problem which faces the Canadian public today is their lack of ability to make any correction, change, or expression of desire in respect of the Canadian broadcasting system. It always has been interesting to me to note that my political party, the New Democratic Party and previously the C.C.F., always considered the C.B.C. to be a holy cow about which you did not say anything bad, and you attacked anyone who was going to say anything about it. When debates were taking place and everybody was congratulating the C.B.C. for the advancements it made in the field of drama, which I did not understand at all, I was interested, in the success achieved by Don Messer's Islanders, as a summer replacement. I am sure its success shocked the C.B.C. officials as much as did the "Seven Days" dispute. They tried to remove the Islanders and found that it was rated about the second highest of all the programs. Finally they had to yield to the demand of a large segment of the public and keep Don Messer on.

I am one of those who believe the C.B.C. has a number of functions. If you can squeeze in drama and probably anything else that is good for people, along with entertainment, this is all to the good; but entertainment should not be disregarded entirely. I am sure the C.B.C. was shocked to find that the program 'Seven Days" was receiving such a wide audience appeal. I never have stood up to talk about "Festival" because I think those who run "Festival" are a bunch of nuts, and that a lot of the programs are like that. This is just a personal opinion. I know nothing about drama. I have not criticized it because I thought it must have some good in it and that perhaps people liked it.

I did like "Seven Days". In the last election when I travelled through my constituency I was surprised to find when I entered a house when the "Seven Days" program was on—and this followed Bonanza—that you could not talk to the people at that time. I have had an opportunity to watch "Seven Days" and considered it to be a very good program. I feel that if they put on eight or ten items and I am only mad at one of them, they have done pretty well for me. If everyone found the same thing, I think it did very well for them.

It is all well to talk about Minifie. I never saw such a deadpan announcer. He is like an announcer on a local radio station who, when announcing the death of someone, made it sound like a hilarious occasion and when talking about the strike—made it sound like a wonderful thing. I think on "Seven Days" there has been a very good balance. This is something which I think most of those who have resented "Seven Days" appear to forget. The three million persons who watched the program considered it to be a pretty good program. Maybe one person phoned Bud Walker and said it was bad, and he made a public apology. He apologized for a situation at St. Vincent de Paul that did not require an apology. I know this from first hand experience because I was there. I know that it was not as complete as it might have been, but what was taped was a two hour program and it had to be cut down to eight minutes. I agree that the warden did not get as much time as he might have, but he got some time. I participated in this program, did not get any time, and I did not complain to Mr. Walker. I believe his apology was unwarranted.

When I hear these weak sisters stand up in parliament and talk about the grand and glorious picture of parliament which must be given, I say that if you must have this, then get out of politics. We want an interview to be dynamic. I can even get sick when I see Charles Lynch interview the Prime Minister, and carry him for 60 minutes. The Prime Minister of this country has a great deal to give to the public and he does not have to be carried by someone with an opposite view. Everybody knows where Charles Lynch stands politically. I was ashamed of that program. I was ashamed of the fact that there was a need to build a little wall around somebody. If they need that, then they should not be interviewed.

It seems to me that the interviews carried out on the "Seven Days" program were well done, and I think particularly of the interview of Mr. Bundy, conducted by two young men. I went to the C.B.C. offices shortly afterwards and asked Bud Walker how he would like to have conducted that interview. He told me that he would not have wanted particularly to conduct it. A great many complaints were made because Bundy took over the interview from beginning to end, and would hardly allow the interviewers to ask any questions. I give the two young men full credit for the efforts in the interview, because Bundy is such a capable man he could take over the whole show. If it were not for the fact that these young fellows got a little belligerent they probably would not have got a word in edgewise. This interview was more like a paid political broadcast, and Mr. Bundy acted like the man paying for it, not wanting the interviewers to interrupt.

Surely we must all agree that the management situation is bad. We know that the Prime Minister was blackmailed into appointing Mr. Ouimet as president for another seven years, at a time when he intended to appoint him for only one year. I am sure everyone is aware of the fact that Mr. Briggs was appointed by a previous administration to keep Mr. Walker in line, and to set up what one might consider as a ship-shape organization. This sure is a leaky ship, foundering on the rocks. It has been leaking water for a long time. If I were a dictatorial minister I would reappoint Mr. Ouimet to carry on in his capacity. He has not done a damned thing for the C.B.C. for some time, in fact since Mr. Briggs came on the scene. I would get rid of Briggs and Walker because they have not only done little, but everything they have done has been done wrong and at the wrong time. They could not have picked a worse time to fire LaPierre and Watson. Those two gentlemen became identified with the sympathy of three and a half million viewers.

The French Canadians suggest that LaPierre does not portray the French Canadian, but for my part I think he portrays a very nice type of French Canada, and I like that kind. LaPierre is emotional, gets involved, flies off the handle and cries when it is necessary. Even though the French Canadian people tell you they are not emotional, LaPierre portrays the emotional French Canadian. I do not like separatists, or young people who go around dragging things through the mud and making everything as difficult as possible. I think most English speaking Canadians like and enjoy the type of French Canadian that LaPierre portrayed. They believe that the balance created between the emotional LaPierre on one side and the cool and calculating critical Watson on the other was sort of a cultural balance. Whether one agrees or disagrees with my feelings, approximately three and a half million viewers felt that these co-hosts created a cultural Canadian balance. You might think that this was an Alice in Wonderland type of program but I think it was good.

I attended the meetings of the broadcasting committee, not because I had to but because I was interested, and I know many of my colleagues were interested in this situation. Many people in this country are going to ask us, as members of parliament, to indicate which side of this controversy we support. I for one cannot understand how the management side can be justified. If people charged with managing cannot manage, then they are not management. This fact brings to mind a situation which occurred in respect of the Hollinger mine. An individual had 5,000 people working for him. The supervisor told him that he could not find a job for one individual and therefore he would have to be fired. The manager, in reply, suggested that if the supervisor and himself could not find a job for everyone they were not managing the company properly. The management of the Hollinger mine was certainly not benevolent in their approach to employees but they adopted the attitude that there must be a place for everybody, and if a place could not be found management was not doing its job.

Some may think that management has a right to be dictatorial but I do not believe that is true. After all, this is not the eighteenth century. We do have a masters and servants act; but I remember listening to a well known Ontario lawyer argue a case, and I am sure he lost it when it became apparent that he was basing his argument on the provisions of this act. Management has a role and that role is to manage. Employees also have a role, and that role is to give as much service and ability as possible. It is not their position to try to usurp management's role. They must, of course, give the best that they can within the established framework. Surely this is an obligation.

I listened to Reeves Haggan last night on Doug Fisher's show over C.T.V. I think Doug Fisher has an uncanny ability to bring out what is in people. If it is bad, he brings it out; if it is good, he brings it out. He does not compete or put himself in a competitive position with the person being interviewed. I think he made it obvious that Reeves Haggan is a capable and sincere person and that he left his position because he felt the dismissal of certain producers was not done on a normal and proper management relationship. He was informed that Leiterman was to be dismissed with only two days notice.

This afternoon we were informed how the dismissal of these producers came about. I wonder whether people watching the program last night, after listening to Mr. Haggan, would feel that he was one of a group of young ambitious men. In my opinion he represents the progressive element of the C.B.C., and a young man who is interested in doing his job. At no time did he suggest that he was interested in taking over the C.B.C. At no time was he vindictive.

The situation has to be changed and I suggest the first step to be taken is to dismiss Walker. His dismissal must be arranged. He is the man who is responsible, not only for starting this conflagration but also for pouring fuel on it when it got going. Fuel was provided for this fire also by members of the broadcasting committee, as well as by Mr. Keate and Mr. Fowler.

Who allowed Mr. Walker to go to Toronto in October and take over the operations there? Is the minister aware of the fact that Mr. Walker said he was not going to do this when he was in Ottawa, but that he received a phone call from Mr. Ouimet telling him that he was about to release a statement and that it was to be attributed to Mr. Walker? I have heard a lot of talk about political pressures in the C.B.C. organization, but I do not think there are any as we know them. I believe the situation is much like an insurance company headed by a "Mother Ouimet", who decided that politics had to be involved.

Let us take a more cogent example. Let us look at any major union in Canada—and I have had something to do with several of them. There are politics in these unions. They do not call the politicians Liberals, Conservatives, N.D.P. or anything else; but these are politics whereby people are trying to better themselves and set up their own political regime, in the sense of the organization to which they belong. I am rather inclined to believe that the C.B.C. in its lines of demarcation have spent more time on the politics of those lines than on politics as we know them, whereby politicians in the House of Commons have any influence on them.

I doubt whether there are very many people in parliament today who would say we should get rid of the C.B.C. I am of the opinion, however, that there are many who would say, "Don't let the C.B.C. get any stronger than it is. Don't let it have any greater influence than it has. In fact, any problem the C.B.C. has is all to the good, because it may go away by itself.". I think a number of members of parliament would agree that private television might do a better job if the C.B.C. was out of the way. Mr. Haggan was asked yesterday whether he could produce a good public affairs program without money, and he said, "Absolutely not". He was asked whether this was the reason "Seven Days" had been so successful and indicated that it had a reasonably modest budget for that type of production.

The minister just made a comment which I did not hear. I do not know whether she agrees with what I said or not. But the budget varies anywhere from about $12,000 a week to $50,000 a week; so that in discussing it we were never sure how much the budget was. Perhaps when I was not there the committee was able to ascertain exactly the total cost of this program including technical assistance, studio and all the other things necessary. His point was that C.T.V. was providing enough money in some of the productions they were undertaking to be able to produce, reasonably, a better type of television program than they were producing. The reason they were not producing a better type of program was that the people in the C.B.C., built up through the C.B.C. and by the C.B.C., were more capable than any others in Canada. I think this is true and would agree that the producers of "Seven Days" were probably of the top calibre.

I was surprised at the remark a Conservative made in the committee. In view of where he sits I would have thought his position would have been different. Mr. Haggan was referring to Leiterman and called him a near-genius. I do not know whether I would go that far. I do not know what a near-genius is; nor do I know what a distant one would be. I do not even know what mediocre producers are like; this is not my field. But it is my opinion that with a viewing audience of three and a half million the program "Seven Days" was the kind of thing that should have been extended into other fields. I honestly believe that over the years the C.B.C. has developed a very impartial news media that probably cannot be duplicated anywhere. I think its public affairs programs were never of that calibre, and with "Seven Days" we had a program that had a large audience and was presenting things that were controversial and interesting. One hon. member mentioned L.S.D. I watched that program. Some members should pay some attention to these programs and not talk about things they have not seen. I came to the conclusion that I just didn't have guts enough to try L.S.D.

I am quite sure this was brought home to many young people of this country as well. The program did not only show the fantasies produced through taking L.S.D., and the medical aspects of it, but it showed the dangers of taking this drug.

An hon. Member: It didn't show enough.

Mr. Peters: It showed enough that I would not go out and undertake one of those experiments with a sugar cube that somebody gave me on the street. That is the good feature of programs such as this; many people see them and realize the dangers involved in this kind of thing. This is what makes television such an important media. It provided me and a great many other people with information on a subject I did not know anything about, and it provided that information in such a way that I felt I would not have the nerve to take that trip into insanity—

An hon. Member: You wouldn't get back.

Mr. Peters:—or whatever they call it, because I just did not have the nerve. Some members may not have thought of it in that way. Some may have decided they were going to take it. More power to them. I do not want to duplicate anybody's action in this regard. I believe the public is smarter than those members of parliament who are ultra-conservative and want to go back in time, rather than forward. I believe the public is smarter than they give them credit for. The public have a right to make a decision on some things, and I believe they are better equipped so do so because of television and other news media. In addition, Mr. Chairman, we have in this country more people with university education than ever before. This applies also to people with high school or public school education. They read, write and can observe and, in my opinion, are well equipped to make a decision. Even at election time they make their decision, whether rightly or wrongly. They are now in a position to make that decision. I believe their decision is getting "righter" as time goes by.

In my opinion people are now making better decisions, and I believe that television is a medium that assists them to do this. It is a medium where the individual viewer is in close and immediate contact with the screen and the people on it. I think it provides a much clearer picture of the situation than we would otherwise have.

We know what the press has said about this program. I am surprised at the strength of their opposition to "Seven Days". I would not know whether it was because Leiterman had been previously in the journalistic field; I would not know whether it is caused by petty jealousy; I do not know whether it is the up-staging these people have received. I am not really sure of the reason but have been surprised by it, because I have found that newspaper people as a rule are not resentful of others making an impression on the public, but have enjoyed the added prestige the journalistic type of communication was creating, whether it be in the magazine, television or newspaper field.

I have been surprised at the resentment the press has shown to the desire of young people to make an impression in the C.B.C. organization and obtain some rapport with management and others, to obtain a dialogue to be carried on between top management and the production level so that top management would be aware of what they were trying to do, wanted to do and were capable of doing. Then management would make the decision whether Canada was ready for this type of thing.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I believe that parliament has now to make a decision. Do we go back to the mediocre coverage we were receiving in public affairs programming, or do we continue to expand in this field and go into programs like "Quarterly". The French Canadians will scream blue murder, I am sure, at some of the things that have been said on "Quarterly" because there are English and French speaking people who do not really have an understanding of the program, and the intention of trying to bring the two races together to develop something that will eventually become Canadian talent and Canadian national culture.

I believe this is a role of the C.B.C. and it is the type of role that should be developed. I believe it cannot be developed by the Walkers, by the Ouimets, or by the Briggs. It can possibly be developed by people like Haggan, Thibault, and some of the others who are dedicated entirely to their work, and the people with whom they work.

I think they are willing to experiment, they are willing to allow for an exchange of ideas in a completely new field. This will not be possible if there is a lack of understanding between the producers of both networks at that particular level. I am assured by some that this can also extend into other parts of th C.B.C., not only in the field of public affairs programming but in other fields. It will be difficult for the minister to sit idly by and not do something about the many reports that have been brought to her attention over the past year or so. If this happens, then the three and a half million Canadians who have watched and enjoyed this program will ask themselves: Why have the members of parliament not done something about this matter? It is not our duty to interfere in the business of the C.B.C. by firing the individuals concerned or by reappointing Leiterman and re-establishing "Seven Days", but to establish a rapport which will allow for a dialogue and a free exchange of ideas between management and producers.

I believe there should be something for the right and something for the left, and I hope there will be a program in the fall for three and a half million people to enjoy.

Mr. Loney: I rise to participate in this debate on interim supply because of the very serious situation which exists in the southern portion of the riding of Bruce, which I represent. This situation exists not only in part of Bruce county but also in the lower part of Gray and the surrounding counties. I am further prompted to speak this evening on the subject, Mr. Chairman, because of the lack of satisfactory answers to questions I have raised in the house in the last few days regarding a letter to the Prime Minister which alludes to a certain campaign promise made on November 4 concerning area development. This promise was made to the people of the Kincardine area.

The subject on which I wish to speak, Mr. Chairman, is the problem which is created when one area has been designated as a depressed or slow growth area, and the area adjacent to it is not so designated. The communities in the south of Grey and Bruce counties are very much at a disadvantage when they must compete with the other part of the county to attract industrial development and expansion.

We are well aware, Mr. Chairman, that under the existing legislation these sectors do not qualify for designation even though they are recognized as such by every survey which has been made to date. When the Minister of Industry introduced the new program on August 5, 1965 he said the areas which qualify are characterized by high and chronic unemployment, low family incomes, and contain some 16 per cent of the national labour force as compared with approximately 7.5 per cent of the labour force covered under the former plan.

There is low unemployment in the area concerned because there is no industrial expansion. There has been an industrial decline and an industrial stagnation. The employees have moved away to become unemployment statistics in the metropolitan centres. The government boasts of policies to relieve unemployment but they have done so at the expense of rural areas. The workers have migrated to metropolitan centres but they want to return to their homes in the Georgian bay and lake Huron areas.

These problems have been of great concern to myself and to my colleague, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. We have communicated with the Minister of Industry, but with no success. There have been numerous delegations and representations made to the department but to no avail. We have made every possible approach to the department concerned. We have joined with representatives of the communities concerned, with county councils, industrial commissions, chambers of commerce and individual businessmen. We have used a non-political approach. We have had delegates from the Liberal organizations, and on one occasion a delegation which had among its members the defeated Liberal candidates from that region. That was a large delegation.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce and myself are concerned about the future of our area. I may assure the house that we are not alone in this concern. The provincial member for Bruce, a member of the Liberal party, is also very much concerned. He is especially concerned abou a commitment made to the people of Kincardine on November 4 prior to the last election.

I am now referring to a letter written by that member to the Prime Minister on May 19, 1966. The letter was published in an article headed "Ross Whicher Requests Action on Recent Federal Election Promise by Liberal Party". It was written at the Parliament Buildings, Queen's Park, Toronto, Ont., and reads as follows:

The Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson
Prime Minister of Canada
House of Commons
Ottawa, Canada

My Dear Prime Minister:

During the past several weeks I have written to you twice in regard to the statement issued immediately previous to the last federal election by the Liberal candidate for Bruce in so far as the town of Kincardine and its immediate area were to be affected by the term "designated area" is concerned. I have also talked to your secretary by telephone and had correspondence with the Hon. Mr. Drury, the Minister in charge of this particular problem.

I will not go into the question again as to whether Kincardine should or should not be included as a designated area. There are arguments on both sides. However, to me as the Liberal member for the area for the past eleven years in the provincial legislature, there is a far more serious question. It is a matter to me of principle and of honour. May I quote the News Release that was given verbally to the people of Kincardine by Kent Lamont, the Liberal candidate, just a few days before the last election, and also given to the press, radio and television.

Statement received by Gordon Beaton from Mr. Keith Davey this afternoon, November 4th, by phone to be conveyed to Mr. Kent Lamont, Liberal candidate in the riding of Bruce re designated areas. If Mr. Lamont wishes to make a statement publicly the following is the suggested announcement he should make: "I have been in touch with the Minister of Industry who has advised me that the area development agency of his department have embarked upon a study to determine what should be the boundaries of the Georgian Bay economic region. They are being assisted in this study by the Ontario government." If Mr. Lamont wishes he could add the following: "I have been authorized that I may announce that Kincardine area will after this study be included in the area already designated. I have been assured by the Minister that circumstances in the Kincardine area are exactly that which these studies are directed and that I can assure the people of the Kincardine area that it will be included in the designated area."

Can anything be more explicit? Here we have the word of Keith Davey, now a Senator who, at that time was national organizer for the Liberal party and through his position speaking officially for the Liberal party.

This promise has not been kept. Honour has been a word that has been synonymous with your whole life. May I respectfully say that it is a word that has described your political life more than any other. I hope that in a small way it helps to describe me. Most humbly I tell you that I did not win this riding against such Conservative leadership as Leslie Frost and John Robarts by stretching the truth even in an election campaign. And by our lack of action we Liberals have certainly misinformed the people of Kincardine. Out of respect for my Prime Minister I am being temperate in my wording. If you were an ordinary Liberal I would use that language which I normally employ to describe such things.

He concludes by saying:

Under the circumstances, as outlined above, it will be impossible for me to associate myself with any proclamations or declarations that your government may issue for this area. Regrettably, I would always have the feeling that it might not be carried out.

Yours very truly,
Ross M. Whicher, M.P.P.
(Bruce)

I ask the government to honour their pledge. Again I ask the government to alleviate the serious situation which exists today. The designated areas program provides for an annual review. Has this problem been reconsidered? I do not want action of the kind described by the minister when pressed to remove the discrimination and competition created by this bill, namely to remove designation from the adjacent area. Unemployment is the basic criterion for designation, yet the word "unemployment" appears only once in the statement of the minister extending over some five pages, which he made on August 5, 1965.

With reference to that statement, Mr. Chairman, I say that that word was used only once. He went on to use very descriptive phrases, such as economic difficulties, variety of industries, growing markets, industrial development, economic growth, employment opportunities and incentive program. When the Prime Minister introduced this legislation first on June 7, 1965, he indicated that the program of incentives for area development was a further measure in the government's campaign against poverty and inadequate opportunities, and as reported at page 2022 of Hansard he said:

This program is designed to encourage the establishment of industry in areas of Canada where there is a special need to raise employment and income and broaden economic opportunity for people.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I submit that if the people of my riding do not qualify for this, then I do not know what they would qualify for.

With regard to the minister's statement, I would ask, why such narrow criteria for such a broad program of assistance? I recognize that statistical criteria must be employed, but we have asked that designation apply to the general area on a regional basis or on a county basis, or counties adjacent to one another having similar problems and need for special economic development incentives. I ask not only for designation of the area in my riding but also for designation on a regional basis, so that general economic conditions will be improved and development accelerated.

In support of my plea this evening I should like to refer to the letter I received from the mayor of Kincardine this afternoon. It is dated July 9, 1966 and is as follows:

Dear Sir:

I follow very closely all reports from parliament as given by the London Free Press. I appreciate and wish to express my personal thanks for your efforts on our behalf re designated area. I note you are bringing attention to a letter by Ross Whicher to the Prime Minister on our behalf before the house next week. I personally wrote the Prime Minister on June 9, 1966 re statements by Kent Lamont, also a reply to a telegram from the Prime Minister after our delegation to Ottawa last summer and I am also waiting for a reply.

I also had a telephone call this evening from the chairman of the industrial commission in Kincardine, who received a copy of the statement alleged to have been circulated by the Liberal organization—and I say alleged because I have no way of knowing whether or not it is authentic until the government takes some sort of action. This is the statement that was forwarded, in the first instance, to the candidates in the last campaign. In his telephone conversation this evening the chairman urged me to do everything possible to alleviate the serious situation existing today in the town of Kincardine. He pointed to the area immediately to the north, which has already benefited from the designation; and while I do not doubt for one moment that there is a certain amount of jealousy, I feel that the people in the area are quite justified in feeling that way when we read that there has been recent industrial expansion and development in the communities which are immediately affected, namely Port Elgin, Owen Sound, Midland and further north.

Just recently there has been a new $1 million plant which commenced construction in the town of Port Elgin. There must be something wrong in the area, Mr. Chairman, when the Prime Minister chooses the Bruce peninsula, in particular the city of Owen Sound, to announce on November 4 tax incentives which were designed to help the tourist industry to earn more U.S. dollars. This announcement was featured in an article in the Globe and Mail for that date under the heading "P.M. announces incentives".

[Mr. Loney.]

There must be something wrong when we see press clippings on June 29, particularly one in the Port Elgin Times, which says that this area has been selected for a job vacancy survey.

There must be something wrong, Mr. Chairman, when a Liberal candidate prior to the last election said that, if elected, he would attempt to have the riding of Grey-Bruce designated in order to receive assistance to secure new industries. Another candidate in the riding of Bruce referred to the fact that action in Bruce county was needed, and this, mind you, is after the program had been brought in on August 5, 1965.

Another press clipping, this time from the Kincardine News for December 15, 1965, is headed "Confer with federal Minister of Inquiry" and commences as follows:

The exclusion of the Kincardine area from the federal government's "designated area" has dealt a severe blow to any hopes of attracting industry to this region, but the members of the local Industrial Committee are still striving to change the decision to draw the boundary line at North Bruce.

Another editorial is headed "Discrimination in Designated Areas".

We ask, Mr. Chairman, that something be done to alleviate this situation. We ask for consideration. We ask further for some amendment of the act to be brought in to equate opportunities in the Georgian Bay area. We ask that something—anything—be done to rectify the current decline and regression. Surely, Mr. Chairman, even though this government has a record of so many changes, revisions, last minute stands and reversals, it will find that in changing the formula it would not be setting any unwarranted precedent.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I regret having to take a couple moments of the time of this committee, but there are certain things that I must bring to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is responsible, of course, for the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and for the recent so-called baby census that has taken place.

This variety of census of course is very important, and it should be accurate because government policies having to do with social welfare, immigration, finance and the like are dependant on its accuracy, as are businesses and like institutions throughout the country. A couple of instances of inaccuracies in the recent census have been brought to my attention. I am sure that other hon. members have had similar things brought to their attention.

This census, Mr. Chairman, has cost many millions of dollars. Many government departments and government policies are dependant on the accuracy of it. I should like to cite an instance of inaccuracy in the census, for the benefit of the minister, and I hope that he may send out instructions, or that he may request the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to sent out instructions, so that something can be done to rectify the obvious mistakes and inaccuracies which have crept into the recent census taking.

A newspaper in the city of Woodstock reports an astonishing incident where a census taker went to a residence in which there are a number of apartments. The census taker, apparently unable to find at home some of the persons living in the apartment house requested the proprietor of the building to guess at the answers to some of the six questions that were put. The proprietor declined the invitation, and presumably the census taker filled in the answers from his, or her, as the case may be, imagination. It turned out that one of the occupants of the apartment building had been enumerated without her knowledge, and it was quite clear therefore that the information must have been filled in from the imagination of the census taker.

Another incident brought to my attention was in the city of Toronto. The home of a relation of mine, who at the time was temporarily absent was enumerated; Also his daughter, a university student, was taking a course outside the country. It turns out that the person replying to the census taker was informed that since two persons were absent from the residence on the day of enumeration, they could not be included in the census. Incidentally the hon. member for York South was informed of this incident by letter.

The thing I was to bring to the minister's attention is this: One of these incidents was uncovered by a newspaper, and the other was brought to my attention by a private individual, These are two instances of inaccuracies. There must be many other inaccuracies in this census. Even if 1 per cent of the information is wrong, that could have a very serious effect on the results of the census and the use to which the figures arising from it can be put.

This census has cost the taxpayers many millions of dollars. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce considers it his responsibility to see that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics checks into this matter, to see if anything can be done about remedying these inaccuracies. It is quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that those who were responsible for instructing the census takers did not do their jobs very well. As for the people taking the census, certainly a considerable number of them did not know what they were doing.

I draw this to the minister's attention and I hope that he may take the appropriate remedial action.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Batten in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Sharp moved:

Resolved, that toward making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967, the sum of $1,662,982,791.93, be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of the Minister of National Revenue for just a few moments with regard to a matter that I have had occasion to raise many times. The references that I wish to make on this occasion, however, are few and brief.

On June 17, as recorded in Hansard at page 6543, I asked the Minister of National Revenue if he would consider arranging for a term of reference to be given to the joint committee on the public service so that it might discuss the question of, adjusting the pensions of retired civil servants. The minister replied on that occasion in these words:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would have no objection to doing that providing the committee completes the huge amount of work it now has before it in considering four very complicated bills.

I replied:

That is fine; we can do it after we have completed the other bills.

Ten days later, as recorded in Hansard at page 6873, I renewed the question. On that occasion I asked the minister if he would discuss with representatives of the various parties in the house the possible wording of a term of reference so that the matter of increasing the pensions of retired civil servants might be considered by the joint committee on the public service when it has finished the other matters that have been referred to it.

I should like to read the reply given on that occasion, which as I have said is on page 6873. It reads as follows:

> Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the joint committee has dealt with the rather tremendous task it has in front of it, namely the consideration of the bills to implement collective bargaining in the civil service, I would be pleased to discuss such a resolution with representative members of the parties opposite as well as with my cabinet colleagues, whose approval I must obtain before putting such a resolution on the order paper.

At no point in these proceedings have I attempted to get out of the minister more than I feel he promised. He made it very clear that the subject matter of my request, namely for the joint committee on the public service to discuss the pensions of retired civil servants, would have to come after we have considered the four bills referred to it. We have finished one of them, namely, the pension integration bill. The other three bills relate to the question of collective bargaining in the civil service and they are still before that committee.

It will obviously take some weeks, it may be fall, before we complete the work on the collective bargaining in the civil service, but it was my hope that the minister might meet the suggestion I made on June 27, namely that an appropriate term of reference might be drafted in order that those who are interested might know that this important question will be discussed by that committee.

The reason I suggested to the minister that he might discuss the wording of the term of reference with representatives of the various parties is that usually when something is done this way there is no debate on the floor of this house on such a motion. If there were an all-party agreement on such a term of reference it could be brought before the house some night just before closing time; it could be passed and then those who are interested would know that pensions of retired civil servants would be discussed in the committee.

I do not suggest, when I say this, that there is any question about the minister's promise. He is a man of his word. But I should be glad if before the recess, which will come along one of these days, he would confirm that this matter of pensions paid to retired civil servants and their widows can and will be discussed by the joint committee when it has finished its consideration of the other three bills.

Mr. Benson: I would simply say that I stand behind everything I have said in this respect. I personally have no objection to this matter going to the committee when it has completed the considerable amount of work presently before it. At the time I first answered the hon. member on this point there were four bills to be dealt with. Indeed I would hope that when we have completed supply we could quickly move to discuss item 51 on the order paper, so that we might have three items open. But when those three important measures have been disposed of, namely the bill with respect to collective bargaining in the public service, the Financial Administration Act and the new public service act, I would certainly be most pleased to see that the matter of which the hon. member has spoken is brought before the committee.

I do not believe I can give any further assurance than this—the assurance that I personally would like to see this matter discussed when the other important and urgent matters have been cleared up. However, as I stated earlier, I am not committing the government. I am merely saying that I personally am in favour of having this question discussed, and I leave the matter open.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for his words of confirmation. He has stated his own position as a minister with respect to this matter and I dare to believe, and I dare to hope, that his cabinet colleagues will back him up when the time comes.

With respect to his suggestion that in a moment or two we might deal with order 51, I am sure we would all agree to that. It calls for concurrence in a Senate amendment to the pension integration bill, the whole purport of which is simply to correct two words in the French version of the bill. I am sure we would agree to do that and then we would be one step further on toward dealing with the pensions of retired civil servants.

Mr. Benson: If we had the consent of the house we could get that off the order paper immediately after supply. I repeat that this would be possible if the house were to give unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: We shall.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Benson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-226 for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Mr. Benson moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 2—

Mr. Knowles: I believe I am correct in assuming the minister gave the usual undertaking about this bill at an earlier stage?

Mr. Benson: I gave the usual undertaking at the resolution stage before the somewhat lengthy debate which later took place, and I would simply confirm the usual undertaking with respect to it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A to H inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa, July 11, 1966.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Emmett M. Hall, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 11th of July, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General.

PENSIONS

CORRELATION OF VARIOUS PLANS WITH CANADA PENSION PLAN—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-193, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act and the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the record the minister might indicate what it is that this amendment does.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, when the bill was being considered by the committee, the committee recommended a change in two words in the French version of the bill, and when the bill passed the house it was with that amendment changing the two words in the French version. When the law officers of the crown saw that the amended words were not good French they recommended that they be converted back to the original version. The Senate agreed to that, and also agreed to leave the problem of complete translation of this bill, along with that of all other bills, to the committee which is dealing with the preparatory work for the Revised Statutes of Canada. The amendment does not change the purport or meaning of the bill in any way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the two words?

Mr. Benson: The words "fonction publique" were substituted for "service public". It was then found that service public and fonction publique did not mean the same thing and so it was necessary to convert back to the original translation, with the understanding that the whole problem of translating this particular idea would be looked into by the committee dealing with revision of the statutes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How did that go through a cabinet with so many outstanding French Canadians in it?

Mr. Benson: I would simply like to tell the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Diefenbaker) that it did not go through the cabinet. It was the committee which recommended this particular change of words, and their recommendation was adopted by the house. The cabinet then took a look at it and, with all the good French Canadians in the cabinet they found these words were not very good. They referred them to the law officers of the crown, who agreed, and so now we have the words reverting to the original version as agreed to by this very efficient cabinet.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROVISION FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF FINDINGS OF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONER

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-215, respecting certain conditions of employment of dock workers at the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I can think of no better way to introduce the motion that this bill be read a second time than to read the preamble to it:

Whereas the processes of free collective bargaining and of mediation between representatives of employing shipping companies using the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec and of dock workers at those ports have been successful in producing agreement on wages and most of the other issues in dispute at the time of the strike of such dock workers that began in the month of May, 1966, and, in the report of the mediator appointed to mediate the issues then in dispute, it was recommended that an industrial inquiry commission be appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to inquire into certain matters on which agreement was not reached and to report its conclusions thereon to the Minister of Labour at the earliest possible date;

And whereas an industrial inquiry commission to inquire into those certain matters has been appointed under the said act, and it is in the national interest that the conclusions of the said commission with respect thereto be carried into effect without delay following receipt of the report of the said commission, by the incorporation of those conclusions in the terms of settlement that were entered into following the settlement of the other issues involved in the dispute and in any collective agreements entered into pursuant to those terms of settlement.

The collective agreement under which the dock workers at the three ports worked for a period of nearly three years prior to May of this year, actually expired on December 31, 1965. Prior to its expiration, in fact in late October of last year, the unions concerned served notice of their intention to insist on changes in the agreement when the time came to negotiate.

It is of some significance that other locals of the International Longshoremen's Association represent the dock workers in the cities of Halifax and Saint John. The traffic on the St. Lawrence being closed in the early part of 1966, and the Port of Halifax being open, the Shipping Federation of Canada agreed with the Halifax local on the terms of a new collective agreement, and negotiations were opened with the bargaining representatives of the local in Saint John, New Brunswick. The new Halifax agreement provides that members of that union will receive any greater benefits that may be given to the St. Lawrence ports members as a result of subsequent negotiations.

On or about January 31 of this year the International Longshoremen's Association made application on behalf of the unions in the three St. Lawrence ports for the appointment of a conciliation officer to mediate their disputes. A series of meetings, upwards of 20 in number, took place between the bargaining representatives of the locals in the three ports and the shipping federation.

These meetings began in or about the early part of February and they continued well into the month of March. A long list of requests was presented by the longshoremen's association. Some counter proposals were submitted by the shipping federation. At these 20 odd meetings that were held in February and March several, though not all of these issues were discussed at some length, and I might say that the requests involved both monetary and non-monetary items.

About the end of March, following the breakdown of negotiations between the parties, the unions made application to me as Minister of Labour for conciliation services, and on April 4 I appointed a conciliator to mediate the matters in dispute. On April 15 the conciliation officer reported to me by telegram that there was considerable unrest in the port of Montreal, and that there was the likelihood of a wildcat strike. He recommended that a conciliation board be established immediately.

On the same day, April 15, I established a board as requested. The parties were notified by telegram of this fact and were asked to nominate their representative member to the board. Four days later a wildcat strike took place in the Port of Montreal, ostensibly over the automobile parking privileges granted the longshoremen at that port. In fairness, Mr. Speaker, I might say that there probably were other reasons such as the delay factor in making progress with the negotiations. In any event the wildcat strike did occur. I asked Mr. Poirier, the conciliation officer, to intervene to see what he could do to have the men return to work.

In the meantime, on April 20 the Shipping Federation nominated its member on the conciliation board. On April 25 the International Longshoremen's Association nominated its representative on the board. In the meantime partly through the good offices of the conciliation officer, the men had returned to work on April 21. On April 29, the two representative members were formally appointed as members of the board and they were asked to agree on the third member who would be chairman.

On May 10, some 12 days later, the representatives of the two parties, the longshoremen's association and the shipping federation, agreed upon Mr. Justice Claude Prevost as the third member and chairman. On that same day a second illegal or wildcat strike occured at the Port of Montreal. The shipping federation then took the position that the union members should call off the illegal strike as a condition precedent to the continuation of the conciliation proceedings.

Hon. members will recall that at that time I expressed concern over this situation and actually expressed disapproval of the action of the federation, since I thought it was important that the conciliation board should proceed with a minimum of delay. I think I should reiterate, because of the tense situation which developed, that just prior to establishment of this conciliation board with a conciliation officer on the job—he had been there about two weeks—a walkout or illegal strike had occurred and the men had returned to work on April 31, only to walk out again on May 10. I mention these walkouts because they added to the tension and helped create a very difficult atmosphere for any conciliation or mediation proceedings.

I am not saying where the fault lay; usually there is fault on both sides in cases of that kind. Whatever the reason, because of the attitudes of the parties the conciliation board was not able to deal with any of the issues in dispute. They heard no evidence of any kind, no representations, and so reported to me on May 17. On the following day, May 18, I appointed His Honour Judge Rene Lippé, chairman of the trustees of the Maritime Transportation Association, as a mediator in this dispute. I think as every member in this house knows Judge Lippé is an experienced and able administrator with a broad experience in labour-management disputes.

I appealed to both parties to get together with Judge Lippé with a view to working out a settlement of the issues. He held several meetings with the parties during the period May 18 to June 13 inclusive, During this period he submitted several interim reports to me, some of which I passed on to the house. His final report was submitted to me on June 23 and this report was tabled by my parliamentary secretary on July 4.

As pointed out in the mediator's report, in the final stages of negotiation the crucial issues in the dispute were the size of the wage increase, job security, calls and recalls on the one hand and increased productivity and related matters on the other. From meetings which took place in Ottawa during the later stages of negotiation, June 10, 11, 12 and 13, it was obvious to everyone who had given serious thought to the matter that it would be absolutely impossible to get the shipping federation to agree to the very substantial increases in wages for 1966 and 1967, and the other benefits requested by the union, without assurance to them that they might expect some increased productivity at least during the year 1967.

In the early stages of negotiation the shipping federation had admitted that they were prepared to forgo any increase during 1966, but they thought that if they were going to be asked for further substantial increases to take effect in 1967, there should be some assurance of increased productivity in return.

I think I can summarize the position of the shipping federation by saying they simply were not prepared to agree to any increases for the second year without some assurance of increased productivity during the latter part of the two year term. I might refer to one of the documents that was tabled by me on Friday last. It is headed Terms of Settlement for the Two-Year Collective Agreement between the International Longshoremen's locals in Montreal, Trois-Rivières, Quebec and The Shipping Federation of Canada. The first paragraph of the agreement reads:

1. Each employee will receive 40c. for every hour worked as of January 1, 1966, made up as follows:—

20c. increase per man-hour worked retroactive to January 1, 1966, and effective up to but not including the day work resumes; and

20c. per man-hour worked retroactive to January 1, 1966, effective up to but not including the day work resumes, in compensation for improvements in productivity.

From date of resumption of work the above increases shall be applied on overtime as well.

That is, there would be no increase on the overtime prior to the date of resumption of work. Paragraph 2. has a similar provision:

An additional 15c. per hour increase in wages to be effective January 1, 1967; and a further 25c. per hour increase in wages to be effective on May 1, 1967 also in compensation for improvements in productivity. These increases shall be applied on overtime as well.

• (9:30 p.m.)

In the interests of brevity, it might be well for me to refer to the report of the mediator, which hon. members have had the opportunity to peruse, since I filed it in this house a week ago. On page 2 the mediator reports as follows:

Basically, the request of the association was:

(A) A 50 cents hourly increase retroactive to January 1st 1966;

(B) A further hourly increase of 50 cents for the year 1967;

(C) No modification of the work load until at the earliest January 1st 1968.

In addition, there was presented by the association a long list of further requests which, for the purpose of brevity I will qualify as fringe benefits, although this expression is not perfect in this instance. These requests were both of a monetary and of a non-monetary nature.

On the other hand, the stand of the Federation was that they are engaged in a competitive business and that any labour contract must take into consideration the economics of the business. In that light, the Federation stated that they were not in a position to make an offer as to the hourly wages and other benefits unless and until the question of the work load has been determined. Reference was made at that time by the Federation to the contract entered into in Halifax between the I.L.A. Longshoremen local and the Federation.

It was easy to determine on that first day that the parties were really too far apart to reach an agreement. I, therefore, decided to meet with the parties separately in an effort to mediate the issues for the immediate future, leaving for further negotiations a long term contract which would expire in 1968, if not 1969.

These meetings of the commissioner with each of the parties took place daily until Saturady the 21st, inclusive, at which time I submitted to the parties the following recommendations:—

I will not go into the details of the next two and a half pages of the report, but I should like to say that the mediator submitted to both sides these recommendations since the shipping federation was prepared to agree to a substantial increase in 1966 but not to a further increase in 1967. He suggested that the unions accept the increase which he proposed for 1966 and that an industrial inquiry commission be set up immediately to look into the matter of uroductivity and related matters. The parties would then have the benefit of this report, and he felt that within a relatively short time, certainly before the end of the year, these matters could be subjects for a negotiated contract for 1967-68 or possibly 1967, 1968 and 1969.

The mediator, continuing with his report at page 5 said:

Owing to the urgence of the situation, it has been impossible for the undersigned to give proper consideration to the question of reduction of crews. However, because of the importance of this issue, the undersigned recommends as soon as possible the appointment by the Minister of Labour of the government of Canada of an industrial inquiry commission to study this problem.

Without criticizing the past conduct of either party, the undersigned, pursuant to discussions with said parties, is of the opinion that it would be desirable that negotiations relative to the next collective agreement be initiated immediately.

The industrial inquiry commission who will study the problem of reduction in crews could also deal with this problem of negotiations.

This passage refers to wages and fringe benefits accompanying reorganization and improvements. This proposal was submitted to the shipping federation and to the unions but the unions did not accept it. In fact, their officers did not recommend it and they gave as one of their reasons that they did not want the contract to expire on December 31, 1966 only to find themselves in the midst of another serious dispute in the year of our centennial.

The union leaders told me that out of respect for the mediator they did call a meeting and submitted the proposal. They did not recommend it, however, and it was turned down. That was the proposal for the interim settlement for the year 1966 only. I might say that this recommendation for an interim solution was accepted by the shipping federation.

This turn down took place on Tuesday, the 25th, at the mass meeting, and the association rejected the mediator's recommendation for a temporary settlement. On Wednesday, the 25th, the parties were requested by telegram to meet again with the mediator. This they did and on that occasion the President of the International Longshoremen's Union from New York, Mr. T. W. Gleason, came to Montreal and met with the mediator and the representatives of the union. There was a caucus held of the shipping federation members and they made a further offer which is set out at pages 7 and 8 of the mediator's report. I am not going to go into detail on it because it was not accepted.

On May 26 the unions made an offer which they referred to as their minimum proposals. There was some reduction in what they asked for. Instead of asking for 50 cents an hour in 1966 and another 50 cents an hour in 1967 they agreed to accept 40 cents an hour in 1966 and a further 40 cents an hour in 1967. These were the basic increases in the hourly rates, although there were fringe benefits and other items involved.

On May 27 that proposal was submitted to the shipping federation. On the following morning the shipping federation said it would not accept this proposal and again reiterated its stand with respect to a definite assurance that in the second year there had to be some assurance of increased productivity. At that time the mediator got in touch with me and presented one of his interim reports. He suggested that I invite representatives of both sides to Ottawa to discuss the basic provisions, and explore the possibility of settlement on the strength of an assurance that an industrial inquiry commission would be set up to inquire into the crucial issues. He indicated that such a course might lead to a settlement.

As I have already advised the house on an earlier occasion, in company with two of my colleagues, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau), and my deputy minister I met with the representatives of both parties here, and their legal advisers, in the later afternoon of May 27. Extended discussions took place. The memorandum used as a basis for such discussions contained the minimum demands put forward by the longshoremen on May 26.

On that occasion I suggested to the two parties that since it seemed that agreement was possible on most of the issues—I would say over 40 of the 50-odd issues that were involved—and agreement seemed almost certain on all but perhaps five or six of these items, they might agree to establish an independent commission and they could choose their own commissioner to inquire into the possibilities of increased productivity and related matters. I will not go into detail, but in the course of the discussion arguments were put forward that the average crew, or gang, strength in the port of Montreal is 18—I refer, of course, to a longshoremen's gang—but in Trois-Rivières it is 16, in Halifax it is 16, in Toronto it is 15 and on the west coast, in Vancouver and other ports, I am told that it is substantially less than that.

The longshoremen were concerned with job security and said it would have to be shown conclusively, or beyond a reasonable doubt, that they were not going to suffer through some whim on the part of the employers; it would have to be established. So my suggestion was that this inquiry commission could hear the evidence of both sides. The commissioner would be whom they would agree upon, or if they could not agree on one I, as Minister of Labour, after getting their advice would appoint one, that each side would have an assessor who would be there to assist the commissioner, and he could have as long as he felt necessary to inquire into the situation.

I might say that at this time, in the early morning of May 28, there was no suggestion of any legislative enactment to make the findings of the commission binding. The suggestion was that this be a voluntary arrangement between the two parties. Discussions lasted several hours and we adjourned in the wee, small hours of Saturday, May 28. The next morning the representative of the longshoremen got in touch with me and said, "I am not saying we will agree"—to the appointment of such a commission—"but there would be no point in our agreeing to it if the employers are not going to come along and meet what we refer to as the balance of our minimum terms". I said that I would speak to the employers, if he would discuss it with his people. This was on Saturday. We met the following day in Montreal. My colleague the Minister of Industry and my parliamentary secretary were with me. We had interesting, useful meetings. There is no doubt that there was a considerable narrowing of the issues, but the negotiations broke down again in the wee, small hours of Monday the 30th, this time largely on the issue of job security.

The international vice president of the longshoremen's association said that he was concerned with job security; he was not so much concerned with an inquiry. There might be an inquiry, there might not be; but he did not want the employers taking a position that was going to throw out of work bona fide longshoremen who had worked for an appreciable length of time. There were arguments about university students, taxi drivers and others who might not be bona fide longshoremen. In the course of the next day or two these points were straightened out by an exchange of wires; but when the mediator brought the parties together again in late May—or it might have been early June—the unions then stated that they could not go along with the proposal for a commission. They made their position clear; they said, "If the government wants to establish a commission, it can." Other alternatives were explored by the mediator and, as shown in his report, on about June 10 or 11 he got in touch with me again and suggested another meeting in Ottawa.

This time they came to Ottawa on Saturday, June 11. My colleagues the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who had an interest in this matter because of the harbour board docks in Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), who had had a broad experience in this field, the President of the Privy Council, my deputy minister and I met with the two sides.

The first meeting began in the middle of the morning. It was then said, according to the report—the mediator was there—that apparently a deadlock or an impasse had occurred. I then invited suggestions for a solution and made the statement that the issues could not stay deadlocked forever. Then I made the suggestion, which had actually originated with the mediator, that consideration might be given, if they could agree on every other point except increased productivity and job security, to refer those issues to the commissioner.

At the meeting on the morning of Saturday, June 11, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Jodoin, was present and in the course of the meeting not only I but my colleague the Minister of Transport—at least the two of us—said, "It looks as if there might be a solution if we were to establish a commission and agree that its findings might be made binding on these two points."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just "might be"?

Mr. Nicholson: Might be made binding. This was a proposal we were putting forward, that if they would agree that its findings might be binding, a solution might be found. The president of the Canadian Labour Congress said that the congress was opposed to compulsory arbitration. The spokesman for the longshoremen's association, their solictor or legal adviser, said that they were opposed—obviously there had been a change of heart in the intervening two weeks—to compulsory arbitration. He also said, "But if the government does set up a commission and the government is prepared to take the responsibility to make its findings binding, we will obey the law."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: That was not surprising, because he was a lawyer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who made that statement?

Mr. Nicholson: The lawyer for the longshoremen's association.

Mr. Grafftey: The plot thickens.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Cutler?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes; Mr. Cutler said, "If this is done, we will obey the law." I say that statement was made not only to me in response to a statement I made, but later to the Minister of Transport.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a very short question? I assume he is speaking about Mr. Cutler. In reply to a question by the minister as to what the association would do if such legislation were passed, Mr. Cutler said they would obey the law; is that what happened?

Mr. Nicholson: I think I mentioned earlier that both Mr. Pickersgill and I had invited the longshoremen to speak quite freely. I might say that the shipping federation was not there. We asked if the longshoremen had any suggestions to make. Naturally they would have liked a contract continuing through to January 1, 1968 with an extra 40 cents next year and without any commitments on a change in productivity. There is no doubt about that phase of it in the early stages. However, when we asked them to bring forward any suggestions they might have, and they were not forthcoming, there were two occasions at which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and I said that it had been suggested we establish the commission and that we might make only the findings on these issues binding. Both he and I asked them for their reaction at different times, to which they answered: If you take that responsibility; set up the commission and pass the legislation; we will obey the law.

Mr. Douglas: Did the minister take that as acquiescence to the proposal?

Mr. Nicholson: I will not say we took it as acquiescence at first, because the discussions continued for another 14 hours. There were further discussions in the afternoon during which there was no doubt as to their acquiescence to certain aspects of the proposal.

After the morning meeting we met again in the West Block, this time with simultaneous interpretation so that any of the longshoremen, who might not understand me, because my French is far from fluent, would know what I and others, said in the course of the discussions. I might say that the president of the Canadian Labour Congress said again that the congress was opposed to compulsory arbitration and that he wanted to make that fact clear.

The question was again asked, this time by Mr. Pickersgill, whether there was any other solution. We left the morning meeting at about 1.30 p.m. to meet with the shipping federation with whom we spent several hours in the afternoon. They insisted that an agreement be reached for the reorganization of longshoremen's gangs, new types of slings and other changes that might result in increased productivity. Eventually they did agree that if the government would take the responsibility for setting up the commission and agree to pass legislation, they would acquiesce in such a course and would agree to the second payment of 40 cents in 1967; 15 cents were paid on January 1 and 25 cents later in the year when the recommendations of the commission were implemented.

Other points were discussed at that meeting at which my colleagues and I, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of Transport, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau) and my deputy minister were present. We met later with the longshoremen and their legal adviser.

Mr. Starr: Was the parliamentary secretary with you then?

Mr. Nicholson: Not on that occasion. He was at the earlier meeting in Montreal. I am sure it would have been very helpful if he had been there.

Mr. Starr: He knows more about it than all the other ministers.

Mr. Nicholson: On the evening of Saturday, June 11 we spent several hours with the longshoremen discussing the matter. We explained to them that we had been able to convince the shipping federation that, if they could not agree, the sensible way to settle this matter was to refer it to the commission whose findings on these two or three points would be made binding by legislation. I wish to assure this house that there is not the slightest doubt that this point was made clear to every longshoreman present at that meeting, including their lawyer. We were questioned about it back and forth over a period of several hours.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister another question? Was Mr. Jodoin present at the meeting with the longshoremen's association the night of June 11?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Jodoin was present at the morning session between roughly 11 a.m. and 1.30 in the afternoon. He then left for Toronto and was not present at the meetings held in the afternoon, the evening and early morning of the next day, Sunday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question, as it is approaching ten o'clock? May I ask the minister on the basis of his long recital of the facts whether the house is to conclude that both sides, the shipping federation and the longshoremen representatives, agreed to compulsory arbitration?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker. As I said in answer to the right hon. gentleman a day or two ago, they avoided reference to compulsory arbitration, although Mr. Jodoin brought it up on one or two occasions. Other words were used, that there would be a hearing and that the findings on these two or three unsettled points would be made binding by legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Nicholson: It is a matter for judicial interpretation. I do not wish to argue with the right hon. gentleman. It may or may not be compulsory arbitration. It is a question of interpretation. In fairness to the longshoremen and their representatives I must say the longshoremen kept repeating that the government must take the responsibility for this, but they encouraged us to try to find a solution.

Mr. Grafftey: I wish you would.

Mr. Nicholson: When we came back and told the longshoremen that the employers were prepared—to use a colloquialism—to buy a pig in a poke and take their chances on the findings of a commission, I can assure you that several of them—I will not say all of them—expressed to me their sincere appreciation for what we had been able to do in that regard.

The negotiations continued for several hours and at one time we thought an agreement had been reached. We had actually prepared a press release which we thought could be used by both parties, but at the very last minute the negotiations broke down partly on the question of recalls.

The longshoremen get four hours for the first call-up and at least in the port of Montreal they get two for the first recall. They were asking for a four hour recall. At about four o'clock in the morning this point became of critical importance. It was impossible to resolve it and the negotiations broke off in the wee hours, at about 5.30 a.m.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the minister has only reached June 11 in his recount of the facts and I think the settlement date was much later, could we not call it ten o'clock and carry on the discussion tomorrow?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member know that the house has received a message that the Deputy to His Excellency will be expecting us very soon? Therefore in the circumstances we might continue with our business.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, before the minister continues may I ask him this. Is the press release which was made ready for both parties on the early morning, I suppose, of June 12 in existence somewhere and, if so, could we be let in on it?

Mr. Nicholson: I would hope so, Mr. Speaker; but since it was drafted after discussion with both parties, and it was never used I would not want to make the positive statement that it was used. However, I will look for it if it might be of any use. It was drafted over at the West Block at about five o'clock in the morning and we had been at it continuously since nine o'clock the previous morning. Comment has been made on the fact that I have only reached June 11, but actually I have covered the period from October 1965 to June 11. The settlement was reached on June 14, so we have about three days left.

We broke up at 5.30 a.m., all of us tired and disappointed. And no one was more disappointed than the minister—unless it was the longshoremen, who had hoped that there was going to be a settlement reached, based on what the federation had agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

(d) It is desirable to co-ordinate among the provinces the concepts and criteria of need applied in administering federal assistance in this field.

2. Both the costs of education and the resources available to the student should be taken into account in developing the concepts of need.

APPENDIX "B"

COMMUNIQUÉ AND DOCUMENTS ISSUED FOLLOWING CANADA-COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN CONFERENCE

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

During the past three days substantial progress has been made on the process of closer consultation and cooperation among the Commonwealth countries of the western Hemisphere. This development holds great promise for the future and will bring early practical benefits to all the participants. The Heads of Government participating in the present Conference are determined to continue and strengthen the fruitful collaboration among them which has been begun in Ottawa this week.

2. At the Conference Antigua, Bahamas, Barbados, Canada, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Trinidad and Tobago were represented by their Heads of Government and British Honduras by the Minister of Natural Resources and Trade. Britain was represented by an observer and by special invitation the University of the West Indies was also represented.

3. The Heads of Government took note that their Conference opened on the forty-first anniversary of the signature of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement.

4. The Conference welcomed the positive outcome of constitutional discussions for Barbados and the working out of special relationships between Britain and Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent.

Trade

5. A review of the special trade and economic relations among the Commonwealth Carribean-Canada group of countries was a central feature of the Conference. Ministers were unanimous in the great value they attach to maintaining and further strengthening the special trade ties between Canada and the Commonwealth countries of the Carribean. To this end, a special Protocol to the 1925 Trade Agreement has been approved by the Conference and signed by all participating countries. This Protocol provides for continuing close consultation and co-operation within the Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada group of countries.

Through the further strengthening of their trade and economic ties, this group of countries can best promote their own trading interests and the contribution they can make to the strengthening of international trade and economic relations throughout the world. The report of the Special Committee on Trade was unanimously adopted by the Conference and is attached.

6. It was agreed that a study of the question of a free trade area between the Commonwealth Caribbean and Canada might be made jointly by appropriate institutions to be designated by the Trade and Economic Committee.

Aid

7. The Heads of Government agreed that they shared an obligation in common to ensure the most effective use of the limited resources available in the Caribbean area and that an increased effort should be made to mobilize additional resources to accelerate the pace of economic development in the Commonwealth Caribbean area. The Canadian Government announced that it was Canada's intention to strengthen its aid efforts in the countries of the Commonwealth Caribbean, with which Canada had special links. These countries had demonstrated their ability to use available resources effectively to meet their urgent needs.

8. The Canadian Government indicated that its basic aid programme for the Commonwealth Caribbean countries will be generally made more flexible in its terms, and over each of the next five years will reach at least the level of the enlarged programme for the current fiscal year of a total of more than $65 million for the period. The proposals for special aid for the Universities of the West Indies and Guyana and for a Caribbean Broadcasting Service would raise the minimum figure to $75 million for the five-year period. With good and practicable projects the Commonwealth Caribbean part of the expanding Canadian aid programme for all purposes will rise substantially above that figure.

9. Reference was made to the problem of mobilizing in the area adequate financial resources to meet all of the local costs associated with economic development, and Canada indicated its willingness, in appropriate cases, to finance a portion of local costs of development projects.

10. Particular attention was devoted to the need for increased levels of assistance for the non-independent territories. In this connection, it was agreed that the report of the tripartite economic survey of Barbados, and the Leeward and Windward Islands, conducted by Britain, Canada and the United States, should be useful in promoting co-ordinated development efforts in the Caribbean and in mobilizing additional foreign resources to assist in fulfilling the potential for development in the dependent territories. The Conference agreed that further serious study of the report should be undertaken without delay and that meetings of those governments directly concerned might usefully be convened in the fall to consider the implications of the report and of the expected report on British Honduras for longer range co-ordinated aid efforts.

11. It was also agreed to study the possibility of establishing a financial institution for regional development which might be used as a method of financing projects of particular interest to the smaller areas, as well as projects which would benefit the region as a whole.

12. Special consideration was devoted to programmes of assistance to the University of the West Indies and the University of Guyana. Memoranda of Understanding on these programs were signed on July 8. The texts are attached as Annexes II and III.

Transport and Communications

13. The Heads of Government discussed matters relating to Transport and Communications both between Canada and the Caribbean and within the Caribbean area. The needs of the area for improved regional air services were reviewed and the technical cooperation of the Canadian authorities in meeting these needs was offered. Many of the governments represented the need for improvements of airport facilities and the Canadian Government agreed that these were matters which would be examined. The need for multilateral discussion with a view to the conclusion of air services agreements between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries was discussed and the desirability of consultation and the greatest degree of mutual cooperation in the negotiation of bilateral arrangements with other countries was stressed.

14. The restoration of direct shipping services between Canada and the Caribbean area was urged by several delegations and it was agreed by the Canadian authorities that this matter should be fully investigated in the light of its possible long term contribution to the promotion of trade. Reference was made to the international telecommunications network in being and in prospect. With regard to the operation of the telecommunication services within the islands, Canada would be pleased to provide technical training and advice within the context of the External Aid programme. The Canadian government offered to co-operate in working out and underwriting arrangements for first class air mail service at surface rates between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries to be established as soon as technical arrangements could be made.

Migration

15. In the discussion on migration the Heads of the Caribbean Governments took note of the fact that immigrants from the Commonwealth Caribbean were eligible for entry into Canada on as favourable a basis as immigrants from any other parts of the world and that migration from the area to Canada had increased in recent years. However, they emphasized the need for continued and expanded migration opportunities for their people. The Canadian Government announced that Canada was prepared to keep its door open to qualified immigrants from the Commonwealth Caribbean on a completely non-discriminatory basis. The experimental movement of seasonal farm labour to Canada from Jamaica during the current year was reviewed and Canada indicated that if the experiment proved successful and there was a continued need for outside labour in future years consideration would be given to broadening the program to include other Caribbean countries. Canada also announced a 100 percent increase in the special household service worker movement from the Caribbean to Canada, and the extension of the Canadian Immigration Assisted Passage Loan Scheme to immigrants from Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean.

16. The Government of Guyana explained that with accelerated development of Guyana's resources it would be possible for Guyana to absorb migrants from the Caribbean countries, and announced its willingness to make available immediately for settlement by Guyanese and other West Indians selected areas of known potential. The Heads of Government agreed that the machinery established for the continuation of joint action on matters discussed at the Conference should examine these plans as early as possible.

Other Economic Questions

17. The Heads of Government considered ways of promoting private investment in the Commonwealth Caribbean. They noted that there were no restrictions on the flow of Canadian private capital to the area but expressed concern at the effect which the absence of double taxation agreements could have on that flow. In the context of the relations between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries, the Canadian government indicated its readiness to enter into discussions leading to agreements with interested Commonwealth countries in the area to avoid double taxation.

18. They also discussed possibilities for developing the tourist industry in the Caribbean and as part of the process, as indicated in the report of the Trade Committee, the Canadian Government undertook to give consideration to the suggestion that enlarged duty-free exemptions be allowed to Canadians entering from Commonwealth Caribbean countries.

International Questions of Common Interest

19. The Commonwealth countries in the Western Hemisphere emphasized the great value they attach to their relations with the United States and the many countries in Latin America which make up the membership of the Organization of American States. Those participants in the Conference whose countries would be eligible for membership in that Organization indicated their intention either to carry out a joint study of the question or to give one another the benefit of national studies which were being made. They also expect to consult together on this question in the months ahead.

20. There was a thorough discussion of the implications of the continuing situation in Rhodesia. The Heads of Government noted that unless there was an early solution of this grave issue the future of the Commonwealth as a multi-racial association would clearly be endangered. They expressed the hope that such an early solution will be announced by the British Government at the forthcoming meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

21. The Conference endorsed the resolution adopted by the Commonwealth Caribbean Heads of Government at their recent meeting in Barbados affirming their fullest support for the self-determination of British Honduras in accordance with the wishes of the people of the country.

Cultural Relations

22. The Conference recognized the desirability of further strengthening the cultural ties between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean. It was decided to establish appropriate machinery for strengthening such ties with a view to giving the Canadian public the opportunity of seeing in their own country the expression by West Indian artists of indigenous Caribbean art forms such as the dance and the steelband and to making the West Indian public familiar with Canadian artistic achievements particularly in the field of the performing arts. The Government of Canada also indicated its willingness to assist with the establishment of broadcasting facilities serving the entire region of the Commonwealth Caribbean and consultations will now take place among the broadcasting authorities of the participating governments.

Methods of Following Up The Canada-Caribbean Talks

23. In keeping with the intention of Heads of Government that the consultations instituted at this Conference should be continued, it was agreed that a meeting of the governments represented should be held, at a date to be fixed and at an agreed venue in the West Indies, for a general discussion of Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada relationships and to review progress. In the meantime to ensure that effective follow-up action is taken on the matters discussed at this Conference it was agreed that, in addition to normal bilateral consultations, the High Commissioners of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries in Ottawa should consult jointly with Canadian officials regarding the timing and location of the first meeting of the Trade and Economic Committee and the form of other consultative arrangements for the future.

REPORT BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE TRADE COMMITTEE

The Trade Committee established by the Conference on July 6 has held three sessions.

2. We reviewed a range of trade and commodity problems in the light of the Trade Agreement of 1925 and of developments since then, including the prospects for the Kennedy Round of Tariff negotiations.

3. The Committee agreed that the 1925 Agreement continued to provide a valuable basis for our trade relations. In some respects, however, there is need to adapt the Agreement to current circumstances and requirements. The discussion of trade and commodity problems covered a number of issues of concern to participating countries, including problems relating to the trade in rum, rice, sugar, bananas, citrus and other fruits, vegetables and spices, wheat, salted fish and manufactured goods.

4. The Commonwealth Caribbean countries expressed particular concern about possible damage to their trade over any loss of their present preferential position in the Canadian market and the importance, particularly for the smaller territories, of improved shipping facilities for the development of their exports to Canada.

5. Considerable attention was given to the problems faced by the Commonwealth Caribbean sugar producers in their sales of sugar to Canada. Canadian representatives offered, subject to the necessary international waivers, to extend to Commonwealth Caribbean countries and territories collectively a tariff-free quota for raw sugar, the quantity being equal to the average volume of Commonwealth Caribbean sales to Canada over the past five years. This was intended to provide an opportunity for them to maintain their traditional sales to the Canadian market and enhance the return to their producers. In addition, the Canadian representative indicated their willingness to work towards an effective International Sugar Agreement with a price range that would yield a fair return to producers and would be equitable to consumers.

The Canadian representatives indicated their expectation that the price benefits of the elimination of the need to pay the BP Tariff rate of .29¢ a cwt would accrue to Commonwealth Caribbean suppliers. It is not the intention of the Canadian authorities to allocate the tariff-free quota between Commonwealth Caribbean suppliers. Any arrangements in this regard would be for the Commonwealth Caribbean suppliers to work out among themselves.

6. A number of Commonwealth Caribbean countries emphasized their difficulties in developing their exports of bananas to the Canadian market. Several countries are heavily dependent on bananas for their employment and export earnings. The special importance of shipping facilities was underlined in developing this trade. It was agreed to conduct a joint study of this important item at an early date.

7. Representatives of several Commonwealth Caribbean countries referred to problems relating to the valuation for duty of their exports of manufactured goods to Canada. It appeared that their concerns might in part be met by use of the new Section 37A of the Canadian Customs Act. This was intended to deal with inadvertent discrimination in Canadian customs law in connection with imports from countries with compact domestic markets in which goods are normally sold in small quantities or direct to the retail level.

8. Several members of the Committee referred to difficulties they had encountered in exporting rum to Canada, specifically problems involving labelling, the content provisions of the Canadian Excise Act, advertising restrictions, provincial listing and mark-up practices and the tariff treatment of normal rum containers. The Canadian representatives undertook to consider amending the labelling requirements and to use their good offices with the Provincial authorities respecting these matters for which they have responsibility.

9. Several members of the Committee referred to the difficulties involved in the Canadian requirement that, in order to receive preferential treatment, goods must be shipped direct to the Canadian port from a Commonwealth country. Canadian representatives indicated the Canadian Government's willingness to waive Article VII of the 1925 Agreement on this point.

10. In the context of the development of tourism, several Committee members asked whether consideration might be given to enlarged duty-free exemptions for Canadians returning from Commonwealth Caribbean countries. The Canadian representatives undertook to give consideration to this suggestion.

11. The Canadian representatives referred to their concern about instances where certain Canadian producers and manufacturers were being excluded or restricted in their access to traditional markets and expressed their desire to avoid damage to these established trading interests. Particular reference was made to Canadian exports of salted fish and wheat flour. The Commonwealth Caribbean countries concerned indicated their intention to ensure a fair opportunity for Canadian trade in their markets.

12. The Committee recognized that it was not possible in the short time available to resolve all outstanding problems. It agreed that it is highly desirable to maintain close consultations on trade and economic matters and decided to this end to recommend that, in addition to present facilities for consultation on a bilateral basis, a Standing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs should be established to meet from time to time at Ministerial or official level as may be appropriate.

13. The Committee considered a draft protocol to give effect to the conclusions reached. The proposed text of a protocol is attached and is recommended by the Committee for approval by the Conference and for signature. The text of the Canadian Government Proposal on Sugar is also attached.

14. The Committee expressed its dissatisfaction with the offer on tropical products recently tabled by the European Economic Community in connection with the Kennedy Round trade negotiations in Genera. They also took note of the suggestion that the Caribbean Commonwealth country interests in the lowering of the EEC tariffs on rum and alumina be kept in mind by Canada in its negotiations with the Community.

15. The discussions in the Trade Committee were carried out in a most friendly and constructive atmosphere.

CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT PROTOCOL

Recognizing the important changes which have taken place in their trade and commercial relations since the negotiation of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement of 1925;

Recognizing the desirability of close co-operation and collaboration in the development of their respective economies in order to facilitate the most efficient utilization of resources and the maximum development of mutually advantageous trade;

Taking into account the urgent economic development needs of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries and the key importance of trade to the raising of their standards of living and the progressive development of their economies;

Taking into account the common interest of the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean and Canada in ensuring a fair and remunerative return at stable prices for exports of primary products of particular interest to them and the urgent need of these countries to diversify their exports:

Antigua, the Bahamas, Barbados, British Honduras, Canada, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica, Montserrat, Saint Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago agree as follows:

1. To examine the 1925 Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement in detail with a view to its further amendment or re-negotiation in the light of the results of the Kennedy Round of trade negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;

2. To continue the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement of 1925 in force, ad interim, subject to the following:

(i) to the extent that it may be necessary in order to avoid conflict between the provisions of the Agreement and the provisions of the GATT, the obligations of the Agreement, after consultation, may be waived.

(ii) Canada will consult with the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean before concluding any agreement in the Kennedy Round which would have the effect of reducing margins of preference bound under the Agreement and to take such reductions into account in any renegotiation of the Agreement.

(iii) The direct shipment requirements of Article VII are waived.

(iv) Part II of the Agreement relating to steamship services is recognized as being no longer in effect.

3. To consult upon request with respect to measures to encourage economic development which might substantially affect the trading interests of the other parties, with a view to avoiding possible damage to those trading interests and to achieving the best use of resources, taking into account the scope for regional co-operation.

4. To consult and co-operate on tourism and in establishing or improving transportation, communications and other facilities designed to promote mutually beneficial trade and other exchanges.

5. To work together in international commodity discussions and arrangements, and particularly to seek to secure and maintain an appropriate and effective price range under a new International Sugar Agreement which will be remunerative to producers and equitable to consumers.

6. To endeavour to revive the banana trade and to bring about increased sales of bananas to Canada from the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean.

7. To seek to secure acceptable conditions of access for wheat in world markets in order to bring about increased trade at prices which will be remunerative to efficient producers and fair to consumers, taking into account world food needs.

8. The Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean undertake in the development of local flour mills to provide fair and equal opportunities for the Canadian industry to participate in their development and for Canada to have a fair and equal opportunity to supply the wheat requirements of such new mills.

9. The Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean undertake to ensure that Canadian exporters of salted cod are given a fair and equal opportunity to supply the market requirements at prices which will be remunerative to efficient producers and fair to consumers.

10. To accord fair and equitable treatment to individuals and enterprises of the other parties.

11. Canada undertakes to require that the origin and Canadian content of any rum marketed in Canada be clearly marked and to use its good offices with the provincial authorities to facilitate the marketing of rum from the Commonwealth Caribbean countries.

12. In pursuance of the foregoing to establish a Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada Trade and Economic Committee to consult on trade, financial and related matters, which shall meet from time to time at ministerial or senior official level as may be appropriate.

In respect of those territories for which the United Kingdom Government has a responsibility in these matters, this Protocol is being signed with the authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

ANNEX II

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL ON SUGAR

The Canadian Government proposal regarding raw sugar imports from the Commonwealth Caribbean countries and territories is to provide on a unilateral basis duty free entry for a quantity of raw sugar equal to the average of such imports for the last five years.

This would mean the abolition for such countries and territories only of the present British Preferential Tariff rate of approximately 29¢ a cwt. Any allocation of this tariff quota would be a matter for the Commonwealth Caribbean Governments.

This tariff quota would, of course, be a new tariff preference and could not therefore be implemented before a waiver was obtained from the no-new preference provisions of the GATT. Releases would also be required from the Australian, South African and United Kingdom Governments with whom Canada has trade agreements involving obligations concerning the Canadian Tariff on raw sugar. The Canadian Government will be prepared to use its best endeavours with the Canadian sugar refiners to ensure that the amount of the tariff free quota is in fact taken up each year and that the full benefit of the additional margin of preference is received by the West Indian producers.

Mr. Grégoire: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

CANADIAN CORPORATION FOR WORLD EXHIBITION

AMENDMENT INCREASING PROTECTION FOR SYMBOLS, INSIGNIA, ETC.

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-42 (from the Senate), to amend the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED U.S. OBJECTION TO CANADA-RUSSIA AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there is any basis for press reports to the effect that President Johnson, or someone on his behalf, raised strong objections to Canada signing an air agreement with the Soviet union or Soviet government. When were those representations made, and were any of them in writing?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canada-U.S.S.R. air agreement, copies of which were tabled in the house yesterday afternoon, provides for air service between Moscow and Montreal only. It is expected that both Air Canada and Aeroflot will fly one round trip per week between these two cities, but there is no question in the agreement of an extension to other points.

So far as I am aware the United States is not opposed to this agreement. Indeed, hon. members may recall that in 1961 the United States negotiated a somewhat similar agreement with the Soviet union, although this has not yet been brought into effect.

In any event, the agreement signed yesterday by the Canadian government is based on decisions taken by the Canadian government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question I asked was whether objections had been raised by President Johnson or someone on his behalf, and it requires just a simple answer. If such did not take place then surely a negative answer would be the answer, rather than a generality.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have not used generalities in my response. I have given a pretty detailed reply to most of what my right hon. friend asked—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Most of it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but since my right hon. friend reminds that he had another aspect to his question I might as well address myself to that.

As my right hon. friend knows, it is not normal to confirm or deny whether exchanges of communications between heads of government have taken place on any particular subject. Such communications are privileged. Of course there has been an opportunity not only for the United States but for other countries to express their views, but I would repeat that the agreement signed yesterday, so far as I am concerned and so far as I know, is not opposed by the United States. I also added that in any event the decision taken was a decision taken by the government of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there was not any objection, wherein did the courage consist?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In replying to my right hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REPORTED BOMBINGS BY U.S. AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports from Saigon to the effect that for several months the United States air force has been bombing targets in Laos to the extent of some 100 strikes a day, I should like to ask the minister whether he is in possession of this information; and was he ever given the information by the United States government or by the Canadian representatives on the international control commission?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will recall that some weeks ago this question was asked and I indicated that the commission had received a complaint about these alleged bombings in Laos and that the commission, which of course includes a Canadian representative, depends upon those who made the complaint to facilitate the commission's examination of the allegations. Such permission has not yet been granted.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will any representations be made either to the government of Laos or the United States government for permission to investigate these charges?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The permission in this case in practical terms would not necessarily be given entirely by the royal government of Laos but also by those forces in Laos opposed militarily to the royal government. It is to these forces that a request by the Laos government to make an investigation must be made. The royal government of Laos does not fully control the whole territory of Laos.

Mr. Douglas: I have another supplementary question. With reference to the United States airports in Laos and in Thailand from which some of this bombing is going on, has any request been made of the government controlling these areas with regard to an investigation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There have been communications quite recently—I am not familiar with the details—addressed by the commission along the lines of those referred to by my hon. friend.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

FINANCE

DISCLOSURE OF INTEREST RATES ON SMALL LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can the minister advise the house whether he has received any representations to the effect that legislation should be passed in this house to lower the interest rates charged by small loans companies and whether he intends to have such new legislation passed this year?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall having recently received any such representations on this subject, although it is a matter of continuing interest to Canadians generally. It is my intention, as I said when speaking to the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill to amend the Bank Act, to convene a federal-provincial conference this year to discuss consumer credit, which of course will include interest and the revelation of true interest charges.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT NO CHANGE BE MADE IN NAVAL UNIFORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The men in the highland regiments of our armed forces are delighted to know that the minister intends to retain the kilt. In view of the interest in our seagirt provinces, would the minister give a similar assurance that the uniforms now worn by the officers and men of Her Majesty's Royal Canadian Navy and reserve will not be changed in design, pattern or colour?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I allowed the hon. member's question yesterday, but I think perhaps this one should not be asked at this time. It might be placed on the order paper or discussed at ten o'clock this evening.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order; I believe the morale of our armed forces depends on many things, not the least of which is an adherence to tradition which builds esprit de corps among the men.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the morale of the armed forces will hold up until this evening at ten o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD ADMISSION OF MAINLAND CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's answer yesterday to the member for Oxford I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government set up a special body of officials to advise on a course of action relating to the seating of communist China at the next session of the United Nations and, if so, will the government make its attitude known before the session begins? I think it is important that this question be asked at this particular time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes.

Mr. Grafftey: May I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs mean yes, a body has been set up, and yes, the government will make its decision known before the session begins?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So that my hon. friend's important question will receive the treatment it deserves, when I said "yes" I meant that we are studying this and we have employed the technique for our departmental study that my hon. friend mentioned in his question.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell us the day or the order of business under which he will make his promised statement to the house regarding old age pensions?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure of the day, but at the moment I think the most appropriate time to make it would be on motions.

Mr. Knowles: Is it still true that it will be on a day during this part of the session?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry in relation to the question I asked yesterday. Has the minister anything to report to the house today in regard to the cancellation of contracts with the Canadian government or Canadian companies by the United States government? I have in my hand a quotation from a statement by the secretary of defence regarding such contracts.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman would read the quotation he has in his hand.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would prefer the hon. member not to read the quotation.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot get away with that sort of business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question and I think the question in itself is complete. It is now up to the minister to either reply or refuse to answer.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I wish to pose another question for the minister. Have any export permits for the sale of aerial bombs been approved by the government?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, no export permits for the sale of aerial bombs have been approved by the government of Canada.

Mr. Winkler: I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister whether any applications for the sale of bombs have been received by the government.

Mr. Drury: Although this is not my responsibility as minister, to the best of my knowledge no applications for export permits for the sale of aerial bombs have been received.

Mr. Winkler: Whose responsibility is it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether it is a fact that as a result of production decreases and rising costs an aircraft parts contract for Canada in the amount of $62.8 million has been lost. I refer to a contract under which De Havilland of Canada undertook to supply wing and stabilizer units for the new DC-9. Can the minister say whether in fact this contract has been lost to Canada, and whether the government has an alternative means of making up the consequent economic effects of this very large reduction?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to attempt to ascertain the facts of this situation. I am not aware that a large contract of this kind has been cancelled.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question based on a statement made by the secretary of defence for the United States. He said:

—I recall one contract with a Canadian concern for bomb production which will be cancelled as a result of this cutback.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Winkler: I wish to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any applications in any form have been received by the Canadian government for the sale of aerial bombs to the United States.

Mr. Drury: The question is sufficiently urgent, Mr. Speaker, to warrant a very thorough and profound inquiry. I will have this made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAINLAND CHINA—REPORTED BAN ON TOURISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in view of a story in this morning's paper that mainland China has apparently applied a ban on tourists. In view of the fact that a group of Canadian high school teachers, and maybe others, are now in Hong Kong awaiting admission to China on previously obtained visas, would the minister make inquiries and take steps to get the Chinese government to agree that such groups should be admitted despite the present ban?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have very serious doubts that this is the type of question that can be asked during this period of our daily procedures. The hon. member has made a point and has brought a situation to the attention of the minister, and I assume that the matter will be taken into consideration, but I suggest to the hon. member that it should not be raised as a question at this time.

Mr. Lewis: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, and just to make it clear, the reason for the question having been asked is that the group I referred to is now in Hong Kong awaiting admission in the next day or two, and stands to lose a very substantial sum of money which has been paid into the Bank of Peking for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the problem and difficulty pointed out by the hon. member cannot necessarily be solved by the question being asked at this time.

INDUSTRY

INSTRUCTIONS FROM U.S. RESPECTING FLOUR FOR CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether he is aware that the three American owned flour mills in Canada, Robin Hood, Quaker and Pillsbury, have received letters from Washington forbidding them to mill Canadian wheat in Canada for sale to Cuba; and does the minister consider this action to be in keeping with the principles of good corporate citizenship expected of firms operating in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not so urgent that it should be asked just now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of order. The question that was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South is one of great consequence, as to whether the United States of America is asserting extraterritoriality over Canadian corporations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They tried that when I was prime minister, and I want to find out where the courage is now on the part of this government to face this situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair does not deny that the matter is one of great importance from the Canadian standpoint; but I did not think, and still do not think, it is a question that can be asked at this time because it is of such a general nature. If the hon. member feels aggrieved and thinks it is very urgent the House of Commons, itself, has provided an alternative; it allows hon. members who feel they have a matter of urgency to raise to take the question up at the adjournment debate. The course is open to the hon. member for Winnipeg South to do that this very evening at ten o'clock, at which time he can ask the question and there can be an answer.

