There are perhaps many socially useful projects which could be undertaken to give these people the opportunity, in a dignified way, to earn their own income. Perhaps it would also give them the opportunity for some additional schooling or additional training on such projects which could be even more useful to them. This is something that up until now we have not been able to do in this co-ordinated way, and I think that this aspect represents one of the most imaginative features of the plan.

I know for a fact that this particular aspect appeals strongly to the Newfoundland federation of labour which, in their submissions to the provincial government, have advocated this kind of approach for some time. I also know that the provincial government of Newfoundland welcomes the opportunity to participate in this kind of program.

One could go on and talk about many examples of the usefulness of this plan. I think it is natural, when we are discussing assistance to the needy, that the problem of the old age pensioner should be brought up. However, I also think we have to recognize in the development of social security in this country that when the original universal pension was brought in in the early fifties it was not designed to provide complete support. If it was, then it has certainly failed in that particular. At best it was an income supplement.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that whatever the figure fixed upon for payments to all individuals in a particular category, there will still exist individuals in that category who will have particular needs and who will require extra assistance. It is this approach to social security that makes this plan stand out from all others, which distinguishes it as unique.

There is another aspect of the plan I should like to mention. I have heard both in parliament and outside of parliament the criticism that one of the weaknesses—politically, if you will—of the plan is that it does not do something immediately and quickly, and in one swift payment, for those who will benefit from the plan. The people who make this suggestion in my view do not understand the problem. Because when we are dealing particularly with the unfortunate people who have been for many generations living off welfare, we are dealing with a complicated problem. There is little likelihood that any direct payments to all individuals in a particular group would suffice for all their needs. What is required is a more flexible approach.

In 1964 during the course of the budget debate the topic on which I chose to speak was the need in this country for a philosophy of social security, a sound and comprehensive approach to the needs of the people of Canada and the need for a war on poverty. There is no single piece of legislation that has been introduced in the past or, I suppose, is likely to be introduced for some time that can have more significance in dealing with those who are in real and genuine need across Canada than this.

It is because I believe that this plan is so vital to our whole structure of social security, and it is because all of those with whom I have had discussions and who are familiar with our welfare approach in Canada have felt the same, that I was so genuinely shocked that the New Democratic Party, the members of which in some respects are not too different from many of us in many ways, should have picked this particular piece of legislation for what was surely one of the most regrettable and reprehensible acts of partisanship that we have seen in this House of Commons for some time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is an excellent piece of legislation; that it represents a proper philosophy, that there is a difference between "means" and "needs"; and that when this plan is in operation in the various provinces of Canada we will have more equipment and more facilities to deal with the problem of poverty. But this is not a problem that is going to be solved by waving any miracle wand or providing any sort of instant solution. The problem has existed for many years. It is a problem that will only be beaten with imagination and with courage. This kind of plan, one which perhaps appeals to a smaller group than some others, is one that is both imaginative and courageous.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In accordance with an order of the house made this day I do now leave the chair. The house will resume at seven o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I do not rise now in order to prolong unduly the debate in which we find ourselves engaged. However, I am disturbed by the attitude which has been taken toward the question of old age security. I certainly believe that the intention of the minister as outlined in this bill is an honourable one, but I have, however, a fear—and I believe it is justified—that a large part of his proposals may amount to nothing more than window dressing. I say this, bearing in mind the answer the minister gave me some days ago with regard to the total cost of this program, or of that part of it which is to be invoked.

It seems to me the minister must have a good script writer. He certainly made a good job of the speech the hon. gentleman made in the house when he introduced this bill on second reading. It is, indeed, a measure which might be projected as being a highly desirable one. Be this as it may, I agree with the principles enunciated, though regretting very much that the minister and the government have not seen fit to take a different stand with regard to the old age pensioners, and to do so immediately, before this house takes a recess.

Before the dinner hour the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) had the floor. I recall that on another occasion my motion for an increase to $100 for old age security pensioners was talked out in the private members hour by that same hon. member. I wonder where he stands on this question. The message comes through to me that he is one of the people in the Liberal party who is not in favour of any increase for old age pensioners, as opposed to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) who made his position clear on this issue in days gone by.

I would ask the same hon. member for St. John's West—and I regret he is not in his place—whether, if he does not favour an increase for old age pensioners, he would be favourably disposed toward the recommendations of the Croll report on aging? Would he be in favour of the amendment which was suggested in that report?

Senator Croll is a member of the Liberal party. Do his opinions not reflect the thinking which goes on today in government circles, and among those on the back benches opposite who support the government? I believe they do. I believe every supporter of the government today would support the terms of that report, if they searched their consciences and gave an honest expression of opinion. What does that report recommend, in essence? In essence it recommends an increase in old age security payments to $105 a month, immediately—not at some vague date in the future.

It is the government which must bear the responsibility for delay—the government, the minister particularly concerned, and intellectuals over there, like the hon. member for St. John's West who spoke before the dinner hour in such glowing terms about what this whole program might achieve.

As I said, I am in favour of this measure. But how much of it will be implemented right away? What are the necessities to be faced in Canada today? I believe one of the tasks of our democracy, and those who have responsibilities in it, is to serve the needs of the people. I should like the minister to remember this. If he thinks for one moment that the senior citizens of this country find it easy to live on $75 a month, he had better change his thinking. He had better get down to the kitchens of these old people and see how they have to live, just in the same way as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) had better take off his stetson, get down into the barn and see what the farmers are thinking. This window-dressing does no good unless our intentions are on the correct lines. There is no use in being a legislator unless you know what the circumstances are.

I am not so naïve in political things as to think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) does not know what the needs of senior citizens are. A few days ago, on June 27, I asked the minister a question, which I did not follow up in any way because I wanted to know exactly what he thought, if he were going to follow the example of the premier of Prince Edward Island and, as recorded at page 6872, of Hansard the minister replied:

> The position taken by the premier of Prince Edward Island is made possible or will be made possible through the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

If this is the case, and if he agrees with the action taken by the premier of P.E.I., why does not the minister take the same position with regard to the same group of people in the rest of Canada? Or are we to take it at this stage that the government is prepared to move out of the field of old age security, on a partial basis, and let the provinces assume some of the responsibility? If that is the minister's intention then he is abdicating the position of Minister of National Health and Welfare for the Dominion of Canada. There is no question about that in my mind, and the minister will have to answer to the senior citizens for the position he has taken in this regard.

Today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) if he anticipated taking any action under the old age security program to increase old age pensions to $100 per month. Not only did the Prime Minister say no, but so far as I am concerned he said no in derisive terms, and as a result our senior citizens must know precisely where they stand and how the government feels about them.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister, what about backbenchers in his own party? Through you I am suggesting to him, to the house, and to the whole country that Liberal party members had better beware when they go home during any summer recess. If they are frightened to go home and face their constituents on the basis of their refusal to help our senior citizens, then I can tell them they have allies on this side of the house who will agree with them. All they have to do is recognize the need that exists.

Today I received a letter in the mail which I think is worthy of being put on the record. I know the minister and all other members of the house received this letter. It is from the Senior Women's Committee for Pension Increase, and emanates from Madison avenue in Toronto. Actually it is a copy of a letter addressed to Hon. A. J. MacEachen and dated June 27.

An hon. Member: Hon. Allan MacEachen?

Mr. Winkler: I refer also to the former minister from the province of P.E.I. He knew what the score was. He said that when the Conservative party went out on the hustings during the last election and promised an old age pension of $100 per month, it was that which caused his defeat.

Our record is clear in this regard. Right after this session of parliament was convened we moved to demand from the government that it pay senior citizens $100 per month. But what happened? The Liberals stood up, row after row of them, and voted against us. Further, they will do that again if need be.

However, the warning is sharp and clear. Some of the government's backbenchers will no longer support it on this position. The minister had better take cognizance of this fact. With the increased cost of living that is abroad in this country today, and the government's failure to recognize the needs of the people, though it spends millions of dollars in other fields, this all indicates that the government no longer has the interests of the people at heart.

I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will take note of these words and act accordingly. We will do everything in our power to assist him if he introduces legislation to increase the old age pension. Our record is clear on that. We stood up and voted for it at the beginning of this session. At innumerable times we have pressed the government to come forward with such legislation. I myself moved a motion during private members hour pleading with the government to do this. I did not do so for any political purpose, and I am not doing so for any political purpose tonight. As I said earlier, if we recognize the basis of our democratic responsibilities in the House of Commons we will act on this, and act on it at an early date. The minister has my assurance that the members of this party will support him, and support him quickly. He can introduce legislation any time he wishes, and by the way we act we will show that we agree with it.

I shall now quote the letter to which I referred earlier. It reads:

Thank you for your letter of June 21st in answer to our telegram.

You say "you know of no basis for the statement that the government has rejected the recommendations of the Senate committee on aging." It was reported in the Globe and Mail of recent date that, "the government studied the proposal of the Senate committee on aging to guarantee a minimum income of $1,260 a year for single person and $2,220 for married couple but decided it was administratively unworkable."

But the Prime Minister is not prepared to consider this, and the government does not want to have anything to do with it, The Croll report recommended an additional $5, making a total of $105, but at this stage we would settle for the $100. The letter continues:

In your address at the Canadian Conference on Social Welfare held in Vancouver you are reported as saying "the problems of poverty can't be wiped out over night...the keys are education and rehabilitation." How would you educate and rehabilitate people over 69 years of age? What sort of education do they need other than how to live without food and clothing?

That is a very good question, Mr. Speaker—a very good question, Mr. Minister.

The Canadian Welfare Council report states that study was needed first of the priority to be given the economic needs of the aged and the rest of the population. Some of the welfare workers told our committee that if it weren't for the people on welfare they wouldn't have a job. Apparently the government is trying to bring the senior citizens under welfare which would make them charity cases.

This is the difference between a means and a needs test, although to my mind they are precisely the same thing.

You spoke of the shortage of welfare workers and said, "The Canada Assistance Plan contained provision for federal contribution toward the cost of staff training." This would have to be a permanent school and when the cost of training and the salaries of the army of investigators needed were paid, the cost would probably be more than the increase would be.

This training plan is as unrealistic and as sensible as the student loan. We know of both men and women who took courses for which they were paid $30 a week and they had no intention of using the training.

The Senate committee plan would be very simple. The government has the list of old age pensioners. A simple income tax form could be mailed out, to be returned immediately and those with less than the guaranteed income would get an increase. This could be implemented in July of this year.

We wish to emphasize that most of the trouble and illness among the elderly people would disappear if they had no worry, if their food, clothing, shelter, medicine and money for recreation were assured.

We understand there is trouble in the Liberal party over this.

And I understand the same thing.

Almost every family in Canada has one or more senior citizens and the resentment towards the discrimination against them is growing fast.

That is a very true statement, Mr. Speaker.

People do not understand the stand the government has taken because they know it is now an increase is needed, not ten years from now.

We know you have influence in the cabinet and we urge you not to allow this matter to be held over until fall.

Even though the matter is this important, we all heard the Prime Minister's answer today. Not only will it be held over till fall, but nothing may be done at all.

• (7:20 p.m.)

The letter ends with these words:

What the government does now before it adjourns will determine our next step.

That may seem to be a little political pressure, but they do not mean that. I think the need is there and it is very clear. There may be other portions of the letter with which I do not agree, but I think it explains the position of the senior citizens. I agree almost entirely with the terms of this letter. On June 14 I also spoke in this house in regard to the same matter. I placed on the record some figures which were made available to me by departmental officials in respect of the sum of money in the old age security fund and the amount anticipated to be in the fund by the end of the next fiscal year. That total sum is $445 million. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the moneys in this fund deserve to be protected, but they also deserve to be used for the benefit of the people for which the fund was set up.

I suggest to you that, on the basis of the growth of this fund, almost the whole problem with which the minister is faced, and which is not great financially to the federal government, could be financed or at least started out of this fund. I believe the provinces would be inclined to agree to a partial responsibility in this particular area. The important factor is that everybody realizes the need—everybody except the government. The government has said no from last January until today, when they have said it more emphatically than ever before. The old age security recipients in Canada today can expect less from this government than they could six months ago. The government wavered a little then, but today it is no. When the Prime Minister says no, as he did today, you can be sure that row after row of government members will stand up and support this stand, even though they may know it is wrong. I could mention persons such as the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh), if he were here. He knows the need. He recognizes the need of other people in this country, and that is all the minister has to do this evening.

Once again let me tell you on behalf of the Conservative party that our position is clear. Last January and ever since we have stood up in this house and supported these senior citizens. The need is greater now than then and I humbly ask the minister to take up his responsibility in this regard and act at a very early date.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, if there are members in this house who would like to see this bill killed or who would oppose it, I am not one of them. I am inclined neither to attack the bill nor to brush it aside as inconsequential. Ever since there was word of this bill I have made it my business to find out all I could about the principles underlying it. I have made it my business to talk to social workers; I have read practically everything I could get my hands on. I have read the information the minister has sent us and I have read in the newspapers what he has said. I went to Vancouver last week where I attended the social work conference of the Canadian Social Council. I did this for the express purpose of listening to the different government officials outline the social legislation which has come before this house this session. I also wished to hear the welfare people, including the experts from Great Britain and the United States discuss this and related matters. I have made what study I was able to of this bill.

During the week I was in Vancouver I spoke with social workers from all across Canada, including the two gentlemen who were mentioned last night as being controversial figures in this debate. I feel that the social workers in this country favour the bill. They want it, and they believe it will give them a somewhat wider scope than they have had before. I want to say, however, that I think it should be made perfectly clear that this bill is not a great new boon for social security. As a matter of fact in discussing this welfare question before the welfare council of Ottawa and other places, the minister himself has stated, and I quote his words, "The plan does not involve any great new program". He went on to show that what this bill does is to put under one heading four programs of federal-provincial assistance. These are the programs which concern the aged, the blind, the disabled and the unemployed; these have been combined into one single program with the advantages which are to be gained from co-ordination. Certain new features also have been added to them.

I think we should start out with a realization that this bill is not going to be the be-all and end-all of the ills with which the social worker is faced, or that it is going to end poverty in Canada by itself or do anything else like that. It is a housekeeping measure, a tidying-up measure. Although there are several reasons, this is the first reason I think the bill is an advance over what we have had. I am not going to say the bill is all that we desire. It is not; but it is an advance over what we have had. First of all, it co-ordinates these already existing systems. Second, I think it is going to help provide new services along some lines which are vitally necessary in this country. I am not going to go in detail into the new services, but there are such things as child care, homemaker services, provision for nursing in the home, and other forms of health care which are badly needed and which the people in the field realize are badly needed. In the third place, I think this legislation will give social workers more scope in preventive and rehabilitative work than they have had heretofore. Instead of having to wait until the families and individuals are in a very bad way they will be able to step in at an early stage of distress and difficulty.

The social workers will have much more scope to do preventive work and also to pioneer along new lines of rehabilitation. In the fourth place, I think undoubtedly this legislation will help secure more and more highly trained social workers. This is important in an age like ours, where training is very necessary. In the last place, I think it is going to be very valuable because it will include the Indians under the same provisions as other people. I think this is a very essential and long overdue form of restitution which we are making to some of the native people in this country.

Having said this, I should like to say that for what the bill is, I welcome it; I think it is an improvement. However, this bill is not doing the whole job which needs to be done at this time. It is in going beyond that that I wish to make my criticism. Mind you, the social workers have very serious reservations. More than one of those with whom I spoke has told me this.

The new legislation is going to create a great deal of confusion, and as a result of complete jurisdiction being given to provincial governments there will be a lot of hurdles to meet. The provincial governments are now going to be responsible for deciding the definition of needs. A good many social workers are worried about this situation, and how this will be worked out in a number of provinces, including my own province. Not only is the interpretation of the needs provision going to be dependent upon provincial governments, it will be dependent upon the ability, discretion and farsightedness of the individual social worker. Many social workers have told me that they are sure it will be just as hard for individuals to get what they require under this needs test as it was under the means test. Social workers are going to be faced with difficulties at both the local and provincial levels, and this is something that should be considered carefully.

I should now like to outline my real criticism, because this is a criticism I made earlier in connection with another measure. The downfall of this government will not relate so much to its sins of commission as to its sins of omission. This bill makes no provision whatsoever to look after the retired people of this country on an equitable or comparable basis in relation to—and do not start writing now, Mr. Minister, because I have not finished my sentence. This bill does nothing on a comparable basis for the older people of this country. I know there are references in this bill to that category of citizen, but those references are included with references to indigents. There is no provision in this bill for the older people on a basis of right. Surely they are entitled to at least that much.

Last night and today the minister took refuge, when dealing with points of order, in the suggestion that this bill was not the means by which old age pensions should be increased to $100 per month beginning at age 65 without a means test. He said this legislation was not the measure within which to accomplish that.

Since this session convened in January we have been waiting for the introduction of a measure which would increase the old age pensions to $100 and reduce the eligible age to 65. However, as far back as January 20, as pointed out by hon. members to my right, the government indicated its opposition by voting against a proposal which would increase old age pensions to $100 a month at age 65 without a means test. Let me make it abundantly clear that at that time the government did not make it definite that it intended to do nothing for the senior citizens of this country before the end of this session. This government has kept the older people of this country dangling on the hook, waiting for what they believed this government was going to do to increase their standard of living.

An hon. Member: They are still waiting.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes, they are still waiting. I was extremely shocked today when I observed the vigour and ability with which two ministers of the crown jumped to their feet to assist the Speaker to find grounds upon which—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member suspects that her remarks are not in order. A ruling was made by the Chair and I do not think hon. members should argue that ruling at this time.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am not arguing your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I am just pointing out the efficiency with which those ministers assisted the Chair. I am not criticizing your ruling and I am quite sure that it was a good one, but those hon. gentlemen did not need to show so much zeal in helping to have the motion ruled out of order. They should have left that chore to other members.

The point I am trying to make is that the older people of this country trusted this government because it said it intended to increase the old age security pension. I was astonished when the minister said yesterday quite clearly that nothing of this kind was to be done this session. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said today very definitely that nothing would be done. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made one last attempt to do something for these people by proposing an amendment to this bill, simply because there is apparently no other way of forcing the government to do something.

During this session the government has thrown up barriers to any increase in old age pensions and now it has banged, bolted and barred the door in the face of all the old people of this country. This government has now eliminated any hope that they will get an increase, and hope is all that many of them have been living on for the last while. All hope of action this session has been removed, and removed by the very individual who should have been the guardian of the welfare of the older citizen. I refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen).

This whole situation is not new to me. I remember the session of 1926 when, over the protests of a great many people in this country, including members of the other place who have now had a change of heart, the first piece of social security legislation was placed on the federal statute books. At that time pensions of $20 a month for individuals aged 70 and over were introduced on a means test. I was not here on the floor at that time, but up in the gallery. A handful of farmers and labour people led by J. S. Woodsworth succeeded in forcing a reluctant government headed by the late Mackenzie King into passing that legislation.

It may be hard to believe, but I am sure that if hon. members read Hansard of some years ago they will find that the leader of the opposition in 1926 said that this measure was forced upon a reluctant government by the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, J. S. Woodsworth, at a time when the government and the opposition were nicely balanced. The older people who had been living with indignity felt that for the first time, when this legislation was passed they did not have to crawl for charity. I remember those days when many old people had to take their children to court and have them declared as being unable to support them, before being able to obtain charity from the municipalities. I remember those days very well, and the fighting years of the 1930's and the 1940's when step by step by step old age pensions were increased, and the means test gradually eliminated. I remember the long fight which ended with the adoption of the universal old age pension of $40 per month at age 70. This happened in 1951. At that time the means test was eliminated.

In 1957 the old age pension was increased to $46 and then to $55. There were two increases that year, but they were too little and too late. In 1962 the pension was increased to $65, and in 1963 to $75. What has happened to the cost of living in the last 12 years? It has gone up nearly 6 per cent, yet there has been nothing done to improve the old age security pension during those intervening years.

An hon. Member: Did you say 12 years?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am afraid I am a long way out in my calculation. Perhaps someone over there can give me the right answer because I am sure someone there has it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That is a challenge for you.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am sorry; I should have said 6 per cent in the last 12 months. What it is in the last 12 years I hardly dare hazard a guess. The Senate committee on aging has gone into this matter thoroughly. I shall not go into all the recommendations of that committee but I will draw to the attention of the government this sentence in their report:

> Any suggestion that these older people, when the $75 pension is not sufficient, should be expected to depend for supplementation on public assistance after a needs test is utterly unacceptable.

This is what the Senate committee on aging has set forth, and it is in line with what has been the practice in this country with the old age security pension. Yet what the minister is proposing as the only solution for the senior citizens of this country is precisely this: To subject them to a needs test and then put them on social assistance.

I suggest that it is no answer for the minister to say that, no matter if they do have an increase in the old age security pension, they will still need the supplementary benefits under the Canada Assistance Plan. I will read what the Senate has to say on that, too, because after what we have seen today I do not want to leave out anything that is relevant:

> Public assistance should, of course, be available to them,—

That is to the senior citizens.

> —as to others in the population, to meet residual needs and to deal with special circumstances, but it is the committee's conviction that main reliance for meeting their ordinary requirements should be on benefits to which they are entitled as a matter of right and that the proportion of older people requiring needs-tested supplementation should be very small at all times.

That is exactly what my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said last night, that if we needed the Canada Assistance Plan for those on old age security pension, it should be for those needs that are residual, whereas the minister is proposing to make the Canada Assistance Plan the actual supplement to their pension. In other words, he is proposing, after the old people have had this long hard fight waged for them to receive their pension as of right, instead of as charity, to pitchfork them into the ranks of the indigent, those people on social assistance, whom we are trying desperately to get out of that category. He is adding to the category of poverty the one category that had escaped to the dignity of the old age pension.

We say this is not good enough. The Senate committee on aging pointed out a way in which this problem could and should be solved. As a matter of fact the Senate committee suggested that we should have a guaranteed income for those on old age security pension. This has been rejected by the government. Perhaps the minister will tell me that it has not been rejected by the government, but we have been waiting to see it appear on the order paper this session. The old people are the population group in this country that cannot wait. The young ones may have some chance of survival if they can hang out long enough for enough pressure to be built up for the government to see the error of its ways, and come through to help them. But the old people cannot wait. That is why we have to look after their needs before we rise for the summer recess.

The Senate committee on aging proposed that we have a minimum income in this country and that we begin with the recipients of the old age security pension. I should like to ask the minister if he would be good enough to send me very soon the complete text of the speech he made at the opening of the welfare conference in Vancouver in the Queen Elizabeth theatre on June 20, because I have seen only the excerpts that he has sent around. I will swear on a stack of almost any book you care to provide that I heard the minister in that speech make reference to the desirability and need of exploring a guaranteed minimum income in this country.

I would very much like to find out whether it is in the text. I will not say categorically that he did say this, but unless my ears have gone back on me completely that is what he said in the speech. I remember that there was great applause at that point, because the welfare and social workers believe that the Senate is talking good sense when it suggests that we have a minimum guaranteed income for those on old age security in this country.

The government is evidently rejecting this proposal. I have heard government officials say, in private conversation at least, that a guaranteed minimum income would be too difficult to work out administratively. One of the most interesting addresses we had at the Canadian Welfare Conference in Vancouver was that of Professor Richard Titmuss of the London School of Economics. He told us that there is now going through the British House of Commons a piece of social security legislation which in its outlines is very like the guaranteed minimum income which has been proposed by the Senate committee on aging.

It is a piece of legislation under which they calculate the income of those people on social assistance, that of the old age pensioners and those in other categories of social need. They calculate the income of these people—incidentally, they do not take into consideration the home in which they live—and take account of the taxes they have to pay. They permit an allowance whereby people can earn extra money, and then they calculate an allowance that people who are receiving various forms of state assistance, including pensions, are entitled to receive. At regular intervals a cheque is sent out to these people and at the end of the year they are asked whether their status has changed.

If their status has not changed, they continue to receive the cheque. What is the cheque? It is the difference between what these people are receiving and what the government considers to be a suitable guaranteed minimum income. That is the sort of thing we should be doing in Canada if our resources permit us to do it. If our resources do not permit us to do it, I suggest that the government take another look at its social priorities, because we ought to be able to cut expenditures in quite a few places and increase the pension received by our elderly people, those people who have built this country.

The minister spoke of the needs test enabling needs to be met with dignity and impartiality. Maybe they will be met with the impartiality that people show in meting out charity; but no dignity whatever is possible when assistance is received in the form of charity and not as of right. These old people have the right to receive what they have come to believe is their birthright, namely an adequate allowance without any questions being asked, an allowance as of right.

My criticism is not of the bill directly, so far as it goes. It is that nothing is provided, except what is in the bill, for senior citizens of this country. In my view this is what makes it absolutely necessary that we make one more try to achieve our purpose. If I could only describe what the older people in this country are up against I would give a great deal. I cannot do it. But I can read to the house two or three communications that I have received from Vancouver. I did not receive them last winter, or last week, but today. I have here a letter from the Federated Legislative Council of the Elder Citizens Associations of British Columbia in my own city of Vancouver, from which I quote the following:

We are aware of the fact that the Canada Pension Plan has nothing in it for those already retired; also that the suggested Canada Assistance Act holds little help for these people. We stress the need for immediate action in this regard because there are many who have already retired, and these are the people who need this now, not later.

We note that untold millions are being used for commissions of inquiry and increased government salaries in the higher brackets; also, that money is being sent overseas to eliminate poverty. At the same time many retired Canadians on a fixed income, founders of Canada, are actually in need.

Now I wish to read to you two communications which came to me this morning from people in my riding of Vancouver-Kingsway. The first one reads as follows:

About pensions? What happened to Mr. Pearson's promise of $125 for the pensioners and help the poor program? Has it changed to pity the rich, the poor can beg? It looks like everybody won their raise in wages. The MP's and doctors just give themselves a raise without any argument. But the pensioner has to take what he gets and like it. Nearly all of them need a lot more to live on now. When the old age pensioners were growing up, wages were small and we did not have a chance to save much after paying taxes, raising families and putting children through school. Especially the ones that served in two world wars. You did not get very rich on $1.10 a day that we got in the first war. What is the government going to do about the high cost of low living? When the men get a raise it is for two or three years. But prices go up on everything every week through the year . . . Why should old age pensioners have to pay school taxes on top of other taxes when they have already paid to put their children through school? You won't get very fat off $75 per month after you pay your taxes, food, clothing, lights, gas, medical expenses, etc.

It happens my wife also has a pension and between us we get $1,800. In a country as rich as Canada $75 per month is a disgrace. Money paid in pensions is not wasted. It goes in circulation and makes more business. But money—millions of it is wasted making test planes and jeeps for army and air force—then the whole thing is junked . . . Something is wrong somewhere . . . With all the hundreds of millions to be spent on new construction across Canada, there must be a few extra dollars to help the pensioners catch up on the high cost of living.

I wish to suggest to you it is all very well to smile complacently or to think of going home for a holiday. These are flesh and blood people; they cannot eat averages. Other people may be making more on an average than they are, but it is our job to look after them.

Here is another letter which I will read to you. It says:

I am 84 years old and since last January when I got a heart stroke I was still working part-time as an expert gardener, a hobby of mine that I made my trade when I was laid off at the Canadian White Pine at 66. Having raised four children at that time, I had $50 in the bank, no debts and my little house paid for. I had to wait four years for the $40 pension at that time and my wife is seven years younger than I am. Still we have managed and made some saving.

These are not indigents or social assistance cases. These are people who have been robbed through no fault of their own by the continuous increase in the cost of living. The letter goes on to say:

> When I was 70 I inquired if I may get the health insurance only, but I was told that I will be obliged to take the pension also and stop working, so I turned it down and fortunately that medicare came just handy a few months before my stroke. All these personal details are only to help you to state the case of many thousands who are penalized for working hard and being thrifty and I have a few thousand dollars savings at the bank that will take care of us to the end, but it is a matter of principle and justice.
> I know the actual game just as well as yourself. The raise of the pension to $100 is fully justified and imperative right now for one-third of the pensioners in the low bracket and will cost $100 million. There exists at this time a real majority for it . . . They use the bogey of inflation and wait their own sweet time at the next election two or three years from now to buy enough votes by raising the pension to everybody and it is well known that no inflation ever occurs before an election—it is only after.

I will now suggest to you that people of this calibre, people who have been self-respecting, self-sustaining and thrifty, do not merit the humiliation and indignity of being dumped back into a means or a needs test. These are the people to whom we should give something very much better at this time.

I offer no apologies for taking the time of the house tonight because this is one of the purposes for which I came down here. This is one of the reasons for which I was sent down from Vancouver-Kingsway. The people there feel they have been getting the short end of the stick, and there are a great many old age pensioners at that short end. The very least we can do is to give them $100 a month at the age of 65 without requiring a means test.

The old age pensioners are the most defenceless of all people and the ones who have the least time to waste. We remember that it was a Liberal government who once before waited too long and then gave too little and too late. We saw the same sort of death-bed repentance exercised in Prince Edward Island by the Conservative government, or shall we call it the former government, I do not know which. This again was a case of too little and too late. We have been fighting for this measure for a long time and I do not aspire to a halo in calling for immediate action to be taken. It is part of our belief that those people who were the pioneers of this country should be able to live in dignity and peace until the end of their days. We cannot agree to adjourning parliament until something is done for them. We are now preparing to celebrate Canada's 99th birthday with pomp, ceremony, fanfare and a brand new flag while the pensioners, some of whom have also reached the age of 99, suffer hunger, penury and loss of dignity.

Let me say emphatically that death-bed repentance is better than no repentance at all. We have still a few hours left before recessing and if the government wishes the house to wait so that they can draft legislation in respect of old age pensioners, let me tell them every party in this house will cheerfully wait for such legislation. I also wish to suggest that although death-bed repentance may not get you into heaven, it might save you quite a long term in purgatory.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, half a century ago George Bernard Shaw wrote:

> The evil that must be fought is not sin, suffering, greed, it is neither monopolization, ignorance, alchoholism, war, nor plague, it is simply poverty.

Needless to say then that the bill under consideration is much to my liking. Even though it is not complete and does not meet all our wishes, I feel it will bring to the people something they need. As reported on page 6921 of Hansard, the minister said that approximately one million persons may benefit from this legislation. This is what he said:

> These include some 85,000 persons still covered under the old age assistance program, 8,000 receiving blindness allowances and 55,000 receiving disabled persons allowances. Also included are 200,000 needy mothers with dependent children, 600,000 other recipients of assistance, the cost of whose assistance now is shared under the Unemployment Assistance Act, and 50,000 children in the care of child welfare authorities.

According to these figures, this makes almost one million persons, and the minister is presenting a piece of legislation designed to spend $85 million more for them. All persons mentioned by the minister are precisely those who are living in poverty, in near destitution.

So, with the figures indicated by the minister, we realize, the present government realizes, and those who rose to speak in the house as well as those who have not spoken yet realize that, all over Canada, there is suffering, that there is poverty in this country. There is no need to look for it in Africa, Asia or elsewhere. We have suffering here, at home. It is high time that we should become aware of it and launch the war against that suffering, against that poverty.

But one fact remains and I wonder if we have considered in depth why we have so much poverty in Canada. We are launching a war on poverty, on suffering, but unless we stop the machine that produces the mistakes, unless we eliminate the system that brings on such an atmosphere of poverty in this country, we will be marking time, and we will always have to start all over again. It reminds me of a dog running around in circles, after its own tail. It will never reach it and the first thing that happens, the animal is panting and forced to stop. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government is not in the same situation.

Now, the figures quoted by the minister in his speech are completely different from those given by various bodies that have conducted some research on suffering, on the state of poverty in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a report which appeared in L'Action of February 19, 1965—that is not so long ago—and which states:

—the survey on poverty in the Montreal area carried out by Mr. Emile Gosselin for the Montreal Labour Council.

Not in Canada, not in the province of Quebec, but in the Montreal area. In this report, some figures are quoted which are somewhat different from those quoted by the minister a while ago, with regard to poverty and misery. I quote:

In the city of Montreal, 423,418 persons, or 38 per cent of the total population, and, in the metropolitan area, 706,880 persons, or 33 per cent of the population, living in misery, in poverty or in want. Another 17 per cent of the total population of the metropolitan area live a precarious or marginal existence. Therefore, a total of 1,032,000 persons, or 48.6 per cent, of the metropolitan area population live in misery, poverty, want or in a marginal state.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, according to a study carried out by those organizations, metropolitan Montreal alone numbers more than one million people who suffer from poverty, misery or want.

Then, I do think that the $85 million proposed by the minister is clearly not enough to do away with the existing evil, not only in metropolitan Montreal or the province of Quebec but throughout Canada.

Another interesting point is made a little later on in the article. Further along it is determined that there are:

Four levels of poverty. On the basis of research made on this question in Canada and the United States, Professor Gosselin established, through four degrees of want, the following levels: any family of four people with a total annual income of less than $2,000 and any person living with a family whose annual income is below $1,000 lives in destitution; families of four with an annual income of less than $3,000 and single people earning less than $1,500 a year live in poverty; families whose annual income is below $4,000 and single people earning less than $2,000 live in hardship; families earning less than $5,000 and single people earning less than $2,500 a year live in a Marginal State.

Mr. Speaker, as written in this article published in L'Action under "Présence chrétienne":

Now that we are becoming aware that poverty does not only exist in underdeveloped countries and that there are not merely a few exceptional cases in our own country, now that we know the situation in statistics, let us try to understand the human factor, let us share their lot and their suffering. That is the next step: to know poverty not only in one's mind but in one's body.

Mr. Speaker, I think that if we came more often down to the level of the poor, saw more of them and tried to know them, lived with them to understand their situation, and above all if we went to them to find suggestions on how to help them, then, Mr. Speaker, we could bring more effective and actual solutions to the evil situation which now prevails in our country, supposedly one of the richest in the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable that in the 20th century, in this century of progress and automation, after a 100 years of confederation in Canada, after a 100 years of administration by traditional political parties, that we should have to take steps such as this one, because there is too much misery and poverty in Canada. And we neglect to find the true solutions to those problems.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I found in the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare some points which gave me some satisfaction. For instance, as far as disability is concerned, I was happy to hear that the severe medical examination which a disabled person must now undergo to get a pension has been abolished. As a matter of fact, after such an examination, he finds that he must be at death's door, in short must be fully disabled, unable to climb stairs, to eat without help, before getting a pension. When he has reached that stage, he is considered disabled. I am happy to hear that this method of establishing the disability of a person will disappear and that when an individual is no longer able to meet his needs through his work, his income, he will then be considered disabled.

I think that will sensibly improve the legislation and will benefit people struck by any disability, victims of accidents or any other things that may happen during a lifetime of work.

The minister mentioned another point which will also be in the bill and to which I would like to call the attention of the house, namely retarded children. We have to deplore today the fact that not enough attention is paid to that group of our society. We lack institutions to welcome those children and not a week goes by without my getting requests for help or information to find out how to go about finding a place for retarded children, children who are not completely disabled but to whom more hope could be given, in short a better life.

We notice that there are too few institutions like that in Canada, in the province of Quebec and in our localities. Therefore, I think that building institutions, schools where such children could be adapted to a normal life would be a great step in that fight against the misery which is the lot of people, children who are not to blame for what is happening to them, but who have to suffer. It is our responsibility to help them find a better life.

Mr. Speaker, another point was brought up in the course of the present debate which I too would like to stress and which has been one of the main causes of the great lengths to which the debate seems to be stretching. I am thinking of old age security pension. I do not want to dwell too long on it, but I feel that the topic is rather interesting, especially to those who are well on in years or who will soon be.

Today the government refuses to increase the old age pension, in short to adjust it to the cost of living index; it turns a deaf ear. Yet, I think that though the ministers have not taken the stand officially, though they have not spoken in favour of increasing old age pensions in line with the cost of living index, or according to the recommendations of the Senate committee on aging, I feel that they do agree the pension should be increased but do not dare say so; they do not dare take the means to do so.

A few weeks ago the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) said the following before the Canadian Club in Toronto:

> It was difficult for the Liberal members to vote against the recent proposal of the opposition providing to increase the old age pension from the present $75 a month to $100 a month.

The minister was referring to the amendment moved by the opposition to increase the old age pension to $100 a month.

And the minister added:

> We only wish we could have done so, but in view of the fact that it would have cost $800 million a year, and also that, under the present circumstances, it is difficult to find enough revenue to cover our present rate of expenditures, this additional amount would have exerted tension on our economy which would have to be curbed.

Mr. Speaker, government members do not dare to express their opinion. They would like to but they do not dare, because it would cost, in their opinion—it is a questionable figure—$800 million a year.

But perhaps at the end of the evening, tomorrow or, at least in the fall, when the Bank Act will be considered, the same members will speak bombastically to obtain that the manufacturers, the "money-makers", the people who do not need it, and this is not very urgent, in my opinion, better capital gains, higher interests for their investments. For those people, you will hear fiery speeches, so that those who control the economic stream of the nation may have a larger income. But for our senior citizens, that has no importance. They do not dare; it will cost too much.

When money is needed to wage war, to alleviate poverty in Asia, Africa, everywhere, to make gifts of all sorts, then nothing is neglected; it is easy to find. But to help those who have been deprived for many years by taxes of all sorts, to provide them not with a luxurious but a decent retirement, at least, then they do not dare, they cannot find the necessary revenue.

Mr. Speaker, all the people of a certain age who are reduced to want today—I do not speak of those who are disabled, as a result of sickness or accident, but of our senior citizens —are in that state because of the maladministration of our old political parties, because of a system which should never have existed in our country. They have been stripped, during all their working life, of their revenue and their salary by excessive taxes. They have been stripped and, as a result, they got poor and, today, help is given to them piecemeal.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the problem of poverty in Canada should be studied thoroughly once again. It should be reconsidered and a solution should be found, not only to alleviate poverty, but also to check its causes. That is the task to which we must apply ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the principal cause of that situation is in the present Bank Act and that is what we shall grapple with, so as to find a means to improve the present situation; you will then see that the result will be better and we will not have to come up with bills like the one now before us.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the speech of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), for whom I have the greatest admiration, I felt that perhaps he should have subtitled it, "Never look a gift horse in the mouth". I think that the particular gift horse called the Canada Assistance Plan needs considerable examination, and the longer one looks at it the more disturbing this kind of legislation becomes. Many of the reasons for the dissatisfaction with this legislation have been indicated by my colleagues and by members of other parties, although the plan has some advantages.

I was interested to see how the plan would be applied and would affect those people who are currently having difficulties and require assistance. Like all members of parliament I get letters asking for assistance which perhaps comes within the provincial field. Like all members of parliament who find it difficult to make excuses or to appear to be passing the buck, I get involved in these matters and I am given the opportunity of seeing some of the cases that come before provincial governments and some of the problems with which they have to deal.

This morning I went through my files and took out just a few of the letters that have come to my attention in order to make an analysis of these problems, based on my personal experience, to see in just what way the Canada Assistance Plan is going to be of help and whether it is the best way of providing assistance to those people who require help. A very interesting fact arises from an examination of these letters, and I suggest to all hon. members on the government side that they take a look at the letters they have received to see whether their experience is not similar to mine. I should like to read some of the letters I have received and perhaps draw some conclusions from the problems outlined in these letters as to what is the best approach to the personal problems of many of the people of this country.

The first one begins in this way:

> I am writing this letter to let you know I am now 66 years old. On September 9 I will be 67 years old and we get the old age pension for one—

• (8:20 p.m.)

This family, Mr. Speaker, needs assistance very badly. I am not going into all the details of the letter. The husband's asthma is very bad and he will be in hospital. The key phrase in the letter is "66 years old". The implication of this and of many other letters I have received—and I will be repeating this point over and over again—is that if there were an old age pension of $100 a month at age 65 much of the problem evidenced in this letter will disappear. There is no need for provincial assistance here. There is no need for a needs test or a means test or anything else. This situation can be dealt with effectively by means of an adequate old age pension. Another letter says:

> I wonder if you can intercede to get me a little more old age pension as I am finding it very hard to keep up with doctor bills and the drugs which are needed. Also, we have to keep up our home as well.

Here again, an increased old age pension would solve this difficulty. Medicare, which we are now awaiting, would take care of another aspect of this situation. Thus, two programs within the jurisdiction of the federal government would be sufficient to meet the needs in this field.

I could go on to show that in letter after letter the key words, drugs, sickness, illness, old age, keep appearing. Yet the government is proposing that we accept a short-term measure designed to fill in the interstices of a welfare program and adopt it as a solution to welfare needs.

Either the government does not understand the nature of what is happening or else it refuses to face realities. It is my opinion that a great many of the welfare cases now being handled by the provinces would disappear if adequate old age pensions were paid and a suitable medicare program introduced. If we have a choice in this country, and I believe we do, why do we propose legislation of the kind before us when legislation of he kind to which I have referred is obviously called for? It is true there will probably always be a need for supplementary legislation in this field to deal with cases which do not fall within general categories, but surely we should not be asked to enact legislation such as this when the need for an increase in old age pensions throughout the country is so obvious.

Like many other members of the house I am concerned about the prestige of parliament. I am concerned about the loyalty of the people of Canada to their federal government. The other night I listened with interest to an amendment proposed by an hon. member on the government side and supported by the hon. member for St. John's West as a means by which government prestige might be improved. The method suggested was that we should write into all legislation providing federal assistance to the provinces a provision to the effect that a sign must be put up giving the federal government due credit for its share of the assistance and indicating the degree to which the federal government had participated.

I said then that this seemed to show a far greater concern for public relations than for doing things which would genuinely merit the affection of the people of Canada. This kind of thing is symptomatic of the legislation before us.

I say to members on the government side that they are taking a long step toward abdicating their responsibility in the field of old age assistance, and the vacuum they create by this abdication will be filled by the provinces themselves. Hon. members opposite may rest assured of that. The province of Prince Edward Island has already indicated that it recognizes the importance of making available a minimum of $100 a month to old age pensioners and intends to provide a supplement. Does the minister believe that other provinces will not take similar action? Does he not realize that such provinces will probably find a way of getting the federal government to pay a large portion of the cost in any event? Is he prepared to let a responsibility of this kind pass from his into other hands because he is unwilling to use his authority and unwilling to make a decision?

I presume that should the provinces decide to make supplementary payments to old age pensioners they could go to the federal government under the terms of the legislation before us and obtain financial assistance with respect to the supplementary payments on the basis of the percentage of the people covered. Thus the cost would be borne to a considerable extent by the federal government.

The result will be that the people will look on the federal government and say: What fools they are. Why did they let this come to pass? Naturally they will be grateful for assistance, whether it comes from the federal government or the provinces. But they will see one further indication that the federal government is refusing to act in the face of an evident need.

If supplements are paid, and I cannot see how it can be avoided any longer, the money will have to be found one way or another, either within the limits of provincial taxation or in the area of federal taxation. Surely the federal government has far better instruments for taxation at its disposal than have the provinces. If this tax is to be raised at the provincial level, the tendency will be for it to come from the home owners or from the smaller people of this country.

I was interested in the emphasis placed upon the distinction between means and needs. On the surface there seemed to be a concern to explain that the needs of certain individuals would be met to a greater extent under this legislation than was possible in the past and that the old means test might be changed. Certainly the hope was expressed that the attitude toward it might be changed. But the minister gives no indication of recognizing there is any occasion for a needs test as between one province of Canada and another. Here we have a program which says in effect: If you are a wealthy province and can raise large sums of money we shall give you large sums of money but if you are a poor province, unable to raise as much, we shall only give you an amount matching whatever you can raise.

Is this the best the minister could have done, especially when he knows full well the disadvantages afflicting some areas? Could a better formula not have been devised? Is it right that a poor province should be treated no differently than a rich province? Is this the way we are going to help correct the inequities that exist? Is this not a program to freeze the status quo? It appears that that is what the legislation is designed to do, and for that reason it falls far short of what is required in present circumstances.

Sometimes the question is asked, "How are we going to pay for it"? All kinds of suggestions are made in this regard, but the impression left by government spokesmen is that we cannot afford it. Yet the record indicates that Canada, one of the wealthiest nations in the western world, a nation with a standard of living second only to the United States, spends less on social welfare as a percentage of gross national product than nations much poorer.

I wish to read from a United Nations study published in 1961. Some changes have taken place since that time, mainly because of the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan, which will change the figures slightly, but the statistics in the report are startling. It shows the proportion of social welfare expenditures to gross national product in various countries. The percentages exclude education but include health, family allowances, social security and public assistance of various kinds. In the United Kingdom the figure is 11 per cent, in Sweden 10.5 per cent, in West Germany 9.4 per cent, in Australia 9.1 per cent, in France 5.8 per cent and in Canada 5.7 per cent. Our percentage is not pleasant to contemplate.

An earlier study by the International Labour Organization in Geneva, made from a different viewpoint and published under the title "The Cost of Social Security, 1949-1954", arrived at the following comparative percentages of gross national product: West Germany 19.2 per cent, France 18.5 per cent, Italy 14.7 per cent, Sweden 11.5 per cent, United Kingdom 10.7 per cent, Netherlands 9.6 per cent and Canada 9.1 per cent. On the basis of those figures I do not think anyone can say that this country has been overly generous in taking care of the social welfare needs of its citizens.

Last year I was proud to be a member of the parliament which passed the Canada Pension Plan. We in this party gave that plan our wholehearted endorsement because we realized the great value of that type of program. We have always supported, if not even sponsored, the old age security program, and we are on our way now toward building up a good comprehensive social security program provided the government does not backslide as it is doing with respect to this legislation and by not increasing the old age pension.

Once the old age security program reaches a certain level the government will have to consider seriously the need for an income related program such as suggested by the Senate committee on aging. If the government does the right thing with regard to the old age security program, the right thing being to increase the pension to $100 per month at age 65, if it uses the Canada Assistance Plan in the way it should be used, as a supplement to take care of those instances that do not fall within the broad general cetegory, and if it then acts on the Senate committee report, the minister and the government will have reason to be proud instead of being under the gun as they have been for the last few days so far as this particular problem is concerned.

The minister has seen how deep is the feeling of members on this side of the house and I am sure he has been made aware of the depth of feeling among members of his own party about the need to increase the old age pension. He really cannot ignore this expressed feeling any longer. Quite frankly, I do not understand what he is waiting for because surely he must realize that he has to do something about old age security and that he has to raise the pension.

If the minister does not raise the old age pension, then the provinces will. Is the minister prepared to abdicate his responsibility, to sit back and say: The federal government is timid; if the provinces want to do it that is their business and we will help them out? Does he honestly believe that the Canada Assistance Plan will help the great number of older people who need assistance, taking into account the pittance he is providing under the plan for a nation of 20 million people, a pittance that is supposed to do so many things?

Helping older people is only one aspect of this program. There are all kinds of things that this program is designed to do. Can the minister stretch $80 million that far? Surely he knows he cannot, and surely he knows our older people cannot live on $75 per month. When the minister replies I hope he will say he has listened to those voices from every political party, including his own, who have pleaded with him to do something for our older people.

Everything has been done that I believe is possible to do. We have had pleas to the minister's good nature. We have had threats to defeat the government. We have had threats to sit here all summer if need be. But up to the present moment the minister has retained great equanimity in the face of all these things. If these things do not move him and he says he needs a better reason to be moved, let him search his own heart, examine the situation of our older people and then stand up and tell the house that his government is prepared to do something worth while before we adjourn this summer.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have hesitated to inject myself into this debate because I am myself concerned. Approaching as I do in a month or two the end of my 70th year, naturally I am personally involved to some extent. However, I think it is perhaps time that someone of my generation should speak on behalf of the vast number of people in Canada who have reached my age or a greater age and are left in the situation in which they have been left today by this and previous governments.

There are several ways by which the degree of civilization of a people may be measured. We may measure it perhaps by the number of cars that block our highways. We may measure it perhaps by the measure of ostentation with which a nation proceeds to celebrate its 100th birthday. We may measure it by the number of millionaires we have. There are numerous ways. But I suggest a more valid measure of the degree of civilization of any people is the manner in which they treat and consider those at both ends of life's scale.

What is important is the way we approach the situation of the more vulnerable and more helpless members of our community. I may tell you that even one such as myself who looks forward to retirement without any particular misgivings on that score, knowing I shall be comfortable enough in my last days, realizes that as one gets old one is obliged to recognize the fact that one becomes more and more vulnerable, more and more helpless and more and more dependent on the compassion, generosity and kindness of one's fellow human beings.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is a terrible indictment of the degree of civilization of the people of Canada for this government to refuse to move in this manner to give relief to those who are in the age group to which I belong and those who are older. It seems quite shocking to me that Canadian people who have never known hunger, who have never known despair and who have never known misery and poverty should, in the midst of a society which we think of as being the second most affluent in the world, be content to leave hundreds of thousands of their fellow citizens in a condition of misery.

I think of the old lady in my constituency who I met casually a few weeks ago who was obliged to subsist on a diet of corn flakes for the last two weeks of the month before her cheque came in. She seemed rather surprised when I expressed my shock. She said: "Oh, there are many like me; some take shredded wheat but I take corn flakes and survive until the next cheque comes in." She was rather philosophical. She thought it was rather shocking that she had been left in this condition because she had worked hard all her life, but she assumed that eventually parliament would get around to providing an income which would produce something more than corn flakes in the last week of the month.

I know we shall be told repeatedly as we have been told in the past that we cannot afford this. I know that in the editorial columns of every financial page in this country we will be warned that we must go carefully and that we cannot move too fast in the direction of the welfare state.

I know we will be asked where will the money come from. There are a number of places we could suggest. I am going to suggest one. I would suggest that if we were prepared to cut in half the hundreds of millions of dollars we have thrown down the drain, ever since I first entered this house 13 years ago, on so-called defence, we could easily care for the needs of the old people of this country. I have not heard one minister of national defence in all that time—and I have sat opposite a succession of them—tell us that with this vast expenditure of funds the security of the Canadian people has been in any way ensured. This is a prestige thing, and there is no other reason for it. Anyone who examines the situation knows perfectly well that Canada cannot make any meaningful contribution toward the military strength of the western world. But for prestige purposes we continue to throw the money away and say we cannot afford to look after our own people. That is a scandalous scale of values.

I was reminded of this the other day while speaking to a representative of one of the small Caribbean nations. I asked him whether his people had an army. He said: "Oh, no, we cannot afford an army." Then he turned to me and smiled and said: "Anyway, I would hope we would have too much sense to pretend that we could afford one." The inference was perfectly obvious. He considered we did not have as much sense as he hoped his people would have.