I have pointed out before, and do so again, that it is very easy for the Chair to make a mistake on this kind of question. The decision has to be made on the spur of the moment, and certainly mistakes can be made. But it is to guard against such mistakes that an escape valve has been supplied through provision for discussion later in the day. Therefore if the hon. member for Winnipeg South feels he has a matter of extreme national urgency he can discuss it in just a few hours' time in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise again to ask a question arising out of the question that was asked previously. I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it has come to his notice that the United States administration is today endeavouring to dictate to Canadian corporations, even though they have been capitalized by the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition is obviously asking the same question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. gentleman says no. I am here as the servant of the house, and if there is a general feeling that a question which has been ruled out of order as not being of extreme urgency should be recognized and answered, then certainly I am quite willing to swallow my pride and allow the question.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As we are nearing the end of the session, Mr. Speaker, may I take the responsibility of suggesting, as this question has been asked by the right hon. gentleman as well as by other hon. members, and without in any way suggesting that Your Honour's decision is wrong, that perhaps you would want the government to clearly indicate that if there is any extra-territorial application in this matter, then of course the government will take the strongest action in the national interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on the point of order which has been raised.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point of order. The question has been asked and answered. I will certainly allow supplementary questions, and I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg South wishes to ask a supplementary question now.

Mr. Sherman: I was merely going to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I asked in my question whether the minister was aware of the situation. However, I respect the Chair's ruling, and I will ask for permission to debate the question at ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: We will have our cake and eat it.

Mr. Douglas: May I rise on a supplementary question and ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it has come to the attention of the government that any of the three milling companies mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South had been instructed by the U.S. government that they are not to mill flour to fill the U.S.S.R. contract?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This has not been brought to my attention. The Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce informs me he has already asked that this matter be examined, which I will also request when I leave this chamber.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. LONGSHOREMEN—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TELEGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour which perhaps his parliamentary secretary would be prepared to deal with in the minister's absence. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he will table in the house a copy of a telegram to the longshoremen in British Columbia, on the strength of which it is reported that the longshoremen who were in jail have paid their fines and been released.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I will bring the matter to the attention of the minister, Mr. Speaker, who will be back here within an hour.

FISHERIES

BAY OF FUNDY—AMENDMENT OF SEINING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Since I began this session with a question on fisheries I might end it with one.

Can the minister inform the house whether there are any changes to be announced in the fishing regulations pertaining to seiners on the Bay of Fundy between the New Brunswick coast and the Nova Scotia coast? Several questions relating to this subject have been asked by myself and other hon. members during this session. The urgency of the matter lies in the fact that the house may not be sitting when the next season starts and the discrimination might continue.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the last few days I have signed a recommendation to the governor in council suggesting changes in the existing regulations. The closing date will be advanced from November 15 to, I believe, September 30. Furthermore, I have also amended the regulations in order to protect the weir operators on the Nova Scotia side by not allowing seiners to operate within one mile of set weirs.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—RESOLUTION OF CANADIAN UN ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On July 7 I asked the Prime Minister whether he or the hon. gentleman opposite had received a resolution from the United Nations Association of Canada supporting the recommendations of U Thant made on June 20, 1966 regarding the war in Viet Nam. At that time the Prime Minister said he could not recall it but would look into the matter together with the hon. gentleman opposite and give us an answer in a few days. I wonder whether the minister is prepared to answer this question now.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I apologize for not having responded as quickly as we indicated we would. I will look into the matter right away.

AIRPORTS

BRANDON, MAN.—COMPLETION OF TERMINAL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio, notice of which I have given to him. Can the minister indicate whether final clearance will be given for the new terminal at Brandon in time for summer construction?

Hon. John N. Turner (Member of the Administration): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. May I say in answer that discussions with officials from the city of Brandon are still continuing, and it might be a little difficult to have the terminal opened this summer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF AIR BASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I try my luck with the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether he is planning to shift the Canadian air bases from France to other places in Europe, or will he reduce Canada's financial obligation by closing those bases and not reopening them elsewhere?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): As soon as the government's decision is made on this matter, Mr. Speaker, it will be announced in the normal way.

Mr. Churchill: The minister said that several days ago. May I ask whether he has resolved his differences with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who wants to maintain Canada's heavy expenditure in Europe although this appears to be unnecessary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member with respect that his question is argumentative.

Mr. Hellyer: May I just assure my hon. friend that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: There is a difference of opinion there, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the minister of external affairs insisting on the retention of two extra Canadian air bases in Europe when they have to be moved from France, and does he realize that this is perhaps an unnecessary expenditure under the circumstances?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has been reading the same article that I myself saw yesterday in the Globe and Mail. Of course my hon. friend knows that government policy is not disclosed until it has been formulated.

Mr. Churchill: When will the government's policy be formulated; because the movement of these air bases has to be made very soon?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend's question gives me an opportunity to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg South that no such resolution has been received either in the Prime Minister's office or in mine.

INDUSTRY

SAINT JOHN-HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION IN AREA INCENTIVE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to address my question to the Minister of Industry concerning the recent appeal for proposals from New Brunswick to the Atlantic Development Board. Will the minister refer the matter of the exclusion of Saint John and Halifax from the incentive program to the board, which action would be under the minister's jurisdiction and which has been intimated by the government for some time?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): A number of premises are postulated in that question with which I cannot agree.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Since the minister has lost his only two supporters in New Brunswick for his proposal, the premier of that province and the mayor of Saint John, will he act on it this summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry. The area development incentive program has stimulated tremendous interest in the establishment of fish processing firms in Nova Scotia which may well be essential to the full development of the potential of that industry. In view of this fact will the minister indicate whether there is any truth in the rumour that the federal government is considering the complete elimination of the incentive program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is on general policy, and cannot be asked at this time.

TRADE

DEBATE ON PROTOCOL TO CARIBBEAN CONFERENCE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): My question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. Because of protests over the shipping provisions of the Canada-Commonwealth Caribbean conference agreement, when can we expect a debate on the protocol in this house?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I will give consideration to that matter and answer the hon. gentleman later.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CAMBRIDGE BAY—INQUIRY AS TO SCHOOL-HOSTEL COMPLEX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, but in his absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary could take the question as notice. Have tenders been issued for a $5 million school-hostel complex at Cambridge Bay? If so, how does this square with the policy of having smaller school units to avoid the disruption of families, which has been causing such serious social problems in the north?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Dinsdale: With deference, Mr. Speaker, the house is expecting to adjourn shortly, and I hardly think there would be an opportunity for a reply to a question placed on the order paper. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary could take the question as notice and have a reply at a later time.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I shall be pleased to take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister upon his arrival in Ottawa tonight.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF CUT-OFF DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Is the minister now in a position to tell us whether he has considered the possibility of extending the July 25 deadline with regard to the application of the special regulations he announced on Friday, July 8?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since yesterday I have received many representations asking me to extend the deadline set in the statement I made in the house concerning immigrant visitors. I am ready to consider the requests submitted, and within a few days I may be in a position to indicate whether we shall extend or maintain this deadline.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALBERNI, B.C.—REQUEST FOR SALE OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether, since the federal government has sold Sunnybrook hospital to the University of Toronto for one dollar, the government will consider taking like action and selling much less valuable former national defence property in Alberni for a like amount.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper perhaps in a more clear way.

Mr. Barnett: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SPENCE ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Can he inform the house if he has any knowledge as to whether the report of the Spence commission is ready for publication?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I really do not know; I shall have to make inquiries.

Mr. Winkler: I wonder if the minister could tell us whether we might expect it next week.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I really do not know.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—BASIS OF PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops asked me if I would reply to starred question No. 1,710, which reads as follows:

> Is it the intention of the government to pay to provinces which decline to accept the federal medicare plan, the fiscal equivalent of the payments thus forgone from the federal treasury on the same basis as the arrangement generally known as "opting out" approved in negotiations with the province of Quebec in recent years?

In reply to the question I wish to state there is no provision for federal contributions to provinces which do not have medical care plans which conform to the four criteria.

In regard to the hon. member's reference to "opting out arrangements", I should note that these apply only in respect of shared cost programs where an agreement between the two governments exists. The medical care legislation will not require agreements between the federal and provincial governments; it will simply authorize payments from the consolidated revenue fund to any province which has a medical care plan as described in the federal legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the meaning of the minister's statement. If the province of Quebec should decide to set up its own medicare plan, can the minister tell whether it will be entitled at the same time to a financial compensation, as in the case of other joint programs of which it chose to opt out?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: This is not contemplated in the proposal made by the federal government, which has been well known for some months.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell us whether he intends to look also into this proposal and to see to it that a financial compensation is granted to the province as in other fields?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is no opting out arrangement contemplated under this proposal. It is rather a question of opting in on the part of the provinces for federal contributions toward plans which meet the four criteria.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the fact that many farmers on the prairies have a great deal of wheat in their granaries. Will the minister report now as to whether, between now and July 30, there will be an increase in quotas so that farm storage may be reduced to the greatest possible extent? I am sure the minister is now in a position to answer this question, because the other day he stated he had been in communication with the wheat board.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I was in communication with the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and he told me that the objective of the Canadian Wheat Board is a general quota of ten bushels per acre, which he hoped would be in force at all points. If in fact there were a few points which were not on the ten bushel quota, they would be very few indeed. It will be the policy of the Canadian Wheat Board to facilitate the movement of Canadian wheat, and whatever measures are necessary to attain that end will be followed. I say this because it may be necessary in the coming crop year to vary policies that have been followed in the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to thank the minister for that statement. In view of the fact that we are approaching the end of this portion of the session, and all western farmers naturally are most interested in this subject, can the minister give the house and the country a general idea of some of the changes that will be necessary, as he envisages the situation now, to permit the filling of the very large contracts for wheat that have been undertaken?

Mr. Sharp: I doubt whether it would be possible to do this before the house adjourns. I can only repeat that the wheat board is now considering the changed situation that has arisen out of the fact that there is, for as far ahead as we can see, a very strong demand for Canadian wheat. It will be most important that wheat always be available to meet this demand, so the wheat board would not want to permit a quota system, which was introduced under very different circumstances, to interfere with the fulfilment of these contracts.

I should like to go further at this time, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think it will be possible. However, I am sure the Canadian Wheat Board, whether or not parliament is in session, will give as much information as possible to the farmers of western Canada for their guidance.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question regarding the minister's statement that there may be some delivery points that will not reach the ten bushel quota. Will the wheat board give any consideration to taking this into account in setting the quota for those delivery points in the next crop year, if they were not able to reach the ten bushel quota this year?

Mr. Sharp: This subject is invariably considered by the board at the end of every crop year during which there has been any suggestion of unfairness in quotas. The decision has always been not to cause overlapping between two crop years. Therefore I have to answer the question in this way, that the wheat board would not take a shortfall in quotas in this crop year into account in fixing quotas for the coming crop year. This has never been done, and I doubt very much whether it would be done this year. However, circumstances are changing so rapidly in the demand and supply situation for wheat that I suggest to the hon. gentleman he should wait until we see what conditions are like at the opening of the crop year, when his question may be quite irrelevant.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister whether the wheat board would give consideration to giving those points that did not reach the ten bushel quota a higher priority for the coming year, if it is not prepared to give them compensation in the form of a higher delivery quota.

Mr. Sharp: The Canadian Wheat Board of course makes the decisions in these matters and will, I am sure, take into account the views of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, when I asked a question similar to that now asked, you ruled that it was hypothetical. If it was hypothetical when I asked it, should it not be hypothetical when some other member asks it?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question has become more urgent since yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Now that the minister has gone as far as he has, would the house be right in coming to the conclusion that the tremendous demand for wheat will mean that the quota system is going to be set aside?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think I should like to go that far, Mr. Speaker. Some changes in the administration of the quota system may be required.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has now expired.

[Mr. Sharp.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege for me to sponsor this resolution and to begin debate on a program which, if approved, will enable the government of Canada to provide financial support to provincially administered medical care plans.

I would point out that this program is the fourth major step in the health insurance plan initiated some years ago by my colleague who now holds the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other three are the health grants program, hospital insurance, and the establishment of the health resources fund.

In 1948, when the health grants were being discussed in this house, the then prime minister described them as being fundamental prerequisites of a nation-wide system of health insurance. The second phase, which was also piloted by my colleague now the Secretary of State for External Affairs through the legislative procedures in the spring of 1957, culminated in the hospital insurance program which provides benefits to virtually the whole population of our country. Members, of course will be familiar with the health resources fund, which was only recently approved by this parliament.

I am proud, Mr. Chairman, to be the pilot of this new measure, which will extend the benefits now available beyond the doors of the hospital, ensuring the availability of physicians' services whether these be provided in the doctor's office or in the patient's home. As hon. members know, the federal government has for some years been examining ways and means of ensuring that the opportunity for good health which is now viewed in western democracies as a right possessed by all should be available to every citizen of our country.

This effort springs not only from a deepening of our humanitarian concern for our fellow citizens, but from a realization that we cannot afford the social and economic consequences of our failure to do so. In an industrial country such as ours we cannot afford the loss to our economy stemming from ill health.

It was these considerations, undoubtedly, which led to the appointment of the royal commission on health services, whose report has been subjected to considerable study by the government. The royal commission on health services, consisting as it did of representative professional personnel, recruited a corp of experts in many health fields and had the assistance of many of the best brains in Canada, to quote the chairman, an eminent Canadian jurist. It was the view of the royal commission on health services that there is an enormous gap between our scientific knowledge and skills on the one hand and our organizational and financial arrangements to apply them to the needs of men, on the other.

The commission described its recommendations as a method of closing this gap. One of its recommendations was partially implemented by the Health Resources Fund Act recently passed by the house. Another essential recommendation was for a comprehensive universal health services program consisting of several phases, one of which is for a universal program of medical services benefits—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could I interrupt the minister. In view of the fact that the press has available copies of his remarks, would it not be possible for the hon. member for Simcoe East also to have a copy so he could follow the minister's speech?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have failed to provide copies to my hon. friends.

An hon. Member: That is twice in one week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, this will be accomplished through the present bill. The basic question, of course, is why do this through a nation-wide, government sponsored medical insurance system.

An hon. Member: Where is that copy?

Mr. MacEachen: The answer is simple. The government of Canada believes that all Canadians should be able to obtain health services of high quality according to their need for such services and irrespective of their ability to pay. And we believe the only practical and effective way of doing this is through a universal, prepaid, government sponsored scheme.

This same conclusion was reached by the royal commission, which spent almost three years examining Canada's health needs and seeking ways to improve and extend health services. The royal commission's recommendation for a universal, prepaid, publicly administered system was endorsed by all its members, including members of the medical, nursing and dental professions and a doctor who had been president of the Canadian Medical Association.

The commission, and the government, recognize the fundamental principle that health is not a privilege tied to the state of one's bank account, but rather a basic right which should be open to all.

Mr. Rynard: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it is not possible to get a copy of the paper the minister is reading from.

An hon. Member: The press have it.

Mr. Rynard: How can we listen to this long speech and comment on it afterward if we have not got the paper the minister is holding in his hand? It is ridiculous. This sort of thing has been done over and over again.

Mr. MacEachen: I regret that I did not make copies available to my hon. friends. It was an oversight, and my parliamentary secretary is seeking to obtain copies. Frankly, I do not know how the hon. gentleman can profit more from reading the speech than from listening.

Mr. Douglas: Is there not any remedy for those who cannot do either?

Mr. Knowles: What about the rule against the reading of speeches?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I think we recognize, too, that while an individual's health is a highly personal affair in many respects, his or her good health is of direct benefit to the wider community.

• (3:30 p.m.)

These are the fundamental points which I believe every Canadian can and does support. The question is how best we can assure that this goal is met. The federal government's proposal, as hon. members know, is to offer the provinces a sizeable sum of money to support provincial medical care insurance programs which meet certain established standards.

We have taken this approach because we recognized that under our constitution health is a provincial responsibility and, because of this, federal initiative in this field is limited to encouraging provincial action. This is an important point, but one which I am afraid has been lost sight of in some of the debates on this subject.

It would be much simpler and, to some, more attractive to shunt these considerations aside and promise broad and direct federal action in this field. But in practice this would amount to little more than an exercise in futility, for it would mean making federal promises that are not within the federal power to keep.

It may be a matter of interest to members to note the manner in which changing times and conditions are reflected in the varying methods by which federal assistance has been made to provincial programs in the unfolding of our health insurance plan. When the health grants were introduced in 1948, many provincial governments were financially hard-pressed and because of this condition, but at the same time respecting the constitutional position, the federal government set up a series of health grants only some of which required the matching of the funds by a province. Thus, for many years in certain areas, the federal government has been providing through some of the health grants payments in full for projects designed and administered by the provincial governments.

By the time the hospital insurance program was introduced, federal sharing had become the usual means through which the government of Canada made contributions toward programs which clearly fell within provincial jurisdiction. Thus, the hospital insurance program became a conditional grants program under which the federal government began providing very considerable sums of money, but only with respect to shareable items of expenditure approved by the provincial governments.

The present phase of health insurance comes at a time when the conditional grants technique is undergoing some rethinking. Hence, it would not be in conformity with this policy to bring in a measure designed along the lines of existing conditional grant programs.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order. I wonder whether the minister would send his parliamentary secretary to the press gallery to see whether there is an extra copy of his speech available. Every member of the press gallery has a copy and I am sure there must be an extra copy left over. As a courtesy, could not one be given to the opposition critic, who still has no copy?

Mr. Grafftey: It is a matter of courtesy. We shall read it; you make the speech. Is that a deal?

Mr. MacEachen: There is no valid point of order.

Mr. Grafftey: Modern methods include courtesy.

Mr. MacEachen: I have said twice that whatever copies are available will be made available to hon. members. In the meantime, if hon. gentlemen opposite will bear with me I will seek to place copies at their disposal. I do not think there is any point in making an issue of this matter. Maybe I have a copy here for the hon. member. Here is one.

Mr. Rynard: On the point of order, I have just received one from the press. Thank you very much.

An hon. Member: That was well staged.

Mr. Ricard: Well staged? We asked five or six times before you did anything.

Mr. MacEachen: The resolution under consideration does not envisage a plan designed along the lines of existing grant programs but employs another avenue through which federal support will be provided. I shall discuss this further later in my remarks.

I have mentioned that there is no question at this time as to the role allocated to the provinces under our constitution in the health field. This role is a predominant one, and provincial governments individually will devise programs, as some have in fact already done, which undoubtedly will differ from province to province, as existing programs already do.

At the same time not all of the provinces have the same fiscal capability of providing such programs or of meeting the costs of programs designed for all residents. Thus, although Canada is one country a Canadian resident of one province may be at a distinct disadvantage when compared with a Canadian resident of another province.

Of even greater national concern is the disadvantage which may be suffered by a Canadian who, having resided in one province, moves to another province only to find that his position is the same as it might have been had he moved to a point beyond his own national boundaries. Clearly these are considerations which give rise to certain federal responsibilities in the health and welfare fields.

Thus while it is the policy of this government to redefine its role in so far as conditional grant programs are concerned, it may not abrogate its obligation to ensure the national character of our country by establishing an acceptable level of services available to all citizens. It is proposed, therefore, that with the full co-operation of the provinces the federal government will support medical care programs which meet the four basic principles which the government of Canada believes will serve the national interest.

The first of these principles involves the scope of benefits which it is considered should be made available as a minimum, regardless of any other benefits a province may wish to include as well. It is considered that the medical care program should offer all of the services provided by physicians.

This would mean that the services of general practitioners and specialists would be insured services, regardless of where these services were made available. Whether the insured person is seen by the physician in the doctor's office, in the hospital, in a nursing home, or in a private home belonging to the insured person or to anyone else, the benefits of the medical care plan should be available.

Provincial governments, may of course, wish to expand the provincial programs so as to include additional benefits; there is nothing in the federal plan to deter them from doing so. We have assured the provincial governments that as soon as there is a consensus on the timing of further benefits to be provided over and above physicians' services, the federal government would consider enlarging appropriately and in due course the scope of benefits to which it would be prepared to contribute. As a first phase, however, the present resolution contemplates only the provision of physicians' services.

The second principle which is considered to be essential if the federal government is to make substantial financial contributions is that of coverage. In discussions with the provinces the matter of universal coverage, which we feel to be essential, has been examined carefully and closely. We have explained to the provinces that the principle of universal coverage should not be confused with compulsory coverage.

It is a fact that if a province chooses to finance its share of the costs by levying a premium, then and only then would the question of compulsion arise. It would be the decision of a province whether premiums would be compulsory in the sense that taxes are compulsory. Certainly this measure does not contemplate compulsion on individual doctors to join a plan; nor would there be any compulsion on individual persons to use the services provided under the plan.

I do not wish to appear to be splitting hairs, but it would seem to me that certain adverse comments which have been made on the question of compulsion give the impression that doctors would be required to treat patients they do not wish to treat and that individuals would be required to accept benefits under a program which they did not wish to accept. At the risk of repeating myself on this point, I should like categorically to state that neither of these two circumstances would be involved in the principle of universal coverage in the context of medical care.

Members might be interested in an assessment of the experience which has been gained in this regard under the various provincial hospital insurance plans. It will be recalled that under that program insured services were also required to be made available on equal terms and conditions to all residents. Universal coverage was automatically achieved in those provinces which chose to finance their share of the costs out of the general revenues of the province, or by means of a sales tax, or by a combination of these methods with or without an authorized charge for which provision was made in the legislation.

In these provinces persons who are residents become entitled to services by virtue of such status. Universality if achieved without compulsion of any sort except the compulsion to pay provincial taxes, which we all must pay.

However, when the hospital insurance program began five provinces chose to finance their share of costs by means of a premium. This entailed the registration of individuals and the payment of the premium fixed by provincial legislation. Within a relatively short time two of these provinces abandoned the premium system of financing and achieved universal coverage automatically by adopting a non-premium system. Of the remaining three provinces which still use the premium system, only two have made it compulsory under provincial law for all residents to be covered—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are those two provinces?

Mr. MacEachen: I believe they are British Columbia and Alberta, and the third province would be Ontario. I am speaking according to memory. The third province has maintained an element of voluntary enrolment. Nevertheless, the extent of coverage under hospital insurance at the present time in all provinces, including the province with a partial voluntary element, is now over 99 per cent of the eligible population.

I have explained this situation in some detail because I am anxious to illustrate my initial point, that universal coverage does not necessarily mean compulsory coverage.

In my discussions with the provinces as to what percentage of coverage the federal government will be prepared to view as universal, if a premium system of financing were adopted, I have agreed that for the initial period coverage of 90 per cent would be acceptable. It would be expected, of course, that this would rise to 95 per cent over a period of time.

Hon. members may ask why the federal government considers the principle of universal coverage to be so important. I believe that if the considerable expenditures which will have to be made to provincial programs are to be justified, then the federal government must have the assurance that as many people as possible will benefit. That is the case for the federal parliament. From the national point of view it is also essential to ensure that there is no differentiation in coverage between the residents of one province and another if federal funds are to be provided.

Before I leave the question of universal coverage I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services and to studies made for that commission. All of these reached the same conclusion on the need for universality.

The third principle which the federal government considers to be essential is that of public administration. It is obvious that when the federal government makes substantial financial contributions available to the provinces, a provincial government must be capable of taking full responsibility for the use to which these contributions are put. The provincial plans should be non-profit and subjected to public audit, and the administrators of the plan should be answerable to the public through the provincial legislature.

Once more I would like to point to the experience we have had in hospital insurance, which is as relevant to public administration as to universal coverage. Hospital insurance programs, without exception, are administered by the provincial governments, either directly by departments of health or, alternatively, by commissions established by provincial governments specifically for this purpose. I believe I am correct in saying that there is no jurisdiction in this country which has had reason to regret this method of administration.

The last principle which it is considered essential to incorporate in provincial medical care plans relates to transferability or, if you like, portability. This simply means that when a resident of one province moves to another province his entitlement to benefits will continue long enough for him to become entitled to benefits in the new province.

The Chairman: Order. I apologize for interrupting the minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Let him continue.

The Chairman: Does the minister request extra time to complete his remarks?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: As I pointed out earlier, residents of provinces are also residents of Canada. It is essential, therefore, that the federal government ensures that mobility of the population between provinces does not place any resident in the same position as would apply if he moved to another country. This is particularly relevant when the federal government contributes to the cost of provincial programs.

Where provinces bring in medical care programs meeting these principles then the federal government, under the proposed bill, would accept fiscal responsibility for a contribution equal to one half of the present per capita cost of insured services in those provinces participating in the plan. Insured services, of course, mean medically necessary services provided by medical practitioners. If such a program were to be provided in all provinces next year, it is estimated that the cost to the federal treasury for a full year would be $340 million.

It has been estimated that approximately $600 million would be spent next year on physicians' services if no change were made in the present methods of providing these services. I would ask hon. members, therefore, to compare the estimates on which we are basing public expenditures for public programs covering the whole population if these go into effect next year, namely, a total of $680 million including the provincial share of half the costs. Thus, by redistributing the estimated $600 million and adding another $80 million, all residents of all the provinces of Canada will have physicians' services available to them. These are estimates and these comments are for illustration purposes.

Members of the committee may be interested in knowing that some 6 million Canadians still lack any medical insurance coverage, and 3 million more have only limited coverage. Probably not more than 10 million Canadians at the present time have what could be called adequate comprehensive coverage. Those without adequate coverage include primarily residents of rural areas and people with moderate or low incomes, unable to acquire low-cost group insurance. I might mention that these figures do not include those who will benefit from the health provisions set out in the Canada Assistance Plan.

These, then, and the financial proposal are the principles which have been discussed with the provinces. The response from the provinces has, I must say, been most encouraging. Some provinces have already indicated their readiness to proceed by our target date of July 1, 1967. Others have not been in a position to commit themselves, although some of these pointed out that they would be able to change existing plans to meet the principles described above. I should like to state that no province has stated that it will definitely not participate although, as hon. members are undoubtedly aware, the premier of Alberta has expressed criticism of the proposal.

The introduction of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, I believe marks an historic day for this parliament and for Canada. The program it spells out goes a long way toward closing the gap in our over-all social security system. It is our hope it will result in the commencement of provincial medical care plans covering all Canadians on the 100th birthday of Confederation, July 1, 1967. This would be a most appropriate way to mark our birthday, since it would ensure ready access to medical care to all of our people, regardless of means, of pre-existing conditions, of age, or other circumstances which may have barred such access in the past.

At some time in each of our lives such care is necessary, if only to avoid the pitfalls of ill health. An investment in health is an investment in human resources. Only strong human resources can fulfil the promise offered to us by the other resources of our great country.

In concluding and in thanking the members of the committee for allowing me additional time, I should like to say I am confident that this measure will receive the constructive and conscientious attention of the committee and receive approval at a later hour this day.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, before the minister sits down, might I ask him whether it is his intention and the intention of the government to proceed with the legislation after the house has passed this resolution?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to indicate what the situation will be or at what stage we will terminate, but I should like to have second reading of this bill today if possible or before the summer adjournment. That is not a commitment on the part of the government; it is what I should like to see.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether this bill will be placed before the House of Commons committee on health and welfare for further study; and can the minister say today also, whether, in view of the federal contribution of 50 per cent of the cost of provincially sponsored health plans, the premiums of provincial health plans will be cut by 50 per cent?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the importance of both these questions. When members of the committee have had an opportunity to examine the clauses in the bill I believe they will come to the conclusion that committee study, other than study in committee of the whole, may not be necessary in respect of this bill, because the bill itself merely embodies the principles about which I have been talking for the past half hour.

Mr. Knowles: They have been studied for nearly 50 years.

Mr. MacEachen: It is, I believe, true to say that the main negotiations with regard to individual plans will occur between provincial governments and members of the medical profession and others on a provincial basis. It would seem to me that committee study in these jurisdictions would be more appropriate.

In answer to the second question, the federal government proposes to pay half the per capita cost of providing insured services in the participating provinces. It will not be the intention to pay half the cost of premiums, which would be a double form of assistance.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister two questions? The first has to do with choice and rights between patient and doctor, in other words, the right of the patient to choose his own doctor and the right of a doctor to refuse a patient. I think that first question should be answered and amplified.

An hon. Member: Get a horn.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, there will be no interference under the terms of this bill with the freedom of a doctor to practise medicine inside or outside the plan. They have freedom in that regard, and a patient will of course be free to choose his own doctor. There will be no compulsion on either hand.

The Leader of the Opposition asked a question and I should like to tell him I was almost totally wrong in my answer. The provinces which have the premium system are Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. I was right so far as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. Kindt: My second question has to do with portability. It was made clear by the minister that a person moving between one province and another would have medical services. Does that same situation apply if he moves to a foreign country temporarily or permanently? In the plan which is now envisaged what is the position of the government with regard to a person who may be travelling in a foreign country? Second, what would the position be if he is going to live there temporarily?

Mr. MacEachen: On the particular aspect of reciprocal arrangements with other countries, I should like to wait until we have an opportunity to have the bill before members before discussing this point which is important but which is not a principle so far as the resolution stage is concerned.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair hesitates to interrupt to rule the questions which have been asked out of order, but I think I should remind the committee of a citation from May's seventeenth edition, page 798:

> Debate in committee on a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

It is the opinion of the Chair that many of the questions being asked might be asked more properly when the bill is before the house in committee of the whole.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, in furtherance of my question, we are at the resolution stage and, while I respect the statement made by the Chair, it is most important to have answers to these questions. Surely the minister is in a position to tell us whether those who travel abroad, as many of us from time to time have to do, will have to carry with them excess money for medical services.

Mr. Deachman: On a point of order—

Mr. Kindt: I want to know the answer to this before we get away from the resolution stage.

Mr. Deachman: On a point of order—

The Chairman: Order. There is already a point of order.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to answer my question. He said there would be an absolutely free choice between patient and doctor. That satisfies me. Now I am asking a second question concerning whether or not the plan applies when persons travel abroad. Suppose a person went to England. Would he be covered under the plan?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I think the fact that I answered the first question shows how dangerous it is to attempt to deal with these details at the resolution stage. It is obvious that a person having membership in a Canadian medical care plan or rather a provincial medical care plan could only have benefits in another country if reciprocal arrangements were worked out with that country. At present, for example, under the Canada Pension Plan such an effort is being made right now. We announced yesterday that a committee of officials was working with the United States government to reach some reciprocal arrangement. There is nothing in any Canadian bill which could determine such an arrangement except through an agreement with another country.

Mr. Monteith: I do not wish to interject at this stage, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that speeches should follow the normal course, but is it not true in respect of hospital insurance that if someone is taken ill in Michigan or New York state, for example, part of the hospital bill is paid?

Mr. MacEachen: I think that is the case, yes.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Perth asking a question as to what might be contained in the bill?

Mr. Monteith: I will go into the subject at a later time, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: If that is what the hon. member is asking I would rule his question out of order.

Mr. Kindt: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member for Macleod rising on a point of order?

Mr. Kindt: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Kindt: Surely the minister, who is now ready to bring in the bill, knows enough about it to satisfy the people of Canada and hon. members whether or not an individual taken ill outside the country is entitled to medical care. Surely the minister can answer that question now before asking us to pass the resolution and move on to the second stage. The minister's attitude makes one believe that he is perpetrating some kind of subterfuge. Why is he bringing in the bill now if he does not know the answers to these obvious questions?

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to say that the resolution brought in this afternoon by the minister represents something that all of us would like to see achieved in this country, namely, the best medical care possible for all Canadians. There can be no argument against such an achievement.

It is not my intention to deal in detail with the resolution but I do wish to speak in generalities. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was the premier of Saskatchewan when that province adopted hospital insurance. I do not wish to misquote him, but I believe he said that the work load of hospitals and physicians there increased by some 26 per cent following the adoption of that program. As the result of neglect in the training of a sufficient number of doctors we now have an acute shortage in Canada.

The minister has spoken about hospital insurance and I am sure that no one disagrees with the principle involved. In the province of Ontario the federal government pays only 14 per cent of the capital cost of constructing hospitals. Surely the federal government should be paying at least one-third of the capital cost throughout Canada. I suggest that the federal government is abrogating its responsibility in this regard.

Let us look at the tax burden the ordinary individual is carrying under the hospitalization plan. I should like to quote briefly at this point from a press release of the Ontario Hospital Association dated February 18, 1966 regarding a brief submitted to the provincial government. It states in part:

> The brief's strongest comments are reserved for the federal government, which has not increased its basic $2,000 per bed grant since 1958—

Let me remind the minister that the grant in 1957 was $1,000 per bed and that we doubled it when we were in power. This release states that the federal government has not increased its $2,000 per bed grant since 1958 in spite of the fact that costs have multiplied many times over. If my memory serves me correctly, the cost per hospital bed in 1958 was $5,000. Today this figure runs closer to $30,000. The press release then continues:

> —and makes no contribution at all toward many essential supporting areas such as operating suites, dietary departments, treatment rooms and delivery suites.

The president of the Ontario Hospital Association, Mr. Glen Phelps, had this to say:

> —already some of the figures in the brief might be out of date.

I place part of the blame in this regard on provincial governments, and particularly the government of Ontario which should be applying more pressure on the federal government to make it live up to its responsibilities. The press release then states that Mr. Phelps said:

> During the past few weeks . . . we have been hearing of cost estimates for new buildings running closer to $30,000 a bed than $20,000. So the $14,000 we have recommended as the fair share of senior governments would not be enough to cover the desired two-thirds. It also seems fairly clear now that last month's dominion-provincial health conference offered no encouragement that Ottawa intends to increase its financial contribution—

The federal government has control of direct taxation but pays only a meagre 14 per cent of capital construction costs. Surely there is some hypocrisy in this regard. The municipalities across this country, which already carry a heavy tax burden, are left to pay the highest proportion of the cost of hospital construction.

Let me now deal with the problem created by the shortage of doctors. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said in this regard that the work load of doctors and hospitals increased by 26½ per cent following the adoption of hospital insurance. I do not believe that under this medicare plan the work load would increase that much in the province of Ontario. There are over four million people in this province today who are covered by first-class prepaid insurance plans which compare favourably with anything any government could provide. The best authorities I can find indicate that the work load would increase by 15 to 20 per cent.

Let us compare the physician work load in other countries with the work load in this country. We have 21,290 doctors in civilian practice or one for every 960 individuals. The United States, which attracts between 200 and 400 doctors from Canada each year, has one physician for every 740 individuals. This is surely an astounding comparison. The work load of doctors in the United States today is approximately 30 per cent less than the work load in Canada.

Doctors in New Zealand do not experience the same difficulties in relation to travel as doctors in Canada; yet that country has one doctor for every 700 persons.

Mr. Munro: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rynard: Certainly.

Mr. Munro: Would the hon. member quote the source of his figures in relation to the ratio of doctors to patients?

Mr. Rynard: If the hon. member wishes to find these figures, let him look at the Canada Year Book or the address of Dr. McCreary, dean of the faculty of medicine at the University of British Columbia and president of the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges. If the hon. member wants the reference I will be very glad to send it to him. I have three or four references here which show that the figures are only out perhaps a few points. I will be very glad to send this document to the hon. member afterwards.

[Mr. Rynard.]

This situation concerns me a great deal because it is quite obvious that Canadian doctors are already carrying a 25 to 35 per cent greater work load than their counterparts in the United States and New Zealand. The doctors in those countries practice at about the same level that we do in Canada. If the government imposes a full medicare plan on these people, what will happen? Medical care will be broken down because a doctor will have less time to spend with his patients. This is obvious when there is more work to do. What happens then? There is only one answer, Mr. Chairman. There will be poor quality work and the practice of medicine will be set back years and years.

My one concern in raising this matter at the resolution stage is: How will we correct this shortage? The Hall Commission report said that we had to add 476 students each year to our present classes. Mr. Chairman, do you realize that this was said in 1964, two years ago? Do you realize that at that time the target date was 1971? This is the equivalent of nine or ten medical schools the size of Queen's University or Western. What is the cost? The nearest I can come to the cost is that Toronto university will add 75 this year to its freshmen year class and they say it will cost them $35 million to do this. There is $250 million right there. By 1970, 7,100 doctors must be added to the profession. This means that we must have 11,860 doctors by that time, so that you have 5,340 left as a minimum after taking out retirements, etc. We are in the same position with regard to dentists and nurses; 35,000 nurses have to be trained and some must receive university training. The Hall Commission report stated that there will be no substantial increase in graduating classes in medicine before 1971.

No move has been made until just recently, and this is 1966. I criticize the government for their lack of action in this regard, and I probably would be right in criticizing some of the universities as they are letting the public down. This report was made in 1964 and the target date was 1971, because it takes seven years to graduate a doctor with the minimal amount of training. It takes 11 years to train a specialist; and if a doctor is to have good, sound training he should spend two years as an intern, so there you have eight years for general practice.

This resolution should be taken step by step so that the plan does not break down completely and so that the minister will have a monument to what he has done rather than something that people will look at and say it is a great pillar of salt. I am really concerned about this situation, which is all the more serious because today in Canada out of every two doctors that graduate one carries on to be a specialist. In this country today 37 per cent of the doctors are certified specialists and 13 per cent are non-certified specialists.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, half the doctors that graduate today specialize, with more crowding into certain fields. We are short of optometrists. There has been a 75 per cent increase in the population but only a 15 per cent increase in optometrists. It takes seven years for a doctor to graduate, and here we are just starting in the fall of 1966. This means it will be 1976 before we will have doctors who have graduated with specialist training, and 1974 for General Practitioners.

There is another problem in this connection, namely, that four of our medical schools now are below par. Four have not enough good teachers or facilities to teach their students properly. I should like to read another article. Somebody might ask where it came from so I will make sure the source is on the record. It is a newspaper article which quotes the Canadian Medical Association Journal. The article says:

> It has been whispered about for a long time. Now it is in the open: one-third of Canada's medical schools, during the last ten years, have been warned that if they don't improve they may lose their North American accreditation. This is a recognized method for judging the quality of medical schools, and loss of accreditation is a sad, bad blow . . .
> "The primary fault in the four schools was not with respect to their basic orientation or the quality of existing staff, but rather that they had insufficient staff and resources to meet the needs of modern medicine."

How derelict in our duty can we be?

> "If the teachers for the expansion of existing schools and the staffing of new medical schools are recruited from within Canada, a sort of academic musical chairs will occur in which the staffs of existing schools will be rapidly diluted, and, if the bidding is brisk, an unfortunate concentration of the best talent in a few centres may develop."

And it surely will be through lack of facilities.

> The editorial is an urgent appeal for government to heed the warnings and the proposals of the Gundy report on medical education. It refers to the "twilight sleep of lethargy" which enfolds both the public and those in high places. It does not add—although we gladly do—that a government that has pushed its expenditures beyond the $9 billion mark, should find it possible to rectify and reverse the existing starvation of medical science.

This brings me to another point. We are spending $10 million on research. The United States is spending $1,200 million. We have been very derelict in this chamber in this regard. If this medicare plan breaks down and is not handled most carefully a step at a time, there will surely be serious consequences because we have not the background at present to operate such a plan. And who is responsible? This government in particular and other governments are responsible because of their starvation of medical science and education. The article continues:

> Canadians complain endlessly about their abject position vis-à-vis the United States. But they refuse to face the fact that much of it is simply due to failure to spend money where it will do the most good. We are prepared, apparently, to institute medicare at vast expense. We do little to improve medical science and education upon which, obviously, medicare ultimately depends. The amount of money involved is trifling in comparison to the global budget total.

What are we going to do about this situation? Whether we have medicare does not matter so much. The important thing is the care of those people who need medical attention. These are the people we must protect, because we are not providing this medical care at the moment. How are we to get out of this rut? I have already said that we are extremely short of teachers, so short, in fact, that four universities may lose their accreditation. How do we get these teachers? Do we train our graduates in Canada or do we bring back some of our teacher scientists from the United States? We have supplied the United States with 200 to 400 medical graduates a year. Out of our 1963 graduates, 49 per cent moved to the United States. What is the reason for this? The reason is that here they lack opportunity. The United States can count on well over 200 young, energetic Canadian doctors with 40 years of earning power, and this is costing this country a total earning power of over $100 million a year.

• (4:20 p.m.)

An hon. Member: What are your sources?

Mr. Rynard: You asked me that before. I will give them to you later.

It costs the Canadian people $50,000 to educate a doctor in this country. I was amazed at this figure because the last figure I saw was back in 1959 at which time I think it cost $25,000. This is a good illustration of what it is costing Canada to train a doctor these days. It costs $100,000 to train these young doctors to become teachers. The loss of our medical graduates is a tremendous economic drain on our country. It also makes it very difficult to maintain the quality of our medical services and to man our universities with good teachers. The loss of our teacher scientists over the last few years has indeed been calamitous.

The minister made a statement which amazed me. He said, if I heard him correctly, that doctors did not have to visit their patients. Where would they send them? I wonder whether the minister knows that there are many hospitals in Canada operating without interns. I know of one such hospital, the name of which I will give to the minister if he wishes, that only has a third of the interns it should have and one of the interns has been brought here from abroad. I wonder whether the minister knows that, at one of our university centres in the province of Ontario, out of 11 graduates who were to practice as interns in that hospital eight have gone to the United States. Why do they go? They go because of the greater opportunities, higher salaries, more independence and more incentives available there. We can keep our teacher scientists here by setting up research centres. Instead of spending $12 million on such facilities we should be spending $100 million. This is the way to keep these people. We have to give them equipment and greater opportunities.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. May I point out to the hon. member that his time is up. Is it agreed that the hon. member for Simcoe East may continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: I will not take up much more time, Mr. Chairman. There are just a few more facts I wish to present. Only 2 per cent of our medical graduates will become teachers and only 0.5 per cent will become scientific researchers. This means we will have to get the teachers from somewhere if we are to man our medical schools and if we are to follow the recommendations of the Hall Commission. First we must train students, then doctors, then teachers and finally scientists.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that building palaces with fine laboratories is of no value if we do not have teachers, teacher scientists and pure scientists. For the past 15 years one-third of our doctors per year have been coming from Great Britain. In one year up to 600 doctors came from Great Britain. I knew the figure was high but I was amazed to see how high it was. I think it was in the year 1964 that three-quarters of all the graduates of British universities emigrated, and today 50 per cent of the interns in some of their hospitals come from outside of Great Britain. A great many of them come from Africa and Asia.

Mr. MacEachen: Will the hon. member permit a question? Why does he think the British doctors are coming to Canada and Canadian doctors are going to the U.S.? Has he any over-all explanation for this movement on the part of the members of the medical profession?

Mr. Rynard: I think the reasons for the movement of these doctors are better working conditions and the incentive of better pay. If the minister would look at the records he would find out that the average doctor in England looks after approximately 2,000 patients. I had the privilege of visiting the office of one of those doctors. There were chairs lined up along the walls of his office with many patients waiting. There must have been 20 or 25 people in that room. That doctor could not have possibly spent more than two or three minutes with each patient.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Was that under the medical plan in England?

Mr. Rynard: That was a few years back under the national health plan. In Orillia, whence I come, there are three doctors from Great Britain. Two are surgeons and one is a general practitioner. They have told me very definitely that their reason for leaving England was overwork and the fact that they were being regimented under politics. One doctor, whom I referred to earlier, was a very nice chap and he told me that he was being over-worked, as anybody with a work load of 2,000 or more patients must be.

The afternoon I saw him he referred one or two of his patients to the local hospital but he did not know when they would be admitted. He said it might be in two or three months time. I pointed out to him that one of his patients might be in a serious condition. He told me he had seen him on three or four previous occasions but the patient had not improved with the treatment that had been given him. The doctor did not follow his patient to the hospital. He was sent to an entirely new doctor who had never seen him before and might not care to perform the surgery. This is the reason for the dissatisfaction of the doctors. To return to the case of this patient, he might, three months following his dismissal from the hospital, return to the doctor for a check-up but the doctor might not even have his history because of lack of time and facilities.

The immigration of foreign doctors has developed in us a lazy attitude in the last 15 years. We have been derelict in our duty to the Canadian people and the government has been derelict in its duty. I want to put that on the record.

Mr. MacEachen: My hon. friend is suggesting that it is costing the Canadian society $50,000 a year to train a doctor and $100,000 to train a teacher or scientist. What is his conclusion from the movement of Canadian doctors to the United States, a movement which is quite unrelated to the medical care program we are now discussing? What steps should we take aside from medical care, which is quite unrelated?

Mr. Rynard: I assume the minister did not hear me. What I said was that there should be an incentive given to these people to remain in Canada. It could be a research work or tax incentive for a few years. Doctors in the United States pay less taxes and get more salary, than doctors do here. I guess the minister missed that part of my speech, but I do believe I alluded to it. If I did not, I intended to.

I should like to refer to what Dr. T. W. Gorman, former President of the Nova Scotia Medical Society, said with respect to this problem. He comes from the minister's own area and he said the problem was serious. He recommended that the length of the medical course be reduced. He pointed out that the profession and the medical schools had a responsibility to supply quantity and quality and suggested a shorter medical course. Dr. Gorman suggested that area of eastern Canada was going to be very short of doctors. The minister must be well aware of these facts. We are short of trained doctors, short of teachers and scientists. The Hall Commission recognized there would be such a shortage up to 1971, but now that we are implementing a health plan the shortage will be accentuated by 1971. The minister has had ample time to introduce this plan; yet we are about two years behind schedule. I should like to quote from page 14, volume I of the Hall Commission report:

> We recognize, of course, that this whole program cannot be put into effect immediately or simultaneously in all provinces. We do not foresee the program coming forth full-grown but rather as an orderly and well planned series of steps which taken together will in a period of years accomplish our objective.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is not concluding that there is any contradiction between the conclusions of the Hall Commission and the proposal we are making today? What we are doing is completely compatible with their recommendations.

Mr. Rynard: If I understood the minister correctly he intimated that this plan would be effective across Canada. I realize he probably has to consider the wishes of the provinces, but he was estimating this plan would cover 90 per cent of the people. If I am wrong, I want to be corrected. I understood him to say that 90 per cent of the people would be covered next year.

Mr. MacEachen: I am referring to the development of services. This proposal refers to only one aspect of the recommendations made by the Hall Commission, namely, physician's services. They recommended this as one phase, and this is the first phase. Their total recommendations are much broader and more extensive than anything we are doing.

Mr. Rynard: All I can say is that the Hall Commission made its report in 1964 and we are now in 1966. At any rate, medical care will be available. Medical care is available in the province of Ontario and, as I have said, four million people are covered in that province. I should like to congratulate the Ontario Minister of Health for introducing OMSIP because it is a step in the right direction.

As I said a moment ago, I am reserving my decision on this plan until I see the bill. I am wondering if this is the type of step we should be taking. In the province of Ontario we have blind people's allowances, disabled persons' allowances, mothers' allowances, old age assistance, the rehabilitation act, and so on. There is assistance to those on lower incomes. If a family of two have a taxable income of $100 or less, the government pays 50 per cent of their medical expenses. Perhaps this is a better type of plan. I do not know. I noticed that in the last election campaign the present Minister of Trade and Commerce stated on November 4 that the Liberal party may have to delay the introduction of a national medicare scheme because of the shortage of doctors and nurses. I am having similar thoughts. We may break down the whole system, and this is what worries me.

I noticed an alarming article in Barron's of England the other day under the heading, "Cradle to Grave?". The article indicated the British were turning away from socialized medicine. I hope we can avoid the pitfalls that have been evident in the British scheme. The British people have received reasonable care, but there have been many quarrels with doctors and complaints from patients. I am told that in England there are insurance companies that are now insuring people so they can get proper medical care. They would rather be under the care of their family doctor than be pushed around under the national health plan. These are the things I want to see avoided in Canada. I am greatly interested in making sure that we avoid these mistakes. I am sure the minister will feel this plan has to be as nearly right as we can make it. It is human to err, but I hope he will review the whole situation in consultation with the provincial ministers who know the situation in the provinces. I hope the minister will then come to the conclusion that he will proceed cautiously and carefully in light of what the ministers of health advise.

We should remember that today the Canadian people are getting fed up with taxes. They are paying more taxes than ever to the federal government, provincial governments and municipal governments. They are getting fed up, and they do not want any mistakes made in this plan. The reason we are having so many strikes and so much labour trouble is that the people do not have enough money to make ends meet. I say with great sincerity that I am not going to be unduly critical. I hope my criticism has been constructive. I should like to see a plan adopted that will be the best in the world. The minister nods his head but I am not sure, after listening to what he had to say, that he knows what the right thing is. I hope he is right because, personally, I like the minister. We owe it to the Canadian people to see that they get the best type of service possible so that we will make this country great medically. Then we will not lose graduates to the United States but will attract them to remain in Canada and we could have one of the greatest medical centres in the world for post-graduate work.

Mr. Douglas: The Minister of National Health and Welfare was quite right, Mr. Chairman, when he said this is a historic day because it marks another milestone in Canada's long march toward comprehensive health insurance. The legislation which we hope will immediately follow this resolution will be another step in the attainment of a goal for which the Canadian people have been waiting a long time. I do not need to remind members of the day when the first official promise of comprehensive health insurance in Canada appeared in the Liberal party's platform at the convention in August of 1919.

The next time official notice was taken of this question by a Liberal government was in 1945 at the federal-provincial conference on reconstruction when the green book proposals set out a fully delineated health insurance program to be brought into operation in conjunction with the provinces. The other day I came across a copy of the Toronto Star for Wednesday, April 21, 1948, with the great, streamer headline, "Health Insurance At Once Said Plan Of Premier King".

In 1948 the people were led to believe that they were to have health insurance. The health grants of 1948 of course were of some assistance. The first real step was taken when legislation was brought down by the Liberal government in 1957 to set up national hospital insurance. Unfortunately that legislation was so restrictive that it was of no benefit to any province unless the majority of the provinces representing the majority of the people of Canada signified their intentions of coming into the plan. Consequently the plan was not established until a Conservative administration removed the restrictive features, and the hospital insurance plan became a reality in 1958.

Then we had the Hall Commission which did a superb piece of work and brought down in June of 1964 what I think is the finest statement on medicare that has ever been published in the English language. That commission recommended immediate action. It asked that within six months of the report being tabled the government convene a federal-provincial conference. The government did convene a conference here in Ottawa on July 19 and 20 of 1965. And on this day, July 12, 1966, we have a resolution preceding the bill which will take the next step in comprehensive health insurance, namely, a measure to provide for medical care for all Canadians in those provinces where the provincial governments are prepared to co-operate in setting up such a plan.

Before I comment on this program may I say I think we should keep in mind that it is only a step in a long-term program, that even though medical care is being established I think we have been too long in getting to it, and that the plan still leaves a large area of health needs untouched. We shall still have to think in terms of essential and prescribed drugs, dental care, optometric care, and all of the ancillary health services. We must bear in mind that, while the present measure is one of the most important steps, we must be under no illusion that the implementation of the plan to be contained in the legislation coming before us is the end of the road.

I want to commend the minister for the work he has done and which his predecessor did in this field. I am sure that they will get a good deal of criticism from many quarters about the drain on the federal treasury and about the increased costs which can be anticipated. I think the public sometimes lose sight of the fact which the minister pointed out this afternoon, that it is already costing the Canadian people some $600,000 a year for this kind of care and that the cost of medicare is not a new cost. It is simply a redistribution of the cost, so that instead of the burden being placed on the sick, it is distributed over the entire population on a basis that has some relation to ability to pay.

An hon. Member: What about the taxes?

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member says: "What about the taxes?" Well, what about paying doctors' bills? People who pay taxes also pay doctors' bills. Most of us would rather pay taxes when we are well than pay doctors' bills when we are sick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member for Simcoe East made some reference to the fact that in Saskatchewan our experience with hospital insurance was that the load went up some 26 per cent. This is true. It levelled out, however, once we got over the backlog. I do not think that medicare will go up at the same rate; which might be of some comfort to the minister.

Perhaps I could draw his attention to the experience of Saskatchewan. The Thompson committee, which did a great deal of research into this matter before the legislation was introduced in 1961, gave it as their opinion that the plan would probably cost about $25 million annually and that the cost would rise for a while and then level off. The interesting thing is that the plan, which is now in its fourth year, never reached $25 million and in fact has slightly declined lately.

An article that appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin on June 15, 1966, had this to say:

> A leader of the 1962 Saskatchewan doctors' strike admitted Tuesday some of his profession's fears about medicare have proved unfounded . . .
> Dr. Barootes broke what he called a self-imposed vow of silence. He told his colleagues:—

This was at the Canadian Medical Association Conference:

> "Some of the qualms we have had have been disproved and some of us should revise our thinking. The idea that total medical care results in constantly-mounting costs has been shattered," he said.
> The fact is, he said, that the total cost of Saskatchewan medicare dropped last year by $500,000, from $23 million to $22.5 million . . .
> He said in an interview later he could not explain why medicare costs have not shot up, as he and other doctors had predicted. He said it may be because Saskatchewan residents have been saturated with medical service—that they now have been treated for all the ailments that, before medicare, went untreated.

This is a courageous statement by Dr. E.W. Barootes, who was chairman of the committee that masterminded the doctors' strike in Saskatchewan. He is a man for whom I have great respect. While I cannot agree with him, I think he is the kind of man who, when he found out that he was wrong, was quite willing to admit that his estimates of the fantastic costs which medicare was supposed to impose upon the people were not well-founded.

Since we have very limited time at this stage of debate I shall confine myself to two questions. One is, what kind of medicare plan are we to get, and the second is, when are we to get it? I am convinced that there is little value in setting up a medicare plan unless it is soundly based. It would be better to postpone the plan than to have a poorly structured plan because once the plan is launched it will take years to undo the damage if it is not soundly based. It is extremely important, therefore, that this plan be on a sound basis.

That sound basis, of course, has been spelled out by the Hall Commission in its very excellent report. It was also spelled out by the Prime Minister in the four basic principles which he set forth as the criteria upon which the medicare plan should be based. I am hopeful that when the legislation is brought down it will be on all fours with the criteria elucidated by the Prime Minister on July 19 and 20 of last year. These four criteria have already been mentioned by the minister.

The Prime Minister in his address to the federal-provincial conference said that the first principle was that the scope of benefits should be, broadly speaking, all the services provided by physicians, both general practitioners and specialists. He went on to say:

> A complete health plan would include dental treatment, prescribed drugs, and other important services, and there is nothing in the approach we propose to prevent these being included, from the start or later, if this were the general wish.

He also said:

> We regard comprehensive physicians' services as the initial minimum.

In light of that statement about the scope of benefits I was hoping that the measure which the minister was going to bring down would be an open-ended plan that would allow the provinces to proceed as fast as they were ready to do so, and that the plan would not slow the provinces down to the pace of the slowest of the Canadian family.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I noticed that the minister in his statement this afternoon said, if I may quote him, "We have assured the provincial governments that as soon as there is a consensus on the timing of further benefits to be provided over and above physicians' services, the federal government would consider enlarging appropriately, and in due course, the scope of benefits to which it would be prepared to contribute."

I wish to ask the minister why we should have to wait for a consensus. I am certain that had we waited for a consensus in 1957 and 1958 the hospital insurance plan would have been long delayed. I see no reason why this legislation should not be sufficiently flexible to provide that when a province has established physicians' care under the plan—and one province has already done so—it is free to make provision for some other health service. This would be in accordance with the green book proposals of 1945.

The province would have a choice. It could select dental care and might start with dental care for children. It could select optometric care or the provision of certain drugs such as insulin and cortisone, and then move into the field of prescribed drugs. I had hoped for legislation sufficiently flexible to make it possible for a province to move as fast as it could build the necessary administration and find the funds with which to pay its share of the cost.

I am disappointed that the scope of the benefits is to be restricted entirely to physicians services and that the program will not be sufficiently flexible to enable other health benefits to be added as provinces are prepared to make them available. I hope the minister will reconsider this matter and that he will not ask the provinces which are most anxious to proceed to wait for a consensus. This is an attractive modern term which everybody likes to use nowadays. But I think we should be encouraging the provinces which wish to move ahead, not asking them to wait until the more laggard provinces are prepared to catch up with them.

The second principle which the Prime Minister laid down in his address to the federal-provincial conference on July 19 was as follows:

> Second, we would propose that the plan should be universal. That is to say, it should cover all residents in the province on uniform terms and conditions.

The next day, July 20, the Prime Minister spelled out in more detail those basic conditions, and on this matter of universality he said:

> The objective, as we see it, must be universal coverage. I cannot see any basis otherwise for a federal contribution.

He went on to say:

> There is often confusion as to the relation between universality and compulsion. Our purpose is that everyone should qualify for benefits. This involves compulsion in the sense that, if a premium is chosen by a province as part of the method of financing, the premium would be compulsory in the sense that taxes are compulsory. Obviously there is no compulsion on people to use the services, nor any compulsion on the individual doctor to join the plan if the demand for his services is such that he can practice successfully outside it.

He went on to say:

> The "principle of need" which was referred to yesterday rejects the idea of universality on the grounds that, if low-income people are covered, others can afford the premiums under private insurance plans. To us, the weaknesses of this are that (1) it sets up an undesirable distinction according to income levels; and (2) even people with quite high incomes can face medical costs which are just as crippling as ordinary illnesses are for low-income people. Most such people may be covered by private plans, but not all will be. In practice, therefore, no extension of private plans will meet all the needs.

I have put this on record, Mr. Chairman, because I think these words of the Prime Minister should be kept in mind when we come to examining the legislation and the extent to which the general principles laid down are, in fact, implemented in the statute itself.

The third principle which the Prime Minister enunciated at the federal-provincial conference is as follows:

> Third, I think it will readily be agreed that a federal contribution can properly be made available only to a plan which is publicly administered, either directly by the provincial government or by a provincial non-profit agency.

Elaborating on this the next day, the Prime Minister said:

> A universal plan with a federal contribution must be a plan for which the provincial government takes full responsibility. It is necessarily a replacement of existing plans of other types. The procedures followed by provincial governments in dealing with the transitional arrangements in the case of hospital insurance would seem to have been highly satisfactory and equally applicable in the case of medical insurance. This means that the experience and skills involved in carrying out existing large programs can be transferred to the public program.
> Again, as in the case of hospital insurance, there will of course be scope for the continuation of private insurance for services above those provided in the public plan.

I underline the word "above"—not as part of the public plan.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it unanimously agreed that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam may continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: I thank the committee. I will try not to impose on their patience for too long.

I put that statement by the Prime Minister on record because I have a good deal of concern about what the government's legislation will contain with respect to the principle of public administration. The Prime Minister made a speech in Calgary on October 20, as reported in the Calgary Albertan of October 21 last. This is what the article said:

> Provincial governments are free to delegate administration of federally-supported medicare to private agencies, Prime Minister Pearson said yesterday.
> He denied opposition charges of a compulsory plan being forced on the provinces.
> Coverage should reach a level of about 95 per cent by a target date of two or three years.
> Government control should be retained whether the plan is administered by a government department or delegated to a private agency.

• (5:00 p.m.)

It appears to me that that is in complete contradiction to the principle which the Prime Minister laid down in his two statements on July 19 and July 20, 1965, to the federal-provincial conference.

In the Globe and Mail of June 30, 1966, I noticed a report of a statement by Dr. Matthew Dymond, the Ontario Minister of Health. I shall not take up the time of the committee by reading it, but he pointed out that the Ontario government plan at the present time covers about 1½ million persons, and if all those covered by doctor sponsored plans and insurance companies were added on, Ontario would have a plan covering over 90 per cent of the people and therefore in his opinion would be eligible to come under the medicare plan which the federal government is proposing.

I think this is a very important point. If the government wants this plan to succeed I believe it must stand by the principle of public administration. The Prime Minister said that this was to be a replacement for private plans and that insurance companies could give additional benefits if they wanted to do so.

The whole question about which we in this party are concerned, and we shall be closely examining the legislation on this point, is whether the medicare plan in some provinces is going to be turned over to private insurance companies and private carriers, because if it is the cost will go up astronomically. This stands to reason because there will be duplication. There will be promotion, there will be advertising, and there will be commissions to be paid to people who go out to sell insurance.

The experience of the Saskatchewan medicare program, which has been in operation since July 1, 1962, is that the administrative costs have been kept down to less than 6 per cent. Less than 6 cents out of every dollar paid by the public for medicare goes for administration whereas, as hon. members know, in private plans this cost can range anywhere from 16 cents to as high as 30 cents and in many cases works out at an average of 23 cents to 27 cents on the dollar.

If this plan is going to give the Canadian people the best possible medicare for the lowest expenditure, in my opinion it has to be publicly administered. It cannot be turned over to private carriers or the Canadian people will find they are paying unduly large amounts of money for the medicare which they require.

The final point which the Prime Minister outlined in his speech of July 19 was as follows:

—and finally, I think it is important to recognize the mobility of Canadians; each provincial plan should therefore provide full transferability of benefits when people are absent from the province or when they move their homes to another province.

Of course there will be no quarrel with that. That is basic.

In answer to the question put by the hon. member for Macleod, who was worried about what happens when people go overseas, under the medicare plan in Saskatchewan—and I assume most provinces will follow the same practice—the medicare card is acceptable in any country of the world for medical services provided in another country. The bill can either be sent to the Saskatchewan medicare commission or the patient can pay the bill himself and later get reimbursement from the commission.

May I now turn briefly to the other question which is, when will we get medicare? The government has talked about a target date of July 1, 1967, but I have been somewhat concerned about the statement made by the Minister of Finance last November 5 when he said medicare would probably have to be postponed because of the shortage of doctors. I hope the government will not delay.

There is much in what the hon. member for Simcoe East has said about the need for more doctors, the need for medical schools and the need for more medical research. Also he is quite correct when he says that we, the Canadian people, have been derelict for the last 20 years in grappling with this problem. But on the other hand I want to say to the minister that if we delay in setting up medicare until the situation is entirely satisfactory, the plan will never be put into operation.

There is something about human nature whereby we never do things until we have to do them. We work best in a crisis and under pressure, and since the preparatory work has not been done—there has been some done but not sufficient—I would hope the government would go ahead with medicare and that it would cling to its target date of July 1, 1967.

The hon. member for Simcoe East warned the government not to fall into the pitfalls experienced in Great Britain. I think he was somewhat unfair to the British health plan when he spoke about a doctor sending patients to hospitals where some other doctor treated them. That has been the practice in Britain, Germany and other western European countries for a century. They have a totally different medical system. They separate their doctors into physicians and surgeons, and a general practitioner is not allowed to take his patient into a hospital.

The things to which my hon. friend has referred cannot be attributed to the British health plan. If one wants to use quotations, I can say that one day at a luncheon meeting I was addressing in London I sat beside one very senior Conservative cabinet minister who said to me, "I voted against the British health plan, I campaigned against it, but I have to admit now it is the best thing we have ever done on these islands. Even if it cost us twice what it is costing, it would be worth it; our children are healthier and our general level of health is vastly superior to anything it has ever been throughout our history."

Of course the hon. member for Simcoe East is right. There has been congestion. There have been problems and wrinkles to be ironed out, as there will be in the Canadian health plan, but if we wait until we have a perfect setup we will never start.

We in Canada have waited far too long for a step which has already been taken by most of the countries of western Europe, and in fact taken by some of them before the turn of the century. The information I want to get from the minister is whether the government is going to proceed with this legislation. We have had a variety of reports. As late as June 6 the house leader, the Minister of Public Works, said that the medicare bill would be dealt with before the summer recess. More recently he has been talking about only the resolution being passed.

Three times on Sunday the C.B.C. reported that the Prime Minister had indicated he wanted all stages of the medicare legislation passed before a summer recess. I do not know whether that is true. The C.B.C. is sometimes given to managing the news and lately has taken to manufacturing it. This also may have been manufactured, but I want to say to the government that it will make a great mistake if it does not deal with this legislation before we adjourn.

If this legislation is left until the fall some of the provinces may use that as an excuse to say they have not had sufficient time to prepare the complementary legislation which they must submit to their legislatures. I think any province that is really interested could have its legislation drafted by now or would be in the process of drafting it, but the minister and this house cannot afford to give any province an alibi for not being ready to come into this plan on July 1 next.

I think this matter ought to be dealt with at this session before we recess for a summer adjournment. It may be said that members wish to get back to their constituencies. Certainly, as much as any other member, I would like to get back to my constituency. I may point out to the government that it is not our fault that this legislation was not brought down two or three months ago; it is not our fault that the government has dallied and delayed in bringing this matter to the attention of the house. But now that it is here I suggest we have a duty to the people of Canada and have a debt to posterity to see that this legislation is put on the statute books of Canada before we leave here for a summer holiday. I should like to tell the government that so far as members of this party are concerned we are prepared to stay here and take whatever time is necessary to deal with this legislation.

A while ago a question was asked with regard to whether this legislation would go to the committee on health and welfare. We would point out to the minister that this legislation is the result of a royal commission which spent four years studying this matter and travelling from one end of Canada to the other. In every section of Canada the people were allowed to make representations irrespective of who they were, what their profession was or what their interest was. This matter has been amply studied. Moreover, this legislation is enabling legislation. The real details of the medicare program will be drafted by the provincial legislatures. All this parliament can do is, first, say that the government of Canada will pay half the average per capita cost of providing this service in any province which cares to establish a plan and, second, it can lay down the basic principles upon which that provincial plan must be predicated. This is all this parliament can do. I see no reason why those principles cannot be put into legislation without submitting this matter to a committee. If the provinces wish to submit their legislation to provincial committees to discuss the details of the plan, that is their business.

I do plead with the minister, and perhaps more necessarily with some of the other members of the government: Do not let this house adjourn for the summer recess without passing this legislation. I ask the government not to weaken and not to delay. I believe the members of this house are prepared to support the minister in passing this legislation as expeditiously as possible. All the members of this house are asking of the government is that they give us some leadership in this regard. If we get that leadership, we will give the government continued co-operation to see that this legislation is passed without delay. It is important legislation because, as the minister himself has already said, this is another milestone in Canada's march toward the day when every Canadian citizen will be entitled to health services irrespective of their colour, their race or their ability to pay. For that reason we want it placed on the statute books as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I listened very intently to the speech made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and I must say that I am at variance with him on several points, for instance, when he asks us to whisk this legislation through. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) says that it is not even necessary to refer this bill to a committee for consideration, while we do not even have the bill before us yet.

And everything seems simplified in the mind of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Again this afternoon, during the question period, we asked if certain provinces which are a little more jealous of their constitutional rights want tax compensation instead of a subsidy. What would happen? Well, the minister seemed a little uncertain, and I am convinced that there is nothing in the bill now to cover that and that consideration in committee could be helpful in finding a solution to those problems.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam seems eager to hurry things, and not give the members of the house or the provinces too much of an opportunity to consider this legislation. Yet, it must be recalled that health is a provincial matter, and that the provinces are the ones which, in the final analysis under the terms of the constitution, have jurisdiction in the field of health.

And that is why I am surprised at that last-minute suggestion made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Although we are ready to sit during the summer, although we are ready to study Canadian problems, we are not ready to whisk such legislation through.

What we would be ready to accept, however, is that the bill be referred to the committee and that the committee sit during the summer months to take it under consideration. That would be acceptable to us.

We want to take our time in studying this bill, not because we want to avoid working, nor shirk our duty, but because, on the contrary, we want it looked into properly so that, later on, we will not blame ourselves.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned, as if it were something terrible, that health insurance should not be in the hands of private enterprise, adding that it would then be more costly.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that, in Canada, or at least in the province of Quebec, there are health insurance companies the purpose of which is not to make profit; they operate very well and give satisfaction to those who deal with them. For instance, the Quebec Health Service or Blue Cross can manage that type of health insurance program, at a lesser cost than what it would cost the state.

Saskatchewan has been given as an example. But it is in that province that the population has grown the least. Let someone tell us why the people of Saskatchewan leave it to go and live in Alberta and British Columbia. They do, because they are fed up with socialism, where the state tries to manage everything for the individual. The individual is not trusted; he is denied his responsibilities. And so, the citizens of Saskatchewan go elsewhere to live. The last census proved it. If there is a province where the population did not increase, that is Saskatchewan.

To what is that due? To the fact that an attempt was made to decrease the responsibilities of the individual, to strip him of his personality, in order to hand everything over to the state. We can see what it has led to: not much. It kept the province from progressing in comparison with the other prairie provinces which have developed much more rapidly.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to let this bill be rushed through in such a way that will prevent us from realizing what has happened. We do not even have a copy of the bill.

If the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam agrees to the committee sitting during the summer so that the hon. members can look into this bill, we have no objection. But if they try to railroad a bill in such a way that nobody is able to see anything, well, then we raise an objection.

Mr. Chairman, it was said a while ago that the federal government had only two things to do: to pay the 50 per cent of the cost and, second, to enumerate the conditions. But we should like to know how the 50 per cent will be paid to the provinces. We do not agree at all with the federal government collecting tax money and then saying to the provinces: set up a program in such a way so as to use this tax money in an orderly fashion. We prefer a system like the one adopted for many other programs, that is a fiscal compensation. If they expect that medicare is going to cost such an amount to the province of Quebec and the federal government is going to pay half the cost, the province of Quebec should get a fiscal equivalent for what that will cost the federal government.

That is one of the first conditions we would like to see included in the bill, because we believe it is very important that the jurisdiction of the provincial government in the field of health should be respected as much as possible. We think that is possible in the case of medicare. That has been done in other areas, in many joint programs; therefore, why could this not be done with medicare? I think the minister will not object and if he failed to make such provision in the bill, he will see to it, before introducing the bill, to move an amendment so as to enable the provinces to choose either between a fiscal compensation or any other plan that the federal government will make available to them or leave them free to accept.

As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it is a known fact that this province has decided to establish its own medicare plan. The only thing we can do here to support this plan is to demand that a fiscal compensation rather than a straight subsidy or grant be paid by the federal government, because we feel that the federal government would override its jurisdiction and we are against any further infringements on the rights of the provinces. Once the federal government has decided to pay a certain amount or give a fiscal compensation, it may then leave the provinces a free hand in the administration of their medicare plan.

If the provinces want to go through private, non-profit organizations, let them. In many cases, it has been demonstrated that the administration of such a plan by a private organization—by this I mean a private, non-profit insurance company—is preferable and less expensive. Let the provinces take their own decisions on their own programs, since this is under their jurisdiction, under their responsibility in this area of health.

Mr. Chairman, that is all we have to say at this stage and we object to this being a state plan, where all is controlled by the state, that is the doctors, the drugs, the hospitals and the rest. We want individuals to preserve their right to choose, that they may continue to live in accordance with their own decisions and their own responsibilities; we object to any infringement by the state in the field of health. The goal to be attained in a health insurance plan is to provide health care for all Canadians, regardless of wealth, rank, race, religion, or age. The objective is to make it possible for each citizen to have access to medical care. There is a way to reach that goal. It can be done through a government program administered, directed, supervised, inspected by the government, and we want none of that.

In the field of health, even more than in others, the individual has a right to his freedom, he must be free to choose his own plan, his own doctor. And in the field of health also, the doctors must be left free. Since medicine is a profession, we must leave to the doctors as much personal ambition as possible, as much personal initiative as possible; only if those conditions are respected will we have good doctors, in short competent doctors. They must not be turned into government employees. They must not be turned into bureaucrats who will have to work in shifts. We must give that profession all the freedom it needs. We must also give the individual, the human being, all the freedom he needs. The government must set up a plan where everyone will be free to choose but will have access to medical care, whatever his means, and even if he has no money at all, to get medical attention when he is sick, to go to the hospital when the need arises, to see a doctor.

That is the goal to be attained and the bill which will be introduced should seek to attain that goal, while leaving his freedom to the individual and the human being.

Mr. Chairman, the minister did not mention in his statement what such care will be; he said: it must be as general as possible. Well, it will be necessary to include all medical care, including dental care, etc.

Mr. Chairman, such are the few remarks we wanted to make; we will wait until we see the bill before discussing it further. We believe that it should be referred to the committee for further study. If that can be done during the summer months, we are ready to do it; if that must be postponed until the fall, we would deplore it, because we would prefer things to go even faster, but in any event, we are ready to co-operate if the bill is referred to the committee for further study, so that the legislation will be the best possible, to the benefit of each and every Canadian citizen.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in commenting on this resolution, which is a preliminary to the medicare legislation that has been talked about by the government now for such a long period of time, I should like to say that we in the Social Credit party are in complete agreement with the proposition advanced by the minister that every Canadian citizen and every Canadian family, regardless of financial status or any other classification that might be applied, must have full access to the highest quality, comprehensive health care possible, according to physical or mental needs. This is a basic principle, and I think we, not only as members of this house but as members of society as a whole, must assure every Canadian citizen and every Canadian family that it will be achieved.

In this regard I am just as anxious as any member of the New Democratic Party, the government or any other member of the house to see that every Canadian citizen receives complete health care according to his needs at a price he can afford. Therefore my remarks regarding this resolution at this time and in reply to the minister's statement are not in disagreement with that objective—we agree with that objective—but rather in disagreement with the method proposed as to how this objective should be achieved. Just because the government says that medicare is the most logical, efficient and economic way of achieving this objective, and just because the government suggests that its proposal is the best way of achieving this objective, does not make this necessarily true.

Having said that, I do not believe that the federal, provincial or municipal governments have any responsibility to care for the health needs of Canadian citizens who are themselves able to provide that care. That is the false philosophy of the welfare state. In my opinion the government does have a responsibility to assist those who are unable to provide for their own needs. If we accomplish that then we are meeting our responsibilities as our brothers' keepers.

Nothing less than the very best of health care must be made available to all Canadian citizens according to their needs, but that does not mean the government must provide this care. I have in mind now those citizens who are able to provide for themselves. If we provide hospitals, health services and various forms of health treatment then I think it is only reasonable for everyone to have access to them, but to throw that whole responsibility on the shoulders of the government is not necessary; in fact, it is wrong.

We are told today that this legislation is intended to pay for only physicians' services and the estimated cost is approximately $28 per capita, half of which is to be paid by the federal government. This represents only one small area of the over-all field of health care. For those who advance the thesis that the government is responsible for everyone, regardless of whether they can afford it or not, this is a major step. However, it is committing not only the federal government but the provincial governments to a program that will be vastly more expensive than $28 per capita. In fact, it is just the beginning, because if we say we are going to supply only physicians' services we are neglecting very important areas of health care that must later be included in the plan.

What about optometric care, particularly for our children? What about dental care? What about other forms of health care that are legitimate in the over-all field of caring for the sick, such as chiropractic treatment? These things must be included later. Therefore in dealing with this legislation we are actually committing ourselves to a program of health care that will be vastly more expensive than the plan we are talking about now.

I believe there are other things that are vitally important and which are inherent in this legislation. A government-dominated scheme, whether it is compulsory by direct premium or compulsory by being charged to general taxation leads inevitably to a loss of individual freedom. Nothing is more compulsory than taxation. Is it not possible for us in this democratic society to meet our basic responsibility to our fellow men without destroying, weakening or eroding those basic elements of freedom that are inherent in the democratic process? I think it is. Therefore I think we in this house who represent the Canadian people should make sure that in approaching the objective with which we all must agree we are using the most efficient and effective methods. I do not believe the legislation as outlined in this resolution and the minister's statement is the most efficient and effective method. To say that we must deal with this matter prior to the recess is to cut short essential discussion on the one hand and on the other to force upon the provinces and the people of Canada something which cannot deal with that quickly. It has been said that the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services has adequately dealt with the problem. I disagree. It made recommendations, some of which are very excellent. But this may not be the best answer to the problem. Just to commit the government to this phase of health care is to override many of the recommendations that were made relating to the supplying of adequate services to meet the needs of our people as they relate to health care.

The first speaker after the minister in the debate this afternoon, the hon. member for Simcoe East, a man in the medical profession whom I respect very much, raised a point that was also included in the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services. I refer to our ability to provide the facilities, doctors and nurses necessary for the proper functioning of this program. Just to ignore certain aspects of the commission's report because we think we must now force a commitment upon the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces is absolutely wrong. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that if the public were fully aware of the ultimate cost in relation to the benefits that will be received under the legislation as proposed at the present time, they would be most hesitant to accept such a plan; in fact, I think they would reject it.

Another vital area, as medical care relates to the general field of welfare, is that of priorities. I believe we are approaching the general responsibility of public welfare in reverse. There are priorities within our responsibilities in the area of public welfare which must be established. We cannot afford, the public purse cannot pay for, the over-all cost of public welfare to which we are today committing ourselves.

I think the basic priority that we have to the public at large and to our children is one of education. I believe it is necessary to make sure that we give education the priority it must have. I refer not only to general education but to the education involved in giving our people the health care they deserve. This includes the training of doctors, the building of hospitals and providing research facilities. If we move in with a medicare program for which we have not laid adequate foundations or made complete provision, we are cutting off our nose to spite our face. I say it is absolutely imperative that we give education in all its aspects the first priority so far as our welfare responsibility is concerned.

I would say that our second priority in this area of responsibility concerns health care. But again I say that I do not believe it is the responsibility of the government to assume the health care of all Canadian people. If the Canadian people are what I believe them to be, they want to accept their own responsibilities as they relate to themselves and their families. In the area of government we must accept responsibility through the public purse to take care of those unable to take care of themselves. If we do this we are meeting our over-all responsibility because we will have made available to everyone the health facilities and services we are able to provide. This is our second area of responsibility, so far as priority is concerned, in the general area of welfare.

I would suggest that the third area of welfare in the priority picture is that of pensions, providing for our older people and those who cannot work. What we are doing now is approaching the problem in reverse. We have imposed upon the taxpayer a costly pension plan. It is described as a compulsory saving plan; it is actually a compulsory pension plan. Now we are dealing with medicare. Some time in the near future we will be dealing with education and will get ourselves into trouble. In fact, we are in trouble already in this regard because those concerned with education of whatever kind know very well that the dollar available for education is not adequate. The provincial departments of education, the Teachers' Federation, the ratepayers' associations, are concerned about the fact that they do not have enough money with which to bear the responsibility that is theirs, and the federal government must come in and assist them.