In my part of the country in the early days the native population on Vancouver Island solved the problems of the old people perfectly simply. They had a simple method. When an old man or an old woman was unable any longer to contribute to the work and welfare of the tribe he or she was taken out to the ocean at low tide and parked there with a small package of food. The tribe then went back to the land and waited for nature to take its course. We are not quite as kind as that, because we insist on giving our old people a little money so that the tides of poverty will not sweep them away immediately and they will have plenty of time in their later years to repent the fact that they spent their lives working for the benefit of the community and Canada and trusted us to see that they would be looked after in their old age.

I would suggest that if one wishes to advance an argument there is no better argument than this to convince the government, and it seems that one has to adduce these arguments to get any action from this dilapidated and discredited government. Let no one doubt that it is dilapidated and discredited. If it is seeking some operation which will be a face-lifting operation, there is no better place to do it than to do it here by bringing in legislation which will not solve the problems of the old people of the country and will not enable them to live in luxury but which, by adding merely $25 a month, perhaps will relieve some of the poverty, misery and frustration under which they live today.

I know quite well that if the government does this it will be subjected to criticism, as I said earlier, in every financial paper in the country. It would be subjected to criticism on every editorial page in the country because the people who write these things represent those who do not wish to have further expenditures placed on them in order that the old people will be helped. It will take a certain amount of courage, I quite admit, for the government to fly in the face of these newspaper editorial writers and financial critics.

Courage unfortunately has been one quality which has been in conspicuously short supply in this government. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if this government hopes to save itself then this is about the only card it has left to play. It should summon its courage and play it now today and not later when it will be revealed to the people of Canada that it has been forced to do something which it did not have the courage and decency to do on its own initiative.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, without repetition it would be very difficult for me to add to the arguments advanced by hon. members on this side of the house in respect of this legislation. I will, however, make a few remarks about the attitude of this government toward old age pensioners and the representations made on their behalf.

I call your attention to the fact that anyone attending the House of Commons today would come to the conclusion that the only people here concerned with old age pensioners are those sitting on this side of the house. I cannot believe that is true. Since the government voted against a proposal to increase old age pensions by $25 a number of members on the government side have risen to profess an interest in the old people of this country. In view of that fact and in view of the rumours that are flying around this house I am going to put a direct challenge to the Liberal benches.

A number of members on the other side of the house have professed an interest in old age pensioners since that party voted against an increase in their pensions. If that professed interest is real let some of those members stand and speak on behalf of our older citizens. Rumour has it that the government has asked them not to speak. If they think something should be done for pensioners, now is the time for them to get up and make representations. Rumour also has it that the government is prepared to do something for old age pensioners if the backbenchers on that side of the house will hold back and say nothing about this bill. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) has on a number of occasions, since that party voted against an increase, posed questions to his government in respect of an increase in pensions. Let us hear from that hon. member now and other members of his party who have professed some concern for our older people. Let us have some action from that side of the house. Let those hon. members now show their real colours in respect of old age pensioners.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I was one of the members present in the house yesterday when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a very logical, reasoned and well-balanced presentation in respect of the bill now before us. I felt that he did full justice to the measure and pointed out, perhaps in a manner which leaned too far toward being fair, the virtues of the bill. On the other hand, I believe that by his motion, he presented an opportunity to rectify the basic inadequacies of the program being presented by the government, in the absence of any indication that the government intended to do anything else. However, I gather that his proposal was not allowed to come before the house for discussion.

I say that I gather that because during the course of the day I, along with certain other members of the Indian affairs committee, was at a meeting with some of the Indian people of Ontario. In that connection, of course, it comes to my mind that certain portions of this bill make reference to the situation of the Indian people of Canada. As I understand those portions of the bill and the principle involved there will be an appreciable move in the direction of recognition of the fact that the Indian people are, as one Indian spokesman said today, not merely Indians but also people. In so far as the bill moves in that direction, I for one am prepared to say that it is a step in the right direction.

Perhaps I should qualify that support by suggesting that the measure to which I referred will put the Indian people in the same position as the rest of the people of Canada in that they will have the same rights to share poverty. If that is a right to be desired, then I suppose this bill is a forward step. I presume all of us in this house have some concern in our minds and hearts for the needs of our fellow human beings. I am sure that none of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party who have or will participate in this debate would suggest that any member of the house is lacking in those human attributes. However, I feel it is fair to say it is evident that while the members of the present government may as individuals have some of the milk of human kindness in their breasts, they have very little human sagacity or understanding in their heads.

It is all very well for us as Canadian citizens to have our own feelings and emotions, but parliament basically is a place where we should come to use our heads. I for one submit that the members of the present government are displaying an astonishing lack of ability to use that upper portion of the human body, particularly when they try to suggest at this juncture in Canadian history that the bill now before us is the answer to the problems of the older people of Canada.

My colleague and seatmate, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron), made reference to the fact that he had some hesitancy in speaking during this debate because he is reaching that age when he could be considered an older or senior citizen. My own feeling in participating in this debate is perhaps one of some shame because I happen to belong to another age group slightly junior to that to which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands belongs. I happen to belong to that particular age group in Canadian society which stands to benefit most from the Canada Pension Plan enacted by parliament during a prior session.

If I may express my views as a member of that particular group, I cannot help feeling some shame because those of us in that particular group, and I think that includes a great many of the members of this house, gave recognition to that measure as a forward advance in social progress but are not prepared or willing to give greater recognition to the needs of the generation to which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands belongs. That hon. gentleman said that he did not need to be too directly concerned about the implications of the level of old age security payments and the matter of providing pensions by right to the present older generation of Canadians. I am sure he would be willing to recognize that in many ways this is more a matter of chance than anything else.

Sometimes I find myself thinking about the period of time through which Canadian citizens like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) have gone. I happen to know something which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands did not mention in his speech, namely, that he was one of those Canadians who found themselves in France and Flanders at a very early age. He happened to be fortunate enough to come back. He lived through, as indeed I suppose I did, the ups and downs of a period of Canadian history that is so often referred to as the hungry 30's. This is one reason why so many of the present generation of older citizens are in a position in which they need, as a matter of right through the contributions of the Canadian economy as a whole, an income that will enable them to live with dignity and respect. As individual citizens of this country they had no opportunity in their earlier days, when many of them were raising families, to provide for the necessities of life as they grew older.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) is piloting this bill through the house. I often feel that we have to face the wrong minister across the floor of the house when discussing measures of this kind. Naturally I do not seek to put words into the mouth of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He has taken on the job of being responsible for the health and welfare of the Canadian people so far as the operations of the federal government are concerned. But I cannot help feeling that if we could get him beyond the bounds of what is referred to as cabinet solidarity he would, because he belongs to the same age group as I do though perhaps he is somewhat my junior in years, indicate his appreciation of the inadequacies of the measures he is proposing in this bill.

I recall, as I suppose do all those who were candidates in the last election campaign, the clarion call of the war on poverty that was being sounded forth at that time. If this measure is the answer to the war on poverty I suggest that it is a pretty feeble war. It is perhaps in the same position as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands suggested we as a nation are in the world today with regard to our very feeble defence effort. I feel that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in this position in relation to the kind of promises trumpeted by the Liberal party political machine during the last election campaign.

I wish this bill had been put before us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) because I would like to see him answering the questions being raised in this debate. In my mind he is the one responsible next to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for assessing the kind of priorities to be given to what is to be done in this country. He is the one who should have to stand in this house and explain why we have to be content with this miserable half-measure. He is the one who, so far as the policies of the government are concerned, establishes the kind of priorities that exist in our society where on the one hand we see lush and extravagant expenditures for meaningless and fruitless purposes while on the other hand, as previous speakers have indicated, we know that thousands and thousands of Canadian citizens are having to live on the verge of starvation.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, who sometimes has in mind the customs of the native Indian people of British Columbia of another age, I am inclined to agree that we are less kind than some of the earlier so-called primitive societies. Primitive societies by and large accepted one or other of two approaches to the question of what should happen to their older people. They either took the necessary steps to bring their lives to a swift and relatively painless conclusion when they had reached the point where they could no longer fend for themselves, or they accepted fully the right of the older people in their societies to share completely in whatever measure of abundance that society as a whole was capable of providing. We in our so-called civilized, advanced, technical age are not prepared to be as kind. We are prepared to let our older people face a slow death for lack of a decent living. Sometimes I feel it would be much more honest if we were to say to them: The best thing for you is to find the nearest bridge and jump off it into the river or stream that lies below rather than seeking to carry on over a period of months or years in the way we insist you must live in the midst of abundance and plenty.

I am not suggesting that only the Minister of Finance and the government as a whole are responsible for assigning priorities in this regard. I suppose in great measure the fixing of priorities reflects the attitude that exists in the minds of many people in our society. It reflects the attitude of the people who sit in the councils of high finance.

Last evening in private members' hour we had under discussion a bill concerned with the refinancing of a certain company. There was an exchange wherein the hon. member who was sponsoring the bill took exception to certain remarks I was making and suggested that I did not know too much about good corporate practice. I admitted I was not an authority on what, in the minds of many people, is good corporate practice. However, I said I knew enough about it to realize that if the hon. member sponsoring the bill considers the proposal contained in it to be good corporate practice, then he and I will have to continue to differ on the matter because so far as I am concerned the kind of corporate practice set out in the bill would result in gouging every cent out of the consuming public of Canada for the purpose of lining the pockets of a small minority of people in our society.

It seems to me that the attitude of the government in respect of the proposed assistance plan is typified by their attitude to what they consider to be good corporate practice. I disagree with that manner of running the government of Canada just as I disagree with the approach of the private company to which I have referred. I think this is the general issue behind such bills which the government wishes us to support.

There is a basic difference between the philosophy and attitude that we in the New Democratic Party are trying to put forward in this house and the philosophy and attitude expressed by the government of Canada. I know there are a lot of well-meaning hon. members who support the government, and if they wish to continue being the government's yes men that is their right and their business. However, I suggest that the writing is on the wall and it indicates that the Canadian people will no longer put up with this kind of exploitation and that there are enough Canadians with the right feelings in their hearts and good heads on their shoulders to see through this sham to which I have had to listen ever since I have been in this house.

What we are discussing tonight is a matter which has been discussed in every session of parliament since I have been a member and I know that it was being discussed for a good many years prior to my election to this house in 1953. This legislation is a challenge and if we cannot convince the members of this government then one of these days we will convince the Canadian people that we cannot continue in this way at a time when we boast about our technological progress and travelling to the moon and when those of us who are in a position to do so travel back and forth across Canada in a few hours. We will not be satisfied with a more primitive and cruel society than existed in this country before the Europeans discovered it. We could learn a lot from the Indian people in my constituency about the way to treat our older people and it would be a good thing if we could measure up to them.

I am not sure that the limitations in this bill are entirely confined to the people in the older age groups. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare was introducing this bill he said there would always be a need for this kind of filler-in assistance program. He suggested to us that no country in the world has abolished this type of assistance in its social security system. I would be prepared to agree with him in certain respects but I certainly disagree with the approach that a needs test should be required forever in our society. We will have to abolish such practices before we become a completely civilized nation.

However, I agree that the most immediate and urgent action we should now take is to alleviate the situation of the particular segment of the Canadian people who are being left out in the cold in respect of any improvement in social security legislation. I say that in view of the proposal I now see on the order paper for a medical care program which we hope will bring medical health care to all Canadians along with the action we have taken in regard to the Canada Pension Plan.

I think the proposal which was put forward to increase old age pensions to $100 a month at the age of 65 is perhaps too modest. In fact, I will be most happy to challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to improve on the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who, I am sure, would be among the first in this house to get up and congratulate the minister if he were to do that. I wish the Minister of Finance would come into the house right now and tell us why the government does not support the simple and immediate proposal we are making. Somehow I feel it is almost unfair of me to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to stand up and do it. He does not appear to be giving any indication of a desire to get up on his feet at the present moment.

Mr. MacEachen: May I, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Barnett: If he could give me some indication that that is what he has in mind, I would be quite happy to terminate my remarks at this point.

Mr. MacEachen: I am ready, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: Does the minister wish to ask me a question?

Mr. MacEachen: I accept the hon. member's invitation if he will sit down and allow me to wind up the second reading of this bill by making a statement.

Mr. Douglas: If some hon. member on the government side wishes to make a statement, we are prepared to accept it.

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Mr. Speaker. After all, there are other hon. members on the government side who have not yet spoken.

Mr. MacEachen: I see my hon. friends have now withdrawn their invitation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This might be a good time to suggest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that he direct his remarks to the principle of the bill before us.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: I freely admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am not an authority on the rules of the house but I do know enough about them to realize that in the present circumstances I can only yield the floor to the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he wishes to address a question to me. If he has such an announcement to make he could easily have one of his colleagues make it on his behalf. I must say that in spite of the evident desire of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to express some final remarks upon the bill before us, he has not given any indication that he proposes to make any basic amendments in the committee stage. If that were really going to happen or if the government had some real alternative to propose, I am sure it probably would have been forthcoming before now, if not through the Minister of National Health and Welfare then through one of his colleagues.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister said no on the orders of the day when he was asked a question by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Barnett: I hear that the Prime Minister said no at the opening of the session today. Of course, we have to accept the word of the Prime Minister as the final view on matters of government policy. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam apparently is not too strongly convinced that the Prime Minister always hews to a certain line when announcing policy. I would be quite happy if the Prime Minister were to change his mind.

The claims which were made prior to the introduction of this measure concerning its relationship to the so-called war on poverty and the various statements of the present administration during the election campaign mean nothing at all because the initiative is left with the provincial governments. I suppose there are some provincial governments, and the minister said he had indications from one or two, that will implement the provisions contained in this bill. It will perhaps enable them to raise their sights a little more easily so far as provincial handout programs are concerned. People in my constituency who are dependent on what is available to them from provincial programs often come to me and therefore I have some idea of the practical effect of provincial welfare programs. I feel that this bill is completely inadequate in so far as the benefits available to the older citizens of Canada are concerned.

During the last time I had an opportunity of doing some travelling in my own constituency I encountered a family situation where an elderly gentleman was suffering from a heart condition and was unable to engage in any sort of active work. His wife had just come back from hospital after having undergone a cancer operation. This couple had a daughter whose husband had deserted her and left her with five children. She was dependent upon the provincial assistance program and, having no other place where she could find shelter, had to go to the home of her parents. It was suggested to her that she should go out to work in order to support herself and the five children, leaving the care of those five bouncing children to the grandfather who was suffering from a heart condition and a grandmother who had recently returned from hospital following a cancer operation.

This is an actual example of how the welfare approach works out in practice. When you follow this bill right through you find that all it is going to do is give a few more dollars to the provinces to carry on that kind of program. Every hon. member encounters dozens and dozens of people in similar situations when travelling round his constituency. I am sure that Comox-Alberni probably has fewer such people than many areas of Canada because by and large it is a rich, wealth-producing area. It probably has less than the average number of older people. If I encounter situation after situation of this type in travelling through my constituency, then surely the Minister of National Health and Welfare must agree that there is a serious deficiency in the principle of the bill he has put before us. A few extra dollars in the hands of welfare administrations is not going to alter these situations in any basic way. We may ease them slightly because there are a few extra dollars but we are not doing anything to correct situations of this kind.

Mr. MacEachen: We certainly are. Read the bill.

Mr. Barnett: I understood the minister to say it does something but it does not correct the basic human cruelty of the welfare approach. Sometimes I find it completely incomprehensible that the government of Canada, which proposes to speak for the needs of the Canadian people, should be content to ask members of parliament to be satisfied to go home after having passed a measure of this kind feeling that they have done a great thing for their constituents. Certainly I should like to go home and visit the fine people who live in the northern part of Vancouver Island. But I should like to go home and meet and talk with them feeling that I am proud to be a member of the Canadian parliament. I am not going to feel very proud if this measure which makes some provision for the senior citizens of Canada is all I have to go home with.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question? Does the hon. gentleman intend to support this measure or does he intend to vote against it?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, that is one of those ingenious questions which the Minister of Transport is so fond of asking. I am going to ask the Minister of Transport a question in return.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is your answer?

Mr. Barnett: Is the Minister of Transport in his heart going to be proud to go home to his constituents in Bonavista-Twillingate and say that this is the best that the Canadian parliament can do for the old people of Bonavista-Twillingate?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, sir, I will be very proud to say that no country in the world makes as generous provision for its old people as does Canada. Everyone in this house knows it, and the hypocrisy over there is not going to conceal it either.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, the statement the Minister of Transport has just made is not true.

Mr. Douglas: And he knows it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Name the country that does more for its old people than Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will both hon. gentlemen sit down, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has risen on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have to support the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). The statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is untrue, because the Minister of Transport cannot go home to Bonavista.

Mr. Starr: He has not got a home there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This might be the proper time to advise the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that his time has expired.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Barnett: Just before the point of order was raised I had stated that what the Minister of Transport said was not true and I would like the courtesy of the house for time to say in a few words why in my opinion his statement is not true. I can do so in two minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Name the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asking for unanimous consent of the house to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I might not have risen to take part in this debate but for certain events that transpired today. Until today and during the course of today I had been quite content with the statements that had been made by members of the Conservative party in connection with our interest in this bill and our interest in having it extended by parallel legislation so that the old age pensioners of this country would also receive some assistance. But the answer that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) gave today when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked him whether he would bring in additional legislation to increase old age pensions from $75 to $100 a month brought forth from the Prime Minister a very abrupt answer, a strict "No". Had he suggested to us that he was giving consideration to additional legislation or had he said that he was going to fulfil his election promise to the old people of this country during the course of this session, then perhaps we would have been content. But he brushed aside the question of the Leader of the Opposition very abruptly and I wondered at the time why he did so.

He also had in front of him for consideration an amendment which was ruled out of order by the chair but which nevertheless was an attempt on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to give the government a way out of the dilemma they are in. The amendment suggested, as I understand its intent, that in addition to the bill now in front of us there should also be concurrent legislation to provide an increase in the old age pension from $75 to $100 a month.

An olive branch was extended to the government, Mr. Speaker, by the New Democratic Party but the government turned it aside and would not accept this expression of opinion. The intent of that amendment had the support of our party. Here was a chance for the government to save face and extricate itself from difficulty by telling us that concurrent legislation would be brought forward. Quite properly, they would say that they could not accept the amendment.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It was ruled out of order.

Mr. Churchill: It was ruled out of order. But suppose it had been ruled in order. The government might then have voted it down and said that it was a question of confidence. Even so, Mr. Speaker, the government should have read between the lines and interpreted the feeling of the house as it was expressed in the amendment and by the comments made during the point of order that was raised as meaning that the members of the house generally were in favour of some extra legislation which would provide for the elderly people of this country that which they richly deserve and which was promised to them by the Liberal party at election time, namely an increase in their old age pensions. However, Mr. Speaker, the government failed to interpret the will of the house and it dug in, getting a little irritated perhaps because this debate has continued.

It is for these two reasons, sir, that I decided I would participate in the debate. I want to help the government out of their difficulty. We have been doing nothing else now for the last several months. We have been helping them with their program in the house. We have been passing legislation for them rather quickly. So far as we are concerned we are content to sit longer hours. We want them to have a good rest this summer so that they can collect their thoughts and formulate a program for the next session. We have been very co-operative.

The situation tonight is simply this. It is not right for this house to aim at an early adjournment this summer while leaving unfinished business as important as the Canada Assistance Plan and help for the old age pensioners. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to sit here all summer until we complete some of these important pieces of legislation. The government will continue to disintegrate while this goes on because it needs to have the House of Commons rise so that it will be out of the way. But if they fail in disintegrating of their own volition we shall assist them with that too.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare a little while ago interrupted the hon. member who spoke just before me. He said he wanted to speak to the question, wind up the debate and also make a statement. What does he mean by this? Has he some further announcement to make which will enlarge the scope of this bill so as to take account of the plea which has been put forward on behalf of the old age pensioner? If he has such a statement, as has already been suggested, some colleague of his could get up and make it and take part in this debate.

It is a strange thing that in this debate which has been going on for a couple of days the Minister of National Health and Welfare should find himself isolated from his colleagues, who are not supporting him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: He is isolated from his friends on the back benches who are not supporting him on this measure. I am told there are many members of the Liberal party who would like to speak in favour of the bill in front of us and who would like also to speak in favour of fulfilling that Liberal promise to the old age pensioners. But they are being held back. I sympathize with them. I believe in freedom of speech and I believe that, no matter what party he supports, anyone who has been elected to this house should have the opportunity to present his views freely. How members from the ranks of the Liberal party can go back to their constituencies this summer and fail to report to their old age pensioners that they have done something for them, escapes me. It is all right for the members of the cabinet. They can always say that pressure of work keeps them here in Ottawa. They do not have to face these pensioners. But private members cannot offer such an excuse. They will have to go home and face the music in their constituencies.

What will they say to the elderly people of this country? They will have to say: Once again the Liberal party has let you down. This will be very bad for the Liberal party. People in the constituencies will be saying: There are other parties in this country which would be willing to help us. Why not give them a chance? I am worried about the Liberal party and I want to help them out tonight. It is my suggestion to them that they will have an opportunity to rectify their error by making a statement tomorrow. The Minister of National Health and Welfare can make a statement tomorrow about what he wants to do to correct the deficiencies which have been pointed out, and instead of rushing away for a summer recess most of the members of this house are prepared to stay here and give the government a chance to make this correction.

Once again we come to the assistance of the government. It would have been really embarrassing to them had we quickly passed the Canada Assistance Plan legislation tonight without any modification being made in it, and they would have regretted it the next day. But we shall give them tonight to think it over. Perhaps the Prime Minister will modify his attitude with regard to the old age pensioners tomorrow and perhaps tomorrow we shall hear a statement on motions that concurrent legislation will be brought in to match this particular bill and that old age pensions will be raised immediately to $100 a month.

Mr. Knowles: We hope you are a prophet, Gordon.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I have been right sometimes on political questions in the past and perhaps I am right on this occasion.

Speaking on the resolution stage the Minister of National Health and Welfare said this particular bill would underpin the whole social security structure. I am paraphrasing his words, though he did use the word "underpin". Rounding out the social security situation in Canada sounded all right at the time.

But on reflection and on re-reading his speech I have discovered that he was making a good deal out of something which was not as important as he pretended it was when he spoke on June 14. Most of these programs have been in operation for years. This bill simply undertakes a tidying-up process. We do not object to that. Administratively it appears to be a good idea. Certain assistance plans which have been operating separately for years are now being brought together. The minister has a title for it, the Canada Assistance Plan, and it sounds as though it is brand new. Unless I have misjudged the propaganda machine of the Liberal party, this will be presented to the public as something entirely original which is underpinning our whole social security program.

Mr. Douglas: Whole page advertisements.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. Whole page ads. I hope the people will not be misled. This is just a tidying-up process and it fails to underpin our whole social security program for two reasons. First, it does not provide for our older citizens who are in desperate need of assistance at the present time and, in the second place, the amount of money being provided is rather inadequate.

The minister said it was estimated that $85 million would be required for the additional assistance foreseen under the terms of the bill. At the same time he tells us there are about one million people who require help, that is, those who are still under the old age assistance program, those who receive blindness allowances, those who are disabled, the needy mothers with dependent children and 600,000 other recipients of assistance as well as 50,000 children in the care of child welfare authorities. In all, there are one million Canadian citizens who are to be assisted by an extra amount of $85 million.

Well, $85 million sounds like a great deal of money but it only amounts to $7 a month or 23 cents a day for these people, and I cannot see that this will provide very much additional assistance. It will not provide as much assistance as the minister attempted to say it would when he was speaking about this measure on the resolution stage and on second reading. When we add together all the welfare payments and the cost of the assistance work which is being done, the new expenditure, he said, would bring the total level of federal disbursements on welfare services to more than $250 million.

He tried to impress on us that this represented very substantial assistance. I am not so sure that it is. We have a population of 20 million people and we are a wealthy country which can budget for close to $8 billion in revenue in the course of a fiscal year. I am not so sure that $250 million for one million citizens of this country who are in need is anything like beyond our means.

Therefore I am not overly impressed with the picture painted by the minister of what he is doing by this plan. I know his keenness to get on with it and get publicity out of something which people may think is new but which comprises only older and useful plans dressed up under a new name. The government cannot claim that this is something new and cannot claim that it is going to underpin our whole social security structure.

This is a slow process. During the last 40 years we have experienced a change in public opinion with regard to social security. It was frowned upon in early days when people were supposed to work and save. I remember very early in life, at the age of 10, 11 and 12, walking behind my father on the day before Christmas and pulling my toboggan or sleigh laden with parcels to distribute to needy families, and at that early age I saw the crippling effects of poverty.

One family which I had to look after, not only at Christmas time but during the year, kept on increasing year by year until it got to the size of two adults and 13 junior members. Even as a small boy I rather wondered how the head of that family, who had nothing but a minor job as a caretaker, could raise such an enormous brood, but it has taken us a long time to realize that it is not possible for everybody in this country to earn a satisfactory living and save for their old age. As the years have gone by we have discovered that this is an impossibility for a great many people and that the state has an obligation on their behalf.

The wealth of a nation rests with its people, in addition to its natural resources. Unless its people are strong and healthy and have a good outlook on life, the nation suffers accordingly. I know all about the depression years. I saw their evil effects on hundreds of people. I saw their effect on a class of 40 high school boys, aged 17 and 18, whose fathers had been unemployed for anywhere from one to five years.

During the last year I was engaged in teaching those boys were not interested in school. They would have been drop-outs had there had been any place to drop to. But strangely enough, a year later when the war broke out these young men at age 17, 18 and 19 put on their country's uniform and served in the navy, army or air force. Three of them became officers in the Canadian Army; yet they had been making no progress in school. At the time I knew them in 1938 all these lads were headed for the unemployment line, just like their fathers, to live on the dole and eke out an existence. But when the time of crisis came they served their country. They served their country well and several of them lost their lives.

It is no advantage to our country to have thousands of children living under meagre conditions. It is no advantage to us if we have 200,000 needy mothers with dependant children eking out a bare existence. These are the present and future adult citizens of our country. They deserve sufficient food to develop healthy bodies and sufficient stimulus through education of the mind so that they will be useful citizens. The mothers of these needy children should be not be ground down by toil and worry and end up in ill health. The psychological effect is, of course, even greater if a family can see no sign of life but just a grim existence stretching ahead from day to day.

It is no credit to a country to fail to give its senior citizens that which they deserve. They deserve something beyond a mere existence, and over the years we have fortunately reached a stage where our senior citizens are getting much better attention than they got some years ago.

I recall visiting senior citizens in the city of Winnipeg 20 years ago. I particularly remember three elderly men in their eighties, eking out an existence on an old age pension of $30 a month and living in squalid quarters. I asked how they managed to keep alive and how they got their food. They told me that on Monday morning they went to one of the stores and bought stale bread left over from Saturday. They were boiling a cup of tea when I visited them and I asked how much the gas cost for the ring they were using. They replied, "We are pretty smart. You watch that kettle. The minute it begins to hum we switch the gas off, the water comes to a boil from the heat still left in the ring and then we make our cup of tea." The only tobacco they had was what was given to them.

When I was a member of the Manitoba legislation in 1947-48 I was batching for one month and I decided to live on $30 to see how the old age pensioners lived. I put $30 aside. I did not pay my rent out of it but restricted myself to $1 a day for the full 30 days. I existed on hamburg, stale bread and an egg or two. There was no steak or extra treats for me.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): And no whisky.

Mr. Churchill: And no whisky. I walked instead of riding on the buses. I rolled my own cigarettes. I just got by and no more, and I did not buy clothes or pay my rent. That is the type of life senior citizens were living in those years, and many of them are still living under those conditions because they are restricted to $75 a month while over the 20-year interval the value of money has declined. When they pay rent out of their $75 they have barely sufficient left for food. What do they do for clothing and for little extras? This thing is shameful.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Our country, a wealthy nation, owes our older people some enjoyment in the later years of their life. I think that assistance should be given to them very very promptly. That is why we are urging today that the government listen to its backbenchers and to the people on this side of the house, bring in the concurrent legislation that was requested and raise immediately the pension for our older citizens from $75 to $100 a month. Let us accomplish that. We will pass the Canada Assistance Plan in no time because we are not opposed to the general idea. Then we will sit here and do the other bits of legislation and wind up.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That is a threat.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman opposite says it is a threat. It is no threat at all. I am suggesting we are prepared to sit here, continue with this and other pieces of legislation and do our proper job for our country. But we are asking the government to fulfil its obligation to our senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that the word is out through an ex-minister of the Liberal government that the minister intends announcing the implementation of a plan for a guaranteed income after the summer recess. I ask members of the house to govern themselves accordingly and restrain themselves so that the minister may rise in his place and make such an announcement.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacEachen: A point of order has been raised and for the second time tonight—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: —I have attempted to respond to an invitation from the opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I ask the minister whether he is rising on the point of order?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to reply to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. He was given a full opportunity to present his point of order and I should like to reply to it by saying that this is the second time tonight hon. members have asked me to reply on this general subject and make a statement with regard to the intentions of the government. Twice I have volunteered and have been refused. I am waiting anxiously to conclude this debate in order that the bill will be passed and so that the house will be fully aware of the government's plans.

Mr. Douglas: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the night before last the minister made a speech which we took to contain the government's plans, but if the minister has something additional or if the government has had second thoughts I am sure the house would be quite prepared to give unanimous consent to revert to motions so that the minister can make his statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam knows perfectly well that the orderly way to proceed with this debate is to give the minister an opportunity to wind up on second reading. No other proposal can cover up the persistent filibuster which is being carried on.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot impute motives to the members of this house.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Why do you laugh?

Mr. Douglas: He cannot impute motives. If the minister wishes to make any statement about a change in the government's plans we can revert to motions, but until he asks for permission to do so we can only conclude that the government is going to persist in the niggardly plan which is now before the house. Neither the minister nor the government have any right to shut out proper discussion by promising to do something they have no intention of doing.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The Minister of National Health and Welfare is so anxious to speak on this matter that the backbenchers who are interested in it have been pulled back and not given an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair assumes that this ends the discussion on the point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): If the Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to state that the government is willing to grant the increase in old age pension, let him say so then. We will be pleased to allow him to announce it immediately. But if he merely intends to bring the debate to a close, that would not be quite honest, because I feel we have the right, the duty even, to tell the house why we are in favour of increasing the old age pension.

I can see the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois) whispering near the curtains at the back. I recall how the same member, during the last election campaign, clamoured loudly: I promise to see that the old age pension is increased. But, now, the member for Chicoutimi leaves the house; yet, he committed himself to supporting this increase. I was there when he said so; he had it printed in the newspapers and that cost him money. Today—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Chicoutimi rising on a point of order?

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): A question of privilege, sir.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I am glad to give him the opportunity to speak for the first time.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to disappoint those members, but this is not my maiden speech this evening, since I have already spoken on two or three occasions.

The member for Lapointe, who is very talkative and takes up a great deal of the time of the house, has just made a totally incorrect and unfounded assertion. During the last election campaign, I have never promised at any of my meetings—it is therefore impossible for the member for Lapointe to have heard me—to have the old age pension increased to $100 across the board. What I said, and it is reasonable, is that I would make every effort to have the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) put forward a program designed to pay a pension up to $125 per month to needy people. Then, if the member for Lapointe delves deeply enough in his memory, he will find that what I have just said is the same thing I stated during the last election campaign.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the point of order is completed—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Lapointe would now direct his remarks to the principle of Bill C-207.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I remember very well that, at that time, the hon. member for Chicoutimi was not saying: "I shall endeavour", as he just did tonight, but rather: "I pledge". And it took 15 minutes to list everything he pledged. Now, he has not yet fulfilled any of those pledges, including that concerning old age pension, since he voted against an amendment to increase old age pensions; he voted against, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare himself said today—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, The hon. member is now reflecting on the manner in which members in the house vote. May I suggest to him again that he direct his remarks to the principle of the bill before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: The principle of the bill is social security. Now I am speaking of social security. I claim that something must be done in order to increase not only the pensions for the disabled, for needy mothers, for the blind members of I know not what constituencies—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: —but also the old age pensions. The hon. member claims we are filibustering.

No, Mr. Speaker, we are not filibustering. That is not true. We want the bill to carry completely but we want more than that to carry and we are ready, on this side, to give up our summer recess so that more than this carry and so that people aged 65 and over get $100 a month without discriminating tests. We are ready to stay here for that purpose, to try to get that for our oldsters. But why are the Liberal members sitting in silence? Why are they not coming over to our side and support our demands to the government to have the old age pensions increased to $100 a month at 65 years without tests?

While the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) was speaking, I noted that ten ministers were in the house, but barely eight Liberal members. This proves that the back-benchers of the Liberal party are embarrassed by the position taken at this time by their government. They are staying out of the house and the ministers are sitting because the members are embarrassed at the sight of the attitude taken by their government. You cannot deny this, it is a fact, you were all absent a while ago. More than that, Mr. Speaker, for a while I noted that there were hardly three Quebec Liberals present in the house, out of 58 or 59, while we were discussing one of the most important item of the current session.

• (10:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him where the members of his party are, because I can only count two in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: The hon. member asked me where are our own members. There are four, that is nearly 50 per cent, who spoke in favour of an increase in the old age pension, while none—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the whereabouts of members is closely related to the principle of Bill C-207. I again request the co-operation of the hon. member for Lapointe and ask him to adhere as closely as possible to the principle of the bill now before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I replied to the question put to me and if you find that I departed from the subject matter, it is probably because the simultaneous translation does not come out well at the other end. But I think I am directly on the subject in speaking of an increase of the old age pension because it is a social welfare measure.

We ask, Mr. Speaker, that the pension be increased to $100 for any person of 65 or over, and we believe that that is most reasonable. Would it be that a person who started to work at 18, 20 or 22 and who worked 40, 45 or 47 years of his life to build and develop Canada, is not entitled to $100 a month at the age of 65 or that it would not be fair to grant him that amount?

When people who have worked 45 or 47 years and paid taxes all their life reach 65, can Canada not give them $100 a month? Mr. Speaker, I say that a government which is unwilling to do that is far removed from the people and does not think of them but of the great financial interests it is trying to protect.

Mr. Speaker, a monthly pension of $100 is not much, as those who spoke before me have said. It is not much compared to what those citizens did for their country, working for years, enduring hardship and toil.

Take for example the farmers, who work from early in the morning till late at night all their life, during 50 years, and when they reach 65 they are treated shabbily; they who helped to build and develop the country are treated meanly and refused a bigger pension. They are given a scant $75 a month when a monthly pension of $100 would hardly be enough.

What do we give those old people? Toward the end of their lives, even if they are given $75 a month, they often have to pay debts incurred to raise their children, to buy a house, and so on. They still have to pay taxes like everyone else, and when comes the time to rest for those people who have worked for their country for so long, all they are given is a paltry $75 a month. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it is thanks to them that Canada is today a rich and developed country, rich enough to afford to give them a monthly pension of $100.

When one considers that Canada pays each year $1.2 billion in interests, dividends and profits to foreign capitalists, one wonders how it is that the government would not have enough heart to pay $100 a month to our Canadian citizens. Everything for the foreigners, never anything for our old people in Canada. That is the attitude of the present government in the matter now under consideration.

The hon. member for Chicoutimi is still purring. He said a little earlier that he was speaking for the second time, but today he is forgetting to take part in the debate which concerns, us, because I know that his electors in the riding of Chicoutimi are the first to request an increase in old age pension. I am ready to hold a debate in his riding, so as to let his electors know that the hon. member for Chicoutimi, the riding next to mine, is against our introducing legislation to increase the old age pension to $100 a month. I am prepared to let the hon. member for Chicoutimi know, in his own riding, that he voted against that last January. He is blushing and sitting deeper in his seat, but he would blush even more in a public meeting.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is the opinion of the Chair that the remarks now being made by the hon. member for Lapointe are not in order. I again ask for the co-operation of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. One can readily understand that I should sink deep into my chair, but the hon. member for Lapointe cannot do that, as he does not carry much weight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): As for what my constituents think or do not think about having or not having a $100-a-month pension, I consider that the constituents of Chicoutimi are surely as intelligent as those of other constituencies, that they realize it is better to give to those in need than to increase pensions to millionaires, to do a little demagoguery as the hon. member for Lapointe has been doing for many years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron, High Park): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe that he follow the observations of Mr. Deputy Speaker, whose place I have temporarily taken, and confine himself strictly to the principle of Bill No. C-207. Let us not have any more of this cross-fighting between Chicoutimi and Lapointe but rather let us get on with our consideration of this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order of the hon. member for Chicoutimi was not well-taken and he should have been called to order immediately, since that is the second time he injects himself into the debate without having a justified point of order. If he has one, let him say so and set it out, but I know only too well that the population—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron, High Park): Order, please. Let me point out to the hon. member that what I said applied to both him and the hon. member for Chicoutimi.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware that a member should represent in the house the interests of his constituents, that he should reflect the opinions and the wishes of his constituents. We are aware that the electors of the constituencies of Lapointe, Chicoutimi or elsewhere, are anxious not only for the increases proposed in the Canada Assistance Plan which is now under consideration, but also for the increase of the old age pensions to $100 per month.

We are not satisfied with what has been introduced today. We approve it and we accept it, we have already said so. But we are not satisfied with this. If others are satisfied with it, let them have their own narrow views, their own small increases. As far as we are concerned, we want a real increase in the old age pension for persons aged 65 and over, and without a means test. We are demanding that the pension be increased to $100 for everyone aged 65 or more.

Mr. Speaker, I shall say this: Canada is a country rich enough to afford this $100 a month pension to its citizens. When, for instance, we consider the number of plants that are laying off workers because they are over-producing, I feel that if our old people had a greater purchasing power, they could buy more of such production and these plants could maintain full production or, at least, a higher production. If our old people were getting a higher old age pension, all of them would be in a position to purchase more goods and increased purchasing would mean more work for the workers in industry, our economy would be expanded still further, our large, our innumerable resources would be further developed.

When the government refuses to increase the old age pensions, I claim the government lacks confidence, or rather the awareness of the resources it should be managing, of all the resources in Canada.

If our old people get $100 instead of $75, have we to fear that our old people will suddenly start buying too much butter, too much meat, too much milk, so that others will be deprived? If our old people start getting $100 per month tomorrow, will they be buying too many clothes, so that other people will be deprived? Who is afraid of that? There is enough for everybody. There is plenty for all. So giving $100 per month to our old people will not deprive others of anything. There is enough for all, whether it is clothes, housing, food, recreation, there is some for all.

Mr. Speaker, when we try to limit the purchasing power of our old people, then we try to keep those who worked in the past to build our country in misery, to reward them for all they did to develop this country. We do not see clearly enough the merits of those who worked or came before us; when I say "we", I mean the government. The government does not see clearly enough the merits of those who worked in the last 50 years to develop our country. If I were the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Messrs. Sharp and MacEachen), I would be ashamed to introduce legislation which is good but incomplete, which does not take into account at the present time a whole sector of our population, namely those who are 65 and over.

Mr. Speaker, $100 is not much when you consider how rapidly the cost of living is increasing now. The cost of living increases faster than the allowance given to our old people, the disabled, the crippled, the needy mothers, etc. The cost of living increases even more quickly than the allowances.

Mr. Speaker, what about family allowances? They have not been increased, except for an additional $1 given to a small category of people, since 1944. Whereas everything costs more today, no thought has been given to increasing family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, to bring up one, two or three children costs more than in 1944-45 and although the government comes before us with a social assistance program, it does not think at all about increasing family allowances, just as it does not think about increasing the old age pension.

Coming back to the system proposed in that bill, to the proposed increases, there is a disadvantage for those who are admissible. It is that the investigations last too long. Too much time and effort is spent trying to find the little thing which will enable the government to refuse a pension, to withdraw it from an individual who would be eligible for his pension. Investigations, forms, inspectors and auditors; every step is taken to withdraw the pensions that are to be given through a piece of legislation.

The act is such that officials, at least senior officials, try to cut or take away pensions whenever possible, because they show great zeal in this field. Mr. Speaker, I think that even if the increase granted today is good, it is not sufficient and the government should have implemented the promises it made during the last general election and raised old age pensions. Fine statements are all very well, but they should be folllowed by action.

I wonder why the government today is not presenting, in addition to the bill we are now studying, another act raising old age pensions to $100 for each 65-year-old citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare will consider this suggestion. I hope he will think of all the Canadians who have developed the country, who deserve from their motherland more than poverty. At their advanced age, they deserve to be given at least an adequate pension. Let the minister think about this and announce tomorrow that old age pensions are increased to $100 a month. He will then see that, all over the country, people will be happy to see that our old citizens receive what they have earned through their work, that they are given what is theirs out of the wealth of the country, that is, an adequate pension at the proper age.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, how is it that the hon. member for Lapointe speaks of pensions and federal policy when he has already announced that he would leave federal politics?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) wants to speak, he should speak louder, because I did not understand him at all on account of the distance between us.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): When I have to answer the member for Lapointe, I shall be able to do so very easily, because his arguments are rather weak.

[English]

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to make some brief remarks with reference to the legislation before us. I wish to say at the outset that I certainly do not want to be thought of as participating in some kind of filibuster.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Schreyer: It is my intention to say a few words only because the longer I sit in this house and listen to the responses of the government and the minister to questions put to them by members on this side as to why they will not increase the old age pension, the more I am convinced that they have given no adequate reason why this should not be done.

I should like to ask the minister to explain precisely why the government will not do something to alleviate the low income problem facing the elderly people of our country. There is adequate information at our fingertips which shows quite clearly that the absolute minimum level of income needed by old age pensioners today is somewhere in the order of $110 to $140 a month. The amount varies in the various studies that have been conducted. For example, I have before me a summary of information which emanated from the Canadian Conference on Aging.

It is their estimate that the absolute minimum required by an old age pensioner to allow him to live the way we want him to live is $138.96 per month. The Toronto Metro Social Planning Council has estimated that $126.47 per month is the absolute minimum necessary for old age pensioners. Other studies have also been conducted in this regard. It should be obvious to hon. members on the government side that it has been adequately proved there is need for an increase in the purchasing power of our older citizens and an increase in old age pensions.

I think this is the right time to ask the minister—I am not doing this in a taunting manner as it is not my desire to taunt hon. members opposite—in view of the data collected and the studies carried out on the level of income necessary for old age pensioners, how in the world the government can sit back and allow the pension to remain at $75 a month. This amount is about 50 to 65 per cent below the level regarded as an absolute minimum by the various study groups which have looked into the matter.

It has been argued by hon. members opposite, and particularly by the minister when presenting this legislation, that it will serve to provide additional income to those people who, upon a means-needs test analysis, prove that they are eligible for it. However, surely the minister should not be so anxious to provide this additional income by means of such a complicated and involved means-needs test system. Why enter into the thicket of red tape when it can be done with ample justification and in a much simpler way by means of a universal increase of old age pensions to $100 a month?

I am sure hon. members opposite, including the minister, may from time to time take the view that some members on this side of the house are exploiting this issue for partisan or political gain. Nevertheless I suggest to the minister that if he holds this opinion it is a very harsh one indeed. If hon. members opposite indulge in name calling and suggestions as to who is or is not hypocritical—I am now referring specifically to the charge made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) that a member of our group was being hypocritical when speaking of the need for increasing old age pensions—then I point out to the minister that we on this side can indulge in the use of precisely the same kind of language.

We have been made aware of the publicity which the government has given in recent months to the war on poverty and we consider it to be hypocritical in the light of the government's attitude to the level of old age pensions today. If the government really intends to deal with the problem of poverty immediately and with the minimum amount of red tape, it can do so forthwith in the area involving old age pensioners.

Is the government refusing to adopt the request of hon. members on this side? Is the government refusing to increase old age pensions because this country cannot afford it? Is that the answer they are giving us, or are they refusing to increase old age pensions at the present time because it might have an adverse effect on the economy resulting in inflation? Is that the government's reason for not increasing old age pensions? If this is so then I will put to the minister what I consider to be a rather more obvious answer. If, in the opinion of the minister, this country cannot afford to increase pensions to $100 a month, then the government is applying a strange set of priorities because we are spending much larger amounts of money in other sectors of the economy which have nothing to do with ordinary humanitarianism and common decency toward our old people.

If that is the reason which the minister wishes to give us, then I suggest that if our purchasing power must somehow be decreased or inhibited so as to dampen demand it is very strange that it is our older people who are chosen to bear this burden first. Let the government lower the purchasing power of those who have until now lived in the fullness of economic blessing instead of trying to take it away from those people who until now have never really had the opportunity to live abundantly. All that we ask is that they be provided with that minimum purchasing power laid down by social workers and others who have studied the matter.

It has been suggested by certain economists in the United States that that country cannot afford both guns and butter, that they cannot fight a war against poverty and build a great society at the same time as they are fighting against an enemy. This argument has been put forward rather forcefully. The answer given by the economic adviser to the president was that if a cutback in domestic spending is necessary it should be done at the expense of those who have more than adequate purchasing power at their disposal and not at the expense of the unfortunate, the school dropouts and the elderly who need better medical care, better income and better social security.

I wish to reject completely any suggestion from the other side that whoever speaks in this debate is indulging in a planned filibuster because I can look the minister squarely in the eye and tell him that I have not been approached or asked by anyone to speak on this subject.

Mr. Basford: Will the hon. member permit a question? If what he says is true, then would he and his party sit down so as to allow the minister to make a statement?

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: The minister will have lots of chance to make a statement. He wants to close the debate in order to gag us, and you know it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Douglas: We have had this hypocritical bunkum from you before.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. gentleman rose to ask a question and the permission of the hon. member for Springfield to ask a question does not entitle him to enter a debate.

Mr. Basford: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I quite understand that you were somewhat taken aback. I did ask a question which resulted in some outbursts. It has always been my observation in this house that there is no greater mournful sound than the sound of the wounded hypocrites on the other side.

Mr. Lewis: That is doggerel. It is not even poetry.

Mr. Schreyer: I heard the question which was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. My answer is quite simple. I will sit down in a matter of a few minutes. As to what other members of my party may do, that is up to them. I certainly resent any implication from the other side that when we speak in this debate we are intent on holding up the business of the house. How long has the debate on this legislation gone on? Not a very long time. If the minister is anxious to make a statement to close the debate, he will have that opportunity later tonight or tomorrow. The mere fact that the minister may have some sort of engagement or commitment for tomorrow is no reason why he should take out his impatience on us.

Mr. Lewis: How long did he take before he introduced the bill?

Mr. Schreyer: In any event, if the minister feels compelled to make a statement this evening he has already been given an indication that hon. members will agree to revert to motions so that he can make that statement. This would not be an unprecedented way to proceed.

In so far as old age pensions are concerned, I should like to make a specific reference to the effect of this legislation on the elderly people in rural areas. I know from personal experience that during the past 15 years the incomes of most Canadian farmers have been much below the hoped-for level. In fact, it has been readily admitted by successive ministers of agriculture that income in the Canadian agricultural industry has been a serious problem in that the costs of farmers have been increasing and the prices they have been receiving for their commodities have been remaining static or in some cases have even declined. This has had an effect on those farm people who have come to their retirement years recently and, because they have had low net incomes over the past decade, are facing a very bleak retirement. Until such time as the Canada Pension Plan takes full effect, which is still almost a decade away, these people have little to hope for in the way of enhanced retirement pensions. Is it really asking too much of the government or the minister to consider this specific aspect of the problem of universal old age pensions?

In my opinion it is partly the fault of the Canadian government that net farm income has been low over the past decade. Since it has been partly the fault of the government, it seems to me there is an onus upon the government to take some tangible, concrete step to alleviate the problem facing these farm folk who are coming to retirement age in the immediate future. I know the Canada Assistance Plan will be of some help in this regard. However, there will be this complicated, protracted means-needs test type of investigation. Many farm folk find this very awkward because a computation must be made of their net assets. The value of their old machinery must be computed and the value of the land and old buildings. This is really an administrative nightmare for a social worker or anyone taking applications for old age assistance in these farm areas and trying to determine whether or not these people have the means to meet their needs.

So, Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude on this note. While the Canada Assistance Plan now before us is perhaps in some ways a distinct improvement over the situation which has existed, nevertheless in one important respect it is a very real disappointment. While it may succeed in providing certain improvements in our social assistance programs, it nevertheless imposes this means-needs test—I use the two words conjointly—on the many elderly people of our country. I dare say the country could well afford, and should want to afford, just a little bit better. The cost of living index has shown a substantial increase in recent months. Yet there has been no indication from the government what they intend to do about adjusting the universal old age pension to accommodate this increase. I hope the minister will not be so intransigent in this regard that he will simply not consider the request for some legislation to be introduced within a relatively short time to give our old age pensioners a level of income which at least approaches the income levels described as absolutely necessary by such organizations as the Toronto Metro Social Planning Conference, the Canadian Conference for the Aged and so on.

As a new member of the house I am actually astounded when I watch the government stubbornly refuse to admit that the present old age pension level is simply unacceptably low in the light of the cost of living. I am astounded that the government has not been moved so far to take any tangible, direct action to deal with this matter. There is no point in my saying any more, Mr. Speaker, for the simple reason that if the government cannot be persuaded in a few words, with complete absence of taunting, complete absence of acrimony, then it is not likely they will be persuaded at all.

In the meantime we can only be sorry for these people who are over 65 years of age and who have another ten years ahead of them. In fact they will never become eligible for any kind of decent pension under the Canada Pension Plan. Their future at the moment seems bleak and without much hope unless they wish to go through a complicated, and in my opinion unnecessary, means-needs test. The minister should make amends before he is condemned by the elderly people of this country.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I am not filibustering, I want to ask a question. I appreciate very much the moderate and very proper way in which the hon. member for Springfield presented his case. Like all members of the house I have a problem about which I want to ask him a very simple question. It is this. Rather than require pensioners to show a reasonable need, does the hon. member support the principle that we should pay the extra $25 a month to hundreds of thousands of people who do not require it at all?

Mr. Monteith: There are not hundreds of thousands.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I have asked the question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member would be glad to supply the answer.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, there is no simple, arithmetical answer to that question. In the end it is a matter of judgment, of philosophical conviction as to the position one takes on the matter. As a member of the legislature of Manitoba for several years I came into close contact with a lot of elderly people, widows between the ages of 60 and 65, who were facing precisely the kind of problem that many hon. members in recent days have been talking about. I found that in almost every case they had to go through the very awkward, complicated and unnecessary procedure of filling out an O.A.A. and disability allowance form at length, stating their assets, the value of their chattels, equipment, machinery and so on, in order to qualify for a minimal subsistence type of pension.

I would say to the hon. member who posed the question that it is so much simpler, and I think it saves the taxpayer money, to grant this type of assistance on a universal basis and then to recover it by means of the ordinary income tax process to which all income-earning people in this country are subject. In the end, I hazard to say that in not too many years social welfare and assistance-type legislation in this country will evolve toward the kind of guaranteed annual income which will be based in turn on a sort of income tax process. Those people who are in receipt of a guaranteed annual income but who have no real need of it because of their own earned income will simply have this money turned back to society for them, and I see nothing terrible about that.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the many speeches from across the floor tonight and I noted that one speaker referred to farm families.

Mr. Monteith: Filibuster.

Mr. Hopkins: I was born and raised on a farm and I am proud of it. I have heard that people on farms are somewhat ashamed of the position in which they are today. My mother and father still live on a 100-acre farm in Ontario and they are aged 65 and 67. They are proud to live there and I am proud to say that they are living there; and they are not one bit ashamed of their occupation. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am also amazed to hear the remarks which have been made—

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hopkins: —particularly by the members of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Springfield is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege is this. The hon. member for Renfrew North is leaving the distinct inference that other members on this side are somehow ashamed of their farming connections. If that is the inference he intends to leave, I certainly do have a point of privilege. I repudiate that inference completely.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to that, I cannot blame the hon. member for Springfield if he has a guilty conscience. I did not name him in particular.

Mr. Peters: I will name you tomorrow.

Mr. Hopkins: But I think the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) did mention the farming population.

Mr. Peters: And your 100-acre farms.

Mr. Monteith: Filibuster.

Mr. Hopkins: We have heard the cry of filibuster from across the floor. I hesitate to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I feel I must. This must be another guilt complex.

I do not usually rise in this manner and I do not want to create a disturbance in this debate. All I want to say is that it does surprise me greatly that there should be so much competition from across the floor on a bill from the government side of the house which deals with increased pensions for the blind and the crippled who are in need, as provided for by the Canada Assistance Plan which is before this house at the present time.

Mr. Starr: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Hopkins: It also provides for widows who are in need as well as others who have inadequate incomes. I should simply like to say that the Liberal party of Canada has always been the champion of these people and as long as we are here we will continue to be the champion of these people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

• (11:00 p.m.)

Mr. McNulty: May I have unanimous consent to revert to routine proceedings for the purpose of presenting a report of a standing committee?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to reverting to routine proceedings?

Mr. Starr: Before we agree I think it would be advisable that an explanation be given as to what is involved.

Canada Assistance Plan

Mr. McNulty: I wish to present the fourth report of the standing committee on national defence.

Mr. Starr: I think it could be done tomorrow or Monday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

It being three minutes past eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 30, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1966-67

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates B for the financial year ending March 31, 1967, was presented by Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue), read by Mr. Speaker to the house and referred to the committee of supply.

• (2:40 p.m.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the standing committee on national defence, in English and in French.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As vice chairman and on behalf of all the opposition members of this committee I wish to inform the house that we formally dissociate ourselves with the report and the necessity for making it at this time.

[Note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SITE OF SECOND PLANT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on June 14 last I informed the house that Canadian General Electric Company Limited had been granted an extension to June 30 for selection of the site for the heavy water plant to be constructed by that company.

I am now informed by CGE that the site selected is on the Cape Breton side of the strait of Canso in the province of Nova Scotia. An overriding factor in favour of this site was the deuterium content in the water that will be used in the manufacturing process.

A power plant, fuelled with oil with provision for backing up with coal, will be built by the Nova Scotia power commission to supply steam and electric power for the heavy water plant. It is hoped that in time these plants will be part of a larger industrial complex in Cape Breton in line with this government's concern to find new industries for the Atlantic provinces, industries based on modern technology and modern forms of energy.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has been closely associated with the Minister of Finance and myself in this matter, rejoices in this announcement. I am sure the members representing the province of Nova Scotia in this house, the premier and the government of Nova Scotia will also share fully in these sentiments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

In view of the announcement he has just made concerning the establishment of a heavy water plant on Cape Breton, would the minister tell us if there is hope for the establishment of such a plant on the Gaspé peninsula, as was recently stated, for the benefit of the people of Gaspé?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): The Gaspé peninsula and particularly the city of Gaspé was among the few contestants in the race. One of the reasons why an extension was granted to CGE for a decision was to allow the company to make a complete survey of all the proposals made.

Mr. Grégoire: May I be permitted a supplementary question? Can the minister tell us whether the citizens of the Gaspé peninsula can hope for the establishment of such a plant at some future date, or within a short while?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—TABLING OF ENGINEERING STUDY

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, by leave I wish to table the report on the engineering study, Alaska highway—Canadian section—prepared by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DIVORCE

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park) moved that the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce, presented to the house on Tuesday, June 28, be concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Since the report is asking that the committee sit at the same time as the house and since we do not believe that members can be in two places at the same time, that is in the committee and in the House of Commons, we do not concur in that report and ask that it be passed on division.

[English]

Motion agreed to on division.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we leave the order of motions, is it not the intention of the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare to make a statement on the government's intention with respect to old age security?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand we are debating the Canada Assistance Plan, and that will be a good occasion for the minister to make a statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question might have been asked on the orders of the day.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT REQUIRING DISCLOSURE OF DRUG INGREDIENTS

Mr. Milton L. Klein (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-217, to amend the Criminal Code (publication of ingredients of wonder drugs).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to prevent a recurrence of such incidents as the public announcement in the press claiming curative action of an anti-cancer hormone, coupled with the refusal to divulge the ingredients thereof. Such premature announcement has caused great mental anguish, not only to those afflicted with the disease but also to members of their families. This bill would make it a criminal offence for anyone to make public pronouncements or to call press conferences claiming cures for dread diseases without first divulging all the ingredients of the formula to the National Research Council, where proper and adequate tests can be made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE OLD AGE PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister say whether the report in the press is correct—although this matter has not yet been brought before parliament—that the government intends to provide the necessary legislation so that $30 monthly will be available to pensioners whose family income is less than $1,260 a year? Does the government have this in mind? What is the nature of the plan it is going to place before the house? We would like to know whether the government has finally decided to capitulate in part to the demands of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the question is of course out of order. I assume that the second part is acceptable. I have some doubts about the third part.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I am trying to do is seek information. In order to simplify it, I ask the Prime Minister this. Is what is reported in the press correct, or is the press to have available information that is denied the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question in this form is not acceptable. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition knows better than I do that hon. members cannot ask whether reports in the press are exact or inexact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will reduce it to simplicity itself, even to a paraphrase. Does the government intend to bring in legislation to this effect, as reported in the press today?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): My answer will be simplicity itself. The government's intention will be announced in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All this evasion and postponement of legislation for the old people.

Mr. Knowles: The government will be out in due course.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOMBING OF NORTH VIET NAM CITIES—STATEMENT BY U.K. PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In view of the statement made by Prime Minister Wilson dissociating himself from the action of the United States in bombing the Hanoi-Haiphong areas, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has been in touch with Prime Minister Wilson, and whether he would be willing to associate himself with the stand taken by the British government.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is referring to all the matters that were dealt with in the British Prime Minister's statement. I understand from his question that he is only referring to that part of the statement which dealt with the British Prime Minister's "dissociation from the extension of the bombing, and that he is asking whether the government wishes to join in that dissociation".

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that we have never been associated with the bombing of North Viet Nam, therefore the question of dissociation does not arise, only regret at its extension.

Mr. Douglas: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; in view of the dangers inherent in the escalation of the war, are the Commonwealth prime ministers in consultation with a view to continuing the steps which they agreed to take at the last Commonwealth prime ministers' conference in an attempt to stop this escalation and secure some basis for negotiation?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I well remember, as does my hon. friend, that at the last Commonwealth prime ministers' conference an effort was made to help bring the conflict to an end by sending a Commonwealth mission of prime ministers to Viet Nam, a mission which was not agreeable to the government of North Viet Nam which refused to receive it.

In connection with the present situation, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already been in touch with the United Kingdom High Commissioner, and naturally he will be consulting on this matter with other Commonwealth governments.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether it is correct that during the visit of Mr. Bundy in Ottawa the Prime Minister made clear the view of the Canadian government that any change in the scale or pattern of hostilities could have serious implication for the efforts in which we are engaged to establish common ground on which an approach to a peaceful solution of the Viet Nam conflict could be built. Am I correct that this was made clear to Mr. Bundy?

Mr. Pearson: I think I made our position clear in that matter yesterday in general terms. I cannot confirm the precise words that have been quoted by my hon. friend as reflecting the talk I had with Mr. Bundy.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the general fears that are felt not only by Canadians but by people throughout the world respecting events that have recently taken place in connection with the additional areas that are now being bombed by the United States forces, will the Prime Minister consider early next week—or indeed whenever the opening day may be following the week end adjournment—setting aside a couple of hours for this house to discuss this matter? This is a question that brings to all of us a sense of trepidation. An opportunity to discuss this matter will allow the views of Canadians as a whole to be expressed by their representatives in parliament.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to consider the matter, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION DAY

REPORTED INTENTION OF CERTAIN STORES TO REMAIN OPEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the government who would deal with this matter. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to the fact that several food and other chain stores in Ottawa and elsewhere intend to remain open for business on Friday, July 1, Canada's national day and a statutory holiday fixed by this house, and remain closed on Monday, July 4? If this is so, has the government taken into consideration any action it may take to prevent this rather regrettable and reprehensible practice continuing into 1967, when we celebrate our centenary?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have seen references to this matter in the press. I shall be glad to look into it to see if there is anything within the federal government's jurisdiction which would cover this proposed action.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask a supplementary question. I am wondering whether the Prime Minister is opposed to this practice.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Would it not be appropriate for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, to make a declaration in this connection so that Canadians would realize that on this national holiday, Dominion day, there should be regard given in Canada to those things that are of our history and our very existence?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, not only should there be an appropriate regard by all Canadians for their national holiday, but I am sure there is on the part of the great majority of Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FAILURE OF DEPARTMENTS TO FOLLOW RECOMMENDATIONS OF AUDITOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement in the latest report of the public accounts committee, which has received considerable publicity in the newspapers in the last few hours and with which I am sure the Prime Minister is familiar, to the effect that during the past two years many of the recommendations of the Auditor General for preventing waste of public funds have been ignored by many government departments, does the Prime Minister intend to instruct the ministers concerned that they must pay attention to these recommendations without delay?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me this is a question of a very general nature, and I do not think it can be asked in this way at this time.

[Translation]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council.

Could the President of the Privy Council tell the house if, at his meeting last Sunday with the premier of Quebec, a new formula to repatriate the Canadian constitution, and also the national medicare program, were discussed?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as reported, it was a first contact on the ministerial level and no attempt was made to solve the problems which might exist between the two levels of government. We made a broad survey of the situation, exchanged information and stated our positions without discussing them on all matters now pending with regard to relations between the two governments.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the President of the Privy Council tell the house if meetings will be held shortly to discuss the two matters mentioned in my question?

Mr. Favreau: That question is not hypothetical, because there should be meetings between the two governments, but I think that the purposes of those meetings, whatever they are, will be announced in due course.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government any report to make to the house on the position in the Argentine? Is the new government there considered to be in full control of the country, and what is the position of the government of Canada with respect to the recognition of the new regime?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been taken about the recognition of the new regime in the Argentine. The latest information we have is that the country seems to be under the control of the present administration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF MEDIATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Yesterday during his introduction of a bill he referred to the fact that a report by Judge Lippe had been filed with him. I would ask the minister whether he would consider tabling that report, in view of the fact that he quoted it and stated that it was the basis for the action of the government in introducing the bill.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I will be glad to consider the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

VANCOUVER—DEPORTATION OF JAPANESE GIRL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of immigration. Some time ago I raised the question of Miss Endo and a deportation order which had been issued against her in Vancouver. I was wondering whether the minister had any additional information, which was promised earlier. Has the minister anything to add?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not get the name. Is this the Japanese girl in Vancouver?

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: The Japanese girl in question has filed an appeal which is now being considered. I am just waiting for the judgment of the appeal board before making any comments.

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question. Is the minister prepared to say that the immigration officials had another option which they could have exercised rather than issuing a deportation order?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is argumentative.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALBERTA—HOSPITAL UNABLE TO FUNCTION BECAUSE OF STAFF SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the urgent matter of an emergency crash program to recruit medical manpower in Canada, and is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister been informed that a fully equipped hospital in northern Alberta cannot function and carry on because there is no doctor?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is not acceptable. He is asking whether the minister has been informed of something. I suggest that the question as asked is not acceptable.

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that there is now a very urgent situation in the town of Manning in northern Alberta, as well as in other parts of the north, where the equipped hospital and the population of several thousand people are without the services of a doctor, will the minister not give consideration to the suggestion very forcefully, frequently and eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi with regard to establishing an urgent medical training program?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RIVERS, MAN.—REPORTED INTENTION TO CLOSE TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Minister of National Defence. Has he received any telegrams or telephone calls from the Rivers area expressing concern about the rumoured closing or disbandment of the Canadian joint air training centre at Rivers?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt whether this is a matter of national urgency, and I wonder whether the hon. member is satisfied that it is. If he feels that the question is urgent then I would invite the minister to answer it.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such communications to my knowledge. I will be willing to check with my office and advise my hon. friend.

Mr. Mandziuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister denying categorically that there is any truth in these rumours, and is he saying that the government does not plan to close the base?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no hesitation in ruling out the second question.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RECOMMENDATIONS BY AUTHORITY AS TO TOLL INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. An article in the New York Times of June 23 reports that the governors of a mid-west group of states are asking that St. Lawrence cargo tolls be eliminated. I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet received representations from the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for an increase in toll rates on the seaway.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The answer, sir, is no.

CHURCHILL, MAN.—REQUEST FOR EARLY OPENING OF PORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Previously he indicated that he would be glad to look into the possibility of an earlier opening of the port of Churchill in order to facilitate the movement of grain. Since ice has left the Churchill river a little earlier this year than last year and recent aerial surveys indicate that navigation is in progress, has the minister anything to report at the moment on this situation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did convey to the harbours board the suggestion that this matter should be looked into. I have not received a report from the board, but I will ask for one and communicate it to the hon. member.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether his department has been in contact with marine underwriters to see whether they also might be favourably disposed toward an earlier opening?

Mr. Pickersgill: I could not say without inquiring, sir.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INCOMPLETE ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works, as leader of the house—he might take note of it.

In answer to question No. 1,595 on the order paper of June 29, I notice that 11 parts of the question were answered instead of 12. The twelfth one, which was not answered, reads as follows:

> Who gave the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the list of names of the five commissioners for the constituency of Sherbrooke?

Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if I can expect an answer to that question?

An hon. Member: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) answered that question.

Mr. Allard: In the absence of the leader of the house, may I direct my question to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member rise on a point of order? I assume he might have an objection concerning a point of order and I take for granted that the responsible minister will agree to take note of the representations the hon. member has just made.

SHIPPING

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING MANNING OF SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Following the question I put yesterday, is the minister ready to table the correspondence between himself and the president of the S.I.U. in connection with manning of ships on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to table the correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents requested by the hon. member for St. Ann?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REFUNDS TO EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the deep concern of scores of employers across this country about the extra contributions they must make to the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec pension plan for seasonal employees, can the minister now state whether any machinery of government has been found by means of which it is possible that these people will be able to get their extra contributions returned?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me this question was asked of the minister previously on a number of occasions. I have some doubt whether it can be answered at this time. I might suggest that the hon. member put it on the order paper.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to your ruling it is possible that recently the minister may have found some means to bring this about, which he would like to tell the house.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet found a way of performing miracles.

PUBLIC SERVICE

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO RECLASSIFICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): My question is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. I gave him notice that I would ask it, and it is raised because of a request by several national defence employee associations across Canada. The question is raised because of a lack of information about the red circling of positions in the new declassifications with respect to the Department of National Defence. I would ask the minister how soon we can expect information on this subject.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the reclassification of civil servants is within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I should be very pleased to inquire with respect to the information requested by the hon. member.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS—PROPOSED WORK TO RULE OVER HOLIDAY WEEK END

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. It appears that inspectors at border points have stated that they will work to rule this holiday week end. This will cause great congestion at the border crossing points. Has the minister any recommendations about this matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, at noon today I announced increases for 48,000 civil servants in group B, which will mean that approximately 1,400 customs officers who were formerly red circled will no longer be red circled. I understand the situation at Windsor and Sarnia to be that the officials in question are meeting tonight. I believe the result of these meetings will be that there will be no slow down.

I can point out to hon. members also that the members of the staff side conference representing the civil service associations are completely in agreement with the increases which have been announced for 48,000 group B employees.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the house whether removal from red circling will apply to customs and excise officers specifically at the port of Windsor?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, a good many customs and excise officers at the port of Windsor will no longer be red circled as a result of the adjustments in the group B rates. In addition, the Civil Service Commission and my particular department have agreed to consult with the employee organizations involved with respect to the red circling toward the end of this year, when there will have been sufficient opportunity for the Civil Service Commission to continue with its reclassifications and also for the departments involved to consider the movement of employees out of the red circled positions.

FORESTRY

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OF DUTCH ELM DISEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. I have given him notice of the question. Can anything be done to save our elm trees from the ravages of the Dutch elm disease?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this question, although obviously and apparently urgent, might be placed on the order paper. The question does not deal with a sudden emergency, and I think the hon. member would want to put it on the order paper.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INVESTIGATION INTO GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General and ask him when he expects to be able to table the report on working conditions as a result of the inquiry being conducted by Judge Montpetit.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): For a while, Mr. Speaker, I thought I might be able to have that report tabled by the end of June. As there have been more presentations put before the judge, that report might be delayed until later this year.

NATURAL GAS

U.S. HEARING ON TRANSMISSION BETWEEN CANADIAN POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): My question is directed to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and the urgency of this question, Mr. Speaker, is based on the fact that in the matter of the application by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to export and import natural gas for transmission from western to eastern Canada through the northern United States, the National Energy Board has already completed public hearings. It is quite possible that the board will render its decision before this house meets again in the fall.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to kindly put his question.

Mr. Andras: My question is this, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of the existence of a brief presented by an intervener to the same application before the federal power commission in the United States, which brief contains a computorized study purporting to prove that the ultimate delivered cost of natural gas to southern Ontario will be lower if the existing northern Ontario route is adapted and looped, than by transmission through the proposed new United States route—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a proper question.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, as Le Devoir published this morning an item to the effect that the Minister of Forestry said he believes the defeat of the Lesage government can be attributed to the fact that he did not show himself to be concerned with real human problems, I should like to ask the hon. minister whether that is the opinion he expressed, and whether he does not also believe that the refusal of the government to agree to the $25 monthly increase of old age pensions we are asking for, which meets a real human need reveals the same unconcern.

Mr. Speaker: The question is out of order.

AIRPORTS

ST. JOHNS, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Beaulieu (Saint-Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

[English]

Is the Minister of Transport ready to give me an answer about the airport in St. Johns, Quebec? We have been asking about this for six months now. The city council has come here, and we have all come here to ask him. He has said that he is studying it very carefully. I should like to get a definite answer, because this should be done before Expo and not after.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is asking a question which has to be answered before Expo '67, I think he might put it on the order paper.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

Inasmuch as this is the last day of the month, I wonder when we can expect to have tabled the government white paper on broadcasting.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the house. I am afraid in this case, as in others where women are involved, I am a little late. Referring to the question, I would not anticipate that it would be later than next week. I am afraid it is not expected that I shall be able to table the white paper today.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State assure us that we shall have this white paper before the house adjourns for the summer?

Miss LaMarsh: Without question, Mr. Speaker, although the date of adjournment is pretty questionable.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED DEFIANCE OF BOARD BY PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): May I, while I am on my feet, reply to a question put yesterday by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition as to the accuracy or otherwise of certain views expressed on the program "Viewpoint" on national television with regard to the C.B.C. board of directors.

I have made inquiries of the president of the C.B.C., who is also chairman of the board, and am informed by him that the views to which the right hon. gentleman referred are not correct. The board of directors of the corporation have at no time issued instructions to the president in regard to Mr. Walker.

The hon. member for Timiskaming asked me a supplementary question in regard to C.B.C. news coverage of the same subject. I am informed that C.B.C. television news carried an item referring to a speculative report in the Toronto Star on its 6.45 p.m. edition June 28. The fact that the same item was not carried on the 11 p.m. newscast is attributable solely to normal news value considerations. No influence whatsoever was exerted to ensure that the item was not repeated.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I want to thank the hon. lady for giving an answer so promptly. I would ask her whether the C.B.C. board of governors at its last meeting came to the conclusion that Mr. Walker, who was vice president and general manager of the English network, should be removed.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that. I do not normally receive copies of the minutes of C.B.C. meetings. Only such items as require governmental or parliamentary action are normally conveyed to me through the normal channels. Those matters go first to the president, who is also chairman of the board.

I have the president's assurance that no directions were given to him about the forcible or otherwise retirement of Mr. Walker. I am certain that if the board itself has expressed some things which it feels the government needs to act on, I shall be notified of this by a report, perhaps from the secretary of the board, at the conclusion of the meeting.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): As a supplementary question, inasmuch as I believe today is the last day of the meeting of the board of directors before the fall and no assurance has yet been given to the "Seven Days" production people in Toronto that the show will continue next year, can the minister assure the house that this important program will be continued as in the past two years?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER TO HEALTH INSURANCE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he wrote a letter on June 20 to the executive director of the Canadian Health Insurance Association having to do with the government's position regarding medicare, and, if so, will the minister table that letter at the earliest possible opportunity and in any event before the resolution on medicare comes up for discussion in the house?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think I did send a letter recently to the president or chief officer of the health insurance association, and I shall be glad to table it at the earliest possible moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION FOR DESECRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Would the minister indicate whether there is any law in existence which provides for the prosecution of those who desecrate or destroy the Canadian national flag and other national symbols? I think this question is extremely urgent, since many were destroyed last year in the province of Quebec during our national celebrations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot ask for legal interpretation of or advice about a statute.

Mr. Allmand: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be important if the Minister of Justice would let us know before the national holiday if any law prohibits such action.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member still cannot ask that question. He cannot ask a minister if there is a law or if there is not a law. This is not a proper question at this period of our proceedings.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INCORRECT TIME SHOWN BY CLOCKS IN CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I intended to address to the Minister of Public Works, but since he is not present at the moment I shall address it to his parliamentary secretary or to whatever minister is in charge of time. Is there any sinister significance in the fact that both the clocks in the house—

Some hon. Members: All three.

Mr. Brewin: —in fact all three, are approximately half an hour slow?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman can rest fully assured that there is no sinister significance in this alleged fact.

Mr. Knowles: The government is behind the times.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—PROTESTS RESPECTING LOW FARM INCOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he received from the C.F.U. Federation of the Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière diocese representations deploring the low income of the farmers of this area from manufactured milk? Does the minister intend to make further proposals to the farmers so as to enable them to get a fair price for their manufactured milk?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I have received no such communication.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Minister of Agriculture intend to inquire as to the reason why farmers are not getting $4 per hundredweight of milk as promised in a statement he made earlier?

[English]

Mr. Greene: As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, our responsibility as announced under the dairy support program, namely, that there would be a national weighted average of $4 f.o.b. the factory, is being fulfilled, and I am keeping constant supervision over the program to assure that the federal responsibility in this area is fulfilled.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene).

On June 14 and 17 last, the apple growers of St. Pie, St. Paul, St. Hilaire, Rougemont and St. Jean Baptiste suffered losses of one and a quarter million because of hailstorms. Would the minister tell the house whether representations have been made to his department for grants to offset damages incurred by those apple growers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I do not remember, Mr. Speaker, but I shall take the question as notice.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF REPLICA OF "GRANDE HERMINE" FOR EXPO '67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Because of the fact that the people of Gaspé are experiencing the loss of a possible heavy water plant, can the Prime Minister assure me that he will make sufficient space available in his office to receive a petition with 50,000 names on it requesting that the final destination of the Grande Hermine be Gaspé?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the people of the constituency of Algoma East are experiencing the same sense of deprivation and loss, and I shall do what I can to help the people of both constituencies in view of the decision that has been made.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the legislation now before the house contains the long awaited Canada Assistance Plan. For over a year the people of Canada, particularly the old age pensioners, have been told with a great fanfare of trumpets and clanging of cymbals that the arrival of the Canada Assistance Plan would solve all their problems. Now we have the plan before us and I must say it is a pathetic response to a great social need. One would almost be justified in using the old and hackneyed phrase that the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse.

Not only are the old age pensioners and the public generally disappointed in this legislation but there is a growing indication that many backbenchers on the government side of the house are equally disappointed. Last night it was an interesting spectacle to watch some of the ministers flitting like butterflies from member to member on the government side, trying to persuade them to refrain from taking part in the debate and assuring them that if they would just wait until the minister spoke their worst fears would be assuaged.

The government has even become so desperate that it has now started a rumour that the minister is going to make some pronouncement that will relieve the concern of the old age pensioners. If the government feels that concurrently with the old age assistance plan there ought to be legislation to increase the old age security pension, the minister had ample opportunity to announce that when he brought in this legislation.

Further, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had ample opportunity yesterday when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) specifically asked him if the government would bring down legislation to raise the pension to $100 a month before there was a summer adjournment, but the Prime Minister brushed that aside. Today the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has had ample opportunity, either on motions or during the question period, to announce a policy that would give some hope to our older citizens that the government has not quite forgotten them.

If the minister is prepared to indicate that before we recess for the summer he will bring down concurrent legislation providing $100 a month to old age security pensioners at age 65, he has only to nod his head and I am quite prepared to sit down and give him the floor. But I am not prepared to fall for the old ruse of allowing the minister to close the debate and prevent members on this side of the house from expressing their opinions, on the supposition that he is going to do something, when all the record of the past indicates that the government is not likely to do very much.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In the first place, I wish to say that the Canada Assistance Plan is good administrative legislation. It will do many things which social welfare workers have been advocating over the years. First of all, it will remove many of the restrictive categories and will enable welfare workers to deal with individuals as people rather than as statistics in a given category. In this way it will provide a flexibility for welfare workers which they have not enjoyed in the past. Certainly in the matter of administering welfare programs this is a forward step.

This plan substitutes a needs test in place of a means test. This also has some advantages. One advantage is that where a provincial government is generous and where the welfare worker is trained it will enable those administering the welfare programs to supply whatever funds are necessary to meet the special need of a particular case. That is something welfare workers have been asking for a long time. It is very difficult when bureaucrats lay down circumscribed conditions and maximum figures of allowable income or the amount of the grant which can be given to deal with special cases. A person may have diabetes and need insulin or a special diet. He may require a hearing aid. There is a whole host of things such as home care and special training that cannot be foreseen in the preparation of regulations which are necessary to give the welfare worker sufficient elbow room so that he or she can deal with special cases of need.

It should be pointed out at the same time that the needs test also has some distinct disadvantages. Where the provincial government is niggardly and where the welfare administrator is stingy the recipient can be worse off than he or she was before. The difficulty about a needs test is that it is a matter of subjective judgment. The concept of need is in the mind of the administrator. Consequently it is going to be difficult to exercise any uniformity of standards. Undoubtedly there will be different concepts of need as one goes from community to community and particularly as one goes from province to province. This causes me some concern, because unfortunately there has always been a disparity between the welfare benefits paid in the "have" provinces and those paid in the "have not" provinces.

One of the ideas inherent in an old age security pension as of right is that all Canadian citizens are entitled to the same amount of payment in their old age irrespective of where they live in Canada. I am concerned lest in relying upon a needs test without any standard of uniformity the "have" provinces can be fairly generous but the "have not" provinces, irrespective of how generous they may want to be, since they must match any payment they get from the federal government, may be required because of financial stringency to be much less generous than some of the more wealthy provinces. I cannot imagine anything which will contribute more to national disunity than to have a wide and growing disparity between the treatment of old people, widows, the crippled, the blind and the disabled, from province to province with less generous treatment in the poorer provinces than in the richer.

[Mr. Douglas.]

In my view the basic weakness in the Canada Assistance Plan is that it is wedded to the old concept of welfare. Assistance is still going to be granted on the basis of requiring each individual to pass a test. It is true it is to be a needs test rather than a means test, but it is still a test. It is an affront to human dignity to ask people because they are in bad financial circumstances to degrade and humiliate themselves by submitting to a test. What the government really is saying in this legislation is: We are going to help the needy people of Canada provided they are on their knees. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is little value in feeding the bodies of men and women if we are going to leave them with a sense of humiliation.

Last Sunday afternoon while I was attending a picnic in the city of Hamilton a long-time resident of that community walking with a cane hobbled up to me and said, "I want you to tell Mr. Pearson that I would rather starve than pass a test." I think he represents the view of hundreds of thousands of proud-spirited people in this country who are not going to submit themselves to a test and who feel, as a result of having toiled all their lives in helping to build Canada and bring it to what it is today, that they are entitled to the amenities of life without having to undergo an individual test.

The whole concept of welfare is changing throughout the world. In the United Kingdom at the present time legislation has been introduced to provide for a guaranteed annual income. In the United States a number of congressional and state committees are studying the same proposition, only they call it a negative income tax. Whatever terminology one may use, I am convinced we shall see public opinion in the years ahead force whatever government is in office to abolish the means test and the needs test and guarantee people in necessitous circumstances an income which can be determined by means of the income tax so that the individual will be assured that if whatever pension and income he has are not sufficient to meet a given minimum the government will make up the difference.

We in the New Democratic Party feel that if the government were to establish $100 per month pensions at age 65 and set up a guaranteed annual income measure providing, let us say, $1,500 per year for single people and $3,000 per year for a married couple, people who had nothing but their pensions would still be entitled to some additional assistance under the guaranteed annual income measure. Those who have some private income in addition to their pensions, and this would be indicated when they filed their income tax returns, would not be entitled to any additional payment.

This would not rule out the need for the Canada Assistance Plan. There will still be cases of special need and there will still be instances where welfare departments will have to step in because of special circumstances and give additional aid over and above any assistance that may be provided as a result of old age security pensions and guaranteed annual incomes.

The tragic thing about this legislation is that it really does nothing for the elderly citizens of Canada. The groups who are affected, recipients of mothers' allowances, the blind and disabled, need all the help they can get and that is why I should like to see the adoption of a guaranteed annual income measure. These people need more help than can be provided now and, in some provinces, more than the provinces can afford to pay. There is nothing in this legislation which will help the people who are trying to survive on $75 per month.

I consider this legislation the cruelest hoax that has ever been perpetrated on senior citizens of this country because their expectations were built up by the government and by the Liberal party. I could bring in stacks of Liberal campaign literature which informed the old people of the great assistance they were going to get when the Canada Assistance Plan was adopted. For over a year every time we raised the question of increasing old age pensions we were told to wait until the Canada Assistance Plan was brought before the house. There is nothing in this legislation that will guarantee any assistance to the old age security pensioner. This measure does provide that if the provincial governments want to give additional money the federal government will pay part of the cost, but there is no guarantee that provincial governments will want to pay more and there are many provinces which may not be able to pay more.

What were the old people told about this Canada Assistance Plan? I have here the Toronto Star of October 16, 1965 which has a three-column, one-inch type heading reading "Pearson Pledges $100 A Month For Needy Old People". The article then states:

> The government plans to pay pensions of more than $100 a month to old people with no other income, Prime Minister Pearson said last night.

The article goes on to state:

> The Liberals proposed to concentrate higher pensions on people who need more than $75 a month and have no other income.

The article then quotes the Prime Minister as stating:

> Anybody who has only $75 from the state, and no other source of income, and needs more, even if it's $125—more than $100—should be in a position to get it.
> It's so simple to say, "all right, you gave them $75, we'll give them $100". But I'm not going to engage in any auction of the people's money for that kind of thing.
> Mr. Pearson did not estimate how much the proposed "Canada assistance program" would cost.
> He said only that his government is prepared to pay "a large share" of the extra pensions—leaving the rest of the bill to the provinces.

The Ottawa Journal of the same date carried an article under the heading "Pledges Pension Boost" and the subheading "Pearson Promises $100 Or More For Needy Aged". Every other newspaper in the country carried similar stories. Many of the old age pensioners took the government's promise seriously, that if they had no other pension than $75 a month they would be entitled to $125 a month. That is the kind of propaganda that was spread, but there is nothing in this bill which will guarantee them a five cent piece more than the $75 a month they are getting right now.

I accuse the government of a cruel deception upon the old people of this country. I accuse the government of playing politics with the hopes and expectations which they aroused in the senior citizens of this country. Having built up great expectations by advance publicity the government is now trying to hurry this legislation through the house by introducing it late, hoping thereby that they can get it passed before the public becomes aware of the fact that the old people of this country have been betrayed and deceived. With respect to old age security pensioners this plan is a deliberate attempt to foist off on the provinces a responsibility which belongs to the government of Canada.

In 1951 the government of Canada asked for a constitutional amendment to give it exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of providing old age security pensions and it got that authority. What is more, it got the tax revenue to provide these pensions through a 4 per cent surcharge on personal income tax, 3 per cent on sales tax and 3 per cent on corporation tax. That money has gone into the old age security fund and it is quite a fund today. It has a surplus now in the neighbourhood of $250 million and it is going up at the rate of $20 million a month. It is estimated that by March 31 next the fund will have a surplus of $455 million.

The government can well afford to make some additional payment to the old age pensioners. It may be that it is delaying this in order to use it as an election gimmick during the next campaign. I do not know if that is the intention, but if so it is a terrible way to treat the old people of this country. Instead of exercising the jursidiction which the government asked for and instead of spending the money it has taxed for this purpose, what is the government doing? It is now saying that $75 per month is all it is going to pay old age security pensioners.

The old age security pensioners need more. The Prime Minister said in a television interview during the last election campaign that they might need up to $125 a month. The government now says that if they need more let the provinces put it up and the government will pay half. There is no reason why the provinces should pay any part of this increase because these people are the exclusive responsibility of the government of Canada. The provinces have plenty of other responsibilities. They have all the rest of the welfare field lying at their doorstep and have inadequate financial resources, particularly in the have-not provinces.

This government has no excuse whatsoever for trying to shift part of its responsibility for looking after old age security pensioners on to the shoulders of provincial governments. There can be no doubt that the federal government can afford to increase these pensions to $100 per month, particularly in view of the surpluses that are building up in the old age security fund.

I hope the minister will not follow the line that has been followed by the Prime Minister on some occasions, namely, of pointing out that inflationary pressures would build up if we increased the old age pension. The old age pensioners are in a very anomalous position. When we are in a deflationary phase in the business cycle we do not give them an increase because we cannot afford it. When we are in an inflationary phase in the business cycle we cannot give them an increase because it will cause inflationary pressure. So the old age pensioners cannot win. If the government is convinced—I am not—that there is too much money chasing too few goods and that somebody's purchasing power must be curtailed, the last people who ought to have their purchasing power curtailed are the elderly citizens of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: These are the people who need every dollar they can get just in order to live. Like all members of parliament I get letters from people all across this country. Here is one that came to me from the city of Toronto from a woman of 74 years of age who has been a widow for 10 years, is a diabetic and is partly crippled as a result. There is one phrase in this letter that has stayed with me ever since I read it. I could not get it out of my mind. She says:

> I do hope and pray we will get a raise this month as I know I get hungry at times and I guess we all do. We will hope and pray for a brighter future.

When I think of a woman 74 years of age having to say "I get hungry at times" in a country that has the second highest standard of living in the world, a country that is in a state of affluence, a country whose gross national product has been increasing steadily throughout the years, it is certainly a reflection upon the adequacy of our social security program.

The argument which is being put up by members opposite, not by their speeches because they have been very careful not to make speeches but by their interjections, was expressed very well yesterday by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron) as reported at page 7076 of Hansard when he interrupted and asked a question. He said:

> Like all members of the house I have a problem about which I want to ask him a very simple question. It is this. Rather than require pensioners to show a reasonable need, does the hon. member support the principle that we should pay the extra $25 a month to hundreds of thousands of people who do not require it at all?

Another member across the way interrupted yesterday to say, "Do you think that we should pay a pension to a person with an income of $10,000 a year?" Mr. Speaker, in the first place we thought this type of argument had ended long ago when parliament decided to set up an old age security pension without a means test and to pay it as a matter of right.

What about the question of paying this pension to people who do not really need it? First of all, how many are there? I think the figures show that of the people 70 years of age or over in this country the number with an income of $10,000 or over is 1.1 per cent.

We have to ask ourselves: Is it better to make 99 per cent of the people go through the humiliation of a test lest we pay too much to the 1 per cent? I would also remind the house that even the 1 per cent who may not need the pension have through the years paid their income tax surcharge and the 3 per cent sales tax into the old age security fund and are entitled to the pension. They have paid for it; it is not charity.

Mr. Starr: And they will be paying on this, too.

Mr. Douglas: Furthermore, if their income is high enough the $100 a month that we are proposing would put them into an income bracket which would mean that a good part of the pension would be taken back in tax. We in the New Democratic Party take the position that it is better to recover by means of income tax from the few who have too much rather than humiliate the many who have too little. We had hoped that the type of argument advanced by the hon. member for High Park and others, namely, that we cannot give everybody an increase in the pension because somebody who does not need it may receive it, had disappeared long ago.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, we want a guaranteed annual income on a negative income tax basis. We want to see the end of tests. What the government is proposing here is that the old age pensioners will get $75 a month as of right. But anything more they get they will get by virtue of passing a test and on the basis of the generosity of the provincial government, and then the federal government will come in and pay part of the cost. I say that the government's failure to announce concurrent legislation, along with the Canada Assistance Plan, to raise the old age security pension is a betrayal of the people's hopes. We are not opposed to the Canada Assistance Plan. We do not object to what is in it. We are profoundly disappointed about what is not in it and the provision it does not make for the people who were led to believe that the Canada Assistance Plan would be the charter of their salvation.

I say that the Canadian people, when they realize the full implications of the government's neglect of our elderly citizens, will rise in their wrath and condemn this government. After all, the cost of living, which is bothering every family in Canada, falls just as heavily on the old people. In many ways it falls more severely on the old people because while in the last 12 months the weighted cost of living index for all commodities went up 4 per cent, if one takes the specific commodities which people must buy in order to live, food, clothing and shelter, those items have gone up more than 4 per cent. Consequently the cost of living for these old people has gone up to a very marked degree.

When the workers find that the cost of living is going up faster than their wages they have trade unions in many cases and can do something about it. They can negotiate a new agreement; or they can go out on strike if they want to. When farmers are pushed too far they can wheel their tractors out on the road. But these old people have no weapons with which to fight in the economic jungle of our modern society. They have nothing to appeal to except the conscience of the Canadian people, and I believe that the conscience of the Canadian people will be touched as they realize the full implications of the government's neglect. I am convinced that the backbenchers on the government side have had their consciences touched. I am convinced that if the government were to allow a free vote today on whether the old age pension should be raised to $100 a month at age 65, the motion would pass. Only the government's intransigence has kept them from passing it now.

I listened in particular to the comments made yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and I can only come to the conclusion that the government's arrogance has dulled their sensibilities. When the Minister of Transport said yesterday that we have the best social security system in the world he certainly proved either that he does not know what he is talking about or that he has become so completely insulated from the people of this country that he has returned to the arrogance of 1957. Because any person who will look at the social security systems of some of the other countries of the world would not make the kind of statement that was made by the Minister of Transport. I invite the Minister of Transport to go out and tell the old age pensioners of this country, who are trying to eke out an existence on $75 a month, that we have the best social security system in the world—let him try telling them that and see what their reaction will be.

I think the government should stop and take stock. They are in a minority position in this house. They have stayed in office for the very obvious reason that no party today wants to put this country to the cost of another general election. So the government has been given a free hand in bringing down legislation and has obtained the co-operation of all parties of this house in proceeding with their program.

I want to tell the government that unless they do something about the plight of old age pensioners, the opposition parties in this parliament will be justified in combining and putting this government out of office. I think the people of Canada would support them in taking such a step. After all, the last time the Liberal government was defeated was in 1957, and the reason for its defeat was that it had become so arrogant that it lost touch with the feelings and the social conscience of the Canadian people. Despite the fact that they had a large surplus in the treasury, the very best they could do was to raise the old age pension by $6 a month. When opposition members of that day raised their voices in protest, they received the same kind of answers that we have been getting these past two or three days.

But when the government—dubbed as the "six bucks boys"—went to the people in the election of 1957 they found that the reaction of the Canadian people was such as to put them out of office. I suggest they would be wise not to make the same mistake again. The Canadian people are patient and long suffering but their patience is wearing thin. The great bulk of the Canadian people, concerned as they are about their own problem of getting sufficient income to meet the rising cost of living, are also concerned about their neighbours and their fellow Canadians. There is hardly a community in Canada in which there are not old people who are in need, and these people have touched the conscience of their neighbours and their friends.

I want to tell the government that the Canadian people will not put up too long with a government that refuses to take the steps which are so obvious and to use the money which is now available in the old age security fund to provide these old people with some of the amenities and decencies of life. If this government wants to put some muscle into its war on poverty, here is the place to begin.

Let them begin by bringing in concurrent legislation so that in addition to the Canada Assistance Plan the old age security pensioners of this country will get $100 a month, not by passing a test, not by having to depend on a generous provincial government, but by right, and by virtue of the fact that this parliament has made it clear that it will live up to its federal responsibilities for the elderly people of Canada.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Before the debate on second reading terminates, Mr. Speaker, and before we go into committee I should like to make a brief statement. Because of the fact that my name had been mentioned on one or two occasions during the debate I thought I should say something to the house at this time. The questions I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) respecting the increase in the old age pension were directed to an increase in payments under the Old Age Security Act; these questions were not directed in any way to the Canada Assistance Plan. I wish to assure the house that my position in this matter remains unchanged.

The Canada Assistance Plan is a welfare matter. I have been advocating changes in the Old Age Security Act for the benefit of senior citizens without the requirement of a means test. And so, Mr. Speaker, I will reserve my remarks on the Canada Assistance Plan until we go into committee.

I wish to say at this time that I believe the plan which is before the house is a good one in that it benefits the disabled, the unemployed, the blind, the poor and the aged who need additional assistance to that which is provided under the Old Age Security Act. It represents a great advance in the welfare legislation, and I am all in favour of it as far as it goes. I understand it has been carefully considered by the provinces, which are in favour of it and expect this house to pass the measure.

I will refrain from making any further comments until we hear from the minister who, as he has indicated on several occasions, wishes to make a further statement regarding this act in winding up the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A revised statement.

Mr. Brown: Perhaps the minister wishes to make a statement in view of the fact that the subject of old age pensions, which is relevant to this debate, was constantly brought up during the course of the discussions in the house.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment in general on the debate that has taken place, particularly that of yesterday. I believe that the level of the debate was at all times very high. I am referring specifically to the speech made by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) who spoke first on behalf of the opposition in respect of this bill. His speech was restrained, logical and forceful as well as helpful to all members.

Then, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a reasoned, clear and constructive contribution to the debate. All these members are concerned with the subject of the welfare of the senior citizens of Canada. I believe the debate indicated that they have a feeling which is shared all over this house that the means test or even the needs test, which is an improvement over the means test, should not be used with regard to the senior citizens of Canada. In spite of a few remarks which were made on both sides of the house, I want to say in conclusion that I thought the debate on this subject was a credit to the House of Commons on the eve of Canada's 99th birthday. I believe all hon. members at all times upheld the dignity, honour and reputation of parliament.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I usually do not intervene in debates in this house on social and economic subjects, Mr. Speaker, the reason being that I have been assigned certain other responsibilities. However, I feel that if I did not intervene in this particular debate I would be derelict in my duty, particularly my duty to my constituents. I know of no single subject upon which my constituents are more concerned than the subject which is being discussed in this debate. On no single subject have I had more letters, more sincere and moving letters. I imagine this is true of every member in the house. I am not forgetting the fact that when I went around to seek election, as other members did, I called upon many people in the constituency and person after person urged me, if I did anything in this house, I should do my best to work toward an increase in the old age pension.

Such oratory as I have, Mr. Speaker, is not of the tear jerking variety. I do not propose to try to put into rhetorical terms the situation that faces many of my constituents, who are typical of people all across Canada. However, I want to read one or two letters which were brought to my attention and which set out typical situations about which we have heard. I quote:

> I am going to be 80 years old in a few months and I have been receiving the old age pension since the age of 65.
> The money I am receiving from the pension is not enough to keep me going, Mr. Brewin. I've needed new glasses for one year now and I am not able to buy them. Because of this I am not able to read and my eyes burn terribly.
> The doctor informs me that I also have a hernia. I need medicine at times, and I cannot buy it. I have no other income but my pension.
> I am not eating properly since I must be extremely frugal in order to survive.
> People have told me to write to you, Mr. Brewin, and they said you would help me to receive $100 or $104.

I do not believe it would be a very fair answer to this person if I were to say that, well, some time in the future we may be going to do something about this or if I were to say, well, the weather is getting hot, the government is anxious to have a recess, at a time when we have an opportunity to speak up for these people as a result of this debate. If I were concerned about matters of that sort, if I were worried because somebody said I was filibustering or taking up time unnecessarily, I believe I would be failing in my duty if I did not bring these matters to the attention of the house.

I have another letter here, Mr. Speaker. This letter contained a small article from the Toronto Telegram, and the person who wrote to me from my constituency told me that this statement is, to his knowledge, absolutely true. I should like to read it:

> Hundreds of old age pensioners in Toronto are slowly starving to death—

This may be a sensational statement, but wait until you hear who makes it.

> —a Toronto nun claims.
> "The public is not aware of the vast number of pensioners suffering from malnutrition," says Sister Mary Vianny, administrator of Providence Villa home for the aged.
> "Anyone would find it difficult to live on $75 monthly. More than 250 of the 500 persons at Providence Villa must receive outside help in order to survive on the regular pension."
> Speaking at an interfaith rally of the United Appeal, Sister Vianny said that despite government grants in addition to regular pensions, it costs the home more than $20 a month to "give each resident proper care."
> She said that Providence Villa was being asked increasingly more to care for pensioners.
> "Money is not the only answer," she suggested. "Many older persons living alone do not receive the proper care. They are just sitting in their rooms slowly starving to death."

I believe this to be a statement of fact. I am not putting it forth in sentimental terms because I believe it is a fact. I have called on many of these people and spoken to them. I know that they have this $75 a month. I know that eventually, at some time in the future, through this assistance plan which we are now discussing if the provinces take it up as no doubt they will, these people may be able to get the extra amount they need. But I say that these people are slowly starving to death now. These are not my words, they are the words of an experienced social worker speaking to an experienced group.

I could go on and cite other letters of this sort which I have received, but I will not. However, I do have a letter which I think is perhaps typical and it says:

> Our government is in trying—

I do not know what that means.

> —to solve scandal problems instead of improving legislation such as the old age pension on which the undersigned are dependant upon for a decent existence. We would appreciate it if you could approach the government on our behalf—

This letter is signed by a group of pensioners of the Baron Byng Legion, branch No. 1, Ontario, within my constituency. There are many signatures on it. This being the situation, Mr. Speaker, this is our opportunity to bring to the attention of the government the fact that this is not a political issue or a fictitious issue. This is a real matter affecting people. If we were in a situation in which the required action were impossible to take, then I believe it would be our duty to say so frankly. We would be doing something wrong if we were to hold out hopes that were impossible of fulfilment.

It is not our job, as I understand it, as members of parliament merely to reflect public opinion. If public opinion demanded that something be done that was impossible of fulfilment or would damage the economy of the country, then of course we should say so frankly, whether that was popular or unpopular, and take the consequences of doing so. We are not here merely to reflect opinion, as I understand it, we are here to exercise our judgment on policy. I say, with all the sincerity I can command, it is possible for this affluent country to pay this reasonable amount that is being asked here for all our old age pensioners. I am not going into the economics of the situation. So far as I am concerned, I know that inflation is a serious danger. However, as has been said by my leader, if it is required to impose additional taxation on people, on the well to do and even the less well to do, in order that we may have enough for the old age pensioners to save them from starvation, then I say we should do precisely that. I do not believe there is a single family in my constituency receiving an average income of $5,000 or $6,000 a year who would not pay the extra tax for this sort of thing. But they know very well that some old people perhaps own a home, and out of their pension they may have to pay $400 taxes. Streetcar fares and the price of bread, milk and rent have been escalating for the old age pensioners. I think I speak for the ordinary people of the country when I say that if it means that the imposition of some extra tax is necessary—and I am not sure it is; I am sure a lot of the cost of an increase would come back in one form or another—the people of this country would accept it as a measure of social justice, and with a willingness to be fair.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Racine: Would the hon. member permit a question in French?

Mr. Brewin: Certainly. In case I do not understand I will listen to the translation.

[Translation]

Mr. Racine: I do not want to misinterpret the hon. member. Is he suggesting that taxes should be increased in certain fields, in order to increase old age pensions from $75 to $100 and if so, in what field should the government impose taxes?

I would like the hon. member to enlighten us on that point.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot answer the hon. member in adequate French, so I will stick to English, particularly since the question is a complicated one. I am not making a budget speech at the moment but I could suggest a good many things. A capital gains tax would be one means. We live in an affluent society and if additional taxation is necessary, there are plenty of sources of additional taxation which might cut down the consumption of people on particular income levels—and the consumption of people like myself, as far as that is concerned—in order to provide the funds necessary to pay the extra old age pension.

I am perfectly prepared to accept that, and I think the people of Canada would be prepared to accept it if they knew the destination of this money and it was shown that a tax was essential. I am not advocating an increase in taxation. It may well be, with the buoyant revenue received by this government which has produced a boom which is still going on, as I understand it, that we do not need any extra tax. But if we do, let us as Canadian citizens and taxpayers be ready to pay the cost. As my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), said, if there is a danger of inflation, must we take it out on the old age pensioners who can least afford to meet this particular burden?

It was suggested, Mr. Speaker, at one stage of this debate by one or two interrupters on the opposite side of the house, and I think it was repeated in the newspapers—I do not think it was the more thoughtful members opposite who made this suggestion—that we in this part of the house are engaged in some sort of filibuster. I have tried to find out just what is involved in filibustering; it sounds like a nasty and sinister proposition. I found out that a filibuster, according to the definition in the Encyclopaedia of Parliament, 1961, is as follows:

> The obstruction of business in a legislature by dilatory tactics, such as speaking merely to consume time. The use of the word in this sense is almost confined to the United States, where the late Senator Huey Long spoke for nearly 16 hours in 1935. He introduced such irrelevancies as recipes for fried oysters and the life of Frederick the Great in a speech alleging an offence by the executive in placing in high-salaried positions men whose names had not been submitted to the Senate for confirmation.