But you cannot solve the problem by pushing it farther from you. There is only the tax dollar available to meet all these charges. Whether it is collected and used by the federal, provincial or local governments does not really matter so far as the taxpayer is concerned, because it is he who pays the tax. Therefore I think it is imperative that in dealing with this legislation we consider the area of priority as it concerns our financial ability to pay through the public purse.

Coming to the points the minister elaborated on today in introducing this resolution, I would make a few comments in the order of his presentation. The minister said the first requirement that will be imposed upon the provincial governments, in relation to their being qualified to receive the 50 per cent contribution from the federal government, is that their medicare schemes provide doctors' services on a universal basis. First of all I believe that the scope is entirely too narrow.

• (5:40 p.m.)

There is a question which I wish to address to the minister and which I think he owes it to us to answer even before the legislation is introduced. Who will set the doctors' fees? The minister says arbitrarily that the plan will cost $28 per capita and the federal government will pay $14 out of that sum, but has the federal government set up a scheme for doctors' fees to which the doctors of Canada and the provincial governments must adhere?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thompson: How then can the federal government force the provincial governments into a program that requires complete coverage by the medical practitioners? Twenty-eight dollars will probably not be enough to cover it. Perhaps the medical fees will vary from one province to another. The matter of the doctors' fees is very important, and for the minister to say that the government will not set those fees means that the door will be opened to much confusion, trouble and inequity in the various provinces.

Mr. MacEachen: May I clarify this point for my hon. friend? It is certainly not the intention in the federal legislation to set up any schedule of fees. This would be a matter for determination within a provincially administered medical care plan.

Mr. Thompson: The minister says this will be the responsibility of the provinces but in this legislation the federal government is stating, or I expect it will, how much will be allowed for doctors' fees to each province on a per capita basis.

Mr. MacEachen: The federal government will reimburse the provinces on the basis of actual experience in the amount of one-half of the per capita cost of providing insured services in the participating provinces. The federal government's role will be the reimbursement of the fees established within the provinces according to their experience.

Mr. Thompson: Time does not permit me, Mr. Chairman, to debate this point at the present time. I hope it will turn out to be as simple as it is now outlined by the minister. I have certain reservations about it.

I say to the minister, in regard to the narrowness of the scope of this scheme, that I suppose the prepayment of medical practitioners' fees is one area where the program can be initiated, but it is very unfair because there are other areas of health service which do not concern medical practitioners and which are omitted in this legislation.

Mr. Chairman: Order please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Red Deer but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Please continue.

The Chairman: Does the committee of the whole give consent to the hon. member for Red Deer to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the indulgence of hon. members and your own, Mr. Chairman, in permitting me to continue.

My third observation on the first matter raised by the minister concerns our ability to supply adequate numbers of medical practitioners on the basis that is proposed in this legislation. This has already been dealt with in the debate but I think it represents a very real problem.

Experience with medicare programs in Saskatchewan, Great Britain, New Zealand, Sweden and elsewhere has indicated that immediately the services of medical practitioners are made available on the basis demanded in this legislation the work load of the practitioners is increased. I think that our own inability to increase the number of medical graduates in this country, together with the loss of our graduates through immigration to other countries, in spite of the numbers that arrive here from Great Britain, will pose a very real problem in the implementation of this plan. It is one thing to say we will implement it by July 1, 1967; it is another thing to make it functional on an equitable basis.

Second, we were told this afternoon that any provincial medicare program must give universal coverage but that it will not be compulsory. I find that in this explanation the minister has made a play on words. It seems to me to be practically an exercise in semantics because what could be more compulsory than having to pay for the medicare program through a general tax contribution. In fact it amounts to political blackmail, although I hesitate to use the word because I know the minister, not being that kind of a person, does not really intend it, so far as the provinces are concerned and the individuals as well who do not choose to accept that it is the government's responsibility to meet their own health needs. How can he say it is voluntary if he intends to force the provincial governments to pay for something they are not going to get? It is certainly very compulsory. It includes everyone arbitrarily, whether they need it or not, and therefore to say it is not a compulsory scheme so far as payment is concerned is incorrect.

I have been referring specifically to the financial aspect being made compulsory. It is a good feature of this legislation that the freedom to choose doctors is left up to the provincial authorities and is not made compulsory. I believe it is also a violation of individual rights. I suppose one cannot accept the government's responsibility in areas such as these without sacrificing one's individual rights, but that is really unnecessary. I think other alternatives or approaches might be found to be more satisfactory.

In the third point which the minister made in his statement he referred to the fact that one of the prerequisites of the federal government is that the provincial governments must apply the medical program through provincial plans which are non-profit and subject to public audit. What the minister is actually doing here is wiping out the private carrier. How can a private insurance scheme operate under the qualifications that have been outlined to us this afternoon? An hon. member had just said they are not supposed to do so but why should we accept something that is less efficient and more costly if it can be done another way? I believe that today it is possible, because of the efficiency of private enterprise and with proper government regulation, to supply medicare insurance through private carriers at a more economic rate than can be done through public carriers because, whether we like to admit it or not, the government is the least efficient body in administering such schemes.

Mr. Barnett: May I ask the hon. member, in connection with his suggestion regarding the relative efficiency of public and private plans, whether he heard the figures on the administrative cost put before the committee earlier today by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam?

Mr. Thompson: I have certainly heard them but the fact is that when you begin to deal with public administrative costs, much of it is hidden in other services that are not directly related to it. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam did not say very much about the tremendous escalation of the first projected cost of the Saskatchewan medicare system. Only two years after the system was implemented in Saskatchewan the premium cost had more than doubled. Inherent in this are other charges which are also related to public expense. Perhaps there could be justification for doing it that way if the public purse can afford it. But this is not a proven fact by any means. I do not understand why the minister demands that every provincial government eliminate the private carriers now providing health insurance. Certainly this is not good economy or efficiency so far as the citizens of this nation are concerned.

Time does not permit a lengthy debate on this subject but I should like to say very briefly that portability, as explained by the minister, is very necessary. However, this is something which I think can be worked out without forcing this type of medicare program on the provinces. I believe every provincial health administration realizes it is unfair to implement a provincial medicare scheme that is not transferable. The transferable feature has worked rather well so far as hospital insurance is concerned and I am sure it could be worked so far as medicare is concerned without making it a prerequisite, as in this legislation, although in principle we must accept it.

I believe it would be wrong to criticize the remarks the minister has made this afternoon without offering some alternative proposals. Very briefly, I should like to mention to him another way of achieving the objective which we all agree must be our ultimate goal in the area of health. If the government had said that they were going to be completely responsible for the medical care of pensioners in Canada, they would have relieved provincial health administrations of one of the most costly areas of medical care. Because we are concerned with pensions for our senior citizens, the government could well have said that they were going to extend that pension responsibility to include complete medical coverage for these pensioners.

I believe the provision of medical care is even more essential for these older citizens than increasing the pension to $100 per month. We all know that the most expensive time of our life, in so far as medical costs are concerned, is in our senior years. This would have been an area in which the federal government could have legitimately claimed jurisdiction, and it would have saved provincial departments of health tremendous amounts of money in the implementation of their own medicare programs. I do not believe we have to have uniformity in medicare programs across the country simply because the needs of areas differ.

Another practical way of meeting the increasing costs of medicare would be to supply the provincial governments with a per capita grant. If it were desired to place prerequisites on the making of the grants, it could have been stipulated that they must be used for preventive medicine. They could also have been designated for the care of our children because it is in these areas that preventive medicine offers the greatest opportunity of service.

I would also suggest to the minister that I believe it is the desire of every Canadian citizen to take care of his own needs. Unfortunately there are some who are unable to do so. This is particularly true when some unfortunate accident happens to the family. I am speaking from experience in this connection because throughout the years my father's family had tremendous health costs. I remember, as a young school teacher, that my dad took me into the room where he kept his records and showed me receipts for more than $10,000 for medical and hospital care. This was at a time when dollars were worth a lot more than now. This burden of medical costs made it difficult for him to provide assistance to those who were fortunate enough to have good health and who wanted an education. There are many families in Canada today who face such a calamity. I believe the one great fear many Canadian parents have in so far as medical costs are concerned is that some unfortunate accident or disease will hit them and they will not have the financial means to meet it.

Thus as a third point I believe the federal government, therefore, could easily justify providing every Canadian family with some form of basic calamity or accident insurance policy which would take care of hospital and medical fees say in excess of $1,000. In summary if the government had proposed such a program that would take care of our senior citizens first, that would assist the provinces in taking care of our school age children or pre-school age children with respect to preventive health care through the provision of a per capita grant or if we had some kind of insurance scheme to take care of extreme cases of accident or disease catastrophe, I think they would have had an alternative so far as their responsibility for medicare is concerned. Then the provinces would be able to take care of the remaining medical costs without placing too great a burden upon them. This is why, Mr. Chairman, I find it very difficult to accept the arguments that have been put forward by the minister today that this is the best method by which our responsibilities in the area of health care can be met.

On the basis of those arguments it is impossible for us to give support to the legislation he is proposing. I do not agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that this legislation must be dealt with in the next week or two. I hope that if this resolution does pass, as we expect it will even though we cannot give it our support, the legislation will be referred to the proper committee. If it is possible for some of our committees considering major legislative items to meet prior to parliament reconvening, that would be good. I believe therefore that provision must be made before we leave here to send this legislation to a committee for further study. We should not pass the legislation in an autocratic fashion that would deny the provinces the medical profession and others, the right to make representations before a committee. We should not force something on the provinces which is going to commit them to vast sums of money without the provinces having too much to say about it. I believe, therefore, that as soon as the legislation is introduced it should be referred to the committee for the further study which it deserves and must have.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure for me to rise to speak in this house, because I am sitting on this side of the house which has always been in the vanguard of Canada's future. We have been given a further proof of this in the last two hours because it seems that hon. members opposite who have taken a position on the measure do not seem to know what medicare is about. Everything was mixed up: socialism, drugs and medicine. It seems to me it might be well advised at times, to consider whether speeches should not be somewhat shorter, but mean something.

We have always been the party of the people. We are the party dealing daily with the needs of the Canadian people and that is why I am doubly pleased to take this opportunity to say a few words about this social security measure which is part of the vast general humane program of my party, I mean medicare as proposed by our government.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) at the federal-provincial conference of July 65, had, as you know, stated that the federal government would financially assist the provinces willing to introduce medicare, provided they meet the four basic requirements or principles which are that the schemes be universal—a much discussed point about which I shall say more later—transferable, that they provide assistance for or, if you prefer, that they include all medical services provided either by practitioners or by specialists, whether in the hospital, in the office or at home and, finally, that such plans be administered by a provincial government or under its responsibility.

Of these four principles, two—transferability of benefits and complete assistance or coverage of all medical services, seem to have been almost unanimously approved by Canadians.

I shall try, as much as possible, to speak today on the two other requirements laid down by my government to help the provinces anxious to attract their citizens, that is universality and public administration. The basic principle underlying the provision of medicare by the government is society's responsibility to provide all citizens with adequate health services.

Every Canadian citizen has a perfect right to complete and continued protection. That is a basic human right like the right to education, life and freedom. The government cannot divest itself of its responsibilities by relying on the administration of private enterprises, whatever they may be, for profitable purposes or not. Physical health, like mental health, is equally important in remaining able to work, in holding a remunerative job. Furthermore, it is essential to the economic security of a nation; if an army's victory depends on a full stomach, the economic prosperity of a country depends on the health of its citizens.

Anyway, why should private companies be interested in the administration of a program on a non-profit basis, which would be the only acceptable way? These companies would have to see some advantage in it, for example publicity for their life insurance company, because many such companies were established for non-profitable purposes simply to have free publicity throughout the country. I do not see how these public funds can be used to this end, even in such an indirect way.

The federal government undertakes to pay 50 per cent of the cost of this program and must see to it that this money is used to provide protection for all its citizens on equal terms and conditions throughout Canada. Under the circumstances, in my humble opinion, only a public administration system can give the government this assurance without burdening the administrative machinery to no purpose with a control which is increasingly difficult to maintain and a nuisance to all.

Universal application, as the hon. Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) said several times, means that at least 90 per cent of the population of a province must be covered for the moment by the provincial program, again under uniform conditions and without differentiation as to age, financial position or ill health.

In a few years this 90 per cent of the population will become close to 100 per cent, the figure we are to reach. In my opinion, the government is wise to insist on this universal application, for, as I said earlier, it is responsible for the health of every individual, for humanitarian and economic reasons. The financial barrier which prevents many people from receiving medical care, affects not only the individual himself but all of society.

A person's illness creates a social void around him which affects not only his near relations but all society. It creates general disorder.

The question of the famous arguments, that is, whether the provinces are ready to receive the compulsory health insurance program called medicare, may be raised. Some sharp discussions have already taken place, but the government was wise enough, before entering this field, to appoint a commission called the Hall commission to inquire into health services in Canada and their needs.

Now, this commission which looked into the matter for almost three years, studied health needs and sought means to extend and improve present services, reached the same conclusion. It recommended a universal plan on a public management basis. All members of the commission seconded this recommendation, including doctors, nurses, dentists and even a former president of the Canadian Medical Association, an organization which comprises approximately 75 per cent of all Canadian doctors.

I feel that in the present situation, especially as I pointed out earlier, it rests with the government to provide for education and health services. It is up to the government to provide the required funds so that no Canadian in 1967 is deprived of the bare minimum, including health.

And I know that in this very house, on August 22, 1958, when hospital insurance began to take shape in the province of Quebec, it was said that that province would only participate in a hospital insurance plan, as stated by the member for Quebec West:

When we have beds for the sick.

It was only two years later that the province of Quebec, with the same number of beds or almost, went down to history as being the last to participate in the Canadian hospital plan, after losing approximately $154 million in benefits.

I shall now give a brief historical account of what has taken place in Canada over a good many years.

[English]

The interest which all provinces now have in public health insurance began first in the western provinces of Canada and in Newfoundland. While the legislature of British Columbia was probably the first to consider the issue of health insurance with the appointment of a royal commission in 1919, the first action was taken in the prairie provinces during and after world war I with the operation of the union hospital and municipal doctor systems, and in Newfoundland with the introduction of the cottage hospital system in 1934.

Further action was taken by several provinces during the period 1943 to 1949. In Quebec in 1943 an act to constitute a health insurance commission was passed. The commission was directed to study the problem of health insurance and to suggest a plan. However, in 1945 the legislation was repealed and the work was terminated. The Municipal Health Services Act was passed in Ontario in 1944 to enable municipalities to develop contributory plans subject to approval of the provincial department of health for whatever medical care services were required.

Under the Health Services Act of 1945 Manitoba made provision for the extension of health services and for the organization of medical care districts in which, subject to approval of the Minister of Health, municipalities could enter into contracts with physicians for specified, prepaid medical care. A Health Services Act was passed in Saskatchewan in 1945 to provide comprehensive health services including hospital, medical and dental services, and pharmaceutical benefits for persons receiving old age pensions, mothers' allowances, and general welfare. Beginning in 1946, under the same legislation the Swift Current health region operated a universal, prepaid, public medical care service for residents of that area.

The Saskatchewan hospital services plan began operation in 1947. It was the first provincial program to provide comprehensive, prepaid hospital insurance on a compulsory basis to almost the entire population. Alberta introduced a maternity hospital care program in 1944 and the Alberta hospital services plan in 1949, which were available without charge to all residents. The British Columbia hospital insurance service began also in 1949 in that province.

Public medical care insurance plans are presently in operation in seven provinces: Newfoundland, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. Newfoundland provides coverage for medical and surgical care to part of the population, under the cottage hospital medical care plan. In Manitoba, under the provisions of the Health Services Act, 1945, voluntary, prepaid coverage is available in organized medical care districts for medical care specified in contracts between physicians and municipalities. Since 1962 Saskatchewan has been operating a province-wide, compulsory medical care insurance program. The Swift Current regional medical care insurance plan contiues in contract with the medical care insurance commission of the province. Public programs for the provision of voluntary medical insurance to any resident have been in operation in Alberta since 1963, and in British Columbia since 1965. Ontario has amended its legislation passed in 1965 and has scheduled a plan of voluntary coverage for any resident which commenced operation on July 1, 1966. Quebec accepted a modified health plan for its social beneficiaries last April. It is presently studying a medical care insurance plan and the provincial government has expressed its intention to introduce a plan by January 1, 1968.

The three maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have not taken any independent action to plan or introduce public medical care insurance except that at the conference of federal and provincial ministers of health, held in Ottawa on February 1, 1966, New Brunswick accepted the federal proposals but Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island did not make any commitment on these proposals for health insurance. Maybe Prince Edward Island will change its mind after what happened yesterday.

The first recorded official interest of the federal government in health insurance was in 1928 when the standing committee on industrial and international relations was authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and disability. Their recommendations culminated in the Employment and Social Insurance Act, 1935, which provided for the appointment of a commission to gather information on health insurance plans and to submit to the Governor in Council proposals for federal cooperation in the provision of benefits. The act was subsequently declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court and the Privy Council.

More thorough study of the issue began in 1941 when the minister of pensions and national health presented a report on the deficiencies in public health and medical services in Canada to the annual meeting of the Dominion Council of Health. The members were sympathetic to the formulation of a plan for health insurance. A study was then launched, with that objective, under the direction of the department of pensions and national health. The Canadiana Medical Association formed a committee on health insurance to assist in the preparation of a draft plan for public health and health insurance. The outcome of this study was a draft bill which was reported to the House of Commons on July 29, 1944. It was discussed with provincial ministers and deputy ministers of health in May of that year. The federal proposal based on the bill was presented to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction convened in 1945. The proposal included a comprehensive health insurance program supported in part by federal contribution and administered by the provinces, health grants to improve public health services throughout Canada, and loans to assist and promote the construction of hospitals. However, discussion at the conference centred mainly on financial arrangements and taxation. Since all provinces failed to reach agreement with the federal government on those arrangements, adoption of the proposed national health program was precluded.

In the following years parts of the federal proposal of 1945 were separately put into effect. The national health grant program was introduced in 1948 to provide grants in aid of public health services, health surveys, professional training, and hospital construction. Then the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed in 1957. By the end of 1960 agreements had been made with all provinces and territories to make the program national in scope.

On June 20, 1961, the Royal Commission on Health Services was appointed with Chief Justice Emmett M. Hall as chairman. By Order in Council P.C. 1961-883 the commission was required to inquire into and report upon the existing facilities and the future need for health services for the people of Canada and the resources to provide such services, and to recommend such measures, consistent with the constitutional division of legislative powers in Canada, as the commissioners believe will ensure that the best possible health care is available to all Canadians. The commission's report was tabled in the House of Commons on June 19, 1964. This report further focused the attention of the federal government on the desirability of some system of nation-wide medical care insurance.

Subsequently, at the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa in July, 1965, the federal government made certain proposals to bring about a system of health insurance in all provinces by a target date of July 1, 1967. During the meeting of provincial and federal ministers of health in Ottawa on February 1, 1966, three provinces accepted the federal proposals and the others remained uncommitted without making any definite refusal of the offer. In reviewing the situation the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare hoped that all provinces would accept the proposals by the target date.

[Translation]

This shows, Mr. Chairman, that since 1919, for nearly 50 years, Canada has been seeking some solution for the conservation of the health of the individual. The Hall Commission has concretized this desire for medical care offered to every Canadian.

Many will say that conflicts will arise between physicians and patients. I do not think so. I think that even if we do not have yet the necessary material for the task which is shortly to be ours, and if we must make a superhuman effort, perhaps when these programs are implemented, I am speaking of physicians eventually, everything will level off. With our professional and technical training and health resources program, toward which the federal government put aside $500 million to develop that manpower of technicians, nurses, medical research centres, new universities which will train more physicians, everything will be phased-in, as was the case for hospital insurance. I am speaking of the province of Quebec and of a need its people wants to be fulfilled.

The Chairman: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Gatineau but the time allotted to him has expired.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee give consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, when members are given extensions of time, except for spokesmen for parties I think some limit should be placed on that extension. I would say five minutes.

Mr. Isabelle: A minute and a half.

[Translation]

This is the implementation of a general plan. This answers the needs of the population and we cannot afford not to grant it, because it is not only a need, but a right.

We must do it for the sake of our fellow-citizens, for the sake of our present government which is always ready, as it has always been in the past, to practise its theory of liberalism which consists in serving those in need, those who need its assistance.

This comes within the general implementation of social welfare programs and leads the way toward their fullest application in the near future.

Medicare will be the greatest piece of legislation ever undertaken by any government, since it will affect personally and directly each and everyone of 20 million Canadian citizens.

I ask the medical profession, to which I have the honour to belong, to be courageous as it has always been since the beginning of medical history, in order to prove to the other citizens that we are worthy of our forefathers, who worked without cease under extremely difficult conditions to accomplish the most humanitarian task, that of caring for one's fellow-men, so that they might enjoy the greatest gift all—health.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, let me tell those who say that Canada is not ready for a medicare program that the same thing happened in 1958. At that time, the Canadian hospitals, having only a limited number of beds, were not ready to accept the hospital insurance plan. I have before me a book which dates back to 1895, where the doctors of that time are advised to study so as to keep up with the progress of science in the last 15 years, that is since 1880. The doctors are asked to go back to university so as to be up to date. If the doctors of that time had followed this advice, they would have been forced to close their offices and their patients would have died while they were studying. We should not postpone indefinitely the establishment of the medicare plan in Canada, because it must come into operation in 1967. People are asking for it.

[Mr. Churchill.]

[English]

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member for Peace River proceeds, perhaps he would permit me to announce the item for the adjournment debate this evening. There is one question: the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Sherman), Industry—instructions from U.S. respecting flour for Cuba.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the remarks made by the preceding speaker I congratulate him on the simple and abiding faith he seems to have. I only wish I had it. It may be that he sits in a different position than I do, and maybe he has not been here as long, but I hope he can continue to have that sort of faith. It is very touching.

I intend to make reference later to some of the comments of the hon. member for Simcoe East, who made a tremendous contribution to this debate. So far as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is concerned, he said what was predictable, and I think what he said was mostly wrong. There is one thing about the hon. member. When he is wrong he is consistently wrong whereas, in contrast, the government is usually wrong but it is usually inconsistently wrong.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam spoke of the necessity of staying here to complete all stages of this legislation. The minister did not go quite that far. He was not quite that ambitious. He is prepared to make three or four bites of the cherry, and indicated a lurking desire to finish second reading.

There is, Mr. Chairman, no monopoly of political virtue in any part of this chamber. I am prepared, as I am convinced is each other member of this party, to stay in session if it is necessary. However, not only is it not necessary but it is quite undesirable that we should deal with any more than resolution stage at this time.

Despite the considerable finesse exercised by the minister when glossing over what I think are some compulsive features which will be embodied in this legislation, there are these aspects of it. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that there has been a royal commission preceding this legislation and there had been studies and surveys made which generated a lot of comment. So far as royal commissions are concerned, we have so many of them that when Canadians hear about a report of another royal commission they usually hide their heads under a pillow. But that is not the point. This debate should be on a national scale.

There are interests involved of provincial governments, of professional institutions, of hospitals and municipalities, and over and above that there are the interests of every person in Canada. It is my sincere view that when the resolution is passed and the bill is exposed it is desirable we should stop there so that the contents of the bill may become fully known. The minister knows what is in the bill. So far as he could he gave us some indication of what it contains, but it is a condition precedent to any further debate that during the course of the summer there should be an opportunity for the people of Canada to inquire into this measure, to formulate their views about it and pass those views on to their members of parliament who in turn can debate the measure. In that way we could make a greater, more interesting and more valid contribution when we return in the fall, and so I cannot go along with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam on that suggestion.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, my views are very much the same as those of the hon. member for Red Deer, with whom I do not always agree. It may be that the Chinook winds which originate in Calgary and blow up to Red Deer sometimes get as far as Peace River, but many of the things he has said are comments with which I find myself in agreement, especially those concerning welfare.

The phrase contained in the American Declaration of Independence, "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," has been translated in this country by this government as "life and the pursuit of welfare." Welfare, in its broadest sense and ordinary meaning, is fine, but the narrower, restrictive and artificial interpretation which is now all too often accepted is something else entirely.

Any step which is directed against the triple evils of poverty, disease and ignorance must of necessity be of overriding concern to any legislative body, but this does not relieve us of the obligation to scrutinize measures like this with the greatest of care. Not only must we look at the merits of the proposal itself but at its relationship to the national interest and the over-all economy.

As to the intrinsic merits certainly the Hall report, at first blush, appears to be ample authority. Any reader of this report will find a carefully documented argument, well buttressed with supporting material. To take the report by itself, one would be hard put to find reasons to oppose it but, set in the context of the contemporary political, social, and economic background, I have some misgivings which I must voice.

The minister has given us some hint, although it is not in terms of the report, of the cost of the scheme in terms of the federal contribution. To this we must add the provincial costs. One wonders about the validity of these figures. The original estimates prepared for almost all government proposals, for the great public works starting with the building of the railroads down to the building of the St. Lawrence Seaway, have always been greatly exceeded. In addition, there are the maintenance and annual carrying charges which are always substantially greater than estimated. This applies also to most of the social welfare schemes which we have introduced in Canada, and these costs are reflected in increased taxes—income, excise, sales, customs and property—a cost which is borne by the small consumer in two forms.

In the first place, it is an inescapable fact that as a result of the proven extravagance, waste and bad management in government the taxpayer's dollar when returned to him in the form of benefits has decreased when passing through the government establishment. Conversely, the cost is further increased because that portion of the public which has the opportunity to pass on the increased taxes paid always manages to do so in such a way, and with such an increment, that the aggregate of the amount passed on, in higher costs of goods and services, invariably exceeds what has been contributed in the form of taxes, and so there is a loss at both ends.

In the orthodox inflationary consideration, higher taxes mean higher prices, higher prices require higher wage levels, and sometimes there are strikes and work stoppages to obtain these with all the loss of production and confusion that follows. This in turn involves still higher prices with demands for more government-sponsored assistance, increases in pensions and so on. There is an ever-increasing, dizzy, upward spiral. Ask any housewife who goes to the supermarket to do her shopping. The improved standard of living and the related collateral social benefits that we all desire then become a mirage held out for us on the one hand—pension plan, assistance programs, medicare, higher wages—but then snatched away on the other by the fantastic increases we have to pay for everything needed for the ordinary business of living.

Social programs must be or ought to be financed out of increased national productivity. Surely there should be some relation between the quantum of such benefits and the index of our productivity. Unfortunately Canada has a top-heavy three level government structure, national, provincial and municipal, and with a tax system frequently operating to stultify incentive has been dispensing social welfare and wage increases without too much regard to its ability as a nation to pay for them out of increased productivity.

As a nation we seem to have acquired an infinite capacity for self-deception on this score. Certainly the capacity has been fostered and nurtured by the present government which gives the people a series of temporary palliatives, something to keep them momentarily content without regard to the ultimate cost. I think it is about time for some real sincerity and honesty, a time for a government to say: Here is the benefit if you desire it but here is the cost. Certainly this is what the Hall Commission suggested. I do not know what the minister will do in this regard, but recommendation No. 194 at page 88 of the Hall Royal Commission report reads as follows:

> That taxes collected by the federal government to pay for the expanded health services program be identified in such a manner as to make it clear to the taxpayer that the taxes paid cover the health service benefits made available to him.

I hope this will be in the bill when it is introduced.

The case which the government makes is as usual nothing but its stock of shop-worn clichés cunningly interwoven with the self-adulation which is the trade mark of the Liberal party. Rather than concentrating on baking a bigger and better pie, it has become obsessed with the task of trying to divide and subdivide the existing one.

I have tried to give some idea of the price we pay. What do we get in return? There is a guarantee of adequate medical care for those who might not otherwise have this benefit. We must, of course, consider this in terms of the shortage of personnel needed to provide this care. Here I should like to make a very brief comment in respect of the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe East. Here is a man who obviously is sincere and who has made a powerful contribution to this debate. He is a man who is on the firing line in this fight to provide health services, and he tells us honestly and sincerely of his fears for the future in the light of what he feels the government may have in mind. I do not think it is possible for anyone who heard the hon. member for Simcoe East to dismiss lightly the cautions and warnings he has uttered.

It is a very desirable and laudable objective to drive away the spectre of fear and the burden of having to endure the indignities and the misery and pain of illness which is susceptible to treatment and help. Certainly we must move to achieve this objective. The question is whether the government in its bill will provide a proposal which is acceptable without change and whether it can advance persuasive arguments that are logical that the scheme it proposes must be taken in its total form. It is my view, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come to take a stand, not necessarily a stand against the establishment of a program to provide a better medical health program in Canada but a stand that such programs, and all other social welfare programs, be dealt with with due regard to the essential priorities, with due regard to the impact they have on the life of people, and with due regard to the inflationary aspect of our economy. I have apprehensions about the slap-happy, haphazard, helter-skelter programs which this government has been introducing with more emphasis on political advantages than on proper planning.

I think we must consider our ability to finance these things. I am not speaking in terms of cost in dollars but rather in terms of the deteriorating dollar and in terms of the continuing diminishing amount which the dollar buys today. That is the consideration which I fear and which I have in mind. We must also think in terms of the necessity to provide adequate national savings in the form of real wealth for these programs as well as other essential programs which I see in relation to our need for increased productivity such as the development of national resources, improvements to our national transportation system, education generally, as well as increases in the productive skills of labour forces, increases in technological improvements required in respect of industry and so on. In addition we must be prepared to increase sharply our external aid to developing nations, not only to help them but in enlightened self-interest.

So, without opposing this resolution at this time until I have an opportunity to see, digest and discuss the legislation, I think it is essential that there be an objective and impartial survey and evaluation of our position vis-à-vis the use of our resources, one that should be made outside of government on a non-political basis.

I therefore have considered and suggest an amendment as follows:

"The said act shall not come into operation until such time as the Economic Council of Canada has made a report to parliament and to the government as to the relative priority in terms of time and capital to be assigned to present and proposed social welfare programs and such other measures as are required to develop productive capacity to provide for these and other requirements of the people, the said report to be made by July 1, 1967".

I am quite prepared to say, Mr. Chairman, that there may be some question about the amendment being in order. I am not going to make an argument on that now, but I propose it in order to emphasize the point of view I have been making. I feel that the Economic Council, a body independent of government which already through its reports has made a study of the over-all pattern of government costs and expenditures with relation to the price structure and productive capacity, is the proper body. Such a survey should examine these various proposals from the economic point of view including a study of the contribution they make and the extent to which they affect the price structure so that the net value and net worth of these programs can be assessed.

It is not my intention to suggest that the Economic Council should assume the responsibility of the government. Parliament and the government can never abdicate their sole responsibility in this regard. It is always for the government to initiate and for parliament to legislate these programs. But it is now apparent that we should provide ourselves with the best available information and that this requires at the present time a survey of the economy to see what effect these measures will have and to see what can be done to contain the price structure. I say quite sincerely that this is not necessarily a position in opposition to the measure. It will require a study of the terms set out in the bill to form an opinion in that regard.

In my view, however, we have failed to recognize the cumulative and pyramiding result that all such programs have on the general economic situation and the eroding effect on the financial position of the majority of Canadians, for example, those who have fixed incomes and farmers whose income is established by external conditions. This is on the assumption which we are entitled to make that no action or inadequate action is being taken to develop our productive capacity to stabilize price levels.

There is an Alice In Wonderland quality, or at least a great deal of hypocrisy, in the position of the federal government. We pass these various measures I have mentioned and thereby set a bad example in our extravagance in government. We provide, even initiate, wage increases without regard to sound basic guidelines. We shirk our duty to increase productivity. As a result of these factors or at least in large part because of them, when prices go up we complain in this house and elsewhere and we mumble about price control.

Even if imposed price controls ever make political and economic sense we have absolutely no jurisdiction to tamper directly with these controls. We are limited to the indirect method of fiscal and monetary steps. We set in motion inflationary forces; we inject their pressure into our economic system and then we whine and whimper about the results. For this reason it seems to me that such unbiased, non-political report should be available before we proceed. There would be no interference with the procedure of legislation.

If it should happen, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is impressed by the comments I have made, perhaps we could design the amendment I have moved in such a way as to satisfy him.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Peace River permit me to ask a question before he completes his remarks?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: I have listened carefully to the hon. member. He made reference several times to social welfare and said, if I understood him correctly, that he was not using that term in its broad sense. Is there any distinction in his mind between a social welfare program such as the recently adopted Canada Assistance Plan and a social insurance program such as the proposal in this resolution? I ask this question not only because of the references in his speech but because of the use of the expression "social welfare programs" in the amendment he desires to move. In my mind this involves the whole question of relevancy.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I think I made the distinction that there was a difference between the welfare of the people and social welfare as that term has been used. It may well be that certain types of social welfare programs in the final analysis have a beneficial affect on the welfare of individuals. The point I was trying to make and express in my amendment was that you must take the whole impact of this program on a price structure and a priority basis. A distinction can be made at times between a social welfare program and the welfare of the people generally. The whole picture has to be taken into view.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member has not dealt with the question whether he makes a distinction between a social welfare program and a social insurance plan.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not think there would be a great distinction in relation to the amendment I moved.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Do you wish argument at this time?

The Deputy Chairman: I shall put the amendment to the committee. It is moved by the hon. member for Peace River that:

> The said act shall not come into operation until such time as the Economic Council of Canada has made a report to parliament and to the government as to the relative priority in terms of time and capital to be assigned to present and proposed social welfare programs and such other measures as are required to develop productive capacity to provide for these and other requirements of the people, the said report to be made by July 1, 1967.

The Chair would like to have the assistance of hon. members in order that a decision can be made as to the admissibility of this amendment. It must be relevant to the resolution before it can be admissible.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the motion before the house reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada towards the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

The question before the house is whether it is expedient to introduce such a measure. The amendment in its present form does not relate to that motion because it states in part:

> The said act shall not come into operation—

There is no connection in that regard with the motion now before the house. I do not think it is necessary to go beyond that simple point to demonstrate the inadmissibility of this amendment, because the simple connective tissue has not been provided to link the two. We are dealing with a resolution and not with an act. The form of the amendment is deficient. I do not wish to go beyond that in this argument.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments on the question of the admissibility of the amendment. As I understand the proposed motion, it says it is expedient to introduce a measure. In my understanding that has always meant it is expedient to introduce a measure which will in fact be an act of parliament. It appears to me that in this practical sense the proposed amendment is a direct negative of the resolution put forward by the minister. It states in effect that it is not expedient to introduce a measure for the purpose of assisting in provincial medical insurance plans until certain other things have taken place. Therefore it cannot properly be attached to the main motion as an amendment inasmuch as the passing of it would negative the original motion.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I do not have a copy of the proposed amendment before me, but I am afraid I cannot accept the argument advanced by the minister to the effect that it is irrelevant because it refers to an act whereas the resolution refers to the fact that it is expedient to introduce a measure.

Any measure that follows a resolution is a bill and once a bill is passed it becomes an act. I presume the hon. member for Peace River is trying to use a word that would properly describe what would in fact result if the proposed measure were passed. He wants the government to wait until the Economic Council of Canada has made a report to parliament and to the government as to the relative priority in terms of time and capital. He has stated that by that time, if there is to be no interference with the passage of this resolution, measure, bill or act, it would in effect be an act.

I am concerned about another aspect regarding the propriety of introducing an amendment of this kind, notwithstanding the fact that I personally agree with the purpose and purport of the amendment. It seems to me that it is in effect an exercise in futility to adopt a resolution and then a bill, winding up with an act, if that process is dependent upon a report from a body other than parliament. It seems to me that it is the responsibility of parliament and the government to gather whatever information they require prior to passing an act, and I am not sure of the propriety of any act of this parliament being dependent upon the opinion of any other body, even one of the eminence of the Economic Council of Canada.

• (6:50 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order. With regard to the relevancy of the amendment now before the committee, it seems to the Chair that the amendment goes beyond the provisions of the resolution. Therefore it would appear irrelevant to the resolution and as such the amendment would be out of order. May I also suggest that the amendment fails on other grounds in that it is declaratory of principle and is in the nature of a reasoned amendment. The authority for this ruling is to be found at page 798 of May's seventeenth edition, chapter XXIX, headed "Expenditure: Financial Resolutions. Procedure in Committee of the Whole House on Expenditure." The paragraph headed "Scope of Debate on Resolution" reads as follows:

> Debate in committee on a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

The next section, headed "Procedure on Amendments", says:

> The approval or the reduction of the expenditure under consideration, or an increase in the stringency of the terms and conditions of the charge thereby created, are the matters specially entrusted to such a committee, and to these objects amendments are directed.
> An amendment proposing to substitute for the resolution an argumentative justification for the refusal of the demand is out of order—

On these grounds I regret that I must declare this amendment out of order.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to congratulate the minister and the government for bringing forward this very important measure at this time. I should particularly like to congratulate the minister because I think that in the relatively short time he has held this office he has done a remarkable job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Davis: A great many people in this country have been talking about medicare for a long time and have often been very glib about the subject. It is one which involves several jurisdictions, not the least of which is the provincial jurisdiction, and action in this connection tends to tread on many toes. The minister has effectively carried out his negotiations with the provinces. As a result of his efforts the provincial governments know where the federal government stands in this respect, and I am quite sure that the medical profession and many other people associated with the provision of health care in this country now have a much better idea of where we are heading than has ever been the case in the past. I am quite sure they have a much better idea, for example, than had the professional people in the province of Saskatchewan a few years ago when the previous Saskatchewan government's medicare plan was brought in there.

I want to concentrate briefly on some of the financial aspects of this plan, but first I would say that medicare, in the sense of this resolution and later the bill, rounds out the number of vital health care services which we badly need in this country. We had the health grants legislation back in the late 1940's. We had hospital insurance brought in by federal legislation in 1957. It has been eminently successful. One fact attesting to this is that close to 100 per cent, of the order of 99 per cent, of all Canadians are now covered in respect of hospital insurance.

We have had passed more recently under the present minister the health resources plan which will help to provide many of the professional people and, more importantly in connection with the present legislation, the doctors who will be required to supply the needs of the country in respect of physicians' services.

Now we have the medicare legislation to provide for the paying of doctors' bills throughout the country. There is an old saying that goes something along these lines: A man or a woman is really well off when he or she is healthy, wealthy and wise. Personally I would rate good health ahead of being wealthy. I suggest that good health also precedes being wise, because I cannot imagine a child who is suffering from some disease learning very well and I cannot imagine an individual of more advanced years who is suffering from some ailment being very rational or wise. So I think that in the order of priorities we are dealing with something that is vital, something which heads the list. I would disagree at least to this extent with the hon. member for Red Deer who suggested that education should come ahead of health, because I believe that the reverse order is probably true. Certainly as a matter of emphasis I would put health well up the list. I would even put it ahead of wealth and wisdom in the priority of things.

The minister has passed over this matter rather lightly but I have heard other speakers say quite often that health is a matter of provincial responsibility. I do not want to agree with that conclusion. Indeed, I have yet to be convinced that health is a subject which is totally a matter of provincial responsibility. I tend to believe the contrary. I believe that because health is so important it is something which is to the general advantage of Canada. I have not found a specific clause in the British North America Act, our constitution, which says that the nation must have little or nothing to do with health, and I notice that we have a federal Department of National Health and Welfare which has survived under two different administrations. Therefore I suggest that health is to a degree at least an important federal or national responsibility.

This legislation is essentially financial in character. It deals with money. It does not deal, at least in any great detail, with the administration of a medicare plan. The administration in its depth and detail will be a matter for the provinces. This measure says in effect that the government of Canada, the representatives of the people of Canada here in parliament assembled, will collect from all the people of Canada a given sum of money every year and will distribute it equally to all Canadians. The government here in Ottawa will remit to each provincial government a given sum of money which reflects the population in that province.

The formula is arrived at roughly in this way. The sum total of all doctors' bills is properly checked out, properly accounted. They are totalled, divided by the Canadian population and a certain figure is arrived at. The estimate for next year is of the order of $34 per capita. The total doctors' bill for Canada is $34 multiplied by 20 million, being the number of people in Canada. That is $680 million as the total bill for next year.

The federal government, as I understand it, under the proposed legislation will pay half that amount, half of $34 or $17 per person, to the provincial governments. Each province will receive its population figure times $17 for that year. The province from which I come, with a population approaching two million, would therefore receive two million times $17 or close to $34 million, or about 5 per cent of the total national cost of medicare or 10 per cent of the total federal tax collection for and expenditures on medicare. Some provinces might find their costs a little higher than $34 on the average, some less, but they will receive $17 per capita and will have a genuine incentive to average out at around the Canadian average figure.

They will indeed have an incentive to cut the cost. In some of the provinces, such as Ontario and British Columbia, where hourly wage rates, and other prices are higher, the figure may be above $34—maybe $36 or $40—but $17 per capita will come back to that province from the national treasury. This is a measure which, to some degree, spreads the wealth across the nation. It is a measure which collects from all of those who pay the federal income tax, the federal corporation tax, the federal sales tax, import duties and so on. It collects from those who can afford to pay and it redistributes the moneys on a per capita basis across the country. I therefore say it is a measure which, in some degree redistributes wealth across the nation.

That is as it should be, and I am quite convinced that the people of British Columbia, the people in my riding, who perhaps on the average are better off than the average Canadian, would go along with this legislation. They also recognize health care as being one of the top priority items in this country, if not the highest priority item. They are quite willing to pay according to their ability and to see these moneys distributed more in accordance with the needs of individual Canadians across the country, with the needs of those who are less fortunate, those who are ill, who suffer from accidents, and so on.

I would now like to say a word about rising costs, because a great deal of nonsense has been said about the extent of the increase of costs of medicare. We hear references to the fact that the bill for medicare in the United Kingdom has gone up five or six times since the end of world war II, since medicare was brought in by the Labour government in the late 1940's. This is true in dollar terms, but the cost of medical care, of physicians' services in this country has also gone up five or six times.

As I recall it, the national income of Canada at the end of world war II was around $12 billion; today it is over $50 billion. Our national income has gone up fivefold and the percentage of that income devoted to physicians' services has risen, not fallen. I therefore suggest that the total of all the bills collected by the physicians in this country has risen five or six times.

This is not wrong; this is as it should be. However, let us face the fact that in a country such as the United Kingdom an increase of five or six times has its parallel in Canada which, so far at least, has not had a comprehensive prepaid medical care plan.

The Hall Commission found that, on the average, countries which were industrialized and enjoyed a reasonably high standard of living spent anywhere between 4.5 and 5.5 per cent of their national income on health services of different kinds. In 1961 the United Kingdom spent around 5 per cent, while we spent 5.4 per cent. It follows that without a comprehensive, prepaid medical care scheme we were devoting more of our national income to health care than were the people of the United Kingdom. Today our percentage is comparable to or higher than that of other nations such as west Germany, and the Scandinavian countries which have had such universal schemes in effect, not just for years but for decades. I would even venture to say that in the case of Germany this type of scheme has been in effect for nearly a century. We find that those countries were able to develop a medical profession which is among the best in the world and which performs services that are satisfactory to the people of those countries.

It is typical that as the income of the people rises, they spend more on medical services. So we should not be surprised to see the percentage devoted to medical care of physicians' services in this country rise over the next few years. However, there is a point beyond which, as people become more affluent, the percentage goes over a threshold so to speak. It begins to fall after people pass the $5,000 a year income level. By the time they get up to around $10,000 the share falls to 3 or 4 per cent. If all Canadians were suddenly propelled into the $10,000 a year income bracket, we would not be spending 5.5 to 6 per cent on health services, as we are currently doing, but a lesser amount. The prospect therefore is for an increase in percentage for some time, then a levelling off, then a decline in the payments.

I have noticed that the minister made some allowance for a sharp increase in the demand for physicians' services in the first year or two. This is in accordance with experience in other countries. Many people, 10 or 15 per cent of the population, are afraid of going to a doctor because of the bills they will encounter, or else they put off going to a doctor for so long that they never get to one at all. Under a medical care plan these people will be more inclined to go to a physician and have the benefit of his advice and his care.

There will therefore be an increase in the workload of the medical profession in this country. There is no point in trying to ignore this fact. The demand is there, the human factor is there, and surely as members of parliament will recognize, the need is there. If the medical profession is not adequately staffed today, and in some cases does not have adequate research facilities, hospital equipment and so on, then it is our responsibility to make sure that opportunities are given for training, the carrying on of research, and that the necessary facilities are provided for them. There will be a period of some difficulty; an increase in the workload is bound to cause some strain. But this is a type of strain which the great majority of the medical profession is not only prepared to accept, but is willing and anxious to meet to the best of its ability.

Not long ago I came across the brief of the Canadian Medical Association to the Hall Commission. It stated the following as the objectives of the doctors of Canada:

1. The highest standard of medical services should be available to every resident of Canada.

2. Insurance to prepay the costs of medical services should be available to all regardless of age, state of health or financial status.

3. Certain individuals require assistance to pay medical services insurance costs.

4. The efforts of organized medicine, governments, and all other interested bodies should be co-ordinated toward these ends.

These recommendations, which seem to fit amazingly well into the resolution we have before us—and I trust the legislation will be forthcoming—arise out of the predicament in which many individuals find themselves. You and I may well have experienced a situation such as this.

I wish to quote from a book which appeared some time ago written by Henry Richardson entitled "Economic and Financial Aspects of Social Security". It states:

Sickness is too uncertain and irregular in its onset and too variable in its severity for the cost to be met as it occurs out of the normal family budget. Provision can be made effectively only by saving, but many people do not make adequate savings individually, especially if their means are low, and young people may not have had time to save enough to pay for a severe and costly illness. Moreover, medical care is becoming increasingly costly because of the advances being made in scientific research and techniques. In consequence, the difficulty of paying direct for medical care has become much greater and will continue to increase. The remedy is for the risks of sickness to be pooled by the whole community and for medical needs to be met mainly by small regular payments from the family's annual budget.

I should now like to refer to some of the benefits. The Hall Commission considered this matter, but I am sure the Economic Council also, if the hon. member for Peace River had been successful, would not only have investigated expenditures but would also have looked into the benefits which would result from better and improved medical care. They would have dealt with facts of this nature. On the average, roughly 2 per cent of our working force is absent through illness all the time. These people who are off for extended periods of time, if they had continued to be productive and had better care, could have, increased our national income by about 4 per cent. Even if we had an increase of half of one per cent, if we could knock the incidence of illness down by about 10 per cent—a half of one per cent relative to 4 per cent—then we could more than offset any possible increase in the cost of medicare in this country. So the Economic Council, working out the benefits and costs, I am quite sure would come down on the side of an effective prepaid medical care scheme in this country. In other words, I feel a careful economic appraisal would result in a verdict in favour of the introduction of medical care.

I have referred to the fact that on a number of occasions the minister has underlined the fact that administration is by the provinces, that the details are up to the provinces. The provinces will receive their per capita payments annually. They will collect their own taxes and perhaps will collect premiums as well. The sum total of these revenues will pay the doctors' bills and the provinces will be responsible for the payment of those bills.

There are four important conditions which have been repeatedly stressed by the Prime Minister at federal-provincial conferences and by the minister on a number of occasions. These are conditions attached by the federal government before federal money will be available to the provinces. They are simple, but they are very important. The first concerns the scope of services available. All doctor's services should be available to all Canadians who rely on this type of support, that is all physicians' services must be available to those individuals participating in this plan. This is No. 1.

The second point is that there will be universal coverage, that is, universal in the sense of 90 per cent, originally, and 95 per cent after a period of years. I think that if our experience in medicare parallels our experience in hospital insurance, this figure will move up toward 98 per cent or 99 per cent. The reasons will become more obvious as we gain experience with this program.

The third point is that the programs must be publicly administered by the provinces. Those provinces may have a variety of schemes. I think this is co-operative federalism working at its best. The federal government agrees to attach a minimum of strings to moneys of this kind, but the strings or conditions are vital to a successful scheme. They involve a minimum of federal direction and they involve a minimum of inconvenience to the provinces, as well as a maximum of flexibility to improve the efficiency of the scheme.

The provinces must take full responsibility themselves. As I understand it, what is meant by public administration is that there must be a minister of health in the province. He and his department must take full responsibility for the soundness of the schemes, whether there be one province-wide, government administered scheme such as presently exists in Saskatchewan, or a multiplicity of schemes which involves one substantial government plan and a variety of other plans. As I understand it, the condition attached is that these additional plans, which may be loosely referred to as private plans, must be in the nature of non-profit operations. They will be thoroughly scrutinized and, in a sense, licensed by the provincial authorities.

Obviously, the doctors' non-profit plans will qualify. I have not discussed this with the minister, but I believe some of the big insurance companies schemes would also qualify, if they are not making a profit? As I understand it, insurance companies have often used medical care insurance as a loss leader to attract attention of the community to their other services. If in fact, they are offering this type of service, I cannot see why they would not qualify as a non-profit operation.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted for his speech has now expired.

Mr. Davis: I wonder if I could have one or two more minutes to conclude?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member may have a minute or two more to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Davis: I was talking about the private carriers operating as non-profit organizations, in the economic and financial sense of the word. I think it is desirable, and in some provinces I would like to see what these other agencies can do. I should like to see what private insurance companies can do from the standpoint of a non-profit scheme. I noted that recently the London Life Insurance Company, for instance, took the contract for Physicians' Services for the civil service of Ontario away from P.S.I. They took it away from P.S.I. because they had lower costs; they were better organized and they used the latest data processing techniques. Because of their lower costs they made a more attractive bid to the government of Ontario.

I can envisage in this country the possibility of certain provinces having provincially run schemes, and other provinces with a variety of public and private agencies. This flexibility is desirable. If the private agencies are inefficient, they are going to lose out in competition; they are not going to quote the best prices and they are going to be ignored. In any case, I am prepared to take that chance. I think this is a flexible approach, and I believe it is a highly desirable one.

I should have liked to go on at length about the freedom of the individual to choose his doctor, to work wherever he wants in this country and still benefit under the plan. I should have liked even more to talk about the freedom of the doctor to accept any patient or to deny services to that patient. This is the program, as it is evolving, at least in so far as our federal stipulations are concerned. It does not interfere with the doctor in the way the program in the United Kingdom and some other countries does. It does not require a doctor to go to a certain area, to have a panel to serve. It does not limit his freedom in that important sense. He is in no way a civil servant. He is a professional, completely on his own, as he has always been. He may have fewer problems collecting his bills, but I cannot think of any great difficulties he is likely to encounter. Indeed in the remarks made by a number of my doctor friends, some of whom are very vocal and some even hostile, I find a situation similar to that which I encounter when I talk to some of our separatists: They have a problem, but they will not tell us what the solution is. They will not tell us how the constitution can be changed, but they have a problem. Many of those inside and outside the medical profession who are concerned with these imaginary problems will also find that they will disappear when this legislation is implemented.

Mr. Brand: I have listened with a great deal of interest to many of those who have taken part in this debate. I have listened to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano assure the medical profession that they have nothing to fear, that they know exactly where they are going. I suggest to the hon. member that he get together with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to straighten out exactly what their views are, because I distinctly heard the minister say, in relation to the scope of the benefits, that the government was going to see that all the services provided by the physicians were insured services. He went further to say that they were going to insure the availability of physicians' services.

If hon. members do not believe that is a problem, then they do not know what went on in Saskatchewan just a few years ago, when an amendment was introduced to the medical care insurance act of that province which, by insuring the services of physicians, effectively denied physicians the opportunity to practise medicine properly. This is what the fight was all about; and if the minister does not know this yet, I think it is about time he looked into the situation a little more carefully, before making statements to the house.

I say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that despite this mistake—and I hope it is that, which has been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I concur wholeheartedly with the suggestion implicit in the resolution of federal contributions to help pay part of the costs of medical services incurred by provinces pursuant to any provincial medicare program.

I note, coming to another point, that there is nothing in this resolution which indicates whether or not there has been any change in the attitude of the government—and I have heard various views on this tonight—toward the four provisos that the minister previously indicated would be included in the medical care legislation. That change in attitude has to do with the provinces themselves. It is of the utmost importance, Mr. Chairman, to every province in Canada to know exactly the stand of the Canadian government as to which province will or will not be able to participate in this shared cost program. Despite what the minister says, this is ambiguous.

My own province of Saskatchewan has of course met these four provisos, and we will welcome any additional moneys from the federal government. I am sure that that will allow the government to do away with the direct tax it presently has, and make this program free—if one puts those words in parenthesis—to the people of Saskatchewan.

While we are not so naïve as to believe that medical care will be free, as suggested, we think that the distribution costs will be made on a more equitable basis, since it seems that the federal government's share of the cost can allow the Saskatchewan government to eliminate the direct tax it now imposes. I believe that this direct tax, which is easily paid by those in a position to do so, is not so easily paid by some who are neither within the ambit of social aid assistance, nor high enough on the income scale to permit payment of this tax without hardship.

Much has been said, however, by the minister and by members of the other parties as to what effect provision of medical care on a universally available basis will have on the health standards of Canadians. Much has been said about the supposed opposition of Canada's medical profession to the proposed implementation of universal medical care. I should like to discuss both these statements in some detail and clear up, if at all possible, many of the misunderstandings which have arisen regarding the stand of the medical profession.

Page 2, volume 2 of the Royal Commission on Health Services contains a quotation from the Canadian Medical Association brief submitted to the Royal Commission on Health Services in May, 1962. In this brief the C.N.A. said:

> —insurance to prepay the costs of medical services should be available to all regardless of age, state of health or financial status.

Commenting on this statement the royal commission said, on the same page:

> —it is clear that this policy intends that every Canadian will have or will be entitled to have prepaid coverage enabling each and every one to seek the services of a physician and to receive the services which in his physician's judgment are required.

I point out to the minister that you do not insure services, and I draw his attention to the famous statement made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in regard to insuring services when he was asked that question during the medical care crisis in his province. He said that you cannot insure physicians' services because, as he said: "You can no more lead a horse to water and make it drink than you can take a doctor and make him practise medicine." Despite the fact that he had to eat those words later, I think the meaning is clear to us today.

It seems clear to me that this statement, which is supported by an overwhelming majority of Canadian doctors, is unequivocal and clearly indicates support for a program of prepaid medical care for every person in Canada. It should be noted that this brief was submitted to the royal commission prior to the culmination of the difficulties in Saskatchewan in July of 1962 when despite what is said by certain individuals and politicians, the battle was joined there, not because of opposition to prepaid medical care but because of opposition to what we sincerely believed was an attempt by a provincial government to control the medical profession. I know that there are those who take issue with me in this regard, and they are entitled to their interpretation. I think, on the other hand, conversely, that I too am entitled to my views on this matter.

You may wonder, Mr. Chairman, what application these remarks have to the resolution before the house, but I believe that it is essential to the understanding and application of the resolution that there be a clear knowledge of what pitfalls and stumbling blocks must be avoided by the government in order to bring in the proposed legislation in an atmosphere of reasoned understanding.

As I have said, many attempts have been made to claim that the doctors were opposed to prepaid medical care. I have heard on public platforms and in the news media deliberate distortions which indicated that doctors were opposed to this because the income tax would find out how much money they were making, or that they would make less money under a medical care scheme. I have even heard a prominent former member of this house claim that the doctors were afraid of prepaid medical care because the standard of medicine was so low in this country, and we did not want anybody else to find out about it.

What are the facts? I should like to refer briefly not to what socialist governments, not to what governments bent on welfare statism have done, but to what individuals and doctors have done to bring about programs of prepaid medical care.

In 1929 the medical profession pioneered in Saskatchewan the free treatment of tuberculosis. Sanitoriums were set up under a system of private enterprise, with the municipalities supporting the scheme on a per capita basis. In 1931 the profession co-operated with the government, establishing diagnostic and therapeutic cancer clinics available to all at a modest fee. This fee was eliminated by the way under the Liberal government of Saskatchewan prior to the socialists gaining power in 1944.

For many years our country areas were serviced by a local tax-supported municipal scheme. This was pioneered by a citizen of Saskatchewan, Mr. Matthew Anderson, reeve of the municipality of McKillop, in Bulyea, and as a result of his singlehanded action and laudable persistence, an act respecting medical and hospital services in municipalities was assented to in the Legislature of Saskatchewan on April 1, 1939. It may be of interest to some of my friends on the left to know that this included hospital care, medical care and necessary medicines and appliances furnished upon prescription. It seems to me that no mention is ever made by those of socialistic persuasion of the very effective and useful efforts of this private citizen, who operated in a milieu of private enterprise to see that the rural areas were very well served indeed.

A great need still remained in our cities and large towns. To fill this gap the medical profession of Saskatchewan between 1934 and 1938 organized several voluntary non-profit prepaid medical care plans. Much was said during the medicare struggle to the effect that these doctor-sponsored plans were making a great deal of money at the expense of the people of Saskatchewan, despite the fact that they were incorporated under the co-operative assistance act of Saskatchewan, were completely non-profit, and were owned completely by those who took out membership in them.

Despite what we had in this field, there were still gaps in medical care, particularly with those low-income groups who did not qualify for social aid and still could not afford the low premiums of the voluntary plans. So it was that in 1941 the Saskatchewan College of Physicians and Surgeons, in co-operation with the government of the day, set up a continuing committee to consider a universally available province-wide health insurance scheme. Despite these overtures by the medical profession, nothing was done, and in 1944 the C.C.F. government came into power in Saskatchewan. The medical profession offered its co-operation to this government and as a result, in 1944, medical coverage for old age pensioners, the blind, and indigent widows with families was established.

At the outset this plan was subsidized up to 60 per cent by the medical profession. Hospitalization in that province is a matter of record. Our profession continued to press for an extension of the proposed health insurance scheme. Many meetings were held with the minister of health and with the premier of the province, now the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam; but it was not until 1950, if I remember correctly, that he gave up his cabinet post and Hon. T. J. Bentley took over as minister of health. Following this, the college received a letter stating that no further discussions or negotiations would be held at that time. That was the situation in Saskatchewan. We never hear this from the other side of the fence at all.

We felt they were waiting to find—if I may use this word; it appears in the resolution before us—an expedient time to introduce a bill into the Saskatchewan legislature. I do not know how many hon. members know what "expedient" means, but I took the trouble to look it up. Here, in the Concise Oxford Dictionary, it says "politic rather than just". I leave this to the imaginations of hon. members.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said the reason they did not bring in a program was that they did not have the money. I accept this view; it is perhaps correct. But this does seem to fly in the face of the contention expressed today by members in that corner of the house that medical care really does not cost any more money, since you are merely taking the amount presently being spent and distributing it among the whole citizenry, giving more equitable coverage.

However, our voluntary plans went on. They covered almost 40 per cent of our population. Taking this percentage along with municipal coverage, coverage of old age pensioners, the blind, widows, mothers' allowances, workmen's compensation, cancer clinics and so on, only 10 per cent of our population had no assistance with their medical bills.

That is interesting, I would think. What happened next? Well, into this improbable situation, medicare was introduced. I shall not take the time of the committee now by telling the long and dolorous story of what happened over the next few years. Certainly the lack of communication between the medical profession and the government of Saskatchewan was very like the failure of communication surrounding the "Seven Days" crisis within the C.B.C. Nobody seemed able to get together with anybody else, and I think the reasons were the same as those which the hon. member for York East mentioned the other day when he was discussing the "Seven Days" affair—it was management, rather than the other group, which was causing the trouble.

Eventually a commission under Dr. W. P. Thompson was set up to study not only the question of a medical care plan as originally proposed, but the entire health needs of the province of Saskatchewan. The commission continued its hearings on into 1961. A campaign was mounted against the doctors, and people were made to believe they were against a medical care scheme. The government was re-elected. Hon. members know the rest of the story.

But it was in 1961 that the Canadian Medical Association approached the then prime minister of Canada, the present Leader of the Opposition, and urged him to set up a Royal Commission on Health Services. This has been said before, but it is worthy of repetition: It is as a result of this commission on health services under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall that the present resolution is before us today.

I have mentioned previously the effect of insuring physicians' services and the iniquitous type of legislation which was brought in in Saskatchewan. A large number of doctors withdrew their services. We did not go on strike. If we did, the Labour members who sit on my left may wonder how we could have a strike and continue to work.

Nevertheless, medical care continues in Saskatchewan. I am not claiming that all the blame was on one side. Most of it was, but not all of it. The doctors themselves, under great emotion, said and did things which they should not have done; but I still believe, and they still believe, that our stand was basically a correct one and I should not like to see a repetition of these tragic events in any other area of Canada.

As a result of this attempt to insure the services of physicians, much was said about the deterioration of medical care under a medical care scheme. The Hall Commission and the present Minister of National Health and Welfare seem to feel that implementation of a medical care plan will not affect the quality of care, nor will it be a burden on the present facilities, and indeed the Hall Commission on page 9, volume 2, of its report, states as follows:

> We can hope therefore that the introduction of universal insurance in Canada will reduce our present losses to the United States, and will result in Canada becoming self-sufficient as the new medical schools are established and existing schools expanded.

I mentioned earlier what happened in Saskatchewan. I think it is worth mentioning again, however briefly—I was thinking of the medical school at the University of Saskatchewan—that instead of producing more graduates, we produced fewer. In the three year period from 1957 to 1959, a total of 289 new entrants was recorded in Saskatchewan and 121 of these were graduates of Canadian schools, for a percentage of 42. During the three year period 1963 to 1965, there was a total of 399 new entrants, 91 of whom were Canadian. This is a percentage of 22.8, a substantial decrease. We are experiencing a steady loss of Canadian graduates; instead of getting more, we are getting less.

I wholeheartedly agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe East about the loss of Canadian doctors. I think this is a serious matter. The total number of doctors in our province has, of course, increased—due to the greatly increasing numbers of doctors from Pakistan, the United Kingdom, Taiwan, India, North Korea and the Philippines. I am disturbed, not because I question the qualifications of these doctors, but why should we take doctors from countries which themselves face an acute shortage of qualified physicians? We must do something about producing doctors ourselves. It is easy to say that everything will be lovely in a few years time—"Wouldn't it be luverly?"

I am glad hon. members opposite think so, and I hope they are right. It is true that in Saskatchewan there has been an 11 per cent increase in the number of doctors following medicare, but still we do not have enough. The ratio is about one to 1,007, well below the national average and significantly below British Columbia's ratio of one to 758, and Ontario's one to 776. If the ratio is bad in Saskatchewan, what will happen in the Maritimes where the ratio is between one to

1,000 and one to 1,300, and in Newfoundland where it is one to 1,991?

These figures refute the contention that the introduction of medical care will solve all our problems. Should I remind the minister again of his statement in Halifax, where he said it would take 20 years to increase our dentist population by 5 per cent? Yet on the basis of the figures I have given this committee the minister apparently feels that without difficulty we can increase the doctor population by between 10 per cent and 15 per cent in one year. I know it cannot be done. I should like to hear what the hon. gentleman has in his mind.

I would remind hon. members briefly of the priorities suggested. Perhaps I may quote again from the Report of the Royal Commission on Health Services, where the following statements are made on page 1 of volume 2:

> We consider quality as the most essential element in health services and every aspect of the programs must be constantly directed to that end.

Not just a second thought, to fill in the gap between organizational methods and the payment of physicians.

• (7:40 p.m.)

A few lines further on they say:

> Quality depends primarily on the supply, availability, knowledge, skill, and dedication of professionally qualified personnel, secondly on the facilities at their disposal and thirdly on the organization of the services.

Those are your priorities, first supply, second facilities, third organization. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam agrees with me because as reported in Hansard of April 6, 1965, at page 50 he said:

> There are some provinces who have an adequate number of doctors in ratio to their population and who, very quickly, could qualify for medical care . . . Some provinces would take longer to qualify.

You bet your sweet little life they are going to take longer to qualify. We in this profession will provide the knowledge, the skill and the dedication, and the health resources fund will go a little way to providing the facilities. But what is the minister going to do about the supply of doctors? What about the manpower policy—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brand: I thank hon. members for the courtesy of allowing me to continue, and I shall finish in another couple of minutes. I want to remind the minister about the manpower policy recommended in the Hall Commission report. What is the government doing about that recommendation that urges the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges to set up departments of general practice in the teaching hospitals, and chairs of general practice in the faculties of medicine?

What are we doing to ensure the continuing training of the general practitioner? I have heard conflicting views on whether this is a provincial or federal responsibility, views expressed from the opposite side of the chamber. Personally I think that once you step into this field you have a responsibility to provide that. The minister throws his hands in the air. Is that what he feels about this situation? Is that the way he is going to treat this serious problem? I sincerely hope not. I trust from a medical point of view it was more of a tic than a demonstration of anything else.

At page 259 the Hall report stated:

> In a world of specialists it has become important to review and re-define the role of the general practitioner—

I ask the minister to peruse the Hall Commission's statement in this respect at a quieter time.

It is axiomatic, and I am sure the minister would agree with this, that inseparable links to quality are the freedom of the health profession and the freedom of the public as potential patients. I am glad the minister spelled this out, although somewhat in a blurred fashion; but I am sure he agrees with the Hall report that these freedoms must be spelled out in the legislation and be safeguarded through organizational arrangements and mutual respect.

When I was speaking in the house on the health estimates I suggested that the government should reconsider its inflexible attitude toward those provinces which wish to proceed with medical care in a manner of their own choosing, since such care is primarily a provincial responsibility. No matter how the minister and the government may look at the matter, if they are intending to prescribe the manner in which medical care shall be carried out they are infringing on an area of provincial responsibility, in other words poaching on preserves where they have no right.

I believe each citizen of Canada has a right to obtain benefits for which he has paid, through the increased burden of taxation which is already beginning to kill the spirit of enterprise that should be an integral part of a young and robust nation such as ours. I would urge the government not to deny any citizen of Canada his right to a share of the tax moneys merely because provinces do not live up to the guidelines proposed by the federal government. Surely it is in the spirit of the Hall report to allow such provincial freedom of choice. Include the non-profit prepaid plans, as has been said, and you go a long way because you have trans-Canada plans which can fit in and allow portability.

Finally, the minister should remember that one of the priorities proposed in the Hall report was the free spirit of co-operation among all those who participate in such a plan. Medicare, dominion-wide, can be a success, but it should not be so at the expense of the rights and freedoms of the patient and practitioner alike.

This has been a stormy session and is almost coming to a close, but let us not add to the storm. Mr. Chairman, may I conclude by quoting from a letter written by Washington to Madison on November 5, 1786, which is taken from the Writings of Washington, volume 29, page 51:

> No morn ever dawned more favourably than ours did; and no day was ever more clouded than the present! Wisdom and good examples are necessary at this time to rescue the political machine from the impending storm.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Chairman, I take pride in being permitted to participate in this debate on the principles of the government's national medical care insurance plan. I am concerned that there are so few in the chamber tonight to listen to and take part in the debate, which is surely one of the most historic that will occur during this session.

I am proud to subscribe to the principles enunciated in the resolution and by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As this is a time for stating one's position on the principle of the plan, I have been somewhat disappointed by the remarks from the official opposition, and to this point I am not yet sure whether it is in favour of this proposal in principle, or against it. I have the greatest of respect for the two hon. members who have spoken on behalf of the official opposition. I respect the concerns they have expressed on behalf of their learned profession, which is so intimately affected by this plan, but I am left in a bit of a quandary as to the position of the political party they support.

[Mr. Brand.]

I recall that in the recent election one of the planks in the platform of the Progressive Conservative party was stated in this way, and I quote from the Toronto Daily Star of November 6, 1965:

> The Progressive Conservative party will institute a system of medicare, based on a universal, comprehensive program of medical and health services for every Canadian, as outlined in the Hall Commission report.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that seems to be what is before us in this resolution; but on the basis of what has been said by official opposition spokesmen in this debate I am not sure whether that is still the policy of the Progressive Conservative party.

I note that the government of Ontario has not taken issue with the principles put forward by the federal government. I refer to a Canadian Press dispatch from Toronto which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 3, 1966, the first paragraph of which says:

> Ontario did not say at the Ottawa meeting of provincial health ministers early in the week that the province disagrees with federal government proposals for a national scheme of medical care insurance, Health Minister Matthew Dymond told the legislature Wednesday.

An hon. Member: We are 80 per cent covered now.

Mr. Stanbury: Some hon. members undoubtedly feel that the Ontario plan has seeds of perfection in it, but the Globe and Mail, which is hardly a Liberal organ—

Mr. Winkler: Are you opposed to it? That is the question.

Mr. Stanbury: —said on January 29, 1966 that:

> The government scheme—

Referring to the Ontario government scheme.

> —is likely to attract most of the high-users, because these must pay premium rates with the private non-profit plans that will continue to operate. If the Government scheme, as intended, remains actuarially sound, then these high-risk cases—who are frequently least able to pay—could eventually find themselves paying higher premiums than those in the private plans. If this inequity develops, it could only be corrected by bringing all under the government plan, or by subsidizing the plan from general revenue.
> Until the plan has been in operation for some time it cannot be known, either, if the proposed low-income subsidies will be sufficient to ensure that nobody is prevented by poverty from obtaining coverage.

Mr. Winkler: That is right.

Mr. Stanbury: This is the Ontario plan which the premier of Ontario suggests can be brought within the federal proposal, but which is hardly perfect under present conditions even in the judgment of the Toronto Globe and Mail.

Mr. Winkler: Is the hon. member opposed to that plan?

Mr. Stanbury: I am a supporter of a plan in the terms of the Hall Commission report, the kind of plan which meets the four standards set down by the Prime Minister of Canada as warranting the use of federal funds for its support.

Mr. Winkler: But you did not answer my question: Are you in favour of the plan or not?

Mr. Stanbury: I am not in favour of the Ontario plan as it stands today. I feel it has many weaknesses and should conform to the four principles which have been outlined.

Mr. Winkler: May I ask one more question.

Mr. Stanbury: Are you in favour of the present Ontario plan?

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member admit that those who require services receive them, regardless of the price of the premium?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Chairman, I presume from what the hon. member says that he is fully in favour of the Ontario plan.

Mr. Winkler: That's for sure.

Mr. Stanbury: Therefore he has no objection to the private insurers retaining all the group coverage and the government having the high-risk coverage to look after.

Mr. Winkler: So long as the people who need the coverage get it, I am in favour of it.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. gentleman is interfering, now.

Mr. Stanbury: No matter whether or not it is at the expense of the public and to the benefit of the insurers, apparently.

Mr. Winkler: That is a pretty weak answer.

Mr. Stanbury: The chief argument of the official opposition up until this point appears to suggest that they approve of medicare, but on the never-never plan. Their chief objection seems to be a lack of manpower. I should like to refer to a remark made by Sir Hugh Linstead, president of the International Pharmaceutical Association when he appeared in Canada recently. This appears in the Hamilton Spectator of June 9 last. He said:

> I know of no country, including the United States, where medical resources are sufficient for the population.

He added:

> All countries have to ration medical aid.

He suggested that medical facilities should be given with regard to need rather than to the ability of people to pay.

Surely that is the simple answer to the concern expressed by my hon. friends in the official opposition; that is, that you must surely provide medical services strictly on the basis of need and on no other basis. According to the Hall Commission, the only way that can be done is by a universal scheme.

The Prime Minister has been accused, I think by the hon. member for Red Deer, of political blackmail because he set down certain principles to which provincial plans should conform if federal funds were to be devoted to their support. I suggest these principles are perfectly reasonable and necessary. When he announced this policy in Toronto the Prime Minister said:

> We cannot impose policies and programs on provinces in respect of matters within their jurisdiction. And we will have to be increasingly careful in participating in joint federal-provincial programs in which all provinces do not participate.
> On the other hand, we will not forgo our right to make grants to provinces to help them in programs such as medicare which are provincially-administered; and our right to relate such grants to the acceptance of certain principles which, in our view, justify the expenditure of federal funds for provincially-administered schemes.
> It is then for the provinces to decide whether they wish to co-operate on this basis.

Mr. Chairman, I do not call that political blackmail. I agree with the Winnipeg Free Press which terms this approach an ingenious one. It is one, Mr. Chairman, which ensures that federal initiative will bring about as soon as possible the kind of national health service insurance plan which will be in the interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Winkler: By compulsion or choice?

Mr. Stanbury: By choice of provincial governments.

On this principle of universality with which my hon. friends apparently take issue, I think I can quote no authority which might appeal to them more than Sir Winston Churchill who, when speaking more than 50 years ago, spoke of social insurance in its various forms as spreading the risks of life, and bringing "the magic of averages" to the help of the poor. This program will bring the magic of averages to the help of all Canadians. This program is being welcomed across the country. The Kingston Whig Standard of May 19 commented:

> Whatever the plan chosen by each province, Canada is now about to take a great and too-long-delayed step in social welfare. It can be taken for granted that the whole country will be covered by satisfactory medical insurance within the next year or two.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am proud as a member of the Liberal party that I have had a part in bringing about this plan. I am proud that we now have a government which is prepared finally to bring such a plan to fruition.

Hon. members will be aware of my particular interest in education. I am grateful that education shares with health a position in the consideration of this government as a matter of top priority. No former government has invested so much in education, or shown such constructive concern in this other field of primarily provincial jurisdiction but of such vital national importance.

Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, the chairman of the Royal Commission on Health Services, has laid to rest the argument made by some hon. members, that because of the demands made on governments by education we should put off indefinitely a national medicare insurance plan. Mr. Justice Hall declared in Ottawa last November:

> "There cannot and must not be any question of conflict or of priority between the needs of better education and good health."

He pointed out that medicare calls for an annual expenditure of about $600 million, of which half would be raised by the federal government and half by the provinces. He said that in 1961, according to estimates made by the Hall Commission, Canadians spent $383 million for physicians' services and $72 million for the administrative cost of private health insurance plans, and that these figures have no doubt increased since 1961; so that the actual increase to the public as a whole should not be above $100 million annually. It might be pointed out as well that last year there was an estimated loss to our economy through illness of $1,630 million. A great deal of this loss might well have been prevented had there been an adequate medical insurance plan in existence.

• (8:00 p.m.)

An editorial in the Toronto Star of December 1, 1965 came to this conclusion:

> If public health and higher education are thought of as investments rather than as burdens, the question is not whether Canada can afford to have medicare and increased aid to universities but whether it can afford not to have them.

During this session the government has committed massive funds to both health and education. We have observed some memorable legislation. We have had the Canada Students Loan Plan extension measure, which gave an injection of new funds to education; we have had the Canada Assistance Plan, which will supplement the Canada Pension Plan passed during the last session; we have had the government's announcement of vastly increased support for higher education, some of which has already been committed and more to be negotiated with the provinces in the fall. Recently we have had the health resources fund which laid the groundwork for the national medical care insurance plan, which we now have before us tonight.

I suggest that this resolution carries out the injunction of the Hall Commission report, which proposed that "as a nation we should now take the necessary legislative, organizational and financial decisions to make all the fruits of the health sciences available to all our residents, without hindrance of any kind".

Surely our people are the most valuable of Canada's resources, and their freedom and opportunity are surely the most sacred trust of government. The twin foundations of individual freedom and opportunity are our citizens' health and education—freedom from the catastrophes of illness and ignorance, both largely beyond individual control, and opportunity to live in good health and to pursue the abilities of the individual to the best advantage of his family and his country.

I am proud that the government which I support is moving forward strongly and resolutely with the construction of both these foundations of our individual freedom and opportunity—freedom from illness and opportunity to learn—and that these are being ranked foremost among our responsibilities to the Canadian people, not only of today but of tomorrow.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat posed a number of questions in regard to the stand taken by the opposition on this important matter. I discerned a somewhat reserved reference to our stand. Let me assure him at the outset that a program of medicare for all citizens of Canada has long been one of the prime objectives of the Conservative party. Surely it is not necessary to press this particular point, because in the course of remarks that have already been made by spokesmen on this side we have demonstrated beyond a shadow of a doubt what our actual position is.

It should be remembered by all hon. members of the committee that what we are adopting by this resolution is largely the result of an excellent study that took place as a result of the initiative of the former Conservative government. The report that emerged from the Royal Commission on Health Services, better known as the Hall report, charted the course of comprehensive health care which, over the next few years, will ensure that Canada has one of the most progressive programs to take care of all her citizens of any country in the world.

It is not necessary to reiterate many of the statements made tonight and this afternoon. We are concerned about this health problem because, as has been indicated by several speakers, it is one of the major problems that Canada has had to face. The previous speaker mentioned the high cost of illness, amounting to between one billion and two billion dollars per annum. He also referred to the tremendous loss in terms of man days, amounting to $100 million per year. I merely repeat his observations at this time to underline the fact that we are dealing with a most important matter.

The amazing thing about this program is that it has taken years to develop. The minister in introducing his resolution took bows on behalf of his party for its initiative. He has been in this house about the same length of time as I have, and I am sure he will agree that activity in this field in the early 1950's was conspicuous by its absence. When the hospital insurance program was brought down in 1957 it remained for us to amend it in 1958, in order to make it possible for that step forward in health services to be made.

The minister now wants to ensure that we have a comprehensive health insurance program on the statute books by July 1, 1967, so the government can take all the credit derived therefrom. We certainly agree that the principle as outlined by the minister in his statement should be implemented as quickly as possible. I scarcely believe, however, that on the basis of past performance, at least during the 15 years I have been in this house, we are going to have a comprehensive and absolutely complete program in operation as early as the beginning of our 100th birthday.