It goes on to say that the United States type of filibustering is not permissible in the House of Commons, and would not be allowed under various standing orders. So that even if I or the members of my party were capable of filibustering, I think we would have difficulty living up to the standards set by Mr. Huey Long.

But, Mr. Speaker, are we filibustering simply because we in this part of the house, faced with what the government itself says is one of its most important measures, and believing that there are gaping deficiencies in it which affect our constituents and people all over Canada, are we to be accused of filibustering because in speaking about this matter we put the needs of our constituents before the house?

I have not been a member of the house for very long, but I do remember sitting here all summer to debate the issue of the Canadian flag. I do not know that I begrudged the time, but I think we spent 30 days on that matter. I think it was an important subject and I do not criticize any member of the house at the time who took part in that debate. But I say that a discussion of a day or two—and a day or two is about all this discussion will occupy—in order to help put before the house what our constituents feel and believe on this question is thoroughly justifiable. I would feel ashamed if I for one had yielded to any suggestion, or if the members of my party had yielded to any suggestion, that we should pack up our bags and go home and not talk about these matters at this particular time.

A filibuster is an obstruction of business by people speaking merely to consume time. We are not trying to obstruct business. We expect the Canada Assistance Plan to be passed within a day or two. We do not know that there is any hurry to pass it in the next day or two, but we expect it to be passed. We have made it absolutely clear that, although we think it is inadequate, we do think it is an advance and that it will get our support. But is that any reason that we should be accused in the course of a debate of obstructing the business of the house by filibustering, by speaking to consume time, when we bring before the house the plight of our own constituents in relation to the most important matter in the lives of many of our constituents that we have ever discussed in this house?

Anybody who makes such an accusation, Mr. Speaker, is being blind. It is suggested that it is a terrible thing, that we are holding up the house and do not want to go on a vacation. Personally, I think that that sort of talk is much exaggerated. I know that when the house does recess, as it probably will within a few days, the members of the house will have lots of work to do in their constituencies. I for one would be glad to have the opportunity to get back to my constituency and talk to my constituents about this matter.

I see nothing wrong with our desiring to have a reasonable vacation, in view of the work we do in this house. But to suggest that somebody who wrote an article in a newspaper or some government member leaked the idea that we were to get out by today, and that this would be the last day of this part of the session, and that therefore we are disrupting somebody's plans by insisting on an adequate discussion of the Canada Assistance Plan, is nonsense. We should sit here, if necessary, for as many weeks as are required to deal with this legislation, and to deal, I hope, with the parallel, sister legislation which ought to be introduced. It is clearly the will of the house that legislation dealing with an increase in old age pensions should be introduced. Personally I think that it would be very unfortunate if we in this house were to allow anything to interfere with our responsibilities in this regard.

I have said that the Canada Assistance Plan is a step forward. We have consulted the social workers who see the real advantages in it. We understand that in many fields, as has been pointed out, the provinces have primary responsibility. But we believe that it is our responsibility in this house to deal with the question of old age pensions, and a minimal way of dealing with it at this time is to increase the pension to $100 a month without a means test. I want to say that in no other subject I have had the opportunity of dealing with in this house in four years am I more conscious of speaking the earnest prayers and desires of my constituents, whether they qualify for old age pension or not.

I give the government and this parliament credit for the Canada Pension Plan. The time will come when this problem may be solved. But is that any reason why we should, in the interim, disregard the rights of people who have struggled and worked to create the affluent society we are enjoying? I say no, Mr. Speaker. I should like my voice to be added to all the others which have spoken, not for my own sake, but for the sake of those people I have been chosen to represent, and especially for the sake of the older people, who are the people in urgent need. They hope that this house will do something for them.

I urge the government to reconsider this matter and to increase pensions, not at some future date, but now, or in the immediate future. I ask the government to yield to the clear will of this house and, I suggest, to the clear will of the people of Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Does the hon. member for Beauce wish to put a question?

[English]

Mr. Racine: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. gentleman a question. He did not speak in any way about family allowances. Does he think that they should be increased? What does he say about the views expressed by—I do not know whether he is the joint leader in Quebec—one of the leaders of the New Democratic Party? I should like to know if his party wants to increase old age pensions, family allowances and everything else?

Mr. Brewin: I never disagree with the leader of my party in the province of Quebec. If he has said that something is the policy of this party, he is right, and I stand behind that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Racine: You could disagree when he is telling the province that he has the help of three ministers of Union Nationale.

Mr. Brewin: I am afraid that is getting a little out of my sphere.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments of the time of the house to speak on behalf of the senior citizens in my riding whom it is my honour to represent.

I believe this legislation that has been set before us, known as the Canada Assistance Plan, is one of the greatest pieces of camouflage that we have ever seen in this house. I say that, because it was stated during the election campaign that if the senior citizens would only wait, this government would introduce legislation to be known as the Canada Assistance Plan that would take care of their needs and their wants.

However, I give the minister some credit for this legislation, because it has developed a new concept with respect to welfare work. This legislation has introduced federal assistance for the health care plan, the mothers allowances, child welfare and Indian welfare, also the social welfare workers provision for self training. All these things are good, and I congratulate the minister in tidying up all these welfare acts, which have grown like Topsy, and for bringing them all together under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Whom does this plan assist? It assists most of the people, but it leaves out those very important people who should have assistance, namely the senior citizens. There is no assistance for them whatever. There is not one nickel in this legislation for our senior citizens, unless the provinces agree to enter into the agreement set out with the federal government. It must be remembered that some provinces in Canada are not financially able to enter into this program. What will the senior citizens do in those provinces? The federal government, and not the provincial government, has the responsibility for the senior citizens.

We may take that for granted. What is the senior citizen get that money? He or she application. In your riding, sir, or in my riding we have senior citizens geting $75 a month. You and I know that it is not enough for them to live on, with the great increase in the cost of living. This bill says to them: "But you can get more money". And how does the senior citizen get that money? He or she has to go to the welfare office and, on bended knee, say to the welfare officer: "Will you please give me extra money. I cannot live on $75 a month." Our senior citizens have to go begging for that increase.

Is that what this parliament wants our senior citizens to do? That is what is laid down in the bill, as I understand it. It says, in effect: "Go down to the welfare office and ask for a few dollars extra over and above the $75." This was not what was talked about during the election campaign. Now, however, we are faced with facts. This measure is what the government has presented to parliament, asking that it be endorsed.

The members on the other side of the house are not proud of this legislation, they are not satisfied with it. If they were they would be on their feet speaking in support of it, and giving it their endorsement. The Liberal members are not in favour of this legislation. As a matter of fact they are ashamed of it.

The situation we have is this: that this government refuses to give added income, which is so badly needed, to our senior citizens. Yet this same government can spend $6 million for a picture for the art gallery; it can spend $100 million in building a new national defence building 37 stories tall in this city; it can buy a ship from the Sorel Company in Quebec, pay $310,000 more for it than they should have paid, turn around and give the same firm the business of refitting it at an estimate of $750,000, and finish up paying $2,447,000, without calling for tenders.

Everywhere we look we can see money wasted. Yet this government refuses to provide much needed assistance to our senior citizens. The government has come forward with the Canada Assistance Plan, which gives assistance to everybody but to our senior citizens. For the life of me I cannot understand why this type of legislation was brought in at this late date, just when we are ready to adjourn, and asking us to pass it. This is important legislation and should have been one of the first pieces of business to be dealt with, so that we might have had a good chance of debating it from beginning to end.

I said I would be brief, so I conclude. I simply say that this plan offers assistance to nearly everybody but to those persons who should have it and need it most, the senior citizens, those people who helped to build this country. I ask the Minister to reconsider this bill.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I could not let this debate come to a close without adding a word, although I want to be very brief, because I hope all hon. members in this house will do all they can and I ask them to do so to have this legislation passed, although I believe 90 per cent of hon. members do not find it categorical enough. When one is thirsty and does not have a glass of water to drink, one drinks the few remaining drops in the bottom; I think that is the principle hon. members ought to accept this afternoon, in order to close this debate.

Some claimed that the opposition wanted to start a little filibuster. I do not believe, as an hon. member pointed out a few moments ago, that two days to deal with such an important matter is too long. This legislation should simply have come before the house at the beginning of the session, instead of trivial things such as the Spencer and Munsinger affairs. In fact, the government should endeavour to bring in serious legislation at the beginning of sessions, so that we can work on something solid.

As far as Bill No. C-207 is concerned, Mr. Speaker, we are very disappointed. We had been expecting it for a long while and we also expected to have a statement from the government to the effect that it would transfer to the provinces certain rights which belonged to them. Today, and this is after stating that it was short of money, that it could not raise old age pensions, the government says through its assistance plan, that it has money to spend. We would have thought that it would have given the provinces the money it had to dispose of, that is $100 million or $200 million, in order to enable them to improve their social assistance services. As you all know, the provinces, and the province of Quebec which I know more particularly, have their own social assistance plans, where everything is well defined, well determined, and for the completion of which the only thing lacking is money.

We would be pleased to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare return to the provinces what amount he may dispose of, such as $200 or $300 million, to enable them to operate in the field assigned to them.

We also expected a bill which would improve the conditions for eligibility of the pensioners, so that they might not be at the mercy, as is often the case, of petty politicians. We also expected the provisions to explain the act clearly enough to prevent investigators from wangling their way out of tight spots. It would have been even more marvellous if the act could have been implemented directly without investigators.

What we expected most was that the government would keep one of its greatest promises, that to increase the old age pension; that is would be willing to risk some money. The government could have introduced that act, providing for an increase in the old age pension to at least $100 a month. I feel that in those two fields of endeavour, namely old age pensions and family allowances, the government can act directly and constitutionally. I feel it should have made every effort in those two fields in which it can act without transgressing our constitution, and it would have been congratulated for doing so.

It is all very well to say that an old person can live on a welfare cheque of $75 a month, Mr. Speaker; it simply cannot be done. It is impossible, and only a person who has no contact at all with elderly people thinks that way. For the past 30 years I have been mayor of my city and president of the school board, hence in constant contact with elderly people who come to our office to try to obtain the bare necessities. Although the province of Quebec has brought another amendment to the assistance of elderly people through the medical aid card and added a further amount up to $30 a month for drugs, I believe that if the federal government had wanted to be logical, and especially constitutional, it would have simply said to the provinces: We are prepared to hand over to you—not give you, I do not speak of gifts as concerns the provinces—$100 million, $200 million, to try to improve further your social assistance legislation and thus co-operate with your programs against poverty.

Mr. Speaker, it is the same with family allowances. The Quebec government is about to double family allowances and I think that this sum would have been accepted with delight by the new premier of Quebec; it would have helped to pay part of his increase in family allowances.

What do we have? First of all, we have a bill that normally involves the three levels of government, provincial, municipal and federal. We have a bill hatched solely by the federal government, while they should at least have had the decency to call in the interested parties to consider the possibilities, since joint programs and federal-provincial relations are involved. But no. We are presented with a bill containing a flood of words and a dearth of ideas. The bill has 21 pages and what do they say? They say to the provinces: "We will have some millions of dollars to redistribute." That is just about all the bill says.

When this bill is compared to Quebec social assistance, it will be observed that it is simply a repetition of the provisions of the Quebec Social Insurance Act. Without stating the amounts, without specifying this or that department, it provides for increased assistance.

Mr. Speaker, this is such a paltry bill it could have been condensed in one page instead of 21. And in one page it would have been in accordance with the constitution, whereas in 21 pages, the constitution is being infringed upon. When reference is made only to a few pages, the short title of the bill is used. Can you imagine? The short title of the act is the Canada Assistance Plan. We have always been aware of the Social Assistance Act. This reminds us of the time the federal government changed the title of ARDA to Rural Development. It was exactly the same act, but in order to give it a Liberal title, it was named: Rural Development.

I remember a legislation providing assistance which caused everybody a great deal of suffering—I was very young then—especially with regard patronage, and the word "assistance" in the title is extremely repugnant to us, as well as to the entire population.

The Assistance Plan is defined as follows:

> "Assistance" means aid in any form to or in respect of persons in need for the purpose of providing or providing for all or any of the following:
> (i) food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements—

Why not include shoes, stockings and socks? Why not? This would lengthen the wording of the act.

It goes on:

> (ii) prescribed items incidental to carrying on a trade or other . . .
> (iii) care in a home for special care,
> (iv) travel . . .
> (vi) health care services,

Everything is listed. However, Mr. Speaker, all those things are already provided in provincial acts which are supposed to be administered under provincial authority.

Provincial authority in charge of social welfare, but "assistance" has been overlooked. The authority entrusted with the administration of welfare is the province. It could not be otherwise, because only the provinces are entitled to administer social welfare.

We suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been much more logical for the government to say simply: We might help the provinces even more by turning over to them more of the money we took away from them.

Further on, reference is made to persons in need, and this is the major problem in our areas.

At this stage, I would like to point out that each government should try today to hire as investigators real social workers, with diplomas, free from politics, who respect the law; unfortunately, that is not the case in our regions. We still have small politically appointed investigators who indulge in politics.

As a matter of fact, I wish to tell the house about a case which I referred to the minister. It is about a man who brought up 16 children; he has been unable to work for a year and a half and he has certificates from three doctors to prove that he is disabled. He has not been working for a year and a half and there are still two young children at home, but he cannot get anything. Think of it. He has not received anything for a year and a half. Why? Because he has a small property worth about $3,500.

Well, I thought that the government would have allocated a taken amount to try to direct the investigators with regard to properties. A man who has acquired a small property the hard way asks for help and is told: Sell your property, go to the city, rent a house and then you will be able to get social assistance. I find that utterly ridiculous. And it goes much further, because in my own city we have had, for four years now, about 20 or 22 per cent of those immigrants who used to live in the country—at least those people who were without work—they had a small piece of land, kept a few head of cattle and had a small garden to get potatoes at least.

But if the couple in need wanted to stay on their piece of land, they could not get a penny under the legislation. And they have to leave everyting, go to the city, live in a rented house with all their children. And those people have seven, eight, nine, ten children.

Just think of those people coming to the city and there they yet get help, a pitiful allowance.

I sincerely believed that the government would have included in the legislation a clause to wake up the governments concerned and give the investigators the opportunity to help the families without depriving them of everything first.

I think that is one of the big problems of public assistance, because some people want to keep their small house, very often a modest house. And the cost of the government would be cut in half if it gave them a few cents to stay in their locality, instead of having them move to the large cities where life is so expensive.

I believe this is a capital point for the economy. As I said, 20 per cent of those people now live within the city limits and with the assisted persons we already had, almost 40 per cent of the people of our city are socially assisted. That is getting to be an epidemic for a city.

Well, I believe that if the legislation contained a section to correct such a situation, it would certainly be more substantial.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Now, as regards children. We have here persons under the age of 21 years, as far as foster homes are concerned. Well, this is another problem. I do not understand why public assistance—I am saying this to the minister because he will have the opportunity to discuss it with the ministers of the other provinces—would provide for a foster home but, on the other hand, gives nothing or almost nothing to the mother of a family, a widow with two, four, five or six children. If you can provide $30 or $35 per month for a foster home, then give the $35 per month to the mother. It would enable this mother to keep her children with her and it would not cost more to the government. You will provide it if she makes the sacrifice of parting with her children and sending them to a foster home. Then, why not give it to the mother, who wants to keep her children with her and who will surely discharge her duties in a much better way than the foster home?

You have examples today of foster homes where children are martyrs. Why? Because you forced the mother to throw her children out of her home.

Well, at least, let there be granted to the mother the same benefits as are granted to strangers for taking care of those children.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago, I would still have many points to make, but I do not want to take up more time.

First, I hope the minister will bring in some amendments before we pass this bill. Of course, if they had gone to the trouble of investigating further in the provinces, and if they had acted like in all joint programs, for this is, in effect, a joint program, there is no argument about that —if they had acted like in all joint programs, you certainly would not have brought forward a bill so empty, so poorly adjusted to the needs of Canadians on welfare and, above all, you would have accepted to pay $100 per month pensions to old people.

And what about family allowances? One would think it is useless to talk about them here. Nobody wants children any longer. I believe some hon. members, if they could, would remove the present allowances.

I ask the government to make an effort, for Quebec is going to double its allowances. Let the government make an effort and if it wants to go hand in hand with the province of Quebec, let it do something about family allowances.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the rather foolish word "filibuster" used recently. Since I have never been known for making many or long speeches, since I belong to that place in Canada which has the finest summer climate in the world, and since I think Ottawa has perhaps the worst summer climate, I will not be accused of participating in any such inappropriately described exercise. But if I thought any utterance or act of mine would in any way hasten the day when the senior citizens of this country would have a full measure of justice meted out to them in the way we are discussing, I would not hesitate to remain here throughout the dreadful months of July and August. I am not given to making rash promises or difficult pledges.

This has been, as members have said, an interesting debate. I think in this country we are going to have to look pretty carefully at welfare programs, and there are areas in which I, for instance, would find myself in quite strong disagreement with the people on my left, geographically and philosophically; but I cannot for the life of me understand the continuing difference of opinion about this particular area of welfare. I refer to the area which has been discussed by the last three or four speakers. I find it hard to see how the conflicts can be sustained when welfare for our older people—our senior citizens, to use a euphemism—is being discussed.

This is a sector of our population whose capacity for earning is either completely gone or painfully diminished. These are people who, like the rest of us, are living through a period of rapidly rising living costs, and who, because of their own situation, face in addition to the rising cost of living exceptional expenses because of advancing years—the cost of medicine, nursing, special care and transportation. Many of them are no longer able to own or drive a car.

Surely no one in this house or anywhere in Canada has to document the needs of people living today in Canada with the cost of living index where it is, and I am sure it is higher now than it was when I last checked it not too long ago. No one can decently, let alone comfortably, live on $75 a month or $18.75 a week. I do not think that anyone could or would for a moment suggest that this is a proper measure of financial assistance to the older people of this country.

I was much impressed during the last election campaign with the response which the people of my constituency gave to the platform of this party. I suppose no thoughtful member of any party is ever at any time 100 per cent in accord with what his party stands for, but I know that in all the years I have been a member of the Conservative party I have never been more proud of its position than I was in respect of its clear-cut, forthright and consistently retained approach to this problem.

We in this party think that for many reasons the $75 should be forthwith raised to $100. We have said this and, I am happy to say, backed our voices with our votes when this house was seized directly with the question; and for that I am very proud of my membership in this party. This figure should be immediately raised from $75 to $100. I believe that any astute and sensible government would have done so before now.

I am concerned, as I have always been concerned, about the means test, and whether it is euphemistically called a needs test or not does not really alter the case or mitigate my feelings of anxiety about it. The government has said that it has abolished the means test and that what is being used now is a needs test. How is the need established? Is it based on the colour of an old person's eyes or the part of his hair? No, it is established by a most undignified scrutiny into every detail of an individual's life, in so far as his finances are concerned. Not only must one be poor, he must prove to some official of the state that he is poor. I think that to force this upon the senior citizens of this country in an indignity.

Another thing that concerns me, and I have good reason for concern about this, is the possibility of regional variation because of previous suggestions that perhaps an old person in Toronto needs more than an old person in Prince Edward Island.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Somebody else said that.

Mr. Macquarrie: No member of my party ever said that. For the people who have laboured long for their country, have paid taxes and discharged their obligations as good citizens, I think to have them appear before some authority and document the degree of their need is a degradation; it is unnecessary, it is an impropriety and it is an indignity to which I will never lend my support. I think that this country—and we have been saying this for a long time—can afford to look after this sector of the society which is, as one member said last night, the most defenceless of all elements in our population against the buffets of economic life.

I think we can afford to take this step at this time; and it is not by any means a giant step. I am sorry that in the Canada Assistance Plan, which has some meritorious features which I do not deny—indeed I welcome them—there is the needs test, the means test, and that behind it is the stubborn refusal of the government to recognize the needs of our older people.

There is one aspect of this debate which has interested me in particular. Hon. members opposite, including the minister and others on this side of the house, have made reference to the province of Prince Edward Island and to its premier Hon. Walter Shaw. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) in reply to a question said, as reported at page 6872 of Hansard:

> The position taken by the premier of Prince Edward Island is made possible or will be made possible through the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

I should like to make a comment on that reply, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, the resolution in respect of this measure has been languishing on the order paper, lo these many weeks. That is the reference to time. I should like to say, too, that the government of Prince Edward Island under the leadership of Premier Shaw is providing for the payment of $100 per month to all its older citizens, and not only to those who come forward and document their poverty. This is a very important distinction.

I was sorry that the hon. lady from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), for whom I have a high regard not only because of herself but because her husband was a Prince Edward Islander, choose to designate the action of the government of Prince Edward Island as a deathbed repentance. I should think that, considering what she and her colleagues have been saying for the last few days, the premier of Prince Edward Island should become their hero because he has moved to put into effect what they have been calling for. The government of Prince Edward Island is prepared to bear the full load of pensions without a means test.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, could I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes.

Mr. MacEachen: Is he aware that the proposal made by Premier Shaw depends for its implementation on the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan and that that government proposes to enact its pension legislation under the provisions of the bill that we are now discussing?

Mr. Macquarrie: I should like to say to the minister that as I read this bill, and since he is piloting it through the house, I presume he read it too, the Canada Assistance Plan is for those in need, and the government of Prince Edward Island is paying its pension to all senior citizens without their having to prove need. Therefore the minister's statement is not on all fours with the actual situation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend obviously is not aware that the government of Prince Edward Island proposes to apply a means test, and has requested federal co-operation under this plan to do that.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I think it might be well for the minister to look more carefully into the actions of the government of Prince Edward Island, for a variety of reasons; first, so he would know what he is talking about, and second, so that he might have an example to follow. I am telling the minister and the house that the government of Prince Edward Island is in the process of paying the additional $25 to recipients of the old age pension, without a means test, and I expect my word to be taken on that.

Mr. MacEachen: That is not what the minister of welfare of Prince Edward Island told me.

Mr. Macquarrie: I would say that things have advanced in Prince Edward Island, and I wish the same pace of improvement could be engineered by the minister. We look forward to the day when a part of the burden now being borne completely by the province of Prince Edward Island will be shared by the dominion government through the Canada Assistance Plan. That will be rightfully under this legislation of course, for those in need.

This measure provides no device, no means whereby the dominion government will assist the province of Prince Edward Island in the payment to those who are not able to document their poverty. This is the fundamental difference between the program envisaged in this legislation and the action which the Shaw government has already taken.

I should like to say, while we are on the subject, that the Department of National Health and Welfare could have been more co-operative in this regard. When the province of Prince Eward Island sought from the minister's department the names of recipients of old age security cheques, I think the co-operation which could have been extended was not forthcoming. I would hope that this situation will be corrected; that even if the government refuses to pay $100 a month to all senior citizens, they will not refuse at least to give the names to a provincial government that is prepared to do so.

Mr. MacEachen: I have given them that assurance in a letter. There is full co-operation.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am glad to hear that. I was hoping the minister would not hold out in this negative attitude too long. We must get the situation straight. It is not for the province of Prince Edward Island to be paying all of the pension; it is not even, in my view, sufficient for the province to be paying half the pension; it is the dominion government which should be paying all the pension.

Mr. Knowles: All across Canada.

Mr. Macquarrie: I would say that in this one area of welfare which is now clearly a dominion responsibility the government should not hesitate to move in and give justice to our older people. I would say that they might well emulate Premier Shaw instead of criticizing him. The government of the smallest province of Canada has set an example in this regard, and I am proud that in the smallest of all the provinces, a province with a very limited revenue base, a province where the cost of services to its people is high, a measure of justice has been meted out by its government.

I say that Prince Edward Island, as it has before, has set a worthy example, and I honour Premier Shaw and his colleagues for doing this. I am not surprised they did it. Premier Shaw, as well as being the leader of my party in Prince Edward Island, is an honoured and prominent member of the national party to which I belong. He stood with us last October and November when we made our point of view clear. In the face of the failure of the dominion government to provide the money, he is doing it in the province of Prince Edward Island. I say to the hon. lady from Vancouver-Kingsway that Premier Shaw is the man whose example she should proclaim from the housetops all across Canada, and that she should not criticize him. Let us emulate the man, but let us not leave it to the provinces to move into the vacuum created by a vacuous government which is not honouring its oft proclaimed promise to bring about a measure of justice to the older people of Canada. I think that those who are pressing strongly, vigorously and even at length to have this legislation passed are doing a service to the older people of the country.

I do not accept very kindly the suggestion that we would be good fellows if we quietly acquiesced and vacated this place. This is an issue upon which much will be heard in the weeks or months ahead, and it is something on which I for one do not wish to give up. I do not want to see the provinces left with a burden which is properly that of the dominion government. I call upon the minister and his colleagues to act on this. They have changed their minds on many other occasions; they could much more worthily change their minds on this.

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): I am quite well aware, Mr. Speaker that there is not too much that is new that I can add to this debate. However, being tremendously aware of the interest of my constituents in the provisions of Bill C-207, I cannot sit quietly and not raise some strong objections to the government's seeming indifference to certain aspects of the bill, even though much of what I have to say has already been said more ably than I can perhaps express it. Nevertheless I must support wholeheartedly the arguments put forth by hon. members on this side of the house, and particularly those of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who so courageously, efficiently and, I might say, at all times, defends the cause of the millions of ordinary people all across the country. I do not wish to get into any conflict with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) because I do not want to make the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway a point of argument, regarding what happened in Prince Edward Island.

One of the first questions I was asked by the news media following my election to parliament was whether I would support the proposed Canada Assistance Plan, which, as all hon. members know, was given a great deal of publicity during the election campaign. Recognizing the possibilities of such a plan, my answer was an unqualified yes. My answer today will still have to be yes, even though Bill C-207 is far from reaching the expectations I entertained for it. However, a slice of bread is better than no bread at all, and this in my opinion is what Bill C-207 exemplifies; a slice of bread where a whole loaf, or perhaps more truthfully many loaves, are needed. However, the principle behind the bill is a worthy one, even though the provisions of the bill fall far short of what is expected of them, particularly so with respect to our senior citizens.

As I understand it, a sum of $85 million will be made available by the government to assist in supplementing the pension of a great variety of people who, through no fault of their own, are unable to bring home a pay cheque to take care of their needs of every day living. The idea is commendable indeed, but when you take into account the great number of people who are in need of additional assistance of one kind or another, how far is $85 million going to go? How stringent will the rules and regulations have to be in order that a person might qualify for additional assistance? What degree of need will have to be evident before assistance is granted?

Taking into account the sum of money available and the many thousands who are now eking out a meagre existence on insufficient pensions of one kind or another, I think it is quite obvious that only a small minority will benefit from this legislation, and even those to no great extent.

This, Mr. Speaker, brings me to the point with which I am most concerned, and that is the plight of the many thousands who are now trying to get along on old age assistance. These are the people who deserve prior attention. But when a very large portion of this $85 million is siphoned off to assist disabled and blind persons, widowed mothers, and the many other types of assistance that are spelled out in the bill, then we must ask ourselves just how many of the aged people will get the assistance they need. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to imply that there is not a very great need for assistance for people in the categories other than those who rely on old age assistance. The point I am concerned about is that in my opinion too few of the aged will get the help they so urgently require.

The second point I wish to make is also in connection with those living on old age security. Many of these people have through their lifetime contributed to their country and their communities. As my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway has stated, they have built this country and many of them have performed a valuable service to their fellowmen. They have educated their children to become good and industrious citizens. They have lived through a major depression and did not have the opportunity to acquire much in the way of worldly possessions. Many have done well to manage to retain a humble home. Are we to subject these people to a means or a needs test, before they can qualify for a pension that will at best only provide necessary clothes and food? I reiterate what my colleague has stated: A decent pension is their right, and we should not deny it to them. They should not be required to answer numerous questions and to suffer humiliation in order to get this pittance.

I find it hard to believe that hon. members on the government side of the house have not received continual representations from across the country insisting on the need for an immediate increase in old age security pensions. I find it even harder to believe that anyone can turn a deaf ear to the pleas of these people. I do not think it should be necessary to go into any detail and to quote figures to show that the increase in the cost of living more than warrants a minimum pension of $100 a month for our senior citizens.

I would like to give just one example of what I consider to be a typical case. It is a local case and I am well acquainted with it. It regards a husband and wife who are trying to maintain their humble home, which has been theirs for the past 40 years. The wife has not yet reached the age of 70, so they are trying to make ends meet on the husband's pension. When they tried to get additional assistance they were advised to sell their home and move into a small apartment. Needless to say they do not wish to give up a home that has been theirs for four decades. They have a small garden and their sole enjoyment and entertainment is in trying to keep their property in a presentable condition.

If the wife could qualify for the old age retirement pension without any questions asked, think what a load this would take off their minds. When I say old age retirement I mean a pension of $100 a month. This is the type of people who have too much pride to humiliate themselves by subjecting themselves to a means or needs test, whatever you like to call it. They have been an asset to their community all through the years. Surely they have the right to spend their remaining years in dignity and without feeling they are charges on the community. This is only one case, but I am sure it is typical of many thousands of others. I am sure that every hon. member in the house knows this to be a fact.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that as a new member I am amazed that the government would wait until this late date to bring before the house such an important piece of legislation. I have to ask myself the question, is it by accident or design that the measure was not placed on the order paper until most members were anxious to get away for a summer recess? Perhaps I am only a frustrated rookie member, but I am afraid I have already reached my own conclusion as to the degree of sincerity behind this legislation. I hope I am wrong and the government will yet take the action that is needed to ensure that our senior citizens will get the relief that is so long overdue and so badly needed. I hope the government will immediately introduce concurrent legislation to increase the old age assistance to $100 a month and reduce the age requirement to 65.

[Mr. Fawcett.]

Let me also stress the fact that according to all surveys $100 a month is insufficient. Unless some action is taken now to curb the inflationary cost of living and to provide decent housing within the means of our senior citizens, additional increases in old age assistance will be needed to ensure that these people can enjoy the measure of security they justly deserve. Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that perhaps I have been a little naïve in answering the many letters requesting relief which I have received from old age pensioners. I have assured them that sooner or later the government would break down and give them the relief that was required. I hope I have not been naïve. There will be no one any happier than I if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) announces there will be concurrent legislation introduced which will give these people the additional increases they require without a needs or means test.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in the course of remarks about the Canada Assistance Plan by hon. members, one theme has tended to recur frequently, namely that the financial needs of the aged should be more adequately recognized, either through an increase in the old age security pension or through the adoption of a guaranteed annual income as recommended in the report of the Senate committee on aging, or in other ways. A number of complimentary references were made to the Senate committee report and it was suggested by some members that the government has not given sufficient attention to its recommendations. I should like, therefore, to devote some attention to that report and to assure you that it has been taken seriously and that action has already been taken on a number of its recommendations. A continued and careful study will be made of the report as a whole.

It should be borne in mind that the Canada Assistance Plan is a measure designed to support the provision of appropriate aid to any person in Canada regardless of his age, place of residence or the cause of his need. Thus, while it provides the basis upon which special attention can be given to particular groups in the country, such as the aged, it nevertheless helps to assure that the needs of all groups will be considered. Indeed, it is only through the development of very comprehensive and soundly conceived assistance measures for the total population that the needs of particular groups can be adequately met.

This approach is recognized by the Senate committee on aging and is set out as the first principle for relating this approach to the needs of the aged. I quote from page 7 of the report as follows:

1. The welfare of older people is closely linked with the welfare of all Canadians. Many of the problems older people face are the result of new developments in society, such as rapid technological change, which are having their effects on other age groups as well. This means that constructive planning for old people cannot proceed on an ad hoc basis, but must rest on an analysis and understanding of the social situation.

2. Society has a responsibility to protect and assist disadvantaged groups in the population, such as older people under present day conditions, but in doing so must also take account of the wider public interest.

Commencing with this realistic approach to social need, the report of the Senate committee goes on to make a number of recommendations which, in its opinion, must be implemented if our society is to fully accept its responsibilities toward its older citizens. The first of these, and the one which has received the greatest attention, concerns the need for income security. Specifically, the recommendation is that an income guarantee program should be established. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has already stated to this house that this proposal is being carefully considered, but that there are important implications which were not brought out in the Senate report which must be considered before any responsible decision can be taken. This view is held also by the Canadian Welfare Council, which has established a sound reputation as a responsible and well informed spokesman for the views of social welfare in Canada.

In a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) dated May 29, 1966, the council makes the following statement:

The council believes that the principle of a guaranteed income for the aged has much to commend it. However, there are many questions that should be studied, and related decisions made, before a conclusion is reached as to whether such a program should be undertaken. These questions are concerned with the proposal itself, and with current and future programs to improve the living standards not only of the aged but of all Canada's needy people.

The council sets out seven major questions which in its opinion need to be answered before a decision is reached. These are as follows:

1. Has parliament the constitutional power to institute an income guarantee program?

2 What priority should be given to the economic needs of the elderly vis-à-vis those of the rest of the population (recent studies carried out by the Canadian Welfare Council have shown that a relatively large proportion of the total population is living in poverty, many below the present level of the old age security pension).

3. Should a guaranteed income program as recommended for the aged also apply to the blind and disabled?

4. What would be the impact of a guaranteed income on the incentive built into the Canada Pension Plan to keep people 65 to 70 years of age in the labour force?

5. If such a program were inaugurated:

(a) What would constitute "income" for purposes of calculating the deficiency between what income a claimant has and what he should receive?

(b) How would the amount of the guaranteed income be determined and what devices would be necessary to keep it abreast of the standard of living?

(c) Would the guaranteed income be the same across Canada or would there be regional differences?

(d) What provision would be made for dependent spouses (under 65) and children, when the beneficiary is alive and when he or she dies?

(e) On what basis would an applicant's first year benefits be calculated?

(f) How would overpayments be dealt with?

6. What are the alternatives to such a program?

7. Should a sickness cash benefit program be established for all people with or without an income guarantee?

The Senate committee, in putting forward this recommendation, recognized that it had not been in the position to estimate the cost of an income guaranteed program, and suggested that the proposal should be given immediate study.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has already stated that through the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government will contribute toward the cost of providing assistance to older persons whose income is insufficient to meet their needs.

He pointed out that no ceiling is set on the amount of the federal contribution and that the concept of assistance is sufficiently broad to cover any element of need that may be present. It includes, for example, the cost of a comprehensive range of health care services, the lack of which represents one of the most costly and worrying problems facing older people today. It includes institutional care and a variety of welfare services to which I will shortly refer in greater detail. It is anticipated that the substantial federal funds to be made available to the provinces will contribute materially to their ability to provide the additional assistance to all older persons who require it.

Canada Assistance Plan

I would now like to refer to other recommendations that appear in the Senate committee's report. There are in all 92 recommendations under seven headings, covering the general topics of income status and security, employment status and opportunities, health status and health care, housing status and needs, community services for old people, research and statistics, and planning and co-ordination. Many of the recommendations come within the area of responsibility of other government departments, where they are being given close attention.

I can take the time to list only a few of the recommendations that come within the fields of health and welfare. The following illustrate the range of needs to be covered, and you will note in some instances refer specifically to the Canada Assistance Plan.

Home care programs for the elderly should be greatly extended. They should include medical and nursing care, physiotherapy and other rehabilitative services, and visiting homemakers.

Counselling services provided by local welfare departments to the elderly and others should be a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Municipalities should extend counselling services for old people and develop foster home placement services.

Homemaker services should be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Study should be given by the appropriate authority to the place and function of homes for the aged, and in particular attention should be given to prevailing admission policies, the possibility of alternative accommodation in sheltered semi-independent housing for relatively well ambulant patients, the placing of rehabilitation or "reactivization" programs, and the careful selection and training of staff.

Grants under the health and welfare training programs of the federal government should be used to increase the supply of workers equipped for work in the field of old age.

The welfare branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare should establish a specific division for the purpose of providing technical advice and up-to-date information with regard to day care centres, homemakers, meal services, counselling and such other welfare services for the elderly as come within its terms of reference.

[Mrs. Rideout.]

The Senate report clearly documents the need for the variety of social welfare services proposed, and indicates that, to the extent to which they are provided, older people can be helped to maintain their independence as fully and as long as possible. The Canada Assistance Plan has been specifically designed to give emphasis to the general approach put forward by the Senate committee, but in doing so includes the needs of the total population along with the needs of that particularly deserving group, the aged.

Let me list some examples of services provided for under the plan, and relate them to the aged. First, health care services, including not only medical, surgical and optical and nursing services, but also such important items as drugs and prosthetic appliances. Hon. members will know that one of the more costly items required by many older people is that of drugs, and the federal contribution toward this item alone will help to alleviate the concerns of older people who are presently unable to meet the high cost of medication.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member continues would she allow a question. She has mentioned the question of drugs and the alleviation of the conditions under which so many old people, as well as other people, operate owing to the high cost of drugs. Is she aware of the fact that a request has come from the government of Saskatchewan for the immediate removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on drugs, and what is the attitude of the government in that regard?

Mrs. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the right hon. gentleman's question but I will say only this at the moment. I think he is probably well aware that the committee on the cost of food and drugs is still hearing witnesses and certainly is concerned, as is the right hon. gentleman, about a most important matter.

Second, homes for special care and particularly homes for the aged and nursing homes. Federal contributions will be available not only to help cover the costs of care in such homes, but also of the important services that should be attached to them. I refer here to such services as physiotherapy, occupational therapy and nursing services. In this connection I might also note that federal contributions may be made available toward the cost of day care services which may be set up in conjunction with an institution or separately.

Through such services older people can remain in their own homes but at the same time receive the attention provided in a day care setting.

Third, homemaker services. Particular attention was given by the Senate committee to the importance of homemaker services through which older persons, in their own homes, can be assisted and supported and provided with the help and care needed to enable them to carry on independently and to postpone, as long as possible, the need to enter an institution.

Fourth, counselling services. The Senate committee report also emphasized the importance of various forms of counselling services through which older persons can be given advice and help where needed and can be referred to appropriate services in a community. The plan provides for federal contributions in this respect as well as for other rehabilitation services required by the aged.

In addition to providing for federal contributions toward the costs of providing assistance and welfare services, the bill provides for the Department of National Health and Welfare to make consultative services available to the provinces with respect to the development and operation of assistance and welfare services programs. There are already consultants on the staff of the department, and others will be appointed as soon as qualified persons can be recruited. Particular attention is being and will continue to be paid to the needs of the aged.

May I also say, Mr. Speaker, the Canada Assistance Plan provides a sound basis for the development, extension and improvement of assistance and welfare services for the aged. It acknowledges and provides for the wide variety of needs that older persons face. It contributes toward the research and evaluation needed to assess and develop services in accordance with changing needs. It contributes to the cost of training the skilled personnel required to provide the services. It takes into account the representations put forward by the many organizations who speak for the aged, and represents a major step forward in ensuring that our older citizens can have access to the help needed to enable them to live full, independent and satisfying lives.

If I might, Mr. Speaker, I should like for a few moments to speak about the child welfare program as it is covered in the Canada Assistance Plan. I am sure that all hon. members who have children, as I have, recognize the special care that is needed for the children who are in need, unwanted and uncared for. I wish to take a few moments of the time of the house to speak of this particular aspect of the Canada Assistance Plan which is very near and dear to my heart.

Hon. members will have observed that the plan covers persons under the age of 21 who are in the care or custody or under the control or supervision of a child welfare authority, or who are foster children—that is, children in receipt of assistance but not under the supervision of child welfare agencies.

I understand that some 50,000 children are in the care of child welfare agencies in Canada. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns), a social worker himself with years of experience in charge of an important child welfare agency, emphasized in the speech I mentioned earlier that "one of the difficulties in the welfare structure is the inadequacy of the provision for children," and went on to say: "I must point out that child welfare services have been understaffed all across the land." He knows what he is talking about.

Fifty thousand children. And these are not all that are being helped by child welfare agencies. For example, I believe that something like 13,000 children are placed for adoption each year by our child welfare services in Canada. Still others need placement, and adoption homes might be found for them if more trained staff could be employed.

It has often been pointed out by child welfare agencies that many children who come into their care might have been able to stay in their own homes, or be returned to them without undue delay, if the agencies could provide adequate family rehabilitative services, which all too frequently is not possible because of limited funds. I quote again from the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa who, in referring to child welfare agencies, remarked that: "Those agencies are provided the rehabilitative services concerned with the basic unit in Canadian society—namely, the family" and he indicated that these services were in urgent need of being strengthened. Saving or restoring the family for the child is sound social policy and makes sense from an economic point of view. Here is one place where those who are concerned with the welfare of people and those whose chief interest is in saving money may find themselves on common ground.

This leads me to the important concept of prevention which is a basic feature of the Canada Assistance Plan. We have heard of the dependency cycle and the need to break it at some point. Well, what better point than that of the child. Later may be too late, despite our best efforts. But our success at the point of the child is dependant upon the skill and knowledge to be found in our child welfare agencies and the resources available to them. The Canada Assistance Plan will encourage the development of better services to children and the expansion of resources available to child welfare agencies, such as day-care, homemakers, adoption, casework and other services.

Lately, I have read in the newspapers about the inadequacies in the number of facilities in some provinces for the special care of emotionally disturbed children. Many of these children do not require hospital treatment. What they need is a type of non-medical special care which normally comes under welfare auspices. This is provided in a number of institutions across Canada, some being former orphanages which have now developed specialized programs for this type of child. These would be covered under the plan.

There are other children who may suffer disturbances and may need treatment under medical auspices, and there are still others whose needs are for correctional care or better educational facilities. Provision for these types of need lies outside the scope of the Canada Assistance Plan and belongs elsewhere.

However, the better the job that is done by the child welfare services, including the special care for emotionally disturbed children, the less need there will be for hospital treatment and correctional facilities for children and, I might add, for adults. I believe it makes good sense to aid in the development of these vitally needed services.

The integration of child welfare into a comprehensive welfare plan for all Canadians is a step forward and basic to a fully-rounded program designed to help meet the needs of people. The coverage by the Canada Assistance Plan of children who are in need of social assistance and welfare services complements the federal government's existing income support measures for children—namely, family allowances, family assistance—that is, the family allowance program for children from abroad during their first year in Canada—and youth allowances.

[Mrs. Rideout.]

I have attempted to point up the various ways in which the Canada Assistance Plan supports the provision of assistance and welfare services for children, and I am sure that hon. members will agree that federal funds devoted to this purpose will be well spent. But the Canada Assistance Plan is also an integrating measure. Up to now, child welfare services have been largely provided by agencies or departments which direct their entire attention to children. This focus can now be shifted and attention given to the needs of children as members of a family unit, with the objective of helping to keep families together and prevent the need for the care of children outside their own homes.

The close integration of child welfare with public assistance and its related welfare services is an objective which has been advocated by all provinces. It represents a major step forward in ensuring that the needs of people of all ages can be properly and effectively met.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with discussion I had with members of our party this afternoon I would ask that government order No. 48 be called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the house agree to having government order No. 48 called at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN LIVESTOCK FEED BOARD

ASSISTANCE IN STORAGE AND TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a corporation, to be known as the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, for the purpose of assisting livestock feeders in eastern Canada and British Columbia; to empower the board to make payments related to the cost of feed grain storage in eastern Canada and payments related to the cost of feed grain transportation to or for the benefit of livestock feeders in eastern Canada and British Columbia, to enter into arrangements for the purpose of ensuring the availability at reasonable prices of adequate supplies of feed grain for such livestock feeders, and when authorized by the governor in council to enter into direct marketing operations in feed grain; to provide for the administration of the said board and for the establishment of an advisory committee; and to provide that all expenditures in connection with the said measure, other than those related to direct marketing operations, will be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament therefor and that any expenditures related to direct marketing operations in feed grain will be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to an account to be known as the Canadian Livestock Feed Board account, the amount of any such expenditure to be charged to the said account not to exceed the amount by which ten million dollars exceeds the balance of the said account plus any amount advanced to the board as authorized by the governor in council pursuant to the said measure.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sauvé thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-218 to provide assistance to Livestock Feeders in Eastern Canada and British Columbia.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while we are taking this means of co-operating in order to allow the bill to come up for second reading, it cannot be implied by that, that all the terms therein are agreed to by Her Majesty's Opposition.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. McIlraith: I can only say that on Monday hon. members should be prepared to deal with any of the items on the order paper. We shall deal first with legislation, subject only to our right to adjust the order so as to have certain business completed here and sent to the other place. We shall start with the measure presently before the house, the Canada Assistance Plan, then deal with the income tax bill, the crop insurance bill and the National Arts Centre bill. Having disposed of those I hope hon. members will be ready to deal with the other items in any order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could the minister say when the long interred, and now recently disinterred Bank Act amendments, will come before the house?

Mr. McIlraith: At the first available opportunity we can get. I have been trying to get an opportunity to have that item called for some days now. I would not wish to have it called before the other bills which have to go to the other place, but I would hope it could be called on Monday.

Mr. Churchill: Have you the assurance of the hon. member for Davenport in regard to that?

Mr. McIlraith: I am perfectly sure, on this eve of what I hope will be a very pleasant holiday to all hon. members, that we can have it brought forward at the earliest opportunity, and I hope that will be on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I hope by Monday you will have decided on the extra $25 for the old age pensioners.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to special order made Wednesday, June 29, and in accordance with provisional standing order 2(4), this house stands adjourned until 2.30 o'clock on the afternoon of Monday next.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 4, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF AGREEMENT AND NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND BULGARIA

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in French and in English, copies of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the People's Republic of Bulgaria relating to the settlement of financial matters, and copies of exchanges of notes between Canada and Bulgaria dealing with consular matters and with the establishment of diplomatic relations between our two countries.

QUEBEC—TABLING OF REPORT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Labour agreed to table at the first opportunity the report of Judge Lippé who acted as mediator in the recent longshoremen's strike. In his unavoidable absence I should like to ask the permission of the house to table that report now in English and in French.

Mr. Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BROADCASTING

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of now offering to table before the house a bilingual copy of broadcasting (radiodiffusion) 1966.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish an immigration appeal board and to make provision for appeals thereto in respect of certain matters relating to immigration and to provide for the appointment, remuneration and expenses of the members of the board and the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the conduct of the work of the board.

Motion agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF ARCTIC WILDLIFE

Question No. 1,563—Mr. Johnston:

Are any steps being taken to prevent extinction of various forms of Arctic wildlife, particularly the polar bear, as a result of unrestricted hunting made possible by modern development of snowmobiles and air transport and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. I am informed by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories as follows: Yes. Three important species of Arctic wildlife, muskoxen, caribou and polar bear, have been declared by the governor in council to be species in danger of extinction. The muskox has been protected from hunting by legislation since 1917. Only male caribou over one year of age may be hunted in the Northwest Territories east of the Mackenzie river, and caribou meat fit for human consumption must not be wasted. Female polar bears with cubs under one year of age are protected throughout the Northwest Territories except Banks island, Victoria island and the Mackenzie District. Under the Northwest Territories game ordinance and regulations no persons are permitted to hunt game from an aircraft or from a motor vehicle. Furthermore, only Indians, Eskimos and a very limited number of white trappers with historic rights are permitted to hunt and trap wildlife in most regions of the Northwest Territories. Further legislation to provide additional protection for polar bears and other Arctic wildlife is now under consideration.

Questions

EXPO '67—EMPLOYMENT OF STUDENTS

Question No. 1,580—Mr. Sherman:

Will any students at the university and high school level be employed at Expo '67 and, if so (a) how many (b) in what capacities is it intended that these students will be employed (c) from what regions of the country will these students be drawn (d) will preference be given to any particular students on the basis of region or language?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): (a) The corporation and other employers on the site of the exhibition will employ students at the university and high school levels providing these students meet the employment criteria established for the positions in which they wish to be employed. As there are no classes of employment specifically reserved for students and as the criteria to be met vary widely, it is difficult to determine the number of students that will be employed. However, it is presently estimated that the corporation will employ some 650 students and the concessionaires a further 2,300. In addition, it is estimated that some 300 students may be employed by the exhibitors in supporting type services.

(b) Certain students may be employed in skilled capacities such as translators or interpreters. However, the vast majority will be employed in semi-skilled and unskilled capacities such as: entrance attendants, parking attendants, ushers, maintenance men, hostesses, guides, clerks, cleaners, information agents, protective agents, platform guards, typists, identification officers, gardeners, ride attendants, area representatives, ship attendants, messengers, waiters, restaurant help.

(c) A program for the recruitment of a special category of personnel comprising 225 hostesses and 30 male guides, geographically representative of Canada as a whole, has been planned and is being implemented to greet visitors to the exhibition.

(d) No preference will be given on the basis of regional origin insofar as this is feasible. The corporation will attempt to recruit students or other employees on a national basis. Ability to speak more than one language will be considered an asset in view of the international character of the exhibition.

INVESTIGATION RESPECTING C.N.R. WORK FORCE, NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 1,602—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has the Canadian National Railways commissioned anyone to investigate the sociological, psychological and economic issues involved in reference to the 800 to 900 person Canadian National Railway work force at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, as stated by Professor Roy E. George, to the Canadian Industrial Relations Institute at Toronto recently and, if so (a) who has been commissioned (b) what time will be entailed in the carrying out of such study and how soon will a report be available and to whom will the commission report (c) as a result of any aforementioned study, will jobs be provided for the unemployed workers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The Canadian National Railways has signed an agreement with the International Longshoremen's Association and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for the carrying out of a complete investigation into various issues involved in the reduction of the longshore work force at North Sydney which is anticipated to take place during the next three years. (a) The studies are being carried out by a joint union-management committee with Professor Roy E. George as research director. (b) It is anticipated that the studies will be continuous until the completion of the change-over to the new ferry service. Informal confidential reports of the studies are being made from time to time to the Canadian National Railways, to the union, and to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and action is already underway to implement some of the conclusions of the earlier part of the studies, particularly in the area of retraining for other work. (c) It is confidently expected that the various measures developed out of these studies will result in satisfactory re-employment for the individuals displaced.

EXPO '67—ADVERTISING OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 1,607—Mr. Allmand:

1. Has there been an advertising program for Expo '67 in countries other than Canada?

2. If so (a) in what countries has this advertising program taken place (b) what has been the nature of this advertising program?

3. Do the directors of Expo '67 intend to advertise in an intensive way and, if so, when?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Yes.

2. This advertising program has taken place in the following countries: (a and b) (i) General advertising telling the over-all story of Expo '67 has appeared to date in 1966 in major circulation magazines in the U.S.A., Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Australia, Japan, South America, India, Sweden, Norway, Finland and Denmark. (ii) Advertising dealing with the promotion of the business development bureau of Expo '67 has appeared to date in special editions of major newspapers in the U.S.A., England, France, Israel and Italy. (iii) Advertising of the advance passport of admission sales program has appeared in trade publications to help recruit distributors in Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium and Denmark. (N.B.: the program of advertising to recruit distributors in the United States is being carried on behalf of Expo '67 by American Express Co. Ltd.). Advertising to promote the advance admission sales program to the general public has appeared to date in 1966 as follows:

In the U.S.A. in major circulation magazines.

In co-operation with the American Express Company who paid 50 per cent of the cost in Life Magazine issue of May 20, a full page advertisement in colour. In addition, in 12 regions covering the northeastern area of the United States, from Washington north and Chicago east, an eight page full colour booklet was inserted into the magazine besides the full page advertisement. In most magazines published in Great Britain, Switzerland, Japan, Mexico, New Zealand, Arabia, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Greece, the Middle East, and many countries in Africa and South America.

3. The advertising program approved by the corporation's board of directors for the year 1966 includes extensive advertising of Expo '67 in the U.S.A. and in special supplements and editions in magazines and newspapers throughout the world. In the U.S.A., advertising will appear in newspapers, magazines, radio and television. It is estimated that 57 per cent of Expo '67 visitors will come from the U.S.A. An advertising program is now being finalized for 1967 and will include extensive advertising of Expo '67 until the mid-summer of 1967 throughout Canada and the U.S.A. Advertising abroad is now being planned on behalf of Expo '67 by the Canadian government centennial commission, by the Canadian travel bureau, the tourist bureaus of the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, etc., and by Canadian businesses such as Air Canada, Canadian General Electric, International Nickel Company, etc., and by American and other firms such as American Express, Moore McCormack Lines, B.O.A.C., Air France, etc. Extensive coverage is also received in press radio and TV all over the world through information services.

Questions

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 1,615—Mr. Thompson:

1. What was the total amount paid in interest on the Canadian federal debt in (a) 1964-65 (b) 1965-66?

2. What portion of this amount was paid directly to individual Canadian citizens?

3. What portion of this amount was paid to the Bank of Canada for bonds and treasury bills held by the Bank of Canada?

4. What portion of this amount was paid to (a) financial institutions of Canada, including the Bank of Canada (b) all other Canadian corporations (c) corporations outside Canada (d) financial institutions outside Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. The interest paid on government of Canada debt including treasury bills was $802.6 million in the fiscal year 1964-65 and $832.0 million in 1965-66.

2 and 4. A substantial part of government of Canada debt is in the form of bearer securities rather than being registered in the name of the owners and for this reason it is not possible to compute the total amount of interest paid to different categories of investor. The following estimated distribution of the outstanding amount of government of Canada direct and guaranteed debt, however, will give a rough indication of the distribution of interest payments.

Estimated holdings of government of Canada direct and guaranteed debt

	As at December 31
	1963	1964	1965
Total	20,276	20,733	20,681

3. The amounts paid to the Bank of Canada were $118.5 million in 1964-65 and $132.4 million in 1965-66.

Questions

FAMILIES LIVING IN THREE ROOMS OR LESS

Question No. 1,621—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Of the total Canadian population, how many families live in houses of three rooms or less?

2. Of the total Indian population, how many families live in houses of three rooms or less?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Northern Affairs and National Resources as follows:

1. The 1961 census provides the following information: Total number of households in Canada, 4,554,493; households with 3 rooms or less, 628,376.

2. 14,839 families, according to a survey conducted by the Indian affairs branch in March, 1965.

FAMILIES LIVING IN HOMES WITH FACILITIES

Question No. 1,622—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Of the total Canadian population, how many live in homes which are provided with (a) electricity (b) sewer service or septic tanks (c) running water (d) indoor baths?

2. Of the total Indian population, how many live in homes which are provided with (a) electricity (b) sewer service or septic tanks (c) running water (d) indoor baths?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Northern Affairs and National Resources as follows:

1. The 1961 census provides the following information:

Total number of households in Canada, 4,554,493; Households with (a) Electricity, I/; (b) municipal sewer or septic tanks, 3,850,-879; (c) running water, 4,058,313; (d) installed bath or shower, 3,659,520.

I/ Not available from 1961 census.

(a) In 1963, it was estimated that 4,608,000 households out of a total of 4,671,000 households (excluding the Yukon and Northwest Territories; households of Indians living on reserves; collective type households; and households living in non-permanent dwellings) had electricity.

2. Houses having facilities according to a survey conducted by the Indian affairs branch —March 1965:

(a) Electricity, 12,773; (b) sewer service or septic tanks, 2,676; (c) running water, 4,112; (d) indoor baths, 2,048.

[Mr. Sharp.]

The number of persons living in these houses was not tabulated. However, taking the average size family as six persons, the number of persons in each category is estimated as follows:

(a) electricity, 76,638; (b) sewer service or septic tanks, 16,056; (c) running water, 24,672; (d) indoor baths, 12,288.

The new $112,000,000 physical community development program announced in the House on March 17, 1966 will provide for more than 12,000 new homes and extension of electricity, sanitation, sewer service and other facilities so as to raise the housing conditions on reserves to approximate average Canadian standards over the next five years.

CATTLE QUARANTINE SERVICE

Question No. 1,633—Mr. Ormiston:

1. What is the cost of maintaining quarantine operations where Charolais cattle are kept on entry into Canada?

2. What was the number of Charolais cattle passing through quarantine in the years 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965 and 1966 to the present date?

3. What charge, if any, is made against the private owner of cattle for quarantine services?

4. What other types of animals have been quarantined during the above-mentioned period and what are the numbers in each case?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The department provides the quarantine facilities. All costs for transportation, care, and feed are borne by the importer.

2. Import records are not maintained on a breed basis. However, it is known that 109 head of Charolais cattle entered Canada through Grosse Ile in 1965/66.

3. No charges have been made for quarantine services. For the forthcoming year cattle entering through the maximum quarantine station at Grosse Ile will be assessed $5 per head per day for a maximum of 90 days and importers will be required to pay costs of all special tests.

4. The following animals underwent quarantine for importation into Canada:

	Cattle	Sheep	Swine	Goat	Deer
1963/64	336	7	38
1964/65	147		15
1965/66	198	8	4		3

EXPO '67—DUPLICATION OF MAILED PUBLICITY

Question No. 1,679—Mr. Mather:

Have complaints been received by the Expo administration as to the duplication of publicity mailings?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Several such complaints have been received and in all such instances immediate steps have been taken to correct the mailing lists.

USE OF CANADIAN MAILS TO DEFRAUD

Question No. 1,680—Mr. Aiken:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Postmaster General to control the use of Canadian postal services by Canadian or American citizens operating mail order businesses in Canada and advertising in the United States?

2. Has the Postmaster General or have any of his officials been approached by United States postal authorities with a view to co-ordinating the control activities of the United States and Canadian postal services?

3. Has the Postmaster General of the United States or any official on his behalf communicated with the Postmaster General of Canada or any of his officials with regard to prohibiting the use of the mails in the area of Canadian-based mail order operations fraudulently soliciting money from United States citizens.

4. Have there been any successful prosecutions anywhere in Canada under section 306 of the Criminal Code of Canada which is designed to prevent the publication of false advertisements?

5. Has the Postmaster General made any representations to the Minister of Justice with a view to amending the Criminal Code to accomplish the purposes outlined in section 306?

6. Is the Postmaster General in the process of preparing amendments to section 7 of the Post Office Act to enable him to effectively control the use of the Canadian mails for unlawful purposes?

7. During the past three years have any "foreign fraud orders" under section 4005 of title 39 United States code, been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General by the Postmaster General of the United States and, if so, how many?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. When evidence is received or complaints made that the Canadian mails are being used for illegal purposes, investigation is instituted by the Post Office Department with a view to determining whether the circumstances justify the issuance of an interim prohibitory order under the provisions of section 7 of the Post Office Act.

3. No.

4. None, in so far as the Canada Post Office is concerned.

5. No.

6. No. The present provisions of section 7 of the Post Office Act are considered satisfactory for control purposes.

7. As a result of regularly receiving copies of the United States Weekly Postal Bulletin, the Canada Post Office Department was made aware of the fact that during the period June, 1963 to May, 1966 inclusive, 31 fraud orders were issued by the United States postal administration against persons or firms residing in Canada.

U.S. MAIL FOREIGN FRAUD ORDERS

Question No. 1,681—Mr. Aiken:

1. Did the Postmaster General of the United States or any official on his behalf advise the Postmaster General of Canada or any of his officials that the following foreign fraud orders were issued against the following individuals and/or companies for "conducting a scheme for obtaining money through the mails by means of false and fraudulent pretenses, representations and promises in violation of section 4005 of title 39, United States code" and, if so, on what dates (a) foreign fraud order No. 65-178, dated October 14, 1965, against Export Warehouse; Alberta Seed Company; Specific; Arthur Darrell Huckerby, manager; A. D. Huckerby, and their agents as such, at Calgary, Alberta, Canada; against whose principals foreign fraud order No. 62-137 was issued May 23, 1962, under the names Mushroom Salt Co., and Dehydrated Products and Chemicals at Calgary, Alberta, Canada (b) foreign fraud order No. 65-182, dated November 2, 1965, directed against O.S.C.A., director, O.S.C.A. and Ontario Sporting Club Alliance at Toronto, Ontario, Canada; listed as a subsidiary of The Great Northern Pulp Group Ltd., Hugh J. Bruce, president—directors John Heaven, Terence Howes and Barbara Heaven (c) foreign fraud order No. 65-185, dated November 8, 1965, directed against Bestyet Books, 189 Henry avenue No. 3, Winnipeg 2, Canada; principal or principals unknown (d) foreign fraud order No. 65-197, dated December 23, 1965, directed against Mr. Gerald Buell, 624 Lorne street, New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, Canada (e) foreign fraud order No. 66-44, dated January 21, 1966, directed against John Able, 207½ Fort street, Apt. 21, Winnipeg 1, Canada; principal or principals unknown (f) foreign fraud order No. 66-60, dated February 24, 1966, directed against L. Pereira, 3 Golfdown Drive, Rexdale, Ontario, Canada (g) foreign fraud order No. 66-67, dated March 11, 1966, directed against Newton Vale—Studio N.R., 160 Bay St., Toronto, Ontario, Canada; against whose principal foreign fraud orders No. 61-122 (May 8, 1961), No. 62-14 (March 23, 1962), No. 63-42 (March 26, 1963), and No. 64-255 (November 3, 1965) were issued?

2. In each of the above cases, did the Postmaster General initiate any action under section 7 of the Post Office Act which provides for the issuance of interim or final prohibitory orders denying the use of Canadian postal services to persons who are using the mails for unlawful purposes?

3. Was an investigation undertaken in each case?

4. If so, what were the results of these investigations?

Questions

5. Was either an interim or final prohibitory order issued in any of the above cases?

6. If so, on what dates?

7. Were the principals and/or the companies named in the above foreign fraud orders enjoying free and unencumbered use of the Canadian mails on June 1, 1966?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. As a result of the regular receipt of copies of the United States Weekly Postal Bulletin, the Canada post office was made aware on the dates shown below of the issuance of the fraud orders mentioned. (a) October 21, 1965, (b) November 11, 1965; (c) November 18, 1965; (d) December 30, 1965; (e) January 27, 1966; (f) March 3, 1966; (g) March 17, 1966.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. Evidence or information received was not considered sufficient in any of the above cases to justify action being taken under the provisions of section 7 of the Post Office Act.

5. No.

6. See answer to No. 5.

7. Yes.

POSTMASTER CLASSIFICATIONS AND SALARIES, KENT COUNTY, ONT.

Question No. 1,689—Mr. Danforth:

1. What are the present work classifications and rates of pay of postmasters at the following post offices in Kent county, Ontario (a) Grande Pointe (b) Bear Line (c) Dover Centre?

2. What was the rate of pay to each postmaster in 1963?

3. How often have each of these positions been reclassified since 1963 and what were the reasons?

4. Have there been any pay increases to any of these postmasters since 1963 and, if so, what was the date of increase and the amount of each?

5. Has the work classification in these three post offices been carried out on a total weight basis and, if not, for what reason?

6. Are newspapers, daily or weekly, included in the work classification, and (a) if not, for what reasons (b) if so, will they affect the present classification?

7. Has the work classification in each of these three offices been carried out on exactly the same basis and, if not, what are the differences, in detail?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. The present classification of the offices concerned is determined by a work load survey as follows:

	Class	Salary per annum
(a) Grande Pointe	Group 7	$1,360.
(b) Bear Line	Group 9	$1,885.
(c) Dover Centre	Group 12	$2,115.

2. (a) Grande Pointe, not established until 17-6-64; (b) Bear Line, $1,885. per annum; (c) Dover Centre, $1,350. per annum.

3. (a) Grande Pointe, once from Group 6 to 7 effective 1-6-65. Increase in work load; (b) Bear Line, once from Group 12 to 9 effective 1-9-64. Decrease in work load; no change in salary; (c) Dover Centre, once from Group 8 to 12 effective 1-10-64. Increase in work load.

4. (a) Grande Pointe, $1,080. to $1,170. ($90.) effective 1-10-64; $1,170. to $1,315. ($145.) effective 1-6-65; $1,315. to $1,360. ($45.) effective 1-8-65; (b) Bear Line, No change. (c) Dover Centre, $1,350. to $1,885. ($535.) effective 1-10-64; $1,885. to $2,035. ($150.) effective 1-10-64; $2,035. to $2,115. ($80.) effective 1-8-65.

5. Yes, the classification of these offices was determined as a result of work load surveys which gives the postmaster credit for each function performed.

6. Yes. (b) The number of newspapers handled, as well as other duties performed by the postmaster, are contributing factors to the eventual classification arrived at.

7. Yes.

GROSSE ILE CATTLE QUARANTINE STATION

Question No. 1,713—Mr. McCutcheon:

1. Is the Grosse Ile quarantine station prepared to receive shipments of cattle from abroad at the present time?

2. Are new arrivals expected and, if so, when?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The maximum security quarantine station a Grosse Ile is being prepared to receive importations of cattle from France.

2. Providing the disease situation in France continues to remain favourable, the next shipment is expected to arrive at the Grosse Ile quarantine station early in October, 1966.

CHARTER OF JAPANESE TRAWLER FOR WHALING SURVEY

Question No. 1,715—Mr. McCleave:

1. Did the Department of Fisheries, or any other department or agency of the federal government, recently charter the Japanese trawler Kyo Maru to conduct a survey of the whaling fishery in the North Atlantic and, if so, what are the terms of the charter?

2. Were tenders called for the above-mentioned charter, and (a) if so, how many responses were there, and by whom (b) if not, what was the reason?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. Yes. To carry out exploratory work and demonstration of modern whale catching techniques and methods. The owners are to receive $12,000 for a period of six months, and are permitted to retain and dispose of, at a Canadian port or ports, all whales caught. The agreement provides that the vessel will be operated under the general direction and control of a designated representative of the minister.

2. No. A vessel of the type required was unavailable in Canada.

SHARES AND DEPOSITS, CAISSES POPULAIRES AND CREDIT UNIONS

Question No. 1,723—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What were the total amounts of registered shares and deposits in the caisses populaires and credit unions in 1965?

2. Has this detail been omitted from the list of "financial assets held by the public", as shown in the annual report of the Bank of Canada for 1964?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. This information is not yet available for 1965 and there is at present no reliable basis for forecasting it. At the end of 1964 the total amount of caisses populaires and credit union shares was $853 million and the amount of deposits was $1,128 million, making a total of $1,983 million.

2. I am informed that an estimate of $1,900 million for 1964 was included in the table entitled "General Public Holdings of Certain Financial Assets" in the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada for 1964, and because of the difficulty of making a reliable forecast, this category of financial assets was not included in the comparable table in the 1965 report.

PARKING TICKETS, PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 1,727—Mr. Godin:

1. How many parking tickets were issued on Parliament Hill during 1965?

2. How many of these tickets were taken back by the R.C.M.P. following explanations given by the alleged offenders?

3. What was the total revenue from these tickets?

4. Who received the revenue from these tickets?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. 2,753.

2. None.

3. $2,871.

4. The city of Ottawa.

COMMUNITY PASTURES AND RESERVOIRS

Question No. 1,728—Mr. Godin:

1. Under the PFRA, how many acres of land have been used as community pastures in (a) Manitoba (b) Saskatchewan (c) Alberta (d) Quebec?

2. Under the same plan, how many reservoirs or dams for irrigation or watering of livestock received subsidies of $300 to $600 in the provinces of (a) Manitoba (b) Saskatchewan (c) Alberta (d) Quebec?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act are applicable only in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

1. (a) Manitoba, 391,124 acres; (b) Saskatchewan, 1,782,073 acres; (c) Alberta, 145,280 acres; (d) Quebec, See note above.

2. (a) Manitoba, 17,268; (b) Saskatchewan, 59,691; (c) Alberta, 18,988; (d) Quebec, See note above.

RESEARCH GRANTS, QUEEN MARY HOSPITAL STAFF, MONTREAL

Question No. 1,730—Mr. Allard:

1. Were any members of the medical staff at the Queen Mary veterans' hospital in Montreal granted research funds by the Defence Research Board and the medical research council in 1964-1965 and, if so, who were they?

2. For each of the members of this medical staff, what was in 1965, the amount of funds granted for research?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC UNDER STUDENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 1,731—Mr. Dionne:

1. In what form and in what amount has fiscal compensation been made to the province of Quebec following the adoption of the Canada Student Loans Act?

2. How many students in each province of the country have received loans under this act?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Section 12 of the Canada Student Loans Act provides for alternative payments to a province in respect of a loan year (payable within six months after the end of that loan year) where that province advised the Minister of Finance that it would operate its own student loans plan and that it would not participate in the Canada student loans plan during that loan year. The amount of the payment to a non-participating province is to be that proportion of the total actual payments to lenders during that loan year (net after recoveries) which the non-participating province's population in the 18-24 year age group bears to that of the participating provinces. Payment to Quebec under this section of the act in the amount of $74,262 was made in the fall of 1965 in respect of the first loan year of the plan which ended June 30, 1965.

2. A total of 42,113 students received certificates of eligibility authorizing student loans in the first loan year ended June 30, 1965 as follows: Newfoundland, 737; Prince Edward Island, 437; Nova Scotia, 2,513; New Brunswick, 2,027; Ontario, 21,920; Manitoba, 2,272; Saskatchewan, 2,992; Alberta, 4,519; British Columbia, 4,675; Yukon, 12; Northwest Territories, 9; Total: 42,113.

A total of 50,419 students received certificates of eligibility authorizing student loans in the first nine months of the second loan year as follows: Newfoundland, 1,314; Prince Edward Island, 613; Nova Scotia, 3,767; New Brunswick, 2,988; Ontario, 20,022; Manitoba, 3,431; Saskatchewan, 4,830; Alberta, 6,333; British Columbia, 7,090; Yukon, 23; Northwest Territories, 8; Total: 50,419.

FISHING VESSEL CREWS, ATLANTIC COAST

Question No. 1,753—Mr. Howard:

1. How many fishing vessels operating out of Canadian ports in (a) Nova Scotia (b) New Brunswick (c) Newfoundland, are manned by crews which contain other than Canadian citizens?

2. How many of the said vessels were subsidized in any way from the federal treasury?

3. Is there any intention on the part of the government to extend to other provinces the provision of the British Columbia fishery regulations to the effect that a licence may be granted only to a company incorporated under the laws of Canada or to a person who is a Canadian citizen or who has served in the Canadian armed forces and, if so, when will such an extension take place?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. Not available.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. At the present no consideration is being given to this matter.

EXPERIMENTAL HOUSING PROGRAM, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 1,761—Mr. Korchinski:

1. As of June 21, 1966, how many houses have been bought by enfranchised Indians and Métis in Northern Saskatchewan under the experimental housing program?

[Mr. Sharp.]

2. What are the localities in which the houses are situated?

3. How many houses are in each of these localities?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1. Of 36 houses approved as of June 21, 1966 under the experimental housing program in northern Saskatchewan, 35 houses were bought by enfranchised Indians and metis. The sale of the remaining house did not proceed and was withdrawn from the program.

2. Seven houses are located in Air Ronge, two in La Ronge, ten in Buffalo Narrows, ten in Île-à-la-Crosse, three in Beauval and three in Cumberland House.

3. See answer to 2 above.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POLICING METHODS ON INDIAN RESERVES

Question No. 1,366—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Are any Indian reservations in Canada policed by special R.C.M.P. constables of Indian origin and, if so, which ones?

2. Is any other method of policing used and, if so (a) what is that method (b) how many reservations are involved?

Return tabled.

PURCHASES BY CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 1,485—Mr. Caouette:

1. What amount of purchasing is made annually by (a) C.N.R. (b) Air Canada (c) Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation (d) C.B.C. (e) Polymer Corporation Ltd. (f) Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd.?

2. What proportion of this sum represents the purchase of (a) Canadian products (b) foreign products, for each of these companies?

3. Do the aforesaid crown corporations give preference to a company whose major business is carried out in Canada even though its bid is not the lowest and, if so, by virtue of what authority?

Return tabled.

WINTER WORKS STATISTICS

Question No. 1,603—Mr. Allard:

1. What was the value of the winter works programs carried out in each province in the years 1964, 1965 and 1966?

2. What is the value of the winter works programs carried out in each municipality in the province of Quebec in the years 1964, 1965 and 1966?

3. With regard to the population of each province, what percentage of federal expenditure is incurred for winter works?

Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TAKEN FOLLOWING U.S. BOMBING OF NORTH VIET NAM CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked the Prime Minister whether the government would look favourably on the request that some day this week we be given an opportunity in this house to discuss the Viet Nam situation. While there has been no answer in that regard as yet and no opportunity to debate this matter, there are a number of questions that I should like to place before the Prime Minister at this time.

Over the week end or within the last few days the President of the United States said in Omaha that one should count ten before dissenting from United States policy in Viet Nam. I ask the Prime Minister, in view of the expansion of bombing that has quite fearful, dark and ominous dimensions and the possibility of a world war, whether the government of Canada has directly endeavoured to exert its moral influence upon the United States to exercise a degree of restraint in expanding the bombing operations; and whether any steps have been taken in the last few days that would indicate that the North Vietnamese are prepared in any way to allow for the convening of a conference so that this ever increasing and frightening threat to world peace might have some hope of being removed.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first half of my right hon. friend's question, the possibility of a discussion of this matter in the house before any recess is being considered by myself and my colleagues. One possible way of arranging for a debate would be when interim supply is requested; but we will be discussing this matter tomorrow morning at a cabinet meeting.

So far as other questions are concerned, our position on the matter of the bombing of North Viet Nam has been made clear to the United States government recently, indeed over the week end. I said in the house that we regretted the extension of the bombing, and that remains our position. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think no government has pressed harder for an end to hostilities in Viet Nam by negotiation than this government, and we will perhaps continue so to press.

Perhaps I may be permitted, because of the seriousness of the question, to repeat what I said publicly on May 1:

> There seems to me to be one overriding consideration here; not who is responsible for what, but how can the fighting and the slaughter and the suffering be ended and the people of that distressed land be allowed to live their lives in peace and freedom in a political society of their own choice without outside interference in making that choice, and outside pressures after the choice has been made.

I then went on to say, and this remains my view:

> The first concrete step in this direction would be a cease fire, or a more formal armistice agreement, put into effect as part of a wider pattern of peace negotiations without prior conditions.
> Once the cease fire was in effect and as negotiations progressed, equivalent and phased withdrawals from South Viet Nam by North Viet Nam and by the forces of other governments could take place under international supervision.

I can only reiterate, Mr. Speaker, the hope that a cease fire can be arranged which would bring an end not only to bombing from the air but also to shooting on the ground, and that negotiations can begin. I sincerely hope that with negotiations under way the process of phased withdrawal on both sides could begin.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, has there been any reaction to the visitation by Mr. Chester Ronning which would indicate that the North Vietnamese have any feeling or attitude of mind that might lead the right hon. gentleman to believe there is any hope at the moment of a conference being convened?

Mr. Pearson: It is impossible to be optimistic at the moment in regard to an early convening of any such conference. However, while it is impossible to be optimistic, it would be most regrettable if we ceased in any way to work for such a conference. That remains our policy.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the widespread concern that has been expressed by prominent world figures such as Senator Robert Kennedy, does the Prime Minister not consider that the United States would be more fully seized of the gravity of the situation if the Canadian government formally expressed disapproval of the escalation of the war by the bombing of the Hanoi and Haiphong areas?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: This government, with the support of the house I am sure, is engaged in a continuing process of trying to bring about negotiations. Because of our position on the international truce commission, and because we have been able to enlist the services of a very experienced negotiator in these matters, and in the midst of an effort to bring about negotiations, I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it would be desirable for me to comment any more than is required on the policies of either side in this dispute. We have already indicated our regret at the extension of the bombing, and I prefer to leave it at that at this moment.

Mr. Douglas: I rise on a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether Canada is endeavouring to have its two colleagues on the international control commission, India and Poland, join with us in another attempt to reconvene the Geneva accord powers in the hope that this could be the beginning of a basis for negotiations.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we are doing everything we can to secure an appropriate role for the commission in this regard, and that requires continuous consultation with the other members of the commission.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask a supplementary question on the same subject, but addressed to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister undertake to give to the House of Commons, at the opening of the debate on external affairs if we have one, a military appreciation of the situation in Viet Nam so that full information will be available to all hon. members with regard to the nature of the war, its extent and the prospects at the present time?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I would find some difficulty in doing that, in view of the fact that much of the information we have in respect of the war is from sources outside of Canada, from the United States in particular. If my hon. friend would really like to have an appreciation of the situation there it might be that we could arrange a private meeting at which information could be given. Since most of the information is classified and comes from sources outside the country, it would be difficult for me to give an appreciation which would be really usable without compromising the information received from other sources.

FINANCE

QUEBEC—SALE OF BONDS ON U.S. MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can the minister tell the house whether the Quebec government's decision to float a $50 million bond issue on the United States market will result in the cancellation of the recent decision of the federal Minister of Finance to redeem Canadian bonds held on the United States market?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I tried to rise at the end of the written question period, Mr. Speaker, but I did not catch your eye. I should like to ask the government house leader if he will use his good offices to secure answers to questions currently on the order paper. There are some 37 pages of them, less the 28 that were answered today, numbering down to 894 and dating back to March 1.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): I would be very glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—REMOVAL OF FORCES FROM FRANCE AND ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that President de Gaulle has ordered all foreign military installations out of France by April 1, 1967, will the minister indicate the approximate date on which our forces will be moved from Marville and Metz, and the new bases to which they will be assigned?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): This matter has been given serious consideration by the government. I expect we will be in a position to make an announcement shortly. I think perhaps it would be better to wait until the details have been determined rather than give a statement to the house at this time.

Mr. Crouse: May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. I know he realizes that the maintenance of our aircraft is a highly sophisticated business, and it could well be that the ground crews would be thinking more of moving their wives and furniture than of maintaining the aircraft flown by our pilots. This could lead to serious problems. I ask the minister if he would recognize the urgency of this matter and reach a decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Hellyer: That is precisely one of the problems; I am determined to make every effort to assure that whatever moves are made will be made during the summer period so they will not disrupt the schooling of the children. This is one of the technicalities that is being worked out. As soon as it can be done I will inform the house. I should like to try, if we can, to inform the people concerned simultaneously or approximately at the same time as the information is made public.

[Later:]

Mr. Crouse: I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence arising out of the answer he gave to me some moments ago. When our forces are moved from Metz and Marville, is it the government's intention to maintain our eight squadrons of Starfighters in Europe in a nuclear strike role?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a question of general policy, and I doubt whether it should be asked at this time.

AIRPORTS

SYDNEY, N.S.—POSSIBLE OPERATION ON PART TIME BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport prompted by a radio newscast over the week end to the effect that the operation of the airport at Sydney will be placed on a part time basis, namely, closing each night at midnight. May I ask the minister if he, as the minister concerned, is in a position to confirm or deny these reports?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the hon. gentleman if he would interest himself to the extent of inquiring about what may be the future for the operation of the airport, and report to the house?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be delighted to do so.

TELEVISION

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF NEW REGULATIONS ON COMMUNITY ANTENNA SYSTEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the regulations recommended in the white paper on broadcasting just tabled, would the hon. lady say what effect they will have on C.A.T.V. systems, where they have a number of United States channels and a number of Canadian channels. Will these regulations in any way affect the viewing of the United States channels?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts whether this question can be asked at this time. This is a matter of a very general character, and I suggest to the hon. member that it cannot be asked now.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State whether she intends to refer the white paper to the committee on broadcasting.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do intend to do that, I would hope in the fall. If there is no summer adjournment, of course, then there is no reason why it should not be referred almost immediately.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): A supplementary question. May I ask the Secretary of State whether it is the intention to introduce during this session—I do not mean prior to adjournment but at this session of parliament—legislation to give effect to the recommendations of the government which are contained in the white paper, so that the white paper and a proposed bill would be before the committee? Will that be done at this session?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I would not think they would be referred together; but whether a bill is introduced during 1966 would certainly depend on the progress made by the committee with the white paper in the fall.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA FOLLOWING BOMB TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell us whether the Canadian government, as a Pacific power and as one having a special relationship with France, has made any representation to the government of France protesting the recent bomb test in the south Pacific?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the government of Canada made known its view that all countries with a nuclear capacity should be encouraged to adhere to the partial nuclear test ban treaty. This includes, of course, the government of France as well as the government of mainland China. Neither country has adhered to the treaty, and there is no indication of any intention by either government at the present time to do so. It would be the sincere wish of Canada that they both would.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that other Pacific nations like Chile, Ecuador and New Zealand have already registered protests over this A-bomb test, have we registered an immediate protest over the test of the past week end?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, before the recent test by the government of France took place we had expressed our desire and our strong view that all countries with a nuclear capacity should adhere to the partial nuclear test ban treaty.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RECOMMENDATIONS BY AUTHORITY AS TO TOLL INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Could the minister tell the house whether he has received the report on tolls from the St. Lawrence seaway authority and, if so, would he make the report public?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on June 30, late in the afternoon, I received the report required by law from the St. Lawrence seaway authority as to the sufficiency of tolls and the proposed changes related to the authority's financial requirements. The authority, I very much regret to say, has not been able to negotiate a joint report with the United States Development Corporation. I feel that the report should not be made public pending the outcome of possible further negotiations with the United States government, because, I think all hon. members would agree that it would be desirable, if possible, to secure such an agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Does the Minister of Transport intend to ask the St. Lawrence seaway administration to facilitate passage of pleasure craft through the locks of the St. Lawrence seaway?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I would have to consider that question very carefully, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him whether the consensus of this report could be made available to the transport committee which could consider it in camera.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, that is something that I would have to think about quite a lot. I think all hon. members would agree that if negotiations are to have any chance of succeeding there must be an opportunity for the parties to consider, without any outside pressures, the position they ought to take. However, I will consider the matter very carefully.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PRODUCTIVITY ANALYSIS OF CANADIAN RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him if the productivity analysis with respect to Canadian railways was undertaken by Professor John Kendrick for the Department of Transport. If so, would the minister make the report public?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I do not think, sir, there is anything that can properly be called a report on this subject. The gentleman in question, who is an expert, was retained by my department to give some advice on this subject in relation to a matter that was under discussion between the government and the two main Canadian railways. Much of the information or the opinion given by the gentleman was oral. It was given for the guidance of the government in a negotiation with the railways that is not completed. I cannot think that it would serve any good purpose to attempt to give any kind of summary of that matter at this time.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister whether he is aware that the alleged contents of this report were used by the Canadian National before the conciliation board headed by Mr. Justice Cameron.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had no knowledge of any such thing until such an allegation was made to one of the officers in my department by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister whether the material in question could be made available to the union so it could answer the arguments presented—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That part of the question is hypothetical.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF OFFICALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. Will the minister table in the house the 26 page report which was drafted following a two-day meeting of officials from across the country in regard to car design and safety measures? The report is marked "Restricted and not for publication", but is referred to and reported in detail in the Oakville Journal Record of Thursday, June 30.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to that request.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—PROTESTS RESPECTING DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Has the minister read the article in the farm paper La Terre de chez nous of June 29, 1966 entitled "Ottawa Dairy Policy Inadequate" and can he tell the house what he intends to do to give justice to dairy farmers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question put by the hon. member is out of order. He asks whether the minister has read an article and I do not believe that, put in that way, it can be accepted.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he is now convinced that his dairy policy is not in line with the requirements of dairy farmers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is now argumentative.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): May I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in order that my question may be in order?

Has the minister received representations from the Quebec Catholic Farmers Union to the effect that the Ottawa agricultural policy is inadequate?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I do not recall any, Mr. Speaker, but I shall take the question as notice.

[English]

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO TWO PRICE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell us when the government will be in a position to announce any policy regarding the two price system for wheat.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): If government policy is made in this regard it will be announced in the normal manner.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO RETIREMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Did any of the three officers replaced at the top level of his department, as announced this morning, retire voluntarily?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this question should be asked at this time. It should be put on the order paper.

FARM MACHINERY

COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—INQUIRY AS TO START OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether Dr. Barber, the commissioner who will investigate prices of farm machinery, has yet started his work? If so, has the government anything to report on this matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Barber has commenced his work but I have nothing to report with respect to any findings at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED FAILURE TO ANSWER UNION WAGE DEMANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the wage demands of the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians made on January 1 of this year, and that the C.B.C. management as yet has made no offer to the union? Can the minister look into this and see that some offer is forthcoming in the near future?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I understand my role, it is not to interfere with management.

[Mr. Greene.]

RESEARCH

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SPACE RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the remarks made over the week end by Dr. Gerald V. Bull who is in charge of space research at McGill University, to the effect that Canada at present has no space policy whatever, is thought not being given by the government to establishing —I suppose it will now be in the fall—a special parliamentary committee on space research, and a policy with regard to space research?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether this question is so urgent that it should be asked now. I would suggest to the hon. member that he give that some thought.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that we are looking forward to a fairly imminent adjournment, and because a considerable government staff change is to take place relating to our space policy, I submit we ought to have some indication whether the government intends to do anything with respect to the establishment of space policy through a parliamentary committee in the fall.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question is much too general in nature and cannot be asked.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR NEW VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Now that the month of July has been reached, could the minister advise whether tenders have been or will be called soon for the construction of the first of the new series of coast guard ships, as we were advised would be the case in the committee on transport and communications during consideration of estimates?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to inquire.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INCREASES IN PROVINCIAL WELFARE PAYMENTS TO BE CONSIDERED AS INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): I would like to answer the question put to me by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) as it appears on page 6937 of Hansard for Tuesday, June 28, 1966, regarding the supplementary allowance available to certain individuals in Prince Edward Island.

This recently announced supplementary allowance, which is available to recipients of the old age security pension in Prince Edward Island, does not constitute exempt income under the War Veterans Allowance Act and regulations and must therefore be assessed as income for war veterans allowance purposes as is the case with the old age security pension.

In his question the hon. member for Queens referred to the supplementation of old age assistance in Prince Edward Island. This, however, will have no effect on recipients of war veterans allowance as they are not entitled to receive old age assistance benefits by reason of paragraph (b) of subsection 3 of the Old Age Assistance Act, which states that old age assistance may not be paid to recipients of war veterans allowances.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO EXTRADITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General, notice of which I gave him on the airplane as we were coming from Toronto this morning.

In view of the reports in the Toronto newspapers that the R.C.M.P. has obtained sufficient evidence to warrant extradition proceedings against Hal Banks, the former head of the Seafarers International Union, is it a fact that such investigation has been completed, and does the government intend to instigate extradition proceedings?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): The material gathered by the R.C.M.P., Mr. Speaker, is being placed in the hands of a special prosecutor, and a final decision has not yet been reached.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER TO HEALTH INSURANCE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the Minister of National Health and Welfare was good enough to confirm that he had written a letter on June 20 to the general manager of the Canadian Health Insurance Association, and that he would be glad to table it at the first opportunity. May I ask whether the letter is available for tabling now?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the letter is not available for tabling. I hope to table it today or tomorrow.

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON—APPOINTMENT OF WARDEN OF WOMEN'S PRISON

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Can the minister inform the house as to the probable date when a permanent warden for the women's penitentiary in Kingston will be appointed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DAMAGE TO SALMON SPAWNING GROUNDS BY LOG RUN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries arising from my understanding that the hon. gentleman was able to spend some time in British Columbia over the weekend. I should like to ask whether while in British Columbia he was able to make any progress toward settling the difference of view between the Department of Fisheries and the government of British Columbia on the question of driving logs in the Stellako river.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): As the hon. member knows, the applicants who had sought a writ of mandamus have withdrawn their application to the supreme court. The matter is now before the Department of Justice, and I am getting legal advice as to what steps should be taken next.

Canada Assistance Plan

Mr. Barnett: May I ask the minister whether his department or the international pacific salmon fisheries commission have conducted an investigation, or will conduct an investigation, concerning the damage resulting from this year's log drive on the river so that we may have a further assessment of this situation?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes. Technicians of the department were present when the drive took place the week before last, and we are now awaiting a report as to the extent of damage done to the spawning grounds.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed, from Thursday, June 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as far as this legislation is concerned, it has been made perfectly clear by various speakers in Her Majesty's loyal opposition that we support the measure in question, though believing there are various changes which should be carried out to make these proposals more effective.

We are greatly disappointed at the absence of any suggestion on the part of the government that an additional $25 a month is to be made available to the old age pensioners of Canada. No one can argue that today, with the cost of living the highest in history, $75 a month meets the elementary requirements of fairness or equity. There are many thousands of people who have been waiting for action, and who from week to week live on a mere pittance, their hopes kept alive by periodic statements that sometime, some where, some place, something will be done.

Today, I intend to review the stand which we, as the opposition, have taken on this matter throughout the last couple of years. I make no apology for going into detail, and I resent very much the suggestion of the minister that there has been on the part of the opposition an attitude of filibustering this bill. As far as the Conservative party is concerned, representatives from all the provinces, I think, have made their views clear. They have the right and duty to do this.

The minister in a moment of annoyance, I think, decided he would brand the opposition as being responsible for a filibuster, thereby taking the pressure off the government for action on behalf of the old age pensioners. Just after he spoke the other evening in this regard I decided to look up the meaning of "filibuster". In the old days in parliament speeches of seven, eight, nine or ten hours were not unusual. Those days, of course, are past. I recall I used to get Hansard in 1910. I was greatly impressed by a member by the name of Mr. Lafortune who, at the end of 14 hours, told the Speaker that he was "about to come to the essential portion" of his argument.

I recall very well that in the days of Prime Minister Mackenzie King speeches on occasion were of almost limitless extent. No one suggested that Mr. King would engage in a filibuster against himself and his party. Mention is sometimes made here of Senator Wayne Morse in the United States. I find that on one occasion he spoke for 22 hours and 26 minutes; he was excelled in length only by a member of the legislature of Texas who spoke for 28 hours and 30 minutes.

Filibusters are in the nature of speeches made without any objective in mind except to hold up the passage of legislation by the government. It is not a filibuster to demand from the government justice on behalf of the old age pensioners of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The charge of filibustering has no effect, but it indicates a state of mind. The minister and the government do not like to hear this question discussed. They seem to be oblivious to the fact that everywhere across Canada there is an almost universal demand for this action to be taken.

The expectation last week was that the house would adjourn by Friday for a summer vacation. I have heard of no further prophecy since that prophecy turned out to be at variance with the facts. However, I believe the time has come for this house to determine on regular adjournment periods—at Christmas time, at Easter and for the summer vacation.

In the United Kingdom they have regular adjournment periods. I think we might very well follow that course; for in the last couple of days the government has seen fit to add one or two further measures to those already before the house.

And so it goes. Always at the end of a session governments find that there are matters they would like to get cleared away. The result is indefinite postponement of the rights of hon. members. Those who are here, not those who are travelling abroad, have the right to look forward to a reasonable expectation of being able to meet with their constituents and enjoying the rest they have earned by being here for such a long period of time.

Somebody suggested to me that one of the reasons for general expectation of an adjournment on last Thursday was that Mr. Commissioner Spence had his report ready and wanted to go on vacation. But now apparently the report is not to come until after adjournment. I do not want to see the commissioner denied his anticipated holiday. I would suggest, if the report is ready as is generally believed to be the case, having been completed some weeks ago, that we would be prepared to have the report brought down while the house is in session rather than waiting indefinitely for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it for granted that the right hon. gentleman's remarks are introductory in nature and that they will lead eventually to consideration of Bill C-207 which is the matter in hand. I would therefore take the liberty of reminding the right hon. gentleman that at the first opportunity he should address himself to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was simply pointing out that the house was to have adjourned last Thursday but that now the adjournment is indefinitely postponed, that various matters have been brought in at the last moment by the government and that we are prepared to have one more brought in. That was the point I was endeavouring to make by way of introduction, as you expressed it, to a full discussion of the bill before the house. I thought that the government would welcome the suggestion that we are prepared to wait even longer if only it will bring in the report instead of setting it aside to be brought in after the session adjourns.

It has been interesting to follow the government's peregrinations in connection with old age pensions. During the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said that he would not do anything that could possibly be construed as endeavouring to buy votes. That was the way in which he met the perfectly responsible program that we advanced for assisting the old age pensioners of Canada. As recently as June 14, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) reviewed the matter that is now before the house. But there was not one word of hope for the old age pensioner at that time.

What happened between June 14 and today? There have been no unusual cataclysms. The rise in the cost of living has been at about the same rate as previously. What has caused the sudden interest of reputable reporters in the press gallery, who have been able to set out in some detail the announcement that the minister will make when he has the opportunity to speak? The minister has had many opportunities to speak. Any day on motions, before the question period, he can get up and let the old age pensioners in on the secret.

He has not done so. On Thursday he put up the attractive member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) who made a delightful speech. If everyone were as attractive as she is the house would be a most attractive place. But I was attracted by the fact that she did not give any of the answers. She could have told the expectantly waiting country what the government is going to do. But no, her lips were sealed except with regard to those matters on which none of us is in disagreement.

What has brought about this change? There was no thought of it on June 14. I do not know what has happened, but the press reports that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), a member to be reckoned with—the government has been reckoning with him for a long while—has urged the government to implement the Croll plan to provide a guaranteed income to old people.

The press also reports that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) believes the government should make the Croll plan part of its program. The press reports that the hon. member for York North (Mr. Addison), a man who understands the needs of people, allegedly accused the government of lying on this matter. I presume that had reference to its recumbency. Finally, the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) was reported as saying that unless something was done he could not face his constituents.

I do not know whether these press reports are correct. If they are, they indicate that there is a basic reason for the sudden conversion of the government to the need of taking action. Long before June 14 the Senate report was published. Why has there not been any action on it until now in the last hours before adjournment? First the government said it would not do anything about increasing the old age pension from $75 to $100. The suggestion of such an increase was ridiculed by the Prime Minister when he spoke in Prince Edward Island. He said he was not going to make an auction block out of a political campaign. He was not going to promise $105. It is interesting that that is the figure he mentioned.

Since that time the government has had every opportunity to act but it has not acted. Every Liberal member has voted against increasing the old age pension from $75 to $100 a month. When I hear some members of the Social Credit party speaking out I am reminded that they joined with the Liberals in that action. Had it not been for that fine, filial relationship between the Liberal party and the Social Credit party, the old age pensioners of Canada would today be getting $100 a month. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) is not in the chamber. If he were I would refer him to some of his own contributions in this connection when on almost every occasion we tried to get action, he was almost the first to rise to argue that our amendments were not constitutional according to parliamentary authority. He rushed in on every occasion, but in his absence I refrain from going into details.

From the beginning to the end on this question, not only in this session but in previous sessions, the government has revealed itself as playing a game, a charade of hypocrisy, wherein the old people of Canada are to be engaged in guessing the meaning of the words and the promises made by the government. What is the reason for this change of attitude? This is a government that bends and, if the wind is strong enough, it is always able to bring about that which it previously had said could not be done. It always stands firm until public opinion is aroused.

What do we find in this connection? The minister has been denied an opportunity to open what one might refer to as Pandora's box. I think this is unfair to him. I might as well tell the house what he will say when he speaks because it has been made available in the press over and over again. Several days ago representatives of the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto Star stated that when the minister spoke he would indicate that nothing is going to be done now, but that assistance will be given in the fall by the provision of an additional $30 per month to qualified pensioners. Mind you, the minister did not give the information, but the newpapers indicate that this information comes from well-authenticated sources which have always been reliable in the past.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Again I can only rely on these formidable witnesses of the press who have stated that anyone whose income is below $1,260 per year will be given assistance. What will happen is that a needs test plus a means test will be applied so far as the needy of this nation are concerned. How many are there in this category? Outside of the farming community there were 425,446 in 1961 who had an income of under $1,000 a year. That relates to total income which means that the $65 per month that was being received was included. We had raised their pensions to that amount by then. How many people fall within the category of $1,000 to $2,000 in income, again including the $65 a month? In that category in the same year there were 158,501.

During the last election campaign, and here in this house, we took the stand that the tremendous exactions under the old age pension scheme would permit an increase being provided out of the surplus moneys collected over and above the actual expected requirement. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) was able to find out as a result of questions, that as of March 31, 1966 the excess that had been collected amounted to approximately $217 million. As of December 31, 1965, the amount was about $140 million. In other words, in three months there was an increase of $77 million. At that rate of increase the amount today over and above what is actually needed for the payment of old age pensions would be in the neighbourhood of $300 million.

I should like to ask the government a few questions and perhaps the Prime Minister will answer them. Can he inform the house whether or not it is a fact that the surplus to which I have made reference has been judged by the experts of the Department of Finance to be sufficient that it would be feasible for old age pensions to be increased immediately to $100 per month? Will the Prime Minister indicate that those experts have gone even further and have come to the conclusion that the surplus would permit an increase in pensions to $125 a month by next year? Following the increase in 1963 of payments into the old age security fund, 1 per cent additional to raise them from 3 per cent to 4 per cent, is it a fact that experts in the Department of Finance calculated that by the fall of 1967 it would be possible to make an increase not only to $100 per month but to $125 per month?

These are things about which we are entitled to have some information. The surplus next year will be much larger than it is this year. I should like to know why the government will not take action, except by way of a smoke screen provision to be announced, on behalf of all the old age pensioners of this nation.

I have made reference to the Prime Minister's speech in Charlottetown on October 16, 1965. In this regard I should like to quote from an article written by Mr. Fraser Kelly which appeared in the Toronto Telegram on October 18, 1965. The Prime Minister is reported as having pointed out that Quebec had opted out of the pension plan and was not paying into it so that if Mr. Diefenbaker's proposal were acted upon Quebec would be getting the higher pension without paying for it. The article then states:

> This means people in Prince Edward Island would be paying for Quebec because people in Quebec wouldn't be paying for themselves, he said.

The article then states:

> He extolled the virtues of the Canada Pension Plan. Then he scornfully rejected opposition promises of $100 a month—

What changes have taken place in the thinking of this government since then? Let me refer to the various votes that have taken place in the house on this matter. On March 29, 1965, an amendment regarding old age pensions was moved in this house. It is interesting to note that when it was ruled out of order every Liberal member, and the Social Credit members as well, voted to uphold the ruling of the Deputy Speaker.

Again, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved a motion in respect of Bill C-136, in connection with contributory old age pensions, to the effect that it be not read a third time but referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 122, every Liberal member voted against any action being taken and again they had the support of their Social Credit allies.

On March 26, 1965, as recorded in Hansard that day, I moved, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) that the bill in question:

> —be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole so that the government may give consideration to and introduce amendments to the said bill to provide for a minimum payment of $25 per month out of the Canada pension plan account to all persons between the ages of 65 and 69 years who are retired from regular employment, and also to provide an increase from $75 per month to $100 per month for all those now 70 years of age or over.

I see that the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) got into the act. He said how unconstitutional and unparliamentary that would be. There was the insistence of the hon. member who is now Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner). Again there was the ruling that the amendment in question was not in order. The Deputy Speaker so ruled and the decision of the Chair was sustained. All hon. members voted to sustain it except the Conservative members. It is interesting to follow what happened. This was over a year ago.

Then we come to 1966. In January I moved that an increase from $75 to $100 a month be made. What happened? Again, all the Liberal members voted against it. I had made it clear in the earlier vote that the vote on this question would not be one of non-confidence, that it would not mean the defeat of the government. But they lined up to defeat the motion. It is amazing, that within a period of only 20 days since the minister introduced this legislation, there has suddenly been a realization that something must be done. They forgot all about that on previous occasions.

On April 6 this year the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) introduced a private resolution as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of introducing a measure to increase the amount of pension provided under the Old Age Security Act to $100 a month and lowering the age of eligibility of applicants to 65 years.

That was a private member's resolution. In no way would its adoption have been construed as a vote of non-confidence. But it is of interest that it was talked out and that the government's final speaker was the hon. member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout), Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The reason was, of course, that the government did not want a vote on this question. Lest there be any mistake about it I will read what she said, because she speaks with the authority of a parliamentary secretary. She said:

> Mr. Speaker, some hon. members are calling for the question to be put. I should like to draw to their attention the importance of the matter under discussion. I was prepared to put forward quite legitimate arguments giving the government's viewpoints with regard to increasing the old age pension to $100 a month. Many members on this side of the house, and I am sure on the other side, would have welcomed the opportunity to speak in this debate today. However, many of them have left for the Easter recess, under the impression that we would continue with government business, a procedure which was denied by hon. members opposite. Therefore with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it six o'clock.

There was some argument. Six o'clock came and out went the hope of adoption of even a private member's resolution to this effect. Even this cursory review shows the attitude of this government. They will not face the problem that is faced by the old age pensioners of Canada. I said a moment ago that the minister had lots of chances. We have been hungrily waiting in expectation of his rising and revealing what the government has in mind.

I asked the Prime Minister the other day, "Are you going to bring in legislation to increase the old age pension from $75 to $100 a month before the adjournment?" The answer was "no". The minister could have made this announcement at any time. I again repeat that what he had in mind was that he would wait until the end of this debate, would then march in and produce this plan, a plan which the government believes will delude the old age pensioners. There could be no discussion, of course, thereafter.