I say this because, as everyone knows, and it has been reiterated several times, the type of medical insurance program that will be finally implemented in Canada will depend upon provincial initiative. I think the minister would agree with that. As a matter of fact the medical insurance programs that are operating at the present time in some of the provinces—indeed most of the provinces have some form of medical insurance —have been entirely to the credit of the provincial governments, and as I read the comments on the government's proposed scheme it seems to me that some of the provinces are going to jealously guard and protect the programs that they have already charted in this important field. This seems to be the case being made by the province of Alberta, for example. My own province of Manitoba has indicated that it does not agree with the program being enunciated by the federal government, and certainly the province of Ontario has uttered similar reservations.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, has my hon. friend read the speech made by the minister of health in the legislature of his province, stating that the government of which he is a member will be ready to participate in a national program on July 1, 1967?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The minister of health of the province of Manitoba is a personal friend of mine and I have not only read his speeches, I can assure the minister, but I have had personal conversations with him. I think the sort of response that Manitoba through its minister of health has made on this matter is typical of the progressive administration of that province. It is not going to take second place in this matter. At the same time he has on behalf of his government made certain reservations in this regard, as has the Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin.

I am merely raising this point to indicate to the minister that while the target date of July 1 is a worthy and laudable objective, I hope he will continue his consultation with the provinces so that the scheme contemplated by the federal government—we have not yet seen the bill so we do not know what the details might be; our discussion is preliminary to the introduction of the legislation—to be inaugurated next year will be carried out with a minimum of friction. I think it would be disastrous for social legislation of this kind if we were to enter into a period of provincial-federal bickering which has marked so much of the progress of the present Liberal administration in Ottawa during the past three years.

Here is a place where co-operative federalism, or consultative federalism might be used to the maximum advantage in order to ensure that the conflicting viewpoints of the provinces might be reconciled with the co-ordinating function of the federal government in so far as it is humanly possible to do so. While Manitoba has always taken a reasonable viewpoint in these matters—and I think that Manitoba, in the federal scheme of things, has established a reputation for being reasonable and moderate in all things—I believe the minister will agree that the position of the province of Alberta is a little more difficult and is something with which he will have to come to grips before the program can be implemented.

I am not going to deal with the principles that have been enunciated by the government in this regard, but I should like to make a few suggestions, which perhaps have already been incorporated in the bill to come before the house. It seems to me that if we are to come to grips with the problem of medicare on a comprehensive basis, we have to deal with three fundamental aspects of this question, the preventive, the therapeutic and the restorative. In medicine as well as in any other field of human activity, an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. I think the minister will agree that so far as health services are concerned the educational function is the basic function in providing an adequate basis for the prevention of illness and disease. This is the priority that the government of Manitoba has constantly repeated in its representations on this matter.

When we come to the therapeutic aspect we must take into consideration that adequate therapy involves the treatment of the whole patient. I am not an expert or authority on these matters—we have already had some well qualified medical practitioners participating in this discussion—but I noticed a little cartoon in the week end newspaper which pointed out one of the difficulties of the practice of medicine at the present time. The cartoon depicted a group of doctors surrounding a patient, and one doctor was saying to the others, "Do you know, that was a very difficult situation. I was almost one half inch out of the area of my specialization." In other words, the science of medicine, the science of medical therapy has advanced to such a state of specialization today that sometimes we fail to take into consideration the fact, and it is a basic fact, that in any illness or disease the whole person is involved.

This brings me, Mr. Chairman, to an important aspect of illness which is not covered in any of the existing health schemes operating in any of the provinces, and that is an adequate approach to the problems of mental illness. It is becoming increasingly recognized by the authorities in the field that when a person is ill, the whole person is suffering from the illness, and the psychosomatic branch of medical science is only now emerging as perhaps one of the encouraging new developments in the field. Mr. Justice Hall in his excellent report makes a strong bid for the inclusion of adequate mental health care in any program of health insurance that will be brought before this parliament. He said there must be the removal of all discrimination in the distinctions made between physical and mental illness.

I trust that in the proposals to be brought forward by the minister and the government adequate consideration will be given to this fundamental aspect of therapy, even though it cannot be implemented on a comprehensive basis at this stage because the final initiative, as I have indicated, will rest with the provincial governments. I know several provincial governments are interested in this aspect and I trust that the legislation will make it possible for the provinces which are ready to move forward to seize the initiative in this regard.

There is just one other point which I should like to make. I do not want to speak at length because many of the points have already been covered and repetition at this stage should be avoided at all costs. However I do want to repeat that the Royal Commission on Health Services in outlining the health charter for this nation emphasized, as many of the provincial governments and many speakers in this debate have done, the necessity for taking priorities into consideration. We are living in a day and age of specialization, and if we are going to have a co-ordinated program—and the essential function of the federal government is that of co-ordination—we must provide, as the Hall Royal Commission has pointed out, for a health planning council so that we can avoid the hit or miss approach to the problem which has existed hitherto.

We must also expand the existing medical resources council which could perhaps be described as a health sciences resources council. All sorts of new disciplines have emerged in recent years in the field of health care.

The role of the social scientist has become increasingly important as has the role of the social worker. I wonder how many hospitals today are adequately equipped with social scientists, psychologists, sociologists and social workers so that the whole person and his problem can come under treatment? I would venture to say there are very few hospitals adequately staffed in this way. The advent of our national health program will immensely aggravate the problem. The program will create the need for proper hospital planning, specially trained architects and administrators to handle the specialized problems arising in modern hospital care, as well as statisticians to compile the data necessary in order to diagnose the problem adequately and then to treat it.

We heartily endorse this scheme. I also wish to express my admiration for the government's belief that this program can be launched successfully by July 1 of 1967. Many long years have been wasted. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a piece of legislation put forward in the spirit of the 60 days of decision. I am sure the minister appreciates the fact that before the program that he contemplates and that is recommended by the Royal Commission is initiated, much more careful consideration and consultation with the provinces in whose hands rests the initiative will be necessary.

Mr. Knowles: We of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Chairman, welcome this resolution. We are happy to vote for it and we hope the legislation which is forecast will commend itself to the house to the point that hon. members will realize that we should go as far as we can with it before we rise for the summer recess. As we get into a discussion of the details there will undoubtedly be some points on which we will have questions to raise and suggestions to make, but as members who have asked for this legislation through the whole of our political experience, we do not intend at this time to indulge in any carping criticisms of this legislation. I am sure the minister and other hon. members on the government side will realize that we would be something other than human if we did not draw attention to the fact that through all the years we have been in parliament we in this party have been urging legislation to establish health insurance or medicare for our people. However, I will not take time tonight to refer to all the occasions on which we have raised this matter but rather, out of the generosity of my heart, I will admit that the Liberals were advocating health insurance before our party even came into being.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the old 1919 line.

Mr. Knowles: I hear my hon. friend the minister referring to 1919 which was before he and some other hon. members on that side of the House were born. However, I do think that in fairness to the Liberal party and out of respect for the important platform decision which that party made in 1919, the book which records that historic decision should at least be seen in this chamber on this historic day. I tried to find some way under our rules in which it could be placed on the table of the house, but I could not find any rule under which I could do so.

Mr. MacEachen: By unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: Is there unanimous consent for tabling this historic book which records the fact that in 1919 the Liberal party took a stand in favour of unemployment insurance, old age insurance and health insurance?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: It is good to hear these hon. members who have been born since that day rejoicing in the fact that it has taken the Liberal party only 47 years to implement the plan that was drafted in 1919. It is good for the people of Canada that at last some action is being taken on this issue.

I may also say Mr. Chairman, that it is very interesting for us to hear our speeches coming back to us from the minister. It was really a delight this afternoon to hear all the arguments that we have used over the years to try to get the Liberals to move, now being used by the minister. He told us about the social responsibility that rests upon Canada to provide for the health of our people. He told us that it would make good economic sense. We cannot object to these arguments because they are the arguments we have been using in this chamber for all the decades during which we have been here.

The minister also drew to our attention the fact that private insurance schemes fail to provide complete coverage for the people of Canada. He gave figures which showed that for all the good that might be said by some hon. members about private schemes, in the end there has to be a public scheme if all the people of Canada are to be covered. As I said, we are glad to hear the speeches we have made over the decades being pronounced in this house today by a minister of the crown advocating this legislation.

We have also heard another very important argument which we have used over the years, namely that a health insurance program does not involve an expenditure of new money to any great extent. What a health insurance program does is to redistribute the cost of medical care. This afternoon the minister gave us actual figures. He said that under the legislation it is anticipated that $680 million will be spent on medical care in the first year in which the plan was in effect. He pointed out, however, that even without this legislation we are spending $600 million for comparable services. After all, therefore, we are simply adding a total of $80 million to the amount of money the Canadian people are spending but we are distributing the cost by this legislation so that it will be borne by the people of Canada according to their ability to pay, but health care will go to the people of Canada according to their need.

This is a good. This is a great day. It is wonderful to have been alive in 1919 when medicare was proposed by the Liberals. It is wonderful still to be alive when it is put into effect 47 years later. I see the minister has borrowed the book and is looking it up. It is on page 205 of the report of the Liberal convention which met in Ottawa in August, 1919.

Mr. Macaluso: Oh, yes, we know about it. The hon. member has drawn it to our attention so often.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend across the way did not even know the book was in existence.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Macaluso: The hon. member referred to it so many times that I profited from his information. I learned about it four years ago, thank you.

Mr. Knowles: You are more than welcome. As I was about to say, I wish to echo for a moment the question put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam this afternoon. It is good to know we are going to get this legislation; but when, is still a question that this house must face. I want to say, as urgently as I can, that I think the House of Commons should go all the way with this legislation before it rises for a summer recess. I think the bill should be passed through all stages.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare suggested that at least he would like to go as far as second reading. This is almost all the way; it would be approval in principle by the House of Commons. I want to say that in view of the kind of discussion that has taken place here today, in view of the differences of opinion that exist, I think the country has a right to know where parliament stands. I do not see how the provinces in this country can make their plans during the summer months on the basis of the debate that has taken place today. The provinces can make their plans only after the legislation has been passed, or certainly has had second reading, so that approval in principle is clear.

I want to suggest to the members of this of the whole committee that in asking the government to go all the way with this legislation we are not asking for something new. Hon. members know that I have been on my feet on orders of the day, or on "late shows", as often as I could during this session to try to get a commitment out of the government. We got a commitment. On three or four occasions the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated it was the desire of the government to deal in full with this medicare legislation before a summer recess. References can be found in Hansard for June 1, June 22, and in several other places. I have the various clippings from Hansard on my desk, as a matter of fact.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if we do not get the legislation through at this time or at least get it approved in principle on second reading, the chances are slim of medicare being in effect on July 1, 1967. If this measure is not considered until the fall, I suggest that the debate we have had here today indicates the second reading debate will be a long one. Before you know it, it will be Christmas and the provinces will not be in a position to pass complementary legislation. The suggestion that the legislation should go to a committee for study is a plausible one. However, Mr. Chairman, as a result of the studies that have been given to this matter in the last half century, surely we are in a position to act. I think of the various reports we have had during the years, such as the Heagerty report, the Marsh report, and so on. I think of all the work that went into the preparation of the green books that were presented to the federal-provincial conference in 1945. I think of an actual bill that was laid on the table of this house in 1944 or 1945 by Hon. Ian Mackenzie, then minister of pensions and national health.

All of these studies have been updated by the studies into health grants and hospitalization, as well as many departmental studies. We took this matter up in the estimates committee a few years ago and a very exhaustive study of it was conducted by the members of this house. Now we have had the Hall report, and members in all parts of the house agree that this was a tremendous study. There have been federal-provincial conferences galore, and I suggest that basically parliament is in a position to make up its mind on this question. I hope we will do it now so that the target date of our 100th birthday can be met with respect to this important question.

I said that we are in full support of this legislation. Any suggestions or criticisms that we might make would be with respect to the details. There are one or two to which I want to refer briefly. I note that the wording the Prime Minister used last July regarding the scope of the services to be covered seemed to me to be a little broader than the wording used today by the minister. Last July the Prime Minister talked in terms of all the services that might be required. The minister today talked in terms of physicians' services of all kinds. Then, he said, he hoped, in the not too distant future, he will be in a position to enlarge on these services.

This strikes me as imposing a limitation, at least in spirit, that was not contained in the announcement the Prime Minister made last July. I should like to suggest this to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He had a great deal to say during the debate on the Canada Assistance Plan about the fact that there is no ceiling on the assistance or the welfare services in which the federal government will participate. I suggest that he should apply the same principle to this legislation. If a province wants to enlarge the range of insured services, the federal government should agree to that and should place no limitation on it, any more than it does on the assistance or the welfare services set out in the Canada Assistance Plan. I remind the minister also that on May 17 of this year, as recorded in Hansard at page 5213, he announced the government's decision to let medicare come into effect in any province that agreed to it without waiting for the majority of all provinces. We immediately approved of that stand, and we still approve of that position. It seems to me that consistent with that position, namely that a province that wants to come in can do so without waiting for the others, is the further position that if a province or two or three provinces want to go further than some of the others in the services that are to be insured, the federal government should go along with that position. We will develop this idea when we go into committee on the bill.

There is one other point that I think we will want to look at rather closely when we are considering the bill, and that is with respect to what is known as the third criterion. I refer to the one having to do with plans being provincially administered. Here, again, I detected a slight difference between the wording of last July and the wording of today. I was only slightly concerned when the minister spoke, but I was really quite exercised when the hon. member for Coast-Capilano spoke because he seemed to see in this wording a possibility of private carriers being included in the plan. I realize that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano does not speak for the government, but at least he has posed a question with which we will want to deal when we go into committee.

The time for this debate is limited and we are limited to 20 minutes, so I shall cut my remarks short. There are in fact just two more things I want to say, and I can say them briefly. In the course of this debate those who have been critical of this legislation have trotted out the word "priorities". They spoke about two other things that should come first. Last year when we were debating the Canada Pension Plan we had this same argument. People then were saying: We must establish priorities. Education and health were regarded by some speakers as matters that had priority over the Canada Pension Plan. Today, because we are dealing with health, the people who were talking in this way are saying that education and pensions should take priority over health. I suppose if we had a bill to provide massive sums of money for education those same people would be saying that health and social security should have priority over education.

It seems to me, in a country that has a gross national product of $55 billion, in a country that has the affluence and the prospects of this country, that we do not need to talk about one or the other of these things. We have the money to provide social security, education, and health. Those who talk about priorities, as I see it, are attempting to slow down our work in this important field. I urge that we have the capacity to go along with all these important aspects of social welfare, and I hope that we shall do so without the kind of delay that we have had from the party opposite, which has taken 47 years to implement the three most important planks in its 1919 platform.

The other point I should like to make relates to the complaints that some people have made about the payments that will have to be made for medicare, even though it is clear that there will be no premium at the federal level, and even though it is clear that, for the most part, our medical services will be paid for out of general revenue. The point was made by an hon. member that this involves taxes, and that our people do not like taxes of any sort.

I know it is an old cliché, and it is an adage that everybody does not agree with, but I think it is true that taxes are the price we pay for civilization. I suggest if we must pay taxes for civilization, one of the aspects of civilization that is most worth paying for is the good health of our people. I urge that we do not keep finding these excuses for a slow-down with respect to this legislation, but that we recognize, as was said the other day by my leader, and as was subsequently said by others, that the best thing we can do to celebrate our one hundredth birthday, on July 1, 1967, is to have medicare in effect.

I urge therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this committee of the whole and this House of Commons act on this legislation in the light of its importance, that we get this resolution through, and that we proceed with the bill before we think of going home for a summer recess.

Mr. Munro: I could not help noting that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre kept referring to the Liberal platform policy which had been announced back in 1919. It seems to me, ever since I have been here, since 1962, that that has been the permanent line adopted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would point out to him how tedious it is to hear the same line day in and day out, and how refreshing it would be to hear something novel and original.

I think it will be well, before the hon. member talks about how long it has taken some parties to implement their policies, to remember that the leader of his party for almost 20 years was premier of Saskatchewan, before he brought in medicare legislation in the early 1960's. It would be well for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to bear that in mind before talking of how long it has taken other parties to implement their programs. I do not think it is pertinent to discuss what some political parties might have done or said 30 or 40 years ago. I think the point to remember is that now we have legislation before us, and that we should get on with it and put it into effect.

That brings me logically to the position taken by the official opposition. It seems that they would prefer to deal with the initial stages of the legislation now, and then deal with the remainder of it, namely, second reading, if I am stating their position correctly, later. I find this a very difficult position to comprehend, especially when one looks at the stages that this program has gone through in the last three years, to wind up in the resolution before us today.

We had the royal commission—and a good commission it was—set up by the Conservative government between 1958 and 1962. That commission reported two and a half years ago, and it came out with its second volume less than two years ago. Following the publication of these two reports—actually it would be more accurate to say that the second volume came out one and a half years ago—the government launched an intensive study of its recommendations. After that the government took the initiative and put forward proposals at a federal-provincial conference in July, one year ago. These were the proposals setting down the four criteria which have been referred to frequently today.

That shows progress, I would say, that no one should be ashamed of. These reports had to be studied, and they were studied intensely. Federal-provincial conferences were called, and the first one of real significance was over one year ago when the four criteria were laid down which are contained in the bill we have coming before us, and which have been submitted in this resolution.

There is nothing novel about the matter. Members of this house have been aware of this legislation, and of its nature, for over one year. We all have been aware of the royal commission report for well over two years. Why it should take any further mulling over, or why it should need any further time for discussion over the recess is hard to understand.

I would think in view of the royal commission's findings, in view of the ample material there available for all to study, in view of the fact that the principal ingredients of this resolution were laid before a federal-provincial conference over a year ago—ingredients which have changed hardly at all and which are contained in this resolution, and in this proposed legislation—we should be able to complete this legislation within a day or two. I would urge that that course of action be adopted. We should then have done something which we could be proud of accomplishing prior to recess.

I think now, Mr. Chairman, it would be appropriate for me to deal with some of the principal objections taken to this legislation. The objection you often hear, although it has not been referred to too much in this house today, is the objection to there being any target date. It has been suggested that setting a target date is unnecessary and unrealistic. With this I do not agree. Without target date discussions can drift, and it can be years before any progress is made.

Another criticism that is most often repeated concerns the universality of application of these proposals, and of the compulsory element that flows from such application. As has been mentioned, the government put forward four basic principles which it felt were prerequisite to the federal government sharing the cost. It has been argued in some quarters that one or more of these criteria should be deleted. One of the principal criteria to which objection has been made is that provincial schemes should be universal in coverage. Opponents of medicare argue that this principle is repugnant to a free society—that it involves compulsion and is not in keeping with a democratic society.

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like him to explain the statement he has made about universality and compulsion and tell us the exact position he takes. Are they similar, or is there a difference?

Mr. Munro: If the hon. member would listen to the remainder of my speech my position will become very clear.

Mr. Winkler: It will be difficult, but I will try.

Mr. Munro: I suggest that universality is an essential ingredient of any real medicare program. It underlines the basic philosophy of the Royal Commission on Health Services; it is also an element common to many provincial health, social and educational programs now in operation in the public sector of the economy. Elementary education, for example, is now universal—compulsory, if you like—as are vaccination and pasteurization. Yet I do not hear any strenuous objection from the other side in regard to these progressive measures.

Mr. Winkler: That is right; but you are not extracting a fee for those purposes.

Mr. Munro: At any rate, this is an objection I hope to deal with at some length. Amother objection one hears, and it has been raised by some medical associations, is that medicare will turn medical practitioners into civil servants. I do not believe this is so. A further objection—I heard it in this committee today—is that medicare will impose an intolerable burden on the economy, one which Canada is not ready to assume. I do not think that either the facts or the experiences of other nations bear this out.

A further criticism, and one which is related to the financial argument, is that medicare at this time is politically motivated and that it has been placed improperly on the list of priorities to the prejudice of other measures which are badly needed. Education is usually mentioned as a public need which has been forced to take second place to medicare.

The primary objection which seems to be worthy of mention is that medicare as presently envisaged by the federal government will severely prejudice the quality of medical services available to Canadians. This is an objection which the hon. member for Simcoe East stressed this afternoon. While I could not agree with many of his observations I felt his was a speech with real content, one which included many worthwhile suggestions.

I have outlined the principal objections here to the medicare proposals. I should like to deal particularly with the arguments of those who object to universality. They feel it compromises freedom of choice—that it compels people to participate in the plan and is foreign to the tenets of democracy.

Surely it is necessary to introduce the principle of universality in any program which so closely affects the health and life of all Canadians. The voluntary approach would never result in everyone being covered. This is a proven fact. I should like to refer hon. members to some figures on this aspect of the subject. The very group which would not be covered by voluntary plans is often the group which fails to receive adequate and, all too often, essential medical care. Universality may lessen an individual's freedom from coercion, but for many, total freedom is enhanced; for many it is the key to the enjoyment of such fundamental rights as freedom from want and freedom from fear.

We talk of equal opportunity. How can we achieve this lofty goal when there are many who for lack of means do not receive adequate health care? How are these people physically able to participate fully in, and contribute to, society? How can they share in the opportunities afforded their more fortunate compatriots?

Mr. Winkler: Can the hon. member indicate what he is reading from?

Mr. Munro: I am reading from my own notes which I have prepared.

Hon. members may be interested in the results of a study of the Alberta plan. Examination of this plan shows that it fails by a considerable margin to achieve universal coverage through the voluntary method. As of May 1, 1965 the Alberta medical plan covered 831,268 residents of the province, or 57.3 per cent of the population. Other plans offering equal benefits cover another 118,981, or 8.2 per cent. Thus, together, these two elements which form the basis of Alberta's plan provided coverage for only 65.5 per cent of the population of the province.

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a question at this point? I should like to ask him whether the people who need the service in the province of Alberta are getting it, and whether they are satisfied with it. That is the question which matters.

Mr. Munro: I would say that a very significant proportion of the people, a proportion in excess of 30 per cent, were without coverage as of May 1, 1965.

[Mr. Munro.]

Mr. Winkler: Do they all want it, or don't they? Is it available to them if they need it? That is all I want to know.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I would very much appreciate the opportunity to complete my remarks.

Mr. Winkler: I want some answers to these questions.

An hon. Member: Make a speech.

Mr. Winkler: Yes, I will make a speech.

Mr. Munro: If the hon. member wishes to refute my contention I trust he will have the opportunity.

Mr. Winkler: I do not want you to mislead the people of this country.

Mr. Munro: I do not think the hon. member should worry about people being misled by this side of the house.

Mr. Winkler: You are good at doing it.

Mr. Munro: The figures are clear. Even including Albertans covered from various other sources, principally federal civil servants and those in the armed services, total coverage amounted to only 76.6 per cent. This means that one in every four residents of the province was uninsured.

The principle of universality, or compulsion, if you like, is not a novel one in Alberta or any other province; rather, it is an integral part of many of the province's statutes. The Maternity Hospitals Act of 1944 provided free maternity hospital care for women regardless of means, and was financed out of general revenues. All taxpayers, in effect, contributed to the scheme.

Before the present hospital insurance program was introduced, Alberta carried on this well established principle and financed its plan out of general revenue, rather than individual premiums which could be said to provide a greater element of individual choice. I suggest that hon. members who object to universality should consider the number of statutes presently in operation in certain of our provinces which apply this principle in the very area of health care.

If there is an element of compulsion in the medicare proposals, it certainly is not a novel one in Ontario or some other provinces. When we talk of health services we are not talking of those goods produced and distributed on the basis of the open market system, a system where the voluntary element is circumscribed only by the dictates of price. We are talking of something much more than services which someone provides because he can turn a profit. We are dealing with services where, for a variety of cogent reasons, such considerations do not apply.

To raise the criticism of lack of choice and, at the same time, to limit it to medical services—one area in the whole health services field—is quite incomprehensible. If this criticism has any validity, should it not be equally applicable to the whole spectrum of health services?

By insisting on universality the federal government has gone a long way toward ensuring that Canadians will pay the most reasonable rates for medical coverage. The risk will be spread among all the people. In this connection I should like to refer to a comparison of rates under different schemes.

Many critics of medicare advocate that coverage be provided by private insurance companies and that these companies be subsidized to provide coverage for those unable to pay their own way. They suggest that private companies could provide this service at a fraction of the cost of the federal proposal. The facts do not bear out this contention.

Figures show that private plans pay out considerably less revenue on claims than do public sponsored plans. The Hall Royal Commission figures show that retained moneys, that is, money not paid out in claims, for private plans range from 38 per cent to a low of 18.5 per cent for a prepaid plan. This covers direct administrative costs, acquisition of new members, commissions, taxes, reserves and profits. In Saskatchewan on the other hand the retention ratio, free of reserves and profits, was only 6.39 per cent in 1963 and 5.81 per cent in 1964. From this comparison it can be seen that there will be a heavy obligation on provincial administrations to have these plans publicly administered.

Another objection in the summary of criticisms is the fact that doctors would now be relegated to the role of civil servants. Such an allegation is set out in a draft letter that the Ontario Medical Association sent to doctors throughout the province, asking them to sign it and send it their patients. I quote one paragraph from that letter:

I—

Referring to the doctor who it is proposed should send out the letter.

—am deeply concerned about Mr. Pearson's proposal because a compulsory, government operated medicare plan could adversely affect our relationship. I would become virtually an employee of the government, and would not be free to care for you and your family in the same way I have done in the past.

Such an allegation is simply not correct. It presupposes that the doctor will not be able to choose his patients; that the patient will not be able to choose his or her physician; that the doctor will not be free to practise where he wishes; that the doctor's fees will be arbitrarily set and that doctors will not have the choice to practise in or out of any government sponsored program. These are the faulty assumptions inherent in the draft letter.

Any provincial scheme can be implemented and qualify within the four criteria and, at the same time, guarantee the preservation of all the above rights, rights which are repugnant to any employee-employer relationship. It has not been suggested by anyone at the federal or provincial level that the doctors would not have the freedom of choice of patient, or the patient freedom of choice of doctor. It has not been suggested that the method of payment to the doctor would be on other than a fee for service basis.

It has not been suggested by anyone that there be any regulations governing where a doctor can carry on his practice. In fact, it has been suggested in the Hall Commission report that the fee schedule would be determined through consultation between the government and the recognized associations representing the medical professionals. How then can it be said that the doctor becomes a government employee or civil servant? How then can it be said that the government is interfering with the doctor-patient relationship?

The third objection is that medicare would place—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Munro: May I have a few more minutes?

The Deputy Chairman: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret there does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, during the course of his introductory remarks this afternoon the minister made a request which the committee, I am quite sure, will comply with, that the proposal he has submitted will receive the constructive and conscientious attention of the house. I trust therefore that if the attention that members give to his proposal, and to the statement he made this afternoon, gives rise in turn to some difference of opinion and criticism, he and the government will give those contrary opinions and those criticisms the same degree and kind of attention that the minister bespoke for his own proposal.

I am quite sure that a statement which would receive universal acceptance is that a proposal that prepaid medical services be available to all Canadians is a valid and desirable objective, and a proper objective for government to seek to accomplish. But I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that we as members of parliament cannot be carried away by a mere statement of objective and that we are still entitled, and indeed required to examine any specific proposal laid before us by the government, in this and any other field, in the light of certain criteria.

The two criteria which I suggest apply most particularly and forcefully here, and which we are bound to bring to bear upon examination of this proposal are these: First, how does the proposal meet the test of economic realism? How does it fit in with any realistic assessment of the priorities—and I make no apology for using that word—to be allotted to government objectives and expenditures? I hope the government will not take the position that it must rush blindly after all objectives that occur to it, without trying to assign some priorities among them.

And second, how does the proposal in question meet the test of constitutional propriety? I use the reference to the constitution here not from the sense or point of view of strict legal application—the question of whether or not the legislation is ultra vires or inter vires—but rather use the words constitutional propriety in the sense of the proper relationship between the two levels of government in Canada, and applying to the proposed activities of the federal government the test of whether or not they involve an unjustifiable intrusion by it into a field which properly belongs to another level of government.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

I suggest most strongly, Mr. Chairman, that on the basis of an examination of the government's previous announcements in connection with its medicare program, and an analysis of the minister's statement this afternoon, the proposal he has placed before this committee, and will place before the house, has very serious deficiencies with respect to both the criteria that I have suggested should be applied.

Looking first at the matter of the economic realism of the proposal, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and to members of the committee, that what is involved here, when a scheme such as the minister has in mind is in full flower, will present a major distortion of the economy and of any realistic scheme of priorities.

Mr. Chairman, all welfare schemes and projects are desirable; of course they are. Anything that will contribute to the betterment of our people, to the better care of our health, to our needs in old age, or any other aspect of our lives as Canadians, is desirable. But it seems to me that as a growing, developing young country we must assign priorities to the problems which confront us. We must bear in mind that the federal government is not responsible for all aspects of Canadian life or all the welfare of Canadians. Nor are the resources available to the government without limit; and therefore it is prudent and proper in the interest of Canadians to insist that the federal government bring a measure of judgment to bear with regard to what its programs will be and on what basis it intends to carry them out, as well as the priority assigned to them.

At the moment, on the basis of proposals and commitments made by the government, we are faced with a vast increase in commitments for expenditures in respect of security measures. In respect of the Canada Pension Plan—the cost of which I have yet to see authoritatively stated—the estimated cost is at least $600 million per annum. We are apparently about to be committed to a medicare plan which at its inception, on the basis of the statement made by the minister this afternoon, will cost $340 million per annum out of the federal treasury. Recently we have had the Bladen report on the needs of education in Canada, much of which has been approved in principle and in respect of which a commitment in principle has been given by the Prime Minister. If implemented in toto its cost can reach an astronomical amount; the commitments given will probably amount to some $500 million per annum out of the federal treasury.

So that on the basis of just those three commitments, in what I might describe generally as the field of welfare, at least $1,500 million—and I suggest closer to $2 million per annum—more has been committed to be raised by federal taxes and paid out of the federal treasury, than was the case just 18 months ago.

And that is in these three areas alone, leaving aside other real responsibilities of the federal government in such important and vital areas as our responsibility in the field of anti-pollution and de-pollution of our water resources. These increased costs are on the basis of present estimates and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we are entitled on the basis of past experience to assume that the estimated costs are well below what they will in fact turn out to be.

My view is that the government has no right or reason to enter into welfare schemes oblivious of the economic consequences. It has to consider whether there will be sufficient funds available for investment in our economic development and whether we will have to place further reliance on foreign investors for Canadian development.

Is it not a strange situation that here we have a present Minister of Finance and a former minister of finance of this government vying for the leadership of the Liberal party on the basis of the question of foreign investment in Canadian development enterprise. Both of them are committed to allowing this increase in expenditure on this kind of measure, which at the same time is helping to reduce the capital available in the pockets of Canadians for investment and which cannot help but increase our dependence on foreign capital. There is no consistency or logic in the government's position. For a government, some of whose spokesmen are crusading to, "buy back the Canadian economy," this is an odd position indeed.

With respect to the estimated cost of this program alone we already have seen a considerable escalation in the estimate. The government originally estimated the per capita cost at $28 to be shared equally by the federal and provincial governments. I understand it now estimates it at $34, an increase of $6 per head. In other words, within six months the estimated cost of medicare has risen by over 20 per cent.

Even the recent figures I believe are overly optimistic. In this connection it is interesting to note the experience of the United Kingdom, with their national health service. Their estimated annual cost of $510 million for the first year turned out to be $1,206 million and has risen steadily to $3,754 million despite the imposition of certain service charges. I suggest that on the basis of that experience, and our own experience, the minister has probably very seriously underestimated both the initial and future annual costs of the medicare program.

I suggest to you, sir, that we should be devoting our energies and our resources to meet the priority needs of the Canadian people and that those priorities really lie in the development programs which would aid in the creation of new jobs. If we concentrated on those, we will eventually reach the position where we would be able to finance even a universal medicare scheme.

I suggest that we take very special consideration of these things and that if we do not the consequences will be disastrous indeed, and if we are to give priority to any form of social measure, I say the priority should be given to education. Even in the field of medicare itself that is where the priority should be given now. In the field of medical assistance we should be providing funds so that we can produce the doctors, teachers and nurses so that we can staff our medicare program.

Mr. MacEachen: Would the hon. gentleman mind if I asked him to relate the matter of increased aid for old age pensioners to the problem of priorities.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly. We are asking that those elder citizens who are not taken care of under the Canada Pension Plan, should be taken care of. That is where the priority should have been given. In the matter of priorities in this field I would ask the minister to approach this matter with a sense of realism, but apparently that is a hopeless request.

Mr. MacEachen: Is my hon. friend now endorsing the $25 flat rate increase in the pension, in the light of the financial consequences?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my colleague the hon. member for Perth, placed on the order paper of this house and brought forward for discussion toward the end of last week a proposal in this matter which logically and realistically sets out our position in the matter of the $25 increase in the old age pension. I commend it for the consideration of the minister.

• (9:20 p.m.)

On the basis of arguments and considerations I have so far brought forward I submit with all earnestness that the federal government has no right in the first place, and has no reason in logic or in responsibility, to impose this scheme on the provinces as the minister intends to do. I submit, rather, that the approach by the federal government to the plan of prepaid medical services in Canada should be to offer to supplement provincial schemes where there are gaps in the present coverage. Because I believe in matching criticism with constructive proposals I should like to put before the committee and the government at this stage a brief statement of principles upon which I think the federal government's approach to medicare should be based. I will summarize them as follows.

Any plan for prepaid medical coverage to which the federal government contributes should not be on a universal and compulsory basis, but should be based on the following principles:

One, that medical services, at an adequate level, should be available to all Canadians on a prepaid basis.

Two, that this being a field primarily within provincial responsibility, the federal government should not seek to superimpose any national, universal or compulsory scheme on existing provincial schemes.

Three, that the role of the federal government should be to extend to the provinces financial assistance to enable them to establish provincial medicare programs whereby prepaid medical care is available to all citizens at a fixed premium, or cost, but not to compel contributions to or participation in a scheme by those who are now covered adequately, or who are able and prefer to provide medical care for themselves.

Four, that all schemes of prepaid medical care, to qualify for federal assistance, should preserve the voluntary doctor-patient relationship.

Five, that beyond federal participation in such uniform programs to ensure availability of standard coverage, the provinces should be left free to expand or enlarge medical care schemes as they and their voters see fit, while the federal government should concentrate its efforts in the vital fields of encouragement of, and provision of resources for, training and research in medical, dental, nursing and other related occupations and facilities.

That, in my submission, Mr. Chairman, is a sound and realistic set of principles upon which federal participation in a program of medicare should be based. Such an approach would lead us to offer to the provinces help in a voluntary but universally available plan.

There are other statistics and considerations which argue this way as well. The 1964 survey on voluntary health insurance reported that more than 80 per cent of Canadians were covered then by some form of prepaid medical care. With the Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia plans now in effect, on the basis of some estimates this figure approaches 90 per cent, although I am told that a more realistic estimate is between 86 and 87 per cent. I have seen estimates that 12.8 million Canadians are now covered by adequate prepaid medical care plans.

The government, however, wishes to use a shotgun approach to the problem. In order to provide medical care for the approximately 10 per cent not now covered—and that is the gap we should be concentrating on—the government insists upon a new type of universal plan which will supersede private and corporate plans long in existence. On the basis of the minister's proposal, all private plans must be wiped out and this plan must be publicly administered. Let me ask him and the committee what is going to happen to some of the very adequate and excellent private plans now in existence, under which employees of companies in large numbers are covered? These individuals are covered by medical plans they like, the benefits of which they enjoy. They are perfectly adequate in coverage. Many of these plans are paid for by the employer without any contribution at all by the employee, as the result of agreements arrived at through the years of the process of collective bargaining. These plans are apparently to be wiped out by the minister's proposal, and there will be substituted some sort of universal plan which can only be paid for out of the tax purse, to which these employees will be contributing. This will deprive them of a benefit they have attained as a result of the process of years of collective bargaining.

I suggest the alternative Ontario Medical Services Insurance Plan or the British Columbia plan, which are universally acceptable and under which the provincial governments pay the premium for the lowest income groups, effectively meet the government's objection to a voluntary scheme. They are universally available, and show that the government's fear that the most needy would not participate or benefit can be met without a compulsory program.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, since the Hall Commission report is being quoted extensively, I think we should remind ourselves of what was said by the commission at page 3 of volume 1 of its report. These are the words used:

> The commission believes that the individual's responsibility for his personal health and that of the members of his or her family is paramount to the extent of the individual's capacities.

Surely one can agree with the objective of adequate medical services for all Canadians without endorsing a comprehensive system of compulsory medical insurance.

These are some of the considerations which in my view indicate that the plan of the minister and the government is not economically realistic. As to the other criteria in relation to its constitutional propriety, again I find that there are very serious objections.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the committee's generosity and I will do my best not to abuse it, and to bring my remarks to a close very shortly.

It is, in my opinion, inescapable that the government must not take the position, as the minister has, that it will dictate to the provinces how they will run their medicare programs, if they want to obtain federal financial contribution. It is true that the minister this afternoon in his words recognized the constitutional fact of provincial jurisdiction. But this is what he said earlier in answer to my question as to whether provinces, which do not care to accept the federal criteria, would qualify for a fiscal equivalent:

> I wish to state there is no provision for federal contributions to provinces which do not have medical care plans which conform to the four criteria . . . The medical care legislation will not require agreements between the federal and provincial governments; it will simply authorize payments from the consolidated revenue fund to any province which has a medical care plan as described in the federal legislation.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, most clearly what is being said is this: Here we are, boys, we have a lot of money in the federal treasury; it is there for you if you will be good and run your medical care programs the way we want you to run them, and not the way you think you should run them. This clearly indicates a heavy-handed use of the club of financial power to force provincial acceptance of federal dictation.

What is the difference between what the minister proposes there, and a proposal that the federal government has money in the treasury and will give it, say, to the province of Manitoba for education if that province will alter its school curriculum and provide for the teaching of French at all levels of their school system? Alternatively, what is the difference between the minister's proposal and the federal government saying to the province of Quebec that it will give that province money from the federal treasury if they will adopt a school system of the kind considered desirable by the people here in Ottawa?

This is nothing more than financial blackmail and it is totally and completely unacceptable.

The federal government makes the boast that what it is doing is co-operative federalism. This is not co-operative federalism: This is dictatorial federalism of the worst sort.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, there are many other objections that I could put forward on the grounds of constitutional impropriety, but as I wish to show the committee my appreciation of their courtesy in allowing me to finish my remarks, I will conclude simply by saying that the other criticisms are equally as valid as those I have already made.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly very pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate, and I can assure you it is not by choice. Probably one might say it is because of provocation, which is not unusual in this house and perhaps is not unusual at this stage of a session. I viewed with a great deal of dismay the way in which the hon. member for Hamilton East entered the debate. I also viewed with tremendous apprehension some of the words that he spoke. The reason I say this is that he referred, as did many speakers this evening, to who was the father of legislation such as this.

If hon. members wish to go back to years gone by, I can recall on another occasion in this house referring to the remarks of Bismarck that were made, not a few decades ago but many, many decades ago. He was certainly a hidebound conservative in European politics and was, I believe, the father of this and many other types of social measures that have been introduced into western social justice. But the thing that concerned me most so far as the hon. member for Hamilton East is concerned was the fact that at this stage in the debate he was allowed to inject certain thinking, in very carefully chosen words, in regard to what government policy is now and what their intentions are.

I say to the hon. member, who is a member of the legal profession, that he would be ostracized by his colleagues in that profession if he tried for one moment to impose this sort of dictatorial control over his friends in the legal profession. One of the things in this country that is becoming vitally serious is that people such as the hon. member and others in the legal profession are coming out and advocating such policies and supporting such socialistic plans as the one to which he paid lip service this evening, as did other hon. members. In view of this it is my opinion that we should socialize the lawyers quickly—and very quickly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that I have a lot of support in this respect. I will be condemned for this, I know; but not being a lawyer I do not very much care. I happen to know the fees that lawyers charge, as do my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party and others. I know what fees the hon. member gets for his services and the fees other gentlemen in his profession are paid. I am a free enterpriser and wish to follow a free course, as other free human beings wish to do. It is interesting that we in Canada are now moving into this medicare plan when the people of England are starting to move out of it.

Mr. Douglas: That is nonsense.

Mr. Winkler: It is not nonsense at all, when you realize how many people in that country are today covered by private plans who were not covered by private plans two years ago. I have the figures here and can give them to the hon. member now. In England today over two million people are insured by private plans who were not insured before the medicare plan came into effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Winkler.]

An hon. Member: They don't want to hear that.

Mr. Winkler: I know they don't want to hear that. It is a peculiar thing, too, that the plan in effect in Alberta is a rather satisfactory one. I hesitate to say this because it is sometimes taken in the wrong way, but I went to work in this country for as little money as anyone in the depression days. I am not ashamed to admit that, nor to say that the family from which I came needed a great deal of the support that families get today; but my family did not receive that support. We would have had greater opportunities if this assistance had been available; I do not deny this for one moment.

But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, the house and the country that what we should be dealing with in a medicare bill is serving the needs of the people who need help the most. If the people do not choose to participate in such a program, it is not for us to cram it down their throats, if they are prepared to pay the tax out of which other people will be assisted. There is nothing charitable about that situation or the government bringing in such a plan.

The hon. member for Hamilton East also referred to a letter sent out by a doctor to his patients, or some distribution of this type of literature in the province of Ontario. I should like to ask the hon. member if he thinks that doctor or the Ontario Medical Association was lying, because that is what the hon. member implied. I should like him to deny that statement.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I was reading from a paragraph of a letter that the Ontario Medical Association sent out to doctor members. The paragraph I quoted from was contained in a letter they sent to the medical profession, suggesting that they incorporate the particular paragraph in a letter they wished them to send to all their patients. I read the paragraph and after reading it said that the conclusions reached in the letter were faulty and incorrect. I pointed that out in my speech, if the hon. member was listening. I did not say the doctors were liars. The hon. member is now attempting to pervert my remarks.

Mr. Winkler: You perverted your own remarks, but I will accept your explanation.

I would also make reference to the cost of plans which have been adopted by governments. I preface these remarks by referring to the speech delivered in this house not many evenings ago by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in which he explained the socialistic plans that were instituted and developed in the province of Saskatchewan. Since the medicare plan was adopted in Great Britain it is interesting to note that it has increased in cost by 500 per cent, and this is not unusual in a government instituted plan of this type.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question now? Is he advocating, as I take it he is from his remarks in objecting to the universality of this plan, medicare with a means test?

Mr. Winkler: My earlier statement was very clear in this respect. I am here as a member of parliament, representing and serving the people. I said before that I believe the duty of every member of parliament is to serve the people's greatest need now, if the need exists; and I know it exists in the case of some people in our society who cannot afford to pay for these things. But I do not understand why people should be forced to participate in a plan that is offered to them, when they already have a plan of their choice. I believe that this is a choice most people wish to make of their own volition. I am not supporting a means test at all. I spoke too often against the means test in connection with the type of social legislation the government are introducing in connection with old age pensions. I am against that sort of thing and will be against it forever.

Mr. Munro: Do you want a means test?

Mr. Winkler: You cannot talk to me now the way you spoke earlier this evening. Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will resume his seat I will carry on with my speech.

I should like to refer now to the province from which I come, and to the program in effect at the present time in Ontario. I would ask the minister to clarify his position in regard to universality and compulsory participation in such a scheme. Does he say that a province which has 90 per cent of its people enrolled in such a plan will be entitled to the money available through this particular scheme? Or is a province which has a 90 per cent enrolment going to be forced into the compulsory aspects of the scheme the minister has enunciated in this house?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Winkler: I should like to proceed by saying that I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Mr. Lewis: Is the hon. member afraid of a question?

Mr. Winkler: I am at a very high point in my speech, if the hon. member does not mind.

Mr. Lewis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winkler: If the hon. member does not mind I should like to continue my statement. I am at a very high point of my speech, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Winkler: I am grateful to hon. members across the floor. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, and it is a very serious point.

Mr. Lewis: Is the hon. member at a low point now?

Mr. Winkler: If the Minister of National Health and Welfare introduced this plan now because of the enrolment that is taking place in the largest province of this country—

Mr. MacEachen: Which one?

Mr. Winkler: If he did that, he is guilty of exactly the same fault, in my humble opinion, as the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the milk farmers, and as the Minister of Industry in regard to designated areas. When I was a child going to school we used to call it "dirty pool". I believe it is very significant that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is forcing this issue at this time because he is only pulling the rug from under the people who wish to serve those in greatest need.

I am not only referring to the province of Ontario. I believe that the province of Quebec is currently considering the same type of program. The province of Saskatchewan already has such a program, as have the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

What is the minister trying to do? If he is trying to impose a new set of ground rules to replace the satisfactory plans which are now in existence, then I suggest that the unparliamentary language I have used would apply.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member a question before he takes his seat? The hon.

member for Grey-Bruce stated, if I heard him correctly, that in Great Britain the cost of the medicare plan has increased by 500 per cent. May I ask the hon. member where he obtained that information, so that we may all be able to read it?

Mr. Winkler: I made inquiries from a very authentic source and that was the information that was given to me this afternoon. May I also inform the hon. member that the research and the medical and surgical teaching has sadly deteriorated in the same period.

Mr. Lewis: Can we be informed of this authentic source, Mr. Chairman? I am paying the hon. member the compliment of accepting his suggestion that his source is authentic, and I should like to share with him the information from this authentic source.

An hon. Member: It is a Conservative source.

Mr. Winkler: No, it is not a Conservative source. This information has come to me from a professor of medicine at the University of Western Ontario.

Mr. Douglas: Now we know where it came from. This is a bit much. You did not consult him; you got this information in your mail.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Having listened to the debate this afternoon and evening I can well understand why it has taken nearly 50 years to get the medicare resolution up to the present stage. Before hearing this debate I had no idea that there were so many hon. members in this house who have been talking across the country about the need for medicare and about the need of the sick people; that there have been so many people promising a national scheme of medicare for many years and who have then, on being faced with a good piece of legislation, spoken about the need for education and the need for legislation on this, that or the other thing, and then have mounted a sudden surprise attack stating that this legislation deprives the people of this country of their liberty.

I feel it is time that Canadians saw the way in which so many hon. members in the house are reacting to the legislation now before us and which the government has had the courage and foresight to present to the house. I hope that at this stage the government will not weaken or defer this measure, because I think that if the minister were to leave this matter at the resolution stage, the summer recess will be used by many hon. members whom we have heard speaking in the house in order to prejudice certain groups of people in their own constituencies against this legislation.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that they will await the opportunity of having this matter referred to a committee in order to kill the legislation before it gets any further. I appeal to the government to go ahead with this matter. I can assure the minister that this measure will have the support not only of a sufficient number of us in this house to have it passed but also the support of the people of this country who have been waiting for medicare for such a long time.

We have heard many quotations from the Hall report, and I was very disappointed to hear the hon. member for Kamloops trying to enumerate a few minutes ago all the medical coverage that Canadians have under private schemes at the present time. The Hall report states quite clearly that after more than 35 years of endeavour on the part of voluntary groups and commercial insurance companies, only slightly more than one half of the population of Canada has any degree of voluntary insurance protection, and this for medical services alone. Of this number, the coverage held by nearly three million people is wholly inadequate. Over 7.5 million Canadians have no medical care insurance whatsoever. I think it is time we stopped talking in distorted terms regarding the medical coverage of Canadians.

The Hall report is an exceedingly worthwhile document and its findings have been beyond criticism or dispute. I think that sometimes we are forgetting why this legislation is being introduced at this time. It is simply being introduced because coverage of this kind is urgently needed in Canada. It has been abundantly proven over and over again that not only the small sections of the population about whom we have been hearing tonight, but wide ranges of Canadian citizens simply cannot afford the medical care they need.

We have been hearing about the exceedingly high cost of medicare. Let me remind the house of the cost of illness to our economy at the present time. In 1963, a hundred million man-days of labour have been lost because of illness, which amount to 3.8 per cent of the gross national product of that year, worth over $1.5 billion. If we assume a continued 3.8 per cent loss, the figure for the year 1965 reaches at least $2 billion, and that does not include the reduced productivity of those who continue to work while in poor health. Obviously not all of this is preventable, but even if only 10 per cent could be avoided through better health care and greater availability of physicians' services, the gain to our economy would at least be equal to $200 million. I think it is time we began to look at this matter in actual terms instead of bringing forward moss-backed ideas that should have died in the last century.

As I said, we have been considering this measure for approximately 50 years. Other countries of the world are away ahead of us. We have the example of the health plan in New Zealand which has been in existence since the 1930's, and the medicare plans which have been in existence in the Scandinavian countries for a long time. We have had the example of Great Britain and our own province of Saskatchewan. Let me ask these people who are so keenly eager to prove that Great Britain wishes to repudiate its medical plan whether it is not strange that in spite of all the true blue Tory governments which have governed that country since the introduction of the medicare plan, none of those Tory governments has repealed this legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Or has amended it.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Or even amended it. They did not dare do it because they knew that if they touched that legislation the common people of Britain would know exactly what to do with them. Let me point out that if the government can get this piece of legislation on the statute books, it will be an enduring memorial to them. It will not be touched by those people who are today making such a fuss from this side of the house. These people who have been complaining about it will never dare to touch it, knowing how needed it is and how popular it will be once the legislation is in effect.

The Hall report made it abundantly clear, too, that another allegation which has been made today is completely wrong. That report has made it abundantly clear that there is no comparison between the cost of administering these private plans and the cost of administering a properly run government medicare scheme. Indeed, the Hall report says that the decisions which Canadians have to make, assuming that they accept the claim of the health insurance industry that it can provide universal coverage, which incidentally the Hall Commission does not accept, is whether they wish to pay $1,020 million for these services in 1971 as administered by the insurance industry, or $837 million for a program administered by governmental agencies.

It has been proven over and over again the public agencies are the ones which can run a medicare scheme more economically. All of us in this corner have been looking forward to getting this legislation before us because we hope, at long last, we are going to be able to turn health care from being a business for profit, as it has been under the private agencies, into a service for the people of Canada. The opponents of this measure say that the cost will go up, and that the Hall Commission estimates have not been high enough. Probably the cost will go up. Costs have gone up for other services and in other industries. Costs are steadily going up these days. I point this out, that if the cost of a public medicare scheme goes up, the cost for private schemes under private agencies will go up too. People who are today without medical service coverage will be just that much worse off than they were. I think there is no argument in saying that costs will go up.

There have been a number of pieces of evidence given concerning the benefits to the people of a publicly administered medicare scheme. I want to give just one single bit of evidence which was given to those of us who were in Vancouver attending the national conference of social workers a week or two ago. Professor Titmuss of the London School of Economics was referring to the benefits that had come to the British people as a result of the health services. He gave this illustration, that the incidence of cataract in people over 70 has declined by 30 per cent in 12 years in Great Britain. This is a disease that is tremendously prevalent among older people.

May I give one other example of what is happening? This may impress hon. members even more. The incidence of blindness is down 25 per cent in Great Britain over the last ten years.

Mr. Brand: May I ask the hon. lady a question?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): All right.

Mr. Brand: Does the hon. lady honestly believe that as a result of medicare in Great Britain the incidence of cataract has improved? If this is the case, I am sure the medical profession would be more than pleased to hear about this new discovery.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am saying that a reputable person, Professor Titmuss, one of the best known authorities in Great Britain on social welfare measures, made the statement that during the last 12 years, during which time medicare was in force in Britain, one of the greatest triumphs had been the reduction of blindness by 25 per cent. He attributed this reduction to the fact that they had a national health service in Britain and people, for the first time, were able to go and get treatment for their blindness. They were able to get treatment for cataract on a large scale.

Let me point out that one of the difficulties we have encountered in Canada has been the fact that the business of providing medical services has been a private industry. The doctors, whether they wanted to or not, have not been in the position to give service to those who most needed it, the people in the lower income group. The hon. member who just asked me the question was this afternoon deploring the shortage of doctors. He said we would have to find ways and means of increasing the number of doctors. Of course we will. Let me point out, however, that the shortage of doctors occurred in Canada, not under a public medicare scheme but under a scheme where the doctors were private, individual businessmen. They have not been able to provide services to the people of this country where those services were required.

Mr. Brand: Will the hon. lady permit—

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have just a minute left, and I am afraid I cannot get an extension of time. Although I have had to put into a shorter period of time than I would have liked the comments I desired to make, let me summarize by urging the government not to be deterred by comments heard from some on this side. The government should know that this measure is one of the most needed by the people of this country. They have been waiting for it and will welcome it more than anything else, with the possible exception of an increase in old age pensions. Once this measure is on the statute books, there is no chance in the world of its ever being repealed by this lot over here, if they should be in power again, or by any other government in this country. I urge the government and the minister to proceed now, before the summer recess.

[Mr. Brand.]

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock it is my duty pursuant to standing order 61A to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. MacEachen thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

• (10:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: I wonder if someone on the government side could tell us what business we shall undertake tomorrow in this house?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the order of business for tomorrow is the income tax amendments; the National Arts Centre; Bill C-215, which is the dock workers bill; second reading of the medical care insurance bill—

Mr. Churchill: No, no.

Mr. MacEachen: —and a bill, standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to amend the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 world exhibition act. That is just a small item.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. In the absence of the government house leader, the acting house leader has now announced additional business for the house which was not contemplated by the government house leader.

In numerous consultations that we have had with the government house leader within the last ten days, an attempt has been made to bring this session to a conclusion, and the arrangement has been that a limited number of bills be placed in front of us. The acting house leader has now placed something else in front of us which was not in that arrangement. This, I think, is breaking the word of the government house leader that he conveyed to us on this side of the house.

Mr. Starr: Also the Prime Minister.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—INSTRUCTIONS FROM U.S. RESPECTING FLOUR FOR CUBA

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): It has come to my attention in recent days, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian political and economic sovereignty may be suffering an infringement—indeed, a violation—as the result of United States government policy respecting trade with the government of Cuba; and I take this opportunity to direct a query in this area to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, the Minister of Industry.

I am informed on excellent authority, sir, that directives have gone out to the three United States owned flour mills in Canada namely, Robin Hood, Quaker and Pillsbury, forbidding them to mill Canadian wheat in Canada for sale to Cuba. The order is articulated under the Trading with the Enemy Act, and apparently carries with it the implied threat of severe penalties for any offender.

I would add that so far as I am aware, these are not new directives, and this is not a new situation. On the contrary, the situation would appear to be a chronic or permanent, one. It has been the subject of widespread suggestion and speculation before. It has come freshly to light as a result of the $800 million wheat agreement that has just been concluded between Canada and the Soviet union.

The directive forbidding these three United States owned flour mills from processing wheat bound for Cuba has sat, I am informed, on the desks of the Canadian offices of these companies for a considerable time. I re-emphasize that so far as I am aware there is nothing new at the level of the directive itself. What is new, apparently, is that despite all the recent furore over United States government guidelines for foreign subsidiaries of domestic U.S. firms, and despite the insistence of the Canadian government that those guidelines have been modified to meet the legitimate principles of Canadian sovereignty, there has been no new directive rescinding the old one. The old one is still in effect, and is being observed once again in connection with the new Canada-Russia wheat deal.

Under the terms of this Canada-Russia deal, the Russians have purchased, for delivery over the next three years, about 45 millions bushels of wheat in the form of flour, and no one has attempted to make any secret of the fact that more than two thirds of it is earmarked for Cuba. The flour is shipped in 100-pound bags, and the total 45 million-bushel purchase represents an annual sale of 6.6 million of these 100 pound bags.

The Russians are in process right now of placing their orders for the processing of this flour with mills in Canada, both Canadian-owned and American-owned, and the situation as I understand it is that while both Canadian-owned mills and American-owned mills are bidding on the orders destined for shipment via the west coast to Russia, only the Canadian-owned companies are bidding on the orders destined for shipment via the east coast to Cuba. The American-owned mills in this country are not bidding on the Cuban orders—presumably because of the old directives from their head offices in the United states which prevent them from doing so.

Now, there are two concessions with respect to this situation that I want to make immediately. The first is that the situation in no way interferes with Canadian business. On the contrary, in fact, it is a beneficial situation as far as the Canadian mills are concerned. They have the whole Cuban market to themselves, with no competition from the American-owned mills.

The second is that I am fully sympathetic with the interests of the United States government and the United States people in their courageous fight at this time—in Southeast Asia, in the Caribbean, in Europe and elsewhere—to resist the forces of aggression in Communist and other forms that threaten the free world. And I can fully appreciate their legitimate desire to withhold, wherever possible, any goods or materials which might be construed by them to be of help and comfort to their enemies.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is a principle at stake here and it is in the undeniable interest of our Canadian sovereignty that it be respected. Hon. members on the government side will say perhaps that no Canadian business is being hurt here; so, they will ask, what harm is being done?

But I would ask them this: What would happen if all the flour mills in Canada were American-owned? Then, would not the logical result be a situation wherein Canada would find that she could not sell any of her flour, or at least could not sell any flour to Cuba?

I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite this: Is the present situation with respect to the American-owned mills in this country in keeping with the spirit of good corporate Canadian citizenship? Is it in accord, in their view, with the principles of citizenship as they feel they should apply to individuals who live here, and make their living here?

I say only this, Mr. Speaker. These American-owned firms are here, and we are glad to have them here. But presumably some benefits accrue to them as a result of their being here and it is therefore incumbent upon them to fulfil the same responsibilities of citizenship in this country as we expect of individual persons who live here and work here.

For my part I believe these United States firms, left to their own social and corporate philosophies, do fulfil those responsibilities most admirably. It is only when a different authority interferes that there is the danger of trouble. In this case, sir, I submit that an over-riding authority has interfered and in so doing has not only inhibited the potential of these American-owned citizens of Canada, but has infringed upon Canadian political and economic sovereignty as well. If this is the visible part, what of the invisible part? I would ask the government to give us assurances that this is not the tip of an iceberg.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg South for his remarks concerning a situation which would not, if it in fact exists, harmonize with good corporate Canadian citizenship.

When I learned of the hon. gentleman's question today we endeavoured to check with the companies concerned. We were able to communicate with most of them, and they said they have not received instructions not to sell any of this flour to Cuba. We propose to check with all of them and make sure of the facts in this regard.

The situation is as the hon. member represented it, that even if the American-owned companies were prevented from processing flour for Cuba, Canadian industry would not lose because then Canadian-owned companies could process more of the wheat. In that way the Canadian economy will not suffer.

However, there is the question of the extension of extraterritoriality with which we were concerned in our meeting with the U.S. ministers earlier this year. Canadian ministers pressed our case very vigorously. We told them this was contrary to the best interests of Canada and totally incompatible with our concepts of Canadian sovereignty.

We told them we intended to take action to let Canadian companies know what we regarded to be good corporate Canadian citizenship. Hon. members know what the guiding principles are. We have set forth the principles under which we suggest that foreign and Canadian owned companies operate in all respects as good Canadian citizens.

We did leave it with the Americans, after pressing very vigorously, that if any cases came to our attention where there was any danger of infringement on Canadian sovereignty, we would bring them to their attention and pursue the matter, and if there is any evidence to that end, as a result of our approaches to these milling companies, we will certainly pursue it.

There have been one or two instances recently in which it was alleged that this sort of thing was happening. We took them up with the American authorities and we found out either it was not happening at all, or, if there was any shadow that it might be happening, appropriate action was taken to prevent it. I would like to assure the hon. member that this matter will be pursued along the lines I have mentioned, and I wish to thank him for bringing it to our attention.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.14 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SHERMAN—SOURCE OF INFORMATION FOR QUESTION ON FLOUR MILLING

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I would like to do the house and the Minister of Trade and Commerce the courtesy of identifying the source of the information which was the basis of my remarks in the house yesterday respecting the Cuban flour milling situation. My source of information was the associate editor of the Winnipeg Tribune, Mr. Val Wenier, and a front page article in that newspaper of last Saturday, July 9.

CRIMINAL CODE

LEGISLATION TO BE DEALT WITH BEFORE OF TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster) moved the first reading of Bill No. C-228, to amend the Criminal Code (harassing telephone communications).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code to provide penalties for persons convicted of abusing the telephone service to harass or torment other persons. This represents a serious and growing problem, and in Ontario and Quebec the Bell Telephone Company estimates that some 2,000 complaints are received monthly from the victims of such action. Similar legislation is now before the United States congress.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTENSION OF TELEVISION SERVICE, CAPE BRETON ISLAND

Question No. 1,231—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria: Supplementary

1. Does the government plan to provide adequate television service to the communities of Pleasant Bay, Red River, Capstick, Bay St. Lawrence, St. Margaret's Village, Dingwall, North Harbour, South Harbour, Sunrise, Big Intervale, Cape North, Aspy Bay, Sugar Loaf, White Point, Smelt Brook and Bay Road Valley in northern Cape Breton Island, N.S.?

2. Has the government, through any of its ministers, received representation in this regard and, if so (a) what reply was given (b) what action, if any, is contemplated?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Minister of Transport is concerned:

2. Yes, (a) letter acknowledged stating that representation being passed on to Secretary of State, (b) to be answered elsewhere.

In so far as the Minister of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

2. (a) Representations were received from several citizens in the areas concerned. As cabinet minister for Nova Scotia the Minister of National Health and Welfare assured his correspondents that every possible consideration was being given to this very important matter. INTEREST RATE ON MONEY FOR FOREIGN LOANS

Question No. 1,369—Mr. Godin:

1. When the government grants a loan to a foreign country at a certain rate, does it obtain this money at this same rate?

2. If so, what is the rate most frequently applicable?

3. If not, on what basis are the standards of such a transaction established?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. No.

2. Not applicable. See answer to 1.

3. In the case of commercial transactions, the rate of interest is determined by commercial considerations and is comparable to the rates normally charged for such transactions by other lenders; in the case of aid transactions, on the current and prospective economic and balance of payments situation of the country to which the loan is made.

U.S. TAX ON TOURISTS

Question No. 1,397—Mr. Allard:

Does the government have any knowledge of an alleged $100 tourist tax to be imposed by the government of the United States on American citizens going abroad and, if so, has the government made or does it intend to make representations to the government of the United States to the effect that this tax should not apply to American citizens visiting Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): There has been some comment recently in the press speculating that the U.S. government was planning a head tax on U.S. tourists going abroad. The U.S. administration quite naturally has under continuous review all aspects of the U.S. balance of payments situation, including what steps they might take if further action should become necessary. There is, as a matter of practice now, close discussion of balance of payments matters between the U.S. and Canada. Canadian representatives have informally reminded the U.S. authorities of Canada's great interest in any policy change affecting U.S. tourists.

WINDSOR, ONT.—PROVISION OF FRENCH RADIO BROADCASTS

Question No. 1,442—Mr. Allard:

1. Has the government received petitions from the city council of Windsor, Ontario, and from several citizens in the Ontario counties of Essex and Kent with regard to the installation of French language radio in that region?

2. If so, what answers has the government given on this subject to the city council of Windsor or to any other person or body?

3. Has the government conveyed any such petitions to the directors of the C.B.C.?

4. If so, when will the directors of the C.B.C. study such petitions?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. The Office of the Secretary of State has generally replied to those concerned after consultations with representatives of the C.B.C. The replies stated that the C.B.C. is at present studying the possibility of setting up a frequency modulation station in this region because of the present lack of good AM frequency bands. The office also stressed the urgent need for the extension of the C.B.C. French network and the priority which the government is giving to this.

3. Individual members of parliament have received letters and sent them to the C.B.C. and the corporation itself has received letters and petitions from individuals and groups.

4. The C.B.C. has considered numerous requests, over the past few years, for the establishment of a French language radio station in Windsor. Due to the absence of a good AM frequency, the C.B.C. is presently thinking in terms of an FM station for Windsor. The proposed station is on the C.B.C. current five-year capital plan.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed as follows: No.

COST OF WITHDRAWING AND RE-ESTABLISHING NATO PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,590—Mr. Crouse:

1. What is the estimated cost to Canada of the political and military withdrawal of our NATO personnel from France?

2. What is the estimated cost of re-establishing these forces in other countries?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned:

With regard to civilian personnel employed by NATO, any costs which might be incurred would arise from a decision to transfer the NATO civilian headquarters out of Paris. No such decision has been taken to date.

In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned: The withdrawal of our military units from bases in France is a matter of negotiation with France and until certain decisions have been taken no estimate of costs can be given.

PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS

Question 1,653—Mr. Irvine:

1. Are any former civil servants of Canada now retired receiving pensions of less than $50 per month and, if so, how many?

2. Are any in receipt of pensions of $50 to $75 per month and, if so, how many?

3. Are any in receipt of pensions of $75 to $100 per month and, if so, how many?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3. The total of the pensions received by retired civil servants from all sources is not known. In so far as the pensions paid under employee pension plans of the government of Canada are concerned, the following information is available in answer to this question: pensioners receiving less than $50 per month, 5,203. Pensioners receiving $50 and less than $75 per month, 4,411. Pensioners receiving $75 to $100 per month, 3,660.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 1,676—Mr. Irvine:

1. What was the total number of persons illegally resident in Canada as of January 1, 1966?

2. Of these, how many are on extended visitors' permits?

3. How many remain on minister's permit?

4. How many have been ordered deported?

5. How many were deported during each of the years 1955 to 1965?

6. How many such people are in Canada awaiting various decisions and/or impending regulation or legislation?

7. Is it the intention of the government to declare a large portion of them "landed immigrants" and, if so, when?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. There are many categories of illegal residents e.g. ship deserters, stowaways, persons who gained entry by eluding examination or by giving fraudulent information and persons who came forward legally as visitors but overstayed the period of their authorized entry. No accurate estimate is possible as to how many of these people may have been in Canada at any given time. However, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration announced in the house on July 8, 1966, the department has received approximately 20,000 applications from visitors in Canada seeking landed immigrant status.

2. and 3. The 20,000 visitors referred to in part 1 have not been issued with formal visitor's or minister's permits but rather they have been allowed to remain in Canada without official immigration status pending decisions on their immigrant applications.

4. and 5. There is no way of distinguishing in departmental statistics all of those persons who may have been in Canada illegally and who were ordered deported or deported. However, the attached statistical table reflects the total number of persons ordered deported or deported from within Canada during each of the years 1955 to 1965 indicating the general category in which they came.

6. See answer to part 1.

7. Government policy in dealing with such applications was announced by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on July 8, 1966.

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 1,684—Mr. Irvine:

KRIEGHOFF PAINTINGS IN NATIONAL GALLERY

Question No. 1,697—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Are there any Krieghoff paintings at the National Gallery?

2. If so (a) how much has been paid for them (b) from whom were they bought (c) what are the titles of these paintings?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.

2. While in this instance the prices of the Krieghoff are generally known to the dealers, information can be provided, but this precedent could prove to be embarrassing in other questions of a similar nature where the National Gallery may feel that it would not be in its best interests to reveal the prices paid. It could possibly result in making negotiations more difficult with dealers and individuals.

DORCHESTER, N.B.—HOUSING FOR PENITENTIARY STAFF

Question No. 1,704—Mr. Coates:

1. Is the government removing the homes used by personnel of the Canadian penitentiary service at Dorchester, New Brunswick, and, if so, for what reason?

2. What action is the government taking to ensure that a substantial number of the employees of the Canadian penitentiary service will reside in close proximity to the penal institutions at Dorchester, N.B., for emergency situations?

3. Is it the intention of the government to carry out any new housing developments in the Dorchester area as a result of the elimination of the present housing?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. The penitentiary service removed eight frame units at Dorchester, as these units became vacant, in keeping with the penitentiary service policy to phase out of housing operations. In 1963 several units were declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation (CADC) and in 1964 CADC authorized the penitentiary service to dispose of these buildings, but no bids were received when public tenders were called. Subsequently the CADC authorized the penitentiary service to proceed with the disposition of the other houses that have been removed. The frame units are approximately 80 years old. As a result of certain representations, the phasing out operation is under review.

2. A substantial number of the staff of the penitentiary live within reasonably close proximity by car of the institution.

3. The penitentiary service has no plans for carrying out any new housing developments in the Dorchester area.

CENTENNIAL FISHERIES MUSEUM, LUNENBURG, N.S.

Question No. 1,737—Mr. Stanbury:

Will the proposed centennial fisheries museum in Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, contain some suitable commemoration of the schooner Bluenose to ensure recognition of the town's greatest historical asset?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes.

The centennial commission has been informed that the centennial fiisheries museum of the town of Lunenburg will take the form of a typical fishing village with up to 12 buildings included.

They will be built on piling to resemble the fishing buildings at a wharf. There will be several arms to the wharfs to which will be tied small fishing boats such as dories.

The tools of the trade will be exhibited at various places through the fishing village, different types of fishing gear will be on display from the earliest time of fishing in the Maritimes up to the present modernized methods. It is also expected that there will be a building which will be displaying the log books of old boats which sailed out of Lunenburg.

DEMOLITION OF HOUSES, DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY

Question No. 1,742—Mr. Flemming:

1. Is the demolition of houses at Dorchester penitentiary, New Brunswick, undertaken with the approval of the government of Canada?

2. Have the houses been condemned as being unsuitable for human habitation?

3. If so, what is the name of the official who made such report?

4. Has any attempt been made to sell the houses to tenants presently occupying same?

5. Has any attempt been made to secure bids by public tender?

6. What is the present appraised value of the houses to be destroyed?

7. Will employees of the Department of Justice occupying these houses at present be obliged to secure housing accommodation elsewhere and, if so, will allowance for travelling be on a mileage basis?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Parts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. The demolition of houses at Dorchester was undertaken pursuant to a penitentiary service policy to phase out of government housing except in isolated localities. In October, 1963 two frame units were declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation (CADC). As no offers to purchase these units were received CADC authorized the penitentiary service to dispose of these units, and in view of this experience CADC subsequently authorized the penitentiary service to proceed with the disposal of other frame units.

The units disposed of while not officially condemned were approximately eighty (80) years old, and the cost of maintenance of some of these units amounted to over $1,200 in a two year period. This cost of maintenance did not include any charge for labour, which was provided by the medium and minimum security inmates. However, this labour service will not be available in the future with the transfer of the minimum security inmates to the existing Springhill minimum security institution, and the transfer of medium security inmates to the new young offenders (medium security) institution which will be opened at Springhill late in 1966.

In the opinion of experienced personnel within the penitentiary service, bearing in mind the age of the frame units, the state of disrepair, the monthly rentals, and the fact that they were situated on crown lands and would have to be removed in the event of sale, and the policy of the penitentiary service to phase out of housing, the cost of continued maintenance would not be justified.

Fixtures and other material salvaged in the disposal of these frame units is at present in storage and will be utilized by the penitentiary service as the occasion arises. In the circumstances no appraisals were obtained.

7. The employees of the department who occupied the demolished houses have secured housing accommodation elsewhere and, where otherwise qualified are entitled to an allowance for travelling under Treasury Board minute 608561, dated June 28, 1963.

TELEVISION TRANSMITTERS FOR NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Question No. 1,755—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation developing a plan whereby small television transmitters will be provided to northern communities which would otherwise be denied C.B.C. television coverage?

2. If so, what is the nature of the development which the C.B.C. has in contemplation and when may it be expected that the program will be put into operation?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. The development would consist of small, self contained television transmitters to provide service by means of video tape recordings to small isolated communities. The tape recordings would be delivered to the community by the most convenient transport available and broadcast on the station in 4 hour units. The transmitters and tape units are still in the developmental stage but, if technically and financially feasible, a start on putting them into operation could be made within the next two or three years and the program completed over the following two or three years.

Question No. 1,771—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Is it the intention of the Department of Fisheries to provide gear assistance to the lobster fishermen of Victoria county, Nova Scotia, who suffered substantial trap losses through storms in early June and, if so, what form will the assistance in question take?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): No, but provision is available through the fishermen's indemnity plan for the insuring of lobster traps.

RETIREMENT OF ARMY LIEUTENANTS AND CAPTAINS

Question No. 1,782—Mr. Bower:

Have any army officers between the ranks of lieutenant and captain inclusive retired prematurely at their own request during the past eighteen months and, if so, how many?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, 178 army officers in the ranks of lieutenant and captain retired at own request between 1 December, 1964, and 31 May, 1966.

LAND USE STUDY, JERICHO BEACH, B.C.

Question No. 1,785—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

1. What firm did the government hire to make a land use study of Jericho Beach national defence lands in Vancouver?

2. How much will the study cost?

3. What are the town planning qualifications possessed by the consultant?

4. With what real estate and development company is the consultant associated?

5. Are the studies continuing in view of the recent request of the city of Vancouver for a discontinuance of the studies and for the conveyance of the lands to the city for park and recreational purposes and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. No firm as such has been hired but Mr. Gilbert J. Hardman, Vancouver, B.C. is carrying out a study.

2. $15,000.

3 and 4. He is an associate of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors and is in charge of estate planning and development for Grosvenor-Laing (B.C.) Ltd., Annacis Industrial Estate, New Westminster, B.C.

5. No request has been received from the mayor of Vancouver for a discontinuance of the study.

DESIGN OF COMMEMORATIVE DOLLAR BILL

Question No. 1,795—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Who designed the special dollar bill commemorating confederation year?

2. What is the purpose of having chosen the picture of parliament being destroyed by fire in 1916?

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. The special dollar bill commemorating confederation year was designed by a security printing organization which supplies the Bank of Canada with bank notes.

2. The scene on the back of the special dollar bill will depict the original centre block of the parliament buildings which was erected in 1860-65 as it appeared in 1867. It will not depict the parliament buildings being destroyed by fire. It was felt that since this historic edifice housed Canada's first parliament it was an appropriate subject for engraving on the centennial note.

DENIAL OF PENSIONS TO ARMED FORCES WIDOWS

2. If so (a) in what areas do such cases arise (b) has any action been taken by the Department of National Defence to resolve such difficulties in favour of widows of members of the armed forces?

2. Does the city of Ottawa obtain the proceeds of tickets issued by the R.C.M.P. for illegal parking on parliament hill and, if so, under what conditions?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. $189,811.06.

absence of these senior officials, temporary arrangements will be made for the performance of their normal duties. The nature of the arrangements will depend upon the particular case. In general it is anticipated that temporary replacements will be provided, but in some instances a temporary redivision or redistribution of duties will be made. It will be understood that an officer going on one of these courses will return to his original position unless a different posting has been arranged by mutual consent.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATION TO BE DEALT WITH BEFORE SUMMER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the business he announced for today can he tell the house now what legislation the government intends to complete before the summer recess?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the only comment I wish to make in connection with this question relates to the medical care insurance bill. Last evening this item was listed as one of the items of business for today. I have noted the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre following that announcement. Since that time I have had an opportunity of considering the discussions that have taken place with the house leaders. There has also been a conversation with the government house leader, who is unfortunately absent in Charlottetown on government business. It appears that at one point the government house leader undertook not to proceed with second reading of the medical care bill if a terminal date for a summer adjournment had been reached. That undertaking may have been felt by some hon. members as an absolute undertaking not to proceed beyond the resolution stage. It appears there is some misunderstanding, and that hon. members opposite feel that was the undertaking.

As the minister directly involved with this bill I would much prefer to see the house deal with it in all its stages, but at least to the second reading stage. However, taking into account what may be a deep feeling in regard to an undertaking, the government will not insist on proceeding beyond the resolution stage.

Let me say that the government is dedicated to the principles embodied in this bill because they represent the firm policy of the government. I wish it were possible by agreement of all parties to deal at least with the second reading stage before adjourning for the summer vacation.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I gather from the remarks of the minister that he is not going to proceed with second reading before the summer vacation. That being so, and in accordance with the business he outlined yesterday, we will be dealing only with the income tax amendments, the bill in respect of the national arts centre, the bill sponsored by the Minister of Trade and Commerce having to do with amendments to the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act and Bill C-215 in respect of the dock workers. That being the case I suggest that if the government can obtain the agreement of other groups in the house we should sit this evening until ten o'clock and again tomorrow with the objective of finishing this business by tomorrow night.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Irrespective of what private commitments may have been made to the official opposition, the commitments made publicly by the Prime Minister, the house leader for the government and again yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare were to the effect that legislation regarding medicare would be considered. May I also say that no commitment was made by a representative of this party at the house leaders' meeting, agreeing not to proceed with the medicare legislation.

In view of these facts I should like to ask the minister whether he does not feel just as bound by the public commitments which he and other ministers of the government have made, as he apparently feels bound by the private commitment that was made by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, yesterday in reply to a question posed I think by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam I stated it would be my preference to complete at least second reading of the medical care bill. I also added that it was not a commitment. If my hon. friend will look at the record he will see this is so. It is still my preference to proceed with the second reading of the bill at least, but I will not insist upon it in the absence of common agreement in the house because of what appears to have been an understanding, or a misunderstanding, between the house leader—

Mr. Churchill: It was a clear understanding. Quit waffling.

Mr. MacEachen:—and the members of the official opposition.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether the Minister of Public Works did not make a formal commitment in this house on June 6, and whether the Prime Minister has not also stated both in the house and outside the house, his latest quotation being last Sunday on radio, that the medicare legislation would be proceeded with before the summer recess?

An hon. Member: No—the resolution.

Mr. MacEachen: The medical care legislation will be proceeded with in this session; there is no doubt about that. The government is firmly committed to the policies in the medical care bill, and if it cannot be dealt with by agreement before the summer recess, then it will be one of the first items of business in the fall.

I have examined carefully all my own statements on this point, and I have examined the statements of the Prime Minister. In all cases we have expressed the hope that we could deal fully with the legislation, but there has been no firm commitment in the house by the Prime Minister or myself that we would pass all the stages of the bill. I have not examined statements made by the house leader, but as the minister involved in the medical care bill I am dedicated to getting it through and wish all parties would agree to give it second reading before the summer adjournment.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will he make it clear, in light of the inquiries he must have made today, that if there was any commitment made by the Minister of Public Works not to proceed, it must have been made privately to one or two house leaders and not to all of us? In other words, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, no such commitment was made to this house leader. I made it clear that we wanted to go all the way and that we expected the government to stand by its commitment to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order with respect to the business of the house. I would point out that commitments have been made with respect to proceeding with medicare prior to the summer adjournment. The first commitment was made by the Minister of Public Works on June 6, as reported at page 5979 of Hansard. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, recently in the house and in meetings with other house leaders the government has been asked to indicate the business which it proposes to bring forward in this part of the present session. I should like to indicate that the major items which the government proposes for consideration, in addition to those already before parliament, are the medicare bill; the Bank Act revisions; a bill to amend the crop insurance legislation——and so on. This was a definite commitment.