If the minister does not get the opportunity today to place this matter before the house, I for one, and I am sure all hon. members on this side of the house, would be willing at any time to revert to motions so that the anticipated announcement, which is as public as the sun, could be made to this house. But that is not the reason they have not done so. The announcement has not been made because the government knows that the opposition will not accept this promise as being adequate, appropriate or in keeping with the rightful demands of the old age pensioners of Canada.

We have made our position clear. The government has applied the whip to Liberal members, because when they meet us outside many of them are quite willing to say, "We know this should be done but what can we do?" That is their attitude. They cannot do anything; they are not allowed to do so. There is one hon. member, a very charming one too, from the Ontario constituency of Brantford. He is all for $100 a month for the old age pensioner. He was for it all through the election campaign. He said, "When I get down there you are going to hear from me." He came back here, but when it came to voting he lined up with the other Liberal members. After all, the whip said, "The government does not want you to vote for it. Line up, or else."

We have again made our position clear on various occasions throughout this debate. Our position is simply that no alternative to $100 a month for the old age pensioners will meet the situation.

Mr. Knowles: Without any means test.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, without a means test.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: We welcome the fact that there has been a softening of the opposition of the government since the Prime Minister spoke in Prince Edward Island in October. At that time he would not have anything to do with this matter; it was ridiculous. But the pressure of public opinion has brought about a slight change.

Someone suggested that we would be giving an increase to old age pensioners with incomes of $10,000 a year or more. My recollection is that approximately 78 per cent of Canadians 70 years and over have incomes under $2,000 a year, including their pension. It would be a great day for the old age pensioners of Canada if the Liberal members opposite were to vote in the house as they speak out of it. This would be an unbelievable miracle, although I still believe that the day of miracles is not over. They could prove that they mean what they say.

Our stand is clear and definite and it has been made so on many occasions. It will not be met by any scheme whereby everybody who on bended knee, asks for the extra $30 a month will have to go through a course of catechism and interrogation. That is a denial of the rights of free men. Just imagine saying to all the old people of Canada: Line up here on the left and we will provide an opportunity for you to get an extra $30 a month. But you have to prove that you are in need. You have to assure us that you do not meet the means test that we will apply. There is no meaner test than a means test. We stand against it.

I could say a great deal more on this occasion but I will limit myself to reiterating our stand which is now a matter of reasoned acceptance. We all took this stand last year when we found that the government had no realization of the needs of old age pensioners. We shall continue to press forward and, no matter what the government may have in mind, our purpose is to do everything we can to bring about this increase.

I hope that the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), who has expressed himself with such power in this debate, will be able to bring about such a change of mind in his party when the vote takes place as he displayed in taking the very opposite stand. I cannot put a question to the Leader of the Social Credit party as he is not here today. I am sure that, if he were here, he would feel constrained to support the views of that hon. gentleman. That shows what the influx of new blood into a party will do. In January he voted against the increase but in the intervening months he has found that that was wrong.

Mr. Johnston: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If he has not, I will give him an opportunity to speak.

I thought the hon. gentleman was going to give us an explanation of the unexplainable but he is not. He will sit where he is. Conversions such as these are welcome; they show what parliament can do. It is sometimes said: "Will you love me in September as you did in May?" I say to the hon. gentleman: Don't love the old age pensioners in June as you did in January.

Mr. MacEachen: May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question for clarification purposes? I gathered at the beginning of his comments that he stated that the members of the opposition as many have already indicated, would vote in support of this bill, and then at the end of his remarks he anticipated a vote in which he would vote against. Was he referring to the second reading of the bill?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope the minister is clearer in the presentation he will make than in the interpretation of my remarks. We support the bill in its present form and we said so at the beginning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Applause is unnecessary. We said we supported this measure over and over again. We trust that the opportunity to vote will be given to assure us that the government will be forced to do that which justice demands in every part of this country. The government has been forced into the position of bringing in changes to this bill which are to be announced by the minister and which we all look forward to hearing. I hope that between now and the time the minister speaks he will rise and say: On the 14th of June I did not expect to advance any legislation to give an increase to old age pensioners but I have looked this over and now I intend to promise those in need $30 a month provided they go through a means test. I hope he will then say: I intended to announce this—it has already been reported by the press—but after listening to all the arguments I have decided that I will come out in favour of an increase of $25 a month without a means test. If the minister does that, he will be in the strongest possible position in the steeplechase that is about to take place.

Mr. Whelan: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? He made reference to a statement of mine having appeared in the press in which I said I had not been able to face my constituents. Could he tell me where such a statement was reported and when it was made? I am not one who is used to my comments being reported incorrectly by the press.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recall reading this statement in the press. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not belong to that group of members of parliament who are unaware of their names having appeared in the press. However, I will find the particular newspaper in which it appeared. Now that he has intervened, I will ask him whether he did say that.

Mr. Whelan: I never said it in the presence of any member of the press—

Some hon. Members: You hoped it would not be reported.

Mr. Whelan: —and I never expressed myself in the terminology used by the Leader of the Opposition. I am in favour of the proper treatment of the elderly people in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This may be the right time to give the hon. member for York South the opportunity to speak.

Canada Assistance Plan

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, similarly to everyone in the house I want to say something about the subject of old age pensions. Before I do that, however, I want to express my own disappointment at the bill as a whole. If the minister were to rise and ask me whether I intend to vote for the bill my answer to him would still be in the affirmative. Those of us who want improvements in the field of social welfare have frequently been faced with suggestions which appear to be half a loaf while they are only a quarter of a loaf, and in such circumstances we are forced to support this bill rather than have nothing at all.

First of all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me that our attitude to welfare has over the years always been one of charity. I have found that private charity has carried over into the public domain. Every time persons in need have required assistance they have been able to obtain it only by begging from the municipal or provincial authorities, by having to prove need or by having to go through some kind of humiliating test.

The improvement in this legislation, and it is supposed to be an improvement, about which the minister has boasted is that instead of having what has been called a means test there will now be a needs test. The only difference that I can see is, as someone has said, in the spelling. Instead of having to prove a certain amount of income the person seeking relief, in addition to showing what his resources are, will have to show what his budgetary needs are. Some social welfare person from some board or department will be in a position to say to the applicant for assistance; I consider this item is necessary for you but that item is not. This is what the test means.

If a person is in necessitous circumstances some bureaucrat, someone representing some municipal or provincial department, will be able to go over that person's means of living and say to him: This you may have but this you may not have; you may not have this because in my view, and in the view of others like me, you do not need it. You do not need to smoke. You do not need to take a trip somewhere once a week. You do not need a television set because I consider it to be unnecessary.

Make no mistake about it, the needs test just as much as the means test means that the person applying for assistance will have to humiliate himself not only by showing what his resources are but will also have to haggle with someone, to bargain with some welfare officer, when getting assistance. This is as humiliating as the means test ever was.

Of course, the minister is able to boast about an improvement because we started with an evil, wicked base, a humiliating base, and when you reduce the humiliation somewhat you are able to boast about improvement. However, the humiliation is still there to a large extent. We in our party, as our leader stated the other day, are looking forward to the day when assistance to people who require it will be based on the concept of a guaranteed annual income or some form of income maintenance. If a person's income does not add up to the level which has been set, not by some arbitrary officer somewhere but by what a budgetary analysis will make clear a person requires in order to live in decency, then his income will be augmented up to that level.

Mr. MacEachen: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He has referred to the proposal put forward by Senator Croll. Would he agree with the income test implied in the proposal, or a test that he envisages under the income guarantee program?

Mr. Lewis: No, Mr. Speaker, and for three reasons. First, if it is intended to be an income maintenance plan the amount suggested is obviously far too low. Surely no one in this house or in the other place believes it is possible for a man to live on $105 a month. I believe the Senate report suggests that his total income should be $1,260 a year. If the Senate committee believes a man can take care of his needs in dignity and self-respect in 1966 on $105 per month, they are talking without knowledge of the cost of living in Canada.

I believe the committee also suggested that the $105 would not be doubled for a couple but $185 would be set for two people. I have seen various calculations made by welfare councils, and if my memory serves me correctly the minimum amount required for a couple to live in self-respect and dignity is somewhere around $3,000. As I pointed out in another debate, in modern, cost-of-living terms a family of four would require $4,700. My first answer, therefore, is no, I cannot accept the Senate committee report. If it is intended to be an income maintenance plan, the amount suggested is niggardly. I suppose when you look at $75 and raise it to $105 you might think you were doing something very good because the percentage increase is substantial.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not want to intrude on my hon. friend's time but I am interested in whether he supports the income test in principle, because earlier he said he was prepared to accept an income maintenance program on the basis of budgetary studies which would be applied, no doubt, under such a program.

Mr. Lewis: Obviously, if you have an income maintenance program, you have got to find out what income a person has; otherwise you cannot have an income maintenance program. I am sure the minister knows that as well as I do. If you are going to say, you must have at least X hundreds of dollars a year or a month in order to live and we will make up anything below that, then there has to be some kind of measurement of a person's income. There are two ways of measuring it, however. One would be to put the person concerned through some humiliating test where every detail has to be discussed, as is the case with the needs test.

I realize that many people have said the needs test is an improvement. I know that most social workers have said that the test the minister proposes in the plan under discussion is an improvement. I have no doubt it is an improvement if you have a good social worker. A good social worker, if he or she has a heart and a knowledge of the needs of people, will be able to get more for the person concerned under this kind of plan than he or she could under the categorical payment plan. I realize that. However, I say that the requirement that a person sit down and haggle with someone else over what he is entitled to have before he will be able to get assistance does not make me any happier. This is a humiliating thing, and I do not like it any more than the minister, I am sure, likes it.

Mr. MacEachen: I will not be asking my hon. friend another question because I do not want to interrupt too much. However, is he not aware that under the Canada Assistance Plan it is possible to provide a level of income support along the lines he has mentioned, without subjecting the individual to the necessity of going into detail about what his needs are, because of the use of the community budget studies, which are an essential part of the plan?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, how does the minister know? He is taking me to my second point. This is the second major weakness in his plan. He sets no standards and he does not know what the studies will reveal. He has no idea what the standards will be. Furthermore, anyone who knows anything about social welfare in Canada, and I do not pose as an expert, knows quite well that standards differ from province to province and from community to community within a province. The standards will be different for metropolitan Toronto and the larger cities in this province compared with the smaller communities in which there may be no social welfare staff and where some committee of the council will set up what the standards shall be. So long as the council has to bear some share of the payment, then the council will be concerned with the cost and the applicant for assistance from the council will suffer.

This takes me to the second major weakness of this bill. However, may I first get back to the point I was making earlier. There are two ways of testing an individual's income. One is the humiliating way and the other is the simple way in which all of us are tested for income tax purposes. The part of the Senate committee report which, if I understood it correctly, appealed to me was the suggestion of an income calculation which would be as simple as the income tax form, or perhaps not as simple but as clear and as limited in the information required as any income tax form. To that extent it would be an improvement.

I come back then to the lack of standards in this bill. This worried me immensely from the very start, and I must say that I have not been able to feel even as approving of the bill as some other members in this house, even some of those who have criticized it.

The one great evil in this country over the years, the one heartbreaking fact about Canada which I am sure has been the cause of greater disunity than anything else, language and culture included, has been the terrible inequality which exists in this country. I have been in communities in this country—and I am not going to mention even the provinces, let alone the names of such communities—where the welfare program is absolutely shameful. There is a lack of welfare workers and a lack of any humanity toward the people who are in need.

These communities will be able to get 50 per cent of their expenditures in an indirect way through the provinces, no doubt, but will their programs be improved? Is there any guarantee that they will treat the needy of Canada with greater consideration than they have up until now? Furthermore, there are provinces in this country—and the minister represents a constituency in one of them —which with the best intent in the world cannot provide the assistance to the needy in the province that anyone with any compassion would consider half adequate, let alone sufficient.

As far as I can see, and I am sure I see correctly, this bill does nothing to establish standards across Canada. It leaves it entirely to the provinces to establish those standards. If the minister says that this is because of the constitutional situation, then I would say to him, with the greatest respect, that the constitution is used too much as an excuse for refusing to equalize the opportunities in this country. Without claiming to be a constitutional expert, but as a lawyer who has read something about our constitution, I know of nothing in the constitution which would prevent the minister from providing in this bill that if such and such a standard were met the government would pay 50 per cent, if such and such a standard were met the government would pay 60 per cent, and if such and such a standard were met the government would pay 75 per cent.

I make the concrete suggestion that there ought to be in the bill an inducement to improve the standard of care for the needy people in Canada, so that those provinces which cannot afford the standard that some other province is able to afford will gain from the bill a great deal more than is now offered them. Until such time as we do get in this country, Mr. Speaker, a sense of urgency as to the need to equalize opportunities for all Canadians, whether young or old, in need or in jobs, and until the big gaps in income per head of population which now exist between one province and another are eliminated, we will continue to have divisive influences which feed on the natural and desirable discontent and resentment prevalent among people in sections of the country who feel that they are not provided the same opportunities as those in other areas of the country. This is the second major weakness in this bill.

Third, another reason I feel unhappy about this bill, aside altogether from the question of the old age pensioners, is that modern welfare involves something more than the payment of money. It seems to me that this bill ignores the progress that has been made in the concept of welfare in 1966. It is not merely a matter of giving assistance. It is not even a matter of giving assistance to train welfare workers and to provide various forms of therapy for elderly and ill people who require it. There is also the concept in modern welfare thinking of providing older people with things to do, of funds being made available so that they can live useful lives in this country, and of building environments for them so that they can lead useful and dignified lives.

The other day the parliamentary secretary to the minister stated how important it was to take care of disturbed and retarded children. It has been pointed out in some provinces, particularly in the legislature of the province of Ontario in the last number of months, that there are tens of thousands of children who are disturbed and who grow into difficult people, to put it mildly, as they grow older.

What is needed in order to meet this problem is not merely an offer to pay a little bit toward providing the kind of service outlined in this bill but large, really massive injections of capital assistance to build the homes and the institutions required and to train people to take care of these tens of thousands of youngsters across Canada. There are probably 100,000 to 200,000 young people who, because of their environment, background and for various other reasons not of their making, or indeed often not of their parents' making, if they know who their parents are, require homes, institutions and the kind of care which, as far as I have been able to study the situation with the help of one very close to me, involves the provision of one teacher or one trainer per child.

As far as I can see there is nothing in this bill that recognizes the modern approach to social welfare. When I say nothing, perhaps that is an exaggeration and I should not put it quite that strongly; but there is very little in the bill which recognizes the trends in modern welfare.

This takes me, Mr. Speaker, to the question of the old age pensioners. I did not intend originally to take part in this debate, and I must say that the person who more than any other got me to my feet was the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), to whom I will return a little later.

Listening to the debate on old age pensions and how much we should give our old age pensioners, I felt—and I am sure every other hon. member including the minister must have felt this way—as if we were in a kind of Alice in Wonderland atmosphere. I am sure it would be most unjust to the minister, to all his colleagues in the cabinet and to the members who surround him to suggest that they have any less concern for the needs of our old people than have we on this side of the house. I am not saying this with tongue in cheek. I am sure that the minister is a kindly man—he looks it and I hope looks are not deceptive—who is as concerned about the plight of the old people in Canada as is anyone on this side of the house. However, he and his colleagues and those who support him have been the victims of an attitude over the years. They are the victims of an attitude which objectively, whatever their hearts say, is an attitude of callousness and mathematical calculation.

If, Mr. Speaker, you look at the history of the old age pension in Canada you will find, I think, a sordid story. Perhaps you will forgive me if I review the dates and a few facts. We start in 1927, after a long fight by the late J. S. Woodsworth, with a pension of $20 a month with a means test. I must say that every time I look at these dates I feel humiliated at having been in this country when this kind of thing happened. From 1927 until about 1944 people aged 70 and over received $20 a month after a means test. In 1943 or 1944 it was up to $25. I learned a long time ago when I was studying a little economics that if you make your base low enough your increase, no matter how small, can be a very large proportion of your base. Therefore, when you start with a measly, niggardly, inhuman amount of $20 a month with a means test and you raise it to $25, you of course have raised the amount by 25 per cent and everybody pats himself on the back for having been generous.

In 1946 the amount was raised to $30 a month but still with a means test. In 1948 it was raised to $40 a month, still with a means test. Without going back to the economics books, Mr. Speaker, I venture to say that the $40 in 1948 was worth not one cent more than $20 was in 1927, if it was worth even that much.

Not until January 1, 1952, which is the effective date, was the means test removed. The $40 was left. The $40 figure remained all the time from 1948 to 1957, despite the immense increase in the cost of living created by the Korean war in 1951, 1952 and 1953. The increases in the price index were greater than any other we have known since the end of the second world war. Yet we left the old age pension at $40 even though it was without a means test in the fifties. We introduced old age assistance at age 65.

The aged were fortunate that there was a series of elections following one another in rapid succession. Thus in 1957 the St. Laurent government increased the pension by $6 to $46. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition formed a government—

Mr. Douglas: Probably because of the $6.

Mr. Lewis: Probably because of the $6. That was a big increase, wasn't it? There was another election in 1957 and the amount was raised to $55. Still another election raised it to $65 in 1962 and yet another election and it was raised to $75 in 1963. I have often said to the old age pension oragnizations I have addressed from time to time: "If I were a member of your organization, I would have in the program of my organization a requirement for a federal election every year, because that way there would be a chance to get faster and better treatment."

The reason I am talking about this, Mr. Speaker, is that at no point in this succession of amounts, as I have been able to read the press and history, was there ever an attempt to figure out what an aged person needs to live on. At no time has that been done. At no time did any department of government sit down and work out what a man aged 70, or now 69 requires to live in dignity and self-respect?

Mr. MacEachen: There was a parliamentary committee in 1950.

Mr. Lewis: They did not decide anything so far as I can see. They were arguing mainly about removing the means test. They were not concerned with the amount. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I imagine, was a member of that committee.

Mr. Knowles: There is no imagination about it. I was there.

Mr. Lewis: As I remember the reports of the committee, which I read some years ago, that committee was concerned with the removal of the means test and with the introduction of old age assistance for those below age 70. It was not concerned with the amount.

Mr. MacEachen: There was a unanimous recommendation about the size of old age security payments, was there not?

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister repeat that? I did not hear him. I hope it was worth hearing.

An hon. Member: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. MacEachen: Did not the committee make some recommendations unanimously about the size of the pension?

Mr. Lewis: Committees must deal with what is before them. I am not here to defend that committee, even though my hon. friend, the whip of my party, was a member of it. I imagine, knowing him, that he must have fought like blazes to get the amount increased.

Mr. Knowles: To $50.

Mr. Lewis: To $50, he tells me. All he could get was the removal of the means test, and he took that. I do not blame him for taking what he could get. What he could get out of that government is about the same as we are apparently getting out of this government, and we shall be glad to take that too even if we do not like it.

Mr. Knowles: At that time the federal government was paying only $30 out of the $40.

Mr. Lewis: The point I wish to make, and I should like it to sink in if I can make my point vigorously and sensibly enough, is that at no time has there been the suggestion that the amount paid to the old age pensioner is enough. What there has been is a rather shameful kind of haggling—raise the amount by this or raise it so much. We have had political parties doing what we are doing here, namely, haggling with each other. Should the pension be $75? Should it be $100? Should it be $90? The fact is that even $100 is not enough for those people who have only the old age pension to live in dignity and self-respect. The Canada Assistance Plan will still have to be used for aged people living on a $100 pension.

Like other hon. members, Mr. Speaker, I have received letters from various people about this old age pension matter. What struck my fancy and my heart, if I may say so, even more than any letter I received, is one letter which I read in the Toronto Telegram of Monday, May 9. In the Telegram there is a column entitled: "Ask the Tely". In that column there is the following moving question by an old age pensioner, and it is all the more moving because of its simplicity than anything else:

> Is there a good second hand clothing store in Toronto. I'm an old age pensioner, and find it hard to pay the price asked for new clothes.—O.A.P.

Then the Telegram gives him the answer, referring him to three or four stores where this old age pensioner could get second hand clothing.

I lower my voice deliberately, Mr. Speaker. I say that so long as there is one person who is forced to write this kind of note to a newspaper in a society as rich as Canada, with a government that boasts of its concern for humanity and for welfare—so long as this happens every member of this house ought to be ashamed of the job parliament has failed to do for the old age pensioners of Canada. Whenever one reads this sort of thing in the newspapers of this country, and I have just referred to a mild complaint, a mild request, and remembers that the gross national product has gone up tremendously in the last number of years, I think that the citizens of this country, particularly those who have the means to live with self-respect and decency, ought to be ashamed of their failure to provide for these people.

I have in my hands a letter from an old lady:

> I am a widow 70 years old. I have only got my $75 old age pension to live on. I find it very hard with every thing so dear and things always going up.

This is the sentence to which I particularly want to refer:

> I wonder if there is any way you could help me.

Aside from any personal assistance, the way I can help her is the way all other hon. members of this party have decided to help her. That way is by raising this issue with all the force at our command so that this government will yield and bring about some humane treatment of the old people in this country. If somebody wants to call this a filibuster, let him do so; let him misuse words and twist the motives and intentions of people.

The fact is that the Social Planning Council of Toronto has pointed out that an elderly person needs $138.96 a month in order to live in some decency. If that sum were brought in line with the present level of the cost of living it would need to be increased somewhat. What we are saying to the minister and to the government is not that $100 a month is enough for the old age pensioner—I am sure no one, even on the other side of the house, believes it is—but that it is essential as an act of humanity to increase the universal pension to $100 a month in order that those who still require assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan may be fewer in number and so that fewer people will be humiliated by having to submit to some test or other.

I am sorry the Minister of Transport is not here. I am sure he has other things to do. I am not blaming him for not being here, but this is my opportunity to speak and I cannot wait for him to be here. But the other day the minister interrupted the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) to say, as reported in Hansard at page 7065:

> Yes, sir, I will be very proud to say that no country in the world makes such generous provision for its old people as does Canada. Everyone in this house knows it, and the hypocrisy over there is not going to conceal it either.

The ignorance of the minister, displayed with typical Pickersgillian assurance, is really shameful. When a minister of the Crown makes a statement of that kind to the house with the self-assurance which my friend of long standing used the other day, it cannot help but arouse the ire of anyone who knows a little about these things.

I do not intend to quote large numbers of statistics, but I hold in my hand a report provided by the research and statistics section of the Canadian Department of National Health and Welfare. This is not something compiled outside Canada; it is provided by the minister's own department. The date is January, 1965. Let me draw attention to several interesting figures. The report deals with various social security items in five countries, Australia, Canada, Great Britain, New Zealand and the United States. It appears that these five countries were chosen because there is greater similarity in their general approach to social security questions than might have been expected had other countries been chosen as well.

Look at the first table on page 2 of this report. It gives government expenditures on health and social welfare as a percentage of the gross national product in those five countries. Canada comes third. There are two countries below us on this list, the United States with 7 per cent, and Australia with 8.2 per cent. The Canadian percentage is 9.4. However, in the United Kingdom it is 10.5 and in New Zealand, 12.1. I should have said these figures are for the year 1962-63.

But on the issue concerning which the Minister of Transport spoke, the issue about which he boasted, namely, the treatment of our old age pensioners, Canada comes last of those five countries. As shown in table 3 on page 5 of this report, New Zealand was spending 3.6 per cent of the gross national product in this field. In the United Kingdom the percentage was 3.4, in the United States 2.7, in Australia 2.3, and here in Canada the figure was 2 per cent. Last of the five. Yet this is the country which is supposed to treat its old age pensioners much better than any other country. This is what the Minister of Transport dares to say. And if anyone wonders what is included in these expenditures footnote (e) at the bottom of the page makes it clear that they comprise old age security benefits and old age assistance payments. So it is the total payments to the old people that are involved. Canada comes last in this series of five countries.

Is there any reason for this? Is our standard of living, or gross national product per capita, lower than that of New Zealand or Australia or the United Kingdom? I appreciate that Australia and some other countries in the world have had old age pensions for a much longer time than we have and that in many instances the payments are more analogous to those under our Canada Pension Plan than they are to the old age security payments. A number of us in this house do, I am sure, regret that we did not begin the Canada Pension Plan at age 65 many years ago so that many of the problems we now face would not have arisen.

I was not a member of this parliament when the Canada Pension Plan was passed, but as I read the Canada Pension Plan and the speeches made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare during the election campaign and since, it seems to me that the Canada Pension Plan took the universal payment under the Old Age Security Act into consideration in arriving at the terms of the scheme.

Obviously, no one intended that the maximum of $104 a month, if I remember correctly, was sufficient for a person to live on. Time and time again spokesmen for the government said: When we have both the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security scheme in operation people will be able to breathe more freely than they can now.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, $250 for a man and wife. That is what they said.

Mr. Lewis: On that score, even if one looks eight or nine years ahead when the Canada Pension Plan will be fully under way, to add $75 to $104 would produce a total of about $180 a month. No one can suggest that even in 1966, let alone in 1975, it is possible for anyone to live anything but a shabby restricted, undignified and crushing existence on such an amount. This is why I plead with the minister and the government that the old age security payment should be raised now, not only to assist those who are not under the Canada Pension Plan but also to make the total old age pension package, when the Canada Pension Plan is fully in force, a great deal better than it would otherwise be.

Why all this long argument with the minister? Why is the government so adamant about this? Why is it that instead of coming forward with an obvious minimum of justice for the old age pensioner the government is considering plans, as the newspapers suggest, which include a means test, a needs test or some other tests, and all of this to be promised for the fall? Why not now? If hon. gentlemen opposite mean what they have said, if they intend to be recognized as a government of heart concerned about the Canadian people, who more deserve this concern than the older people and why not introduce now the small measure of justice which is represented by an increase to $100 a month?

Mr. Ian Grant Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in support of the Canada Assistance Plan and, because I do support it, I wish it to pass promptly and therefore will be brief. As most members in all parties are aware, this plan has been strongly supported by many leading social workers in Canada, by men and women who are not much interested in grinding political axes but who have a real interest and expert knowledge in the field of social welfare.

This plan extends a bold, new guarantee to all Canadians in need. In accepting it the people of Canada for the first time accept responsibility to meet all the needs, no matter how great they may be, of Canadian children, widows, the disabled, the blind, the elderly and the unemployed. Under this plan we accept unlimited liability. We undertake to charge the public treasury to discharge our responsibilities to the needy throughout Canada. This is a program which I support and of which, as a Liberal, I am very proud.

[Mr. Knowles.]

While I support this bill, Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister to consider very seriously certain minor improvements in its administrative provisions. While the basic principle or guarantee to meet all needs covered by the bill is new, some of the administrative machinery is old and I believe can be improved. I urge that before the bill becomes law at least two administrative reforms be made by the minister. The plan now provides for an agreement between the federal government and each province and for the payment under this agreement of federal money to each province to meet the needs of its residents. This tends to make the program dependent upon the initiative of each individual province. This should be improved. The provinces may delay and in the different provinces benefits may not be based upon consistent principles.

Moreover, it seems to me unsound that the spending of money raised by federal taxation should be under the complete control of the individual provinces; nor am I convinced that the administration of this new program is best entrusted to the provincial welfare departments.

How is the problem to be met? I submit that we have sound precedents in our great universities, hospitals, charitable foundations and other public institutions supported by public funds but not directly controlled by governments. I suggest that in each province a joint Canada-provincial foundation be established, to be run by a board of governors on which the province and the federal government would have equal representation but with representation also from the ranks of labour, business, the professions and other interested community groups.

Such a foundation could also serve a very useful purpose in co-ordinating governmental efforts with the efforts of the very large number of private, charitable organizations now in the field. At the present time there is a real shortage of trained social workers and there is a great need for co-ordination of public and private effort in our war on poverty. The federal money paid each year to each such foundation could be subject to the scrutiny of parliament. Parliament would not lose financial control.

Would the provinces object on the ground that such a proposal was not discussed at the federal-provincial conference or that their welfare empire would be transferred to a public foundation? The foundation would not be federally controlled. There could be no valid objection on that ground. If the idea is sound and welcomed by the general public, it would surely be accepted by the provinces. Nor can reforms suggested in this house be completely foreclosed by prior decisions made at federal-provincial conferences.

My second point is that it is vital, if federal money is to be spent, that we should have some say in the method by which needs are to be determined. No member here wishes to impose anything in the nature of a humiliating test: We cannot afford to have social workers, who are in short supply, checking on the needs of our citizens. On the other hand, if we are to eliminate need and poverty in Canada we must make certain that our money is spent wisely and that only those who need it get it.

Possibly we could adopt for this purpose one of the suggestions contained in the very valuable report made by the Senate committee on aging, the Croll report. Needs could be determined upon the basis of a return similar to an income tax return, with spot checks to catch the inveterate cheaters who unfortunately are to be found in some numbers in any society.

While the changes I have suggested are minor and administrative in nature I believe they are important. I hope they will secure the support of members of all parties in the house, of the Canadian public and, most important of all, of the minister who is responsible for this bill.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in a few brief words I would like to support the fight that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has consistently waged over the years for a better deal for those unable to help themselves. I think the argument he presented in his able speech this afternoon is completely unanswerable by the government, and I make a plea to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), who also represents a Nova Scotian constituency, that before the end of this debate he inveigle the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) into the house to make a statement that the request of the Leader of the Opposition is going to be met.

The most compelling and unanswerable statistic that I have found in my study of this problem is printed at the bottom of page 10 of the final report of the special committee of the Senate on aging. It might be assumed by a good number of Canadians that older people would have the advantage of some assistance from their families. Yet paragraph 3 of this report, at the bottom of page 10, point out that in 1961 there were 570,000 of what are called unattached persons, that is, widows, widowers or older people whose children have moved out, over two-thirds of them women and that their median income on the basis of non-farm sample was $829, with 60 per cent receiving less than $1,000 annually. In an aside the report says that we know less than we should about how these people manage.

An even more compelling statistic is that of the remainder, some 252,000 persons, 63 per cent of them were women living alone or with non-relatives, and were presumably dependent for the most part on their own resources. Of this latter group 53 per cent had incomes of less than $1,000, and among those age 70 and over 47 per cent of the men and 50 per cent of the women received almost their entire incomes in the form of old age security pensions. Thus we have a figure of approximately 130,000 people with no other income than $75 per month.

It is generally accepted that one-quarter of one's income should be spent on providing a roof over one's head. But for people in this category a generous nation suggests that $18.75 or $19, not to cut it too finely, is sufficient to spend monthly on accommodation. Where is it possible to get accommodation at such a rent in Canada today?

It has been suggested by various members who have taken part in this debate that if we pass the Canada Assistance Plan, permitting the federal treasury to enter into partnerships with the provinces which could vary from one end of Canada to the other, we will be applying different standards to help our elderly people in need, depending upon the provinces in which they live. This is quite obvious.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) also drew our attention to the great difference in municipal welfare services across Canada. It could be pointed out that voluntary welfare services provided by agencies which exist in different parts of Canada also do not cover the whole country. We have the Red Feather appeals in metropolitan, city and town areas but no help is provided in many parts of the country by those agencies covered by the Red Feather campaigns. I think this argument tends to snowball in favour of something being done in a dramatic and even generous way by this parliament so that we do not write off many members of a generation who are unable because of their age to look after themselves.

At page 11 of the Senate report to which I referred earlier there is an interesting table giving the percentages of non-farm population 70 years of age and over with annual incomes of less than $1,000, by sex, age, and marital status. Just dealing with one group, the male group, for the year ended May 31, 1961, the figure for those from 70 to 79 was 37 per cent, from 80 to 89 it was 58 per cent and for those 90 and over was 62 per cent.

One could go into the impelling needs brought about by advancing age, medical assistance and perhaps special foods. The costs of these are mounting inexorably and income is declining drastically. This situation is simply not fair to older Canadians.

Let me make a final point to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) in view of my familiarity with the area from which he comes. He represents Inverness-Richmond and Cape Breton. While prosperity there is not as noted as in other parts of Canada, the people do enjoy a reasonable environment. They have a love for things in Nova Scotia and wish to stay there to make their living. They are very proud people and I am sure if the minister went to their doors and attempted to explain a needs test as opposed to a means test he would not receive a warm welcome.

I am sure that the minister could look about the villages of his constituency and find that many of the people would sooner deprive themselves of the extra help that could be provided under a formula tied in with a test, deprive themselves of the necessities of life, rather than go through the humiliation of filling out such a form. I am sure there are hundreds of people in Inverness-Richmond who have that feeling. I know from my own mail that there are thousands in my particular area who feel that way.

In conclusion let me say that unless we wish to write off and relegate to the garbage heap of Canada tens of thousands of Canadians the minister would be well counselled to bring in the increase suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and others who have taken part in this debate.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, for the past three or four days the members of this party and, I think it is fair to say, the members of all other opposition parties have been urging the government to reconsider the Canada Assistance Plan legislation and to bring in coincidental measures which would provide a minimum of $100 a month in old age security without a means test. During the three or four days I do not think one day has passed but that the newspapers of this country have reported that the government is considering doing something along this line. We can only hope they are right.

By way of encouraging the government and the minister to take some action in line with an increase in old age security pensions immediately I felt that for my part in this discussion I might do well to point out that it is not only old age pensioners who want and need more money and not only members of the opposition who are trying to get it for them but that some of the leading newspapers in Canada have come out almost daily repeating what we have said here. I should like to quote from one or two of these newspapers which have expressed this point of view.

The other night during this debate my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron), said that by and large it would be remarkable to find that the newspapers of Canada were urging action for better social legislation. I think that has been the general case. Quite often in the past when editorials in newspapers have been concerned with social legislation they have said: "No, no, whoa, whoa" or "go slow." At this time it is quite remarkable to find that such newspapers as the Toronto Telegram are encouraging the government to do something. Let me quote from an article in the Toronto Telegram of June 25 this year under the heading "Aged Need Help":

> Canada's aged who are forced to subsist on a fixed income deserve additional government assistance. Now.
> This is a matter that should not be put off any longer.
> The spiraling costs of living have made it impossible for many of our old age pensioners to make ends meet. According to the cost of living index, prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, it requires $1.43 today to buy what $1 did in 1949.

The article goes on to say:

> The first payments under the new Canada Pension Plan will be made on Jan. 1, 1967, but these people will not benefit from it. The Canada Assistance Plan will establish what is tantamount to a means test when it is finally launched.
> Not only would our aged find a means test demeaning; but by the time the assistance plan is in operation, many of them may not be around to enjoy the additional benefits they might have received.

That is why it is essential the government consider other steps with which to help those in need.

The article then goes on to state that the government should proceed with these steps immediately and not confine itself to the proposals contained in the Canada Assistance Plan.

On the same date another Toronto newspaper, the Star, which I believe is the leading Canadian newspaper so far as circulation is concerned, had this to say about the subject we have been discussing for several days and continue to discuss this afternoon, under the heading "We Can Rescue Canada's Over-65s From Want":

• (5:00 p.m.)

Poverty is the usual condition of Canadians over 65. According to the report of the special Senate committee on aging, 54 per cent of them had gross money incomes under $1,000 in 1961—less than $3 per day.

Compulsory retirement and unemployment keep them away from the Canadian feast of affluence which their lifetime of work helped to create. The committee found more than half of the 1.5 million Canadians over 65 to be in need of help.

How will the country, which clearly owes them dignity and comfort in their old age, give that help? The Canada Pension Plan comes too late for them. And from their standpoint, there are two things wrong with the Canada Assistance Plan which will soon be placed before parliament.

First, it will require each person to take a needs test before receiving assistance. This process will be costly and slow—and the needy aged can least afford to wait for help. Also, many Canadians of the older generation regard any kind of searching means test as humiliating, and may forgo help rather than submit to it.

The Star, like the Telegram, goes on in its editorial to urge the government and parliament to make a study of this matter and take action on the recommendation of the Senate committee on aging, which was basically a guaranteed annual income. I think we are approaching that situation and will come to a guaranteed annual income in this country. I believe this will be a very fair and efficient way of administering our social security legislation in time to come, but it is not going to help today's generation of old age pensioners. What they need, and what I think all hon. members in the house would like to see them receive, is more immediate help in addition to the proposals of the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Canada Assistance Plan has some good elements. It is good housekeeping from an administrative point of view. But the gap left by the failure to provide immediate help in a basic way to the old age pensioner is too serious to be ignored by members of this house. I am very hopeful that, as has been reported by the press of Canada, the government will change its mind on this subject and bring in at an early date improved old age pension legislation. As it is now, what is happening, as my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre remarked during this debate two or three nights ago, is that the minister is saying to the old people, "We cannot do anything for you under the Canada Pension Plan because that legislation was not designed for you, and we cannot do anything for you under the Old Age Security Act because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will not give us the money to raise the pension. Your only recourse is to fall back on social assistance and so we are providing that with the old means test re-introduced."

We in this party, as in the C.C.F. which preceded us, are quite accustomed in fighting for improved social legislation to accepting half a loaf instead of a loaf, and there have been times when we have accepted a slice rather than a half a loaf. But in this particular instance what is being asked of us and the older people in Canada is to accept not half a loaf or even a slice. We are being asked to buy the attractive wrapper that goes around this package, and I believe that many hon. members on both sides of the house do not think this is good enough.

I believe that those persons receiving the old age pension at the present time are probably the last of our Canadian generations left in the valley of scarcity. The rest of us, thanks partly to the work and sacrifices of these older people, are emerging and have emerged into the sunlight of abundance to some degree. I believe that, if for no other reason, this government, parliament and the country should activate themselves more on behalf of improving the standard of living of our senior citizens.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am very hopeful, from what I have read in the papers and have heard from pretty well all corners of this house in recent days, that the minister will do something in this connection and do it in the very near future.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I notice again that when we rise to speak on this side of the house a member of the government shouts "filibuster." We hear this word every so often in this chamber whenever members of the opposition for one reason or another feel very strongly about a subject and insist, much to the chagrin of the government, upon an adequate examination of it. We heard this word used a year or so ago in the flag debate when my hon. friends in the official opposition felt very keenly on the subject and, at the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) himself, entered into an extensive debate. But because it did not please the members of the government it was called a filibuster.

Again today, and for the past few days, every time a member of the opposition rises, no matter what party he speaks for, to discuss the Canada Assistance Plan and more particularly the matter of the old age pensioners of this country the cry of "filibuster" is raised. Personally I do not really care whether the Liberals want to call this debate a filibuster. In this party, and I am sure in the other parties, we make no apology whatsoever for taking up the time of the house to discuss this matter. So far as I am concerned this is one of the most important matters that we could be discussing.

I am sure the minister himself was rather worried that this legislation would slip through quickly, because when he brought it in it was accompanied by the usual press agency fanfare and clever public relations that accompanies most of the government's legislation. I am sure the minister was afraid that this legislation would slip through very quickly before the country had a chance to examine it and see just what its ramifications were.

Those of us who are raising this matter are doing so because we have received hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of requests from old age pensioners who write the most pathetic letters, literally pleading almost on their knees, for something to be done to relieve the conditions and circumstances in which they find themselves. We are not going to let this measure pass quickly without using it as a vehicle to place on the record the plight of these people and as an opportunity to make clear the cynical and callous attitude that many members on the government side are taking in this area. I am not suggesting that all members on the government side are adopting this attitude, but it is strange that what we hear behind the curtains never appears on the record and that many members who tell us of their desire to take positive action in this field are, with one or two exceptions, very quiet when the opportunity occurs to make their views known in public. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said, this whole approach to old age pensions is not an isolated one on the part of this government. It is a typical approach, it seems to me, in handling various pieces of legislation.

The attitude of the government is always: Let us do the bare minimum that we can get away with. Let us never under any circumstances take a subject and treat it adequately and completely. I think, for example, of the field of higher education and even the small gesture of scholarships and bursaries. I think of the election promises of various Liberal candidates of 10,000 scholarships of $1,000 each year. That was the bare minimum. Others went further and talked about bursaries and aid to higher education. A measure was proposed which, although it was recognized as partly beneficial, was the worst kind of aid that could be given to students. It proposes a $4,000 loan to single students and $8,000 to married students. This represents a tremendously progressive and liberal way of assisting students in obtaining higher education.

For example, let us take the manpower training program which for the past decade has been progressively neglectful. The root of our strike problem is the failure of this government and of some of its predecessors to try to deal adequately with manpower training. Another example is that trade adjustment legislation for which we have pleaded for years. All we got was the usual half measure in the form of the United States auto pact agreement. Another example is housing. In the last few years we have pleaded for an adequate housing program but as usual only half measures were taken.

We can consider almost any area in which this house has acted since the present government took office and all we will find is a psychology of half measures. Never has this government dealt adequately with any measure.

It seems to me that this attitude is being repeated here. As I said at the beginning, we intend to discuss this measure as long as we please. If you want to call it a filibuster you can call it so, but so far as I am concerned I make no apologies for it.

As has already been stated, Mr. Speaker, there are some measures in this bill with which all the opposition parties are in agreement. It is not necessary to repeat them to emphasize those features in the bill which we consider to be an improvement. The government needs no help from us in heaping mountains of praise on itself. The minister and his followers are more than capable in that department.

Our main opposition at this time is twofold. First of all, we have argued that the government is wrong and almost inhumane in its refusal to institute an increase in old age pensions to $100 a month payable at the age of 65. Second, we have maintained and will continue to maintain that the institution of a means test is a retrograde step. I know the soothsayers have changed it to what is called a needs test, but it seems to me that in some ways the needs test is even worse. If it is applied with discretion in a fairly affluent community by skilled social workers, then perhaps it is all right. However, I would enter a caveat and take objection even to this. A needs test means an individual investigation of all the old age pensioners and this, it seems to me, is a retrograde step of the worst kind. I hope the minister will have second thoughts as we proceed with the discussion of this bill in the committee stage and that he will not take this step.

Generations of politicians in Canada, long before I entered this chamber, fought a battle to remove the means test. It was not an easy one.

They were faced with all the time-worn slogans that we have heard from members of the Liberal party in this debate. They were told about all the rich people who did not need the pension and about the hundreds of thousands of old age pensioners who did not need an increase in their pensions. However, over the decades, hon. members in the opposition fought with various governments and finally in 1952 a statute was passed removing the means test requirement on old age pensions. That was a good move. It took place a decade before my election. I am ashamed of being in a chamber in which a proposal is made to apply a means test again because this will do more hurt and humiliate the pensioners than any other possible step we could take.

We have argued that pensions must be raised and that no means test should be attached to them. As I said, Mr. Speaker, various members of the Liberal government—and I emphasize the word "Liberal" —have repeatedly told us that hundreds of thousands of pensioners do not need this money and that it is better spent on those in need. Out of curiosity I placed question No. 1743 on the order paper in which I asked for information regarding the breakdown of incomes of Canadians aged 70 and over. I know this information is based on the 1961 census and that the gathering of the information is imperfect. However, I was astonished to find out that there were 433,365 people over 70 with incomes of $1,000 or less. They do not need a means or needs test of any kind. Obviously nobody can live decently on an income of $1,000 a year. The figures I received showed that there were over 158,000 living on less than $1,900. That means that 80 per cent of Canadian taxpayers over 70 years of age are living on incomes of less than $1,900.

Statements have been made by the other side during the debate about all the people over 70 who have incomes of $10,000 a year or more. The return, Mr. Speaker, shows that 1.1 per cent or 8,200 of the people over 70 have incomes of over $10,000 per year, so the suggestions made by the government do not stand up to analysis.

Mr. Knowles: Most of them are in the Senate anyway.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): As my colleague points out, most of those over 70 getting over $10,000 are probably in the Senate anyway.

We do not need a complicated means or needs test to ascertain whether old age pensioners require money. Obviously facts which are known to us prove they do. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) in his contribution to the debate quoted other figures which I had intended to place on the record but will not repeat. They made it abundantly clear that the vast majority of our old age pensioners are living under circumstances of virtual poverty.

What is so annoying about this measure is that in the face of the undisputed and documented knowledge of the conditions of our pensioners, the only solution that the progessive, new left, Liberal government has to offer is a social assistance program based on a means test. We will be awaiting with great interest the contribution of the minister when he rises to speak to see why and under what circumstances he justifies this requirement. Our objection is and will continue to be in regard to the institution of the means test.

I wish to come back at this time to what I said at the resolution stage. There have been rumours that the government will take into account the so-called Croll report, the Senate study on aging. I wish it would. I do not agree with everything in it but I consider it to be a genuine attempt to assess the problems of old people as indivduals, not as an group. It is an attempt to understand what is really involved in being old in this country.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Recommendation No. 2 on page 17 of their report reads as follows:

> Any suggestion that these older people, when the $75 pension is not sufficient, should be expected to depend for supplementation on public assistance after a needs test is utterly unacceptable.

I emphasize the words, "utterly unacceptable". I continue the quotation:

> Public assistance should, of course, be available to them, as to others in the population, to meet residual needs and to deal with special circumstances, but it is the committee's conviction that main reliance for meeting their ordinary requirements should be on benefits to which they are entitled as a matter of right and that the proportion of older people requiring needs-tested supplementation should be very small at all times.

This is the end of the quotation. It is a very nice bit of grammar and reads well. What it makes clear is that we do not need a means test in Canada in connection with old age assistance. Mention is made in the report of some problems the committee could not solve. There were some recommendations they did not feel they could make. However, one recommendation upon which the committee was clear was that we do not want and do not need a means test for old age pensions in Canada. Yet what have you lifted from the report, if this is where you got it? You have put into your legislation the one thing this exhaustive study said we did not want, the means test. With the best intention in the world, the means test could mean nothing but humiliation for old age pensioners. I am going to read a few of their letters before I sit down.

The one thing that the Croll report emphasizes again and again is the need for older people to have their income as of right. This is something for which they have worked and is something to which they are automatically entitled. It allows people their self-respect and their self-esteem. In many ways this is just as important to them as the actual amount of money itself. With one blow you are going to take this away or at least you are going to try to do so. It is going to take a lot of arguments to convince us that there is justification for this move. It is significant that the voices on the government side that have been raised in support of this measure have been few and have been rarely heard.

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

I believe this is because in Ottawa we are perhaps removed from the people a bit. We do not look upon groups in our community as anything but distant groups. The old age pensioners, while there are 1,000,000 or 1,200,000 of them, are scattered all over the place. They do not have anybody to speak for them. They have no pressure lobbies like agriculture, the unions, industrial people or those who want tariff protection. We look upon them, therefore, as a group on the periphery of our society. We think of them almost in statistical terms.

The only objection we have heard in the house in so far as old age pensioners are concerned is that it costs too much to help these people. There is a new word being used, "priorities", and they are low on the order of priorities. All kinds of things are elevated above the human needs of these people. I suspect this results from the fact that when you get into these ivory towers in Ottawa you tend automatically to lose touch with many of the people you represent. I believe that is what has happened to the Liberal party over the years. You are the people with the managerial expertise and you think in terms of the cash register rather than in terms of the human need involved. This attitude may not even be restricted to hon. members opposite.

It seems to me one of the reasons for the fed-up attitude toward parties and politicians today is the general feeling the people have that we have lost touch with them and that in Ottawa we have governments and perhaps parties that are losing touch with the realities of the country. This is part of the malaise which I think is building up in the country because people like you, with the authority, the power and the right to reach out and touch these people, refuse to act.

If the government even at this late date wished to retreat from its intransigent attitude and take a step that would establish them as a government that cares about the people, I suggest they could epitomize that by increasing the old age pension to $100 per month without the imposition of a means test. We in the opposition would like to do so but the rules prohibit us from so doing. We have used every legitimate means at our disposal to present this point of view. We are powerless. All we can do is plead. You are the people who have the power and the authority to act. Specifically, this power to act rests with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). He is the man to whom Canadians must look for leadership. We will not get it from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). His sharp thinking has already ruled out this action because it does not fit in with his cash register mentality and that of the majority of the members of cabinet. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) laughing. I suggest to him that this is no laughing matter which we are trying to discuss.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You will not make an impression on the minister.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I would not even presume to attempt to move the minister in this field. The government has made it clear over the past several days, as have hon. members opposite, that so far as they are concerned they will not relent on this point. The only hope we have left is to appeal to the minister himself to give some leadership in this field.

As I was saying, we tend to forget the pensioners. We forget who they are and what they are. The Croll report puts it in understandable language. I should like to quote from page 6 where we find Senator Croll's introduction:

> Senior citizens are not some indefinable group, separate and apart. They are our mothers and our fathers. They are ourselves in a few years. They are those who have made contributions to society and to our country. They are those who have given their energies, their skills and their children for the good of society. What the senior citizen needs is to retain his earned right in his own world.

It seems to me that this is the type of sentiment from which we are departing in this legislation. We say that, notwithstanding the fact that there are good features in the bill which have been outlined already. When we were discussing the resolution I had a few words to say on my own behalf and that of my party and I tried to point out that I, along with many members who have had to spend a lot of time with old age pensioners, I presume, am ashamed of the way in which we have handled their problems. The Croll report indicates that over 60 per cent of our pensioners live in urban centres. This trend will continue over the years. Before long the vast majority will live in our cities.

Merely to hand out more money to these people, badly as they need it and desperate as they are for income, is not going to solve their problems. Until we are prepared to deal with old age pensioners as a part of the community and not an isolated group that gets a handout every once in a while or that we mention in the house from time to time, we are never going to solve their problems. Until we are prepared to deal with them as part of the community we will never solve the dilemma of the old age pensioners. Their problems are the same as most of the problems of the people we represent. They need decent housing at a price or rental they can afford to pay, but we do not give it to them.

There is an apartment project to house old age pensioners in the constituency which for the moment at least I represent. The tragedy is that the old age pensioners cannot get into it if they receive only the old age pension because the income requirement is too high. Instead they have to live in attic rooms for which they pay $32 a month out their $75, which leaves them with less than a dollar a day to live on and to provide everything they need. I could fill 100 such buildings tomorrow if they were available. We have been asking ever since this government took office for a real housing program for our old age pensioners but nothing has been done. We do not even have a housing program in this country.

Until we deal with the problem of price control for these people, handing them more money, while all right for the moment, is no solution because prices are going up and up and next year the increase will be wiped out. So we are back where we started, with the old fight about the amount.

Until we bring in a genuine medicare scheme to help these people we are not dealing with their problems adequately. Until we begin to think of the old age pensioner as part of the community, as being a person who does not want to be shoved on the sidelines but who wants to feel he is part of life and has a useful part to play and role to perform, with a proper place in the community as a whole, we will never get at the problem of the old age pensioner.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we discuss this question at length. We know that the government is not going to do anything about it. At least, I think I know they are not, though I would have great respect for the government if they were to provide tomorrow as a minimum gesture an increase in the pension at least to the $100 figure. But let none of us think that by doing this we will really be going very much for these people. They will not live high on the hog on $100 a month.