Mr. Churchill: Which page is that?

Mr. Douglas: This was on June 6. May I point out that on July 7 the Prime Minister, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, said as reported at page 7305 of Hansard:

> It is our intention to introduce, I hope within a very few hours, the resolution dealing with medicare, and it is still our hope to get the legislation through all its stages with the least possible delay.

I would again point out that yesterday, while it is true that earlier in the day the minister of health in that capacity said it was his hope that second reading would be proceeded with after the passage of the resolution, he did say in his capacity as acting house leader in outlining the business for today, as reported at page 7606:

> Mr. Speaker, the order of business for tomorrow is the income tax amendments; the national arts centre; Bill C-215, which is the dock workers bill; second reading of the medical care insurance bill—

Hon. members had every right to assume that this legislation would be proceeded with; and if the government thinks that compulsory arbitration for dock workers is important, surely medicare legislation is equally important in view of the commitments the government has made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—REPORTED INTENTION TO EXECUTE U.S. AIRMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since, as the minister has frequently stated, the Canadian representative on the international commission in Viet Nam has easy and welcome access to the government of North Viet Nam, will Canada use her good offices as a member of the international control commission to do everything possible to persuade the government of North Viet Nam not to execute the United States airmen who are prisoners of war in that country? The obvious consequences of such a barbarous act would be disastrous for everyone.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take notice of my hon. friend's question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell us whether the government of North Viet Nam is a signatory of the Geneva convention of 1949 regarding the treatment of prisoners of war?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This question is now being examined.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not acceptable.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister know of any more serious situation with regard to the war in Viet Nam than the reported statements that United States airmen may be tried publicly and executed publicly by the North Vietnamese; and does he not agree that this surely would have no other effect than an escalation of the war?

Mr. Martin (Essex East: I quite agree.

INDUSTRY

INSTRUCTIONS FROM U.S. RESPECTING FLOUR FOR CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask whether his attention has been drawn to a statement which appears in the press, attributed to the manager of the Quaker Oats Company at Peterborough, to the effect that his company has been ordered by their parent company in the United States not to mill flour for Cuba.

I want to ask the minister whether he has verified the accuracy of this report, and if so, what action the minister proposes to take in the light of his research.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This morning I spoke to the president of Quaker Oats and he denied categorically that any such instruction had been received from the parent company in the United States.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether he has been in touch with the other milling companies mentioned, subsidiaries of United States companies, and whether he got a similar reply from them?

Mr. Winters: Yes, we have been in touch with the other milling companies and they have received no such instructions.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to address my question either to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Finance. Can either of them tell me whether tenders have been called for the gristing of the flour portion of our first year's contract with the U.S.S.R.; and if so, have any of these United States subsidiary firms placed bids?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): May I take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I will also say that I have never known of any instances of United States mills having turned down any business with the U.S.S.R.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR ADOPTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING LIVESTOCK FEED BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Following the many telegrams sent yesterday by the Catholic Farmers Union requesting the passage of Bill C-218 before the summer recess, can the minister make a statement to the house and to the Catholic Farmers Union in that connection?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the order of business for today was given yesterday and if the session is extended, I suppose we will probably be able to discuss this bill later.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The minister has undoubtedly met the president of the Catholic Farmers Union concerning Bill C-218 but has he not promised the Catholic Farmers Union that that bill would be considered before the summer recess?

Mr. Sauvé: No, immediately after first reading, Mr. Speaker, we sent a copy of the bill to all concerned. Most of them had an extemely interesting reaction, favourable to the bill, and I made no commitment concerning the business of the house, which is not within my control.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he intends to meet shortly with the provincial ministers of health to discuss medicare and, if so, whether a date has been set for such a meeting.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think I said last Friday, Mr. Speaker, that I expected to have a meeting with the ministers of health. Most of them have wired me that it would be inconvenient for them to meet at that particular time. I think only one of them expressed an interest in a meeting at any future time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fulton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to understand from what the minister has said that there is no arrangement to meet or that no date has been set? Can the minister say whether or not a meeting is planned?

Mr. MacEachen: No meeting is planned at present, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does he intend during the recess to meet with the provincial health ministers to discuss with them the federal medicare program.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member for Kamloops, I had invited the ministers of health to come to Ottawa last week to discuss medical care proposals. Because most of the ministers had other commitments the meeting was not held, and since that time I have made no plans to convene another meeting.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question. I want to know whether it is the intention of the minister to make another effort to ascertain the views of the provincial ministers with regard to the federal plan. That is the question to which I should like an answer.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at the moment to convene another meeting.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF CUT-OFF DATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration following the question asked him yesterday. In view of the telegram received by the minister from Hon. John Yaremko, Ontario provincial secretary and minister of citizenship, in which he urged that the July 25 deadline in the minister's immigration policy be extended to October, and in which he also pointed out that the qualifications required for immigrant status in the fields of education and employment are too stringent, will the minister give consideration to this matter, and will he tell us whether he has arrived at any conclusion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is certain that the date which has been set must not result in cancelling, for all practical purposes, the policy I announced in the house. Up to now, there is no indication that the July 25 deadline will prevent the great majority, if not all, of immigrant visitors from submitting their applications.

If it is established that this date is actually an obstacle to the application of the new regulations, I shall be ready to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Could the minister tell us whether he intends to launch a more intensive publicity campaign, in order to get in touch with the greatest possible number of non-immigrants who might not understand enough English or French and who might be interested in his statement of Friday, July 8 last?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, as early as next week, advertisements will be published in all foreign language papers of Canada to announce the new policy. We hope, in this way, to get in touch with the greatest number of people concerned.

[English]

Mr. Starr: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister determined that the criteria to be applied to immigrants seeking permanent status in Canada should be at least eight months' employment and the equivalent of ten years of schooling in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: No, the conditions enumerated in my statement to the house are not to be added, that is to say if someone has held a job for eight months it will not be necessary for him to have say, the ten year study qualification. Then—

[English]

You do not add the conditions. You may fulfil one condition and that is enough. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Starr: No. My question is this. In many instances there are elderly people, perhaps the parents of Canadians who have been brought over to this country, who do not have the necessary qualifications under either of these criteria. Will they be deported, or will they be allowed to stay?

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Marchand: You mean those who can be classified as sponsored immigrants, for example?

Mr. Starr: They came here under visitors' visas and wish to remain.

Mr. Marchand: They might be the mothers or fathers of Canadian citizens who were landed immigrants, and they will be dealt with in that way.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I am not quite clear on the answer the minister gave to the last question asked by the hon. member for Ontario. It seems to me that when a foreign visitor here has worked for four months, for instance, he should be entitled to the same consideration as one who has worked for eight months. It seems to me there could be some discrimination. I should like to ask the minister if he would be prepared to review this criterion of eight months of employment with a view to modifying it if he finds it may work some injustice.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the condition of having worked or having held a job in Canada for eight months is one of the requisites. There may be an immigrant or a visitor who, not having worked for eight months will nevertheless meet the other qualifications called for, that is having the required education or falling into one of the categories mentioned. Then, he would not be required to have worked eight months; but, for those who will lack the other qualifications, the sole qualification of having worked for eight months will enable them to remain in Canada.

[English]

This does not mean that everyone will have to work eight months. I do not know if I have made myself clear.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—FINE LEVIED BY U.S. AUTHORITY AGAINST CANADIAN TOWING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I sent him notice. I ask the minister whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a United States governmental authority has levied a fine of some $380,000 against McAllister

Towing Limited of Montreal for the reason that McAllister Towing, upon request, assisted a United States tug in making a tow from the St. Catherine lock on the St. Lawrence seaway to Port Colborne, all in Canadian waters. Will the minister look into this matter and make whatever representations are necessary to preserve Canada's sovereignty?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend gave me notice of this question. I have had no direct communication from any of the parties concerned, but I am informed that the solicitors for McAllister Towing Company Limited have brought this matter to the attention of the Canadian Maritime Commission, and they have the question under review. This being the case, I think it would be undesirable for me to add anything except to make clear that according to our information the tow occurred between Montreal and Port Colborne, hence partly in United States waters. I should also like to inform the hon. gentleman that according to our information the amount of the fine involved has been considerably reduced by the United States authorities. This, of course, does not affect the principle to which my hon. friend directs my attention. With these facts and others I will elicit, I will certainly look into the matter further.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO ORGANIZATION OF YOUTH PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is the hon. lady now in a position to advise the house as to the present status of the centennial youth parliament?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I regret that as a result of the pressure of business in the last few days, consideration at cabinet level has not yet been concluded. As I undertook previously, if a decision is not made before the house rises I undertake to write and advise hon. members at once. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I may have unanimous consent to revert to motions to make what I think is a very short announcement respecting colour television.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed? Perhaps it would facilitate matters if the minister were allowed to revert to motions after we have concluded the question period, which is limited to 30 minutes today.

TRADE

DEBATE ON PROTOCOL TO CARIBBEAN CONFERENCE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who acted as chairman of the trade meeting with the Caribbean countries. In view of the apparent disagreement over the method of ratification of the protocol, can the minister say if there was any understanding at the meeting as to whether this matter would be going back to the various countries for approval?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not aware of any such disagreement. I thought it was clearly understood what was set forth in the protocol and the method of processing it. I would be happy to talk to the hon. member about any disagreement of which I am not aware.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In view of the disagreement in the maritime provinces as well as the widespread worry in commonwealth countries about these important changes, does the minister feel we should be given a chance to express our opinion on this matter?

Mr. Winters: I will have to take that as notice. I am not aware of this disagreement.

LABOUR RELATIONS

HAMILTON, ONT.—STEPS TO SETTLE STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In the light of the walkout of 190 stevedores at Hamilton, members of the International Longshoremen's Association, which is connected with the Montreal wage base agreement, I am wondering if the minister's attention has been drawn to a request made by the international longshoremen to the Department of Labour for assistance in settling this matter?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. It was brought to my attention late the day before yesterday. One of our senior officers was assigned to the work immediately.

Mr. Macaluso: May I ask a supplementary question. When will that meeting occur?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nicholson: Exploratory meetings have taken place. It is my understanding that officials of the unions of the longshoremen's association in eastern Canada are meeting in Montreal today.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I word my question in the following way and ask it of the Minister of Finance. Has the government studied the serious and urgent implications involved in the publication at the end of last week of the D.B.S. figures relating to the cost of living? While I do not ask him for specific details of measures, I ask if specific measures are being considered at this time in view of the announcement.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The government is doing everything within its constitutional jurisdiction to restrain inflationary tendencies. I hope I have the full support of all hon. members in that direction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—SENDING OF TROOPS BY WARSAW PACT COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Poland is a member of the international commission on Viet Nam, has Canada protested or does Canada intend to protest to Poland about the stated intention of Warsaw pact countries, including Poland, to send troops if requested to North Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be seeing the Polish ambassador soon and I will be discussing a number of general problems with him.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question. In view of Poland's stated intention, does the government of Canada now feel free to render aid to South Viet Nam should this be considered desirable?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada has never felt that it was restricted in granting aid to South Viet Nam, and it has so indicated.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question. In view of the last statement of the minister may I point out that the minister has relied on the fact that Canada was a member of the international control commission for refusing anything in the way of military assistance, or even the sending of medical personnel, to help the people who are fighting in South Viet Nam. Would the minister care to correct the answer he made just a minute ago?

[Mr. Macaluso.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any occasion to correct my answer. I would simply repeat what both the Minister of National Health and Welfare and myself announced jointly last week, that under the external aid program, the government has agreed to send medical equipment, beds, supplies, medicines and so on to assist the people in South Viet Nam.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question. Can the secretary of state assure the house that whatever the attitude may be of the Polish government, this government has no intention of extending military aid to South Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I made that quite clear last Friday.

MAINLAND CHINA—REPORTED BAN ON TOURISTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I should like to say to the hon. member for York South in answer to his question that it has now been learned that a group of 21 Canadian teachers now in Hong Kong who had made arrangements to tour Communist China have been granted visas, and will be leaving Hong Kong for China in approximately four hours' time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORT OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER ON LAST ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I have given her verbal notice. When will the members of this house receive the report of the chief electoral officer pertaining to the twenty seventh general election on November 8 last, pursuant to subsection 6 of section 56 of the Canada Elections Act?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving my office notice of this question. I have checked with Mr. Hamel, and the chief electoral officer advises me that this report is many thousands of pages in length. Normally in the past it has taken eight to ten months to prepare and print it after each election. He informs me that members may expect to have it some time during the month of September.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ESTROGEN—TREATMENT OF ANIMALS USED IN DRUG PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask the minister whether the government has had any discussions with the Ayerst-McKenna Company in Montreal, which I am informed has a monopoly on the production of the drug estrogen, in connection with ensuring that no inhumane practices are involved in the treatment of animals which are required for the production of this drug.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I myself have had no discussions. I will inquire whether my officials have had any discussions on this matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Can he tell the house how much progress has been made by the ministerial committee in the conflict which involves, on the one hand, the C.N.T.U. and the employees of the C.B.C. French network and, on the other hand, the National Industrial Relations Board about the definition of the negotiating unit?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, for some reason that I have not been able to understand the transcript of the proceedings of the meeting of the cabinet committee with the Canadian Labour Congress and the railway brotherhoods when they made their submissions is not yet available. Whether this is because of a shortage of translators or whatever the reason, the committee has not received the copies of the transcript. We are anxiously awaiting it, and will give the matter prompt attention when the transcript is received.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF LABOUR SAFETY CODE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, may I deal with a matter that was raised by the hon. member for Ontario during the question period a few days ago.

In reply to the question asked by the hon. gentleman with regard to Bill S-35, may I say this. He asked whether an opportunity would be given to interested organizations to present their views to a committee of this house. I stated that such an opportunity had been afforded in the other place to appear before that committee, and some organizations had taken advantage of it. However, since now there are others who want to be heard they will be afforded the opportunity to so appear. It is the intention of the government to refer this matter to the committee of this house on labour and employment as one of its first items of business after the recess.

TELEVISION

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING ALTERATION IN TIMETABLE FOR COLOUR TRANSMISSION

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the Secretary of State wishes to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement. Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the house may recall that last September the government announced its decision to implement the introduction of colour television in Canada by a three-stage process.

By this decision, stations prepared to undertake colour casting were permitted to commence test transmissions during the night-time period starting July 1; to begin regular colour transmissions on a shakedown basis on October 1; and to have all colour transmissions up to full technical requirements by next January 1.

This timetable was worked out in consultation with all interested parties and was accepted by them at that time. The primary consideration in setting the various dates was the need to allow sufficient time for the necessary technical installations and staff training.

In recent months, however, it has become apparent that technical preparations for colour casting are advancing within the industry on a much quicker basis than had been anticipated. In view of these developments, representations have been made to the government, particularly by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, to amend the colour timetable accordingly and especially to move up the October 1 date for full colour transmissions to coincide better with the start of fall program schedules.

The government has given consideration to these representations and, in view of the declared readiness of the various elements of the broadcasting industry to meet an earlier date, we are now prepared to authorize full colour transmissions as of September 1. The remaining four months of this year will continue to be treated as a shakedown period during which minor equipment and operating adjustments can be made in order that all technical requirements may be met as of January 1.

The decision to permit full colour transmissions is open to both the public and private sectors of the broadcasting industry. In the case of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, however there is a caveat. Any alteration in its plans will have to be carried out within the limits of operating and capital funds already approved for the current fiscal year. This is in keeping with the government's view on this subject as outlined in the white paper on broadcasting.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the advance of one month in the introductory date for full colour transmissions will be of value both to the broadcasters and to the viewing public in permitting both to enjoy the benefits of colour from the outset of the fall program season.

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Members of this party heartily welcome the announcement which the hon. lady has just made with respect to colour telecasting in this country. We are delighted that technical developments as outlined by the minister have been proceeding faster than anticipated, and that the colour schedule can be up-dated as a consequence. We certainly think the news will be welcomed by all Canadians, at least by those of them within range of television outlets.

Colour telecasts on an east-west basis can, in the opinion of hon. members of this party, make a great contribution to Canadian unity and will be particularly valuable in centennial year. Hopefully, the new medium will provide a great opportunity for Canadians from coast to coast to experience in living colour, as the phrase goes, the beauties of this land in all its provinces and all its various regions. In addition, the colour telecasting of many of the great centennial pageants and programs which are planned should serve to inspire all of us with the love for Canada which we all hold, but all too seldom express.

However, colour production is not the be all and the end all of television programming, and we would urge that the government proceed with all possible haste in extending television service to the north and to those other regions which are currently under-serviced. This, we believe, is a primary priority. As I say, while welcoming the announcement with respect to colour broadcasting we hope the government will proceed with all possible dispatch to cover those regions which desire to be included within the broadcasting net.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): The other day the hon. member for Winnipeg South and I had some disagreement with regard to one field of broadcasting. I rise on behalf of this party today to express full agreement with him in his emphasis on the need, first, of extending the opportunity for television reception to areas which do not presently have it. This must be given first priority in our plans, and I do not need to take the time of the house by emphasizing it.

As to colour television itself, I should like to express my fear that the financial limitations which have been placed upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may result in private broadcasting stations securing a really important advance in this field over the corporation. I hope the Secretary of State and her advisors will keep a careful eye on developments so as to avoid the C.B.C. falling behind private broadcasting in this field.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, we listened with interest to the statement made by the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) and we are happy to learn that we will have colour television in a not too distant future.

As far as I am concerned, I would have much preferred that the Secretary of State announce that more remote areas, such as the Chibougamau-Chapais area, where people must deposit $200 and must pay a $100 surtax per annum to watch black and white television, would get free black and white television service, like all other regions of Canada.

In any event, I hope that work will continue in the C.B.C. toward providing television service as soon as possible to all northern regions so as to give them the same services as enjoyed everywhere else in Canada.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, July 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp for the second reading of Bill No. C-216 to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am aware that my title is a great trial to you.

An hon. Member: It is to you, too.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is to me, too, I may say.

I had not intended earlier to speak on second reading of the income tax bill on the ground that most of what could be said had already been said during the budget debate. However, since that time the minister has introduced other legislation in this field which reveals rather clearly, in conjunction with the income tax bill, the economic philosophy of the minister and of the government. In the bank bill it became obvious that the minister's policy was to control inflationary pressures by a certain method. He had two courses open to him; one was that of a monetary course and the other was that of a fiscal course. He has chosen the monetary course.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I was interested to hear him tell us a few moments ago that the government had done everything in its power to control inflationary pressures. I presume he had reference to the pleas which the government made to subordinate governments and private industry to curtail expansion in their investment programs. I think this clearly underlines the fact that the choice of the monetary method of controlling inflationary pressures is not the most suitable means by which to achieve this end. I would suggest to the minister that had he been prepared to deal with this problem as a fiscal one, he might well be likely to achieve some success. It is pretty well recognized that the principal stimulus to economic expansion, and thereby to inflationary pressures in certain periods, lies not so much in the field of consumer spending power as it does in the level and direction of investment.

I should have liked to see the government tackle this problem, and the other problems in our society, in a fiscal manner. I suggest if the minister and the government are seriously concerned about the dangers of inflationary pressures, then there should have been a review of the level of the corporation profits tax, and a review of the present rather generous depreciation and depletion allowances in order that the drive toward growth and greater investment would have been to some extent curtailed.

After all, a classic method of preventing inflation getting out of hand is to impose taxes on the large corporations which, from their internally generated savings, are able to add to inflationary pressures by an expanded investment program. I would suggest at the same time that had this been done it would also have been advisable to have considered a revision of the personal income tax structure in the interests of equity in our society, and also I would suggest in the interests of some control of the inflationary pressures, because it is fairly well generally accepted now that additions to the purchasing power of certain economic groups, the lower economic groups in our society, do not necessarily lead to inflationary pressures.

Certainly there can be no argument about the necessity for a revision from the point of view of equity. We in this party have urged for a long time that the category of those who are exempt from personal income tax should be enlarged.

I want to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not advocating a revision of the income tax exemptions because I am well aware that if one merely moves up the limit of income tax exemptions, he profits those in the higher income brackets more than those in the lower income brackets. But I do suggest that means should be found whereby married couples, with an income of $3,000 and less, should be exempt from paying personal income tax, and a single person with an income of $1,500 or less should be exempt from the payment of income tax.

There are a number of devices that can be used to achieve this without running into the difficulty of lifting the tax exemption levels for those in the higher income brackets. I had hoped the minister would have considered this before he brought in this income tax bill, particularly during the time which elapsed between the presentation of his budget and the presentation of this bill.

I want to underline again that if the minister is seriously concerned about inflationary pressures he will have to adopt some other measure than merely causing a rise in interest rates throughout the economy, because I would think it is a moot point as to whether this is really going to tackle the problem of inflationary pressure. It will have almost no effect on the investment programs of the large investing corporations of this country, and will likely add to the troubles of those whom he has not relieved in the lower income brackets.

So, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that at some point the minister would have revealed that the government is, in the first place, really concerned with inflationary pressure, that it is also concerned with an equitable distribution of income in our society, and concerned with the problem of evening out some of the present injustices that are inflicted, not merely by the income tax structure but by the whole structure of our economy, injustices that the government could do something to alleviate.

I find the bill very unsatisfactory from that point of view but, as I say, I said most of this in the budget debate. This bill, coming after the bank bill, reveals perfectly clearly that the government is concerned more with certain sections of the community than with others, that it hesitates—and the minister is hesitating now in this bill and in the bank bill—to impose any burden on those powerful interests in our society who hold in their control the power of inflicting inflation on the country, and economic injustice on a large group of our population. They are the powerful members of our society, the more fortunate segments of the population, and it is very obvious that they are going to be protected by the government even at the expense of the ordinary citizen.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at length at this stage because the items in the income tax bill have been dealt with both in the budget debate and at the time we considered the budget resolutions. We shall be considering the individual clauses of the bill presently, and shall have some questions to ask at that time.

However, I wish to comment on the statement made by the previous speaker, who doubted whether an increase in the interest rates would contain inflation. I think it can be said that an increase in interest rates comes down to an increase in the cost of living. If an industry has to pay more for its borrowings it will pass the cost on, and the cost of living will suffer.

But I do not propose to get into a dissertation on taxing theory at this time. I know the minister has some amendments to offer once we get into committee, and I propose to make my further remarks at that stage.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks about clause 4 of Bill No. C-216 which deals with charitable donations and reads as follows:

(a) the aggregate of gifts made by the taxpayer in the year (and in the immediately preceding year, to the extent of the amount thereof that was not deductible under this act in computing the taxable income of the taxpayer for that immediately preceding year) to

(i) registered Canadian charitable organizations.

It seems to me that the minister has not yet cleared up the matter of charitable donations, because again this year the employees of the Income Tax Division took pleasure in reducing the amounts claimed, in slashing the receipts, in questioning the official receipts duly signed by the religious authorities concerned in our province.

For two or three years now we have been asking the minister to come to a decision. If he feels that 10 per cent of the income is too much, he should set a rate of 5.5, 6 or 7 per cent, but let it be for all the people. Let us stop sending government inspectors or income tax inspectors to our rectories, our religious institutions, to annoy everybody, to look into the books to find out if the parish priest or the parish concerned truly received the amount claimed by the taxpayer.

It seems to me that such annoyance could be completely avoided if the minister took the trouble to study the situation seriously. But only half-hearted consideration is given to that matter, it is left in abeyance; of course, our complaints are listened to in this chamber, but the act continues to be administered rather strangely in that respect. No one is above suspicion, the parish priest who gives a receipt or the charitable organization or the taxpayer, and the Income Tax employees are those who decide if a man gave $125 instead of $225, or $75 instead of $150. It seems to me that, when an income tax return is accompanied by authentic receipts, such receipts should be respected and the government employees, its bureaucrats, should stop poking into those charitable receipts.

I am calling the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to that matter, I am urging the government to study the advisability of setting a uniform rate for everyone, to put a stop to those annoying investigations about charitable receipts.

Such are, Mr. Speaker, the few comments I wanted to make and which I have been repeating year after year since 1962. The minister listens, hears, smiles, thinks that it might be a good thing; but nothing is ever done about it in the legislation. I am urging the minister to study the situation seriously and find a solution to that problem, which is a source of annoyance to all our charitable organizations throughout Canada.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only one minute of the time of the house to support what the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) has just said.

I am not always in agreement with what he says in the house and I sometimes think that he makes very impetuous statements but, in this case, I think he could have been more fiery in his speech. I shall spare the house the reading of a rather heavy file of complaints I am getting from my electors, well-founded and well proven complaints with proof attached, from members of the clergy, including some with a certain standing.

I am ready to admit, Mr. Speaker, that abuses have occurred. That is true but I think this is not sufficient reason to justify the treatment now being handed out to people who behave correctly. I support the proposition of the hon. member for Villeneuve to the effect that, if the Departments of Finance and National Revenue were to seek and find a formula to set an acceptable percentage of income as charitable donations, this would be more equitable for all concerned.

The present system is meddlesome and unjust, and I have a lot of proof that officials of the department have been forced to correct their first assessment, following a long correspondence which wasted everybody's time and which was costly and left a very bad impression on the parties involved. So, I support the motion of the hon. member for Villeneuve and I believe that I am not the only one with this opinion, because I have heard the comments of several members who also feel that the present system is unacceptable. As a result, we suggest that the government should find the means to correct the situation at the earliest possible moment.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—Previous reserve for quadrennial survey, etc.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, on second reading I said I would propose amendments in this bill to remove from the bill all references to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. At that time I said it had been the belief of the government that it would be more efficient to include in the income tax bill the substantive provisions of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. However, after the bill was published many hon. members, including myself, received representations from the industry asking to have an opportunity for consultation. Accordingly I said in the house that in order to provide for that consultation I would, when I had an opportunity, move for the deletion of the relevant clauses so that they could be brought forward again for consideration after we had had consultation with the industry.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleague the Minister of Industry to move that Bill C-216, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, be amended as follows:

(a) strike out the title and substitute the following: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act.";

(b) strike out clause 1 and the heading preceding clause 1 and subclause (1) of clause 2.

Renumber subclause (2) of clause 2 as subclause (1) of clause 1.

(a) renumber subclause (3) of clause 2 as subclause (2) of clause 1;

(b) strike out subclauses (1), (3) and (4) of clause 3 and renumber subclause (2) of clause 3 as clause 2.

Pages 4 to 23

Strike out subclauses (5) and (6) of clause 3 and renumber clauses 4 to 19 as clauses 3 to 18.

Strike out clause 20 and the heading preceding clause 20.

Mr. Drury: I so move.

Mr. Sharp: I regret that these are so complicated I have prepared for the Chairman an annotated version of the bill. Briefly, the amendments remove from this bill all reference to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; that is all they do. I shall have copies of the amendments distributed to some hon. members.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I say that this bill seems to be most noteworthy because of what is struck out from it and that what is not contained in it. The hon. gentleman has now sought, at the solicitation of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, to drop all those references to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act so that there may be an opportunity to consult those persons who are most affected. The hon. gentleman for Saint John-Albert raised this on a number of occasions and I am glad that his solicitations have been listened to by the Minister of Finance. But in addition to that, sir, the bill is especially noteworthy because of the fact that it contains no mention whatever of resolutions 11, 12 and 13 of the budget resolutions, and I think that is extraordinary.

I do not know of any occasion when the income tax legislation has been left so long before being considered by the house and I do not see any reason why resolutions which have stood on the order paper for a period of months should not have been incorporated in the legislation. I think this has caused a considerable degree of upset among these persons who are interested in deferred profit sharing and in matters which are covered by resolutions 12 and 13. It was finally drawn from the minister within the last week that he planned to introduce a further bill later in the session. He should let us know now, before we go further, just what is the problem. Is the minister now seeking to change the principle he outlined in resolutions 11, 12 and 13? Surely with the skill of members of the Department of Justice, there is no problem in drafting the legislation based on these resolutions. They have been on the order paper for many months. Surely the minister could have brought the legislation forward before now. He owes it to this committee and those who are interested to set forth in detail what he plans to do in respect of section 79(C) which has to do with deferred profit sharing plans. Why has he delayed and why does he not bring this forward now? Under what circumstances does he intend to bring forward legislation implementing these resolutions at a later date of the session?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the reason we have not brought forward legislation to implement all of the income tax resolutions is that the circumstances surrounding deferred profit sharing plans are very complex. I can assure the hon. member that the government adheres to the general principles laid down in the resolution. It may be we will find, after examining the great variety of circumstances which exist, that we will have to ask for an amendment to the resolution. I do not think that will be necessary; but we do want to be sure the legislation we bring forward does in fact deal fairly and equitably with the tremendous variety of plans which have been brought into existence in recent years.

Let me add this. At one stage we thought it might be sufficient to bring forward for consideration immediately only one clause of this bill, but then we felt it desirable to obtain as much certainty as possible in the tax legislation. We decided the alternative of bringing forward all these sections was the better move.

The principal change we felt had to be enacted immediately is that part dealing with withholding tax on the sale of securities of provinces and municipalities. In this regard there was some uncertainty in financial markets as to whether or not we were going to apply the withholding tax. The financial institutions outside this country were not as confident as we might be in this house that these resolutions would be accepted, and we felt it desirable to proceed at least with that part of the act.

It is our intention to proceed with the remainder of the resolutions when the house resumes in the fall, and I do not think the delay will be anything except useful to taxpayers in Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1 as amended agreed to.

On clause 2—"Conversion" and "Conversion Cost".

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I have not thoroughly examined clause 2 which has to do with Canadian vessel construction assistance. Is this being deleted?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the substantive clause which we are now on is to be found in the middle of page 3. It appears as subclause (2) of clause 3. It is now renumbered as clause 2.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this has to do with foreclosure. Does it deal with the proceedings of foreclosure of a mortgage?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. Perhaps I should give a short explanation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That would be appreciated.

Mr. Sharp: This amendment is necessary because the present law does not make clear what should be regarded as the proceeds of disposition when a taxpayer's property has been disposed of by reason of foreclosure, and the amount of the taxpayer's liability under the agreement has been reduced. It is necessary to determine the amount of the proceeds of disposition and to determine the amount of terminable losses allowed to the taxpayer, or possibly to determine the amount of recaptured terminable losses.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Charitable donations.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, on clause 4, I said something a while ago and I should like to get an answer from the minister.

Has the government currently under consideration giving the taxpayer a uniform rate, a set rate—and that this rate be made applicable to everybody—regarding charitable donations? Is the minister in a position to tell us what he intends to do in this matter?

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, if one were to accept the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Villeneuve, allowing everyone to claim a certain percentage of their income as a deduction for charitable donations, we would be in effect wiping out deductions for charitable donations and merely increasing the basic exemption. The government has no intention of doing that at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, everyone now has the right to deduct $100 for charitable donations from his taxable income. Let us take the case of an ordinary Canadian, a Catholic, who goes to mass every Sunday; he gives to all kinds of charitable organizations during the year; he easily gives more than the $100 allowable.

Now, when National Revenue officials reduce by $150 the total amount of charitable donations they say that the taxpayer concerned did not give more than $100. The amount is always brought down to the sum allowed everyone. I think that this causes a serious injustice. It seems to me that when receipts in proper form are submitted to the department, the officials should accept them, because they are not given by idiots, in the province or elsewhere in the country, but by responsible persons.

Now, the act stipulates that we have the right to deduct an amount up to 10 per cent of our income, supported by receipts, of course; but if the 10 per cent is too high for the whole population, would 5 per cent or 6 per cent be acceptable by the department, so that officials may stop inquiring in rectories or of charitable organizations as they are doing now? Could the minister give us additional information?

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I have been very much involved in this problem regarding charitable donations and the issuing of receipts. In some instances these receipts exceed the actual amount donated by an individual to a particular charity. The provisions of this bill, which will come into effect in 1967, will wipe out entirely the necessity of looking beyond the receipts as such, because the charitable organization will have to show to the government of Canada the total amount it receives. Presumably in order to determine the amount, the charitable organization will be in a position to issue receipts for this amount of money. The two will balance, one with the other, and the government of Canada will not have to look beyond the receipts as such.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue.

Can the minister tell us whether, at the present time, inspectors of his department go into rectories and ask to look at the parish records in order to determine if such an amount has actually been collected or donated and whether or not the amounts of receipts filed with the department exceed those declared or listed in the records? Are inspectors still visiting rectories or organizations in order to check the books of a parish, for instance?

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the department does not try to verify the books of charitable organizations, be they parishes or otherwise. What the department tries to do is determine that the amount of the receipts issued by a particular charitable organization is equivalent to the amount of money the charitable organization has taken in. When we find that receipts from a particular organization appear to be very high, we may go to the charitable organization and say, "Did you actually receive this amount of money?" If the charitable organization says, "No, we did not. We simply issued the receipts", then we reduce the amount claimed by the individual. In every case where we reduce the amount claimed we give the particular taxpayer the opportunity of substantiating that he really did give this amount of money claimed, or we give the person in charge of the charitable organization the opportunity to say that this amount of money was given to it.

I believe that the problem has been dealt with fairly by my department under the existing law. However, I believe that the new section of the act which will be coming into effect in 1967 will take away from my department the necessity of trying to find out whether the amount of money was actually received by a charitable organization, because they will be filing a financial statement saying that they received so much money and issued receipts for that amount.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell me under what criteria those officers deal in all fairness, as he has just said. If the minister believes that, I do not. But what criteria are applied in the Department of National Revenue to enable them to tell a Canadian citizen: "Your receipt in the amount of $125 is not correct, we bring it down to the $100 now allowed to any Canadian citizen." On what basis can they cut into a $125 receipt and bring it down to the $100 already allowed everybody? Then, you would simply have to say to all Canadians: "Listen, deduct $100, and nothing else." But what basis do they use? Surely this is unfair, for there is not a single Canadian who does not donate more than $100 per year to charitable organizations across Canada.

One hundred dollars per year, that is mockery. And then they cut into small receipts of $200, $225 claimed by ordinary workers, while big shots have the privilege of playing with large amounts, to use detours. The small worker, the farmer, cannot cheat the Income Tax Division, because tax is deducted at the source, and when he claims a deduction for charitable donations, it is brought down to $100 from $200.

I would like the minister to tell me on what basis his departmental officials can establish this $100 amount, to which everybody is entitled?

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to say that we do not cut everybody down to $100. Our department tries to allow every individual in Canada who has given an amount of money to a charitable organization the full amount of the gift he made. I said previously that in some instances there may be misrepresentation, albeit entirely unintentional, and explained the method we use for checking into the matter.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, a question comes to my mind as a result of the answers given by the minister to the questions just asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve. The minister dealt specifically with donations of money which could be deductible. I should like to ask him this question: How do the departmental officials assess a contribution in kind, such as a donation of time? I give this example: If a house painter decided to paint a church and worked at it for a period of three weeks or a month, and received from the priest or the minister a receipt for, we will say $300, is this receipt acceptable for income tax purposes? In this case the man would have contributed, not cash but his services in time, and paint.

Mr. Benson: No, that is not deductible. It would be deductible if in fact the church, for example, paid the fellow $300, which he took into income and then turned around and made a donation to the church of $300. But since he has taken nothing into income, nothing is deductible.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, this clause comes into force on January 1, 1967. I am wondering whether there will be any method by which a person making a gift to a charitable organization will know whether his donation will be deductible for income tax purposes.

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The main reason for allowing almost a full year before this provision comes into effect is to give all organizations the opportunity to register, as is required by this particular clause. They will then be notified that they are registered and will simply notify their donors, in 1967, of the fact that they are registered. In the vast majority of cases there will be no problem in regard to registration.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, in looking over this clause of the bill recently I was trying to find some place where "charitable organization" was defined. I know it is not defined in this bill, and wonder whether there is a definition of it in some other statute.

Mr. Benson: It is not defined in this particular clause because it is an amending clause, of course. Section 62 (1) (e) of the Income Tax Act defines a charitable organization as follows:

> A charitable organization, whether or not incorporated, all the resources of which were devoted to charitable activities carried on by the organization itself and no part of the income of which was payable to, or was otherwise available for the personal benefit of, any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof;

In using "charitable" in this sense we take the common dictionary meaning of that word.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I notice that in clause 3 (2) of the bill provision is made for donations to various organizations organized under the law of the United States that would be allowed as deductions under the United States Internal Revenue Code.

A question that comes to my mind is that in subclause 1 there is a provision for charitable organizations outside Canada to which Her Majesty in right of Canada has made a gift by making them eligible. I wonder why this distinction is made.

Mr. Benson: This comes under the existing law, section 27 (3). It was inserted to deal with commuters because there are a great many people who work in the United States and live in Canada or work in Canada and live in the United States. An agreement was made between the governments of Canada and the United States that in these particular circumstances deductions would be allowed on each side. Since they now have to become a registered charitable organization, we simply say so in this clause.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the definition of charitable organization is not so clear. Are social clubs, for instance, such as the Richelieu Clubs, the Kiwanis, the Rotary, helping unfortunate children throughout the country, are those considered as charitable organizations in this country? The young Scouts, for instance, who sell apples once a year, or any similar organization. It seems to me—and I have proof—that deductions claimed by some Canadians in certain returns are denied.

[English]

Mr. Benson: In the case of fraternal organizations or clubs to which my hon. friend referred, ordinarily the fees paid to a Kiwanis club or a Rotary club are not deductible as they would be in the case of charitable organizations because these clubs have other purposes than that of charity. However, if a charitable trust is set up by an organization, the total amount of the funds of which are used for charitable purposes and not for the benefit of the members, then donations to such a trust would be deductible.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—tax deduction.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, am I right in assuming that what the previous minister of finance, the hon. member for Davenport, has allowed as a deduction in taxes for six months, has now been reduced? My main complaint about this, outside the fact that nobody wishes to pay extra taxes, is that the Income Tax Act sets out the specific rate according to which we arrive at the payable income tax. According to the amendment brought in by the former minister, there was a reduction in the over-all tax which, I believe, in certain cases amounted to $600. This reduction will now be reduced. I am wondering what is the purpose in doing so? Would it not be better to revise the act so that we actually know what rates are applicable, or does the minister intend, at some future date, to allow a greater reduction? Will the present confusion continue?

Mr. Sharp: The principal reason for treating the matter in this way was to avoid any effect upon the revenues of the provinces. After we have had our meetings with the tax structure committee, at which I hope we will arrive at some settlement of tax sharing, and after we have done this in the light of the Carter commission report, I hope we shall arrive at the most logical tax structure in the world.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—amounts receivable.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the minister explain the clause please?

Mr. Sharp: Clause 6, now renumbered clause 5, is a relieving amendment. Section 64 being amended provides that where a taxpayer who has died had certain amounts due to him that would have been included in his income, his legal representative may choose between several alternatives for calculating the tax on these amounts. This amendment will extend the time for making his choice.

The amendment provided in clause 5(2) will let him change the election within a certain time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is it extended to one year?

Mr. Sharp: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6.

Mr. Sharp: I should like to ask the Minister of Industry to move an amendment to line 39 on page 10 by substituting the following therefor:

(2) is applicable to taxation years ending after that day but for the purpose of determining whether the principal business of a corporation for the whole of the taxation year of the corporation that includes March 30, 1966 was trading or dealing in bonds, shares or debentures or any interest therein, the whole of such taxation year shall be deemed to be that portion of the taxation year that is after March 29, 1966.

This amendment is necessary because subclause 3 of clause 6 as renumbered, which provides for the coming into effect of a new rule that a company may not qualify as a non-resident owned company if its principal business includes trading or dealing in bonds, shares or debentures, has retroactive effect and therefore this amendment that I am now asking to be moved is to remove the retroactive effect, which was quite inadvertent.

Mr. Drury: I so move.

[Mr. Monteith.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is it completely relieving in effect?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, completely relieving.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—"Mine".

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This section should probably be entitled "An act to appease Ross Thatcher", but apart from that I think all of us agree that it is wholly overdue and should have been brought forward at a much earlier date. We are glad that the present Minister of Finance has overruled the former adamant attitude taken so often by the hon. gentleman for Davenport and that some influence has been exercised in this matter within the Liberal party. At least the minister has taken this opportunity to act.

An hon. Member: That is what I like. It is really non-partisan.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—

Mr. Monteith: I would just like to make a very brief comment. I think this legislation will cause great hardship to certain companies, as far as getting staff is concerned, and to certain individuals who have in the past been hired under a plan whereby they were expecting to receive stock options in the future. I do not wish to belabour the point, but I want to reiterate what was said previously, that personally I do not feel this has been fair to all concerned.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Monteith: May I just inquire, Mr. Chairman, does this clause mean that if, for instance, the chairman or assistant chairman or any other member of the Tax Appeal Board were to finish his term, for the sake of argument at 73 years of age, he might be reappointed for a full term?

Mr. Sharp: No, he would be reappointed until the age of 75.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Definitions, "corporation."

Mr. Monteith: I simply want to reiterate what I have said on previous occasions with regard to this special tax. I feel that it penalizes firms who have had construction under way and who will now have to pay a special tax to the government. They are going to receive 5 per cent on this tax. Under the revisions of the Bank Act after January 1, 1967, however, if these firms had to borrow, as undoubtedly so many of them will, to finance their construction projects they are going to have to pay 7 per cent on that money. As I said earlier, the result will be an increase in the cost of living because this increased interest rate is going to be passed on to the consumer.

I do not wish to belabour the point, but as I said earlier I do not think it is sound to take this money from these firms. During the Budget debate the minister mentioned there would be a limited number of them, and I can understand that. However, I do not believe it is sensible to take from these firms the funds they are going to require and to which they were possibly committed two or three years in advance, to complete this construction. This construction, when completed, can do only one thing and that is help supply the demand that is needed in Canada to reduce inflation. I cannot see anything good in this clause at all.

Mr. Sharp: May I just say a word on this point, really in reply to some comments made earlier by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. In fact, in the budget which I brought down some months ago and which is now being partially implemented by this bill, various fiscal measures were taken. The hon. member mentioned what he thought was the absence of fiscal measures. I am very glad to learn that the hon. member for Perth does recognize that some fairly stringent fiscal measures were included in that budget.

First of all, there was the restoration of the amount of the cuts that had been made in the previous year in income tax, because of the changed economic situation in the country. There was the application of the 5 per cent refundable tax on corporations. There was a reduction in capital cost allowance for undertakings which were proceeded with in the next 18 months. There was the progressive reduction in the sales tax. All of these were designed to exert pressure on the economy and to cope with the inflationary problem by fiscal measures.

There is also, and I have no hesitation in defending it, an appropriate monetary policy, just as there is in all parts of the world today. If my hon. friend looks at the United States, Germany, France or England, he will see this is a fact. The government of the United Kingdom, which is apparently of the same persuasion as that of my hon. friend, is employing the whole gamut of fiscal and monetary policy in order to restrain inflationary pressures. I think those inflationary pressures remain very strong. I believe we must employ all those measures we can reasonably employ without doing damage to the economy itself. Our purpose is not to stop anything, it is to contain our activity within our physical resources.

Mr. Monteith: I am not going to ask the minister to explain how the refundable portion of this tax is worked out because I believe it would take until tomorrow to do so. I am not an official of the income tax department, but before I came here I practised chartered accountancy. I believe it is going to be a big problem for anyone to read this section and come up with an answer as to how you are going to arrive at the refundable tax.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I was very interested, Mr. Chairman, in the minister's outline of his fiscal policy. Unlike the hon. member for Perth I do not find this refundable tax such a devastating weapon for the government. In fact, when I spoke about it at the time it was introduced in the budget debate, I pointed out it could have only a very minor effect upon the economy. After all, $70 million out of $1,400 million, which is the aggregate of corporation profits, does not seem to me to be of sufficient magnitude to have any great effect.

However, I have another criticism of this provision to which I hope the minister will give us some answers. I refer to the inflexibility of it. If, in the opinion of the minister, it should become necessary to retain this 5 per cent longer than the period of 18 months or 36 months set out in the bill, he does not have the power to do so. If, on the other hand, he believes it should be repaid earlier—well, possibly he could do that because I think the time set out is the maximum time. I suggest the fact he has tied himself to a time limit will negate any effect this tax may have in certain economic circumstances. In order to console the hon. member for Perth, may I reiterate that I cannot believe the retention of $70 million out of $1,400 million is going to have any significant effect in curbing the inflationary pressures or in doing anything else except giving headaches to the profession to which the hon. member for Perth belonged before he came here.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 17—Taxable obligation and non-taxable obligation defined.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the minister say how much further this particular clause goes than the present one?

Mr. Sharp: My understanding, Mr. Chairman, is that this clause gives statutory authority to the existing practice.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): How is the existing practice different from the present statute?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I might read, if I have the permission of the committee, from a letter from the Minister of National Revenue to me. This is unusual procedure, and I would not want it taken as a precedent, but the letter explains perhaps as well as I could the reasons for this.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The proposal would give statutory authority to the existing practice whereby, except in criminal cases, officials do not give testimony in judicial proceedings. Because the present section does not clearly so state, it is necessary in each case for me as minister to make a sworn declaration that it is against public policy to make disclosures. An outside lawyer has to be engaged to represent the department. Since a witness has no right to be represented by a lawyer, a senior practitioner has to be chosen who can persuade the judge to hear him. Very frequently a subpoena is served on short notice and it may be impossible to follow this procedure. If an employee of the department refuses to answer questions he can be sent to jail for contempt of court. This actually happened a number of years ago. The proposed amendment will prevent having to follow this cumbersome procedure. It can be said that the section will simply clearly state what has been the invariable rule. The section will also permit copies to be given to the taxpayer himself and, under the rules of evidence, copies can be used where the original cannot be produced. The proposed section goes further than the existing provision in that it forbids former employees and other authorized persons from disclosing information which is a deficiency in the existing section. This will also clarify the department's right to make disclosures to lawyers, accountants and valuators engaged by the department in specific cases and places these persons in the same position as government employees.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the principle be identical with the principle under the Estate Tax Act?

Mr. Sharp: I am informed that it is based on the corresponding provision in the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Has there been any experience with the Estate Tax Act? If there has, has that experience proved to be satisfactory?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I do not have officials before me who are expert in the Estate Tax Act. Perhaps at some other time I can give the hon. gentleman the answer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps the minister would make inquiry and let me know.

Mr. Sharp: I would be pleased to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the house would consent, notwithstanding these extensive amendments, to third reading so that the bill may proceed to the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: I should also like to thank the committee members for their co-operation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION FOR ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-194, to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Arts Centre—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, June 28, the title, clause 1 and clause 4 with an amendment, and with an amendment to the amendment, had been allowed to stand.

On clause 4 the hon. member for Lévis had moved an amendment as follows:

That clause 4 of Bill C-194 be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph (5):

In the appointment of members and officers of the corporation, due account will be taken of the linguistic duality of Canada and its cultural plurality.

The hon. member for Lapointe had moved an amendment to the said amendment as follows:

That all the words after the word "Canada" be deleted.

On clause 4—Appointment of chairman and vice chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Régimbal: Mr. Chairman, we resume the debate on the amendment moved to clause 4 of Bill No. C-194, on the establishment of the National Arts Centre. The amendment proposes that, in the appointment of the board of trustees of this centre, due consideration be given the linguistic duality and cultural plurality of Canada.

In this type of debate, several points of view are expressed which reflect the particular experience and concern of the person voicing them. In each case, with the best intentions in the world, one speaks according to experience and personal interests; that is why no one person has any claim to absolute truth, just as no one errs completely. It therefore remains for each one of us to analyse the various points submitted and to adopt the attitude which seems most well-rounded, most realistic, most consistent with the concept or the ideal sought.

In the last few days, since the adjournment of this debate, I have had the opportunity and the time to analyse the opinions expressed to date, and if you will allow me, I should like to make known my personal views on the matter.

Let us say, first of all, that much more is involved here than a mere provision in a piece of legislation designed to set up a National Arts Centre. The very fact that this same discussion was held on second reading of Bill No. S-2 shows us in a dramatic manner that what is actually involved is the whole, essentially Canadian context of bilingualism, of national duality or co-existence, in short, of cultural policy, which our best Canadian minds have been trying so hard to define for a century, but with new vigour and intensity, especially in the last ten years: an attempt at a definition which gave birth to the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, which has led others to look forward to a constitutional conference, which has inspired the supporters of separatism, which has brought about the discovery of new stock phrases such as "associate states", "co-operative federalism", etc. Those are as many considerations which show a very keen awareness of this situation, of this experience Canada has gone through in the last century. It is essential that we should endeavour to define it, not so much to explain the last hundred years, but mainly to give direction to the next hundred years, because the peace, security and serenity of future generations depend to a great extent on the clarity of our definition.

In the present discussion on the amendment moved by the member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), we have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and, among others, the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), the member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) and the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard). Previously, we heard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) who, in his intervention of June 10 last supported the amendment when he said substantially that he understood the prime concern contained in this amendment, since that particular bill dealt with the National Arts Centre, an essentially cultural organization, where it was particularly advisable to emphasize the existence of French Canadians or, better still, the French fact in Canada.

It must be borne in mind that the minister said he would have preferred it if the amendment had not been moved. I entirely agree on this last point, but on the previous one I do not agree at all, because it shows a negative attitude which is harmful to the French Canadian fact, because it puts it in a defensive position from the start; it is forced to revert to a defence mechanism while the present generation, today's generation and the generation of tomorrow, whether French or English speaking, has a right to expect that we set the stage to promote its growth.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration put it quite well during the debate on the incorporation of the Ottawa Railway Terminal Company. It will be recalled that there again, the discussion was on the advisability of ensuring French Canadian representation on the board of that company. I am quoting from page 2827 of Hansard, left-hand column:

> The first thing that strikes me and to which I should like to draw the hon. members' attention is that whenever you insert in some legislation or constitution a clause such as this to protect a certain group, it is because you are assuming from the start that this group is incapable of looking after its own protection and of defending itself by other means. In other words, a form of discrimination is thus created to which I am completely opposed.

And later, he adds:

> Otherwise it means, that to be represented in Canada as we should be, a provision will have to be included in every piece of legislation to ensure that such representation will be granted to us.

To complete this thinking, if I may be permitted, he should have added that, as far as existing legislation is concerned, past legislation, that is, where such representation is not provided for, there would no longer be any legal obligation, not even a moral obligation, since this apparently no longer is sufficient, to recognize the French fact in a practical manner. Is that not the true significance of the intervention of the Prime Minister when he asked the mover to withdraw his motion, and of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he asked the hon. member for Lapointe to give his assent to the withdrawal of the amendment?

May I be permitted to suggest, as an aside, Mr. Chairman, that if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration were officially to withdraw his support of the amendment to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Prime Minister, I feel that, in view of the judgement and the understanding he has shown several times in this field of national unity and of Canadian motivation, we would soon achieve the unanimous consent needed for the withdrawal of the subamendment and of the amendment now before us.

Generally speaking, I should like to note in passing that the wording of the present amendment is so vague and so watered down that it no longer means anything; the amendment recommends that "due account will be taken of the linguistic duality and the cultural plurality of Canada".

"Due account will be taken": This commits no one to anything and, for that reason alone, we should all agree to withdraw the amendment, since nothing can accrue therefrom, save confusion, misunderstanding and division. The Prime Minister first and then the Leader of the Opposition expressed their concern that such a provision in a bill would divide our national groups, rather than contribute to the unity in equality which we are all seeking. I share that view and, in turn, I am asking the hon. members to give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of the amendment and subamendment.

In fact, in spite of the care taken by the writer of the amendment to hide under vague words the principle to be established, it is obvious, particularly in the light of the remarks made by the hon. members for Verdun, Lapointe, Sherbrooke and Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain), that the purpose thereof is again to ensure by legislation that the French shall be represented on the board of directors of the National Arts Centre or any other government agency. Therefore, it is the whole question of the nation's bilingual character or, more precisely, the whole question of the French fact that comes up, and I think there is every advantage for us to consider this debate in this light, because we are putting a finger on and squarely tackling the problem which concerns all Canadians at this time.

[English]

In all honesty and objectivity I cannot see what this amendment, or any insistance on establishing a percentage of French speaking or bilingual representation on boards, can accomplish besides attempting to reduce this whole problem of national unity to a mathematical formula, which is no solution at all. Because it is restrictive and selective, it is essentially a negative approach.

I now speak as one who has spent more than half of his life as a member of the French speaking minority in Ontario, where I believe a more positive approach, through many years of sacrifice, effort and stubbornness as well as patience, perseverance and self-determination has resulted in the French speaking element penetrating more and more into every phase of economic, social, cultural and academic life, and in the English speaking element re-examining its whole conception of Canadianism and learning to seek out the differences in characteristics which explain our reactions and attitudes.

Mind you, I do not mean to suggest that life has always been a bed of roses, nor do I suggest that this battle has been won. We have had to scale some almost insurmountable difficulties, in education particularly, and circumstances still come up when strong stands have to be taken by an alert French speaking group, stands that can be and are debated at their full face value without awakening all kinds of emotional stresses and strains. Personally, I have never felt that anyone was out to get me, so to speak, and I am sure that in those 25 odd years which I spent in Ontario never at any time did we, as a group or as individuals, take a step backward. French minorities outside of Quebec have been alert and alive, but throughout the tough moments of their experience they conscientiously exercised the same kind of patience which they expected of others, practised the same kind of understanding which they continually demanded of others, and requested the same kind of respect which they offered to others. They have thus proven to others and to themselves that they belonged to Canada, and that their contribution was an essential asset to Canada in every phase of Canadian life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Régimbal: They were respected not so much for what they could claim, but by what they could do. In business we have the good example of the Robert Campeaus; in finance, the Paul Desmarais; in performing arts, the Leopold Simoneaus; in law, the Leon Lalandes; in politics, many outstanding men, the least of whom is surely not the present Speaker of this house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Régimbal: —and the list could go on and on by the hundreds—in labour, in science, in commerce, in industry, in education, in every field of endeavour, to such a point that at this very moment there is serious talk of establishing a provincially sponsored French culture centre in northern Ontario, and this has been accomplished without a single piece of legislation guaranteeing them a percentage of representation anywhere.

• (4:50 p.m.)

By following this steady, often slow but always definite process of improvement, Ontario is creating the kind of atmosphere in which the French speaking Canadian can develop best and contribute best. Mind you, I am sure that Ontario's proximity to Quebec has helped that province to be more awake to the French speaking reality, which only proves that exposure is still the shortest road to understanding. I speak of Ontario because I know it better than I know other provinces, except Quebec, but I understand that New Brunswick has taken great and imaginative steps toward full participation by French speaking Canadians in their way of life. It is to be hoped that all provinces will match these strides as they become more and more aware of the French fact.

I must take my hat off to the province of Quebec for showing the way in thorough recognition of minority rights and privileges. In all cases the degree of understanding, the degree of progress toward understanding has been measured, not by legislation, but by full, intelligent knowledge of minority rights, and full confidence in that minority's potential and talents.

What is the basic ingredient in this recognition? What are we all striving to establish; what is typical of our Canadian context? I believe it is equality, not only equality before the law, not only equality before the courts, not only equality of services, but especially and almost exclusively equality of opportunity, whereby no matter which of the founding peoples we belong to, or which of the official languages we adopt, our talents, our character, our mentality will have the greatest possible opportunity to develop, because this is our wealth and our heritage. This is our new Canada which young Canadians will want to conquer.

This is the Canada where bilingualism becomes a challenge rather than a duty, an asset to acquire rather than a cross to bear, in which the presence of different cultural backgrounds and expressions becomes an element of healthy competition and an incentive to greatness—a unique country where more sources of inspiration, of learning, of expression are available to make us more complete and efficient human beings, richer because we have learned to share and to exchange our differences.

I suggest, sir, that none of this can be obtained through narrow legislation such as this, but all of it can be obtained through understanding and knowledge, and through the development of definite cultural policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I think that this debate which quite fortunately revolves around the establishment of a National Arts Centre provides us with an excellent opportunity for making a concrete gesture of unity, but getting the most complete unanimity, as indicated by our party leaders. Again, I ask all hon. members to agree to the withdrawal of the amendment and subamendment, and should this prove impossible by mischance, I will have set out my reasons for voting against the amendment.

Before I conclude my remarks, I invite all young Canadians, both French and English speaking, to meet the challenge of our duality of expression, to make it an objective of culture and greatness of soul, thus creating a climate of sound competition, to allow the full development of our Canadian potential, deriving from our cultural differences the inspiration of a more complete education a more universal mentality, where the success of the individual will be dependent on the competence acquired by taking the best out of our two cultures.

[English]

Mr. Klein: Mr. Chairman, I am going to intervene for just a moment for the reasons which were enunciated by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. If we were voting on the amendment itself I would find it very difficult to vote against it because of the treatment which is accorded by the province of Quebec to the Jewish community of Montreal in recognizing the rights of the minority within that province.

I want to take this opportunity to express my admiration for the manner in which the French speaking majority in Quebec has treated the minorities in that province. I refer particularly to the Quebec statute, Chapter 87, 13-14 Elizabeth II, entitled "Protestant Schools of Montreal", and as a tribute to the French Canadians of Quebec I want to read into the record section 4(c):

> The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint for a term of five years the remaining five members who shall be persons of the Jewish faith, or professing the Protestant religion, so that the Greater Montreal Board shall be constituted at any one time of five Jewish members and 20 Protestant members.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I again wish to pay tribute to the French Canadian majority in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, some days ago when this measure was before the committee I rose to speak and indicated that I was neither of Anglo-Saxon nor of French origin, but I felt I could speak as a new Canadian, having come to this country when I was 12 years old. I want to make some brief remarks on the subject raised by the amendment and the subamendment and to indicate why, in my opinion, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes is right, as were other speakers, that we cannot in conscience support this kind of proposal for legislation in Canada, and that indeed those who insist on it are doing the cause which they want to advance a great deal of harm.

[Mr. Régimbal.]

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Does not the hon. member feel that those who do not share this opinion also have a conscience and like to follow the directives—

[English]

Mr. Lewis: If it were not for the fact that I am anxious to conduct myself in this debate in that spirit of good will in which debates are often held in this chamber, I would resent that kind of suggestion. I speak in accordance with my conscience, my belief and my opinion, and I repeat that no one in this chamber is more concerned than I am with establishing the idea and the fact of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada. I say bilingualism and biculturalism despite the fact that I had another language for the first 12 years of my life and did not know a word of English or French, and despite the fact that I have a close and earnest attachment to a culture which is thousands of years old and which is neither English nor French.

Despite that, I believe Canada is a bilingual country and has two major cultures, but that within Canada other languages, including my first language, and other cultures, including the culture of my ancestors, have the right to expand and to live. This is a democracy and we have the right to speak the languages of our ancestors even though they are not English or French. We have the right to expand our cultures and practise our traditions. That is the mark of a democracy, and that is why I am proud to be a citizen of Canada despite the fact that I spent my boyhood in another country.

During this debate reference was made to a committee which has been set up by men and women of origins other than English and French. I forget the exact name of it, something like the committee of citizen action, to which the hon. member for East York is a party. As a member of a family that came to Canada in 1921 I disagree vehemently with the purposes of that kind of committee and that kind of association.

What those people are really saying is not that Canada is a multilingual country, but that Canada is unilingual, that Canada's language is English only, and that if French is to be placed in more prominence, then they want their languages to have the same rights.

I say that that kind of statement represents a misreading of Canadian history; it represents a misunderstanding of Canada's past; it represents a failure to appreciate Canada's present. There are in this country, and we all ought to recognize it and make it part, if I may say so, of our life and existence and total understanding of our country, two languages equally part of Canada; there are in this country two major cultures equally part of Canada; there are in this country tens of thousands of people who are welcome to speak in any language they like and to practise any culture they like or any tradition they like, because this is a free democratic country where that kind of multi-lingual and multicultural activity is welcomed and encouraged rather than prohibited or limited.

The United States of America is a unilingual country—English,—despite the fact that there are there just as many groups and backgrounds or more than there are in Canada. You ask any American, whether his background is Dutch, Irish, French or whatever, what the language of the United States of America is and he will say English, just as is the case in the United Kingdom, even though when you walk along the streets of London you may frequently hear, as I did, any number of languages spoken. It is the same in France where the language is French; even though many other tongues may be heard on the streets of Paris.

I urge upon all my fellow Canadians whose origins are neither English nor French to recognize—just as those countries which are unilingual have one language, just as a country like Belgium which is bilingual, has two languages, and just as Switzerland is trilingual or quadralingual and has three or four languages—that Canada in essence is a bilingual country. That does not say that every Canadian must speak English or French. Nor does it mean that whenever there are two or three English speaking families living in a little village in Quebec where everybody else speaks French they must be given at state expense the opportunity of English schooling and so on; or that when a few French speaking families live in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, or Manitoba or Ontario where the surrounding language is English, these two or three French families should be given at state expense a French language school. It does not mean that at all, because that is bringing bilingualism to an absurdity or practical impossibility.

It does mean, however, that every Canadian from coast to coast should respect the fact that Canada is bilingual; it does mean that wherever there is a substantial French community or a substantial English speaking community, both should be given the right to educate their children in their own language and their own culture. It is also reasonable, Mr. Chairman, that in all of our institutions, federal institutions in particular and the civil service above all, we should recognize the fact of bilingualism in this country.

Now, what are the amendment and the subamendment doing? I agree entirely with the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes that the amendment and subamendment are limiting rather than expanding. I would suggest that unless you have that kind of provision in every statute you would have many exceptions and it would be an absurd act by this parliament; you would run the risk of suggesting that only in those cases where the statute contains a reference to the fact of bilingualism in Canada, that fact would be observed.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to those who support this amendment and subamendment that the time has come in this country in which all of us have worked through our adult lives that the fact of Canada should be taken—not for granted—but should be taken as a fact which no longer needs defensiveness and which no longer needs negative provisions in legislation. I suggest that if we are still at the point where the goverment cannot be relied upon to recognize and act upon the fact without this kind of provision in the legislation, then the provision in the legislation is not going to do any good. If we have reached the point in this country, as I believe we have, where the dialogue is being carried on on an intelligent basis with an understanding of one another, then I am sure this government will carry through. Let us leave it where we place upon the government of this country the responsibility to do the right thing. I am not of the government's political persuasion. The government frequently is wrong, but it is not often stupid. They would have to be not only wrong but stupid to refuse to recognize the fact of Canada at the present time. Let us leave to them the responsibility for doing it. Any administration of this country which from now on fails to act in accordance with the fact of Canada will have to face not only parliament but the people of Canada, not only French speaking but English speaking as well.

Furthermore, I suggest that the amendment contains an error of logic and the subamendment contains an error of omission. The error of logic in the amendment is that it is wrong to say, in my opinion, that our cultures are in some different category from the languages. To the extent that Canada is bilingual because there are two founding languages, two major languages, to the same extent Canada is not multicultural but bicultural, two major cultures; to the extent that it is multicultural, to the extent that we recognize there are cultures in Canada other than English and French, to the same extent must you recognize that Canada is multilingual because there are languages other than English and French spoken. So, the amendment is confusing and I suggest erroneous.

The subamendment, of course, is at fault in omission. The fault is that it concentrates merely on the bilingualism of Canada and pays no attention at all to the fact that there are other groups in this country which speak other languages and that there are other groups in this country which have a cultural background which is different from English or French. In a discussion the other day my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said something which has a great deal of validity. He said we would not have this problem in this country if we had an identifiable Canadian culture which one could point to with pride.

The Chairman: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I have allowed him to proceed and I must now call it five o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let him continue. The hon. gentlemen is making a very interesting speech.

The Chairman: If there is any disposition on the part of the members of the committee to continue, and dispense with private members hour, I think that decision should be taken while the Speaker is in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO EXTEND SITTING HOURS

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 6, subsection (2), I move:

That the house continue to sit until 10 p.m. this evening unless a motion to adjourn is adopted earlier.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: No, I object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must refer the house to standing order No. 6, subsection (2), which reads in part as follows:

If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places and if ten or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion.

May I ask those hon. members who object to stand so the Clerk may count them.

And more than ten members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question on the motion will not be put by the Chair.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, if it meets with the indulgence of the house I should like to ask for unanimous consent to forgo private members hour and continue the matter before the house when the business was interrupted at five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to private members hour being deferred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will proceed to the consideration of the business interrupted a few moments ago.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION FOR ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-194, to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Arts Centre—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 4—Appointment of Chairman and Vice Chairman.

The Chairman: We are now considering the amendment and subamendment.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take too much more of the committee's time. When five o'clock was called I was stating that we would not likely be in the difficulty we are in, had we managed during the last 99 years to develop an identifiable Canadian culture in all its various aspects. I think we would have gone a long way toward developing that had we spent less time arguing about negative measures such as are suggested by hon. members in the amendment and subamendment.

Let me support with all the force I can the proposition of hon. members who have preceded me, to the effect that the time has come to look at this whole question in a positive way in order to organize and build in Canada agencies, instruments and attitudes which will constantly improve the dialogue of a united Canada and bring an end to the needling and provocation which necessarily results from negative requirements, and the enshrinement of this kind of thing in legislation.

As one who knows a little about both English and French speaking Canada, let me say to those members who support the amendment and subamendment, that these are precisely the kind of amendments, embodying a spirit of distrust, which make it a great deal more difficult to get English speaking Canadians to appreciate not only verbally and cerebrally, but with their hearts and their souls, the legitimate demands and aspirations of French Canadians in this country.

The sooner we cease this kind of dialogue and permit ourselves to carry on with a dialogue that is as positive and constructive as human beings can make it, the sooner we will start on the road to building an identifiable Canadian culture in English speaking Canada, as in my opinion the French speaking people of this country have built in French speaking Canada, in all its aspects, particularly in the province of Quebec.

One can neither solve the problem facing Canada by this kind of legislation nor solve even the immediate question of appointments, particularly when we are faced with this kind of vague amendment and subamendment. Indeed, let me say that the idea embodied in the amendment and subamendment might have had a great deal more sense and appeal if it were related to the activities of the centre itself and demanded that it mirror the French, English and other cultures that make up Canada's cultural mosaic. I suggest that it would be more logical and sensible for hon. members to withdraw the amendment and subamendment so that we can build an arts centre for the cultural development of this country, instead of arguing about the composition of the board.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take very long, but since I previously moved a similar amendment to Bill No. S-2, an act to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company, I feel that I have something to say.

A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) asked the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) to withdraw his amendment, saying that people would understand the need and that, from now on, the ministers would give the French Canadian people of Canada a fair representation.

The Prime Minister's intentions are remarkable and I know that if we were to have a Lester Pearson for years and years to come, we could accept that view; but we are not sure of that, because there is also the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who asked the other day that there be only one race in Canada, saying that he did not want second class citizens. That is precisely the false notion which is spreading throughout the country. Some people talk of only one race—and those people do not think at all that there can be two races in Canada. In fact, there are two: the French race and the French Canadians.

As stated a little earlier by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), there are several cultures in Canada and I am happy about it. Canadian culture is on a par with that of other people.

There people can learn English and French which is what the hon. member for York South as well as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) did; they both speak French and English. But do you find many English Canadians who speak both languages? They are the exception and that exception does not suit me. I submit that if they really wanted to develop a double culture in Canada, they would have gone to the trouble of learning a little French. But they do not do it. In Canada, at the present time, the only bilingual people, or practically the only ones, are the few citizens who come from the other remote provinces and most French Canadians or English Canadians are not bilingual because they do not want to be bilingual.

I think that the Leader of the Opposition was wrong when he said that we do not need a second culture in Canada, because I know that at the present time our representation within the commissions does not exceed 12 per cent, whereas we make up over 25 per cent of the population. That fact has always been overlooked and is still overlooked today; it is overlooked with regard to the railways, it is overlooked in this case. No one remembers to mention that the French Canadians have rights, in short, we are forgotten everywhere. The reason is that no one thinks about French Canadians.

That is why I say that we must include in our laws the principle which we are advocating, even if that may displease some people. The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Régimbal) said a little earlier: I congratulate the province of Quebec for its broadmindedness.

The province of Quebec is broadminded because it has to be. Sir Georges-Étienne Cartier had faith in the English majority and he wanted the province of Quebec to be bilingual; it has remained the only bilingual province.

The other provinces are not bilingual; they are unilingual and they are above all English. And when the Leader of the Opposition spoke about that majority which exists in our English circles, well, if we divided the ethnic groups in Canada, we would find that there are more French Canadians. There are more than six million of us and there are only five odd million English people. There are even fewer Scots and Irish even, so that if we divided that by ethnic groups instead of according to the language spoken, we would see that the French Canadians are more numerous. In spite of all that, only 12 per cent of French Canadians sit on commissions; there is something wrong.

That is why I would like to see that provision in our laws, so that those who will come after the present Prime Minister will be reminded that we are entitled to it. I suggested the same thing about the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company and I think that the same fate is in store for my proposal.

I have no illusions, Mr. Chairman; when we are asked to vote on that matter, I am convinced that we will be defeated, but I want to point out that I will vote for the amendment even if, as stated by the hon. member for York South, there is something lacking with regard to that multiple culture which we have today in Canada.

I admit something is lacking. I prefer the amendment moved by the member for Levis because while it mentions bilingualism, it also speaks of biculturalism and a plurality of cultures.

That is why I say I prefer the amendment; on the other hand, I shall vote for the subamendment, and then for the amendment because I maintain that it must be incorporated in our statutes; we must tell our legislators that we are entitled to this protection and I trust the government will finally give it to us.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak for a few moments only, to express my opinions following the remarks of the hon. members today and at previous sittings, and more specifically on June 28 last when this amendment and the subamendment were brought before the house.

I heard the members who spoke before me, Mr. Chairman, and some of the speeches were beautiful. They certainly held some truth, but somehow I feel that lacked realism. One is usually content with a beautiful display of roses, sometimes forgetting that roses always hide thorns. When the rose withers and its petals fall, thorns alone remain and with the passing of time they grow sharp and stiff and prickly; it is precisely of those thorns I am wary.

I see everyone is full of good will; when the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) spoke a moment ago, he said that if the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) holds his position for years and years to come—which, frankly, I do not believe—it could then be hoped that the spirit of section 133 of the B.N.A. Act would be constantly upheld. I am sure the Prime Minister will leave some day. Who will then replace him?

Confederation is barely 100 years old. When time came to unite Lower and Upper Canada, the problem at hand was that of joining a French people and an English people to form a Canadian people. When confederation was signed in 1867, time was taken to include section 133. I see, therefore that the fathers of confederation had the courage to write down on paper what they preached. They wrote it down, most fortunately, for were section 133 not in the constitution, decades ago the French fact would have been completely forgotten, and even as well perhaps the fact that the country had ever had two cultures.

A while ago some hon. members referred to the question of plurality of cultures. I do not quite understand. It seems that there are various interpretations or, at any rate, I give it another meaning. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) talked about it on June 28. He said that one cannot have five, six or seven cultures. One's culture is based on one's knowledge; the greater the knowledge, the greater the culture. It is a matter of degree. The man who has a thorough knowledge of English with all the advantages this entails—and heaven knows that there are many—has a certain degree of culture. Another man, similarly endowed and having besides a good knowledge of the French traditions, knows twice as much and his culture is wider. But it is not a matter of three, four or five cultures. It is a matter of knowledge, period. And the sum total of this knowledge makes a culture. In Canada, there is something we apparently always want to interpret; that is the state of mind that prevailed here today.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favour either of including figures in the act, because that would be absolutely wrong and against the spirit of section 133 of the constitution.

Section 133 gives neither figures nor percentage. As soon as you mention a figure or a percentage, you create a minority, or you start using a slide-rule to work out what you are entitled to keep and that is not very commendable.

This is a state of mind that must be developed here—we are not necessarily of French origin, or of Anglo Saxon origin, but first and foremost Canadians. That is the main point.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this amendment specifying that he should be of French Canadian descent. There is nothing specifying that he should be of English Canadian descent. All the amendment specifies is that he should speak both languages. Whether he be of French Canadian or English Canadian descent has nothing to do with the matter; the main point of the amendment is that he should speak both languages.

I think the amendment is following the spirit of section 133 of the British North America Act, the Canadian constitution, which specified in black and white that there are two official languages in Canada. For this reason I support the amendment. I do not support it because it is detrimental to either race. In my opinion it does not limit anything; it just reinstates in the law what we have in mind and what we are talking about.

We should be running the country properly, instead of trying to get the popular vote by saying, "This is a bilingual conutry. We will do this for the French speaking Canadian and we will do that for the English speaking Canadian"—because this is a mistake. We are talking about national unity today. We have had in this house two types of government which have succeeded each other over the years, namely the Conservatives and Liberals. No other party is responsible for bringing the situation to this point, where the extremists of both nationalities in this country are "going at" each other. This situation has come about because members on both sides of the house have not faced up to reality. The situation has developed because we have ignored reality.

We have had in this country almost 100 years of this type of administration and should have learned from experience. If the administration of the past 100 years has led us into the complete fiasco which exists at the present time, I think it is time we put into practice what we preach, and changed some of the methods we have employed in order to make sure that the situation is not aggravated.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, you can speak of good will; everybody has it. Words go by, and so will the Prime Minister. Speeches go by, and good intentions go by. I might also mention that there is a saying that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. This is a fact, but it is too late to have good intentions in hell. I like to hear people say "We are in favour"; but it means a lot more when it is written down. Spoken words can be forgotten but written words stay. All I ask of hon. members who sit in this house and speak about biculturalism, about bilingualism, about this that and the other, is that they should get up and vote on this question and that they should practise exactly what they preach.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, up to a certain point, I am the one who started all this since I moved the first amendment.

I also listened very carefully to everything that was said, as one who seeks the truth, who does not claim to be right at the outset.

I have especially been impressed by the statement just made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis); in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, if the debate that has been going on for a few days had the only effect of giving the opportunity to as many members of this House of commons as possible to profess their belief in the character of both nations here, in Canada, that would be a lot.

The beliefs expressed by the hon. member for York South have certainly impressed us, and the evidence of lack of fanaticism in Quebec, given by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein), must also have impressed our English speaking friends.

I hope not to be thought a zealot myself; I have definite opinions about Canadianism, and it has been confirmed by my several trips in the ten provinces. I have many friends in the ten provinces, and I must say that in my own riding my English constituents gave me their vote precisely because they knew that I defended their rights in several instances.

But, where I am surprised at the hon. member for York South—and he surprises me becauses I am ordinarily impressed by his very sound logic—is when he concludes his argument by saying: "Well, you seek this should not be put into the statute books." He probably says that because he did not go through what we went through. He has been in Canada for a number of years. Being a new Canadian, he is happy to have been well-treated, and I am proud to hear him say so. But what the hon. member for York South does not know is that my own ancestors came here in 1629; 1760 is a momentous date and he knows why; the Confederation is 99 years old, he is aware of that, and for the last 99 years the people of my own province have nurtured serious grievances.

Neither do I like an amendment like the one being moved; I too would much prefer that such an amendment never needed to be moved. Only, like many people in my province, I find that we have been waiting for a fair treatment for 99 years. But we are not getting it. And I do not need to go back 50 years, because a bill to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company was brought before us. Some thought was given appointing English speaking persons to the Company, but no French speaking ones. That is not ancient history, it happened recently. Now, we have a right to say: Well, the same thing may happen again, and if we all agree on the reality of bilingualism and biculturalism, we want the existence of the two founding nations of the country to be recognized and that appropriate action be taken accordingly.

I pointed out the other day that I had conducted a survey in a number of departments and crown corporations and out of 1850 names or so that I noted, I found approximately 325, but I may have missed a few, which sounded French, and I am not even sure that all those people are from Quebec. There again, the member for York South reaches a conclusion that I do not find logical. He does not seem to realize that if we are driven to ask such things, it is because we have 99 years of grievances behind us and that we really believe in confederation.

It is because, next year, we would like the contract between the two nations to be renewed for another century. Only, we realize that in the province of Quebec, our young people, our young businessmen, are dissatisfied. They are probably more realistic than we were. Being dissatisfied, they must assert loudly their feeling of not having been treated as they should have been. Because a few of them take extremist positions, we want to prevent a divorce from taking place in the years to come.

Mr. Chairman, some responsible people in my province worry about the manner in which confederation will be celebrated next year. They are worried for the very reason that in many areas young people are found to be dissatisfied with the treatment they get.

As I said earlier, even though it is obvious the result of the vote will probably go against us, just the same, even if the only result will have been to force some of our members to make a profession of faith, which was done with some eloquence, and sincerity, by the way, by most of them, I think, it will at least have served to promote the cause of goodwill and national unity. I want it to be known that it is in that spirit that we are dealing with this matter.

I realize it is an extremely dangerous subject, Mr. Chairman, and I am trying to contain myself, because it is so easy to become excited and get carried away over such matters, thereby complicating instead of straightening out the situation. But what I should like to emphasize, for the information of my English speaking friends, is that when we of Quebec raise this question, it should be understood that we are not separatists; we are Canadians who believe in confederation and think it will not last if Quebec is not treated as it should be.

Those who take this for racism should take it rather as an instinct of self-preservation, a warning to all Canadians of good will that it is time this conviction which everyone proclaims so eloquently found its expression in action if not in legislation.

I would not object, for example, to voting against the amendment if the government were to tell us: Well, here are the names proposed for this corporation. If I see three or four French names, I shall be satisfied.

Therefore, let us have proof that this principle will be respected and we will yield. We will then realize that we Canadians can accept understanding and national unity.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up too much time but I have some remarks to make further to the speech we have heard from the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Régimbal), from the hon. member for York-South (Mr. Lewis) and from the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) who has just spoken. I was particularly impressed by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein) of Montreal. He is of Jewish origin and he has clearly laid down here in the house, before all the members, the treatment the minorities, whether English or others, are getting in the province of Quebec.

Now, regarding the amendment on which we will be voting shortly, I see nothing discriminatory about it. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) is to amend Section 4 of the bill by inserting the following paragraph:

> In the appointment of members and officers of the corporation, due account will be taken of the linguistic duality of Canada.

We have been hearing about duality and bilingualism etc. for 30, 40, 50 years. We have heard plenty of words but we have seen little action. When the hon. member for York-South said, a while ago, that French Canadians, as a majority or as an important group in any part of Canada—

• (5:40 p.m.)

—should be given the right to educate their own children in their own language and culture.

[Translation]

The member for York South is right on that score. But I would ask him a question. He is a member of a political party which has been in power close to 20 years in Saskatchewan and his present leader, who is here in Ottawa, was premier of Saskatchewan.

I have relatives in Saskatchewan, French Canadians like myself, who have never enjoyed the school freedom which we grant the Anglo-Saxons in our province of Quebec. And the member for Cartier was pointing it out a while ago. How is it that in 20, or 17 years of power, a government in such a province as Saskatchewan, could not give to the French Canadian minority the same privileges which we give—mark this: "in accordance with the law"—to the minorities living in our province of Quebec? And these are not empty words; we act along these lines. This is the law in the province of Quebec but it is not the law in the province of Saskatchewan.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the hon. member if he is aware that in the province of Saskatchewan between 1944 and 1964 we more than trebled the number of schools in which French was taught, from something in the neighbourhood of 70 to over 210?

Mr. Caouette: Were those schools fully paid for by the government of Saskatchewan, without any increase in taxes? Did the French speaking people pay for public schools and then have to pay for their own schools?

Mr. Douglas: No, my hon. friend should know there are separate schools which are paid for by the ratepayers. The government supplies an equalization grant which applies equally, whether it is a French school or an English school. In some cases, the separate school is an English speaking school and the public school is a French school. In both cases this equalization grant applies.

Mr. Caouette: There are not too many of them. In my opinion there is quite a difference between the schools in Saskatchewan and the way the school question is treated in the province of Quebec. I have relatives in the southern part of Saskatchewan and they have to pay double taxation because they have to pay for public schools, and then they have to pay for separate schools.

Mr. Douglas: My friend is wrong about that.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: But the way our compatriots are treated in the province of Saskatchewan bears no resemblance to the way we treat minorities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, in our province the rights of the minorities are guaranteed by law. Not by words only but by law.

We are now asking here in Ottawa to get as much. It is not so difficult if, in fact, there is no discrimination. When the hon. member for York South says that there is a cultural plurality in Canada, we agree. Of course, if I went to live in China, I would have to comply with that country's customs, while keeping my French language if I could. The hon. member comes from another country; he arrived in Canada in 1921 or 1922 and followed the customs of Canada. But a fact remains; Canada is a bilingual country; he recognized it. Canada is a country made up of two great ethnic groups; the Anglo-Saxon and the French.

Therefore, if that fact is recognized in the legislation, it seems to me that no one should complain, no one should be shocked, because the cultural and bilingual duality in Canada is recognized in the legislation. That is why we will vote, we want to vote and we are asking all Canadians, whatever the ethnic group to which they may belong, to vote so that the cultural and bilingual duality can be recognized in Canada.

Those are, Mr. Chairman, the comments I wanted to make on the matter.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Miss LaMarsh moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, may we have Bill S-42 called? This is the bill to amend the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Caouette.]

CANADIAN CORPORATION FOR WORLD EXHIBITION

AMENDMENT INCREASING PROTECTION FOR SYMBOLS, INSIGNIA, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-42, to amend the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give a brief explanation of the bill, just for the record?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have to confess to the house that I am quite speechless. I understand that the bill is quite important. If I could just have a minute to read it I would be glad to explain it. Perhaps the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) could save me the trouble, because he seems to have read it already.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, to find the minister speechless is an event which should be recorded, and we ought not to extend the debate on second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, is the minister now better briefed?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Then would he like to explain this clause?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would prefer not to, but I will if the committee insists.

The purpose of this amendment is to increase the protection afforded to marks of the corporation and the official symbol of the exhibition in their application to goods or wares. In other words, the purpose is to increase the revenues to the crown, an objective with which I am sure all hon. members will agree.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Winters moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) had, I thought, a few moments ago not done his homework sufficiently to give some explanation of the bill, perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) would give some explanation, for the record, of the purposes of the bill. I think all hon. members have read the bill and thoroughly approve of it. It seems to me somewhat unwise to have the bill go through the house without there being some statement on the record as to what the bill is all about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) speaks now it will have to be by unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my explanation will be short because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has already explained it very fully on second reading. Therefore I need say little by way of amplification at this stage.

The bill, as I heard the Minister of Transport, say, is to protect the symbols, copyright and trade mark position of Expo. Expo officials are now in the position of having to undertake the licensing of a great many products, and we want to ensure through this amendment to the statute that they are in a position to protect copyright and the like, and that fraudulent material is not circulated to the public and sold under the symbol or mark of Expo. The general purpose therefore is to protect our copyright and our trade mark so that we can achieve the necessary control and realize a proper and orderly licensing program for those people who wish to sell goods under licence related to Expo, thus enhancing the revenues which we hope will flow to Expo, and through Expo to the people of Canada, from this great Canadian undertaking.

Canada Corporation for World Exhibition

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question before he sits down. I take it that the act will not prevent amateur photographers from taking pictures on site, but they cannot reproduce them and sell them. Is that correct?

Mr. Winters: That is quite correct.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask the minister whether this includes the copyright of the initials "Expo"? Is that a copyrighted feature, as well as the symbols?

Mr. Winters: "Expo '67" is copyrighted and will also be protected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Starr: I wonder whether the acting house leader could tell us what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, before I deal with that I would again make an appeal to the house. There were two notices of motions put on Votes and Proceedings last Tuesday. They are to approve the activities of the standing committee on northern affairs and national resources and the standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration during the adjournment. I understand the committees may be visiting certain Indian reservations while the house is not sitting, and the passage of the two motions would authorize the committees to carry on during the recess.

If it meets with the approval of the house, I would appeal to the house to approve these two motions.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Are they in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Pennell: Yes, in Votes and Proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By unanimous consent, then.

Committee of the House

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES—INDIAN AFFAIRS, HUMAN RIGHTS AND CITIZENSHIP—PERMISSION TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENT OF HOUSE

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved:

That the standing committee on northern affairs and national resources be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purposes of obtaining further information relating to matters and projects dealing with northern development;

That for this purpose, the said committee be authorized to sit while the house is sitting or during adjournment of the house;

That the Clerk of the said committee and the necessary supporting staff do accompany the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Laing moved:

That the standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purpose of obtaining further information relating to matters affecting Indains and Indian communities; and

That, for this purpose, the said committee be authorized to sit while the house is sitting or during adjournments of the house; and

That the Clerk of the said committee and necessary supporting staff do accompany the said committee.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Before this item goes through I should like to ask whether any consideration has been given to the nature and composition of the supporting staff. One of the other committees tried an experiment in this direction and encountered a certain amount of difficulty in reporting its proceedings because of the necessity of carrying recording equipment. Has any consideration been given to the size of the staff covered by the motion, or to what is really desirable in this direction? I have no objection to meetings being held and reported. I am merely curious to know what kind of supporting staff is envisaged in the motion and how extensive it is likely to be.

Mr. Laing: I would hope that the supporting staff sent along would be adequate, but at the same time, having regard to the type of work this committee will be undertaking I believe the greatest value of these visits to Indian reserves and Indian people will come out of the acquaintance with the problems which is granted to each individual committee member. So I think the hon. member may agree with me that we should not be criticized too strongly if we endeavour to keep the supporting staff to a minimum.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: Tomorrow we shall be dealing with Bill No. C-215, the dock workers bill—in that order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pennell: When this is disposed of there may be a short waiting period while the measure is brought to the other place, and it may be that the leaders may wish to confer with a view to dealing with some business in the interim. But I do not press this.

Mr. Knowles: Medicare?

An hon. Member: Estimates?

Mr. Douglas: Has the government definitely set its face against proceeding with the medicare legislation or would it be prepared to consider this between now and tomorrow?

Mr. Pennell: I can add nothing to what was said by the Minister of National Health and Welfare today. He said there was no unanimous agreement and that the government would not insist upon proceeding with the medicare legislation.

Mr. Howard: You do not have unanimous agreement to proceed with the legislation on the dock workers, either.

Mr. Olson: There is only one bill left—we could perhaps get on with it and finish it up tonight. Would the acting house leader not appeal to the house once more?

Mr. Howard: We would gladly agree to that, if the government would agree to putting off the dock workers bill, as well, until some time in the indefinite future.

It being six minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

Second report of standing committee on health and welfare—Mr. Harley.

[Note: Text of foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

OLD AGE SECURITY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GUARANTEED MINIMUM MONTHLY INCOME

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, earlier, in the house, I indicated the government's intention to provide a further program of income support for older persons in Canada. I promised members I would give the house a general outline of this program before we adjourned for the summer. I am pleased to carry out that commitment, but before I do there are a number of comments I would like to make.

First, I believe the action taken earlier by this house in approving the Canada Assistance Plan will be of real assistance to many older people. Also medicare, when it comes into effect, will bring substantial benefits; indeed, it will be of special importance to older people, just as hospital insurance has been.

I would also remind the house that since this government took office the flat rate pension has been increased from $65 a month to $75. Some 100,000 persons have been brought under the old age security program this year through lowering of the eligibility age to 69 and in January of next year, when the eligibility age will be dropped to 68, another 100,000 will receive full benefits. This yearly reduction in the eligibility age will continue until 1970 when all persons 65 and over will be entitled to the flat rate pension.

By this time, 1970, the flat rate pension will be available as a matter of right to some one and a half million persons age 65 and over. Also, of course, a steadily increasing level of retirement benefits will be payable under the Canada Pension Plan, commencing next January. The Canada Pension Plan, we feel, will largely solve the problem of basic retirement pensions when its provisions come fully into effect and pensions are payable at the full scales provided in it. The plan in itself is a generous one.

There are, however, many older people in Canada who cannot benefit fully, or at all, from the Canada Pension Plan, because they are already past the retirement age or because they will be retiring before the plan becomes fully operational. I do not have to remind the house that the position of this particular group has been of considerable concern to this parliament and to this government.

I would also note the recommendation of the joint committee on the Canada Pension Plan urging further measures on behalf of those people who, because they are or soon will be retired, will not be substantial contributors to or beneficiaries from the Canada Pension Plan.

The increase in the monthly flat rate pension and the lowering of the eligibility age are in line with this recommendation, but clearly this is not all that is needed. I can assure the house that the government, and more particularly my department, has for some time been exploring various additional ways through which adequate assistance can be provided for this group of people. I would recall, for example, a speech which I gave on March 2 in Regina in which this problem was discussed. At that time I noted that a considerable number of older persons would not be able to take advantage of the Canada Pension Plan. I went on to discuss some of the various approaches which were being considered to meet this problem.

It is apparent, then, that a further program of benefits should be considered for persons in this particular age group. We propose to introduce a program that will guarantee a minimum monthly income of $105 to old age security recipients.

The details of such an income guarantee program are now being considered. The total payments which will be required under this program will, of course, decrease over the years, as the Canada and Quebec pension plans come into effect and pay increasing benefits.

The program is being provided with these two plans in mind and is specifically designed for those people who are not and will not, because of age, be able to take advantage of the contributory pension plans. This, as I said, is in line with the recommendations of the special joint committee. Because it is an income guarantee program, and because of the increasing benefits that will be available under the Canada and Quebec pension plans, the burden on the federal treasury will be almost entirely a transitional one.

By using the contemporary income guarantee formula rather than the flat rate increase it is felt that income support can be provided at a higher level for a given outlay of funds. Through this income guarantee program the needs of the older citizen can be more adequately met in a way that is financially responsible and least burdensome on the treasury.

I can inform the house that such a program will be presented to parliament for approval in the autumn, after parliament has reconvened.

It is estimated that the annual cost to the treasury of such a program will be in the neighbourhood of $225 million at the beginning. The revenue measures that will be needed to meet the burden which these supplementary benefits will place on our national finances are also being considered.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the long awaited announcement just made by the minister with some trepidation and disappointment. While it is true the minister says this legislation will be coming before us in the fall for approval, we had hoped to deal with it now.

I should like the minister to explain whether this supplementary benefit will be based on a means test, which is not acceptable, because his statement was not clear in this regard. This announcement comes after a great deal of urging by the party on this side of the house to which I belong.

An hon. Member: And the Liberal backbenchers.

Mr. Rynard: And as someone has said, there has been some urging on the part of a Liberal backbencher. The government has finally seen the light. It is pleasing to note that we in this party have fought constantly for a pension increase and we are happy that we have succeeded at least to the point of having an announcement, even though the actual increase is still to be delayed.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

This program will bring a measure of contentment and happiness to our older citizens, and in a great many cases it will provide many of the necessities they need so badly when the program comes into effect. As the party which brought this question to a vote early in the session, we are pleased at the result to a point, and are most happy at the measure of justice we hope it will bring to our senior citizens. However, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether the increase could not be made effective as of now, to help combat the high cost of living.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, any announcement that indicates that there is to be an improvement in the income of our old age pensioners should be greeted with approval in this House of Commons. However, I must say that the statement the Minister of National Health and Welfare has at long last made to parliament is bitterly disappointing. In the first place, if there is anything in this program that has any value, that offers any help to our senior citizens, it should be put into effect right away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: It is not good enough to tell the older people of this country that approval will be given in the fall to a measure the effective date of which has not been indicated to us in the statement given by the minister. The crux of this proposal is that there will be made available to our senior citizens an additional amount of money on a different basis from that on which they receive the present $75 a month. The minister uses the phrase "guaranteed annual income". He indicates in his statement that the details are yet to be worked out, but it is clear from such details as he has given us that the plan includes a means test under another name. All the government is proposing is that old age pensioners who do not have $30 a month of other income can qualify for up to $30 a month under this supplementary provision. That is a means test.

The proposed increase will be fine, if you forget the quality of dignity, for those who have nothing else. But there are thousands of older people in this country who, because there has been no means test in respect of the old age pension, have saved a little money and have incomes all told of $105, $110, or $150 a month. These people today are in desperate circumstances. In this legislation there is nothing for them at all. That is why I say that this long awaited announcement, with all the fanfare we have had about it and the pulling of teeth it has taken to get it, is bitterly disappointing.

The minister does not make clear just where Canada Pension Plan benefits fit into this scheme, but I think one can see where they fit. They are to be part of the other income that comes under this means test that the minister calls a guaranteed annual income. The whole concept of the Canada Pension Plan was to provide additional income, and now it is income that is to be taken into account under a glorified means test. The minister makes it clear that this proposal is to be transitional in character. He says the burden on the treasury will diminish as the years go on and the Canada Pension Plan comes into full force. In other words—let us get this clear—this is not an increase in the old age security pension, which is what the people of this country want at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My friends across the way can groan, but they will really groan when they get back to their constituencies and meet their people when they have learned that this government has tried to fob them off with a supplementary payment which is on a means test basis.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, the parliament of Canada took one of the greatest steps in its history when it said that retirement income is a matter of right. We did that in 1951 when we removed the means test from the old age pension. To put it back on any portion of what our senior citizens are to receive is a retrograde step, and I hope that between now and the fall when we come back to deal with this legislation the government will repent of this decision and will announce a decision which the people of Canada want. The government will hear about the reaction of the country to this proposal from the hundreds of thousands of people who will not benefit from this measure at all, and I urge the government to reconsider its whole position.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has let the cat out of the bag by giving us the figure representing what he thinks this plan will cost in the first year. The Minister of National Health and Welfare says that at the beginning it will cost $225 million a year. Since I heard that figure I have not had time to do my arithmetic in precise detail, but I have been able to compute that at best this will amount to an average of $15 a month for the people on our old age pension rolls during the first year.

The government says it is offering a total of $105 a month, which represents a supplement of $30 a month; but on an average, according to the terms of this proposal, it only comes to $15 a month or perhaps even less.

An hon. Member: It is only $11.

Mr. Knowles: Some of my friends have had more time to do their arithmetic than I, and they are saying it is only about $11 a month. This means, Mr. Speaker, that because some people will get the full amount, many if not most of our old age pensioners will not get any at all.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although, as I said in the beginning, one would expect that any announcement which does anything for our old age pensioners should be welcomed, this statement is bitterly disappointing. It is not satisfactory from a financial point of view and, what is even worse, it takes away from our senior citizens something that we gave them in 1951—their dignity, and their entitlement to their old age pension as a right. I deeply regret that a government which calls itself Liberal has announced that it intends to come in with such legislation.

The matter of old age pensions, Mr. Speaker, could be dealt with in a direct, straightforward and honest way, and I call upon the government to reconsider its decision. At the end of March, 1966, there was a surplus of $216,982,834.44 in the old age security fund, even after some of the money in that fund had been transferred to another fund. According to an answer given to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler), the Department of Finance estimated that at the end of the fiscal year in which we now find ourselves, the total surplus in that fund will be $455 million.

In other words, even though we are lowering the eligible age and putting more pensioners on the roll, the surplus in this fiscal year will be greater than the surplus in the last fiscal year. This is money which comes from three taxes, 4 per cent on personal income up to a ceiling, a 3 per cent sales tax and a 3 per cent corporation tax, which were earmarked for the old age security fund by a decision of parliament. The old age security fund is on a pay as you go basis. The money which is collected from the taxes paid by the people of Canada and which is being put into the old age security fund is for the payment of old age security pensions, and therefore I say it is a violation of the spirit of that act for the government to leave that money in the fund and not give it to the people for whom it has been collected.

There are over a million pensioners in Canada today. Perhaps there will be 1,200,000 by the time the 68 year olds get on the roll in 1967. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this year every pensioner on the roll could be paid the extra $25 a month that we urged they should receive, could be paid this sum retroactively to the beginning of the fiscal year, could receive the full $300 increase out of the old age security fund, and there would still remain in that fund at the end of the year a surplus of more than $100 million.

It is a disgrace, Mr. Speaker, for the government to come in with the statement that has been made today, in view of the money which is lying in the old age security fund. This money was collected for the old age security pension, collected on a pay as you go basis, but the government has refused to use it. I say that this statement today is bitterly disappointing to us in this house, and it will be received with great disappointment throughout the country as a whole because the people realize that not only is there a need for extra money on which to live, but there is a need for—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rule with respect to comments made at this time. The rules states that brief comments can be made by members of the parties in opposition.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for reminding me of the rules. I am very familiar with them. I had something to do with the drafting of the rule to which you are referring.

I submit that the minister has made a lengthy, argumentive statement, and that the government itself has delayed this announcement until what could be the last day of the session before we recess. The minister promised this statement on the second reading of the Canada Assistance Plan, and promised it on several other occasions. There will be no other opportunity, unless the session continues, to speak on this matter. I think it is appropriate that one spokesman from each party should be allowed to comment on this statement.

However, I have almost completed what I wanted to say. Today even the pension of $100 for which we have asked is not enough.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends can laugh, just as they did when a pension of $50 was suggested some years ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, he is familiar with the rule to which I have referred because he has had something to do with having it drafted. However, the rule does not provide for an exception, even in the case of a debate such as this. I should like him to keep that in mind and perhaps bring his remarks to a conclusion soon.

Mr. Knowles: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I shall now be concluding my remarks. I urge the government to look at its position in the light of the financial needs of the older people of this country and in the light of the right of our senior citizens to their dignity. We gave it to them in 1951. Let us not take it away by a proposal of this kind.

[Translation]

Mr. Gerald Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, following the announcement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), my remarks will be very brief, because I do not find very much to say except to criticize his statement about the increase in the old age pension.

After a great deal of thought and many hesitations, the minister made that statement today, at the very last minute before the adjournment of the present session, and instead of talking about old age security, he preferred to talk about the pension plan. I think therefore, that disappointment will be felt throughout Canada, because Canadians were expecting something else; as far as we are concerned on this side of the house, we would have preferred for our old people more than the crumbs offered by the minister in his statement.

As a matter of fact, the old people are led to believe that they are getting an increase in pension but, if you study carefully the minister's statement, you will find that instead the proposal will take something out of their income.

We saw that the minister succeeded in bypassing an election promise made last fall and we would have been surprised if he had offered us something else at this time.

In any event, over the recess we will have the opportunity and time to study more carefully the minister's recommendation and, when the session resumes in the fall, I am convinced that each member will see to it that the minister is made aware of the demands of the Canadian people, particularly those of the old people. I would not like to be in the shoes of the Liberal members who will have to explain the government's decision to their electors.

• (3:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the announcement we have heard this afternoon is not quite what we have been waiting for. I am reminded of the story which used to be told by the late Solon Low about the farmer who was plowing a field which had a stream alongside it. While the farmer was on the far side of the field his son fell into the stream. As he came round on his tractor and heard the boy screaming he shouted "Hold on while I make another couple of rounds". It seems to me that the old age pensioners of this country are being asked by the government to hold on while the government makes another couple of rounds through the summer.

We have been waiting for some action by the government, expecting that we would receive news of what the papers have been calling over the last few days a generous addition to the incomes of the old age pensioners. But all we have is the promise that the legislation will be presented. Even a member with interests as recent as mine—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Why did your party vote against it?

Mr. Johnston: We did not vote against it but afforded the government an opportunity to do something at that time. No one's disappointment is greater than mine at the lack of any specific announcement at this time of any action. One wonders what would happen if the advisers to the Prime Minister were to advise him during the summer to call another fall election, and just how long it would be before the necessary legislation to provide an increase would be implemented.

An hon. Member: Not much chance of an election.

Mr. Johnston: Somebody says that there is not much chance, and after this announcement I would be inclined to agree; but strange things have happened before.

This is a disappointing announcement. I appreciate the concept we hear of the guaranteed annual income, and I am concerned a bit when the members of the New Democratic Party back away from the concept of the guaranteed annual income every time it approaches. We hear a great deal from them about it at other times during the session, but when it actually comes close to being implemented we see a great deal of fright and a rapid retreat from what it seems to me must come. The only thing I would say is that if the guaranteed annual income is to be brought in and is to be successful in its initial and terribly important application, then it must be truly generous, and I do not feel that this increase is truly generous at the present time.

Mr. Winch: You are backing away now.

Mr. Johnston: I do not feel it is generous at the present time. I cannot quite understand the remark of the hon. member in the context of what I have just said.

I know this announcement will be a bitter disappointment to the old age pensioners in this country. I feel the thought which would best sum up their opinions is contained in one of the briefest letters I have ever received from an old age pensioner, which came to me about a month ago. All it said was "Will you lend me $200 till the government gets round to raising the old age security pension?" In that letter there was a sardonic note which I think will prove somewhat justified by the announcement we have had this afternoon.

At a time when every trade union in the country is demanding an increase in the wages of the workers, and at a time when the price index is rising constantly, I urge the government to reconsider this action and if it is at all possible under present legislation, or by order in council after we leave this chamber this afternoon, give a flat increase to the present pension of $75 a month, and then bring in a generous guaranteed annual income in the fall and proceed from there.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would ask the minister of health and welfare if he would, before this house closes or right now, make a clear-cut statement as to whether the means test is to be restored.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS, HUMAN RIGHTS AND CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN REPORT

On the order: Motions:

Mr. Klein (Chairman of the standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration):

That the second report of the standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration, presented to the house on Thursday, June 16, 1966, be concurred in.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's resolution which was adopted yesterday by unanimous consent, concerning the subject matter of this motion, I wonder whether it is now necessary to move concurrence.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

OLD AGE SECURITY

GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave, pursuant to standing order 26, to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter on urgent public importance, namely the total inadequacy of the policy just announced by the government which will deprive the senior citizens of Canada of the justice to which they are entitled, and the vital necessity of an alternative which would give an immediate increase of $25 a month to all citizens at age 65.

I plead urgency in the matter because of the critical rise in the cost of living and the position which I have consistently taken in the house this session.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly address the Chair on the question of urgency of debate?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to belabour the house. I made it quite clear that the position I have taken in this regard ever since the beginning of this session is based on urgency and need. As I said before I think it is sufficient for me to say that the critical rise in the cost of living makes my motion urgent and important.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the motion moved by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce makes out a basic case for urgency, in that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has today made his announcement about the government's program to take care of the elderly citizens of Canada.

Throughout the time the house was discussing the Canada Assistance Plan we were assured that some measure would be introduced to take care of the elderly people who are not covered by either the Canada Pension Plan or the Canada Assistance Plan. Only today have we been given some particulars regarding the government's proposal to fill this gap in our social security program. We shall have no other chance to discuss this matter until the house reconvenes some time in October.

It seems to me, therefore, that it is of the utmost urgency that parliament have an opportunity now, first, to express its opinion with regard to this proposal before us and, second, to give the minister an opportunity to tell parliament and the country the specific details of his program. Many old age pensioners, also many hon. members of the house, are still uncertain as to whether they are going to be covered; as to what the effective date will be; as to what will be the conditions employed in determining income; whether income will include alleged rent where a person owns his own home; whether assumed interest on assessed value of property will be taken into account, and whether some of the other factors which made the previous means test so unpopular will remain.

Therefore because parliament will have no opportunity, should it adjourn today, until next fall to discuss this matter, I think parliament ought to have this opportunity now of discussing the measure which the minister has forecast, so the members of this house might be given an opportunity to express their opinions and so the government might have a chance to give us some further information which is sorely needed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can tell hon. members that I am prepared to make a decision now. I do not think much purpose would be served by engaging in debate on this question at the moment.

I would ask hon. members to allow the Chair at this point to express its views on the motion which has been presented by the hon.

member for Grey-Bruce. Basically, in spite of the fact that the hon. member refers to a policy announcement which has been made by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare, the motion is based on a general question having to do with old age security and old age pensions.

It seems to me, and I have reached this conclusion having sat in this chair for some weeks now, that this matter has been debated on many occasions, and has been considered from all its aspects during the last few weeks and the last month. I do not think anything could be gained by having further debate on the matter at this time.

Despite the fact that a policy announcement has been made by the minister, the matter before me is the question of urgency of debate. I do not think anything would be gained at this time by having a debate now on the basis of the motion presented by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. May I ask the minister whether he is prepared now to give parliament the facts about the cancellation of a Canadian contract by the United States which was announced by Defence Secretary McNamara on Monday, and which is now described as a contract for rocket components?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, inquiries have been made of the Pentagon both as to what was actually said and what was meant with respect to this matter.

Mr. McNamara, by way of background, was discussing a proposed financial retrenchment program in respect of United States armed force procurement. He was indicating that some of the future plans for procurement of the department were going to be modified, and by way of citing an example he made reference to a contract for bombs to be cancelled, from Canada.

We have since learned that Mr. McNamara had reference in these circumstances, to an intention on the part of the United States Department of Defence not to extend or renew a particular contract for the production of explosives in Canada beyond the duration of the existing contract. There is nothing in this to suggest a cancellation of contracts. It is just that a contract for this particular commodity, with a Canadian firm manufacturing explosive material, will not be again entered into.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the house what, in the cancellation or non-renewal of these contracts, it will mean in terms of employment and dollars and cents under our defence contract agreements with the United States?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anybody knows what future contracts, which are not going to be proceeded with, might have been. This question is strictly hypothetical. We do know the value of the existing contract. We do know when it will be completed. In respect of the future, a further contract for the particular type of explosive in question will not be entered into. This, as the hon. gentleman can understand, is in the perfectly ordinary and natural course of doing business.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement the minister has made, which seems to have some definite aspects to it, is the government now prepared to offer some resistance to the cancellation of these programs?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I must take exception to the use of the word "cancellation". As I indicated to the house the other day, there is between Canada and the United States a production sharing agreement, on the basis of which each country will work to a rough balance of procurement north and south and south and north respectively. At the present time the balance has run slightly in favour of Canada. As a consequence the United States has every right, under our agreement, not to further increase the imbalance in Canada's favour. If the United States, in moving toward a more precise balance, decides not to proceed with the procurement of a particular item for which it has no need, I suggest that Canada and the Canadian government are in no position to protest.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister this. If in the curtailment of United States contracts in Canada the objective is to bring about a balance; and if that happens, as I am sure it will, that as the result of this announcement Canada will be on the short end of this defence production agreement, will not the government launch a protest or do something with respect to the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: That is hypothetical.

Mr. Starr: It is not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is along the same lines as the previous one.

INDUSTRY

INSTRUCTIONS FROM U.S. RESPECTING FLOUR FOR CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): My question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Yesterday the minister told the house that the Quaker Oats Company of Canada Limited had assured him that they had received no directive from their parent company with respect to the milling of flour for Cuba. I wonder if the minister's attention has been drawn to the fact that Mr. J. G. Wharry, president of the Quaker Oats Company of Canada Limited, said that his company will voluntarily act in such a way as not to conflict with the U.S. trading with the enemy act, lest this should bring the parent company into any conflict with the laws of the United States.

In view of that statement I would ask the minister what action he proposes to take, since the statement of the company's president appears to run contrary to item No. 3 of the guide lines which the minister announced in this house on March 31, as shown at page 3714 of Hansard.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this report. I spoke to the president and told him how I regarded the situation. He assured me quite categorically, as I said yesterday, that he had received no instruction or directive of any kind from his U.S. parent. He was acting in what he thought was the best interests of his company. As a matter of corporate decision they felt they did not need to participate in this business. Canadian owned companies thereby benefit because they will have an opportunity of milling more flour.

I also asked him if he was familiar with the government's program of guiding principles. He of course said he was because he had received the letter and replied to it, subscribing to the principles contained therein. We also discussed whether or not Canadian interests will suffer as a result of any action he is taking. They will not, as can be inferred from what I have said.

I then told him that in the event Canadian industry did suffer in any way my attitude would be quite different and I would be obliged to take another point of view. The president said he would be glad to conform to any wishes the Canadian government had to express in this regard.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question may I ask the minister whether he considers it in keeping with Canada's dignity as a sovereign nation that an American subsidiary should consider it is bound by the laws of the United States and can ignore the guide lines set down by a Canadian minister, because if this principle were adhered to by an increasing number of subsidiaries—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is clearly argumentative.

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): As a supplementary question, in view of what the minister said a moment ago in response to the original question put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, in view of the fact that Russian officials are expected in this country next month to arrange for the milling of close to half a billion pounds of Canadian flour destined for Cuba, and in view of the fact that American owned mills in this country are not expected to bid on the job, is the minister assuring the house that our Canadian owned mills will be capable of filling this contract?

Mr. Winters: I understand that is the case, Mr. Speaker, and in any event they have the opportunity of doing so. The Canadian industry will not suffer in this regard.

Mr. Sherman: As a further supplementary, can the minister allay the logical suspicion that Canada could sell more wheat flour to Cuba if the American owned mills in this country could be counted on to bid on these jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is also argumentative.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does he intend to announce shortly that by-elections will be called to fill the vacancies in the house?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Before long, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he prepared to tell us when the promised inquiry into security will get under way and who will head the inquiry?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that it would have been under way by now, but it has taken longer than we expected, or hoped, to work out the details of all the terms of reference. That has now been completed and we are in the process of inviting commissioners to take on this very important task which will extend over many months.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—REQUIREMENT FOR AMORTIZATION OF DEBT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I ask this question now because it is obviously impossible to put a question on the order paper and get an answer before October, and irrevocable steps may be taken by the government in the next three months. In view of the stand which the government has taken that it has no alternative but to increase St. Lawrence seaway tolls, is the minister not aware that there is nothing in the St. Lawrence seaway act which requires the Canadian seaway authority, unlike the statutory requirement for its United States counterpart, to amortize its debt over a specific period of time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not acceptable.

[Later:]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The urgency of my question is based on the great concern expressed by Canadian farmers in respect of this matter. Is it a fact that the minister has agreed to accept the St. Lawrence seaway authority recommendation that tolls be increased on the seaway?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I told the house the other day, but perhaps it is useful to repeat it, that the government has accepted no position in this matter because we are very anxious to have negotiations continue with the United States and we think it would be much better to have a joint understanding than to have each country act separately.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, is it not correct that Welland canal tolls form no part of the St. Lawrence seaway agreement with the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this question is acceptable either.

OLD AGE SECURITY

GUARANTEED INCOME—INQUIRY AS TO MEANS TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, without seeking controversy I would simply like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare this question. Does the announcement he made this afternoon, relating to pensions and a guaranteed annual income for our older people, involve a means test?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask one more supplementary question. Without making a play on words, the minister said it does not involve a means test, but does it involve a needs test?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask the minister a supplementary question with regard to the announcement he made this afternoon. Does he realize—he will correct me if I am wrong—that the measure he has announced will place a penalty on all the earlier recipients under the Canada Pension Plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is argumentative.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, as a further supplementary I wish to ask the minister whether the measure he announced today to assist our older citizens reflects the recommendation of the Croll committee to provide them with a guaranteed minimum income based on income tax returns?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question cannot be accepted for the same reason as others were rejected.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question could the minister tell the house what he anticipates will be the effective date for the implementation of the program he announced on motions?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the effective date will be disclosed in the legislation.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the senior citizens of our country who will be eligible for the increase he mentioned earlier today be subjected to a test as to their income or resources before they will receive any additional money?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the details of any particular method of applying the guaranteed income will be disclosed in the legislation.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question. I am right in concluding that there will be an investigation of their resources and income before they become eligible for it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since, in the light of studies it has undertaken, the Quebec government will be unable to implement a medicare program before January 1, 1970, would the minister or the government agree to postpone the national medical care program until January 1, 1968?

[English]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we propose to proceed with the medical care program in accordance with the bill which is now available to hon. members.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he has had any opportunity to consider the appeal I made to the government last night to give consideration to proceeding with second reading before the house adjourns for the summer recess?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I read my hon. friend's statement on this subject, but we propose to follow the plan that has been outlined and proceed with second reading of the legislation shortly after our return.

Mr. Douglas: As a further supplementary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Douglas: —has the Prime Minister made any commitment to the official opposition not to proceed, as would seem to be indicated by the statement made by the hon. member for Ontario as recorded at page 7606—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Simcoe East.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order based on the question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the implication contained in it. The meetings of the party house leaders were never conducted on the basis of an agreement with one party. I would point out that we have tried to expedite the business of the house. The government has made its own decisions and we have tried to conform with those decisions by passing the legislation which the government wanted.

There should be no implication whatsoever made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are now renewing a discussion which took place yesterday when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam put certain statements on the record. The hon. member has asked a question along the same lines today. The hon.

member for Ontario has risen on a point of order, and I suggest to hon. members that there is no point whatever in renewing the discussion which we had yesterday on this matter.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not renewing the matter at all. I was referring a few moments ago to an interjection the hon. member for Ontario made as found on page 7606 of Hansard. At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was speaking.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that there is no point of order. There is a discussion between two hon. members as to who said what and I suggest this is not a point of order which should be brought up at this time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Ontario is taking exception to something I said and it seems to me I am entitled to clarify that point.

Mr. Crouse: He did not. He raised a point of order.

Mr. Douglas: The point I sought to have clarified was an interjection when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was speaking and said:

The acting house leader has now placed something else in front of us—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member suggesting the question of privilege he is trying to raise now arises out of today's proceedings?

Mr. Starr: On a point of order again, I did not raise a question of privilege. I rose on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: This is my understanding. I understand the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is now rising on a question of privilege. I suggest that as soon as possible he should state what the question of privilege is.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I was seeking to do that. My question to the Prime Minister was based on something which I understood the hon. member for Ontario had taken exception to. I think I am entitled to clarify the statement I was making. The statement to which I referred arose out of a comment by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre when he said:

The acting house leader has now placed something else in front of us which was not in that arrangement. This, I think, is breaking the word of the government house leader that he conveyed to us on this side of the house.

The hon. member for Ontario interjected:

Also the Prime Minister.

I asked if the Prime Minister had also made such a commitment.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

MEDICARE—BASIS OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the conflicting statements on the proposed medicare bill, will the minister tell us whether the federal government will pay 50 per cent of the actual cost of medicare in each province?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no. The federal government will pay 50 per cent of the per capita cost of medicare programs in participating provinces.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister state whether or not the provinces will be given the right to opt out of the medicare legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe this question was discussed in the course of the debate which took place in the house.

POWER

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF THERMONUCLEAR PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lobtinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to a minister well endowed with spiritual energy, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

My question is urgent, Mr. Speaker, because of the increasing concern with regard to the steel complex which was supposed to be set up at Bécancour. Could the minister tell us whether the fate of that thermonuclear plant, which is to be set up in Bécancour by the federal government, is connected with that of steel?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Choquette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the house whether he had today, or whether he is supposed to have in the near future, consultations with the new Quebec government concerning the thermonuclear plant.

Mr. Pepin: No, to the first question, Mr. Speaker, and to the second question also, I hope.

Mr. Choquette: My last question, Mr. Speaker, is whether the thermonuclear plant is to be set up at Bécancour?

Mr. Pepin: The matter is being considered by the cabinet, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO BOARD HEARINGS ON REGIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will the Air Transport Board be holding hearings this summer on the subject of regional air policy? If so, when will these hearings commence and where will they be held?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. gentleman surmises, there are to be hearings on the application of TransAir Limited to give up certain of their prairie runs. Those hearings are bound to have an effect, I would imagine, upon regional air policy but there is no plan for hearings on a regional air policy as such.

Mr. Dinsdale: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the present temporary arrangements for regional air service continue in effect until such time as a firm policy is established?

Mr. Pickersgill: They will continue in effect until such time as the Air Transport Board has reached its conclusion with regard to these particular hearings.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister this summer, after a brief homecoming holiday in Newfoundland, get busy on transport legislation to be dealt with when we resume in the fall; because in spite of the two ministers' play on words no transport legislation of any significance has been brought before the house so far this session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the minister has been busy on this for the last six months. He expects to be busy on it through the recess and is very hopeful he will have legislation acceptable to all parties in the house, which will be passed in one day's debate.

AGRICULTURE

SHEEP—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, lest anyone thinks the shortage of wool in Canada has been caused by the government's efforts to pull the wool over the eyes of the people, I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that Canada's sheep population is now at the lowest ebb since records have been kept. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what he proposes to do to encourage the sheep industry.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while hon. members have been woolgathering we have been acting.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. All joking aside, will he give the Minister of Agriculture instructions to consider the sheep industry in an attempt to see whether something can be done in this regard?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the minister as soon as he returns.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys or the Minister of National Defence or possibly the Prime Minister. The government can never make up its mind, so I do not know who is responsible for answering. The question is with reference to the cabinet committee which I understand has been set up concerning the problem of the Nova Scotia coal mining industry. May I ask whoever is going to answer the question how soon the cabinet committee may be in a position to provide a report? I ask this question because today may be the last opportunity we will have to provide an answer to the coal miners of Nova Scotia in respect of how soon they may receive the assistance promised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and later confirmed by the Prime Minister and other ministers in the house.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not customary to talk about matters discussed in the cabinet or a cabinet committee in the house.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister advise the house whether the government intends to introduce legislation when parliament resumes in October to try to control the very serious rise which is taking place in the cost of living?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): A great deal of our legislation is already having that effect, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister consider that the unprecedented rise of 1 per cent in the last three months shows control by the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order.

LABOUR RELATIONS

HAMILTON, ONT.—STEPS TO SETTLE STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question relating to the one I asked yesterday which I should now like to direct to the Minister of Labour. In view of the critical situation in respect of the longshoremen's walkout at the port of Hamilton, has the minister anything further to add to the report he made to the house yesterday?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to say that the situation does not appear to be as critical now as it was at this time yesterday. Yesterday I referred to the fact that one of my officials had been asked to intervene in the dispute and that a meeting was to take place in Montreal yesterday between representatives of the longshoremen of the eastern ports. I understand that such a meeting took place last night which was attended by, among others, the international president.

Prior to that meeting there was some discussion about arbitrating the issues that gave rise to the Hamilton and Toronto dispute. I am assured that it was agreed that following an exchange of correspondence in an attempt to work out this situation earlier today the Hamilton workers are to return to work. The Toronto workers have continued on the job. Instead of arbitrating the issue the parties have agreed to await the results of the industrial inquiry commission set up to look into the St. Lawrence ports situation. It is my hope that the Hamilton workers will be back to work later today or tomorrow.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION OF TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether an up to date forecast has been made as to the date of the publication of the report of the Carter royal commission on taxation? If it is made available during the recess of parliament, will it be released at that time so hon. members may have an opportunity of studying it before we resume?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I expect that the Carter commission will present its report during the parliamentary recess. As I said in the house in answer to a similar inquiry some time ago, there are difficulties regarding the French version of the report. Special measures are being taken to reduce any delay that might be occasioned by the preparation of the French version. I hope it will be possible to have the report published in both versions during the recess, but it will not be early in the recess. We will be fortunate if it is published before we are back sitting in this house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR HIGHER INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who reports for the Canadian Wheat Board. In the last two or thee days has he received any direct communication from the National Farmers Union or any other farm organization requesting an increase in the initial wheat payment, and can he say whether any action is to be taken by the wheat board toward this end?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that I have received representations about the initial price of wheat for the coming crop year from the farmers union and other organizations. Some of those representations were in favour of increasing the price while others were in favour of leaving it as it is. I expect an announcement will be made on Monday.

WATER RESOURCES

HAMILTON, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF POLLUTION RESEARCH CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, can the minister of energy resources advise the house whether the government has uner consideration the construction of a pollution research centre at pier 29 in Hamilton bay?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to suggest that the hon. member place this question on the order paper. Perhaps he can speak to the minister.

TRADE

DEBATE ON PROTOCOL TO CARIBBEAN CONFERENCE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A few days ago I asked the Acting Prime Minister whether it would be possible to arrange for the house or a committee to consider the protocol signed by Canada and the West Indies. I should like to know now whether any decision has been made in this regard, particularly in view of the vexation transportation aspects?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be a very good idea to have a committee of the house examine the protocol. There should be no difficulty in submitting it to the committee on external affairs which could meet for that purpose.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce which is related to the question I asked yesterday in erspect of this problem. Has the minister any information as to the immediate effects these trade plans may have on the ports of Halifax and Saint John so that the fears in respect of what could happen this summer may be dispelled?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The principal ports concerned with the waiver of the direct shipment regulation would be Halifax and Saint John. Imports from commonwealth Caribbean countries through these ports account, in the case of Halifax, for only one-third of 1 per cent of total cargo from all countries, and in the case of Saint John for only 3.8 per cent of the total. Most of these cargoes are sugar, molasses and salt which are carried in bulk and are unlikely to be affected significantly by the termination of the direct shipment requirement. The other principal cargo imported into Canada from the Caribbean is alumina and bauxite which, as hon. members know, is carried in bulk direct to the smelters.

Any harm that might possibly be done to the ports of Halifax and Saint John I believe will be insignificant when viewed in the light of the broad context of the benefits that are bound to flow from the agreement reached at the conference last week.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I thank the minister for that reply. I hope the house has noted that rum was not included in the list of imports referred to as commodities entering the maritimes.

Mr. Winters: Rum is one of the commodities we concentrated on considerably during the conference.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the minister stops chuckling about rum I should like to ask him to advise the house, and particularly the members from the maritimes, whether he will keep a very close eye on the reaction of other countries which might also approach Canada for similar terms and preferences?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, what has been done in this connection cannot be regarded as a precedent. We will keep our eyes on other such developments that might tend to take place.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—REPORTED PLANS FOR EXPANSION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Did the minister inform the Toronto Telegram that the government has plans for a $100 million expansion program for the Toronto airport?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I said exactly the opposite. I was absolutely startled when I read the article which seemed to suggest, although it did not say so exactly, that I said something of that kind. I did say that we were beginning to make long range plans for the superjet and supersonic age, that these would take a great deal of time and that there were no plans at the present time for any construction at the airport at Toronto. I hope there will not be another silly story rumoured around about this government embarking on another such $100 million project, which obviously resulted from the imagination of some newspaperman.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. If the government does not have any immediate plans for the expansion of Toronto airport, why are the people there who are commentating and answering questions during conducted tours of the airport talking about the grand plans for its expansion?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will get the officials there to change the gramophone record if that is the one they are now using.

WOMEN

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF STATUS BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Two weeks ago I asked him whether or not he would give consideration to the request of 32 national organizations representing nearly 500,000 Canadian women for the establishment of a royal commission to study the status of women in Canada. He replied, with very great enthusiasm, that there was nothing he would rather look into. Now that he has had an opportunity of looking into the matter I should like very much to know whether he intends to give consideration to this matter by the appointment of such a commission.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into it and as a result of my investigations have decided to be very cautious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: But seriously, Mr. Speaker, this matter is before the government. The Secretary of State has been pushing it hard, and when the Secretary of State pushes hard something almost inevitably happens—something.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CHANGES IN HIGH COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is the Minister of National Defence considering further immediate changes in the high command of our defence forces in view of the public acknowledgement of the new chief of staff that the minister's policy of integration has been a complete failure?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): I will have to ask the minister.

Mr. Churchill: Is not the statement of the chief of staff that his first job is "to sell integration and explain why it had to come" a clear indication of the deplorable state of morale in our armed forces and the failure of the policy of the minister and associate minister?

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I note that quite a few questions have already been directed to him today. With the recent passage of the legislation implementing the Canada Assistance Plan and its important provisions, can the minister advise the house whether he has specific information from one or more of the provinces as to how soon improved welfare assistance might be made available under their jurisdiction?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have no specific information with respect to the implementation of the programs under the Canada Assistance Plan in the provinces except the program initiated in the province of Prince Edward Island, which expected to use the Canada Assistance Plan.

NATIONAL PARKS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has any action been taken by his department with a view to establishing a prairie national park in any area now being used for the grazing of cattle?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, our officials have been working very closely with the officials of the parks branch of the province of Saskatchewan in respect of three different areas. I would not be in a position to tell the house today which is the more desirable area, but I will tell the hon. gentleman that the matter of the reduction of agricultural land has been brought to our attention by the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister announced the policy of a second national park a year ago last April 22, when will the minister be in a position to advise the house that the location of a second national park in Saskatchewan has been decided upon?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the responsibility rests with the province of delivering this property to the federal government free of encumbrance, so we are partners in the creation of a national park. However, it would be our hope that some time in 1966 we could make an announcement in respect of a second national park in Saskatchewan.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and is supplementary to one I have already posed. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he can advise us how soon the coal miners of Nova Scotia may expect some action on the long delayed promise of financial assistance? Does he also realize that the coal miners of Nova Scotia do not appreciate the callous and facetious manner in which he is handling this problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order on many grounds, and the period for questions has now expired. Orders of the day.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before you call the orders of the day, could we ask that consideration be given to adjusting the clocks in the chamber so that members will know when the question period has ended? This may also be advantageous later in the day.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROVISION FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF FINDING OF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONER

The house resumed, from Monday, July 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Nicholson for the second reading of Bill No. C-215, respecting certain conditions of employment of dock workers at the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the house earlier in the week I made a full statement, perhaps too lengthy in the opinion of some people at least, which I trust showed very clearly that in spite of hard bargaining, conciliation and mediation efforts over a period of several months settlement without some action by parliament appeared to be impossible.

I think I might say that on the whole the meetings that took place on Saturday, June 11, and in the early morning of June 12 were constructive and very worth while. With a view to avoiding supplementary statements by some of my colleagues, I wish to summarize the happenings on those two days. On the morning of Saturday, June 11, Judge Lippé and my deputy minister confirmed what the former had said to me the previous day, namely, that the counterproposal of the Shipping Federation of Canada, made a day or two earlier, to the minimum demands of the unions made back on May 26 had been turned down by the unions.

The mediator said to me on the Saturday morning that in his opinion and that of my deputy minister, who had been with him during the last two days of the discussions and mediation proceedings, there was no chance of the parties reaching agreement without some definite assurance to the Shipping Federation, the employer, that they might expect, or might hope at least, for increased productivity, not in 1966, but in 1967, in return for the substantial increases and the assurances of job security that the unions were insisting upon and that he felt that parliamentary action at an early date might be necessary.

I might say that on the previous day the mediator, Judge Lippé, had suggested to me that, to bring the strike to a close consideration should be given to having the three or four remaining crucial issues referred to an industrial inquiry commission, and that the government give consideration to introducing legislation with a view to making binding the findings of such a commission on those three or four matters. Shortly after my discussion with the mediator I conferred with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and had a meeting with the legal adviser of the Shipping Federation. This was a very brief meeting. I outlined to him briefly Judge Lippé's proposal.

Later the same morning my three colleagues, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau), Judge Lippé, my deputy minister and I met in my office with Mr. Cutler, the legal adviser of the longshoremen's union, and with a few of his clients and Mr. Jodoin, President of the Canadian Labour Congress. At that meeting I first reminded the union representatives—and this had been a cause of complaint on their part and probably a justifiable one—that they now had had for a day or two the counterproposal of the Shipping Federation for which they had been pressing. I then went on to say that since that counterproposal had been turned down there now appeared to be what was described by one of them as an impasse and which I called a deadlock. I said that the government was strongly of the opinion that an early solution must be found. I then confirmed to the group in my office that I intended, as Minister of Labour, to establish an industrial inquiry commission to look into the working conditions in the three ports and into certain other matters.

I may say that this matter had been under consideration for some weeks, again at the suggestion of the mediator. I then suggested that the possibilities for increased productivity, related job security and other related matters might be referred to the commission for immediate study, and that the other phases of the proposed inquiry into industrial unrest and difficulties on the St. Lawrence, mainly parking facilities on the dock, safety and other matters, might be deferred until later in the year, possibly as a second phase of the study by the commission.

I further suggested that a way out of the deadlock might be found in legislation making the findings of the commission on increased productivity and related matters binding, and that in the same way job security for longshoremen, which was a matter of special concern to the international vice-president, Mr. Tremblay, might be dealt with by the same commission. I stressed the fact that the strike had been on for over a month and that an early solution must be found even if that solution lay in referring the matter to parliament.

As I have already informed the house, and I want to make this clear particularly in view of an editorial that appeared in the Montreal Star today, Mr. Jodoin, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, stated he was opposed to compulsory arbitration. We knew that and we appreciate the reasons for labour organizations being opposed to compulsory arbitration, although there might be circumstances when legislation making certain findings binding would be necessary. I might say that Mr. Cutler, the legal adviser of the longshoremen's association, also stated that his clients were opposed to any legislation that would make the findings of the commission binding.

I then put a question to Mr. Cutler in the presence of my colleagues, the deputy minister, Judge Lippé and others. I asked him what would happen if the government were to decide to make the findings of the commission binding in regard to the three or four remaining points—there were 50 or more in the early stages. I mentioned to him that there seemed to be a block to reaching an agreement and I wondered what would be their position. Mr. Cutler then said clearly and unequivocally that while his clients were opposed to binding legislation, we could rest assured that they were Canadians and would co-operate if the government set up a commission. He then said he would advise them on any legislation that might be passed and that they would obey it. There was no question about that. I was not surprised to get that assurance from a fellow member of the bar. I thought it a reasonable statement on his part.

Mr. McCleave: But he did not agree.

Mr. Nicholson: True, he did not agree. He told me they were not in favour of legislation which makes anything binding, that it is not in keeping with the principles of democratic labour organizations, or words to that effect. I understood his position. We invited ideas for any solutions and when they were not forthcoming I reiterated that legislation might be the answer.

At about that time the Minister of Transport had been studying a memorandum which contained the counterproposals of the Shipping Federation to which I have referred. He proposed to the International Longshoremen and to their solicitor in the presence of the president of the Canadian Labour Congress that to bring an end to the dispute and to get the men back to work, the strike having lasted for over a month by this time, the government was in fact prepared to introduce legislation, which would ensure that the conclusions of the commission on these three or four crucial points would be made binding—and this proviso was very clear—provided the International Lonshoremen's Association and the Shipping Federation could reach an agreement on wages and the other points, of which there were altogether about 12 in the memorandum. I may say that at that particular meeting there were no representatives of the Shipping Federation present. Those present were myself, my three cabinet colleagues, the mediator, the union representatives and their lawyer. Only five or six of the union representatives were present; the others were waiting outside.

After we had discussed this matter for the better part of an hour we adjourned to a room in the west block where simultaneous translating facilities are available so that those of the members who were in attendance who did not understand English would have the benefit of full discussion. During that meeting, which lasted nearly an hour, my cabinet colleagues and I said we intended to meet that afternoon with the representatives of the Shipping Federation and that we would try to find out how far the Shipping Federation would go to improve the terms of payment contained in the counterproposal to which I referred, and which the Minister of Transport had in his hands, if they got a definite assurance from us that the findings of the commission of the crucial issues might be binding. I am not saying the word "crucial" was used, but I refer to the three or four outstanding points.

At that same meeting the president of the C.L.C. stated that he was leaving because of a prior engagement and would not be present at the meetings held later that day. He again stated that the congress, as a matter of principle, was definitely opposed to binding legislation in disputes between labour and management. I am not sure he used the words "in principle" but that was the gist of what he said.

My cabinet colleagues and Judge Lippé and I left that meeting, having conveyed to all the people present in English and through simultaneous translation, that we were going to put this proposal before the Shipping Federation together with the suggestion that, if the parties could agree on all the outstanding points except the three or four I mentioned, we were prepared to recommend that parliament make these findings binding.

After lunch my three colleagues and Judge Lippé and I, met with the representatives of the Shipping Federation and their lawyer. We had a very full discussion. In fact, the discussion took so long that I thought that perhaps our persuasive powers had lost some of their effectiveness. In the meantime the longshoremen left the building after waiting two or three hours. They returned later. Nevertheless, even though the I.L.A. members had left, we continued our efforts and in the very late afternoon the Shipping Federation said that they were prepared to agree to a substantial wage increase and other benefits mentioned in the memorandum, subject to some details which had to be worked out as to whether it was 20 cents on return to work and 20 cents retroactive or some other terms. These were matters of detail.

There was discussion also about what the terms would be in 1967 and how they could be tied in with the findings of a commission of inquiry, if it were set up. However, in principle, they agreed to take their chances with what an industrial inquiry commission might find in the field of increased productivity. If the commission found that the gang structure should be limited to 16 or 17 or 15 or should be increased to 19, which the Shipping Federation would not concede, they would accept these findings and would take their chances on them. They then agreed in return for that to give 40 cents per hour for 1966 and an additional 40 cents that was requested for 1967. There were some other items in the middle about which there did not seem to be any difficulty, as I have mentioned.

I might say that when the Shipping Federation agreed that they would meet the demands on wages within reason subject to the negotiation of certain details, my colleagues and I, with the knowledge and approval of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who was Acting Prime Minister and I had both talked to him earlier in the morning, gave such an assurance. I might say that after a full month of a crippling strike, crippling not only to the people of Canada but to the workers and others directly involved, we felt as a government, or working as a committee of the government speaking for the government, that we had no alternative but to accept our responsibility as a government and to recommend legislation to parliament if the parties, as I have said, could agree to the wages and these other times. The Minister of Transport and I both made that quite clear to both sides.

After the Shipping Federation had agreed to this proposal, subject to negotiation of these details, my colleagues and I along with Judge Lippé met during the evening with the union representatives and their lawyer to discuss the proposal that had come out of our lengthy afternoon meeting with the Shipping Federation and our earlier morning meeting with the longshoremen. As I have mentioned, Mr. Jodoin was not there during the afternoon or evening meetings.

I want to say to this house in unequivocal terms that in my view, and in the opinion of those of my colleagues who were present during the final stages of these negotiations, there is not the slightest doubt but that the Shipping Federation would not have agreed to a settlement along lines, which some of the union members later referred to as fabulous, had we not made to them a clear and positive commitment of the nature to which I have referred.

I want to assure this house also that Mr. Cutler, the legal adviser, and the I.L.A. negotiators were aware of every step of the negotiations from approximately 11.30 in the morning of Saturday, June 11, and that if the parties could agree on wages and these other issues, we were prepared to recommend to parliament legislative action which would make the commission's findings binding with regard to gang structure, sling loads consistent with safety, job security of longshoremen in good standing and related matters. Our whole course of action—when I say "our" I refer to my three cabinet colleagues, the Minister of Transport, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau) the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and myself—on Saturday morning and early Sunday was predicated on the fact that the Shipping Federation and the Longshoremen's Association knew the course we had in mind, and that the later discussions that took place on wages and what the division would be between an allowance for job security and an allowance for straight wages were predicated on that knowledge. I might say again, in view of some of the newspaper articles that have appeared, that though the union representatives did not join in the request for a commission, nor did they formally agree to having the representations implemented by legislation, to say the least they appeared to be realistic. They wanted to see the matter settled and they wanted to see it settled as quickly as possible.

They led us to believe that, if agreement could be reached on the points mentioned by the Minister of Transport, they would cooperate with the commission and that they would obey any law that parliament might pass making these findings binding. I might say that even though the negotiations were broken off and we were tired and disappointed, I was still hopeful a settlement would be reached. It did not seem to me that there were too many differences. I was confirmed in that opinion when on Monday morning, June 13, while my three colleagues and I were in the Prime Minister's office, a telephone call came through to the Prime Minister. It was from Mr. Jodoin. The Prime Minister turned to us and said that Mr. Jodoin had said he was speaking on behalf of the I.L.A. and asked the Prime Minister if we would receive a representative group from the Longshoremen's Association. The Prime Minister, again relaying his conversation with Mr. Jodoin, told us what Mr. Jodoin had said to him—I made a note of the words—that the parties were so close to an agreement the day before he thought a meeting with the Prime Minister present might bring an end to the dispute and result in an early return to work.

The Prime Minister suggested that if they were close to an agreement they might meet in the office of the Minister of Labour with me and the cabinet colleagues who I have mentioned. He gave an assurance the minister would try to get the representatives of the Shipping Federation to come to Ottawa for concurrent or subsequent discussions. As a result of that telephone call meetings did take place during the late afternoon and early evening of the 13th with representatives of the I.L.A. and representatives of the Shipping Federation. During the late evening of the 13th, from shortly before ten o'clock, and continuing into the early morning of the 14th, further meetings were held in the Prime Minister's office. I might say that the Prime Minister first met with representatives of the Shipping Federation but the I.L.A. representatives were in a room not far away. Then the Prime Minister, along with the rest of us, met with representatives of the I.L.A. Still later he met again with each of these groups separately, with the rest of us present.

Finally, the representatives of both parties met with us in the Prime Minister's office. By this time, nearly two o'clock in the morning, a settlement was reached. The settlement was announced to the press. Mr. Speaker, I think an incident occurred which is of very great importance. An aide-mémoire had been prepared by my colleagues and myself for the Prime Minister's use. This aide-mémoire is most important because it confirms definitely the fact that the findings of the commission on these limited issues were to be made binding by legislation.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I should like to read into the record the memorandum which the Prime Minister read, first to the representatives of the Shipping Federation:

At the meeting of the cabinet committee this afternoon with the bargaining committee of the I.L.A. there remained three points outstanding, as follows.

1. Saturday call in.
2. The application of retroactivity on overtime.
3. Four hour recall.

I understand that the first item has been disposed of and I will not raise the matter at this point for consideration.

I propose to ask the I.L.A. to drop its demand for the application of retroactivity on overtime. I am now asking the representatives of the Shipping

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Federation to accept the following proposal with respect to the four hour recall:

1. That the four hour recall be instituted when the men return to work.
2. That this item—

The recall item.

—be submitted to the commission for examination, and that the recommendation of the commission with respect to this item be binding in precisely the same way as the recommendation with respect to gang size. The four hour recall would then be dealt with and included within the contract in the manner specified by the commission.

After that proposal had been placed by the Prime Minister before the Shipping Federation representatives they adjourned to caucus. Then the Prime Minister with the same persons present, the cabinet colleagues to whom I have referred and Judge Lippé, invited the representatives of the Shipping Federation into his office and he read them this statement, except that it was in the converse.

Mr. Lewis: I presume the minister means the I.L.A. representatives.

Mr. Nicholson: I beg your pardon, yes, the I.L.A. I will skip the introductory part. Again the Prime Minister said:

I understand that the first item has been disposed of and I will not raise the matter at this point for consideration.

When speaking to the I.L.A. representatives he used these words:

I now ask you—

The I.L.A.

—to drop your demand for the application of retroactivity on overtime.

These are the notes that I made when this statement was being read with the representatives present. The Prime Minister continued:

I have asked the representatives of the Shipping Federation to accept the following proposal with respect to the four hour recall:

1. That the four hour recall be instituted when the men return to work.

2. That this item be submitted to the commission for examination, and that the recommendation of the commission with respect to this item be binding in precisely the same way as the recommendation with respect to gang size. The four hour recall would then be dealt with and included within the contract in the manner specified by the commission.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question at this point? Am I right in thinking that at this meeting the president of the Canadian Labour Congress was present?

Mr. Nicholson: At this meeting, Mr. Speaker, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress was present. I might say that he took relatively little part in the conversation at that time, although at one stage, again in fairness to him, he did say: "You know, Mr. Prime Minister, we are opposed to legislation which makes any findings of a commission binding", or words to that effect.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, agreement was reached on the strength of the assurance that we gave to the Shipping Federation. We gave it with prior knowledge on the part of the I.L.A. that we were going to discuss this. For approximately three or four hours, perhaps longer, late Saturday night, the 11th, and on the early morning of the 12th, we did not discuss in detail wages and some other items in the eight or nine other areas upon which basically agreement had been reached. But we did discuss whether the 40 cents payable in 1957, that is, the second part of it, would be payable when the commission report came in and whether it would be payable on April 1, May 1, or June 1. These points were discussed at some length.

Before we left the Prime Minister's office and after we had all been photographed, I might say that I saw many of the longshoremen officials shaking hands with some of the officials of the Shipping Federation, with whom they were hardly on speaking terms a month before when I first met them. It was a very jovial, happy occasion. Photographs were taken in which they, Mr. Jodoin and the rest of us participated. When we left the Prime Minister's office it was agreed that the lawyers for the two parties and certain other representatives, not all of them but enough to be truly representative, would meet in my office later the same morning to prepare minutes of settlement.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, as you already know, that the terms of settlement were filed in this chamber, along with certain other documents, by my parliamentary secretary on the 8th instant.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister forgive me if I ask another question at this point? Do I understand him to suggest that the first draft of the terms of settlement was prepared by the lawyers for the two parties and that a draft was not prepared by his department which was presented to them?

Mr. Nicholson: I am glad that question has been asked. When the parties reassembled, knowing that time was an important factor my deputy minister had taken it upon himself, he having been present throughout the whole proceedings, to draft what he thought might be minutes helpful to both sides, because he had no particular axe to grind one way or the other. This draft was then submitted to both sides. I was there for part of the discussion but not for all of it. Several changes were made in the draft which was prepared by my deputy minister, Dr. Haythorne.

One significant change which I remember very clearly was this. If you look at Hansard for July 8, page 7436, the 12 points on which agreement had been reached are enumerated there. Then appears this paragraph:

> The agreements terminating on December 31, 1965, shall be amended by incorporating therein the terms of settlement set out above—

Those are the old agreements which expired last year.

> —and these amended agreements—

The agreements amended by the terms of settlement to which I have referred.

> —shall remain in effect until December 31, 1967, unless amended by negotiations—

Then I actually said: "What about the binding legislation? There is no reference to that and that has clearly been understood." Therefore, the words "or otherwise" which appear in the seventh last line on that page were inserted to cover that situation; there is not the slightest question about that. Mr. Cutler himself discussed the words with me, as did Mr. Pathy representing the I.L.A. Judge Lippe and my deputy minister were there and they took part in discussing whether better words might be used.

Mr. Douglas: They were delightfully uninformative.

Mr. Nicholson: I will tell you why, just to be clear on this for my hon. friend. The Longshoremen's Association had taken the position that they did not want to commit themselves to something that had binding legislation in it. But it was definitely understood that the words "or otherwise" covered that situation, and that was the purpose of putting them in. Whether it was done by agreement or by legislation, that covered it. The only other way you can change a binding agreement, except by agreement, is by legislation; there is not the slightest question about that. I am sure that if Mr. Cutler, Mr. Pathy or the others were questioned about this they would confirm that that was the situation.

When I announced the settlement in the house on the afternoon of that day, I said that an industrial commission would be established and that I would have more to say on that subject after the commission was established. It has since been suggested in this house by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that I should have advised the house at that time that the government intended to introduce legislation along the lines of the present bill. I had a statement to this effect prepared. Originally such a statement was included in the notes that I subsequently used in the house.

As a matter of courtesy and fair dealing I showed it to the legal adviser for the Longshoremen's Association. He said: "I hope, Mr. Minister, that you will not have to refer to binding legislation when speaking in the house because, acting for the longshoremen, my clients should have an opportunity to explain the settlement to their members and they might get a mistaken idea if you make reference to the legislation aspect in the house." I amended the notes accordingly, and I believe that the paper that went to the Hansard office will show that. That seemed to be a reasonable request from Mr. Cutler, and I complied with it.

Mr. Douglas: Before the minister leaves that point, may I ask him whether the same considerations applied when the minister was making the announcement of the commission itself?

Mr. Nicholson: I think that all I did at that time was to table the document, knowing that I expected to introduce the bill within a day or two. I just tabled the document and, as I recall, made no statement.

It is the considered view of the government that the passage of this legislation at this time is both advisable and necessary in order to fulfil the undertaking which we, with the knowledge though perhaps not with the actual consent of the unions, gave to the federation.

The new pay rates provided for in this agreement, namely, the extra 40 cents an hour and the retroactive features, are now in effect. I can assure members of the house, if they need any further assurance, that there would have been no settlement without such an undertaking and there would have been no return to work. We were prepared to leave the matter in the hands of parliament, with a strong recommendation to be made in the light of the history I have recited.

The government believes that its commitment should be fulfilled at this time and not later. It should be done now when the matter is fresh in the minds of those who participated in the final discussions. It should not be done some months from now.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a letter which I received from Mr. Cutler, whom I met frequently in the course of these negotiations. I found Mr. Cutler co-operative. He wrote me a letter dated June 20 which is of some significance because it includes the legal opinion he had given to his clients, which opinion was addressed to Mr. Tremblay, vice president of the International Longshoremen's Association.

When I received that letter I wrote the letter to Mr. Cutler appearing on page 7438 of Hansard. I shall read that:

Dear Mr. Cutler:

I received your letter of June 20 and appreciate your action in forwarding a copy of your letter of June 16 to Mr. Gerard Tremblay, Vice President of the Atlantic coast district of the International Longshoremen's Association.

In order to clear up any possible misunderstanding with respect to the settlement reached on June 14 between the International Longshoremen's Association locals in Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec and The Shipping Federation of Canada, there are a few observations which I would like to make on your letter to Mr. Tremblay.

During our discussions on June 13 and 14 and previously on June 11 and 12, both Mr. Pickersgill, who was the Acting Prime Minister in Mr. Pearson's absence over the week end, and I stated that, provided the parties reached agreement on all of the other items in dispute, the government was prepared to establish an industrial inquiry commission to carry out an independent and objective study of problems in connection with improvements in productivity, job security and related matters, and to take steps to have the conclusions reached as a result of this independent industiral inquiry commission implemented by legislative enactment.

You will recall that the same commitment was made by the Prime Minister during the meetings held in his office on the night of June 13.

This commitment was directly associated throughout our discussions with the wage settlement for both 1966 and 1967 which, as you know, was only accepted by The Shipping Federation of Canada on the strength of this commitment.

I do not think I need read the rest of the letter.

After that letter was written I received a message from Mr. Cutler suggesting that the terms of reference of the industrial inquiry commission which I had filed in the house were not clear enough, that provision had not been made for job security for some people who may have worked less than enough time to give them certain sick benefits that are referred to under the collective agreement. Mr. Cutler, I think properly, complained to me and to my department that the terms were ambiguous and should be cleared up.

I said: "If there is any ambiguity about them, they will be cleared up, because I told you positively that the terms would include job security for all bona fide union longshoremen, whether they have worked 300 hours or 1,000 hours." I recall that I used the expression to him that people with arthritic backs might come to work for three or four hours a day or for three shifts a week. I said that we were prepared to leave problems such as these to the industrial inquiry commissioner to decide, and that if there was any doubt about the terms of the commission we would clarify them. When I spoke to Mr. Cutler on the telephone he said that he had received the letter and that there was no misunderstanding with regard to its contents.

On June 30 the Prime Minister and I received telegrams, copies of which appear on pages 7439 and 7440 of Hansard. I do not need to refer to those telegrams in detail because they can be found in that part of Hansard to which reference has already been made. In this connection I wish to direct hon. members' attention to pages 7440 and 7441 of Hansard. I repeated exactly the same thing in those telegrams.

The Prime Minister sent a telegram shortly after I did saying he was familiar with the contents of my telegram and referring to this memorandum that I have read out today. I shall read the Prime Minister's words, and I quote from page 7442 of Hansard:

> Referring your telegram to me of today's date in which you refer to your wire to Minister of Labour I have seen his telegram in reply. My own knowledge of the facts fully confirms this reply.

This refers to the statement that finally the matter would be made binding by legislation which was read to the longshoremen or their lawyers in Mr. Jodoin's presence late on the night of June 13 and the early morning of June 14.

The bill now before the house, Mr. Speaker, is short. It speaks for itself. On behalf of the government and in light of the facts as I have related them, I would ask for its early passage.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) in his concluding remarks said that the commitment should be fulfilled. The obvious question arising in one's mind is, to whom? I shall have something to say about that later.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I must confess I felt somewhat sorry for the Minister of Labour because he has had to relive the events he has spoken of. He had to tread that tortuous path of events again not only on Monday last but also today for almost two hours. I also felt sorry for him as he wound his way through the gamut of discussions, meetings, luncheons and dinners. The disappointing part is that he eventually came to a point of inconclusion because in presenting this bill he admits that all the matters in dispute between the shipping companies and the I.L.A. were not dealt with. Today we are being asked to deal with Bill C-215 to complete the dealings between the two parties to the dispute, the shipping companies and the I.L.A.

There are two parts to the preamble to the bill and the first paragraph contains the following:

> —it was recommended that an industrial inquiry commission be appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to inquire into certain matters on which agreement was not reached and to report its conclusions thereon to the Minister of Labour at the earliest possible date;

I can agree with that. In fact, no one in the house would be in disagreement with it. But the second part of the preamble reads:

> And whereas an industrial inquiry commission to inquire into those certain matters has been appointed under the said act, and it is in the national interest that the conclusions of the said commission with respect thereto be carried into effect without delay following receipt of the report of the said commission, by the incorporation of those conclusions in the terms of settlement that were entered into following the settlement of the other issues involved in the dispute and in any collective agreements entered into pursuant to those terms of settlement;

The second part of the preamble is nothing else but compulsory arbitration, and compulsory arbitration in its most extreme form. Not only are the terms binding on both parties but they are to be imposed before knowing what they are. Today parliament is being asked to impose upon labour and management conditions which have not yet been decided upon or revealed.

I ask myself, what has happened to this government, a government which until recently on every occasion hid its activity in respect of this matter behind the curtain of the principle of free collective bargaining? I am not going to set out the events as my colleague from Halifax will do that, but when the government was asked questions time and again during the question period respecting the progress of the dispute and the activity of the Minister of Labour, it maintained that it believed in the principle of free collective bargaining. Yet today we are being asked to pass a bill to impose the conclusions of a commission of inquiry upon labour and management, and make those conditions part of a collective agreement even before they have been reached. In my opinion this represents a total breakdown of the machinery of collective bargaining.

Mr. Starr: In its defence the government says that this is necessary, but I say to the government that no legislation is necessary at this point at all. A commissioner can be appointed. No one will object to that. The commissioner can go to work and eventually, upon hearing both sides and investigating the situation completely, he can make a report to the Minister of Labour who in turn should refer that report to the interested parties as a basis for collective bargaining.

Today the government is not following the collective bargaining procedure. It has abandoned the principle which it led us to believe it believed in. It has thrown that principle to the winds. Members of the government are saying that compulsory arbitration is now the order of the day in the settlement of disputes between management and labour. They are saying: This is what we want; we do not know what the recommendations will be but we want them rubberstamped before they are made and parliament will be that rubber stamp.

This legislation is based on assumption. The government is assuming that the recommendations will be acceptable to both parties. What will be the situation if the recommendations are not acceptable? Will that tend to a happy and harmonious situation between these two parties for the duration of the present agreement? This is almost prophetic legislation. We do not know what is going to be recommended but we are being asked to put unknown recommendations into effect.

I say that this approach makes a mockery out of parliament. It makes a mockery out of collective bargaining. What remedy would there be if an error were made in the recommendations? If this legislation is passed and a report is made to the minister, it then becomes law. How can it be changed? It will be fixed and unalterable and will require action by parliament to make even the slightest alteration, however beneficial it might be.

This is the kind of thing a government resorts to when it cannot cope with a situation, and this government has proven to be inept, indecisive and incompetent in matters of this kind. It has allowed such matters to drag on day after day, week after week, month after month, in this particular case for over a month, before acting, and it acted only when the tie-up of the ports was in danger of bringing about an economic crisis. Then and only then did the government proceed by way of concessions to both sides.

How did the government get management to accept the increased wage packet? I would say obviously by giving an assurance that an inquiry would be set up and that binding recommendations would be imposed regarding the work gangs and the loading and unloading operations. In fact, the Minister of Labour admits this. In this connection I quote from the remarks he made on Monday, July 11, as recorded at page 7523 of Hansard. They are interesting because I think this is the crux of the whole situation. He said:

> We left the morning meeting at about 1.30 p.m. to meet with the Shipping Federation with whom we spent several hours in the afternoon. They insisted—> —that an agreement must be reached for the reorganization of longshoremen's gangs, new types of slings and other changes that might result in increased productivity. Eventually they did agree that if the government would take the responsibility for setting up the commission and agree to pass legislation, they would acquiesce in such a course and would agree to the second payment of 40 cents in 1967; 15 cents were paid on January 1 and 25 cents later in the year when the recommendations of the commission were implemented.

The Shipping Federation.

• (4:50 p.m.)

This was the deal; this was the basis upon which this government then proceeded. What was the reaction? The Minister of Labour in his statement the other day said the reaction was not one of acceptance. He said that the unions then stated they could not go along with the proposal for this commission. If the government wishes to establish the commission it can. They have no power to stop the government setting up a commission. In his statement on Monday last, at page 7523 of Hansard, the minister said:

> There were further discussions in the afternoon during which there was no doubt as to their acquiescence to certain aspects of the proposal.

What aspects of the proposal?

> —the president of the Canadian Labour Congress said again that the Congress was opposed to compulsory arbitration and that he wanted to make it clear.

Mr. Cutler, according to the Minister of Labour, said that if the government does set up a commission and if the government is prepared to take the responsibility of making findings, "we will obey the law". Why not? The representatives of Canadian unions certainly obey the law. What else can they do if this government forces compulsory arbitration? If it becomes law the members of the union, who are good Canadians, will obey the law. That does not mean they acquiesce in the procedure now being taken by this House of Commons.

I say that all the statements which have been cited by the Minister of Labour as having been made by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress and the representatives of the I.L.A. are emphatic statements of opposition to compulsory arbitration. In view of these emphatic statements, was it not obvious at that time and is it not obvious now to the government that compulsory arbitration was not and is not acceptable? Yet the government goes ahead because of a commitment to the shipping companies. Why is parliament today asked to impose compulsory arbitration and buy a pig in a poke, to use the words of the Minister of Labour?

We of this party always have been against compulsory arbitration and in this particular instance we will oppose this legislation and vote against it. This is a last resort against the will of the unions who want to protect collective bargaining. This matter can be settled under the collective bargaining procedure. This is a serious mistake. I should like to repeat what I said earlier. The commission should be set up and the commissioner should make his inquiry. He should make his recommendations and the Minister of Labour could then take the recommendations and submit them to the parties. Then the two parties could study the report in an effort to ascertain whether or not it provided a basis for agreement.

As I said, under those circumstances there was no need for this legislation. This bill sets a very dangerous precedent. It says to management and to labour: This is it; we, the government, will legislate for you regardless of your wishes because we know best how these matters can be settled. This matter should be dealt with when the contents of the report are known and the recommendations have been made public and not before.

I say to the minister and to the government that this matter should be reconsidered. The government should not jeopardize the position of free collective bargaining, something which they have said they stand for. Now they have thrown it overboard. They should reconsider their position. A commission should be established, a report made, that report should then be the basis for collective bargaining between the two parties much in the way a conciliation board report is. There should be an opportunity for free collective bargaining and not compulsory arbitration regardless of what the recommendations are.

What if the recommendations are not agreeable to the Minister of Labour himself? What if they are contrary to the things we stand for? How can you impose upon management and labour the conditions in a report? They might not agree and would have to pay for it for the balance of the life of the agreement. I say to the government that they are doing a very dangerous thing in introducing this bill. They are setting a bad precedent. They ought to reconsider this matter and withdraw the bill. They should set up a commission which would make its recommendations and submit them to the two parties as a basis for collective bargaining procedure.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to begin my remarks on this occasion by expressing my appreciation of the very clear and able presentation of the case which the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has made. I suggest to the minister that the hon. member for Ontario placed the case before him in a reasoned and restrained way, as I too hope to try to do. I should like to join him in his request that the minister and the government reconsider their insistence on this legislation being placed before us.

I appreciate fully the difficulties which the minister had in this very important struggle on the waterfronts of Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières. I do so because, as hon. members know, I have had many years experience in a professional capacity in labour relations. Indeed, I have acted for many unions in Ontario and throughout Canada. I have acted also for locals of the International Longshoremen's Association in Toronto and Hamilton. I have had no dealings with locals in the province of Quebec but I have acted, as I said, for Ontario locals.

Therefore I appreciate fully that the parties are perhaps not the most flexible in labour negotiations. I can understand that on many occasions during the many weeks of strike the minister and his colleagues, like all of us in this house, felt rather desperate about the developing situation. I say to him, however, that the bill he has proposed is totally unjustified. It is an evil yielding to the pressure of one side in the dispute. It is giving in to the Shipping Federation which is a rather tough outfit. It is legislation forced on the government by the Shipping Federation, and if it is legislation which the government really supports in principle, then this government stands condemned in the annals of labour history in this country.

I say to the minister that the legislation is wrong in principle. I say to him that it perverts the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act under which he appointed the commissioner of inquiry. I say to him it is also recklessly premature. It is an indication of weakness on the part of the minister and the government and is a shameful abdication of their responsibility to the labour movement of Canada.