I do not want to read into the record all of these social agencies reports, which are stacked almost a mile high and have come in from all over Canada, pointing out the very basic minimum upon which people can be expected to exist. One of these reports was featured in an article in the Toronto Star on October 20, 1965, and was headlined: "Aged Pensioner Says She'll Probably Never Eat Steak Again". The article gives a monthly budget of $126.47 for a man and $118.83 for a woman. It is a very generous budget, I must say.

For example, $31.62 is allotted to food and $41.44 to housing. I defy anyone who comes from an urban area—I am not familiar with the country districts—to show me adequate, decent housing in our cities for $41.44 a month. The budget also allows $6.81 for clothing, $3.29 for home furnishings, $2.17 for transportation in metro, and if the pensioner wants to take a trip 62 cents a month is allocated to transportation outside of metro. These are magnificent and generous figures and are suggested as the minimum on which these people can be expected to exist.

I do not want to have to read into the record, though we may do so as the debate continues, reports from one of the senior citizens committees outlining the plight of these people and their need for better treatment. The really pathetic aspect of the problem of the old age pensioners is the letters received from them in which they tell you what they think and how they feel. I have one here in which a woman comments on the proposed needs or means test, and she says that it would be a very humiliating experience to have to go through. She says that many who really need help would have too much pride and self-respect to apply, and that is true. This refrain runs through all the mail.

What the government seems to fail to understand is that the older people have a great sense of pride and self-respect and that they will be most reluctant to apply for a means test wherein they would have to subject their affairs to examination, no matter how delicately, graciously and sincerely it is done. I am not saying that the people who do apply will be unnecessarily shy, but a good proportion of them are too proud to apply in the first place. They want to live their lives in dignity and independence, and some will not be prepared to apply. One person went so far as to say that she would even give up her niggardly $75 a month rather than submit to a means test.

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have been pleading with the minister for some days now to reconsider the position and to give the lead which we hope he is capable of giving. Even at this late date when the debate has gone for several days we hope that he will announce that the Liberal party has decided to become a liberal party on this point and that it is not going to return to the retrograde position it has taken in regard to a means test.

I have read the debates over the years in which members fought for the need for its removal. No doubt the removal of the means test which the Liberal party is imposing will be an issue in another election. And let the record be clear that it is the Liberal party that is doing this over the objections of a united opposition. I do not say that they do not have the right to do this. But there have not been to many issues in this parliament on which the opposition has been united and I would have thought, coming as we do from constituencies all over Canada and speaking as we do for more Canadians than are represented in the ranks of the government, that some consideration would have been given to the views of the members of the opposition in this regard.

After all, Mr. Speaker, it is no longer a question of finding the money for these pensioners. That cat was let out of the bag the other day at the hearings of the committee. It is now quite clear that there is enough surplus in the fund to pay the increase, so the government does not even have the money argument any more. The funds are there, the need is there, and all that is required is the decision of the minister and his colleagues to institute this very needed reform.

I wish that we on this side of the house possessed either the logic or the eloquence to move the minister in this regard. I hope he will yet change his mind, will announce that the house will be permitted to vote on the attractive features of the bill, to which we all subscribe and give our support, and that ancillary and supplementary legislation will be brought down—we are prepared to sit here until it is—to increase the basic pension to $100 a month without a means test and to make it available to all old age pensioners over 65.

This, Mr. Speaker, in no way kills the present bill. It in no way takes away from the bill the areas for which there is support. But it would provide an excellent opportunity for this house to do something to benefit not just the old age pensioners. A move in this direction would indicate that we in Ottawa are in touch with the needs, the hopes and the aspirations of all Canadians. We want to take a new approach and to bring about actions in this house that show we care about people rather than about money.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, I have been pleased to note the many expressions of support for the Canada Assistance Plan that have been given by hon. members, including those of the opposition. There are exceptions of course, but it would indeed be difficult for any reasonable person not to support a measure which so obviously brings about needed and significant changes in public welfare legislation.

I have been somewhat concerned, however, with the efforts being made to minimize the importance of this bill. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), for example, has stated that this is purely a tidying-up operation and that there is nothing really new in it. It is true that the legislation does represent in a sense a tidying-up operation since it makes it possible to incorporate the provisions of a variety of federal and provincial programs into one act, and to form the basis for the development of a single, integrated and comprehensive assistance program. In doing so it makes it possible for assistance to be provided under one program for all persons who require it regardless of the particular conditions that have led to their need for such help.

We have come a long way from the days of the English poor law when welfare in parts of Canada was characterized by meagre assistance—the less the better—the placement of indigents in alms-houses, county homes or poor farms, strict residence regulations, grudging acceptance of responsibility for keeping the needy, and an almost total lack of understanding of the causes and effects of poverty. It took time, changes in public attitudes and enlightened leadership to change this approach. It also took federal funds and programs for special groups, developed often in collaboration with the provinces, to improve assistance measures. First came pensions for the aged and then attention to special groups like the blind and disabled and veterans. Statutory payments such as old age security and family allowances, social insurance measures such as unemployment insurance and, most recently, the Canada Pension Plan, have also been developed over the years.

Some ten years ago the Unemployment Assistance Act was passed, through which the federal government shared with the provinces and municipalities in the cost of general assistance to the unemployed. This represented a major step forward in providing assistance to the needy and led logically to the Canada Assistance Plan we are studying today.

It is generally recognized now that we have reached the point in Canada where assistance should be based on the fact of need rather than on the cause of need, and that there is no longer justification for setting up special programs to meet the particular needs of various disadvantaged groups. The Canada Assistance Plan provides the basis for a simpler and more efficient means of helping people. At the same time its provisions are sufficiently flexible that special help can be given to persons on the basis of their actual need. Thus it will still be possible to take into account differences between individuals and between various groups of people whose needs vary according to where they live or what are the precipitating causes of their need.

This approach may be characterized as a tidying-up operation, but it is obvious that it introduces a new and important concept, that of basing the amount and type of assistance on actual need and adapting the approach to meet the individual's circumstances.

But the Canada Assistance Plan goes well beyond this because it recognizes that the mere provision of financial assistance in itself is not sufficient. It directs attention to the causes and effects of poverty and provides for measures that will assist people to regain to the fullest possible extent their capacity for self-support. This is not necessarily a new concept, but its recognition in federal legislation and the support given to it is of the greatest significance and will undoubtedly lead to far-reaching developments in the whole field of public welfare. To this extent the Canada Assistance Plan represents an important milestone in the history of public welfare in Canada.

The emphasis the plan gives to preventive and rehabilitative services is in recognition of the fact that for many persons the circumstances that led to their need for assistance could have been and may still be changed to the point where assistance is no longer required. They may suffer from ill health or physical disability, in which case medical or physical rehabilitation services are indicated to remove or overcome the limiting condition. It may be lack of skills or training that prevents the individual from securing or retaining employment. This calls for assessment, appropriate training and job placement. It may be family troubles for which skilled counselling and perhaps homemakers' services may be indicated. It may be lack of motivation or loss of the will to work, often a result of prolonged unemployment. Here programs designed to prepare and motivate such persons to take advantage of rehabilitation and training services or other programs designed to keep them in normal employment may be required.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that the need for financial assistance must in many instances be seen as a result or symptom of problems that can and must be dealt with systematically, effectively and, above all, sympathetically. Dependency is debilitating and often self-perpetuating and, as we all know, tends to be passed on to the children of assistance recipients. From this point of view the provision of financial assistance becomes just one element in the process of helping people rather than, as is often the case at present, the only element. It is a tool to be used when required but used in conjunction with other means of helping the individual to maintain himself and his dependants and then to go on to achieve the maximum degree of self-support of which he is capable.

The Canada Assistance Plan is, then, designed to shift the focus of welfare from relief to prevention and rehabilitation by encouraging, with additional federal funds, development of the wide variety of services which are directed to the achievement of self-support and self-care. Some of these services, of course, now exist in governmental and voluntary agencies and should be more fully utilized.

Federal funds will also help welfare departments and voluntary agencies to engage the additional administrative, professional, clerical and secretarial staff required to extend and improve their administrative procedures and their welfare services.

This social rehabilitation approach is given effect in a number of ways in the Canada Assistance Plan. It appears first in the definition of assistance. While recognizing that basic requirements such as food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements must be provided, it goes on to list other elements that should be taken into account. Contributions will be made for health care services, for example. While most provinces have developed various measures through which public assistance recipients now receive health care services, it is fair to say that in no province have they been comprehensive while in some they have been very limited.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The scope of the Canada Assistance Plan in relation to health care services for needy persons is very broad. For example, it may include medical and surgical services, nursing, dental and optical care, including dentures and eye-glasses, drugs and prosthetic appliances. the additional funds to be provided by the federal government will make it possible for the provinces to develop and extend health care services beyond the present levels and thereby eliminate some of the exclusions which are now characteristic of many of the programs in the provinces, exclusions which have often caused hardship to individuals.

The definition of assistance also includes welfare services. A useful example of the type of service that may be provided is that of homemaker services. The situation often arises where a mother is removed from her home, perhaps for hospitalization, leaving a husband and children to cope as best they can in her absence. If there are no relatives or close friends to care for the children, the father has the option of staying home from work to look after them or neglecting them in order to retain his job or having them placed by child welfare authorities in foster homes or child welfare institutions. The family can be kept together, however, and the mother's peace of mind and eventual recovery enhanced, by bringing in a homemaker who, in fact, takes the place of the mother during her absence. The father is enabled to keep his job with assurance that his family is being looked after, the mother's recovery is hastened because she is assured that her children are being cared for, and the family is held together.

Let me turn now to the definition of welfare services that appears on page 4 of the bill. Welfare services are defined as services having as their object the lessening or removal of causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance. Farther down the page hon. members will note that welfare services can be provided to persons in need or persons who are likely to become persons in need unless welfare services are provided. We are not content, as this definition makes clear, to wait until the problems that the individual or family face become so acute that they are forced to turn to the public authority for financial assistance. Where counselling, homemaker services, referral to appropriate community services and the like are indicated, these can be provided and the will and capacity of the individual can be sustained and strengthened with a view to maintaining his all-important self-dependence.

It has been pointed out by some hon. members that much greater attention needs to be given to the number and quality of staff in the field of welfare. I want to emphasize the fact that tremendous strides have been made in recent years in improving the quality of training for personnel in this field. Emphasis is given in their training to the importance of administering public welfare programs in ways which enhance and protect the rights, self-respect, dignity and independence of people. We have come a long way from the days of the depression when so many people did, in fact, suffer from the attitudes of welfare authorities whose main objective appeared to be to discourage them in every possible way from asking for help when they were unable, because of lack of employment opportunities, to provide for themselves. It is this concern, I believe, which has prompted many people to reject the idea of a needs test, and if that attitude were still in effect I also would be among those who would seek for alternative ways of helping people. But times have changed and attitudes have changed. We recognize the right of people to expect courteous and considerate attention when, usually for reasons beyond their control, they find themselves in need of help.

The Canada Assistance Plan, under the definition of welfare services, makes provision for sharing in the costs of staff training and development and thereby acknowledges in a tangible way the need to provide for adequate numbers of properly qualified people who can administer the programs in ways that will enhance the dignity and self-respect of persons who have every right to expect to be treated in this manner.

Mr. Groos: The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns), himself a professional social worker, has eloquently drawn our attention to the importance of professional training for social work and has urged the importance of a determined program for social work recruitment and education. He has said that in the absence of well-qualified personnel, the availability of additional funds and ancillary personnel will create immediate confusion and may end in damage to the families concerned. I know he will be reassured to see evidence in the plan that funds will be made available to support staff training and development.

I understand that through the Department of National Health and Welfare, provincial departments of welfare, schools of social work, and various voluntary organizations across Canada, determined efforts are being made to extend and improve various necessary educational and training programs for the field of social welfare. It is acknowledged that the Canada Assistance Plan will provide a powerful incentive to these efforts. Given the staff and the resources for which the Canada Assistance Plan makes provision, we can be assured that the social rehabilitation emphasis of the plan will become a reality and that people who at various times now find themselves dependent on public funds may be given every opportunity to achieve the goal of self-support to which we all subscribe.

Mr. Aiken: May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. MacEachen: Perhaps I can assist the Chair at this point by suggesting that some thought has been given to whether the house might not rise for the dinner hour until seven o'clock. If that is agreeable, we might do so then.

Mr. Knowles: There have been such discussions and I think we are all agreed. We would even be prepared to agree that the house should rise between six o'clock and seven each night this week.

The Chairman: Does the house agree that the sitting be suspended until seven o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, it is my duty to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), Finance—housing loans by banks at N.H.A. interest rates; the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman), Public Service—immigration staff association communication respecting morale; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), Canadian flag—inquiry as to prosecution for desecration.

In accordance with the agreement reached, this sitting stands suspended until seven o'clock.

At 6.02 p.m. the sitting of the house was suspended.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed a 7.00 p.m.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker in this debate pointed out many of the attributes of the Canada Assistance Plan and reasons why members should give it their strong and forthright support. I take no great objection to the arguments he advanced, but it seems passing strange to me that the Liberal party which has always held itself out as the party which has endeavoured to do more for the unfortunate of this country should completely ignore and bypass a report prepared by a special committee of the Senate which recommended so much more for this group of citizens, who face real problems because of financial difficulties into which they have been placed by this government.

While I have said that Liberals always hold themselves out as the champions of the downtrodden I must also say that in the field of hospital insurance they managed to accumulate a great deal of mileage because they talked about it from 1919 onwards. Yet it was not until 1957, when the party to which I belong was in power, that it was put into effect. In regard to welfare assistance the Liberal party is trailing far behind the other parties in the House of Commons today.

The members of the opposition parties have indicated their willingness to give to the older citizens of this nation that which most Canadians believe they should have, a pension of at least $100 a month. There are some who appear to be somewhat concerned about the fact that we did not recess last week end. Generally speaking I am sure that members of parliament went up in the estimation of a great many Canadians because of their willingness to stay here in an endeavour to convince the government that a minimum old age security pension of at least $100 a month is a must. I feel certain that a great many members sitting on the back benches on the government side are as pleased as punch that we are still here today debating this matter, with the hope that the government will move forward with a program to provide this minimum pension for all citizens 65 years of age and over without a means test. I do not think I need say more on that aspect of the situation.

The leader of our party today performed a job which leaves the remainder of members in our party in a position of having only to agree with his sentiments. He spoke for every member of the official opposition, if not for the members of all opposition parties, as well as for a number of members sitting on the Liberal side of this house. I am sure many of them are dissatisfied with the arrogant attitude adopted by the cabinet ministers in this regard.

It is my intention this evening to deal with a subject which is not quite as broad as old age assistance and which involves fewer people. The amount of money involved is infinitesimal when compared with the amount that has been paid to date in social welfare and in old age assistance. I refer to the disabled persons allowance. It is my hope that I can convince the minister that the Canada Assistance Plan as constituted will do more harm than good to a great many people who today live in degradation and poverty because the government will not make a move in the right direction. I feel this is particularly upsetting, because there are not enough people in this classification to command the kind of attention that the old age pensioners receive, because of their much greater numbers.

I was very pleased to see during the last election campaign that our leader, when outlining the policies which our party would endorse if elected to office, made an unequivocal promise that we would eliminate the means test in so far as the disabled persons allowance and the blind persons allowance were concerned. This meant that any individual who found himself in the unfortunate position of being either blind or disabled would as of right receive $75 a month during the period that he qualified for such allowance, and indeed in most instances for the rest of his life.

I believe there is only one fair way to indicate the great problem that people face when making application for the disabled persons allowance, and that is by reading into the record some of the correspondence that a member has with constituents and cabinet ministers, both federal and provincial. I should first of all like to read a letter written to me by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) on May 25. I had pointed out to him that a certain individual had doctors' reports indicating a significant degree of disability. This man was unemployable and found himself in the position wherein he could qualify for the disabled persons allowance. The minister replied in this way:

> As you know, although the federal government shares in the cost of disabled persons allowances, this program is administered by the province which determines eligibility and the rate of payment. After consulting with my departmental officials, I understand that——the individual concerned—

> —could not meet the definition of total and permanent disability set out in the legislation and the requirement that the applicant be unable to perform activities of normal living, such as feeding, dressing and personal hygiene. It is evident from the medical report that Mr.—

—again referring to this individual—

> —condition is controlled by medication and that he is able to undertake activities of daily living.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, if you are alive, if you are breathing, if you are able to move, you cannot qualify for this allowance. That is what the minister is telling me. I say that this kind of legislation has no place in the statute books of this nation. When we reach the point that if you move, you cannot get any assistance, then it is a mighty funny kind of welfare program we are endorsing in this House of Commons today. We talk about assistance. This is the most shocking, degrading type of position in which to put any human being that I could possibly imagine.

This is the situation faced by people in this nation who apply for disabled persons allowance. Let me read another letter that I think does a tremendous job of pointing out just how bad this act is, as it stands at the moment. Hon. members opposite talk about the Canada Assistance Plan and what it is going to do for these people. It will do absolutely nothing to improve the situation. As the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) pointed out, the government just introduces a new act and says, "Isn't this a wonderful thing?"

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether my hon. friend would tell me if he is aware that the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan will remove the necessity for meeting the medical test of total and permanent disability; that under the provisions of this plan his grievance, which I think is a justifiable one, will be removed.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the plan proposed today do not meet the situation to which I am referring in the slightest degree. They do not meet it for a number of reasons. The main one is that a person has to pass a needs test in order to qualify for assistance. It does not make any difference whether you are laid out on a bed, incapable of movement; you still have to qualify. It does not make any difference who puts up the money to keep you alive; the government says that you have to pass the test, and if you cannot pass it you will not receive assistance. Let me read what was written about another gentleman. He was known to me for many years. I do not mind putting his name on the record because he is not longer with us. He came to me in August, 1965 and said he had made application for the disabled persons allowance and had been turned down. I received a letter from the Minister of Public Welfare of Nova Scotia informing me that this man applied for the allowance and in September, 1964, was first turned down. I had a great deal of correspondence on this subject and on February 17, 1966, received this letter from his wife:

> This is to thank you for your efforts on my husband's behalf re the disability pension. Unfortunately, the day I received word that he would get his cheque in February was the day of his operation and as he never regained consciousness he never knew he finally qualified.
> If Blair had received even three or four of these cheques he would have been able to spend these months, at least, feeling a small measure of security which would have lessened his worries to some extent.

This situation must occur in a great many cases, as I know of a similar one myself. Surely, there must be a way to eliminate a lot of the red tape so that if one is really disabled he could receive help at least within three months after the application has been filed. Perhaps an adjustment can be made so that others may be helped quicker.

I know your letter played a big part in helping Blair get the pension. It was just too bad it took them so long to realize his urgent need. Many thanks for doing what you could for him when he asked for your assistance.

That is an example of the kind of degradation that this legislation, and any legislation that demands a needs test, puts people through. Are we being good Canadians when we ask our fellow citizens to subject themselves to this sort of thing for years and years in order to receive a pittance that is really not enough to survive on, and is only enough to slowly die on; because $75 a month does not really maintain anybody in health and happiness, it just allows one to survive for a certain number of years.

What else do we do when we put this requirement of a means test on a disabled person's allowance? In effect we say to this person: "You have worked for a great many years and probably you have made some savings. When you have spent your savings on obtaining the medical attention you require, come up to us and we will investigate how you have spent the $3,000 or $4,000 you had saved. We will then give you $75 on which we know you cannot exist." This is what the needs test does to Canadians.

We then hear someone else saying to us: There is nothing wrong in asking people to subject themselves to a needs or a means test; there is a different philosophy in the world today than there was 20 years ago. Apparently, according to some speakers, there is less dignity in the world today. There is only less dignity in the world when you push people down and will not let them up.

If you adopt the attitude which was taken by the Senate committee on aging, you will not subject these people to such a degradation but you will recognize the fact that dignity and pride are necessary to every individual. You will endeavour to maintain these qualities and you will not try to destroy them. In effect we do destroy them when we demand a means or a needs test. Both these tests mean the same thing to every individual who has applied for one of these social assistance schemes.

[Mr. Coates.]

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) is anxious to put forward far-reaching legislation which will maintain the pride and dignity which we desire for all individuals in this nation, he will eliminate the needs or means test from the Canada Assistance Plan and put into effect the system which the Senate committee on aging has recommended. This will eliminate the necessity, to which many Canadians are subjected, of going to the office or home of a member of parliament, of a member of the legislative assembly or of a county councillor and asking him to intercede, in the hope of obtaining some kind of financial assistance which will enable him to survive. If we continue to demand that a means test be made a requirement, we will not move very far ahead of the legislation for the relief for the poor that was so common in the thirties. We will not be progressing and we will continue to subject Canadians to the same humiliations which they have had to suffer in order to get the sustenance of life.

We have to change our philosophy in this respect. The sad thing about this is that I think most hon. members, both on the government side and in the opposition, believe that a change should be brought about. The administration, however, has not yet arrived at this conclusion. The best indication of that is their stubbornness—there is no better word for it—in not bringing forward an increase in the old age security which would be acceptable to every Canadian everywhere. I think any hon. member could go into the street and ask any individual he meets whether he is in favour of immediately increasing old age security by $25 a month, and whether he be a 10 year old boy or an 80 year old man, the reply would be "Yes, we are in agreement".

This measure should have been taken a long time ago because I think that is the way all Canadians think. If the cabinet ministers went back to their constituencies and talked to their supporters a little more often, they would discover that that is the way the average Canadian thinks. The sooner the government eliminates it stubborn attitude in this regard, the sooner the business of this nation will move forward.

I believe members of this parliament have put up with this stubborn arrogance long enough and they will not continue to fool around any longer. We want that increase and we will stay here until we get it. I am all in favour of staying as long as is necessary to get it.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to say at the start that, like other members of the party which I represent, I am in support of this bill. However, I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I disagree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos) who spoke late this afternoon, and I cannot help but believe that we will not have reached the millennium in Canada after this bill is passed and brought into operation. I believe that it will provide services which are long overdue in a number of areas. It is only after this bill is put into operation and after some of the needs for which this bill will provide have been implemented that we will begin to realize how much more remains to be done before we have instituted in this country a really comprehensive social security system about which so many people have talked for many years.

This afternoon I read the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) in introducing this bill. In studying it paragraph by paragraph I realized again that after this bill is implemented we will still be very far from accomplishing the aims which the government has set out for itself in this bill. I will say again that it is my intention to support it and I will list the fields in which the minister has indicated financial assistance will be provided.

They are: people covered by the old age assistance program; people receiving blindness allowances; people receiving disabled persons allowances; needy mothers with dependent children; people receiving assistance in general; people who now receive assistance under the Unemployment Assistance Act; and children in the care of welfare authorities.

This is a good Bill as far as it goes, but it seems to me that when this bill is implemented we will find that we will provide most assistance to people in these categories who reside in the provinces which now have the best programs, that is to say Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. What we are proposing to do in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is no more and no less than help the provinces share the cost. There is no provision in this bill to help the people in the provinces in which public assistance programs have been, and still are, almost totally inadequate. The people in New Brunswick or in the rural areas of my own province of Manitoba are not getting the assistance they should get. If the rates which have been set are inadequate, or if the staff to service their needs is inadequate, as they are, then there are no provisions in this bill which will help.

I am not thinking of a rural area at the moment, Mr. Speaker, I am thinking of a village which happens to be in the constituency of my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in which there is no trained staff, in which the decision as to who gets assistance and how much, is made by members of the local village council. They are estimable people, Mr. Speaker, but they have no qualifications and no training at all. In addition, they are people who, as a result of good health and good fortune have, as our young people would say, got it made themselves. They look down on these people requesting assistance. I have been told by social workers as I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has, that the council looks down upon these people and they are tough with them.

A person really has to crawl on his belly in that village before he can get assistance. There are no provisions in this bill which will help these people at all. I am not going to go into details. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said much better than I could this afternoon that what we need is a national standard. I say again that it is not my intention to vote against this bill. I wonder if the minister has really given any thought to whether the federal government should be giving financial assistance to provinces and municipalities where the standard of assistance given to people who are in need is not adequate? It seems to me it would be a good idea if the federal government, in implementing this program, were to say to the provinces and let the provinces say to the municipalities: There is the Canada Assistance Plan; there is money available from the federal government, but that money is only available if the assistance which you give is sufficient to permit the people who are getting assistance to live with some dignity.

I do not hold any brief for the Manitoba government. Hon. members know it is a Conservative government and that it has a smaller majority this week than it had last week. But the Manitoba government has one of the most constructive programs of any province in Canada for the assistance of the Indian and Metis people who are not living on reserves and who therefore do not come under the jurisdiction of the federal government. However, I have seen how many of these people live. The way in which they exist is a disgrace to any country as wealthy as this one. I question very much whether the federal government should pay one red cent to Manitoba or any other province for that kind of assistance, until the standard of assistance given is such as would permit these people or any other people who require assistance, to live in some kind of decency.

It so happens that today I received an answer to a question I put on the order paper a month or more ago. It relates to the kind of housing in which the Indians in Canada live, as compared to the rest of the population. Let me just call attention to certain facts. Of the 4,617,000 households in Canada, excluding the Yukon and Northwest Territories and the households of Indians living on reserves, 4,600,000 have electricity. When you come to consider the Indians you find that only 12,773 households out of about 60,000 in Canada have electricity. If you look at the problem of running water, you find that of the 4.5 million homes in Canada, 4 million have running water. If you look at the situation with regard to Indians you find that less than 10 per cent of the Indian households have running water, and less than 5 per cent of Indian homes have indoor baths. This is a situation which exists for the descendants of the original inhabitants of this country. I suggest that not only is there nothing in this program to help these people, but there should not be a nickel paid to the provinces until the provinces devise programs which will set standards somewhere close to the standards enjoyed by the rest of the population.

According to the minister, Mr. Speaker, there will be a real effort made to get municipalities to improve the standards of assistance which they now provide. Upon what does the minister base that statement? The fact is that the provinces have not, until now, devised such programs. The fact is that the provinces, in nearly every case, have left assistance to the local governments. This government will be giving a certain amount to the provinces, but the municipalities will administer these programs. This is fine for the urban areas. This may be fine in cities which have full-time welfare departments and which have at least partly trained and qualified staffs to do this job. However, this bill will mean virtually nothing to the people who need assistance and who live in the rural areas of this country, where the kind of program which is required has not even been thought about, let alone instituted.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The minister talks about how much better a needs test is than a means test. I am not being critical of the minister when I say this looks and sounds good, but I can tell him that I have had considerably more experience with this question of the needs test as compared to the means test than the minister has. One of the first things which the Conservative government of Manitoba did when it came to power in 1958 was to enact a law called the social allowances act. What Mr. Roblin was proudest of was the fact that in the province of Manitoba, as a result of the social allowances act, the people of Manitoba in 1959 in effect wiped out the means test, substituting for it the magic phrase which years later the Liberal party has come up with—as it does with so many things—namely the needs test.

I have news for the minister. I would challenge him or his officials to come to Manitoba, where I will be glad to be their guide. After all, there is only one Liberal member from the province of Manitoba. I will take the minister to visit 10 or 20 people who now receive assistance under the social allowances act of Manitoba, which has been in effect since 1959. I will let the minister and his officials ask these people to explain, not the difference in theory or in fine print, but the difference in actual fact between living under the needs test, which has been in existence in Manitoba since 1959, and the means test which existed before then. If the minister does not wish to come with me he could go with the provincial minister of welfare of the province of Manitoba; but I am certain that nine out of 10 of the people the minister or his officials would meet, who receive assistance under the social allowances act and who undergo a needs test instead of a means test, would be unable to explain the difference between the two.

I do not oppose a needs test, though I do not think it is much better than a means test; but when you strip away all the fine language and theory I would suggest to the minister that the people do not know the difference because there really is not any difference. I suggest that most people would consider the two tests exactly the same.

While this bill will mean improvements in the categories listed by the minister, some of which I have already mentioned, it completely ignores two of the major requirements of people who are in need, particularly the older people. It completely ignores the fact that we in Canada—and we all ought to hang our heads in shame for this—have done, I was going to say virtually nothing, but this would be too kind. We have done nothing by way of providing housing for those in need, particularly housing for people who are retired and are now receiving the old age pension.

It is true that in most cities in Canada one can find a few housing projects for people of this type. A month or so ago I was present at the official opening of a very fine housing project in my constituency built under the auspices of the United Church of Canada, named—I am not being critical here—the Fred Douglas Home. Fred Douglas was a leading figure in the United Church in Winnipeg and was also a candidate for the Liberal party during the last two elections in the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre. This project is a very fine one, Mr. Speaker; but if you were to count the units in the city of Winnipeg built under the auspices of the United Church and the Roman Catholic Church, the Lions club, the Kiwanis and the Canadian Legion—and perhaps there are other organizations which have participated which I have not listed—the available units would number merely several hundred, certainly less than a thousand.

When one compares this with the needs of the elderly people who are on low incomes or on pensions in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal or any other city in Canada, it is apparent that this bill or anything which has been proposed by the government will be of little assistance.

We know from experience that unless this housing problem is solved, no matter how the pension is increased—and I will come to this later—what you are saying to the landlords who rent single rooms to the elderly people of this country, which are very often miserable, shabby and inadequate, is that any increase of $10 or $15 a month is an official notification that now is the time to raise the rents. This is what happens, and the old people have to pay these increased rents because they have nowhere else to go.

There is one other matter of tremendous importance, and this is the need of our elderly people to meet in one way or another their health requirements. In the province of Manitoba there is a provincial medicare program. I am not going to say that this program is of no use at all. Several thousand people have their bills paid by this program, and it is voluntary. Under this voluntary program several very serious shortcomings have already become apparent.

First of all, thousands of old people, who could have their medical expenses paid by the provincial medicare plan, do not. This is because having already had to pass through one means test—described as a needs test in Manitoba, though there is really no difference, as I said—in order to receive their pension, they simply refuse to go through what they consider, and what I agree to be, the humiliating experience of another interview with some government official, baring all their problems, expenses and financial resources.

I think in particular of a woman in Winnipeg who was born in the province of Manitoba, has lived in the province all her life and is now 83 years of age. She has no income except the old age pension of $75 a month. When I was talking to her recently she told me that she had to pay her premiums to the Manitoba medical service. I told her she was certainly entitled to have her medical insurance paid by the province under its medicare program. But she told me—and I can understand how she felt—that she suffered one means test in order to get her pension when she was less than 70 years old, and that she had no intention of going through another. So with a total income of $75 a month she pays several dollars a month to cover her medical insurance costs. There is nothing in this program which provides for that type of contingency.

We have a situation in the province of Manitoba where it is possible under the voluntary medicare program—and perhaps on the occasion when we debate the medicare legislation I will bring actual cases to the attention of the house—for a person getting the old age pension of $75 a month to apply for coverage under the provincial medicare plan, and to be turned down on the basis that his or her income is such that he or she is not entitled to assistance from the province.

This is the kind of program, Mr. Speaker, which under the Canada Assistance Plan it is proposed to subsidize. We are proposing to the provinces that even though they have an inadequate program in any of the categories mentioned, we will pay 50 per cent of the cost. I think that, not only does this not meet the needs of the people who are in need, but it is wrong in principle, as every other hon. member has said during this debate.

The problem ought to be one that sets national standards—minimum standards at least—and which says to the provinces: The federal government will pay 50 per cent of the cost, provided the provincial programs meet the minimum standards.

I am not suggesting that the standards be the same in all provinces. I am not suggesting that the provinces cannot give more assistance than is envisaged in the program, and I am not suggesting that the federal government in that case will say: We will not pay. I say that the federal government must set standards, just as it will set standards, I hope, in the months to come with respect to the implementation of medicare.

Were the federal government to say to the provinces: "We are prepared to share in the cost of a medical insurance plan for the payment of doctors and other health needs, provided the provincial plan meets certain requirements, namely that it is universal in character, that it is administered by a public agency, that it is portable from province to province," I see no reason why such program should not be adopted, and why such principles and standards should not be set for the provinces.

I want now to deal with a matter that has already been dealt with. I know it shall be repeating what has been said by many speakers, but I want to deal with the specific problem of those who are now receiving old age pensions or old age assistance. I am referring to those people who will never be able to get the extra income that will be available to people who are working, and who will be able to qualify under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan for certain benefits.

It has been said by members on the government side of the house, by members of the press, by radio and television commentators, that we in this group are filibustering; that we are holding up other hon. members. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was away for several days and am not certain what others have said about this subject. I have no objection to being labelled a participant in a filibuster. I am only sorry for one thing in this debate: I am sorry that the rules of the house prevent our conducting a real filibuster.

I am not different from other hon. members. I have not been able to spend much time in my home city since coming here in 1962. I, in common with other hon. members, was looking forward to spending most of the summer in my home town, in this case Winnipeg. Nevertheless, if I thought that by keeping this house in session all summer we would get an extra $25 a month, which I think is the minimum additional amount that every person receiving an old age assistance or old age pension should get, I should be very happy to stay here for the rest of the summer.

In a country with the great wealth, tremendous resources and small population that we have, for the government to say that the country cannot afford to give every person now receiving old age pension or old age assistance $100 a month, I think is disgraceful. We are all to blame for that, and we all ought to be ashamed of that.

An organization in the city of Winnipeg which works with elderly people, known as the Age and Opportunity Bureau, has estimated the minimum cost of living in that city. I know that other hon. members have referred to this question as it relates to the cities of Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal. I am concerned with all people across Canada, of course, but I am primarily concerned with the city of Winnipeg, because I represent that city.

The organization in question has estimated—and this was done more than six months ago, and I do not need to tell the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the cost of living has risen very substantially in the last six months—that a single retired person needs a minimum of $111.75 a month to live. I want to tell the minister, in case he does not know, that on such a sum people will not live high off the hog. Here is how the budget is broken down—and I quote from the Winnipeg Tribune of January 25, 1966:

> Food, $35.45; clothing $6.45; personal incidentals, $2.29; household supplies, $1.63; electricity, $2.02; housing, $35; reading material, $1.73; religion, $1.08; recreation, $2.09; transportation $3; entertaining, $1.28, personal allowance, $2.87; replacements, 80 cents; telephone, $3.41; health $12.65.

Let us look at these figures. I wonder how many members of parliament or other people in Canada would like to live on a food budget of $35.45 a month.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): It would be all right if you did not eat.

Mr. Orlikow: It would be all right if you did not eat. It might do some of us good to try it for one month.

Mr. Knowles: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Orlikow: I am speaking for myself, but certainly not for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in this respect.

Do you want to know how people can live with a food budget of $35.45 a month? This is what is stated in the Tribune article:

> Only the cheapest cuts of meat are on the food list. The highest-priced roast is 59 cents a pound.

You could spend a whole day going from supermarket to supermarket in Winnipeg or Ottawa to find any roast selling at 59 cents a pound. Continuing the quotation:

> A total of $1.19 a week is allowed for meat, fish and liver. For vegetables, fruits and juices, $2.06 a week is allowed.
> Food is recognized as the most flexible item for a person living on a low budget, as compared to housing, for example which is a fixed cost.

Out of a budget of $111.75 a month a person has to spend $35 for housing. I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare to come to Winnipeg for a couple of days. I shall be glad to take him around the city to show him the kind of accommodation he could get for $35 a month. We certainly would be ashamed to have anybody we know or related to us living under such conditions.

The minimum amount required, then, is $111.75 per month. That is why members of the house from all parties on this side, as well as many members from the other side would like to see, under the provisions of this bill, an immediate increase in the old age pension to $100 a month, and the age at which that is payable to be immediately brought down to age 65. I have heard comments to this effect during this debate, as well as during the session before the election, and during the election campaign. I have heard the argument put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), by the former minister of national health and welfare, by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and by other members of the government that, after all, people would be able to get more than $100 under the provisions of this bill if they needed it. The amount mentioned depended on the city in which the statement was made. If it were in one of the big cities it was $125 or $150; if it was made in one of the smaller cities it was $105.

There have been many stories, I do not know who inspired them, that the minister would get up and make a statement, when he was given an opportunity to speak, about increased pensions. Anyone would think that members have been breaking their necks to prevent the minister from making this important speech which would solve the problems of the needy. We have read stories about an announcement to be made by the minister that an extra $30 a month would be available for everybody. Even if this were true it would be a lot less than the $125 the Prime Minister talked about from one end of Canada to the other.

Even if it were true, as I say, it would only, I am told, be true provided the people who are in need agreed to submit themselves to the indignity of a needs test. I am not opposed to some kind of examination, some kind of test, some filling out of a form for supplementary needs. I suppose in our time there will always be some kind of examination in respect of what might be considered luxuries. But I am opposed, and I will always be opposed, to any program by which the older people of this country who have made their contributions in the years during which they worked would have to submit to any kind of test, whether it is called a means test or whether we gild the lily and call it a needs test, before they can get the basic necessities they require.

I have a good deal of respect for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He comes from a region which is one of the have-not areas of this country. Looking through the parliamentary guide I notice that he himself came from a family which had known want in the early days. Surely he does not need any more convincing that the older people of this country will not be living very affluently if they are given a minimum of $100 a month. Surely all the evidence of every interested organization, whether it be the age and opportunity bureau to which I referred earlier, or the Montreal Welfare Council or the Senate sub-committee on aging, points to the conclusion that the payments now being provided for our old people are insufficient and that they ought to be raised, and raised immediately.

I wish to close by adding my words to the words of so many members of this house from every party, including the Conservative party, who have urged the minister to reconsider his adamant position that the present pension of $75 a month shall not be increased except on the basis of a needs test. I hope the minister will announce when he speaks, whenever that may be, that the government has reconsidered and that the legislation will be amended to provide that the pension shall be increased immediately to $100 a month at the age of 65.

[Translation]

Mr. J. P. Goyer (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, nobody will be surprised when I say, like the previous speakers, that I am in favour of the resolution under study. They indicated, however, that they would vote for the resolution, but they spent their time stressing its omissions. I feel personally that it is a good piece of legislation and surely the best on which we shall be called upon to vote.

To hear members of the opposition, the federal treasury is like some manna or an inexhaustible treasure able to meet any requirements and aspirations. But if these members stood by their principles, they would say at the same time how much the measures they propose would cost and what tax increases they would entail for the people. If they were really honest, I think it would be easier for me to appreciate their position.

But it is obviously a good thing to make promises and support popular measures but, on the other hand, the cost involved to implement them is being overlooked and the truth is hidden from the people.

Older people have been mentioned mostly since we started studying this bill. Another measure that needs to be revised has been forgotten, the one concerning family allowances. In the last 13 years, expenses for old age pensions have increased by 150 per cent, whereas, during the same period expenses for family allowances have only increased by 50 per cent.

This means that while speaking, reminiscences of the last election campaign crop up. While emphasis is laid on assistance to the old people in Canada, the fact that there are still needy families in Canada is totally overlooked; there are parents who have to raise their children with the bare necessities of life. While old age pensions have increased 150 per cent and family allowance by 50 per cent, that fact overlooked perhaps intentionally, and the house is carrying on with what I call electioneering.

Much has been said since the beginning of the session about war on poverty, but when a bill is introduced for the purpose of helping the needy, and only the needy, efforts are made to extend such help to middle class people or those who have the minimum required to meet their obligations.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The New Democratic Party seems to be hanging on to socialism that was sound in the thirties in objecting to a needs test related to income in the social field. It is being recognized that gradually socialist parties all over the world are giving more and more support to assistance to the needy and are moving away from universal plans and when the New Democratic Party which, apparently, is the socialist party in Canada, steers clear of this 1966 socialist policy, I am surprised, because I thought these people were much more aware of the world trends of socialism. The sums of money made available to the needy and earmarked for the operation of social measures in Canada are getting larger and larger. Of course, when only $20 was being given to the old people, it was not sound business practice to have means and needs tests; it would have been much too expensive with regard to the money being given. But as far as the present bill is concerned, there are sound administrative reasons to justify an investigation of the income related needs, because the sums of money we are voting today for social assistance have become so large that it is economical for a government to investigate, in order to have more money available for the needy and to have money which, otherwise, would go to people who do not need it.

Exactly the same policy is being applied in retraining. The Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) has brought down a retraining program under which a worker who is unemployed and who refuses to make an effort to adapt himself to modern methods will get a minimum basic amount, whereas one who is willing to try to become reinstated in the labour market and an asset to the economy of the country is entitled to more which is necessarily an incentive to fit himself for present-day requirements. Consequently, in such a definite field as labour, we have legislation which is not uniform and provides not only for the individual but also for his wishes and for the situation in which he is living. It is only an extension of this political thinking into the social field to support an investigation of the income related needs.

This afternoon, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) stated that an inquiry similar to the income tax statement, for instance, should be preferred, where, in order to get a higher pension, one would simply have to fill out a form along the lines of the income tax statement. The member for York South is surely aware that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) is empowered to investigate the statements an individual makes to the income tax. And more and more, the income tax—

Mr. Lewis: It is only to make sure that it is honest.

Mr. Goyer: I am sorry but I did not get it.

Mr. Lewis: It is only to make sure that it is honest.

Mr. Goyer: To make sure that it is honest. I am not saying that those who would ask for more money as people in need are dishonest. I would not like the hon. member for York South to get me going on that subject but I only wish to tell him that he could have carried his idea to the end and said that we could have an investigation system to establish if the individual has made an accurate statement. And the hon. member for York South also said that it is odious. Is it odious as far as income tax is concerned? I do not think so. Would it also be odious to make an investigation about the income of a person who applies for assistance? I do not think so either and when the hon. member for York South spoke on behalf of his party—I think that is what he was doing—and said that the administration of the plan should not be turned over to the provinces because the per capita income was not the same, the way of life varied from one province to another—and he is right about that—and that therefore the central government should standardize the assistance, I think he was overlooking the constitution. To say only that in Canada we get too deeply involved in constitutional measures is to disregard the whole matter which is now in the air about the Canadian constitution. And it is to disregard the main lieutenant of the N.D.P. in the province of Quebec who claims loudly the respect of the N.D.P for provincial autonomy.

Mr. Lewis: That is right.

Mr. Goyer: When we hear about a policy in parliament and about another one during an election campaign, we are shocked and have good reason to be.

Mr. Lewis: It is the same policy.

Mr. Goyer: And I think that in taking into account constitutional requirements, in proposing that this plan be administered by the provinces, the federal government shows a constitutional realism which does it credit, all the more since as far as efficiency is concerned it is better that this plan be administered by the provinces because the provincial governments are nearer to the people and know better the needs of the people and the individuals. And if we are afraid of provincial governments, we must tell ourselves that they are neither more nor less virtuous than the federal government or the municipal governments.

Mr. Lewis: That is true.

Mr. Goyer: We must necessarily have faith in the other levels of government which know the needs of the population and which can therefore better assume their responsibilities. That is why I think that the government is introducing here its best piece of legislation. To be content to criticize it, to run it down, is not a very progressive attitude. Therefore, I think that one should rather see it as a good measure that can be further improved later.

• (8:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I presume this debate is coming to an end. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), unlike many of his backbench supporters, knows that a filibuster is not taking place and none is likely to take place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Those hon. members on the back benches opposite have not been here very long and are not very smart. If they thought it was a filibuster they should know I would be standing up moving an amendment, whereby all hon. members could speak again in the debate. But I am not prepared to do that because I am not sure it would be supported.

The government should be more aware of the fact that the measure before us is an important one, not because of what it contains but because of what is omitted from it.

There are very few benefits provided by this legislation which are not already in one way or another being provided by provincial governments. This proposal will bring together many pieces of social legislation which have been enacted by the federal government and will provide enabling legislation for provincial governments, through which they can assist people in fields now participated in by provincial governments.

As stated by the last speaker, the Liberal party has been very backward in bringing forward legislation with strings attached, making it necessary for provincial governments to provide certain minimum programs before they are acceptable. That is an argument I have listened to with some interest because it has been advanced on many occasions, and has provided something for the Liberal party to hide behind. The Liberal government, in so far as social welfare legislation is concerned, has been a conservative government with a small "c". It has never stepped forward farther than it could step back at the same time. In fact it has often been said that this government has taken two steps backward for every one forward.

Let us consider what was said in this house when the family allowance program was originally introduced. Children in all parts of the country were supposed to be provided with an amount of money sufficient to cover the costs of the basic necessities of life. No suggestion was made at that time that one level of assistance would be provided in one province and another level in another. This type of assistance was to be provided on a universal level in all provinces.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who said a few minutes ago that in respect of this kind of legislation the government should provide substantive measures allowing all provinces in Canada to take advantage of the federal lead and provide minimum standards throughout the country. It is a shame that people living in the province of Quebec are forced to exist as second-class citizens because of our social welfare legislation. I am sure that in each province in Canada some citizens are second-class because of certain legislative measures. People who live in one province should be in the same position as those who live in others, so far at least as social welfare is concerned.

Obviously it is because of a lack of foresight that this government particularly has been prohibited from adopting certain types of welfare legislation which would set minimum standards for all provinces. I have known our present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) for some time, and I have known something about his background, education and attitude. I have gained this knowledge through talking to him, listening and reading his speeches. He is one of the brighter young members of the Liberal party. Because of the obvious inadequacies of this Canada Assistance Plan the responsibility for it should remain with some of the minister's colleagues. I am sure the minister asked for a great deal more on behalf of the old pensioners of this country than is being provided by this measure. If that is not true, I am sure he is out of character in presenting and supporting this bill.

Let me indicate my support for what was said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) when he suggested that the responsibility for this bill must rest with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). Unfortunately, very often when members of parliament discuss legislation placed before them they do so in terms of what it does not provide. There are very few who will disagree with me when I suggest that the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan are such that a large number of people in this country will suffer. Many people have been told for a long period of time that the Canada Assistance Plan would be the Prime Minister's answer to his promise made in Timiskaming to provide $125 per month for those older citizens who are needy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) may have intended to raise old age assistance from $75 to $125 per month, but of course, as we all know, he is a slow starter. This is the same Liberal government which said a few years ago that a $6 per month increase in old age pensions would bankrupt this country. This is the same government that said because people demanded a $10 per month increase to old age pensions they should get it, whether it would bankrupt the country or not. Apparently this increase has had little effect on the financial resources of Canada.

It makes little difference that the test has been changed from a means test to a needs test. What the old age pensioners of this country need is an increase now. These people need more to live in relative decency, and they need more at this time and not three or four months from now. The Minister of Finance is the individual who has really set the pattern of the Liberal party's approach to old age pensions. Walter Harris started that pattern years ago when he was minister of finance, and it has been followed by successive ministers of finance.

It is interesting to note that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare said that an increase of $25 per month in old age pensions payable at age 65 would cost in the neighbourhood of $800 million. I am not convinced of that fact; but using the minister's figure one must conclude that our present program is costing us in the neighbourhood of two and a half billion per year, or about one third of our national income. That being the case I am surprised that the Prime Minister would even consider it possible to pay $15 per month. Such a program would cost us in the neighbourhood of $1,600,000,000 in addition to what will be required by this measure.

Surely it is time to stop members of parliament from making speeches such as the one made this afternoon. It was obvious that this speech was written by the officials who now sit in the gallery, and read by the hon. member. Let me suggest that those officials have little understanding of either economics or the needs of people. Certainly they do not have an understanding of those needs and the means of meeting them under our present economic structure. The speech made by the hon. member was very nice, but I felt I should have used the provisions of a standing order to question his right to read it. The thinking displayed by that hon. member is the type engaged in by members of this government. It believes that the establishment is always right, and that if those officials in the gallery say something is true it must be true. The government repeats those truths as gospel. It talks about $85 million being placed into the Canada assistance fund, and how wonderful this is going to be for the one million people who will be assisted in one form or another. If it does, it will amount to $85 a year for each of these one million persons, $7.83 a month or 23 cents a day, provided the provinces decide to pay their 23 cents a day. In other words, the federal government will not be contributing a quart of milk to most of the persons to whom they say they are giving this great deal of assistance. Twenty-three cents a day will constitute an improvement, but there are people in this country who write to their members of parliament—and I am sure the minister receives as many letters as the rest of us—pointing out some of the limitations of the legislation operating in the various provinces. I think the minister would agree with me that it is time we achieved some uniformity in this type of legislation and should be spending a lot more than 23 cents a day on a program for those in need.

The previous speaker mentioned provincial rights, but there are other rights. We are talking about the Canada Assistance Plan and the bringing together of all forms of assistance whereby we can assure that assistance is provided to those persons in need, if the province wishes to put the program into effect. Ontario has done very little in this field. I refer to the Disabled Persons Act, the mothers allowance, unemployment assistance, children's welfare and assistance, and so on. In each of these cases we leave the final decision not only to the welfare people, but worse, to the small municipalities in communities across the nation. I have often had occasion to speak with clerks of municipalities. In the case of a person obviously not capable of looking after himself or herself, a person who is in need and has a problem that could be met by receiving assistance in one form or another, I am told, "Yes, we agree that this assistance should be granted; but Mrs. Jones is no damned good. She is living part time with somebody else, and we won't give her any welfare."

The fact that she should be assisted for other reasons does not make any difference. The fact that her children are the same as other children who may be in more favourable circumstances morally, but that her children are in less favourable circumstances financially, does not make any difference. I am pleased that in my area there is a large, unorganized block of townships in which assistance is administered by the provincial welfare people and I am quite happy to have as our welfare district administrator a relative of a member of this house. The assistance granted under provincial welfare schemes by qualified people differs radically and is certainly much more humanely administered than the assistance being provided in many instances by municipal councils, who are still going by the old adage that was true some time ago and is becoming less true, that work is good and no work is no good, and if a person is not working, no matter what his reason, he is obviously no good and should not be supported by municipal funds, even if most of the money comes from provincial or federal government sources.

Although this measure is not very satisfactory, in that it does not contain anything for the old age pensioners of this nation, I would be very remiss if I voted against it. The things in this measure are worth while. Certainly, like most Liberal legislation, this measure will be amended in a couple of years because it has not been very well thought out. But there is really nothing new in the legislation and there is nothing radical about any of the proposals being made. The old age pensioner in this country has not been given any increase, except by those provinces which have had election campaigns recently. I will be interested to know what the minister has to say about the situation in Prince Edward Island, where the old age pensioner had been promised a $25 increase in pension immediately after the election. I wonder whether provincial elections will decide whether an old age pensioner should receive needed assistance.