Throughout his feeble defence of this bill the minister has been trying to place the responsibility for it in part on his contention that the union, if it did not actually agree, may have acquiesced and that if it did not actually acquiesce it at least knew it was coming. I say to him that in spite of his words, and I am not for one moment questioning his veracity or honesty, the record, as contained in the documents which he filed and which are appended to Hansard of Friday, July 8, 1966, shows that the union categorically denies any approval of binding arbitration and has insisted that the minister cannot use the pretence that the union approved as a defence for his action. That fact is stated in the letter which the minister quoted from Mr. Cutler to Mr. Tremblay. It was also stated in the telegrams which have been tabled and form part of the appendix. I do not wish to take the time to read them; they are on record. I challenge the minister to show me in any communication from Mr. Cutler to him or to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that has been tabled or appended to Hansard one word of acquiescence or agreement to binding arbitration legislation.

I continually asked the minister to table these documents, but I must say I got fed up asking. There is another document in the minister's possession which he ought to have tabled. I refer to the telegram from the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Claude Jodoin, dated July 8, 1966 to the minister, a copy of which Mr. Jodoin sent me. The telegram reads as follows:

> Following telegram sent today to labour minister Nicholson quote answer your telegram July 7, at no time was there any agreement by the I.L.A. in my presence nor by myself on behalf of the C.L.C. to compulsory or binding arbitration. I regret to have to disagree with your account of the discussions. References to an inquiry were to an investigation which would look into the situation with a view to possibly making suggestions which might be considered by the parties. It was the position of I.L.A. that such consideration would have to take place in the next negotiations. If compulsory legislation is introduced it will clearly be the responsibility of the government and in no sense can be attributed to any agreement made by the union.
> Claude Jodoin President C.L.C.

Any one of us who have had any experience in labour negotiations—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question for the purpose of clarification? Is it not correct that he received that telegram after the documents were tabled on July 8? I am sure he does not want to leave the impression that the minister deliberately did not table that document. A copy of it was sent to me and it reached me well after the other documents were tabled.

Mr. Lewis: The Minister of Transport is quite right. I received it after the documents were tabled. I am not accusing the Minister of Labour of hiding anything. But several days have passed since July 8 on any one of which he could have tabled this document. Surely it is not necessary, in respect of such an important matter, for us on this side of the house to keep pulling documents from him one by one. I was on the verge of asking him to table it on several occasions but I said to myself: No, I will wait and read it into the record. The document was in his hands and he could have tabled it at some time since July 8. I became fed up trying to get these documents tabled.

Mr. Nicholson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did you not succeed in having a whole batch of documents tabled on just one occasion shortly after your request? You did not get them one by one.

Mr. Lewis: If the minister wants to go into this subject, let me remind him that I asked him for correspondence between the union and himself, between the union and the Prime Minister and between the congress and the minister. I then asked him whether he would table the aide-mémoire to which he referred today. I asked for this correspondence on several occasions, in fact, so often that I reached the end of my tether.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the hon. member not agree that within two minutes of the time of his request I tabled all the correspondence which now appears as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Lewis: I have no intention of attacking the integrity of the minister. He did file this correspondence, but in doing so he failed in a minor way in his duty in not tabling the telegram from Mr. Jodoin. I merely point that out, and that is as far as I wish to go.

In any case I suggest to the minister that in spite of his explanation I, as one member of many in this house, was misled by him, inadvertently no doubt, as to what his intentions were. At no time until he actually introduced this bill did he suggest what was in his mind with regard to compulsory arbitration.

Let me refer to the statement of the Prime Minister made on June 9 in answer to a question asked by my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). This is recorded in Hansard for that date at page 6173. The Prime Minister said:

> Contrary to what the hon. member has suggested, and to what was suggested in the press release I have received from the New Democratic Party to the effect that there is no hope of an early breakthrough, there is hope of success in the negotiations.
> We have not given up that hope. Judge Lippé is negotiating at this moment; we have been in touch with him during the last hour and we have not by any means given up hope that this serious issue will be settled very shortly by the processes of free collective bargaining and not by parliamentary direction.

If one reads the minister's statement of June 14 he will see that the minister made no reference to what Judge Lippé said or what Mr. Cutler suggested. His statement made it quite clear that the commissioner of inquiry to be appointed was to be appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If my memory serves me correctly, he used those very words. One does not have to be a labour expert to know that a commissioner appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act does not make binding recommendations but that he makes recommendations for the parties to consider.

When the minister appointed a commissioner under the provisions of that act, whether he intended it or not he misled this house and the labour movement. He may not have intended to do that, but the objective result was that he misled all of us as to what this commissioner of inquiry would do.

When the minister tabled the document appointing the commissioner on June 23—this is to be found on page 6785 of Hansard—he made a short statement to the effect that he was tabling the document appointing the commissioner. He could have indicated his intention, at that time, but he did not.

I apparently have mislaid the order in council appointing the commissioner but I venture to rely on my memory and state that the preamble to the appointment referred to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, indicating clearly that the commissioner of inquiry was being appointed pursuant to that act. I repeat again that any commissioner appointed pursuant to that act is a person who makes recommendations for the consideration of the parties, and he is not a final and binding arbitrator. Nor, I suggest to the minister, can he hang this legislation around Judge Lippé's neck. I appreciate that in his presentation today the minister seemed to suggest—I did not hear exactly what he said—that verbally Judge Lippé suggested that the findings of the commission be final and binding. But it is a most interesting coincidence that the date of Judge Lippé's report, which was tabled, is June 23, 1966, precisely the date on which the minister appointed the commissioner of inquiry under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act without saying anything about making his conclusions final and binding.

What has happened in this case, I suggest to the minister with the greatest respect, is that two things were being presented by the government and by Judge Lippé and, whether deliberately or otherwise, the two things have been scrambled in their presentation to this house. One, an entirely separate thing that was presented to the parties and was discussed, was the appointment of a commission of inquiry under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act for the purpose of inquiring into the question of productivity and making recommendations thereon. Everybody on both sides of the quarrel knew that this was not a mandatory thing, that the recommendations are not obligatory, not compulsory, but that on the contrary they are voluntarily put before the parties for their consideration.

Later in the game the Shipping Federation apparently said, "We will not give any increase in the second year unless we have this improvement in productivity and therefore you must tell us that you will make mandatory the results of the commissioner's findings. Otherwise we will not play the game." The minister and the government said, "O.K., boys; if that is your wish we will do it for you."

That undertaking, that promise to the Shipping Federation, need not necessarily have anything to do with the appointment of a commissioner of inquiry. Time and time again the minister in his statement said, "The union said they would co-operate with a commissioner of inquiry." Of course they would. Why wouldn't they? The fact is that they refused at first but finally they said, "All right, we will co-operate." Indeed, you cannot have a commission of inquiry looking into anything unless the union co-operates; otherwise the commission of inquiry is not worth a hoot in hades. You cannot have a commission of inquiry looking into the size of gangs and what the union members do unless the union is there, brings witnesses and presents its case. Until such time as you get the union to co-operate, the appointment of a commissioner is, of course, an entirely useless act. So they were finally persuaded to co-operate with the commissioner.

Time and time again—I repeat this because it is important—whether deliberately or not the minister scrambles up the perfectly sensible appointment of a commissioner of inquiry to give the facts to the parties, in order that they may be able to discuss what they want to do about them, with the second fact which is entirely unrelated to it, namely, making the commissioner a compulsory arbitrator. And the minister places in the mouth of the union spokesman statements—I say this without intending any offence to him although perhaps I should not be so kind in view of the legislation that has been put before us—relating to the appointing of a commissioner and to binding arbitration as if they were both made in one sentence at the same time. He knows very well they were not. He knows very well that the reply to one had an entirely different context from the reply to the other.

Too many times have I seen fellow practitioners of mine in the courts and before boards doing precisely that, namely, adding together two parts of statements made at different times in different contexts and trying to make them one in order to give a certain image to the statement. Toward the end of my remarks I will come back to this matter, Mr. Speaker, because it is important in its relationship to the total situation.

We are opposed, as the minister has said on many occasions he is opposed, as the Prime Minister has said he is opposed, as the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) indicated when he interrupted me during some remarks I made on the labour estimates to express his criticism of a bill proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), and as the breast-beating by everybody on the Liberal side of the house has indicated—I am sure my hon. friend the minister of manpower is of this opinion—to compulsory arbitration and in favour of free collective bargaining. Yet the party across the aisle in this chamber brings in this sort of bill.

The hon. member for Ontario is entirely right when he says that this is the worst, the most evil kind of compulsory arbitration, because it is not imposing on people recommendations which have been made public, which the minister and the government have had a chance to study, which members of parliament have had a chance to look at, which the parties have had a chance to study. It is not imposing on them results which are known, which have been examined and about which people have an intelligent and studied opinion. It is asking this parliament to rubberstamp results before anyone knows anything about what they may be, including, may I add, the commissioner himself.

During his representations the other day the minister said, if I may put it this way—I am not quoting his exact words but I am sure he will remember this—that the Shipping Federation was ready to buy a pig in a poke. The Shipping Federation may have been but I do not see why this parliament should buy a pig in a poke—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: —or why this parliament should force the dockworkers to buy a pig in a poke. It is because of the general principles of free collective bargaining, about which all of us care so much, that we are opposed to the imposition of compulsory arbitration except in the most serious and obvious national crises. I will come back to that, too, toward the end of my remarks. I say to the minister—and this was covered in the bill proposed by the hon. member for Skeena—that he had two alternatives on June 13 and 14. He could either have decided to place on the statute books a law which would have put in force those items which the parties had already agreed upon—

Mr. Munro: What do you call that?

Mr. Lewis: You call that, I say to the hon. member for Hamilton East, legislation enshrining their agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question? Has the hon. gentleman any reason to believe that at the time that bill was introduced the parties had agreed on anything?

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the last part of the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman any grounds for believing that at the time the hon. member for Skeena proposed to introduce his bill the parties had agreed on anything?

Mr. Lewis: There are in the record, particularly in Judge Lippé's report, indications of an exchange about wages and the like which make it perfectly clear that when the counterproposal of the union came it had in the wage package precisely the same, 40 cents for 1966 and the 40 cents for 1967, that the Shipping Federation had proposed.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I am not splitting hairs, Mr. Speaker. I think it is of the utmost importance that they said "on condition that we have a reduction in the work gangs or an increase in productivity at least in the second year of the contract." Therefore I say to both ministers that at that point the government could have done one of two things. It could either have incorporated into legislation those points which had been agreed upon and left to final and binding arbitration the points about which management was concerned, or it could have introduced legislation that would be against the dock workers, and it is the latter alternative that was chosen. The government could have introduced a bill that would have put into operation the wages and other items that had been agreed upon and left the issues that were not agreed upon to the commissioner of inquiry. Instead, it is the issues which the union opposed that will be finally determined by the commissioner of inquiry. That is the simple fact of the situation.

My next serious objection, as I have indicated, is that the bill represents a distortion of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I say to the minister that from now on the labour movement in Canada will have every right to suspect the appointment of any commissioner of inquiry under the I.R.D.I. act. They will have the right to ask: Is this merely the first step toward another piece of legislation to impose on us compulsory arbitration?

I ask the minister, what is the hurry about this? The minister says we must do it now when this matter is fresh in everybody's mind. Why, Mr. Speaker? Surely, if I may say so, that is the silliest kind of argument. Whose minds should be clear about this and what is the rush about it? Why must we pass this legislation on July 14, 1966? Why can it not be passed six months from now? Why can the minister not wait for the recommendations of the commissioner of inquiry? The very worst that can happen is that the so-called improvements will not appear in 1967 but will appear in 1968. What does that mean? Will the members of the Shipping Federation go bankrupt? I happen to know they make enough profits to be able to carry the extra load of wages without endangering their existence and the existence of their associates. Our experience makes us doubt the good sense of what the minister is doing.

The other day I read a press release concerning the appointment of Dr. Laurent Picard as the commissioner of inquiry. I was interested in it because I wanted to see what experience this man had. Let me make it clear immediately that I know of no reason for attacking Dr. Picard. As far as I remember I have not met him and if I have I do not recall it. For all I know he is a very honourable man. However, the fact is that the press release issued by the Labour Department shows that Dr. Picard's background is solely in management.

Let me read the first two paragraphs of page 2 of the press release:

> Dr. Picard is associate director of Ecole des Hautes Etudes Commerciales, of the University of Montreal, and director of the business administration department. He is a member of the Quebec commission of teaching and advanced education, and president of the research commission on the shoe industry of the province of Quebec. He received his bachelor of applied science in physics from Laval University, and his doctorate in business administration from Harvard University.

Then, Mr. Speaker, please note this last paragraph:

> Dr. Picard has provided research and consultative services for several industries including the following: aluminum, printing, electronics, chemical products, railways, paper and wood product industries. He also has acted as a consultant to major Canadian and international companies.

It may be that Dr. Picard is fully qualified to make this inquiry and it may well be that he is an honest gentleman who will give it his most objective attention. I do not know. However, I say to the minister that if I were a member of the International Longshoremen's Association and learned of Dr. Picard's background I would be frightened stiff. I have had occasion to deal with these management consultants, these people who make time and motion studies, deal with work loads and all the rest of it. I have seen what they do. Surely the appointment of Dr. Picard by the minister is just as objectionable as if the minister had appointed the director of industrial engineering of the United Steelworkers of America who has had the same kind of experience on the opposite side of the fence. I think it is essential, if this parliament is to act responsibly and, I would add, democratically, that before we take any action to shove recommendations down the workers' throats we know what those recommendations are.

Indeed, I fully support the suggestions of the hon. member for Ontario and I say to the minister and to the government that there is no reason in the world for not waiting until the commissioner has brought down his recommendations. Those recommendations should be studied by the minister and then given to the parties for study in the hope that on their basis they will reach a settlement. If they cannot reach a settlement and the country is again faced with the possibility of another crippling strike, it will be time enough for the government and parliament to take any action they may consider necessary. To ask us to do this now seems to me to be asking us to carry out a commitment to the Shipping Federation which the minister made and for which he alone is responsible and not we, members of parliament, whether on this side of the house or the other.

Mr. Munro: Will the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member has agreed that at the time of the introduction of the bill advanced by his party there were items which were not settled and on which the parties were not in agreement. Does he not agree that by advancing that particular bill he would have denied the workers the right to withhold their labour with respect to those items that were not agreed to by both parties, which would be tantamount to compulsory arbitration?

Mr. Lewis: I do not agree with that, Mr. Speaker, any more than I would if the present bill were not before us. To answer the hon. member for Hamilton East, let me say that what has happened in this case when a commissioner was appointed but before the present bill was introduced was exactly what the bill of the hon. member for Skeena proposed, namely, that the points which had been agreed upon were to be put into legislatin and those which were not agreed upon were to be submitted to a commission of inquiry to investigate the matter within a certain time limit and I believe after 60 days the report was to be given to the parties on the basis of which they would negotiate. That procedure would have preserved the collective bargaining process on those issues which were still in dispute.

That is what I first thought the minister had done when he announced the appointment of a commissioner of inquiry. The parties had agreed upon the other points so legislation on them was not necessary. All of us were happy that those points would not need legislation and that the minister had appointed a commission of inquiry to enable the parties to negotiate the remaining issues in the dispute on the basis of the facts, the evidence and the conclusions submitted by the commissioner. That is what we thought the minister was going to do, but he did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member for Skeena sought leave of the house to introduce a bill but he was not given that leave. Personally I am quite sorry he was not. However, I wonder whether the hon. member would object to allowing the hon. member for York South to communicate the terms of the proposed bill to us, in view of the statement made by the hon. member for York South, so that all of us could be made aware of what is in dispute?

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Let me say first, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to do so because I have not the time. The hon. member for Skeena will speak. He can do what he likes about his bill. No doubt he delights in enlightening the Minister of Transport and I have no doubt he will indulge in his delight today. I have answered the questions and interruptions as best I could, but let me say this: No amount of pointing at any bill we sought to introduce can divert attention from what the government is doing now. If that is their intention, I say to the minister and hon. members opposite that they will fail.

Before my time expires, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, for the reasons I have indicated, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Fawcett):

That Bill C-215 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on labour and employment.

May I summarize my reasons for moving this amendment. The first reason, to which I have not yet alluded, is that I am sorry to have to inform the Minister of Labour that I have had long conversations with Mr. Cutler, whom I have known for many years, and I have had some conversations with Mr. Jodoin, and those gentlemen, with whom I have taken up the precise statements made by the minister in this house, do not recall what transpired in precisely the same way as the minister does. This is nothing new. If anyone has been in negotiations, whether labour or any other negotiations, and has tried to remember what he said and I said and he said out of context, one invariably gets a one-sided picture.

Since the minister has had an opportunity on the floor of this house to place his version of what transpired before the public I feel that the union ought to have an opportunity, as well as the Shipping Federation if it likes, to place before parliament, through the committee on labour and employment, their version of what transpired. This is the first reason for moving this amendment.

The second reason for moving this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is that we as a parliament ought to know not merely that there was an argument over productivity and the size of gangs but also what the Shipping Federation on one side and the union on the other side thought about these issues. We ought to know as a parliament, before we vote on this bill, precisely the nature of the disagreement between the parties. Knowing merely the title of the disagreement is surely not enough. We ought to know what the disagreement is about. Is it about the numbers in a gang? Is it the number who go into the hold or the number who are on deck or the number who work in the shed? What is it about which the parties are in disagreement? Is it the work load or the various kinds of cargo, ordinary cargo, noxious cargo and all the other kinds of cargo about which I know from experience they argue?

We ought to know precisely what they are disagreeing about before we vote on the bill before us. This procedure would give the union and the Shipping Federation an opportunity in the next two or three months to live with the agreement they now have and to see whether the relationship between them cannot be improved in the meantime or whether an increase in productivity can come about merely by an effort of the men, if they should be called upon to put forth more effort. Above all, this procedure will give an opportunity to the commission of inquiry to begin its investigation and to start indicating what the evidence is and what the conclusions may be. These are my reasons for moving the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question now before the house is of the utmost interest to me, and if we agreed on the facts, I would have made or would have been happy to make both the speech of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and the speech of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) because I think we share the same convictions. Not only do I share them intellectually, but for 20 years of my life I have fought binding arbitration and I was even responsible, to a large extent, I feel, for the elimination of such binding arbitration in many areas of industry, commerce, and services in the province of Quebec.

Therefore, I do not intend to question anyone's motives; besides that is not my purpose. Let us say only that I do not see the facts exactly as they are described to me.

Like the hon. member for York South and even the hon. member for Ontario, I have some experience in the field of negotiations, and if every negotiation I was involved in were brought before the house under the same conditions as this one, we would get very funny situations, because in one case, for instance, the employer did not want the Rand formula. He was opposed in principle to the Rand formula. But as he wanted to end the strike, he said: If we set up between ourselves an arbitration board and if that arbitration is compulsory, I am ready to submit the matter right away and you can choose the other members if you want. In other words, the employer found a formula to make himself accept something which he would not have accepted spontaneously.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen collective agreements signed because a government has enacted legislation, such as an order by the Minimum Wages Commission or an order under the Labour Collective Agreements Act. Of course, all this was not included in the agreement itself. That was part of the interplay of forces behind the dispute which had been settled by the labour collective agreement.

Now, there has been reference to binding arbitration. It is a fact that the basis of our system is the will of the parties, that is what the parties are willing to accept. That is why the labour collective agreement is said to be basically—and it must remain so—the will of the parties. Otherwise, you are no longer working under a free bargaining system but under a state intervention system.

Mr. Speaker, I think we must maintain the principle. Binding arbitration has existed and still exists. It is not an absolute principle. It is not a principle which cannot be waived; the parties themselves waive it in many circumstances.

In collective agreements, there may be arbitration not only on the interpretation and violation of the collective agreement, but also on conflicts of interests which can occur during the collective agreement. That exists. The parties' will is then respected. Binding arbitration exists by virtue of our provincial and even our federal legislation. Under the federal legislation on industrial relations, collective agreements must contain a clause providing for the settlement of grievances compulsorily or by an arbitration during the collective agreement. Binding arbitration is a principle which is often waived in the field of labour.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Ontario who said that the worse intervention that could be made in the field of collective agreement was an intervention like the one contained in Bill C-215. The worse intervention that can be made—I beg your pardon—

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister—

Mr. Marchand: You repeated that too.

Mr. Lewis: I just wanted to ask the minister a question. This is true bilingualism. The minister speaks French and I understand him, and if I speak English he will understand me. Is he suggesting that the compulsory arbitration of issues under negotiation is the same kind of thing as the compulsory arbitration of differences about the meaning of a contract?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: The hon. member for York South knows very well that I did not say that, but the opposite. I said: In the federal legislation on labour relations as well as in the provincial legislation there are provisions which make it compulsory to submit to arbitration the grievances resulting from the interpretation and violation of a collective agreement. I said that was one of the exceptions to the general principle of non-binding arbitration. They are conflicts over rights and not interests. However, it also happens that conflicts of interests are submitted to an arbitration board by agreement of the parties. There is no doubt that the parties wish it. All I want to prove in that we are not faced with an unchanging principle. Let us say that it is a principle which is applied differently at various times. It is, if you wish, arbitration which can be voluntarily binding—

Mr. Lewis: It is voluntary arbitration.

Mr. Marchand: Yes, yes, voluntarily binding arbitration.

Mr. Lewis: No, no, voluntary arbitration.

Mr. Marchand: In any case, I just wanted to underline the fact that it was not something new, something that had never happened: binding arbitration does exist.

When the hon. member for Ontario says that the worst intervention that can happen in this field is an intervention such as the one provided for in Bill C-215, I do not agree with him, Mr. Speaker. The worst intervention that can happen is the one which was indirectly suggested by the Leader of the Opposition when, to settle the longshoremen's strike in Montreal, he referred to the settlement of the railway strike, as it had been imposed by the Canadian Parliament. That is the most direct settlement, the one which compels the parties the most because they are not there.

At the present time, the parties are represented before the arbitration board. They can submit their case to the judge. If we decide on the settlement, as it was partially decided by the bill of our friend from Skeena (Mr. Howard), to the extent to which it was decided under the authority of Parliament, it is the worst kind of intervention because it is an intervention which does not leave any resort.

If we have to talk about interventions, or to graduate them, the worst is the direct intervention of Parliament which imposes a settlement on the parties. The second, is to impose binding arbitration, it is less serious. It may be open to question but, to my mind, it leaves some latitude to the parties to discuss their terms before a referee which can be impartial or who must be impartial, at least, under the act.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the only question which requires elucidation in the conflict, and I am speaking of the debate in the house, is to what extent the parties agreed to having this measure brought before the house. That is the only point which interests me. With regard to binding arbitration, attempts can be made to frighten me; I can be told that that procedure would destroy the will of the parties; I would agree. That would pose no problem, as far as I am concerned. Only, if it is proved that the parties wanted this bill, things to be done that way, whether they said so officially or not, so that events might occur as they did, then I feel parliament should respect their wishes, provided in so doing we are not asked to do anything illegal or immoral. We will thus be helping society as a whole. That is the only point which needs clearing up.

The rest, to my mind, is of absolutely no importance. If, some day, we have a serious dispute, and the parties ask parliament to legislate with a view to facilitating its solution without creating a dangerous precedent, I really do not see why we should not do it, especially if society as a whole were to benefit thereby. It would not be a matter of principle, as some would have us believe here. As we say, rather poetically, one swallow does not a summer make. One special act to solve one particular problem does not mean that binding arbitration has just been forced upon Canada. That would really be carrying things too far. The problem is already complicated enough.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will comment on the point that to my mind is fundamental. Now, we will come up against a difficult situation because it is a matter of good faith: to know whom to believe and whom to disbelieve. It is at this level that the debate should take place if we really want to know the truth. On this side of the house we all agree not to impose compulsory arbitration, and I am the first one to be against it. But that is not the question here. We want to know whether the parties, when they reached an agreement, have accepted, directly or indirectly, that this thing should be done as a condition of the settlement. That is the only problem, there is no other.

Then I try objectively to look for some clue in the documents tabled in this house. I have, let us say, two serious clues. As everybody knows, I was not there—like the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Ontario, I was not involved at all in the negotiations—and I try to rely on the documents I have. There are things which are very clear in my mind—

[English]

Mr. McCleave: You should have been there.

Mr. Marchand: I am not Minister of Labour. We already have a very good Minister of Labour. I do not know why we should have two.

Mr. Starr: What about the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill)? Why was he there?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: They were special advisers, Mr. Speaker, and one thing seems quite clear to me.

If we want to throw light on the matter before us instead of merely stirring up trouble, I must say that one thing strikes me and it is that the I.L.A. was bent on rejecting the principle of arbitration. It seems logical to me throughout, that is the association, either directly or through its lawyers or the president of the C.L.C., always maintained its stand against the principle of binding arbitration, saying that it did not want binding arbitration and much preferred that the government would not legislate.

That seems quite clear to me. Are the terms they accepted inconsistent with that stand? Not at all, in my opinion. How can I be sure that at a given time, the I.L.A., through the president of the C.L.C. or its lawyers, asked the government to assume its responsibilities? We do not want to assume it. We know it was a condition to have the employers sign the agreement. We know that is part of the general settlement without being included in the agreement.

I feel there is strong evidence to that effect, that is, when the Minister of Labour wrote to Mr. Cutler to tell him what went on, he said, and I quote from the English text:

Labour Conditions

• (5:50 p.m.)

I quote from page 7440 of Hansard:

It is a fact that the International Longshoremen's Association made it clear during final stages of the negotiations that it was not requesting the establishment of an industrial inquiry commission or that legislation be introduced in this respect but Mr. Cutler did assure me and my cabinet colleagues in presence of union officials that the International Longshoremen's Association would co-operate with the industrial inquiry commission which we stated would be established and that should legislation be introduced by government providing for the implementation of the conclusions of such commission through legislative enactment your clients the International Longshoremen's Association, though they would not support the legislation, would obey the law and that he as counsel for the association would so advise them.

Mr. Lewis: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Marchand: Wait a minute. Let me finish. I gave you every chance and did not intervene at all.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The minister is getting excited. He is on shaky ground.

Mr. Marchand: Of course we are on shaky ground, not with respect to binding arbitration but on these statements that have been made.

[Translation]

Then, instead of taking a firm stand, Mr. Cutler simply says: We disagree with the principles of binding arbitration. He does not say: If there is legislation and if you do not assure us there will not be any legislation, we shall not sign the collective agreement. On the contrary, he took a different attitude, by simply saying: We refuse to have anything to do with the legislation itself.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: Oh, really?

Mr. Marchand: It is there. It is there.

[Translation]

And if you want to know—there is no use laughing, for it is something serious, Mr. Speaker—why it is, and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), as a lawyer, will know why the word "otherwise" was added in the amending section to the collective agreement—and it is the only example I know of in Canada. Has he tried to explain this particular circumstances? Can the agreement be normally amended otherwise than by the will of the parties?

[Mr. Marchand.]

[English]

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question? Would he also permit me to answer something he raised in the midst of his speech? If he permits it, I shall do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I cannot allow the hon. member to answer a question. It is a rhetorical question, I take it, made in the course of the minister's speech.

Mr. Lewis: I thought Your Honour would make that ruling and that is why I asked if the minister would permit a question. The question is very simple, and it relates to the amendment.

The minister has heard his colleagues inform him as to what happened. Did the minister take the trouble to talk to Mr. Cutler to see him, or to find out what is the explanation of how the words "or otherwise" got into that statement? Did he do that, before asking parliament to vote on the kind of thing he is now asking us to vote on? I did. I spoke to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, this paragraph—I read it very badly a while ago and somewhat quickly, I am sorry, but you had it before you and you could follow—indicates that Mr. Cutler did not succeed or did not try, in subsequent letters, to deny the contents of the letter from the Minister of Labour; that Mr. Cutler, who knew that the word "otherwise" was very important as to the understanding of the conflict, and spent his time sending telegrams to clarify its meaning, did not consider enlightening us on that point and it was left to the hon. member for York South to tell us that he had received a telephone call explaining it. I think there is something wrong. For, if it were of such importance, Mr. Cutler himself should have sent a document to explain to us how the word "otherwise" had appeared in a collective agreement.

As for me, I know of only two ways to amend a collective agreement: either through the will of the parties or through legislation, unless the agreement itself involves illegalities which make it automatically void. Apart from that, I know of no other way.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister, for whom I have the greatest respect, permit me to ask this question? Do the words say "by agreement of the parties or otherwise" or do the words say "by negotiation or otherwise"?

Mr. Marchand: "By negotiation or otherwise".

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether it is not entirely possible that the union received an explanation that what the words "or otherwise" referred to were the recommendations of the commissioner of inquiry which the parties would be considering after they came down?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, this point was raised in a letter from the Minister of Labour to Mr. Cutler. It was raised and it is an essential point, it is even the basic point. By some acrobatics, an attempt may be made to have us believe that we are discussing compulsory arbitration, which is not the case. We are trying to find out if there was an acceptance by the parties, in circumstances approximating those I mentioned a while ago. That is the problem.

And a basic argument is brought forward by the Minister of Labour. It was even explained very clearly. However, they did not even take the trouble to reply to the Minister of Labour on that point.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I am really not trying to be an obstructionist. Would the minister be good enough to read the second last paragraph in the right hand colum on page 7441 of Hansard? I refer to the appendix containing the exchange of correspondence? It reads as follows:

> The I.L.A. locals reiterate their position that any inquiry the government chooses to institute despite I.L.A. opposition should be the basis for voluntary negotiations for the next collective agreement since to do otherwise would be creating the dangerous precedent of disrupting the relationship between management and labour during the life of a collective agreement.

I ask the minister, is that not answer enough to the minister's and the Prime Minister's statements as to the I.L.A. position?

• (6:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I do not know who signs this letter. Anyway, it does not explain the word "otherwise". The International Longshoremen's Association has been logical throughout on the principle of compulsory arbitration. It has stuck to its views till the end. I do not deny this. I think the Canadian Labour Congress kept its opinions, though this could have been made a little clearer in the telegram sent by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress. This telegram is a simple declaration of principle which is against compulsory arbitration. It does not necessarily mean that he was against arbitration as proposed under the circumstances which we know. Anyhow, I do not in any way blame the International Longshoremen's Association. I think it negotiated well, obtained a very good work contract, and was justified in doing what it did, if it did it. Therefore I do not blame it. On the contrary, I think the association acted and negotiated well, and that I could very easily have behaved in the same way under the same circumstances, and been very honest toward the workers and the principles in which I believe.

There is no contradiction in all this. The only problem which should be clarified and has not been clarified by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) or the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), is this: whether the Shipping Federation has agreed to sign a collective agreement knowing that the government would pass this bill, the representatives of the longshoremen being fully aware of the facts and, even if they were at first opposed to compulsory arbitration, letting things happen provided Parliament alone assumed the responsibility for the measure. The Canadian Labour Congress would apparently have adopted the same attitude.

This is how I see the situation. I may be wrong, and if you want me to change my mind, I am ready to do so but you show me my view is wrong.

The question here is not to talk about compulsory arbitration. I am as convinced as you are on this point. Rather, we should find out whether, at the bottom of all this, there was a tacit, official, direct or indirect agreement leading to the present events. If there was no agreement, abstention or lack of opposition of this sort when there should have been, I am sorry, but we must respect the situation as being willed by the parties. This is how I see it, and I shall vote for this bill because it has not been established that the facts which I have just mentioned are true.

Debating the principle of compulsory arbitration during the debate on this bill, Mr.

Speaker, is tantamount to displacing the problem.

I am very sorry, but I shall have to be convinced; parties can agree on many things between themselves. I have done it myself 15, 20 times. All labour representatives have done it; the hon. member for York South has probably done it hundreds of times in small committees.

Mr. Lewis: It must be done once more.

Mr. Marchand: Yes, that is it; and it may have to be done again often. Political parties and governments are not the only ones who have the right to find formulas which, even if they do not seem regular, lead to the settlement of certain disputes and to peace between men or institutions.

Trade unions also do it and rightly so, in my opinion.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, this question does not involve principles, in my opinion. There is no question of blaming the International Longshoremen's Association or the Canadian Labour Congress for the way they behaved. In my opinion, they have signed a very fine collective agreement. Active trade-unionists behaved well, they negotiated well. I do not blame them at all, there is no question of principle in my opinion. It is a question of finding out whether, through a misunderstanding or otherwise perhaps, it is a fact that this situation I have tried to set out—and from afar, since I was not there—is really the situation that existed at the time when an agreement was reached. That is the problem to be looked into.

INDUSTRY, RESEARCH AND ENERGY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Paul Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Churchill: For what purpose?

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): To present the report of a standing committee of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi) presented the fifth report of the standing committee on industry, research and energy development in both official languages of this country.

PRIVATE BILLS

AETNA CASUALTY COMPANY OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. S-4, to incorporate Aetna Casualty Company of Canada—Mr. Cameron (High Park)—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, at this late date I am surprised that the house did not decide to continue with the very interesting debate that was taking place. However, this private bill is an interesting one and I am pleased with the decision that was made to allow it to go to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

The reason I am pleased that it went to committee is that members of the government and particularly the sponsors of such bills have in the past told us that if we would let such bills go to a standing committee they would be able there to answer the questions asked in the house. I take note of the order of the house which was made on Thursday, May 5, to send five bills to committee including this one to incorporate the Aetna Casualty Company of Canada, and also of the proceedings in committee on Tuesday, June 14, when 15 members attended and Mr. Humphrys, the superintendent of insurance was present.

Mr. Macaluso: Were you there?

Mr. Peters: I do not see my name on the list of those present. It may be that members of the N.D.P. were elsewhere at that time, but it seems that the coalition that appears to be developing with respect to the passage of insurance company bills was in effect. It may be a matter of, you scratch my back and I will scratch yours but the N.D.P., not having an itchy back, does not need to have it scratched.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): The hon. member has said that there were 15 members present at the committee meeting. Were there any members of the N.D.P. present?

Mr. Peters: I have looked at the list, following the question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I see there were none present. I think the fact that the committee came to the conclusion it did indicates that this was so.

Mr. Macaluso: That is nonsense.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Does it not indicate that the N.D.P. were not too interested in being there when they should have been?

Mr. Peters: I will show you in the next 15 or 20 minutes how interested we are. This is where our interest should be exercised and this is where it is going to be exercised.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, I will help the hon. member waste time by asking him a question. If the hon. member is so interested in these insurance bills he has a right, under our standing orders, to attend these committee meetings. Why did he not attend this one?

Mr. Peters: Very likely because I was at another committee meeting, and I think my record of attendance at at least three of the major committees is fairly good. It may be as good as the record of the hon. member asking the question.

Mr. Macaluso: That I challenge.

Mr. Peters: You can challenge it if you wish but it is of little importance. I find it difficult to attend more than two committees a day. Some of them meet three times a day, and I make no apology for not going. But Mr. Chairman, to get back to the subject under discussion it is very difficult to decide, from reading the record, why these four or five bills were mixed up. They were referred together and to some extent, were handled together.

• (6:10 p.m.)

It is indicated that the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron) was the sponsor of Bill S-4 in conjunction with G. D. Finlayson, Q.C., and John H. C. Clarry, Q.C., parliamentary agents. This is a case of you scratch my back and I will scratch yours because they are, I assume, all on the same side of the fence.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Nobody is scratching my back and I am not scratching anyone else's back.

Mr. Peters: Actually this bill might have been passed were it not for what I consider to be political back-scratching, but we will let that go for the moment.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I am not going to take that statement lying down.

Mr. Peters: You are going to take it sitting down. I have the floor and I do not particularly care whether the hon. member lies down or sits down or what.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I recognize the hon. member for High Park on a point of order.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): The hon. member is imputing motives to me. He is referring to a bill respecting the Canada Health and Accident Insurance Corporation. It was up for second reading. Because my hon. friend wanted the bill immediately following it to go down to the bottom of the list and because an hon. member on this side of the house got up and spoke, my bill did go to the bottom of the list, and now he speaks of political back-scratching. I might say that he was attempting to use me to accomplish his purpose.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not expect the hon. member to really understand much of the problem. The matter to which I was referring was in relation to Bill S-10. If he has other political irons in the fire, that is entirely his responsibility.

Mr. Pilon: Carry on.

Mr. Peters: Pardon?

Mr. Pilon: Carry on.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, there are many members who really believe these bills should pass whether they are right or wrong and they do not care so long as they are handled expeditiously.

Mr. Macaluso: On a point of order, I think hon. members are completely fed up with the implication of motives by the hon. member for Timiskaming against all of us. If the hon. member would pay attention to his own responsibilities in this house, as other members do, we would proceed better. When he and another member of that party impute motives to members of this house it is an affront to members in all parties of the house and to those in his own party who have some sense of responsibility.

Mr. Howard: You are getting nasty now.

The Deputy Chairman: I appeal to hon. members to refer to Bill S-4, an act to incorporate Aetna Casualty Company of Canada and leave aside references to personal motives and other matters.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to get around to that. It is a very short proposition I am considering. I will try to be non-inflammatory if possible. On the preamble the hon. member for Rosedale stated he had an interest in this company and therefore could not vote on the bill. The sponsor of the bill, Mr. Finlayson, introduced the parliamentary agents. Mr. Finlayson explained the purpose of the bill and Mr. Humphrys also made a brief statement. Mr. Finlayson, Mr. Humphrys and Mr. Rhine were questioned and the preamble carried. This was the procedure on the bill. The details, Mr. Chairman, are to be found on page 555 of the evidence.

Before I read what took place in this matter I should like to refer to the bill itself. There was some question in respect of the division of the capital stock into $50 shares and why this should be. There was a further question with regard to the fact that out of the $5 million in the original capital stock only $500,000 had to be subscribed before the company could hold a general meeting and go into operation. In addition, there were questions asked in respect of why certain types of insurance were being included in the list of insurance the company was going to undertake. There was an indication that some of these types of insurance were not handled by the company and yet they had made application for them.

In the questioning I am sure an explanation should have been given which at least would have answered some of these legitimate questions. Another proposition that was raised and which has been raised on a number of occasions was the matter of ascertaining from the Superintendent of Insurance his recommendation with regard to whether or not there is some reason this particular company should be incorporated. If insurance is being offered for fire protection and no other companies are providing coverage, then obviously there would be merit in the establishment of an insurance company that would do this. But I believe that literally thousands and thousands of companies issue fire insurance. I think it should be ascertained whether or not it is proper to expand the number of such companies. I can see one obvious reason companies are formed and why they should be issuing certain types of insurance, but in my opinion one of the roles of the Superintendent of Insurance is to indicate whether or not there is a need, room or place for another company. This should be true when Aetna Casualty Company of Canada makes this application.

In presenting their evidence the witnesses said that the company had been carrying on business in Canada for many years. One witness said:

> —and we are really submitting more to the jurisdiction rather than less in asking the committee to approve the incorporation of a Canadian company. Our application has been fairly scrutinized by the Superintendent of Insurance and this is not a case of somebody coming in new; this is a company that has a background of experience and has been under the jurisdiction of the superintendent for a good number of years and we are content that we have his support in this.

Then the chairman asked Mr. Humphrys whether he had any comments. Mr. Humphrys, I presume taking into consideration some of the arguments which were made, said:

> I will make only a brief comment, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. As Mr. Finlayson has indicated, we have discussed this project with the company when it was under consideration and so far as the department is concerned, we are satisfied that we have no objection to it.
> The bill is in standard form and has no special features. It will require a minimum of capital $500,000 paid and $500,000 surplus before the company can start business. It is my understanding the company intends to capitalize it somewhat higher. The company cannot start business until it has received its certificate of registry under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and we will, therefore, ascertain that the capital has been paid in before the company starts business.

We know the parent company well since it has been in Canada a long time and it is one of the very largest of casualty insurance companies in the United States.

I have no further comment, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: In short, then Mr. Humphrys, you would say that the applicants have met the requirements of your department in so far as they can be met up to this point?

Mr. Humphrys: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do we have any questions?

Mr. Macaluso: Are you going to read the entire minutes?

Mr. Peters: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Macaluso: If you intend to read all the minutes why don't you just table them?

Mr. Peters: The hon. member keeps moving around but the sounds are somewhat the same. Our main objection to the passage of this bill is that the questions we have asked in relation to this company has not been answered. I am sure that hon. members opposite would say that if this company received a charter it would be able to make more money. I have never suggested, and I do not think it would be suggested by any member of my party, that we disagree with what Mr. Humphrys told the committee. Aetna is a good and responsible company.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, one of the basic things we must consider, not only in respect of this bill but in respect of all insurance companies seeking incorporation in bills now before us, is the degree to which the companies are owned or effectively controlled in Canada. In other words, are these companies Canadian or subsidiaries of foreign companies? I understand that in the case of the Aetna Casualty Company it is a wholly owned subsidiary of a United States company, the name of which escapes me for the moment. If I am incorrect in this regard I am sure the sponsor of the bill will correct me. I have just been informed that the parent of this company has its head office in Hartford, Connecticut, so I am right in my thinking.

Since 1962, when the Liberal party decided to develop policies in respect of foreign control of service industries in Canada, we have come to accept the idea that the Liberals believe in Canadian ownership. The former minister of finance spoke at that time as he does now in favour of the concept of Canadian control rather than control resting in the hands of foreigners who are not answerable to Canadian laws for the activities of their subsidiary companies. That hon. member still holds a great deal of influence in the ranks of the Liberal party. However, what has happened in respect of the Bank Act may prove me wrong in that connection. I usually refer to the former minister of finance, but I understand that hon. member who represents Davenport still receives a considerable degree of support for his enunciated ideas. Other Liberals support the idea of Canadian ownership of industries in Canada.

At some subsequent stage of the proceedings in respect of the bill now before us I intend to move certain appropriate amendments in order to ensure that in respect of this company there is the desired Canadian ownership, authority and control. One of the amendments I intend to move, and it could be moved in regard to the clause we are now considering, will be such as to require that all the directors of applicant companies such as this be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada.

At the present time I understand that under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act the majority of directors are required to be Canadian citizens. In this regard I should like to quote from the minutes and proceedings of June 14 of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. Mr. Humphrys, who is the Superintendent of the Department of Insurance, gave evidence on this question in reply to a question posed by the chairman. In reference to the application of the law in respect of Aetna he said at page 560:

As matters stand under the law, a United States company or a company from any country outside Canada, if it is in a strong financial condition can enter Canada and become registered under the Foreign Insurance Companies Act and transact insurance in Canada. Most countries offer reciprocal facilities to Canadian companies; they may enter foreign countries and transact business there. Where a company operates in Canada through a branch office such as the Aetna Casualty and Surety Company does now, the main direction of the company is, of course, at the home office of the company where the directors are situated and where the management is.

In other words, as Mr. Humphrys put it, the main direction of this company is in Hartford, Connecticut, and not at any place in Canada. He then stated:

The same thing applies when a Canadian company does business in the United States through a branch.

There is no argument about that fact, because it is a fact of economic life. Mr. Humphrys then stated:

But where foreign interests who want to do business in Canada incorporate a Canadian company, this requires a substantially larger Canadian content and a more extensive submission to Canadian laws and Canadian decisions than is the case of a branch.

I think there is some conflict in that attitude because, as I read Mr. Humphrys comments, when a company operates through a branch office the requirements of the law are not quite as stringent as they are if the company is incorporated in Canada under our procedures. It seems to me there should be an equitable application of the law, whatever it may be, to all companies whether they operate in Canada as incorporated companies or as subsidiaries. Then Mr. Humphrys made this point about directors of a Canadian company being Canadians. He said:

• (6:30 p.m.)

The requirement that a majority of the directors of a Canadian company be at all times Canadian citizens resident in Canada has been in our insurance laws for some years.

He is referring to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. Then he said:

For this company the law will require that a majority of the directors of this Canadian company at all times be Canadian citizens resident in Canada. This will represent a substantial step forward in the degree of Canadian control and Canadian decisions on the policies of this company.

In Mr. Humphrys' view this is a beneficial thing so far as Canada is concerned because, as he pointed out, when a company incorporates in this country the requirements are tougher than they are if they are just operating a branch office. Mr. Humphrys went on to say:

If a Canadian company were doing business in the United States and wished to incorporate a subsidiary there are no restrictions, of which I am aware, that would require all the directors of that subsidiary to be United States citizens. It would be customary and usual that the parent company would have some representation on the board of directors.

He was making the point that this is a step in the right direction and is a progressive move because it brings a larger degree of Canadian decision-making into the operation of the company. It seems logical to me, if the majority of the directors are required to be Canadian, that this in itself would bring about a larger degree of concern on the part of the company for Canadian interests. If the requirement were that all the directors be Canadian, we would be one more step ahead of the present situation.

[Mr. Howard.]

Parliament has enacted such legislation before. A few years ago we made the requirement in respect of a pipe line company, the name of which I have forgotten, that all the directors be at all times Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in this country. It seems to me this is what we should be doing now, namely, thinking in terms of giving the fullest possible degree of Canadian control to these companies. We are on the verge of perhaps developing a different concept of the structure, management and operation of insurance companies. Perhaps between now and the time these matters are considered again we may be able to develop some well laid plans and ideas about the amendments that would be necessary to put into effect certain basic ideas that we have. One of these is that all the directors of the company shall at all times be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada.

I do not intend to move an amendment at this moment, Mr. Chairman. Such an amendment could well fit into clause 1 because certain people are named therein, and it could also fit into clause 2. Perhaps it would more appropriately be made under clause 2. Mr. Humphrys referred to the requirement that the majority of the directors of a Canadian company be at all times Canadian citizens resident in this country and said it has been in our insurance laws for some years. I do not know how long this requirement has been in our insurance laws but it seems to me that if it has been there for some years we must consider the situation as it existed at the time the change was made and take into account the fact that there is today a far greater desire on the part of the Canadian people to have a greater degree of control over their industries than was the case some years ago.

The reason for Canadian people thinking this way is partly due to the farsighted opinions expressed by the former minister of finance. For this he deserves a great deal of credit. The former minister of finance expressed such opinions before his Prime Minister caught up with him, found that he was advancing ideas dangerous to the right-wing swing within the Liberal party and consequently eased him out of the cabinet. But the former minister of finance is directly responsible for there having developed in Canada a greater desire for an appreciation of the necessity of having Canadian control of our industry. In fact, one of his campaign slogans was "Buy Canada Back". These views of the former minister were widely circulated in Weekend magazine or Star Weekly magazine through an extensive and well thought-out article which he wrote. Other writings of the former minister of finance have contributed to our people having this desire for greater Canadianism.

I believe we should be taking steps to reflect this desire in the laws we enact and this company should not be excluded. In saying this I am liable to be accused of picking and choosing and it may be said: Why should Aetna Casualty Company of Canada be treated differently from any other insurance company? This is a valid argument. Indeed, why should it be treated differently? It may be said that every other insurance company in Canada can go about its business with only the majority of its directors having to be Canadian, and why should we suddenly step into the picture and say that the situation with regard to this company is different and all its directors must be Canadian citizens?

It may also be argued: Why should we insist upon this requirement in respect of the Aetna company and not apply it to all the other insurance companies in respect of which bills appear on our order paper? I admit the validity of this argument but I believe we have to start somewhere. Perhaps we could start with at least a discussion of this very vital principle and we might then be able to persuade the government to introduce legislation to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and make this provision applicable to all insurance companies in Canada.

All I desire to do in this instance, Mr. Chairman, is make a start and follow along from Mr. Humphry's contention that this represents a forward step in the development of Canadian based decision-making. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie asked Mr. Humphrys questions in this respect, as reported at page 560 of the minutes of the proceedings of the committee:

When we talk, Mr. Humphrys, of management or directors, are we talking about any special responsibility in the conduct of the policy of the company itself or do these directors have no power at all to decide the policy of the company?

Mr. Humphrys replied as follows:

The board of directors is the highest management group in the company—

That is understandable.

—so the policy of the company would be established by the board of directors.

The hon. member for Sainte-Marie then said:

I am asking this question particularly because we do not know that policies may be drafted in the United States by the parent company and applied to the subsidiary here in Canada without any change at all in the application of the policy. This is where I am concerned.

And well might he be concerned. Mr. Humphrys answered in this way:

This is possible, sir, but I believe that formation of a separate Canadian company with its management and its business directed primarily toward the Canadian market, it is more likely to result in management policies and general business practices that are designed for the Canadian market to a greater extent than would be the case if the company continued to operate a branch office here. I would say that so far as our department is concerned, we do not attempt to influence insurers either way, either through a branch office or through a subsidiary company but I do believe that the formation of a subsidiary company creates a stronger element of Canadian control and Canadian design in the insurance product than is the case where the operation is through a branch.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I submit that this is an admission of failure, not on the part of Mr. Humphrys because he is only putting policy into effect but on the part of the government, to recognize the difference between the manner in which the requirements of the law are observed in so far as branch offices are concerned and those in regard to incorporated companies. It would seem to me, and I made this point earlier, that what the government should be doing is to make the law applicable universally so that it would apply to branch offices in the same manner as it does to Canadian companies. I do not know how this can be done but it will certainly require some alteration of the legislation because presumably there is no law requiring branch offices to have any degree of Canadian content or control; otherwise this requirement would be in effect. I simply leave it to those who have the responsibility of drafting the government's legislation to draw it up in such a manner that the law will apply equally to the two types of insurance operations.

Then Mr. Irvine followed this by saying—I do not know who Mr. Irvine is but presumably he is in some way connected with the company; maybe he is a member but I have never run across his name before:

The statement given under the preamble was a little technical which made it a little difficult for a person such as myself to understand it completely. This, as I understand it, is to be a Canadian company, a subsidiary of Aetna of Hartford operating in Canada and handling casualty only. Is this right?

To which Mr. Finlayson replied that this was correct, that it would operate in every field but life insurance. I might add that if we had 27 letters in the alphabet we would have to include life insurance as one because under clause 6 we have everything from A to Z.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): The hon. member is making that statement out of whole cloth. It is totally unfounded and an inference that should not be made. It is no credit to the hon. member to have made it.

Mr. Howard: Even listening to my friend from High Park is no credit to me. So Aetna Insurance Company does not wish to get into the life insurance field.

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In entering this debate, Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to lay some stress on the whole question of the insurance business. I have been somewhat concerned for quite some time about the proliferation of insurance companies of various types, and I think in the case of an insurance company of this nature it might be as well if we were first of all to define quite clearly just what sort of an operation we are dealing with because I have noticed that any operation which involves a financial institution invariably assumes in our society some air of respectability, almost of untouchability, and perhaps obscures the reality behind the facade. Obviously insurance companies of this sort are engaged in what could be termed a gambling business. We all gamble with our fire insurance companies that we will not have a fire and they gamble with us on that basis. I am not suggesting it is an illegal or immoral business but I am suggesting it is not necessarily an operation that is highly respectable because it is a financial one. It is a gambling proposition, and this company is asking us to allow them to engage in gambling in 26 various fields of possible accident, danger or loss.

My feeling on this point, Mr. Chairman, is that we have had an experience in one part of this country of a very satisfactory solution to the provision of gambling opportunities, if you like, in a certain type of accident which may occur to citizens, and that is in the field of auto insurance. I suppose everyone knows that one province in Canada has established a gambling operation, if you like, against car accidents which is conducted by the provincial government. The result is that the fortunate inhabitants of that province are able to protect themselves from automobile accidents at a fraction of the cost which those of us who live in other provinces must pay.

On that score I would suggest it is about time that we considered this whole proposition of protection from accidents on the same basis as the Saskatchewan car insurance operation which is still being continued under a Liberal government although it was established under a C.C.F. government. I think we should look very carefully at these insurance bills, even the ones that are not concerned with life insurance which provide even more matters to be examined than the casualty insurance companies. I will not deal with those matters because life insurance is not included here.

One of the points I want to stress, as my colleague from Skeena did, and perhaps pursue a little further is the question of a company which is entirely foreign owned moving into the gambling industry to extract from Canadian citizens a very handsome volume of premiums, I presume, or they would not be asking to be allowed to operate here.

Quite seriously, Mr. Chairman, this is a matter which should be causing great concern to Canadians on account of the effects of foreign ownership particularly of financial institutions. It is not only the former minister of finance who has expressed his concern about foreign ownership of financial institutions. His policy is being continued in one very important area by the present Minister of Finance. I suggest that if we are going to permit this type of operation, if we are going to permit foreign insurance companies to operate in Canada, we are going to add to one of the most serious problems of every Canadian government, and that is the question of the balance of payments. Admittedly the profits of this company which will be remitted to the U.S. will not in themselves have any great effect on the balance of payments, but I suggest to you, sir, that the gradual remission of interest and dividends by U.S. owned insurance companies plays a very important part in creating our balance of payments problem. For that reason I think it is of dubious value that we should allow still another such company to enter the field to draw from the available pool of Canadian earnings that go into this sort of protection and at the same time create more problems for our government which must eventually be dealt with.

I also think, Mr. Chairman, it is time we began to look at the insurance business from the point of view of the traditional free enterprise competitive theory. We are often told, of course, that competition is the life of the economy, that competition is what provides us with cheap services and goods. It may be true in some instances but I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that it is not and cannot be true in the field of insurance of any sort.

I do not have before me the proceedings of the committee which unfortunately I was not able to attend, having been away at the time, so I am not sure what is the exact volume of business which this company conducts. I am not sure whether any figures were given to the committee with regard to the operational costs of this company. However, if they are similar to the costs of a company sponsored under another bill by the same hon. member and considered by the committee the other day, then I suggest to you, sir, that we have ample evidence that the proliferation of insurance companies of any type does not lead to cheaper and better service and lower premiums but must inevitably lead to the contrary. As I recall, in this other instance there were some 400 employees who were employed in servicing 70,000 policies. I imagine that is a fairly average ratio of staff and organization to the volume of business.

If we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, with ensuring that the Canadian people are able to acquire protection against the various hazards of life in a modern society as listed here such as fires, aircraft accidents, automobile accidents, boiler insurance, credit insurance, earthquake insurance, explosion insurance and the whole list right down to the end, windstorm insurance, then I think we have to examine the question of whether or not we can provide them with protection from these vicissitudes by means of competition or whether we should not seriously consider now that this particular type of service to the people of Canada should be carried on by a public authority at much less cost. Obviously it would be at much less cost.

It is impossible, I think, to make out any case whatever for the suggestion that competition is going to have the traditional effect in this particular field. Competition is bound inevitably to increase costs over the whole insurance business. Competition is bound to increase premiums and increase the cost of insurance for those who seek protection.

I think it is the responsibility of this parliament to decide that this whole matter should be examined with very great care. I brought the matter up in the committee the other day, on another life insurance company bill sponsored by the same hon. member. I suggested then that the time had come for us to give serious consideration to the whole insurance business. The other aspect of the business that is important is that this bill would provide a means by which savings are accumulated. This is a sort of gambling operation. It is a gambling operation in which those who are running the house are able to ensure that they are never going to lose to any great extent.

Once in a while some major catastrophe occurs and one insurance company goes under in the storm, but that is a very rare occurrence. I would imagine, Mr. Chairman, that the very fact we have this endless string of new incorporations for every kind of insurance company indicates quite clearly that this is a very profitable business, that there is a great deal of profit to be gained out of protecting the Canadian people—from the innumerable accidents that may overtake them in our modern society. This being the case, sir, I think it is the responsibility of parliament to find out just how expensive this insurance is for the Canadian people and how these expenses may be reduced.

I want to return for a moment, if I may, to the question of foreign ownership of these institutions. I point out that only in the last two days we have had an example of one of the dangers of foreign ownership, about which no satisfactory answer was received. I may say, from spokesmen on behalf of the government.

I want to stress the fact that two ministers of finance have suggested that foreign ownership of financial institutions in Canada is not conducive to the Canadian welfare. Here in this bill we are providing the opportunity for a completely foreign owned corporation to gamble with the Canadian people, to extract from the Canadian people premiums to cover possible losses. The company may transmit its profits out of this country to the detriment of our balance of payments problem. I have often wondered, Mr. Chairman, when I am told that we must have great infusions of foreign capital in order to keep our economy going, if perhaps we stopped some of these leaks—they are getting to be very large leaks now—which may run into the hundreds of millions of dollars per year we might find ourselves in the happy position of not having to rely, and it is a dangerous reliance, on these infusions of foreign capital. There may be a case that can be made out for foreign investment in productive enterprises. There can be, I submit, no case whatever made out for giving a licence to people who are not Canadians, people who are foreign to this country, to gamble with the Canadian people and extract from the Canadian people part of their income in order to protect those people from accidents.

This is something that should be undertaken by Canadians, only by Canadians, and preferably by Canadians jointly and collectively through their publicly elected governmental bodies. Otherwise, it means we are deciding against the interests of the mass of the Canadian people in favour of not merely our own privileged groups but the privileged groups of another country. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come to examine what the costs are in these companies. I have a note here held over from an earlier debate on this bill and it states that the costs are 10 per cent to 30 per cent. I do not know if the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill has figures on this point, but I am not really concerned whether he has. In an operation of this size I am concerned only with the volume of profits that must be transmitted across the border year by year as this company continues to operate with a licence from the parliament of Canada.

Again I suggest to you, sir, it is the duty of those of us who are here representing the Canadian people, not representing special interests either native or foreign, to make sure that when the Canadian people want to protect themselves from accidents of all sorts they should have coverage at the cheapest possible rates. At the same time we should be able to ensure that there is no unnecessary drain on the resources of this country which such a company constitutes. This, I believe, is a very serious matter. I should like to see all these insurance bills stood over until there is a proper investigation of the whole insurance business in Canada because I have been convinced—

The Chairman: Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but I must advise him the hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROVISION FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF FINDINGS OF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONER

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nicholson for the second reading of Bill No. C-215, respecting certain conditions of employment of dock workers at the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-215 is unjust and mischievous and to permit its passage would bring great discredit upon parliament. The bill will bring discredit upon individuals in this government who never again would be accepted as honest brokers in labour disputes between management and labour. As we know, Mr. Speaker, a great deal of labour unrest still faces this country and government will be forced to take action to deal with it.

Second, it will bring discredit upon the supporters of the government, because by supporting this bill they betray the origins of liberalism, or they forfeit the trust that they should have in their leaders. For their leaders said nearly the exact converse of the philosophy espoused by the bill, almost until the very last moment before it was introduced.

Third, to pass Bill No. C-215 would bring discredit upon the whole institution of parliament. For as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) pointed out so ably, we are being asked to give a blank endorsement to the placement in the labour contract which now exists of terms and conditions which would be drawn up by a commissioner, without there being any opportunity for either of the two sides involved to alter so much as one small fraction of any of those terms and conditions. People would ask: Why on earth do parliamentarians behave as donkeys, passing such legislation?

Years ago, Mr. Speaker, we had a member of this chamber who, after various unsuccessful voyagings in Saskatchewan, has now found his way to the other place. Once in comment on some notion expressed by a member of the Liberal opposition of the day he said: "This is the most unheard of thing I have ever heard of". I did not agree with him at that time, but when Bill No. C-215 wanders into his hands tonight in the other place—presuming it passes here—then he can repeat that sentence and I will agree with him fully.

It is possible, Mr. Speaker, under the powers that will be conferred upon the commissioner, whose report will be final and will become part of the contract, to stretch things to the absurd length, for example, of requiring that unloading on the longshores of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec city be carried out by elephants or camels. According to my reading of one clause it might be possible that he would require the longshoremen to do their work in bikinis in the middle of winter.

I do not suggest that the commissioner would abuse the powers that are placed in his hands with such absurd recommendations, Mr. Speaker, but I do suggest this: The power that we would be giving to the commissioner by passage of this bill would surely inhibit any person. I do not think that any one of us would ever like to feel that a commissioner had the last word on anything. There must exist the right for larger bodies or for other people to consider his actions.

I say that this places the commissioner, who perforce by this bill becomes a compulsory arbitrator, in an impossible position. It will also do this to him: No matter what his recommendations, people will be aggrieved by them. Some of those people will be unkind enough to suggest that this was part of the deal beforehand, that it was very well known that the commissioner was going to bring in such recommendations and that this was part of some under-the-table scheme. I am sure that this situation does not exist either, but none the less Mr. Commissioner Picard is put in that position. Therefore I say that Bill No. C-215 will promote mischief. It will lower the esteem of parliament and it will go a long way toward destroying what is left of the ability of this particular government to govern effectively in a time of labour unrest.

The hon. member for Ontario has stated clearly and unequivocally that we cannot condone or support compulsory arbitration; and I repeat the statement that he made then, so that our stand is quite clear. I think I can also say on behalf of my party that we will support the position set forth in the amendment moved by the New Democratic Party; and at the conclusion of my speech I will suggest three, four or five alternatives by which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) could act and take parliament from the unholy position in which it is now placed.

We have had the advantage, Mr. Speaker, of the intervention by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), who late in the day enters upon the scene. He said—and very fairly too—that he would not want to replace the Minister of Labour in the negotiations, and I am quick to add that I would not want to see him replace the Minister of Labour in the negotiations either. But he could have sat in with the Minister of Labour, who had the advantage—whatever it was—of the help of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and various others. Why not have gone to an expert who has made labour mediation his whole life's work, instead of bringing in those who have had very little experience with the subject?

When the minister defended, as he tried to do, compulsory arbitration, he confused methods of arbitration agreed to by parties well before any dispute arose. He did that at one time; at another time he confused the issue that is now before us with compulsory arbitration as set forth in the general laws of this country. As he well knows, and as we in this house all know, the compulsory arbitration which is being brought into this particular dispute is something smuggled in at the last minute, after everybody's attention had been diverted with many glowing statements about the virtues of collective bargaining. I regret that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, for whom I have a great deal of respect, has lost the candour for which he is famous, and on this particular occasion has adopted the dialectic used by others in the cabinet.

Before I review the record—and I will call this a "review B.C.": "before compulsion"—let me say this: I have a small apology to make to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) before I read some of the glowing statements made on this matter by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and some others. I read his contribution on this particular matter during the labour estimates and found it very difficult to understand. I have read it a couple of times and I cannot understand it. I think what happened is this. He was trying to bring "Industry and Humanity" up to date, but failed. Why? Well, my theory is that the custodian of the crystal ball, the Minister of Transport, dropped it at some time somewhere, and the message did not get through from the great beyond.

First, referring to the exchange between the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) and the minister, as set forth at page 5636 of Hansard for May 27:

Mr. Thomas: ...Has consideration been given by his department to the use of compulsory arbitration as a means of setting disputes, rather than resorting to strike action, as has been the case for many years?

Mr. Nicholson: ...Very serious consideration has been given to this matter by the department and by experienced departmental officials over a period of several years. As a member of cabinet I know something of the difficulties that we have had in trying to work out and find an acceptable formula. If you really believe, as I happen to, in the importance and the significance of collective bargaining, which enables management and labour to sit down on opposite sides of the table and unburden their hearts and take strong positions if necessary, it is difficult to say in all cases compulsory arbitration would be necessary, or advisable.

Then the minister makes remarks concerning national interest, safety and security, for example in the air lines industry, movement of passengers and freight, in many cases on the railways; and then he says this:

I cannot give the hon. member a definite answer, but I can assure him—and this is why I made the appeal earlier today—that any constructive suggestions, which any member of this house or any other person may have to make as to how we might solve this extremely difficult question, when our national interests and economy are at stake, would be very welcome.

A constructive suggestion came from the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario, on May 31, as reported at page 5743 of Hansard, when he asked:

—Will the Prime Minister call the parties involved to Ottawa, to bring them into a different atmosphere so they may proceed to a settlement through the collective bargaining arrangement, under the chairmanship of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), who has a great deal of experience in this type of work?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, everything that can be done is being done to bring this strike to an end. The Minister of Labour is in touch with the situation, as my hon. friend knows, and if and when the time comes that the minister who is dealing with the matter feels the intervention of the Prime Minister would be helpful, naturally he will let me know.

Those words were said after the strike had been going on for some time. The strike was causing considerable confusion to the economy in Montreal, Trois-Rivières, Quebec city, and perforce in the rest of the country.

Then we have this question by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) at page 6054 of Hansard:

Can the Prime Minister tell us whether his government anticipates bringing in legislation to end the strike on the St. Lawrence seaway, in view of its prolonged duration and in view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance?

I interject parenthetically that the statement by the Minister of Finance dealt with the effect of the strike on grain shipments. The Prime Minister answered by saying:

Mr. Speaker, we hope this strike will be ended shortly by the process of free collective bargaining.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

We have here the statement of the Prime Minister and the performing mice.

The record continues on June 9, at page 6173, where the Prime Minister says:

—We have not by any means given up hope that this serious issue will be settled very shortly by the processes of free collective bargaining and not by parliamentary direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Continuing, on June 10 at page 6240 the Minister of Labour says:

Mr. Speaker, if I remember the right hon. Prime Minister's words yesterday, he said the government was hopeful, as a result of recent developments, that a settlement would be brought about through collective bargaining in good faith with a sincere desire on the part of both parties to see an end to the dispute.

Then we have this intervention of the former minister of labour, now the Minister of National Health and Welfare, on June 13 at page 6907:

We have here a system of free collective bargaining, and it is the earnest endeavour of the government to reach a solution to these difficult labour situations through the procedures which have been established by law under that system of free collective bargaining.

Then came perhaps the happiest moment that the minister has had—I do not think he has had many since—when he announced what we all thought was the final settlement of this particular issue. Following the statements made, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made an observation which I shall read. It is to be found at page 6369 of Hansard for June 14, as follows:

I certainly have no objection to the idea of setting up a commission of inquiry to look into this matter, providing the decisions and recommendations of that commission are not binding upon both parties but are simply for the purpose of providing a basis upon which collective bargaining negotiations may continue. I hope the minister will give us some more information about that, perhaps when the orders of the day are called.

Earlier the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) had stated that the members of his party were very happy that a solution had been found without the necessity for parliamentary intervention. He said this:

Perhaps the proposal we made last week for parliamentary intervention without compulsory arbitration may have had some bearing on bringing the parties together.

At no time had the Minister of Labour said: Well, we have an agreement, but there are two words in it, namely "or otherwise" which can bring about a bill. If there were any reservations in the minister's mind, they were not stated.

Continuing the record, on June 23 at page 6785 the Minister of Labour announced the appointment of Dr. Laurent Picard, under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, as a commissioner. There is no suggestion in the announcement that the findings of the commissioner would become part of the labour agreement, through the measure to which we are now referring.

Continuing the story on June 29 at page 7019 we have the following:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the bill he introduced earlier, and ask him to tell the house whether he informed the union or the shipping federation at the time the settlemen was reached of his intention to introduce compulsory arbitration of the issue of productivity, following the appointment of a commission of inquiry.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I most certainly did, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: I wish to make sure of this. Did the minister inform both the union and the federation, or just one of those organizations?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes.

This was the first indication, of course, to my knowledge of a suggestion which had never been advanced in the press, or in any statements made inside or outside the house, that methods other than free collective bargaining were to be used in settling this particular dispute.

Continuing the story further, on July 8 at page 7387 the Minister of Labour said:

I think the phrase "compulsory arbitration" was carefully avoided; but the fact that there would be a binding solution, a recommendation to parliament—that legislation be enacted to make the terms binding, that is, the recommendations of the industrial inquiry commission on certain aspects—there is no question about that, Mr. Speaker.

I would say that the arguments this afternoon presented by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) have clearly brought that fact out.

What about the agreement itself, Mr. Speaker? It is set forth on page 7436 of Hansard for July 8. The words over which so much time has been spent namely "or otherwise" are set forth in this document. The pertinent part reads as follows:

The agreements terminating on December 31, 1965, shall be amended by incorporating therein the terms of settlement set out above and these amended agreements shall remain in effect until December 31, 1967, unless amended by negotiations or otherwise.

We have had the voices of Philadelphia trilling in this chamber this afternoon, trying to explain that the words "or otherwise" do not encompass anything so wide sweeping and important as compulsory arbitration. May I add my own thoughts. I will not deal with the words "or otherwise" but instead I shall deal with the word "unless". The way I read this provision, it means that the agreement remains unless something is done. That is, the agreement as set forth here shall remain in effect unless something is done. That agreement deals with wages and some other matters, but certainly not with questions of productivity, and like matters which are the heart and soul of the measure we are now considering.

The record, I think, clearly indicates an understanding which led to a misunderstanding which, if properly spelled out, might have saved difficulties for both sides. Perhaps the longshoremen would not have accepted the idea of a binding report by a commissioner. Perhaps they would have accepted it. But to ask working men to take the words, "or otherwise", and construe them into a piece of legislation being solemnly enacted in the House of Commons and in the other place, to which royal assent might be given, is stretching the absurd into the impossible.

The agreement is neither flesh nor fowl, but bad red herring. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is an obligation on us to rescue the government from its own follies if there is to be hope for labour peace in Canada this year, and if we are to restore the confidence of management and labour that they can come to this place, present their problems, and the government will offer the assistance of its Department of Labour, its skilled people, and even such skills as members of the government themselves possess, to bring industrial stability to a country that is badly in need of the same. Therefore I make some positive suggestions to the minister to help extricate him from the difficulties that he himself, or somebody else, plunged him into.

There is the suggestion of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) to forsake the bill and leave it up to the two sides by collective bargaining or, at the very least, to let them look at the report of Mr. Commissioner Picard and make what they can of it before coming back to parliament and telling us their troubles again.

Also, there is the suggestion made some time ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) considered although, to my knowledge, he did not act upon it. It is set forth at page 6299 of Hansard for June 13, when the Leader of the Opposition inquired—> —whether the government is giving consideration to setting up a commission to review in detail the general position created in employer-employee relations by reason of technological change, a matter that is of prime importance in connection with the various disputes which are arising?

The answer of the Prime Minister was:

> Mr. Speaker, the matter mentioned by my right hon. friend is, of course, one of very great and continuing significance, as we have learned—if we needed to learn—from the dispute that we have been discussing. It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that if the house requires an opportunity to discuss this particular dispute, this will be one of the elements that we will be discussing. I quite agree that it should be considered in its wider context. I think it would be the feeling of the house that the government would give consideration to an examination of the kind suggested by my right hon. friend.

I might add that the dispute being discussed at that particular time was the longshoremen dispute. That is the second suggestion I would mention which received an at-least-we-will-look-into-it-because-it-is-a-good-idea reply from the Prime Minister.

I would suggest to the minister that this is a way out for him not to deal with the longshore dispute by the compulsory arbitration set forth in this bill by having the broader issues examined, so that these people will not feel they are being treated separate or apart but that the whole problem of automation, job security and productivity is being examined at the same time. This could be done, as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, by setting up a commission of inquiry, and to this I would add the suggestion that we could do it in yet another way.

I suggest we could refer these important issues of job security, automation and productivity—surely the most momentous issues now facing the business and industrial life of the country—to a committee of this house in which a large number of hon. members, coming from varied backgrounds, could examine all these things.

I myself have great faith, I will not call it optimistic faith but faith which I am sure would be justified, in what such a committee study could bring forth not only to help the disputants in this particular case but also to set guidelines, by legislation if need be, that would help labour disputants in this country over a generation ahead in dealing with problems caused by computers and all the other modern trappings.

These are several suggestions, in addition to the one offered by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that the subject matter of the dispute be referred to a committee. In that respect our ideas are probably very much alike.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say that the bill is unjust and mischievous. It will bring government, the supporters of government, and parliament itself into discredit. I want to make it clear that the Conservative opposition supports the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South, and I also want to make it clear that we will reject Bill C-215.

• (7:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Alfred Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house understands why I want to take part in the discussion on that bill respecting conditions of employment at the ports on the St. Lawrence and on the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, before going on to my main remarks, I would like to thank all hon. members in my name and on behalf of all my constituents for the extreme courtesy and respect they show for the name of my riding, since I brought the matter up in the house, and the last example is that of the previous speaker who was careful to call my city Trois-Rivières, as it should be called. Some people may think that it is an insignificant matter but in my riding it is a matter of pride, of family feeling, and saying that we are happy about the courtesy shown by my colleagues here is saying a lot.

About the bill, Mr. Speaker, I will say that, as an independent, I am a little like a spectator who does not even pay the amusement tax, who has the pleasure of seeing people in office introduce their bills and also seeing with what vigour the opposition fights them. I find it not only very entertaining but also very instructive.

For instance, I have great esteem for the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and for the hon. member for York South, because they are never dull. They are above average speakers and also they have quite an extraordinary gift for parliamentary debate; they always interest me even when I do not share their views.

I must say just the same that there are times when the strength of their arguments was greatly reduced in the eyes of the most interested spectator that I am, the independent spectator, by the partisan contingencies which become obvious. For instance, when I heard this afternoon the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) bitterly criticize the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) in a tone of voice and with arguments which seemed forced, twisted, in many cases, I said to myself, of course he is a member of the official opposition, leader of his party, he must absolutely object. That is his role, that of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, to object with all its might, with the argumentative strength at his disposal to what the government proposes.

In the eyes of the interested spectator as well as in those of probably many spectators outside this house, that weakens probably, certainly in many cases, the strength of his arguments. And that enables us to ask ourselves questions on the value, as far as sincerity is concerned, of some arguments voiced.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell a story about the member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I am known in my home town as one who likes to tease members of the bar, lawyers. Some people even say that I am allergic to lawyers. This may not be true. I like to tease them because lawyers can hit back better than other people. They are more argumentative.

Lawyers in several provinces of the country are great friends of mine. Back home, those whom I cruelly tease vote for me most of the time. But I was amazed in many cases at the reaction of some lawyers when I asked them, after hearing them making their plea with extraordinary conviction and eloquence: if, by any chance, the individual you defended crossed over to the other side and you had to put the case for the prosecutor, would you do it with as much conviction? And those lawyers would answer: Of course, it is my job. I must resort to all the tricks of the law to win my customer's case.

So then, Mr. Speaker, for a layman such as I, truth does not stem from legislation, but legislation from truth. With the years, I have reached the point where many questions come to my mind when I hear brilliant indictments or eloquent pleas such as that of the hon. member for York South this afternoon. In his argument, he failed, in his wisdom and knowledge to consider that for common people such as me and many others, who heard him say "All my life I have been counsel for certain unions, I have appeared for certain unions" that would remind us: "He is doing his job and his job as a lawyer is to defend his client, the client who is paying his salary." I do not know whether he is still on the pay roll of the unions, but evil tongues claim that the N.P.D. campaign funds are supplied by—I am happy to see the hon. member for York South entering the house because I would have disliked to speak of him in his absence, I have too high a regard for him. The Holy Ghost probably inspired him to come and hear what I have to say and more power to him—when the member for York South brought out that point, the value of his argument was reduced to my layman's mind. And when I recalled that it is being unkindly said, although it may be true and it seems warranted by certain indications and by certain events, that the campaign funds of the N.P.D. are supplied by certain powerful unions, I may say that the value of his argument was somewhat reduced.

At home, Mr. Speaker, I am not being financed by any union although, to the surprise of the N.P.D., I would say that most of their supporters voted for the independent member, because the independent member for Trois-Rivières has always told the truth to the union members at home. Twenty times, possibly, I negotiated collective agreements and I negotiated with learned lawyers, wise in the ways of labour-management relations, and we always got along fine.

We only had a dispute once, which involved a bastard union. I am not saying it was a bastard union: the other unions, the Conseil des métiers du travail, the Syndicats nationaux catholiques clamoured from the roof tops that it was a bastard union. That is probably why we did not agree.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have always told the people back home, our union people with whom I have had contacts in public life for 20 years what I believed to be the truth.

After this preamble, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that, under the present circumstances, I fail to see how anyone can blame the minister for introducing this bill. When it is claimed that it deals a blow to free and voluntary negotiations, I say the facts and the truth are being twisted. I say the best proof that the parties accepted that solution, when there was no other alternative, is that they decided to go back to work. There was, therefore, tacit agreement, Mr. Speaker.

And when they say that this is an almost criminal interference with free and voluntary bargaining, they forget that this is an exceptional case.

As for me, Mr. Speaker, I would go farther than the Minister of Labour. I submit that, in public services or in organizations, even those not directly responsible for public service, but having contingencies where public interest is at stake, there should be a machinery to provide for prompt bargaining. For instance, it should be provided that three, four or five months before the expiry of a collective agreement, the parties concerned should sit down and negotiate. And if on expiry of the collective agreement, for instance, they did not agree, let us have arbitration courts to settle the matter.

After all, in our complex economy we must manage to arrive at some sensible solution. I tell you that it is not intelligent to allow a union to endanger the whole economy of a country to satisfy its own interest.

And I am not the only one to say so, Mr. Speaker. I should like to advance the testimony of someone who knows more about it than I, because I did some research when, like everyone, I read in the papers what the president of the Labour Congress said at one time. The Montreal La Presse said:

> The president of the Canadian Labour Congress violently contested yesterday the statements of the Minister of Labour who said that compulsory arbitration could help to reduce the number of strikes.

Mr. Jodoin added:

> However, he said, if union members are to keep their integrity and share in Canada's growing prosperity—

I find that very surprising. In order to share in the growing prosperity, we must jeopardize it by ruinous strikes such as we have known.

> They must be able to stop working without threat of government intervention.

Elsewhere, Mr. Speaker, I found a statement by Mr. Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, affiliated to the American Federation of Labor and to the C.I.O. He is not a newcomer in the field of labour; following the strike of the bus drivers in New York a short time ago, he said this—I shall try to give as faithful a translation as possible and in case I do a bad job, I shall say I took this passage from the January or February issue of Time magazine: we must put an end to our strikes—this is Walter Reuther speaking—we must put an end to our strikes, which are endangering the survival of society. We can no longer tolerate a situation where a group of employees, even if they have a right to what they ask, can paralyse the economy of a whole community.

It is obvious that Walter Reuther is not in favour of compulsory arbitration. He suggests solutions less generous and less ruinous than endless strikes. In regard to protracted strikes which further the interests of some people, he adds this: We must create without delay a tripartite commission representing the worker, the employer and the state, which will set up the machinery for new policies for the immediate settling of strikes in the public service.

Well, I for one believe that the bill before us is not only acceptable but that it is going to provide, once and for all, for those disputes which are disastrous to the economy.

And I was shocked at hearing the hon. member for York South say: "Postpone that. And if another disastrous strike should occur, it will still be time to pass legislation."

We would have to go through another disastrous strike, Mr. Speaker. For my part, I believe that workers have had more than enough of such things.

I suggest that our workers are getting to wonder whether this is not all eye-wash, whether the whole truth is not hidden from them. I think it is time that workers in 1966 hear the truth, even from their politicians, even from their labour leaders, even from the learned lawyers representing the labour union. In a case such as the one with which we are concerned, at a time when an agreement could not be reached, I say that the will of both parties was expressed clearly enough to warrant government action. I would go as far as to say that the government waited too long to take action and, in saying that, I say I have the support of the rank and file of the labour unions, perhaps not of the leaders whose prestige is at stake if they accept that, but of the people who have to tighten their belts when they have been on strike for 38 or 40 days without getting any wages.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the workers are wondering whether too many people are not playing politics with the workers' interests and with the so-called benefits of labour unions. I think that the workers are beginning to realize that they are being fooled in order to increase the prestige of some fabulously paid labour leaders.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the workers are aware of the fact that they are the ones to foot the final bill on all disputes harmful to the whole economy and that they may be the cat's-paw, in other words, the suckers. They are too well informed these days, not to realize that the wool is being pulled over their eyes and they are only waiting for the opportunity to rightly rebel against such goings-on. They have not had many opportunities so far and I know something about it, because I have personally walked the docks of Trois-Rivières for twenty years. I have in Montreal and also in Quebec, a certain number of friends and acquaintances who give me their views on the situation and tell me, each in turn, that they would refuse, in certain circumstances, to follow their labour leaders if they were not being threatened with broken legs or being thrown into the St. Lawrence. For the enlightenment of those who think that I am dreaming this up, let me remind them of all that happened a few years back at the time of Hal Bank's union and what came out at the inquiry that the government launched later to find out what had occurred.

I say that our workers find it intolerable to see labour leaders urging them to break the law, to overlook court orders and to flout the law, because their own interests are involved, knowing that this will boomerang, that others will also scorn the law and that they, themselves, will become the victims of such contempt of law.

Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I think it is the government's duty to take action, which it did perhaps a little too late, in my opinion. Maybe it did not have the freedom to do it before, obviously fearing all this public protest coming from certain sectors more concerned about their personal advantage than about the commonwealth, but this is a case where the government cannot forget that the commonwealth must come before everything, that the general economy of the nation must have precedence even over the rightful interest of a group, and I think that our workers have enough common sense to understand it.

Mr. Speaker, our workers want to work; they want the government to give them work or organize an economy where they can find employment. They want to work at reasonable wages and for that, they know that the economy must be strong, firm. There are no miracles in life and they know it. They are sufficiently well-informed nowadays to know that. It is no longer possible to make them believe that the moon is made of green cheese and they know that, at times, the government will have to intervene to protect them and that, in other cases, it will have to bring them to reason because they will have been misled by others. I think the majority of our workers are eagerly seeking that truth and that they will be happy to see that the government has the courage of its responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I know it is unpopular to speak this way. I am also of the opinion that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) know very well that after the statements they made there will be tomorrow a general outcry in certain fanatic and pro-labour papers and when I say pro-labour, I mean in a fanatic way, because there are papers which are pro-labour in an intelligent way. Hence, that calls for certain courage. I know also that my statements will perhaps not be popular in a certain press but I know that they reflect the feeling of the humble worker who is deprived of his wages during three or four weeks because of legal red tape and of bickering on the meaning of a word or of a sentence which enable learned lawyers to get phenomenal salaries and politicians to make the fortune of their political party, while they do not have the means to pay for their groceries during the week end.

Mr. Speaker, I will vote in favour of the bill and against the amendment of the New Democratic Party for the reasons that I have outlined and for others that I would have liked to point out. But I do not want to overtax the patience of the house, I will conclude my remarks now and repeat the words of a famous politician named Abraham Lincoln, for the benefit of those who deal with labour questions in a biased or interested manner:

• (7:40 p.m.)

[English]

You can fool some of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time.

Labour Conditions

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the former independent member for Three Rivers.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend that my city is called Trois-Rivières.

[English]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order let me say that I deliberately used the phrase "Three Rivers" and will continue to do so until the hon. member and some of his friends cease to refer to the province from which I come as "Columbie Britannique" and commence to refer to it by its proper name, British Columbia.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: I will say to my hon. friend that I would be greatly pleased to do so, at his request.

[English]

Mr. Howard: In so far as I am concerned now, the riding will now be referred to as "Trois-Rivières".

Mr. Pickersgill: This sounds like a lesson in bilingualism.

Mr. Howard: I want to express admiration for a certain aspect of the Liberal party, and I do so ungrudgingly. Having listened to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) it seems to me that Liberals, no matter what their origin may be, have a tremendous ability to justify any procedure by distortion of the facts and misinterpretation of the words. That hon. minister obviously set out to substantiate a very poor argument by using the very weakest quotation he could find in Hansard. Let me congratulate him on his success.

Under our rules we are required to accept the word of an hon. member. In the circumstances of the present situation we are required to accept the word of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) as to what took place during those wee small hours that he talked about. By the same token we are required to call Claude Jodoin and Mr. Cutler liars because of what they said as to what took place.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: On a point of order,

[Mr. Mongrain.]

Mr. Speaker. I would like to know who said that Messrs. Jodoin and Cutler were liars?

[English]

Mr. Howard: Had the hon. minister been listening he might have understood what I said, but for his benefit I will repeat myself. Our rules require us to accept the word of hon. members of this house. Accordingly we must accept what the Minister of Labour told us took place at these meetings. Whenever there is a conflict between what has been said by the minister and what has been said by Mr. Jodoin and Mr. Cutler as to what took place we must accept the minister's version, and therefore classify the other two gentlemen as liars.

Mr. Marchand: That is not true.

Mr. Howard: That is a regrettable situation, but it is what hon. gentlemen opposite are asking us to do. I for one think this is an extreme misuse of the rules of this house. Unfortunately this misuse will continue so long as the government blindly insists on ramming this bill through parliament, and so long as the government refuses to accept the cautious course advocated by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in his amendment.

If hon. members opposite would accept our advice and proceed cautiously in regard to this bill, permitting the subject matter to go to a committee before which hon. gentlemen here, Mr. Jodoin and Mr. Cutler could appear as witnesses, perhaps the committee could come to a conclusion as to the facts. The key to the whole matter is, as has been said by many hon. members and by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who said what, and who agreed to what? I quite frankly say this, with all due respect to the rules and the minister, that at this juncture I am not prepared to accept the minister's version as to what took place, because on a number of occasions when he has spoken in this house about this matter he has hedged, qualified and been vague.

I think in a situation such as this, perhaps unique in labour-management history, perhaps unique in parliamentary history, that was no time for the Minister of Labour to be coy. It was no time for him to be silent about this extremely vital question of whether or not there should be compulsory arbitration. I should like to read what the minister said, as have other hon. members. On June 14 the minister announced the settlement of the dispute. I shall read only the particularly relevant sections of his remarks. I do not want to read them out of context, and if anybody wants me to read the whole thing, I will do so. He said, as reported at page 6368:

> It was difficult if not impossible for the parties to agree on the nature and extent of possible increases of productivity.

He was there approaching the nub of this question. Then he said:

> When this situation developed I, as Minister of Labour, several weeks ago announced that I intended to set up a commission of inquiry under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to inquire into the possibilities of improving productivity—

That was the time the minister should have disclosed that he was going to do something unique. This was the time that I contend the minister misled the house by not going further, by not saying that he really did not intend to set up a commission under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act as it exists. He should have said: We intend to follow that up by introducing legislation which will make that commissioner's report final and binding. He did not say that at that time.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Gladly.

Mr. Nicholson: Was the hon. member in the house this afternoon and did he hear the minister's explanation of why he did not say that?

Mr. Howard: If you wait, I will give you the answer—if you will sit down. No, I was not in the house, unfortunately. I had every hope, desire and intention of being here, but other circumstances more personal than public unfortunately kept me away. I did not hear the minister's explanation. I would be glad to listen to it now. I realize we would be running contrary to the rules in doing this, because my hon. friend from York South ran into this difficulty before. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have to go in the direction of saying that the minister should have related that on that day. The minister then said:

> I now wish to confirm that I intend to set up such a commission within the next few days. I will have more to say on that subject when I announce the appointment of the commissioner.

The minister was giving an indication of something vague and indefinite at that time, true; but an indication of something else, something in addition to the mere appointment of a commissioner under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I submit that the minister was probably ashamed to say it at that time—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I think that when I asked the question that I asked a few moments ago the hon. member should at least have asked for a copy of Hansard, or the blues of this afternoon, or something else, before carrying on in this vein, becaue I explained in no uncertain terms that I had prepared a statement to be used in the house and had deleted a section of it at the request of the lawyer for the I.L.A., because he said he thought the representatives of the unions should be allowed to explain it to their membership before any statements were made in this house about proposed legislation. It was done at their request, and the original notes that were sent up to Hansard will show that.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, when the minister rose on the question of privilege I inquired of my hon. friend from York South what was said, so I have heard it from two sources. This is all the more reason why the minister should send this subject matter to a committee in order to get at the true facts of the situation, because I understand that Mr. Cutler denies that. Whether he does or not, I cannot say. What went on in those wee, small hours of the morning is unknown to me. I submit that perhaps the minister can be excused for not having disclosed that information to the house on June 14—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a question of privilege. The statement I made did not refer to anything that happened in the wee, small hours of the morning; it referred to something that took place just as I was coming into the house with a prepared statement.

Mr. Howard: The minister just said that on June 14 he did not make any reference to the compulsory feature of the legislation which he intended to introduce because he was requested not to do so by Mr. Cutler. Whether that took place in the wee small hours of the morning, I really do not know. It took place presumably in a conversation between the minister and Mr. Cutler. The minister says one thing: Mr. Cutler says another. All that the amendment before us seeks is a bit of reason, a bit of sense of fair play in order that parliament can hear somebody else's side of the story. The minister apparently did not treat Mr. Cutler's request with any great respect because on June 14 he told us he would have something further to say about the subject upon the appointment of the commissioner.

On June 23 the minister announced the appointment of the commissioner and his remarks were noticeably barren of any reference to this something additional. Was that at the request of Mr. Cutler or anybody else? Let me read the statement the minister made on June 23:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies in English and French of the appointment of Dr. Laurent Picard, under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, as a commission to investigate and report on certain outstanding matters arising out of the industrial dispute that involved longshoring operations and related trades in the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec.

Let me read part of it again:

> —as a commission to investigate and report—

Those are the words in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, "investigate and report"—not "investigate and impose". I submit that, with all the bland comments of the minister, he is doing a darned poor job of trying to cover up for gross mismanagment in an attempt to represent one particular side in this dispute. I am not one of those who usually refers to years of experience, and the like, but never have I heard anything in the labour-management field as terrible as this. The most gracious way in which I can put it, the most kind comment I can make is that it is a piece of legislation based on a misunderstanding.

For heaven's sake, Mr. Minister, don't ask this parliament to stigmatize itself by authorizing yellow dog contracts. There have been enough of them in the past, of sell-out contracts by unscrupulous individuals in both the labour and management fields, and to demean the position of parliament in endorsing such things is, I think, asking too much of parliament.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) earlier today referred, by way of query I think, to the contents of a bill in my name which was listed for introduction. Because this information was requested I think it might be worth while to place on the record the key points of that particular bill, those that relate to the question of negotiations and operation under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I might say that even though the bill was in my name, I only acted in that respect as an agent for the party itself, because this was a matter of strong unanimity.

[Mr. Howard.]

● (8:00 p.m.)

We had no illusions that the bill would be accepted or that it might become law; such is not the course to be followed in this house. Our main contention and approach at that time was to get negotiations under way which would lead to a solution.

Let me read clause 7 of the bill that I had hoped I could introduce. It says:

> The company and each union—

And let me add there are previous parts to this interpretation clause which define the words "company" and "union". It goes on to say:

> —shall forthwith and, in any case not later than five days from the commencement of this act, enter into negotiations with a view to the settlement of any matters presently in dispute beween them as to the terms of an amendment or revision of the existing collective agreement, and shall negotiate in good faith with one another and make every reasonable effort to conclude a settlement and to enter into a new collective agreement.

The principal point behind this clause is not compulsory arbitration but compulsory negotiations, which I think anyone would want to see, because for some five weeks up to that time there had been no attempts to bargain in good faith so as to reach a conclusion in the dispute. We felt that one of the principal points in any law of this nature should hinge upon the requirement that there be collective bargaining in good faith.

I might add at this point that I received comments from several hon. gentlemen opposite in an unofficial way, and that they were almost venomous in their opposition to this sort of legislation. I will refrain from mentioning their names, as they know themselves better than I do, but their objections and comments made to me personally related to compulsory arbitration. This is another reason why I welcome the opportunity to present the principal point in this bill, which is that it does not contain any element of compulsion, except to require compulsory negotiations which are most necessary in order to reach a settlement.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he would read all the operative sections of this bill? I do not ask him to waste the time of the house by reading the interpretation clause, but maybe he will read to us all the operative clauses, and not just clause 7.

Mr. Howard: That is what I am doing. I will gladly make this bill available, as I did to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister who asked me specifically if he could have a copy. Subclause 2 reads as follows:

If at the expiration of 60 days from the commencement of negotiations pursuant to subsection (1) any matters in dispute have not been settled such matters shall be referred to an industrial inquiry commission consisting of a single commissioner—

This is a departure from the general rule.

—appointed pursuant to subsection (1) and (2) of section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act;

I may say here that it has long been my belief that a three-man arbitration and conciliation board is a waste of time because two of the members represent their people, and when a conflict arises within the board itself concerning the matter in dispute, it invariably falls upon the chairman to make a decision anyway.

Mr. Marchand: Did the hon. member ask the labour movement what it thinks about having a single arbitrator?

Mr. Howard: I was in the International Woodworkers of America for a long period of time and in our contract we had a single arbitrator, the late Chief Justice Gordon McG. Sloan.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. gentleman say "a single arbitrator"?

Mr. Howard: Yes, in the contract that existed. When I was in the International Woodworkers of America, our contract named a single arbitrator, the late Chief Justice Gordon McG. Sloan to arbitrate in disputes arising out of collective agreements, not those dealing with negotiations which was an entirely separate matter.

May I also say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that I am not representing labour; I am here to try to legislate for the good of the nation. It is my view that a single commissioner would be far more beneficial than a tripartite group in a case such as this.

Subclause 2 goes on to read:

—provided however, that in the event the union and the company fail to agree upon the person who should constitute the industrial inquiry commission the governor in council shall make the appointment within five days of the expiration of the said 60 days.

This is standard practice. Subclause (3) reads:

Immediately following its appointment the industrial inquiry commission shall inquire into the matters in dispute and shall give full opportunity to all parties to present evidence and make representations.

This again is standard practice.

The following clause is a departure from the provisions in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It reads as follows:

The industrial inquiry commission shall have the authority to make reports including recommendations to the Minister of Labour from time to time on matters referred to it, but in any event all such matters shall be recommended upon not later than the first day of June, 1967.

This would allow the commissioner ample time and opportunity to study the matters involved in the dispute and to make recommendations about them, provided that by June 1, 1967 all the matters had been disposed of.

Note the key word "reports", which is taken from the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and which the Minister of Labour used on June 23 when he announced the appointment of Dr. Picard as the commissioner, with the same implication—that he report.

Subclause (5) reads as follows:

Upon receipt of a report including recommendations from the industrial inquiry commission relating to any matter in dispute between the company and each union, the Minister of Labour shall furnish a copy to each of the parties affected and shall publish the same in such manner as he sees fit.

This again is the standard approach.

Subclause (6) reads as follows:

Nothing in this act shall be deemed to limit or restrict the rights of the parties to an existing collective agreement to agree to vary or amend any of the terms thereof and to give effect thereto.

This is the operative part of the proposed legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman another question? Is there no provision in the legislation requiring the I.L.A. members to go back to work?

Mr. Howard: Yes, this is again standard practice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman read that clause?

Mr. Howard: The proposed bill, patterned as it was on one passed by this parliament some time ago, arranges for the appointment of an administrator to carry on the business of the company. There is a further requirement that every employee who was then on strike should return to the duties of his employment, that there would be no discrimination against him and the like. There is also a provision for wages, which we understood at that time had been a matter of agreement amongst the parties, although it is true they hinged upon certain other factors. I left this clause out because I thought the Minister of Transport and other hon. members on the government side of the house would have a sufficient knowledge of such legislation to know that these provisions would automatically be included in such a bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say, sir, that I would still be very grateful to the hon. gentleman if he would read every clause, without commenting on each, except for clause 7 which he has already read, so that we will all be acquainted with what was in the proposed bill.

Mr. Howard: If the minister had had sufficient interest, as did the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, to make inquiries about these provisions at the time I gave notice on the order paper, he would have been acquainted with the bill. If the minister's colleagues or hon. members on his side of the house had not refused our request for unanimous consent to introduce the bill, it would have been introduced and made public. It is only upon the request of the minister that I brought it forward today.

Mr. Marchand: Perhaps I should not ask a general question of this nature, but will the hon. gentleman tell me whether according to his bill the workers would have had to return to work?

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Well, if the minister had been listening he would know I said they would, under an administrator, to carry on the business of loading and unloading the ships.

Mr. Marchand: In other words, you would have denied the right of the workers to strike?

Mr. Douglas: That is as logical as the speech the minister made this afternoon.

Mr. Macaluso: You would not know what logic was.

Mr. Howard: As I said earlier to the minister in these remarks, I appreciate his ability to distort the facts and misinterpret statements. However, no matter how hard you try, you are not going to do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might request the hon. gentleman, very humbly, just to read his bill, for the benefit of those of us who did not think we had a right to have it before the house was in possession of it?

Mr. Howard: You had the right to have it, if you had not objected.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not object.

Mr. Howard: Not you, personally, I know; you would not dare do anything like that. It would run against your grain to settle a matter of this sort. I still have the stencils for mimeographing this bill in my office and I will gladly run off a few thousand copies for the minister tomorrow if he wants them. If I were to read the bill clause by clause, I would take far too long. I believe I have covered the salient points.

What we have before us in this bill—

Mr. Nicholson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? While I have not seen a copy of the bill, I have read the press release, and I should like to ask if the bill presented by the hon. member was not predicated on the fact that a firm offer had been made by the Shipping Federation? Is there any evidence to support the idea there was an unconditional offer made by the Shipping Federation?

Mr. Howard: The bill was predicated upon a desire to get that aspect of our economy moving again and, hopefully of stirring the hon. gentleman off his seat in order to get cracking on that particular dispute.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would mind answering my question?

Mr. Howard: You are just too impatient, that is all. This indicates a weak position on your part, since you are trying to push something through the house which you cannot fully substantiate. Part of the bill related to wage increases—

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Howard: Just watch that impatience; you will never get any further in the cabinet that way, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is watching you. He does not like this impatience. He likes to take things slow and easy, mostly so that he can change his mind later at any convenient time.

The bill I drafted contained a provision with respect to wage increases which, as I said before, we understood at that time had been the subject of agreement between the parties. It is true we understood also they were connected with some other matters which formed part of the package. Not being privy to the offers and counter-offers, other than by gossip and hearsay, what else could one do? If I had been in the minister's position, and I say this quite humbly, perhaps things would have been started a lot faster than they were. If the minister had had any really serious desire to deal with this matter he would have done so long before he got pushed into it.

The bill before us contains a provision which, no matter how you dress it up, no matter how you misinterpret what the effects might be, no matter how you want to qualify it, calls for compulsory arbitration based on sneakiness. There is not and has not yet been exhibited any intention on the part of the government to allow the other people who were involved in this discussion to tell parliament what their views are. We have had one of three sides presented and we are being asked, under the rules, to accept that statement as the gospel truth.

The worst feature about the bill is that parliament is being asked to force the unknown upon two elements in our society. Parliament is being asked to legislate for some unknown thing in the future, a most unique sort of proposal. Parliament is being asked to say to the Shipping Federation of Canada: We do not know what this is all about, but we think Dr. Picard will be able to find out and he will force you to do certain things. We are being asked to say to the longshoremen who are working there: We do not know anything about the procedures of loading or unloading ships, but we are going to force you to accept what Dr. Picard tells us, you should accept that, because he does not know anything about it either. This is what I consider to be the worst feature of the bill, and I believe it should be rejected. It does not matter who said what or who did not say what or whether was an agreement about certain things, which I submit the amendment seeks to work out. The principal feature, which I understand the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) presented with some force, as did the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), was that we were being asked to legislate some unknown quality in the future, and impose upon unsuspecting people some unknown provision relating to their wages, hours and working conditions.

Since wages have a connection with prices and profits we are being asked to legislate on one aspect of the economic activity in the longshore industry. The natural follow-up when you start to legislate on wages—and this is why I was reluctant to introduce my draft bill, and I am sure this is why the minister is reluctant, and why the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) is able to say his feelings about compulsory arbitration are such as to prevent his accepting something even approximating compulsory arbitration,—is that parliament must step in and legislate with regard to the other two aspects as well. This is an exeremely dangerous step for anybody who has any sincere desire to see free collective bargaining take place. This is another reason I think the bill should be rejected. It would be one more interference with the whole structure of prices, administration and profits. I am not saying that at some time this might not be a desirable thing. However, it is most unfair to extract one item and say we are going to impose particular conditions in respect of it, but allow the other two aspects to run free.

I do hope, even though there may be rancour and harsh feelings, perhaps some words said that would have been better left unsaid, that the minister will seriously consider accepting the proposal made by the hon. member for York South, namely referring the subject matter of this bill to a committee, so that parliament can get the story from all those who desire to appear before that committee. Perhaps on that basis parliament can come to some conclusion as to whether or not there was an agreement between the parties.

As the situation is now, we have one of three sides of the case and we are being asked to accept the hon. gentleman's word as gospel truth, because the rules say so. We are being asked to disregard whatever views the Shipping Federation or the longshoremen may have about this particular matter. The minister would be well advised to do this. If he does not, if he insists upon the course of ramming this particular legislation through parliament, he will be demeaning parlaiment. I, for one, simply cannot participate in parliament's being asked to legislate yellow dog contracts into existence for this union.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate at this time and very briefly to express my strong opposition to this proposed legislation, Bill No. C-215. In doing so I do not plan, of course, to attack the minister, for whom I have always had the greatest respect, and still have. However, I do think that he has been misguided in this situation.

We all know that since this government came into power the minister has been brought forward on a number of occasions by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to bail out other ministers who have dug a hole in which to bury themselves. We have not heard from them since, so he did a very good job. However, I am afraid that the minister must have dug a hole for himself on this occasion; and this is regrettable because I do not think that he would have done this on his own. I think there must have been some assistance from an unknown source, and in reviewing the situation it could be that there is the fine Pickersgillian hand behind the scenes, to the extent that as acting prime minister on that occasion possibly he has led the minister down the garden path. I do not know whether or not this is correct, but I suggest it could be so. Goodness knows, we are bad enough off now with the present Prime Minister; but I hope that the day will never come when we will have the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) as prime minister.

The minister said in his remarks today that Mr. Claude Jodoin was opposed to binding legislation; that the union did not agree to a commissioner or to binding legislation. He also mentioned, through questioning I think, that an agreement was drafted by the deputy minister of labour. So here we have a situation where the government practically draws up an agreement, at least from what I have been told. Then someone has said to the Shipping Federation: Look, you agree to that and we will see that there is legislation brought in, and everything will be hunkey-dory for the shipping federation.

What are we faced with in this legislation, Mr. Speaker? The hon. members for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and York South (Mr. Lewis) put the situation exceptionally well and placed the case before the house, so I do not intend to recall dates, telegrams or letters, to show who said what and who did not say what. Both hon. members are to be commended for the fine job that they did of pointing out the flaws in this iniquitous and vicious—as I think it is—legislation. I cannot see the justification for compulsory arbitration. I am not for it, I will never be for it and I will vote against it.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

As was said by the two hon. members to whom I have referred, this legislation is compulsory arbitration in its most extreme and its worst form. As other hon. members have said, it will put into effect recommendations which are not yet even made. We do not know what this commissioner will say.

Supposing, Mr. Speaker, we approved this bill, and the commissioner says in his report that from now on only Liberals will be employed on the docks. That could happen. It is just as reasonable to suggest that as to suggest anything else. We do not know what this man will recommend. The bill is asking parliament to legislate approval of the commissioner's report. It places the commissioner in an impossible position because any recommendation that he makes will become law at once.

With regard to the position of the government, I suggest that they made a deal with the company to guarantee legislative action to cut the work gangs. The minister admitted in his speech that that was one of the conditions. But the deal was not—

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. Can he refer to any part of my speech where I said any such thing? Would it not be fairer to say that a reduction in gang strength might take place?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I thank the minister for that correction. One would assume that that is going to happen. The minister said "might take place", but I leave it to hon. members and the people interested to draw their own conclusions.

I suggest that the deal was not fully explained to the union members. We have as an appendix to Hansard copies of all of the wires, statements and so on to which I have already referred, to the effect that the union was definitely not in favour of compulsory arbitration. Labour is against compulsory arbitration, as certainly it should be. If we in this house have any thoughts at all for the workingman, we should be against compulsory arbitration.

This legislation is compulsory arbitration. The company dictated the terms to the government, and the government is asking parliament, as another member said today, to rubberstamp these terms. This is bad law. It is dirty, mean, cheap law; but not cheap for the workers concerned: I think it will be expensive for them.

We do not know, Mr. Speaker, for what we are legislating. Did you ever hear of anything so ridiculous? The minister comes into the house with a bill and the government says they want it approved. But we do not know what we will be voting on. We do not know what is in the mind of the commissioner, who has not yet made his study. This is bad legislation in that it imposes compulsory arbitration and destroys the collective bargaining process. It is an example of a devious tactic by the government in making a deal with the company and not spelling it out to the union.

The minister would have us believe that those representing the union are not telling the truth. As a member of parliament, a supporter of labour and as a Conservative I feel that this makeshift, anti-labour type of legislation must be rejected, must be voted down. We should wait until the report is made, until we see what are the recommendations of the commissioner, and get the reactions of the company and of the men. Who knows, Mr. Speaker, there may be no necessity for any legislation. We cannot tell until we see the report, and as yet there is no report.

This kind of approach, which imposes settlement on terms which are not yet known, destroys faith in parliament and in the government—that is, if many people still have much faith in this government. One of the rights of labour is not to be considered guilty until proven guilty. Labour has rights and management has rights. This bill should certainly be held back. We should vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South to refer the bill to a standing committee.

Before the dinner hour this afternoon we had the amazing spectacle of the minister of manpower, or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand)—whichever you prefer to call him—who is responsible for matters respecting labour in this country, in many respects coming out with what amounted to a defence of compulsory arbitration. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, that this hon. gentleman, with his long and excellent record in the labour movement, would make the speech he did this afternoon? I found it rather difficult to realize that he was making the type of speech that he was. He said he was not in on the negotiations, and I for one feel that he should have been. With his long experience and his good record he should have been in on the negotiations. If the Minister of Transport was, then we might as well have had some of the fat cats around, such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), the "minister" from Davenport, and a few of these great champions of labour. We could have had them around. I am sure they would have worried about the union and the workingmen.

This afternoon the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration defended the government's action in this matter. He defended a procedure through which parliament is asked to make into law recommendations that are not yet revealed. Am I correct in assuming that the former union leader, now the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, is saying that the present leader of the Canadian Labour Congress is not telling the truth? Would this be the right interpretation, I wonder? Would it be correct to assume, from the remarks that have been made, that the minister defended a situation where parliament is asked to impose the terms of a collective bargaining agreement between the parties, which have been arrived at by a government appointed commission?

The minister is defending the setting out of conditions dictated by the companies and approved by the Minister of Labour. As I have already said, I feel badly about that. I feel that the Minister of Labour is misdirected and misguided, because in his other portfolios he has done an excellent job of bailing out the Prime Minister and this government. Certainly, I hope that he will listen to reason and take another tack on this occasion.

One of the major points in dispute is the size of work gangs. This was the issue of most concern to the companies. The minister as I understand it, said that he would settle this question through the commission. Parliament would make the report of that commission binding, even without seeing it.

The unions categorically refused to reduce work gangs. Whether the unions were right is not the issue at the moment. The point is that the size of work gangs was one of the major matters between the parties. Through the companies' request the minister has removed this matter from the area of collective bargaining and made it a matter of compulsion. If there is any other interpretation than the one I mentioned I should like to hear it. Regardless of how long and how hard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration shouted in this house this afternoon, I am sure he did not convince me that compulsory arbitration was the correct or the right thing to do.

There is an old saying that when you have a weak case you have to shout. The minister was so loud that it was difficult to hear the translator, through the system.

Mr. Marchand: Complain about the translator and not about me.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Could the hon. minister repeat that? I did not hear him.

Mr. Marchand: The hon. member should complain about the translator, and not about me.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): What a brilliant statement. That was great—great.

Mr. Sharp: It is like your brilliant speech.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): We have an interjection from this great Minister of Finance. What is your stand in this? Are you against labour? I would think you are.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly address the Chair.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to. But when there are objections from across the floor, as the volatile former minister of finance used to say: "When I am provoked, I must reply".

We have these great exponents of labour with us.

An hon. Member: Don't be deterred by rabbits.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): No. We have these Bay street boys, these potential leaders of parties. They will be great leaders for the labour movement. The labour movement will remember them.

At the companies' request, as I have already said, the minister removed this matter from the area of collective bargaining and made it a matter of compulsion. Does this represent collective bargaining, as it is understood by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? Is this his type of collective bargaining? Of course, the minister goes on to say that it all depends whether this sort of thing is what you want. It has been made clear in everything that has been said both during and after the negotiations, that the union was unalterably opposed to having an imposed settlement on this issue.

Mr. Douglas: They should send it to the committee, to find out.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): It should be sent to the committee. We would have an opportunity to find out what the union felt about this. As matters stand at the moment, we have the interpretation by the Minister of Labour of what others said, and what was to be thought of their statements at these gatherings. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said, in long, drawn-out meetings of this nature there is bound to be confusion and it is difficult to remember who said what, and who did not say something.

I therefore suggest to the minister, as others have, that the whole situation should be brought to the committee. Let us delve into it. Statements have been made by Mr. Jodoin and by Mr. Cutler. After the minister revealed the nature of this legislation, what do Messrs. Cutler and Jodoin say? They are uniformly opposed.

This afternoon the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that the Leader of the Opposition suggested a kind of compulsory arbitration to settle a rail strike in 1950. That is not correct. The Leader of the Opposition simply pointed out that the government had acted in a certain way. The minister, in his own words said that this was the worst kind of interference on that occasion. May I point out that the matter referred to was undertaken by a Liberal government under former prime minister St. Laurent. Certainly the matter was not similar to the one we are discussing, because at least labour on that occasion knew what it was getting.

I was deeply shocked by the stand taken by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, having for many years watched his activities in his former position, and having felt that there was much good in his stands on many, many occasions. I admire the work he did on behalf of labour. How can he tell Mr. Jodoin, Mr. Cutler, or the labour movement in this country: This is the best thing for you, because I say it is the best thing for you. That is what it amounts to.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we vote down this legislation. It is mean; it is small, it does not represent our way of life, it does not represent the Canadian way of life. We do not like compulsory arbitration. Certainly there are problems, but there must be another way of settling them. I for one will vote against this measure.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I find myself able to support the amendment to the bill for reasons different from what might be expected. I do not believe we should concern ourselves particularly about the truth of various versions of what went on in the negotiations, because no matter how many witnesses are called, or how many times we go through the various versions of what happened, we shall really be no closer to the truth than is the audience of Rashomon when it hears the final version of what happened in the bamboo grove.

I feel that we ought to concern ourselves with the terms of the agreement as presented in the appendix to Hansard, and with the bill itself. The hon. member for York South spoke of the government's responsibility to labour. Some of us, I think, are concerned with the government's responsibility to the entire country. The agriculture industry is periodically threatened by stoppages at various docks, which become increasingly crucial year by year. Small businessmen found themselves seriously hampered this year when the tourist season opened, and the wares they expected to have were tied up at the Montreal dock. As a result financial loss was suffered thousands of miles away from Montreal. There is a concern that goes far beyond the immediate in this type of dispute, and we have to concern ourselves with it.

The situation at the docks, like many other situations in this country, will have to be dragged into the twentieth century, and it will be dragged screaming very loudly. We can see that from listening to part of the discussion this afternoon.

I know how important it is to the government to be able to put the best possible face on this agreement because we have heard a great deal, even today, about holding the line. We know at least one group of Canadian citizens who are being asked to hold the line somewhat longer. In the light of inflationary tendencies we know that the settlement of the dispute at the Montreal dock was a real break with the policy to hold the line, and so it becomes very important to the government to be able to say: Yes, but look at what we got in return for that; we got at least our foot in the doorway leading to compulsory arbitration.

I do not profess to be a labour person, but I have been involved in salary agreement negotiations and I know how intricate, how prolonged and how tense this kind of negotiations can be. I have had the experience of having to go back to a large number of people and saying: "This is exactly what we agreed to do." I find it hard to agree that the long list of people who signed this agreement could have been so naive, so fresh, so new and so innocent that they would have allowed this clause with its "or otherwise" to stand throughout the agreement. Possibly unwittingly it is there.

I am sure that the people who negotiated know that the whole question of automating the docks will have to be faced some day, sooner or later. What the "or otherwise" does, and what this legislation does, is to take the job out of the hands of the people negotiating the agreement and put it into the hands of parliament. If passed, this legislation will let the government off the hook, but it will let the negotiators of the agreement off the hook as well.

On the other hand, if we look at the terms of the legislation we find that they are concerned with the size and make up of work gangs, but there is also a clause concerning the safeguarding of job security, and in both these cases we run into the problem of looking into the future and not knowing what the suggestions of the commissioner may be.

I do not feel that it is any task of parliament unknowingly to enshrine a feather-bed situation, which we could do if we were to bring in a redundancy fund. We could do that and clearly know, when we are doing it, that we are bringing in a redundancy fund for people removed from employment by automation. Let us be sure we are doing that, if that is what we are doing. On the other hand, if we are setting up compulsory arbitration—and it might not be a bad idea—let us be sure we are doing that. Or, if we are moving into the area of labour courts, where this question can be examined by a body separate from parliament, where a great deal of expertise can be built up over the years, let us be very clear that that is what we are doing. But let us not do it on the basis of this bill, and on the basis of the expression "or otherwise."

Here I am not questioning the veracity of the minister in the statements he made this afternoon. I have never found that personal attack or rudeness accomplished anything, either in this sort of situation or in negotiations for salary agreements. I think we can face the legislation as it is before us, and reject it on other bases quite removed from the basis of personality.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, one of the things which impressed me about the minister's introduction of this bill was the length of the double-barrelled speech he delivered earlier today and the other evening when he first moved second reading. I know him well enough to believe he was making an attempt, to the best of his knowledge and ability, to present the house with a full, detailed account of the rather tumultuous events in which he was deeply involved, leading up to the point at which we now find ourselves.

The question of whether the minister's story was complete and told the whole events has been discussed by previous speakers. The point I would like to make is that the longer I listend to him the more convinced I became that he had so lost himself in the trees that he was not able to see the forest, and the fact that we have this obnoxious piece of legislation before us is because, in the course of being involved in these trees, the minister lost his sense of perspective in this whole matter. As a result, I feel that the minister and the government are asking parliament to compound a most grievous error in this whole field of labour-management relations, and the role of government and parliament in them.

The sequence of events covers quite an extended period, but certainly up to the time when this bill was announced no one in the house had serious reason to believe that the government had anything of this nature in mind. On June 9 the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) addressed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who, in reply, said he felt there would be an early break-through in negotiations and, as recorded at page 6173 of Hansard, said:

> We have not given up that hope. Judge Lippé is negotiating at this moment; we have been in touch with him during the last hour and we have not by any means given up hope that this serious issue will be settled very shortly by the processes of free collective bargaining and not by parliamentary direction.

Some hon. members, presumably on the government side, are recorded as having said, "Hear, hear".

[Mr. Johnston.]

• (8:50 p.m.)

Then the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson):

> In view of statements made last night in a national telecast regarding compulsory arbitration in this critical strike situation, what is the point at which the right hon. gentleman considers the national interest will take priority over the desire, now expressed in government policy, to refrain from interference with free collective bargaining?

Then Mr. Pearson is reported as saying:

> That is a matter for the government of the day and the parliament of the day to decide. It is a very important and very difficult matter to decide. It will have to be left to the responsibility of government and of parliament in respect of any particular situation. Meanwhile, I can say our decision on this matter is not made easier by the kind of press release the New Democratic Party issued this morning.

Then some hon. members again, presumably on the government side, are reported as having said "Hear, hear".

Mr. Speaker, reference already has been made to the statement of the minister when he announced the settlement of the dispute. I should like to draw attention to the reaction to the minister's statement on motions on June 14 by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), when he commented on behalf of this party. This I believe confirms the impression certainly that was in my mind, and so far as I know in the minds of all members of the house, with the possible exception of those who were privy to the discussions in cabinet. At page 6368 the hon. member to Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) said:

> Thtre will be a sigh of relief across this country that the longshoremen's strike has now ended. I can assure the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister that the members of this party are very happy that a solution has been found without the necessity of parliamentary intervention.

A little later at page 6369 of Hansard he goes on to say:

> I hope we will receive from the minister very soon some details as to the terms of the settlement. The minister mentioned, for instance, that he is going to set up a commission of inquiry to look into the question of the reduction of work gangs. While the minister uses the term "productivity", I take it from the statements made by the shipping federation that when they refer to productivity they are talking about getting the same amount of work done with smaller work gangs.
> I certainly have no objection to the idea of setting up a commission of inquiry to look into this matter, providing the decisions and recommendations of that commission are not binding upon both parties but are simply for the purpose of providing a basis upon which collective bargaining negotiations may continue. I hope the minister will give us some more information about that, perhaps when the orders of the day are called.

Well, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned this assumption that was made on that day, on the strength of the minister's announcement that the inquiry commission was to follow the processes of free collective bargaining, continued until the minister burst this bombshell in the house. In view of statements which have been made persistently by members of the government and their supporters on that side of the house, I must say that it came as a great shock to me that this kind of action would be taken, particularly with the knowledge we have of the background of some of the members of this present government.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think all of us recognize that at the present time we are in the midst of a rather crucial situation within our economy, and that it is a responsibility of all members of the house to give some serious thought to just in what direction we should move, and what is the role of parliament and of government in the whole field of collective bargaining with particular reference to the questions involved in this period of rapid technological change. My own observation is that this question is at the root of most of the disputes which have been developing in recent times. I have had some experience of first hand participation in industrial warfare. So far as I am concerned it is a nasty, messy, rather inefficient way of arriving at a settlement of the issues which are involved.

There is a responsibility on parliament and on government to seek to find techniques which will eliminate the necessity in the minds of those in the industrial field, both on the side of management and on the side of the workers, to resort to this kind of action. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this piece of legislation, which in my view has been hasty and ill conceived, will open up a real Pandora's box in this field, if it is allowed to receive the consent of this house for its passage. This will set a precedent, if it is passed, which some of the members of the present government certainly will live to regret. I would join with others who have spoken to ask the government to reconsider this request that they have placed before the house, no matter what may have been the commitments made by some of the members of this government in the heat of the moment, and indeed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) who, perhaps somewhat understandably in view of the great number of hours during which he was holding meetings, was lost among the trees in what admittedly was a very difficult and complex situation, and one which in many ways did involve the vital interests of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to recall to the attention of members of the house some remarks the minister made when he was introducing in the house in the month of May the estimates of the department for which he has responsibility. On May 27, as will be found at page 5631 of Hansard the minister is recorded as saying the following—and I am going to quote him at some little length because I believe what he had to say on that occasion is very relevant to the matter we now have before us:

> Before discussing even briefly the activities of the Department of Labour, having in mind the field of responsibilities that remain with it since January 1, I think it might be well if I made a very short statement about the general economic situation we have in Canada today, and more particularly about those aspects of this general economic situation which are of special interest to Canadian workers and employers.
> I would not be frank if I did not say to this committee that I, as minister, and my department, have been plagued with a flood of disastrous strikes over the past few weeks. These strikes all seriously threaten the Canadian economy, and I urge all members of this house, regardless of party, to apply their minds to this serious situation which threatens our basic economy. We should be applying our minds in an attempt to find some corrective formula or solution which will prevent matters from getting completely out of hand.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say I agree wholeheartedly with that part of the statement the minister made when he was introducing his estimates. Then he goes on to refer to the situation in the province of British Columbia from which both he and I come. A little later on he makes reference to the more immediate situation which is involved in the question before us:

> We are faced with the situations that have been referred to in the last week, namely the dock strike in Montreal, the threatened strike in Air Canada, the railway problems and others which are particularly serious. I really think that we should apply our minds in an attempt to find some solution to this extremely grave situation.
> I have not been in this office long enough to be able to say whether the solution lies in the establishment of arbitration or of labour courts, such as those that have been set up in Australia and other countries of the world. The answer may lie in that kind of action because, while they have had divided success, on the whole they have been successful. I throw that idea out as something that merits the serious consideration of all members of this house and of all Canadians.

• (9:00 p.m.)

On May 27 the minister said he had not been in office long enough to be able to say whether or not the solution lies in the establishment of compulsory arbitration, and he was referring to the dock strike at the St. Lawrence river ports. I do not know what happened in the interval between May 27 and now which enabled the minister to suddenly make up his mind, but apparently he has now had enough experience to suddenly decide that this kind of blunt instrument which he has put forward in this bill provides the solution to the problems he was outlining when he introduced the estimates of his department.

As I said earlier, I think the minister was confronted with serious problems, but the government and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) dragged their heels far too long and have now pushed the panic button. This piece of legislation is the result. I agree with the minister's statement in introducing his estimates when he said we should give serious thought as members of parliament and as Canadian citizens to the solution of these problems. At that time I was somewhat concerned because of the minister's rather passing reference to the possibility of compulsory arbitration. I began to wonder at that time whether the minister was serious, and I must admit any fears raised in my mind at that time were allayed by the statements consistently made by members on the government benches regarding the desire and the intention of the government to adhere to the principles of free collective bargaining. It was my feeling that this reference by the minister was a passing aberration and not something that needed to be of immediate concern to hon. members in this house.

I did take seriously the minister's earlier suggestion that hon. members of this house address themselves to this question of how to settle industrial disputes of the kind he referred to on May 27. About that time I was absent from the house on a trip to Geneva and I spent a good deal of my travelling time reflecting upon the significance of the minister's statement. When I returned I was very pleased to discover that some of my colleagues in the New Democratic party, who had been here in the house during that period, had been giving serious consideration to this question.

As a result of that invitation the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) introduced a bill. He did not introduce it lightly, but as a result of a good deal of thought. It was introduced as a serious attempt to propose a constructive approach in dealing with problems of national consequence. As far as I am concerned, this type of bill should not be introduced lightly because, in effect it attempts to preserve the essential rights of free collective bargaining in every sense of that phrase, in situations where the national interest requires a resumption of certain operations upon which our economy is dependant.

The hon. member for Skeena proposed a bill at a time when we had reached a point where the St. Lawrence river ports were tied up. Apparently the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) has some serious doubts in his mind as to the solution of this problem. He has tried to pervert the intent of this bill and its meaning. He knows as well as I that the difference between compulsory arbitration, and the parliament of Canada saying to a group of workers that in the interests of Canada they must resume their activities, while continuing negotiations, is indeed great.

Had hon. members considered our proposal closely they would have realized that it includes a termination date, and that following that date, if the issues in dispute had not been resolved, the two parties involved would then be free to resume any other activities connected with arriving at a solution under the prevailing circumstances. In my mind this is not the desirable course of action for a parliament to take, but it is the kind of course that, under certain circumstances, becomes necessary. This course provides an alternative infinitely better than the one before us.

In my opinion the judgment of the Minister of Labour became warped under the pressure of events and this caused him to push the panic button. The problem at the nub of this whole situation is one which should not be resolved by the techniques proposed in this bill. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said earlier, this bill is a perversion of conciliation as intended by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, particularly in regard to the appointment of a commission of inquiry. This act is designed as a technique for resolving disputes resulting from technological changes. It was necessary because of a continued and persistent attempt by management of large industries in this country to maintain an archaic attitude toward the proper rights of management, in that collective bargaining is not a proper method of dealing with changes in job content, security of employees and the right to free meetings on a labour level.

From personal experience I know something about this archaic attitude. Before I became a member of this house I was involved in this sort of thing, on the side of unions and working people. The opportunity has presented itself for some personal reflection upon the issues involved. This kind of thing cannot properly be settled in the heat of a battle to arrive at a collective agreement. This is the kind of thing that can quite properly be the subject of an inquiry and the fact-finding analysis of a commissioner. If there is to be any real and permanent solution resulting from the findings of such a commission there must be an acceptance on the part of the parties involved. This will not result from an agreement obtained by threats jammed down the throats of the participants to the dispute.

That is the only way in which this kind of change can be brought about in a way which will tend to lessen the incidence of industrial disputes, unrest and dissatisfaction. I regret that instead of dealing with a bill of this kind we have not had from the Minister of Labour a bill which would implement in a broad way some of the principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Freedman in his report. Those kinds of recommendations and principles are applicable not only on the question of railway runthroughs but to other labour areas, and legislation based on them would become in effect a charter for the basic approach to negotiations in dealing with the rapidly changing industrial society in which we live.

We have had hints that the government has the report of Mr. Justice Freedman under consideration, but there is no suggestion in this bill that the commissioner in bringing in his binding report is to be activated or motivated in any way by the kind of principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Freedman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. gentleman a question. Has he read the terms of reference of the industrial inquiry?

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has he read the section relating to job security?

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and having read them I stand by the remarks I have just made. As I understand them, the terms of reference do not give any general policy direction to the commissioner in respect of making his report. They do set out the points he is to take into consideration in arriving at his findings, but they do not include the kind of terms of reference that I understand are inherent in the report of Mr. Justice Freedman.

I do not know whether the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) agrees with me, but I was trying to point out that there would have been a much happier situation in this house if we were considering and discussing the principles contained in the report of Mr. Justice Freedman, rather than being asked to adopt this kind of shotgun legislation to force a settlement that, for all we know, may simply mean that upon the termination of the agreement the whole matter will erupt into an open sore that will have been festering for the entire period of the agreement.

I do not suppose that consideration of this bill will be the end of this matter. I hope that the government, if they feel they made a commitment in the heat of these negotiations in respect of action along the lines the bill proposes, will consider that they have honoured that committment sufficiently by having placed this proposal before parliament and brought the bill to the point of second reading. But I would plead with the minister to at least agree to the kind of compromise proposal set out in the amendment now before the house. If this motion is adopted I submit it will do at least two things. It will have the practical effect of allowing the kind of discussion and representations referred to by some hon. members who spoke earlier in this debate. I suggest it will also enable the members of this house, through the committee, to be acquainted with and have knowledge of the findings of the commission before the matter came back to the floor of the house for final adjudication. It might be that if those findings were available and it could be established to the satisfaction of the members of the industrial relations committee that there were reasonable grounds, within the life of the agreement, for accepting the proposals, the house when it came back might be disposed to allow the passage of this bill, with the understanding that its effect was limited purely to the particular situation in respect of which the bill has been introduced.

If we allowed the bill to go through without this type of examination I submit we would be opening the door to this sort of approach being used as a quick and easy solution to every other problem that develops and appears to be serious. We will create the kind of atmosphere wherein parties to a dispute will no longer feel there is much point in engaging in serious collective bargaining, because they will know that in any event the government will step in, appoint a commissioner under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and say: You are going to accept whatever the inquiry commissioner decides, regardless of your collective bargaining.

Just at the time members on the treasury benches have been lauding the fact that the government of Canada is introducing collective bargaining for those in the public service of this country, they come into the house with a bill that takes the feet right out from under the whole principle of collective bargaining. It makes the measure for collective bargaining in the federal service a hollow and meaningless thing.

Surely the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the other members of the government are able to see the implications of this piece of legislation and should not attempt to force the members of the house to accept this method as a quick and easy solution of a problem which the government found to be a difficult one.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I ask once again whether the Minister of Labour will not agree to accept the amendment that is before us, so that this whole matter may be considered in committee. If this were done we would perhaps have a better understanding of the whole situation, and in an atmosphere of good faith would be able to arrive at a meaningful solution to the problem this measure was introduced to solve.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of repeating the arguments that have been made in this debate, but I think a number of things have been overlooked in the negotiations carried on by the minister. I believe the reason they have been overlooked is in part due to the lack of experience of the minister in a field in which the situation is different from the fields of labour relations in which he has had experience. For this reason the minister may have been working under an extreme handicap. I believe there is another factor in respect of the negotiations in which the federal government has participated in this situation. The mediators the government engage on behalf of the Department of Labour are not particularly highly skilled, and do not command the respect that should be commanded by them and the department.

It has been demonstrated not only on this occasion but on others that a man of the calibre of the chief mediator whom we had in Ontario for four years, and who had reached international stature through his ability to bring parties together is not available in the federal department to be appointed to such a task. As a result, the negotiating parties faced the difficult negotiations which they have had to handle recently without the assistance they should have had and the minister had to handle more of the negotiations than would otherwise have been necessary.

I know that hon. members are getting restless, as they indicated earlier in the afternoon, and are already concerned about this situation which is backfiring, because if the terms of this legislation are carried out they will be bound by them and already they are faced with a wildcat strike. It appears to me that this situation will be duplicated in many other industries and the accomplishment which we thought had been achieved will be lost for some time as a result of this legislation.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the line taken by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It is perfectly all right to split hairs regarding whether or not there has been agreement on the part of the workers or the management in the memorandum, but this matter really was not spelled out. However the agreements indicated the scope and field under which the parties were willing to operate. The terms of the memorandum of agreement lead to negotiations regarding the implementation of the actual contract and were generally accepted by labour and management as binding. I think the minister must have signed such memoranda of agreement. He will agree that there was an understanding that the terms in the memorandum would be adhered to by the two parties. I am sure he is aware of the difficulty that he would have in renegotiating the terms agreed upon and that he would have trouble with the parties because they would want to know the exact terms of the memorandum of agreement before ratifying it. This is often done before a contract becomes legal and binding.

The government may not realize it, Mr. Speaker, but they have now decided to interfere in what is really a family affair. They may find themselves in a position similar to that of a family counsellor who after counselling a man and wife in a major dispute will never be their friend regardless of whether he has settled their difficulties. I therefore suggest that the minister should consider whether this agreement has in fact been accepted by both parties. If the government wishes to appoint someone to ascertain the role of automation in stevedoring and to do a time and motion study on the amount of productivity that can be achieved with the least number workers, they will have to obtain the co-operation of these people. I suggest their efforts will come to nothing if the union decides to sabotage this agreement without really objecting to this inquiry. The government will find that the job classification which will have to be undertaken will not be successful.

I believe there are many hon. members on the other side of the house who will be voting with the government because of their membership in the Liberal party and regardless of their duty to the people they represent. I know there are many members on that side of the house who have a labour background but when we hear a man as highly esteemed by the labour movement as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicating to the house that he also has feet of clay and putting political support above his conscience, even though he said this afternoon that he is violently opposed to compulsory arbitration he will have to speak long and loud to justify the fine line he is drawing in this type of legislation.

There are many members who should take a look at what this legislation will mean in the future because if this bill is passed it will be easy to duplicate and the need for the Department of Labour will no longer exist because all the government will have to do is to legislate. All those who have been closely connected with labour will find that laws can be passed against labour but they will not be accepted.

Look at the laws against labour which have been passed in the province of Quebec and those which have been passed in the province of Ontario, particularly in the municipal field. They have not accomplished what they were supposed to achieve. If some hon. members doubt this, how do they explain that in spite of the existence of specific municipal legislation a police strike has taken place and there is a threatened strike of hospital workers even though they do not have the right to strike? Labour legislation can only be applied if it is just and it is only in that case that it will be accepted. If those to whom it is applied do not feel it is just and warranted, then they will not operate under it. I am not suggesting they will break the law but I am sure they will look for many ways of circumventing its terms.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, why some cabinet minister did not propose legislation to the house when we appointed the commmission on biculturalism and bilingualism which did not receive a great deal of attention from any hon. members until it had reached the stage of an obsession? I wonder why we did not pass a bill implementing the terms of the report of the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism and make that report part of our legislation? It seems to me just as silly to ask someone to investigate a situation the full implications of which are not understood either by labour or management.

I think that quite an extensive intestigation regarding automation in this industry will have to be carried out before this legislation will receive the co-operation of those concerned. Yet we are now being asked, before even seeing the report of the commissioner, to legislate the terms of an agreement. I do not know what is the reason behind this thinking. I would have no objection if the minister would stand up in the house and ask us to look into the whole matter of automation, not only as it affects this industry but any other industry.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we might some day decide that legislation could overcome some of the limiting factors to the freedom of the indiviual and the security he may have at present under contract. Companies may find some advantages in automation that may be modified by legislation. However, let us not do this to one, small segment of an industry by legislation before the facts are known.

I can recall a strike situation in which I went out to raise money for bail for people even though they had not yet committed offences. I did so because there had been a number of assault and battery charges laid and I had to raise bail for those people. When I came back to the office with a number of deeds I had pledged, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who was our legal counsel, gave me quite a lecture. He told me I was not supposed to get bail pledged for offences that had not yet taken place. Well, we are doing the same thing in this instance. I did not see anything wrong with it. I did not understand the legal implications. I had spent half the night arranging bail for those who were in jail, so the next day I decided it would be better to arrange bail before the offences occurred.

I think it is a particularly dangerous principle we are adopting here. I believe it is one which will backfire not only on the government but on the operations of the Department of Labour with regard to their conciliation and mediation services. No one is going to trust them. I am not prepared to say the union did not know this was going to happen. I have negotiated many times and I know that quite often one says, if you go ahead it is your responsibility but we will go along with it. I have done this myself on a number of occasions. I am not saying it is or is not this way. Surely, however, we have a bigger responsibility to the over-all process of federal mediation and conciliation than to jeopardize it by the settlement of this strike in this way. In my opinion it will not be settled at all if the workers are not agreeable to accept the inquiry in a reasonable manner. There will really be nothing but trouble come out of it, as is already evident since the companies are saying they are going to apply the terms of this bill to the workers in Hamilton.

I know the minister did not intend this to happen. However, the workers in Hamilton are already on strike by reason of the fact they have been threatened in this manner. They are taking what they would call precautionary measures. I believe that this type of action may not accomplish what the minister wants to accomplish. For this reason I hope that the amendment, which is a good one, will be considered by the minister. Personally, I would be much happier if the minister would tell us he was not going to ask for third reading of this bill. He has fulfilled his commitment. I believe that if the matters into which the commissioner is inquiring can be negotiated by the two parties it would be foolish to have the federal labour department intervene. If the situation again became critical, then the minister could bring the bill forward for third reading. I believe it would be easier for conscientious members, even those in the minister's own party who have a background in labour matters, to support the bill then. People like myself who have had a background in labour relations are terrified of the idea of the government providing for compulsory arbitration and in effect eliminating the process of negotiation between labour and management.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the house long. I want to make three points very briefly. The first point is that this legislation demonstrates the government's sense of priorities. Yesterday the government told us that there was not time to sit a few days longer to discuss medicare, something to which the government is committed, something which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the government house leader (Mr. McIlraith) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) have all said would be dealt with before a summer recess. We have not time to deal with medicare. Members are going to be on their way in a very short time to their constituencies, leaving the whole question of medicare up in the air. However, the government has ample time to deal with legislation imposing compulsory arbitration. I think the significance of that sense of values will not be lost upon the people of this country.

We are also going to leave without having done anything about additional help for old age pensioners. We had a statement from the minister today but that statement was notable for the fact that he carefully avoided setting any effective date. When I asked the minister about it he said we would find out the effective date when we saw the legislation. The old age pensioners, therefore, cannot look forward to any immediate assistance despite the fact they were promised that additional legislation would be brought in to help them. These important matters can be shelved but, according to the government, the legislation to impose certain conditions upon the dockworkers of Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières must be dealt with.

The second point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that I am opposed to this legislation because I think it is an attempt to cover up the fact that the government has misled both the country and parliament with regard to the whole labour dispute between the Canada Shipping Federation and the International Longshoremen's Association. Hon. members know that the basic dispute did not have to do with wages. The employers offered wage increases which were acceptable to the workers. What was not acceptable was the condition attached to the offer of increased wages. This condition was a reduction of the work gangs.

The minister can use the euphonious term "increased productivity", but what was meant was the same amount of work from less men. The union was concerned because the men who were likely to be laid off were men up in years who, if they were fired, would not only lose their jobs but in many cases would lose their pension rights. This was the real cause of the dispute. It was for this reason that we, in this party, felt if both parties could settle the wage question, about which there was no quarrel, the matter of the reduction of the work gangs could be left first to an investigation by the commissioner under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and subsequently to collective bargaining on the basis of the facts produced by that inquiry.

I want to draw attention to the attitude which the government took with regard to our proposal. On Thursday, June 9, as recorded at page 6173 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister, first, if he had any substantial hope of an early settlement and, second, if he had not would he give consideration either to advancing the bill of which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) had given notice or introducing a bill which would contain provision for a settlement without imposing compulsory arbitration. The Prime Minister replied as follows:

> Contrary to what the hon. member has suggested, and to what was suggested in the press release I have received from the New Democratic Party to the effect that there is no hope of an early breakthrough, there is hope of success in the negotiations.
> We have not given up that hope. Judge Lippé is negotiating at this moment; we have been in touch with him during the last hour and we have not by any means given up hope that this serious issue will be settled very shortly by the processes of free collective bargaining and not by parliamentary direction.

Those are brave words, Mr. Speaker. What is the bill before us now but parliamentary direction? This is parliamentary imposition of a requirement which was demanded by the shipping federation and opposed by the union. This is typical of the Liberal party, which is always unctuous in the proclamation of its principles but is always prepared to sabotage its principles when it comes to their specific application. A government that was not going to have any parliamentary direction is now asking us to take parliamentary action, not to require the parties to bargain collectively, but to require the union to accept the findings of a commission which has not yet brought down its report.

If the government wanted to do that they should have told parliament and the country what they were doing. Unless the house insists I will not take the trouble to quote all the Hansards which I have here. But the fact is that when the minister announced the settlement on June 14, he made no mention whatever of the fact that the findings of the commissioner appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act were to be binding. When he made his report to the house regarding the appointment of the commission there was no suggestion that the findings were to be binding. The government is now trying to tell us that the reason it did not make this announcement was that the union agreed to do this, but that they did not want it made public too soon.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) surprised me this afternoon with the speech he made. He has a very logical mind and whenever he indulges in sophistry I know that he is on weak ground and that he is all too conscious of it. He is also a very experienced and renowned labour leader. But when I listened to his sophistry this afternoon I began to realize the corrosive and seductive influence of sitting in the seats of the mighty. Because here is what the minister, in essence, said. He began his speech by saying that compulsory arbitration is not uncommon. Then he proceeded to tell us that this bill is not compulsory arbitration. He ended up by saying: Well, one swallow does not make a summer; we must not assume that compulsory arbitration will be the general policy of the government.

The minister sought to show that the union were really very happy about this imposed compulsory arbitration. I want to point out that if the union were agreeable to compulsory arbitration, there is no need for this legislation. Both sides could have put into the collective bargaining agreement the provision that they would submit this matter either to an arbitration tribunal or to a commissioner set up by the government, and that both would accept the findings of that commission. If they were both agreed there was no need for this legislation.

Mr. Marchand: Would the hon. member allow me. I never said that it was not binding arbitration. It is definitely binding arbitration. The problem is to know whether it is binding arbitration based on the will of the parties or on the legislative action of this parliament alone.

Mr. Douglas: I agree wholeheartedly with the minister. The issue is whether this legislation represents the will of both parties or whether it is merely because the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made a commitment to the Canadian Shipping Federation. There is only one way we can find out, and that is for the government to accept the amendment moved by my deskmate, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and let this matter go to a committee of parliament and allow the parties concerned to come before representatives of this house and tell them whether or not this is their will.

The minister said that the I.L.A. officials were agreeable to this. Does he know that of his own knowledge? Did he sit in on these discussions? Of course not. What he tried to do, instead, was to argue that the union did not mind this legislation, but that for purposes of public consumption they had to appear to oppose it, and therefore there was no disagreement from the union. He suggested that since the federation wanted this legislation there was no reason why this house should not pass it.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the union is not opposed to this legislation, then we do not need the legislation. The purport of this bill can be incorporated into the collective bargaining agreement. If they are opposed, then we should not be passing this legislation. If they are in agreement with it but do not want to accept it of their own volition, then I would ask why the government should require this parliament to go through the farce of passing legislation for two disputants who want compulsory arbitration, but want to have it imposed upon them. If the minister is serious about what he said this afternoon, then let me repeat that part of his speech where he said that the nub of this question is: Does this legislation represent the will of the two parties concerned? That is the whole issue. We do not know whether it does represent the will of both parties.

The very best that the minister has been able to tell us is that the union counsel said: Well, it was the government's responsibility and if the government passed the law, then the union would obey it. That, Mr. Speaker, is what any good Canadian would say. That is what I would have to say. If this parliament passes a law, then I have to obey it. I may disagree with it; I may agitate to get it changed; but as long as it is the law of the country I have to obey it. However, to say that because the union admitted that it would have to obey the legislation means that it agreed to the legislation is a distortion of the facts. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Labour ought to know that the union has denied saying that they were in agreement with this legislation.

We in this party, Mr. Speaker, are not only opposed to compulsory arbitration in this particular instance; we are opposed to compulsory arbitration on general principles. In a free society we have no right to impose by law the conditions under which a person will sell his labour. Everyone agrees that we have reached the stage in our modern society when we must try to find some alternative to strikes. Strikes have largely become an outmoded weapon. There is not time to discuss that subject now, but it is the question that we ought to be tackling—the whole problem of how we cope with automation in a technological society without periodic strikes and economic dislocation. That is a big subject, but certainly the answer does not lie in compulsory arbitration.

I want to tell the minister that he aroused a lot of fears across Canada when he was piloting his estimates through the house by his speech suggesting compulsory arbitration and labour courts as a possible way of dealing with labour disputes. Following close upon that we now have his introduction of legislation providing for compulsory arbitration with respect to dockworkers in Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières.

I say to the government that they have set their feet along a dangerous path. Does the government think it can stop the effects of the precedent involved in this particular piece of legislation? Already the Canadian Shipping Federation is taking the position in Hamilton and Toronto that the findings of the commissioner who has been appointed shall not only be binding upon employees in Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières but also in other places.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: Yes.

Mr. Nicholson: With respect to the position taken in the instance cited, was it not agreed by both parties that the men would go back to work in the Hamilton area on the strength of what might be decided by the commissioner in the St. Lawrence ports dispute? Was that not what was agreed to by both parties?

Mr. Douglas: Exactly. May I point out two things to the minister. First, the federation has insisted on using the very legislation the minister is now asking us to pass as a lever to blackmail the employees into accepting that position. Second, the fact that we have a wildcat strike on now, in protest, is an indication of how the employees feel.

I want to point out another thing to the minister. Irrespective of the legislation which is passed, if the commissioner brings down findings that are totally unsatisfactory, does the minister think there will be peace on the waterfronts of this country? In the long run the only way we will resolve problems such as reduction of work gangs and whether men may be thrown on the human scrap heap without adequate security will be by negotiation and not by having an imposed solution.

I say to the government that this is a dangerous precedent which they are establishing. So far as this party is concerned I wish to give notice here and now that we shall not be a party to this precedent and that we shall oppose with all the legitimate resources at our command any attempt in future to extend compulsory arbitration to other areas of the industrial complex of this country.

I urge the minister and the government, before it is too late, to do the one thing which would be absolutely fair. I urge them to accept the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and let this legislation go to the committee on labour and employment in order to allow all parties to appear. If it can be ascertained then, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration says, that this legislation represents the will of both parties, the house can decide whether it wants to pass it.

Surely it is unfair for the government to ask us in the dying hours of this part of the session to pass this legislation when we have no knowledge officially of what the longshoremen's position is with respect to it. We know the views of the Shipping Federation. They are in favour of the legislation. We think that the men have a right to be heard. If the government turns down this amendment, what it is saying is that on the basis of the demand of the Shipping Federation, without giving members of parliament the right to consult with the union, this legislation is going to be put on the statute books in spite of everything we can do to stop it. If the government takes that position the people of this country will know where the Liberal party stands with respect to the rights of workers and the right of free collective bargaining.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the motion.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to make particular reference to clause 2 (b) which deals with the definition of a commission. Would the minister explained to the committee what, to me, is a very apparent discrepancy in the interpretation section of the act, because it suggests that a commission means an industrial inquiry commission appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

I think this question was raised during the discussion on second reading of the bill. It was pointed out that section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which has to do with the appointment of an industrial inquiry, makes it clear that the commissioners appointed under that act are appointed purely for the purpose of making an investigation and reporting upon the facts. I should like the minister to at least make an attempt to explain this obvious inconsistency to me, the making of a reference to a commission in a measure of this kind which, in my view, is being employed for a purpose which is contrary to the principles embodied in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. Nicholson: There would be no necessity for this Bill No. C-215 if it were not to complement the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. While technically this is a substantive measure, it is, in effect, an amendment to that act.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I know the minister made reference to other ports, but I should like to get a quick answer about the effect of this legislation on other ports that may come under its jursidiction. For example, if the federation or the I.L.A. in the port of Saint John were dissatisfied with these agreements, do we have to go through this whole business again?

Mr. Nicholson: Not at all: this measure relates to these three specific ports. If, as a result of this legislation, the collective agreement between the unions in those ports and the Shipping Federation resulted in better conditions for the union, then I understand that with regard to Halifax the people would automatically get the benefits of any improved benefits in Montreal. I cannot say definitely about Saint John.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In other words this agreement, as it affects Montreal, would probably set the pattern for the others?

Mr. Nicholson: It is not a case of setting a pattern. I believe there is a definite agreement with the unions in Halifax, and a partially negotiated agreement with Saint John, that any additional benefits that might be granted to the unions in the three ports on the St. Lawrence would automatically apply to Halifax, and I believe Saint John, but I cannot say definitely.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Incorporation in collective agreements of recommendations of commission.

Mr. McCleave: I should like to point out a problem to the committee which I hope the minister will be able to correct by a simple amendment. There is here a possibility of error when one person is entrusted—

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Are we still discussing clause 2?

The Chairman: No, clause 3.

Mr. Barnett: When you were asking about clause 2 carrying, I said no.

The Chairman: I apologize to the hon. member, but I did not hear him.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And nobody else did, either.

Mr. McCleave: I was pointing out that since this is a one-man operation there is a danger of human error in the report. However, on the happening of certain events set forth in clause 3, the findings of the commissioner automatically become part of the collective bargaining agreement.

• (10:30 p.m.)

I suggest to the minister that he might put in the safeguard that the parties would have, say, a period of ten days to state objections to the report of the commissioner to give him the opportunity to revise his report within that framework, or to reject their contentions. I think that that is the only way we can avoid the possibility—I am not saying it is a great one but it is I think there—that there could be a mistake in his report and that it could be incorporated, by the bill we are now considering, into the agreement between the two parties.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. McCleave: I think the minister was going to reply to the point I was making.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the clause says:

> Forthwith on the receipt by the Minister of Labour of the report of the Commission, the Minister of Labour shall cause copies...to be furnished—

And so on. It is not to be presumed that the minister is going to defy a statute, but certainly the fact the bill provides for the presentation of the report to the minister implies that he will be given time at least to read it and discuss it with the commissionner, if necessary before it was finalized, so as to guard against the situation mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. McCleave: I do not think the minister is correct in his conception of the operation of this report. This is clearly set out in the clause. The actual words are:

—cause copies of the report to be furnished to the Federation and to the Union, and thereupon each collective agreement—

And so on. So that at the magic instant that the report is furnished the collective bargaining agreement becomes fastened with the report of the commissioner.

Mr. Nicholson: All I am saying is that at least the minister should read the report before he sends it on. He will have a chance to look at it.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 52; nays, 32.

On clause 4—Form in which conclusions to be set forth.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, how many collective agreements are apt to be included? I understand there is the one basic collective agreement that was signed on that fateful Saturday night. Will there be others?

Mr. Nicholson: Terms of settlement were signed by representatives of the six unions involved. It is contemplated that there will be, in the terms of settlement, agreements with each of the six unions.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 55; nays, 36.

On clause 5—Saving provision.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the title of this clause is "saving provision". I should like to know whether the minister is being facetious in putting this in. If this clause can apply, then surely, should it not be the first clause in the bill? The clause appears to say that if there is voluntary agreement on the parts of both employees and employer, then the agreement will be added, under this clause. This, I think has been the crux of a large part of the argument, namely that if this clause would work, if there is any possibility of its working, then what is contained in it should be implemented, or should be carried out before the bill becomes effective, so that the bill does not come into operation until clause 5 has had an opportunity to work.

I think the minister should give consideration to putting a waiting period of at least a couple of weeks into the bill, so that this clause can apply, after which the bill shall apply. Doing that would eliminate what most members on both sides of the house believe may happen in a compulsory arbitration of this nature. The problem will be eliminated if the saving provision could apply. There ought to be a time lag, to allow this clause to be implemented, before the bill as a whole comes into operation.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that the question raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming has been raised by one or two of my colleagues. That clause is included because you can amend an agreement by legislation, but unless there is authority, by legislation, to amend an agreement subsequently that cannot be done.

This clause is put in to permit discussion and possible variation, if the parties are able to agree on something after the reports are brought down. The justice department advises that it should be put in for that reason.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: Is the minister indicating that there will be a codicil attached to the signed contract, implemented by the legislation without the signing parties being involved?

Mr. Nicholson: I can give an example. With regard to the Trois-Rivières union that is affected, its work gangs are considerably less than the 18 that are involved. There might be some report with regard to the reduction of work gangs, and it might be necessary to amend the agreement with that particular union, or with any one of the six unions concerned.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 58; Nays, 35.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Peters: I would suggest that the minister take out the words "it is in the national interest."

An hon. Member: Read the clause.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 58; nays, 39.

On the preamble.

Mr. Peters: I am on the right section now. I would suggest to the minister that he withdraw the words "it is in the national interest" and substitute other more suitable words.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, from the standpoint of the hon. member and his colleagues I would have thought these were very good words. They were in the press release in regard to the bill that was proposed to be introduced by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Labour wants to revive the debate, we will be very pleased to accommodate him. This is not the kind of comparison he ought even to suggest to the committee. He knows perfectly well that the other bill was an entirely different thing. He could have had his preamble without this presumptuous suggestion that the deal which he made with the Shipping Federation is in the national interest. Do not let him try to run away from this kind of atrocious language and refer to something that never has been before this committee or the house.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the statement I made this afternoon, in the course of debate I expressed the opinion that the government was prepared to take its responsibility and that it felt, in view of the fact that the strike had lasted for a period of five weeks, that it was essential that the strike be brought to an end. The course we agreed upon in the national interest was this particular bill. We feel it is in the national interest and that is the reason the words are in the preamble.

Mr. Lewis: In the national interest to end the strike but not to bring in this bill.

Mr. Howard: Would it be in the national interest if one of the locals of the longshoremen decided to take some action to become de-certified; would that be in the national interest?

Mr. Nicholson: It is an academic question with which I would not wish to deal at this time.

Preamble agreed to: Yeas, 59; nays, 39.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: I declare the title carried.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures and to supply the financial requirements of affiliated companies in amounts not exceeding, in the calendar year 1965, the amount of $161,600,000, and not exceeding, in the calendar year 1966, the amount of $192,000,000; and to make, in the calendar year 1967 prior to the 1st of July, 1967, certain capital expenditures, by way of investing in the securities of Air Canada, not exceeding $126,000,000 and certain other capital expenditures toward the acquisition of equipment, additions and conversions not exceeding $90,000,000; to provide for the financial requirements of Air Canada in an amount not exceeding 50,000,000, either by means of loans from Her Majesty to the National Company or by means of issues of securities of the National Company, authorized and guaranteed as to interest and principal by Her Majesty, the cash proceeds by either method to be used only for the financial requirements of Air Canada, the capital needs of the National Company itself being met entirely through the sale of preferred stock to Her Majesty and from reserves from depreciation and debt discount; to authorize Her Majesty to continue to purchase until December 31st, 1967, Canadian National Company 4 per cent preferred stock in an annual amount not exceeding 3 per cent of the gross revenues of the Company; to extend until December 31, 1967, the moratorium on interest on the loan of $100,000,000 to the Company authorized by the National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952; to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating reserves to June 30, 1967, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the Railway Company and Air Canada or, if revenues prove insufficient, by subsequent deficit appropriation by Parliament.—The Minister of Finance.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Sharp) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-229, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1965 to the 30th day of June, 1967, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Mr. Peters: It is going to be ten o'clock unless the government moves the motion for adjournment. They had better make up their minds.

Mr. Starr: I think we agreed with the acting house leader that this was as far as we were going to go with this measure. I believe that was all that was requested.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to seek the indulgence of the house to get permission to suspend the business of the house until the call of the Chair later this evening while proceedings are being conducted in the other place. May I also at this moment be permitted to express the sincere thanks of the government to all hon. members for their conciliatory spirit and co-operation during this session.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pennell: I say this with a full measure of sincerity. I recognize the right of hon.

members on the other side of the house to make their position clear. I may say that this has been a very productive session as a result of the co-operation of all hon. members. Thus far we have given full legislative sanction to 43 bills plus a further 7 appropriation bills. In addition to these items which have been fully completed, the house has dealt with the introductory stage of 15 more bills, several of which are undergoing detailed study by standing committees of the house.

We have spent 47 days dealing with supply. Approximately 30 of the 47 days were spent in discussing the old estimates for the fiscal year 1965-66. The house has completed three of the four supply motions respecting this year's spending, and we have spent about 12½ days on this year's estimates or on interim supply. In this time we have completed consideration of the estimates of some ten departments of government and nine other departments are now available to the house for final disposition following a detailed study by standing committees.

I must add further thanks to hon. members for their diligence in committee work. Twenty seven committees were established during the session and to date they have held a total of 349 meetings. Members have never before had or taken such an opportunity to examine the detailed operation of government departments. In a final sentence, on behalf of the government and the house leader as well as his parliamentary secretaries I reaffirm our thanks and respectfully suggest that these statistics reflect most favourably on the efficiency of our parliamentary machinery.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, from this side of the house I want to thank the government for their help and co-operation in dealing with the business of the house. At this time may I say that if the government were organized a little better these functions could have been performed with greater efficiency. I hope that during this period of recess the government will concentrate on seeing that they have a functional team and are organized to make our task easier. Then we will not have to play as difficult a part in organizing the business of the house. I want to say too that this has been a good, productive part of the session. I hope that the image of parliament will in future be enhanced again. I think it is the duty of every member to see that the image of parliament in the eyes of Canadians is brought to a point where Canadians can be proud of this institution.

May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that you have had your baptism of fire and you have come through it well. In my opinion you have had some difficult situations to handle and you have done an admirable job. We wish you a good rest and hope that you will come back refreshed and will be a little more lenient during the question period.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the statistics which have been read to the house by the acting house leader demonstrate that even a fainthearted government can accomplish great things if it has an alert and diligent opposition. Unfortunately the government, while it is guided by the opposition in some respects, becomes very stubborn on other occasions.

• (11:10 p.m.)

We in this party regret, that we are leaving here without having dealt with either the old age pension legislation or with medicare. However, we hope that when parliament reassembles the government will have a program with respect to both these matters and will be prepared to proceed as expeditiously as possible. We appreciate the fine spirit of co-operation which has existed between the government and the members of this party through our respective house leaders.

I should like to express on behalf of this party our congratulations to you, sir, on having had your initial experience as Speaker of the house. When the house began we expected great things from you and we have not been disappointed. You have far exceeded our expectations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: We are convinced that you are well on the way to establishing a record as one of the best Speakers we have had in living memory.

We hope that the government will give some thought during the recess to working out what we suggested about a year ago, namely, the establishment of a definite timetable for parliament with periodic recesses of the house so that the committees can sit continuously. I think that the practice of having many committees sit simultaneously with the house is not working out well. Some committees cannot sit because they cannot get a quorum. Members have to hurry back and forth and are unable to give proper attention either to the work of the house or of the committees.

We hope that the government will give some thought to letting the house adjourn periodically for a couple of weeks when the committees would sit, or to having the committees sit for two weeks when the house is not sitting. We think that this is an area which could be examined with a good deal of profit. This has been done in Great Britain and has been found to expedite the work of parliament. We hope that the government will give consideration to looking into a similar type of reorganization of our parliamentary work in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members agree that we will dispense with the adjournment debate tonight or do hon. members wish to proceed with the debate?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that it is the wish of the house that we suspend business until the call of the Chair later this evening.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, July 14, 1966

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Emmett M. Hall, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 14th July, at 11.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: The sittings of the house will now be suspended till the call of the Chair which will be indicated by the ringing of the bell.

At 11.16 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 12.10 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUMMER ADJOURNMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just received a request from the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) to revert to motions.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General) moved:

That, when this house adjourns at the end of the sitting of the day on which this motion of adopted, it stands adjourned until Wednesday, October 5, 1966, at 2.30 o'clock p.m. provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

In the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker shall act in his stead for the purpose of this order.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent I should like to revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: I see that there is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are on the threshold of adjournment. The farmers in Canada, as those in the province of Quebec, would have liked us to adopt the bill providing assistance to livestock feeders in Eastern Canada and British Columbia. I ask the opposition to kindly agree unanimously to adopt this bill right away.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that there is no point of order. There may be a grievance against the government, but there is no point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: It seems to me the members of the opposition are refusing to pass the bill providing assistance to the farmers.

[English]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if you are going to permit grievances against the government we will be here until September.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Pursuant to special order, the house adjourned at 12.35 a.m. until Wednesday, October 5, 1966, at 2.30 p.m.