I am sure that any province of Canada would be stupid to go into an election without promising an increase in the old age pension, but is it not a very odd situation for the federal government to allow the provincial governments to do what we should be doing for the old age pensioners, to decide when it should be done, when federal government money is involved? I believe this is a poor reflection on the responsibilities and powers granted to the federal government many years ago in respect to this kind of legislation. This responsibility and these powers have not been questioned in the field of old age pensions. We have decided, it appears, to renege in this connection and allow the provincial governments to decide haphazardly whether additional assistance shall be provided.

This is one of the few issues over which I should like to see an election. I make no bones about it. If I had the operation of my party there would be a filibuster and all kinds of motions, including motions to kill the measure if necessary. I would have this kind of filibuster because I believe that if an election were called everybody in the country, and this includes the old age pensioner, would know exactly what the situation was and would be able to vote as his conscience dictated. I would be very happy to leave it at that. This obviously will not be the case. However, the old age pensioner has a right to look to the federal government for protection.

In the budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) said that he anticipated an increase in the cost of living of 3½ per cent. I think it is ridiculous, in these circumstances, to say to the old age pensioner: Hold the line at $75. Believe me, most of them live entirely on this $75. It is ridiculous to think that these people can live on $75 a month when the cost of living will increase by 3½ per cent. It is not only ridiculous but, yes, it is criminally irresponsible for a government to allow the negotiation of contracts that increase the wage structure by 30 per cent and at the same time say to the old age pensioner: Hold the lid on in this regard, you are doing fine on $75.

We should take the problem of the old age pensioner out of politics and apply an escalator clause to the pension. Most of us thought when passing the Canada Pension Plan that an escalator clause should have been included therein. This is the way in which to handle many of the social problems facing Canada. The minister said that it would cost $800 million to increase the old age pension. It is said we would need $2½ billion to increase the old age pension, coupled with our other expenditures today. If we were to go back to a recession in this country such as we had in the early 1930's, when our total budget was less than $1 billion, we would immediately as politicians commence a downward movement on the old age pension; every time we found we were in difficulty we would affect the pension by moving it downward dollar by dollar. I believe it is not fair that the senior citizens of this country should find themselves pawns in a political game such as we have been playing ever since 1957 with respect to the old age pension.

It has been a case of "After you, Alphonse. Elect me and I will give you another $10." We have seen the Liberal party members promising in various constituencies from $46 to $125. It may be fine to have an election every year, because this is the only way in which old age pensioners can ever get a fair deal. If that is the way it has to be, then I am quite prepared to have an election. However it seems silly to spend 10 million or $15 million when we could sit down and intelligently discuss with the finance minister the minimum amount that should be established for the old age pensioners. He could tell us in a straightforward and honest way how we could introduce an escalation provision into the old age pension legislation to take care of the fluctuations in the cost of living. If the cost of living goes down, then obviously the old age pensioner living on a fixed income may find himself the richest man in the country, and those who work eight or ten hours a day would be earning less than he is. It is a fact that there are many Canadians, and there are probably some hon. members in this house, who have worked for less than $75 back in the thirties, and it is not beyond the realm of possibility that the economy of this country may some some day revert to this situation.

The government has clearly stated that the basis of our social security system is the old age pension scheme. Our disability pensions, our veterans allowance pensions and all other types of pensions are geared to the calculations on which the old age pension scheme is based. For this reason I believe that the federal government is not being fair and honest with the old age pensioners, for whom they promised to provide in their election campaigns. Their speeches were made up of very confused phrases which may have meant anything, and they continue to be confused. I defy any hon. member in the house to say what is the Liberal policy in relation to old age pensions. One hon. member says the government accepts the resolutions of the special Senate committee on aging and that this plan will provide a varying scale, according to the needs of old age pensioners. Others say that this special piece of legislation will provide a fixed income.

I believe the old age pensioner in Canada should be able to look forward to retirement in some comfort, because of the contribution and efforts he has made in the formation of this country. Our moral attitude has changed, since the days of my great grandfather and grandfather, who felt a moral obligation toward their parents. Today this is nearly impossible, because most young people cannot support themselves let alone support their parents. I believe it would be civilized of us to provide, through our tax structure, the necessary minimum for the elderly people of this nation, to provide them with a decent standard of living which they have so well earned. I do not believe we are now doing this. Those who have to live on old age pensions and on fixed incomes, including those who live on the pensions provided by the Canada Assistance Plan as enumerated in the various clauses of this bill, are not able to live with the minimum comforts they require.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) said that if he had to retire on $75 a month he would move into the hills, build himself a log cabin and live on bannocks. Most people do not know how to make bannocks or how to build log cabins, and anyway most people would not like to live in the hills. They could just as well be moved out into the snow and allowed to freeze.

We have reached the stage of affluence in our country which would allow us to provide a decent standard of living for these people. I defy hon. members on the government side, who are so opposed to spending a few days in discussing this matter, to stand up and say they represent ridings where there are no people in need. If there are such places, I would like to see them. It is more likely to be true in the riding represented by the hon. member from the west coast who spoke earlier today, where there are more old age pensioners than in other parts of the country because of the temperate climate and other considerations. However, even he will tell you that even living indoors in the rainy weather and sleeping under a lumber pile in good weather costs money.

There are many people in desperate need. I have met many Canadians who have spoken of needs of which most of us probably never think. Some people cannot afford to have their glasses changed to permit them to read or look at television. A few dollars would provide them with this necessity, but unless the Kiwanis or some other organization gives them a donation they are not even able to see what goes on around them.

I will conclude by telling you a story about an old fellow I met in the bush near a little town called Cheminis on the Quebec border in the north end of my riding. I went to see him there, together with a reporter from the Toronto Telegram. This old man was living on an old mine site in a shack in which coal was kept. He was sitting on the porch, rocking. I asked him how he was, to which he replied he was not well and had not been well all winter. I asked him why he did not go to a doctor. He said he could not afford it and besides he had no means of transportation for getting to one. I said "Your days must seem long". He said "Yes, they are very long. I am just sitting here, waiting to die. It cannot come too soon to suit me." The reporter from the Toronto Telegram interviewed this fellow on several occasions and wrote a series of articles about him. Later on he wrote his obituary. It did not take too long for him to die. The reporter was surprised and shocked to find that any man who had lived a fairly extensive life and had travelled over many parts of our nation should finally end his days sitting on the porch, waiting to die, too sick to worry about getting better and too poor to go to a doctor.

When I hear hon. members in this house saying Canada has the best social security system in the world, then I really feel sorry for underdeveloped countries such as Norway, Sweden, Great Britain and France that are worse off than we are. If they are worse off, then we should all be thinking about getting rid of a few billion dollars worth of arms and setting up a social security program which will be a credit to the Canadian nation. We have worked hard in this country and we have developed as rapidly as we can in our harsh climate, making the best of our abundant resources. I believe it will be a very sad day when a member of this parliament will rise and say that most of the people whom we are supporting under this legislation will have to go to bed in hunger and poverty in a country which, by the government's own admission, has the best social security legislation in the world. If this is true, then I believe the day has arrived when we should really do something about this situation.

I have known some of the Liberal cabinet ministers and backbenchers when they were sitting in opposition. At that time I found them to be as interested as I am in providing social security for the elderly in this country. I am shocked and disappointed to hear them thumping their desks, when they are not providing anything more for those people for whom they were so sorry when they were in opposition. I think if it were not for the fact that the finance minister has said that all our economy would be geared to the $75 a month for old age pensioners, we would hear the backbenchers in the Liberal party demanding a decent standard of living for the elderly, the disabled, the blind and the widows.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we would hear demands for much of the legislation to which hon. members have referred in relation to child care, nursery care and kindergarten care. Let us at least look at this piece of legislation we have now, under which we can provide an old age pension of at least $100 without a means test. Let me tell you that anyone who needs that money really does not need to explain why he needs it. All you have to do is go to his home and you will understand why he needs it.

I should like to conclude my remarks by giving one illustration of a family that had to meet a needs test. The gentleman of the family, who was badly crippled, lived on a farm all his life. He was the victim of some disease such as poliomyelitis, or some other disease which hunched him away over. He farmed for many years and received a small disability pension. Finally after 40 years he sold the farm, and put a few dollars in the bank for a little bit of furniture. His pension was cut off and he had to make some repayments to the government.

Finally, this family had $1,200 left in the bank. I went to see them and found they had no food in the house. I asked them why they did not take the $1,200 out of the bank to buy food. The answer I received was that they had been honourable people all their lives; they had worked hard all their lives on a farm which was not particularly good and upon which they had built a nice house. They said they had mortgaged the farm when the children were sick and when they had to go to school. They had worked all their lives to provide themselves with enough money, not to keep them but to bury them in honour. I had never thought about how people who were on welfare paid for a funeral. I know you did not leave them lying around. However, these people wanted to have $1,000 in the bank so that if the woman died first she would get a funeral that would be matched by that of her husband when he died, or vice versa. They had been partners all their lives and they wanted to get the same kind of funeral at the same cost. They wanted to pay for their own funerals with the money for which they had worked all their lives.

Perhaps some people can understand this point of view. I really was not that sympathetic to it. I really thought the welfare people would have allowed them to keep the money, because I could not persuade them to spend the money and go on welfare. I was finally able to convince the welfare people in Ontario to allow these people to go to the funeral parlour and buy a $500 funeral for each one. Then the welfare people would consider this a legitimate expenditure and these people would be able to get enough money to eat. The minister may say, well, there was not any need. I do not know if this situation would meet the needs test or the means test. It certainly indicates to me that any family that had worked hard to provide themselves with decent funerals ought to be allowed to go on welfare. These people really did not have enough money. I think this is the way we should handle welfare. So far as I am concerned this situation indicates the need for establishing the old age pension on a reasonable basis so that people would be enabled to live and die in dignity. Until this is done, I think the rest of the world will look at us and say we have not really accomplished very much during the one hundred years we have been a country.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I wish to make a brief intervention in this debate. It is not my intention to make a comprehensive speech on this matter, although I recognize it as being a very important one. All of us realize that at the moment time is at a premium, and only things of prime importance merit exhaustive study. I do beileve that things of such prime importance as the welfare of Canadians generally and of our older citizens in particular, do merit exhaustive debate if a solution of their plight cannot otherwise be found. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that I concur wholeheartedly with the views expressed by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon with regard to the crying need for a significant increase in the old age pension, without a means test. It is not my intention to review or to buttress this argument because I think all reasonable Canadians recognize this is a valid assertion.

The increase in the cost of living has made it impossible for Canadians to live adequately and with any degree of dignity on $75 per month in the many cases where that is the only income. I believe all Canadians have a right to be able to live in dignity in their declining years. I believe all Canadians who are now 65 or over richly deserve this minimum standard because people who are now 70 years of age were in their forties during the depression years, so that the years which should have been most profitable found them unable to advance their economic position sufficiently to provide for their old age and educate their families.

I want to raise a point with the minister which is of special concern to me. The government of Prince Edward Island has recognized what I believe to be a fact, namely that people who are not benefited by the Canada Pension Plan cannot live decently on $75 a month if that is their only income. The government of Prince Edward Island has already undertaken to pay a supplementary benefit of $25 a month to the recipients of old age security pensions. I have been informed that the government of Prince Edward Island—I stand to be corrected on this—has asked the federal government for a list of recipients of old age security in Prince Edward Island but it was not forthcoming. In any case, the government of Prince Edward Island has found it necessary to establish a system of registration for older citizens so they can become eligible for these supplementary payments.

I cannot credit the fact that the government of a province in this country which asked for this kind of co-operation from the federal government would not find it forthcoming, but I should like the minister to clear up this point. It would be of tremendous administrative benefit to the government and, more important, it would be of advantage to our senior citizens if supplementary payments from provincial sources could be made expeditiously by the federal government furnishing a list of recipients of old age security to the provinces. Before I leave this point I want to say that if the minister has not received this request I would be most grateful if he would co-operate with the government of Prince Edward Island in providing a list, in order to help that province expedite such payments.

I want to turn now to another matter. I do not intend at this stage to refer to the various clauses of this bill, but part V is entitled "Amendments to other acts". I have looked through this part very carefully and I am most disappointed that no amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act are mentioned. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because there are many cases where war veterans are in receipt of war veterans allowance, and I should like briefly to review the eligibility requirements for veterans to receive war veterans allowance.

From a service point of view, veterans of the Canadian forces are eligible if they served in a theatre of war: or if they are in receipt of a service disability pension or have accepted a commuted pension; or if they served in both world wars and were honourably discharged from the last enlistment in each; or if they served in the United Kingdom during world war I for at least 365 days prior to November 12, 1918, including sailing time between Canada and the United Kingdom.

The theory of the payment of war veterans allowance is that veterans who have done their service are paid war veterans allowance without medical examination at the age of 60 on the presumption—which I think is a good one—that they have been prematurely aged by their service. Therefore, generally speaking they cannot receive both war veterans allowance and old age security at the same time. However, the recipients of war veterans allowance in which I am especially interested are those who receive the maximum allowable under the War Veterans Allowance Act and yet, due to conditions over which they have no control, have extraordinary expenses due to disability, blindness or sickness in their families, or matters of this kind, and who, in spite of the fact that they are receiving war veterans allowance, are in dire need of additional social security of some sort.

The responsibility for providing this additional security falls either on the municipality or on the provincial governments. But when the municipality, the provincial government, or any welfare organization tries to provide this additional security to the recipient of war veterans allowance in order to make his position in life tolerable, his war veterans allowance is cut down by a similar amount and he is no better off.

It may be argued—and perhaps this is the case—that in the bulk of cases the recipients of war veterans allowance should not be entitled to receive old age security as well. With that I do not argue. But I would argue that there are many cases where under the present ceilings war veterans allowance is not adequate to meet the needs—and I use that word intentionally—of our war veterans. I know of no possible way at the present time in which the provincial government or the municipality concerned can improve the lot of the veteran who is dependant on war veterans allowance. If they give him any assistance his war veterans allowance is reduced by a like amount, because of the fact that these additional payments are reckoned as income.

However, income or revenue which the war veterans allowance recipient may have from other sources is not necessarily calculated as income. As a matter of fact there is a fairly wide range of sources of revenue to the veteran which are not calculated as income.

I should like to quote from a pamphlet produced by the Department of Veterans Affairs and which deals with war veterans allowances. Page 14 refers to exempt income, which is income not calculated in determining whether or not the veteran passes the means test for war veterans allowance.

"Exempt income" means receipts which are not considered when calculating how much allowance may be paid to a recipient. It includes income from the following sources:

(a) Allowances under the Pension Act and certain other laws for the service of attendants, or for the wear and tear of clothing;

(b) An additional allowance under the Pension Act for any dependant child or parent of a veteran;

(c) A pension or grant received in connection with a military decoration;

(d) Any casual earnings;

(e) War service gratuities or re-establishment credits paid under the War Service Grants Act;

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

(f) Mother's allowance or relief for dependant children paid by a province or municipality;

(g) Family allowances and youth allowances;

(h) Bank interest or dividends of $50 or less per year;

(i) Compensation for maltreatment while a prisoner of war (for a period of two years following payment thereof, after which it is regarded as "personal property");

(j) Scholarships or bursaries to orphans.

I would suggest most strongly to the minister that this act be amended so that payments under the act in the relatively small number of cases where they might be paid to recipients of war veterans allowance will not be calculated as income. In other words, payments under this act would fall within the definition of exempt income. In cases where war veterans allowance is received by war veterans, but because of a combination of unusual circumstances the war veterans allowance is not adequate to give them a reasonable standard of living, a supplementary payment could be made under this act without that payment being calculated as income, thereby causing the war veterans allowance which is paid to be reduced.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we must consider the problem of giving all Canadians a reasonable standard of living and a reasonable sense of fulfilment which is necessary to a satisfactory life. I think we must recognize that although all humans may be equal in the sight of God, all humans are not in fact equal because some are underprivileged while others are underendowed. The underendowment may be due to hereditary factors or to unpreventable experiences over which there has been no control, which makes it difficult or impossible for those people so afflicted to compete with their fellowmen at a satisfactory level.

The underprivileged are underprivileged perhaps because they have had an unsatisfactory environment, or an unsatisfactory home life as children, inadequate schooling, or perhaps because they have found themselves in a segment of our economy which has not given them opportunities they have needed. I feel that it is without doubt the responsibility of the various levels of government, public minded organizations and public minded citizens collectively and individually to try to do everything in their power to remove the things that cause some Canadians to be underprivileged. I think we have a responsibility to correct the effects of bad environment.

Regardless of how successful we might be in those endeavours of which I have just spoken, there are those who are still underendowed. It is my feeling and my belief that we should also accept their welfare as an obligation, so that the underendowed may still have a reasonable standard of life and partake of the benefit of what we like to think is the privilege of being Canadians.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, on entering the house about an hour ago, the member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer) was speaking. He spoke highly of the blessings of Bill C-207 for the destitute, the unhappy, the poor, the state pensioners, the old, the children of Canada. He stated that this bill would solve every problem, do away definitely with poverty in Canada. A few days ago, some of my colleagues took part in the debate on the motion for second reading of bill C-207. At that time we heard members on the other side of the house tell us, naturally, that we were playing politics, that we thought we were in full electoral campaign and that we lied to the people when elections took place.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to point out what the present government promised at the time of the last elections with regard to social security, welfare allowances, old age security and other matters. There was nothing the Liberal party did not promise. And now that it is in power, in Ottawa, it dares accuse others of playing politics.

Mr. Speaker, the member for Dollard was praising Bill No. C-207 entitled:

An Act to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare to and in respect of persons in need.

Its preamble is as follows:

Whereas the Parliament of Canada, recognizing that the provision of adequate assistance to and in respect of persons in need and the prevention and removal of the causes of poverty and dependence on public assistance are the concern of all Canadians, is desirous of encouraging the further development and extension of assistance and welfare services programs throughout Canada by sharing more fully with the provinces in the cost thereof.

This implies, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government does nothing by itself and, moreover, that it is ready to share with the provinces. Now the Quebec government, the former as well as the present government, has clearly stated its opinion on the subject of social assistance and social welfare: the province does not want any interference by the federal government. That is quite clear.

The former premier of Quebec, Mr. Lesage has said so; the new premier, Mr. Johnson has repeated it: Ottawa is not wanted in social security programs for the province of Quebec, because they do not want to pay double administration costs, nor double taxation, nor be at the mercy of Ottawa. As I said the other day, let Ottawa mind its own business; Quebec will mind her own.

Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-207 is a hoax, a lot of words, a lot of statements offering no solution. What, for instance, is being suggested concerning old age pensions? Will we raise the old age pension from $75 to $100 a month, as the official opposition asks? Will we raise it to $125, as the present premier promised in Prince Edward Island during the last election campaign? Will we raise it to $125 a month, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) promised in the western provinces, barely a month ago?

What does the bill say, Mr. Speaker? Absolutely nothing. For family allowance, absolutely nothing. As for assistance to needy mothers, to those in want, what amount is suggested? Absolutely nothing. And the government brings forward a 19-page bill to set out its concern for those poor Canadians, for those who suffer hardship. But what action do they plan to take to solve the problem? Absolutely none. Mr. Speaker, we will be accused of politicking here in the House of Commons when we make representations on behalf of the aged.

The hon. member for Dollard said a few moments ago: I support the increase in family allowances; I support the increase in old age security pensions; I support the increase in allowances to needy mothers. Support of what, of what amount, to relieve hardship and poverty in Canada at long last? Absolutely nothing. Those are the people who in the middle of the election campaign call us demagogues. Yes, they say we stir up people's passions. Mr. Speaker, my group, the Ralliement Créditiste, and myself voter for the Conservative amendment for giving $100 per month to the aged in this country. We voted in favour of such a pension. But I would now rather support the idea set out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in Prince Edward Island. One hundred dollars a month for a senior citizen in Canada no longer makes sense with the present cost of living. The Prime Minister mentioned $125 per month. Now, we in the Ralliement Créditiste support the Prime Minister when he says $125 per month. But let him grant it now that he is in office. That is what we want. Where are the elderly people who are not in need? Perhaps the former Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Louis St-Laurent, who gets $75 per month. Show me a Liberal member on the government side who did not promise an increase in the old age pension in Canada during the last election? My friend, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) made that a big promise.

Mr. Caron: No, I never promised that. That is false.

Mr. Caouette: I was in Gatineau riding then.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Caron: Never.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Hull guaranteed the old people in his riding an increase in the old age pension.

Mr. Caron: That is absolutely false: I never said that.

Mr. Caouette: I met some of his close friends, old people who are entitled to the old age pension—

Mr. Caron: They made a mistake.

Mr. Caouette: —to whom the hon. member for Hull had promised that he would strive for an increase in the old age pension.

Mr. Caron: I never said that.

Mr. Caouette: I am convinced, knowing the sense of responsibilities of the hon. member for Hull, that when the time comes to vote for a higher pension, he will raise both hands in favour of the old people in his riding.

Mr. Speaker, we heard a while ago, as I have already said, the hon. member for Dollard tell us that he was in favour of those pensions, those allowances, etc. But when the time came to vote, the member for Dollard voted against them. When the party now in opposition introduced a resolution designed to pay a $100 monthly pension, the member for Dollard voted against it under the pretext that a government defeat was to be avoided. As I said last week, if the government allowed a free vote as the one we had on capital punishment, I wonder who would vote against increasing old age pensions to $100 or $125 per month? Nobody in this house would vote against it. But no, at this very moment, we stick to the party line: whoever does not support the party leaves the party. Let us do this for our old people in Canada, for those who built what we now have, those who left us a heritage. Let us allow a free vote in the house and grant them this $125 monthly pension from the age of 65, because as everybody knows, no jobs are to be found at 65. Nowadays, a man of 45 is unable to find a job. It is impossible for a man of 50 to find employment because he is too old and the young people invade the labour market. Now, should all employers be asked to help those who are being replaced by the newcomers on the labour market? Mr. Speaker, such a solution would settle next to nothing.

The House of Commons, Canada, the Canadian provinces have been hearing about Social Credit since 1932, 1933, 1934, that is, for 33 years, and there are still some people who do not understand anything.

I see some of my hon. friends opposite find that funny, because they go through Quebec saying: "Social Credit is a question of printing money without consideration", just as the hon. member for Montamagny-L'Islet (Mr. Berger) likes to say in some parts of Quebec: "Créditistes want to solve everything with money, money, money". It is funny that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet should be the first to run after money; he is the first to run after it, but he does not think it a problem. You do not find it a problem when you do not have this problem; but for the people, generally speaking, it is a problem, and that is where the solution lies, in the money problem.

The Créditistes never said that money should be printed without consideration, and all the members know it. We said: According to facts, to realities. When there is $1 of production, there should be $1 in circulation, that is a balanced economy. What change—

Mr. Watson: Ah.

Mr. Caouette: I hear the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie. Where has my hon. friend heard about Social Credit? Where has he studied Social Credit? The same thing applies to my friend from Montmagny-L'Islet; where did he study Social Credit? In his riding, on the north shore, or at sea, as he was the other day when he spoke in the house against Social Credit?

Mr. Speaker, we have had enough of those people who invent all sorts of stories about Créditistes and against the solution we advocate as an alternative to this Bill C-207 that leads nowhere, which does not point out where we are going, which does not show us the way, which settles absolutely nothing because it is based on the decisions of the provinces. Inasmuch as the province will decide, inasmuch as the province will share, inasmuch as the province will want to share, that is Bill C-207.

Mr. Speaker, our solution is not that. What we want and what we require from the government, from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), is that they consult the Bank of Canada and especially its department of national statistics in order to get information. What is the gross production of Canada? We are told it amounted to $52 billion last year. What was the overall purchasing power or national income of Canadians for the same period? We are told that it amounted to $41 or $42 billion. There is therefore a difference of about $11 to $12 billion between our production and our earnings in Canada.

Is this purchasing power not enough to give old age pensions of $125 a month to all our senior citizens? Is that not enough to double family allowances? Mr. Speaker, those are the facts. Those are the figures, and there are still persons who expect people not to know chalk from cheese.

Mr. Speaker, we have a solution. We say to the government: Distribute to the Canadian people a national dividend based on the difference between the gross production and the national income of Canadians. Then, we could provide all those pensions without exception and we would not need C-207 to tell us that we do not know where we are going.

Mr. Speaker, the national dividend has made a great many people laugh in the past. Even members of parliament joked about it, but the national dividend is still the solution not only to the problem of social legislation itself, but to avoid for example the increasing number of strikes in Canada. What has the government to offer; what is the government doing in that field? Absolutely nothing. What are the workers demanding: their due and their due is precisely included in the national dividend advocated by Social Creditors. That is why all workers or the great majority of them take an ever increasing active interest in Social Credit proposals.

Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago, this theory is being expounded in the house since 1935, mainly because of the fact that there has always been a Social Credit representation here in Ottawa except for the 1958-1962 period. In 1962, we came back and demanded and claimed; we got nothing. Sure, we are given a post office, a wharf, an airport terminal, a landing strip, but what are we granted by way of social security? Absolutely nothing. Why? Because the government is in bondage to the financial system, and I am not the one who invented that. One day a prominent and mainly dominant financier, one of the Rothschild Brothers said: "Give me control over a nation's credit and I do not care who makes the laws of that nation".

The Rothschilds practised what they preached at that time. And that is what we heard with our own ears what we read with our own eyes in the Quadragesimo anno encyclical of Pius XI, in 1931, 35 years ago already. There are people aged 35, 40 or 50 here in this house who never understood what Pius XI meant when he said: "Those who control money and credit are the masters of our whole lives, and without their permission nobody has the right to breathe".

Without those people's permission we cannot pass legislation in Ottawa; without those people's permission we cannot legislate in Quebec; without the permission of those who control the nation's economic blood stream, no member can assert himself or prove his worth in the House of Commons of Ottawa, on behalf of his nation, of his people, of his country.

Mr. Speaker, it is that control which we are fighting; there are only nine of us and there are 128 on the other side to fight us. There are 96 or 97 in the other corner of the house to fight us but those two groups work hand in glove when it comes to controlling the economic blood of the nation. Those two groups get along very well when it comes to leaving the control to international or national financiers. To go down on bended knees to Washington or New York to borrow, to beg the right to develop our natural resources, those two groups get along very well. But there is only one group which fights with us against that, without going, however, to the heart of the matter; it is the New Democratic Party, the former C.C.F. They are not going quite to the core of monetary question; when they get there, they will be sitting with us here among the Créditistes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the proof of what I am saying is so obvious. I understand that when the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister of Canada, his government increased the old age pension to $75 per month but that was only three years ago and the cost of living was practically as high as it is today. Why then did not the Leader of the Opposition introduce legislation to give $100 a month to the old people of Canada? Why?

The battle-cry today is: Grant those $100, otherwise we shall defeat you. Had he granted them at the time, he might not have been defeated, but he refused to do so. If the present Prime Minister were replaced today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), the present Prime Minister, as leader of the opposition, would be heard telling the prime minister, who was the Leader of the Opposition: $100 per month makes no sense; it is not enough; grant $125 per month.

They try to outbid each other, whereas we should be doing what is absolutely necessary for the old people, the children, the needy mothers of Canada.

What is necessary to live decently? Not to starve decently; indeed not, but to live decently?

I see members of the cabinet here: the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) who knows all about it; the Minister of Industry and Defence Production (Mr. Drury); the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen); the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer).

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, do these people ask themselves whether Canada can produce enough wheat to feed elderly Canadians, whether it can supply or produce enough shoes and clothing for our old people, our children, our needy mothers, when the stores are full of all kinds of things? The Minister of National Defence knows all this; he knows how the National Defence stores are chockfull of all kinds of things—long johns for a thousand years to come—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: —to clothe Canadians. He knows all that. We are not short of clothes, in Canada.

An hon. Member: Sales of long johns.

Mr. Caouette: Long johns. You can see all sorts of sales organized by the Liberals these days. Especially in the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: And liquidations.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Caouette: Yes, liquidations, surplus sales, season sales, mid season and quarter-season sales and it always ends with long john sales. That is clear. There is all that in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare should use that clothing to help clothe those who need to be clad in our country.

Mr. Speaker, no one, no minister asks himself the question. Even the Minister of Forestry knows that I am right and he fully agrees with me in that respect. Canada can produce anything we need to meet the needs of our older people, our needy mothers, our children. We can produce anything in Canada. But because of financial considerations, we are told: "Holdit; do not distribute," while, on the other hand, economists speak of a break-down in distribution.

To distribute, what do we need? We need purchasing power. Given that power we will at long last get what we need. The other alternative is Bill No. C-207. In that respect, the government will decide to whom to give and not to give, to whom to distribute; the party or government backroom boys will go here and there to find the under-privileged, the poor, provided they are not too clearly tories. Mr. Speaker, I think it is riduculous—

• (9:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: I do too.

Mr. Caouette: —that the house should be asked to study such bills as No. C-207 which tells us absolutely nothing.

Even the government members are in a spot; they cannot explain this bill, because it provides nothing. We are waiting for the provinces to ask for something and we want to help the provinces.

Let us leave the provinces alone. If, in Canada, nine provinces out of ten want to accept Bill No. C-207, emanating from the federal government, let them do it. We shall not stop them. But the province of Quebec will not accept it. The province of Quebec will have its own social assistance plan. This is what the province of Quebec asks Ottawa: Give us back our sources of income so that we can apply this plan. In Quebec, we have no need for Ottawa to make our decisions. This is what Quebec wants. And this is where it is right. In this way, each of the provinces would be right. Only the other provinces prefer to take part in the federal assistance plan.

Mr. Speaker, let the other provinces decide otherwise, we do not care. Only let the province of Quebec be respected. We ask nothing from others but respect for our rights, our freedom and our autonomy. This is what we demand.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say about Bill No. C-207. It is 21 pages long, but contains no constructive or precise measure to fight poverty. As for the co-operation of Quebec, let us wait. Let us see what the Prime Minister of Canada will do with the premier of Quebec before saying what Quebec will get under Bill No. C-207.

I think the new premier of Quebec does not want to be stepped on.

Today, you can no longer say Liberal in Quebec, Liberal in Ottawa. I am convinced the present premier of Quebec will have the rights of the province of Quebec respected.

I see that the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) is shaking his head; it is because he is afraid for his seat in the next election. There is nothing, apart from that, in which he is interested.

Mr. Guay: Let the hon. member meet me again in my riding, as he did during the last election, because he is the one responsible for my election.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, you know very well I can meet the hon. member for Lévis any time, anywhere, any place, in any hall, in front of any gathering. He knows that. He does know it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak any longer on this bill; only I am waiting to see what the stand of the government of Quebec will be; after that, we will be able to fight, in full light, for the rights we have and not for those we do not have. Until then, I am still convinced that there should be a way of passing a social piece of legislation in Canada, in agreement with the provinces, so as to make Canada a country where those who are in need get more, receive the best treatment, in brief, enjoy at least security while preserving their freedom.

[English]

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, even at this stage in the debate I find it necessary to rise to speak on behalf of one of the most significant pieces of legislation ever presented to this House of Commons. The Canada Assistance Plan, and I say this with all due respect, enters into an area which has been the responsibility of the provinces, the administration of welfare.

Unfortunately in this debate another matter has been introduced which has clouded the issues in this piece of legislation, and has introduced a problem of which we on the government side are very much aware, the question of the inadequacy of pensions as presently provided by the Old Age Assistance Act.

Let me remind members in all parts of the house that it was the Liberal government which introduced the Old Age Assistance Act, and that it was the Liberal government which provided $56 of the $75 now allowed our elderly people. The present Liberal government, including all hon. members on the back benches, are just as much concerned about the senior citizens of this country as are hon. members on the opposite side.

It is very difficult to follow the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, whan speaking in this house. I have not spoken too often, but perhaps what I will say now will be much shorter and much more to the point. I abhor the parochialism which is often introduced in the House of Commons by the continued reference to the province of Quebec. I lived in that province and I think I know the aims and the objectives of the French Canadians just as well as, and probably better than many individuals still living there.

We need Quebec, just as much as Quebec needs the rest of the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps my remarks are now not too closely related to the subject matter of the bill now before us, but I feel obliged to make them. I have been the head of a small municipality and I know their problems. At pages 5 and 6 of Bill C-207 municipalities are mentioned. They are of course, the creatures of provinces, and provinces according to the B.N.A. Act, are responsible for welfare. There are widow, children, blind and disabled who need assistance; but because of the lack of funds available provinces, including the affluent province of Ontario, they cannot be provided for adequately. The Dominion of Canada is providing extra assistance up to 50 per cent for these people and many, many others in the way of surgical, medical, obstetrical, dental and nursing services.

I noticed this afternoon that the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Groos) mentioned homemaker services. I have had something to do with the local Red Cross board that is concerned with the provision of these services in a temporary situation in order to keep the children in the home. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman), who represents an area 12 miles from the area I represent, last week suggested that if the extra assistance were provided for senior citizens we could do away with the Canada Assistance Plan. I deny this because an entirely different situation prevails. The people receiving benefit under the Old Age Assistance Act have been provided with an income and have worked for the pension they receive. They are entitled to extra assistance in their old age.

I noticed that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) took some exception this afternoon to a suggestion that the official opposition were filibustering in this debate. I believe that members of the Conservative party have every right to state their views, but would point out that in the last election campaign the official advertising of the Conservative party stated that $100 a month would be paid at age 65 and it was changed to $100 a month at age 70.

I feel obliged to speak in support of this bill. I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) was on his feet to speak, but I feel obliged to state my views because I believe this bill will provide much needed assistance in an area entirely separate from people who are recipients of the old age pension and will provide not only $100 a month but $125 a month, and with the assistance of the federal government probably more than that, for every person really in need.

I suggest that the $100 a month, which is an extra $300 a year, for the people at present receiving the old age pension might have been sufficient in 1965 but in 1967 it will be less than sufficient. I think that the Canada Assistance Plan and the provisos in respect of the disabled, blind and people receiving benefit under the old Age Assistance Act, will provide a great deal more money to those in need.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Hymmen) emphasize that our senior citizens are entitled to fair treatment in their advancing years. Before the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) speaks I think that more members on the government side of the house should rise and express their views, as did the last speaker. I believe it is the duty of each member of this house to express his or her views on the problems that has been before us during consideration of Bill C-207. I refer to the problems of so many of our senior citizens in trying to live on the present old age security pension of $75 a month.

The plight of so many of our old age pensioners was very clearly presented earlier today by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). He also very clearly outlined the efforts of those on the opposition side of the house—I refer particularly now to the Progressive Conservative members—ever since the session started to induce the government to raise the pension to $100 a month.

There is no need to repeat the statements of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, although I have many of them here, because they have been placed on the record so forcefully and I am sure they will go all across the country in outlining our stand with regard to this problem. All I wish to say now is that I fully support all the statements made by our leader.

Bill C-207, known as the Canada Assistance Plan, has a great deal of merit. Speakers on this side of the house have agreed with this statement. The merit of this bill will become more apparent in the years ahead. We are not criticizing the bill for what it is intended to do in those years. As has been pointed out, the federal government will join with the provincial administrations in providing greater benefit for the disabled, the blind and the aged. All we are pressing for is the need for definite and immediate action for higher old age pensions. We are not advocating something new. An old age security pension of $100 a month was a plank in our platform in last year's election campaign, prior to the vote on November 8. I wish to emphasize this statement, Mr. Speaker, that the call for $100 a month was in our platform in the election campaign prior to the vote of the people on November 8.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the house leader to tell us the business of the house before he leaves?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will consider the resolution preceding the Bank Act revision; the second reading of the crop insurance bill; the committee stage of the National Arts Centre bill; and the Canada Assistance Plan. These items will not necessarily be taken in that order. We would like to feel free to call them in any order.

Mr. Knowles: What will be the first item?

Mr. McIlraith: It has been quite apparent to all hon. members that it is not very easy to assess whether the house is interested in proceeding with the consideration of the Canada Assistance Plan. If hon. members are not interested in doing so, it may be better to try to bring legislation before the house with which the house will be willing to deal.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the minister had an important statement to make.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should know that the continued opposition to an important piece of legislation such as this is not conducive to maintaining the high opinion which we hope this parliament holds in the minds of the public.

Mr. Knowles: That is a completely unwarranted statement.

Mr. Douglas: And it is untrue.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—HOUSING LOANS BY BANKS AT N.H.A. INTEREST RATES

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should pause momentarily to let the house empty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I want to give the hon. members time to go to their offices and sign their names.

I have certainly heard sanctimonious bunk before, but the last statement tops them all.

Mr. Douglas: And said with a straight face.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the matter I wish to raise tonight deals with the continuing difficulty that we are having in this country in dealing with the financing of housing expansion. Over the last several months hon. members have continually raised with the government the difficulties which the housing industry is experiencing because of the shortage of mortgage money. We have tried to point out to the government the fact that a good many of our builders are closing down their operations, and that the number of applications for the approval of mortgage loans has been dwindling. Recently I placed a question on the order paper to try to ascertain the number of direct mortgage loans that have been granted in my home area of Toronto. I discovered that six, I think, have been provided during the month of June and five or ten during the month of May.

The whole housing industry in Canada is experiencing at present a very severe drought in the provision of money with which to finance building construction. We have tried, unsuccessfully, to convince the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for C.M.H.C. in the house, that this is a serious problem. He has replied with the usual parade of statistics supplied by his officials, which would seem to indicate that the situation is not at all serious. We have tried to show him the large number of builders from coast to coast who are gradually closing down their operations because they simply cannot finance building any longer.

We suggested to the government that one solution would be for the government to directly enter into the mortgage field, instead of having the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation become a secondary lender who picks up the slack when the conventional lender is not prepared to enter the field. We have suggested that the government become the primary lender. After all it is the government which arbitrarily sets the rate—and I do not quarrel with that—restricting the C.M.H.C. to 6.75 per cent. If the government decides to limit that interest rate, then it should ensure that sufficient funds are available to meet the demand for housing loans. In the last two or three weeks this has become a highly critical problem, certainly in the area which I represent and which many of the members on the government side represent.

Quite frankly, at the present time the conventional lenders are out of the housing field pretty well for the year. Not unwisely, they have diverted their lending facilities to areas of higher yield. They are required to provide the maximum returns to their shareholders, and therefore are naturally going to lend in areas in which they can get maximum returns on their investments. I do not quarrel with this idea. I ask the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Sharp) what consideration the government is giving to making it possible for our banks to re-enter the field of housing loans. A few years ago the banks suddenly became very active in this field, and that was most helpful. Lately they have not been interested. What we really need in this country is some assured source of mortgage money.

In the past the government at Ottawa has tended to turn mortgage money on and off like a tap, not to provide housing but to provide employment or to influence the economy up or down. When things begin to slow down the government makes much more money available to make the construction industry boom. When the government feels the economy is becoming overheated, the money supply is turned off. This has a most unsettling effect on the whole housebuilding industry, because we have no real assured source of mortgage funds in Canada. I was interested, therefore in finding out what the government has in mind, if it has anything in mind, which would permit the chartered banks to go back into the field of insured lending under Central Mortgage regulations. After all, the banks cannot lose. Everybody is insured except the poor fellow who buys the house. They really have nothing to lose and everything to gain. Some bankers tell me that these poor, under-nourished banks would be prepared to enter the field. I was wondering what the government had in mind. Mr. Speaker, in his wisdom, ruled my question out of order, but we would be interested, as I am sure would thousands and thousands of builders as well as potential purchasers of homes, in ascertaining what the government intends to do in this field.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question raised by the member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), it affords me pleasure to thank him for his remarks.

Of course, as far as mortgages for the construction of private homes in Canada are concerned, I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) has clearly indicated on several occasions in the house that the situation is not as bad as the member for Danforth would have us believe.

The question I wish to answer this evening deals with the point he raised, namely whether the government intends to implement policies designed to enable banks to grant mortgage loans. Of course, this is a matter of government policy which, according to tradition, will be announced in due course, but I may say to the hon. member that within a few days, if our debates resume their normal pace, we shall be able to study the resolution concerning the Bank Act and he will then have the opportunity to raise this matter. I am pretty sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will be in a position to answer this worthwhile question.

PUBLIC SERVICE—IMMIGRATION STAFF ASSOCIATION COMMUNICATION RESPECTING MORALE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): On June 17 I directed a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) in his capacity as vice chairman of Treasury Board. The question arose from a series of most disconcerting letters which reached me, as well as every other member, in which a very positive indication is given of a dangerous situation resulting in a serious loss of morale within the civil service. The specific letter which prompted the question came from the central branch of the Canadian Immigration Staff Association, and I quote from that letter:

• (10:10 p.m.)

> The situation being created by this apparent "foot dragging" by the government in concluding these promised pay increases is quickly reaching the critical stage with regard to employee morale.

This was a letter directed to the Minister of Finance and written by D. R. Davies, the representative of the Kitchener branch. In the accompanying brief by Mr. C. A. Edwards, who is chairman of this group, he stresses the following point:

> The point has now been reached where the discontent and dissatisfaction expressed by our members in these two categories can no longer be contained and I want to advise you in all seriousness that if the Treasury Board is not prepared to recommend an adequate adjustment forthwith for the employees in these categories then I cannot, as chairman of the staff side conference, be responsible for the crisis that will surely develop. The Treasury Board has the authority to avert such a crisis and I would strongly suggest that you take the necessary action to avert it before it is too late. We are all aware of the pockets of discontent and dissatisfaction that are increasingly appearing throughout the service at various levels. This will surely soon develop into a full scale crisis of unprecedented dimensions unless the Treasury Board stops ignoring these developments and takes the necessary and required action in the form of adequate pay revisions forthwith and without delay.

We are all aware that in the reclassification that has recently taken place in the National Employment Service and in the accompanying examinations for this reclassification, a great deal of uncertainty has been created within that particular division. The basis on which these examinations were conducted is being questioned. The matter of adjustments and the question of review has been left up in the air, and serious dissatisfaction exists within this service.

Last week I had a call from an employee at the central post office in Ottawa who complained about working conditions in that building and asked me to take a look for myself. I availed myself of the opportunity to inspect the premises, and although some of the criticisms made by this employee were borne out by my inspection—the fact that the building was not kept as clean as it might have been, the overcrowding in the building and the poor ventilation of the building—in fairness I think it might be pointed out that perhaps the Post Office Department cannot do a great deal about these matters, with the exception of the cleanliness of the building.

I think that what was probably more significant about my visit was the fact that these are only symptoms of a far more serious situation, which is the loss of morale that is occurring within the civil service because of the refusal of the government to take action and to look into these various complaints that are being brought to its attention.

I received a letter this morning from an officer in the customs and excise branch, and among other things he says:

> I expect by this time you will have become aware of the extreme dissatisfaction created amongst federal civil servants by the implementation of the government's reclassification plan.

He goes on:

> No doubt others will be writing to you in the same vein, and probably the various branches of the departments concerned will provide you with details of the retrograde steps being taken. Salary cuts, to my mind, are symbolic of depression days, and it is hard to reconcile such acts in times of what our political leaders constantly assure us are "booming". The only boom we have experienced is the one they have lowered on us.

This morning I received a telegram from Mr. John Jackson, the national president of the Customs and Excise Officers Association, in which he says:

> At a meeting of branch presidents held in Toronto this week end the Customs and Excise Officers Association protests against the implementation of the classification revision program because, one, we believe classifications should be bargainable, two, salaries should be bargainable and the government has effectively downgraded the salaries of as many as 40 per cent of our members in the administrative support categories; three, we want a regulatory group distinct and separate from the clerical group for people performing regulatory functions; four, we want people in holding positions to be able to maintain their standard of living by receiving the full benefits of salary revisions as though classification revision had not taken place until the holding situation is relieved by natural attrition such as staff turnover promotions and retirements; five, we believe that if the salary levels announced for October nineteen sixty-six were effective October nineteen sixty-five the situation would be greatly relieved.

A number of things are evident from these letters, the most serious of all being that the government's refusal to take action may result, if that has not already taken place, in a serious loss of morale in our highly valued civil service.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamenary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Knowles: Boom boom Munro.

Mr. Munro: I believe there has been some misunderstanding from the question as put by the hon. member. He indicated that he wanted to debate the question of morale in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, without any particular reference to the cause—if you will check Hansard you will see what I refer to—of that loss of morale.

I am here on behalf of the minister to go into the question asked. From listening to the hon. member it seems that his complaint has more to do with the reclassification process within the civil service, pay increases, and so on, than with anything else. A good many of his remarks had to do with complaints emanating from officials in the customs and excise branch. I think, therefore the more appropriate answer should come from the minister responsible, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Saltsman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I regret that there can be no point of order at this time.

CANADIAN FLAG—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION FOR DESECRATION

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I directed a question to the Minister of Justice, asking him if there was any means available which would allow for the prosecution of those who desecrate and/or destroy the Canadian flag and other national symbols. I asked this question on the day before Dominion Day, because of the unfortunate incidents which took place on that holiday in 1965. Many hon. members will remember how last year some ungrateful and irresponsible persons in Montreal tore down our flag, ripped it and burned it. Similar incidents have been repeated on too many other occasions. In asking this question I was hoping that the government might give notice of stiff sanctions to those persons who might think of repeating this behaviour.

It appears, Mr. Speaker, that similar demonstrations were planned this year, but they were broken up by the Montreal police before they could start. The Montreal Gazette of July 2, which is this past Saturday, reports as follows:

> A highly-organized force of 250 police put a damper on an attempt to stage a parade protesting against Confederation.

Further on it says:

> The police took 50 persons into custody as the group did not have a permit.

And further on, still talking about this group:

> They were to surround the statute of Sir Georges Etienne-Cartier and denounce him as a traitor to French Canada.

I am not an extreme nationalist, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact I favour nationalism only as a means of bringing a more total and more significant contribution to internationalism. I believe that if we are going to make a proper contribution on the international level, then we require a certain national unity and a certain national purpose. National symbols are a means of unifying people. They represent in a graphic way the unified feelings and history of a people. Although the people are free to democratically change their institutions, their laws, and their symbols, they should not be free to blatantly insult and desecrate these institutions and symbols. Such acts only cause unrest, conflict and vengeance. They are not the acts of a civilized and mature society.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken thus far of those who actually desecrate and insult our national symbols, but I must also mention those who fail adequately to honour them. We have just completed our 99th birthday and celebrated Dominion Day, but how many Canadians took any time to honour their country's institutions and symbols? We set aside only one day in the year for this purpose, yet for many Canadians this seems to be too much. Many of these people will quickly criticize those who tear and burn our flag, yet they will do very little to honour it. If these Canadians who supposedly support our institutions and our way of life do not show the way by honouring their symbols, then how can they expect to have them honoured by others?

Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will tell us what can and should be done to discipline these people, and if the law does not presently provide any such sanctions, then I hope they will bring forward some legislation to deal with them. I might in this regard refer to Bill C-209 introduced recently by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme). This bill would introduce a new section in the Criminal Code which would read as follows:

> Every one who fails to pay proper respect to, causes damage to, destroys, alters, defaces, or desecrates the National Flag of Canada or a recognized national symbol of Canada, is guilty of an indictable offence or an offence punishable on summary conviction—

And so on.

Mr. Speaker, we need some law to sanction those who insult our flag and other national symbols. If there is no such law at present, I would strongly recommend Bill C-209—or a similar measure.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to reply only briefly to this important question on behalf of the government, and to say that in my opinion the adoption by parliament of a Canadian flag was one of the greatest steps forward to Canadian maturity. The new flag is a sign of our maturity, and merits proper recognition, as one of our national symbols. All those who do other than honour something which was achieved through such great agonies of parliament—

Mr. Knowles: You were not here.

Mr. Winters: I was not here at that time, but I suffered with the nation. Those who desecrate the flag are, I think it is fair to say, almost to be pitied because they are demonstrating a lack of maturity and a real want of understanding of the meaning of our national symbols and of the state we have now reached in the development of our history.

In the last election campaign in which I participated, I detected a greater response to this new symbol of Canada's unity than by almost anything else. While we are all aware of the arguments which were presented to parliament at that time, I believe it is generally accepted across the country that the fact that we now have a flag of our very own is a great step forward in our march to maturity as a nation.

I am glad my hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) has raised this point. I must say I was impressed by the attention devoted to the recognition of our national holiday. Those of us who were here in Ottawa had an opportunity of seeing the great demonstration before the parliament building in which many of the nationalities which compose the totality of Canadian citizenship were represented.

Mr. Knowles: Thousands of Ottawans on the lawn did not think much of it.

Mr. Winters: I thought it was a splendid demonstration, an outstanding recognition of the total composite of Canadian citizenship based on the two founding races, and I am very happy on behalf of the government to tell the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that we will take full note of the important contribution he has made here this evening.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Patrick T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe) presented the second report of the standing committee on standing orders.

[English]

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS—NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West) presented the ninth report of the standing committee on transport and communications and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that there is no recommendation from the committee which would require the concurrence of the house at this time.

PENITENTIARIES—FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie) presented the first report of the special joint committee on penitentiaries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to submit a motion in writing to the Chair.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TABLING OF LETTER TO HEALTH INSURANCE ASSOCIATION

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to table the correspondence requested by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (2:40 p.m.)

INTERPRETATION ACT

PROVISION FOR REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-9 (from the Senate) to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE

PROVISION FOR EMPLOYMENT SAFETY IN FEDERAL WORKS

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Labour) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-35 (from the Senate) respecting the prevention of employment injury in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING ALLEGED PROVISION OF COMPULSORY ARBITRATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Did he receive a telegram from the solicitors of the International Longshoremen's Association regarding the settlement to which he was a party? Can the Prime Minister also tell me whether he has heard from Mr. Claude Jodoin complaining that Bill C-215 amounts to compulsory arbitration, and that it had been made very clear to the members of this union at the time the settlement was finally agreed upon that nothing in the nature of the legislation now on the order paper would be brought into effect in any way?

What is the Prime Minister's answer to the allegations that are made in the telegram that in his office and in his presence the Minister of Labour raised the question of final and binding arbitration—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the question is rather lengthy. It should be condensed if possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a very long telegram, Mr. Speaker, and I was reading three lines from it.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, of course, that he cannot read the telegram as part of his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The telegram continues as follows:

> The Hon. Nicholson raised the question of final and binding arbitration and again President Jodoin strenuously opposed final and binding arbitration being part of any settlement...

What has the Prime Minister to say in this regard, and is it the intention of the government to proceed with this bill before the summer adjournment?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have received the telegram to which my right hon. friend has referred, and I have replied to it. The Minister of Labour has replied to it at greater length, and has challenged and denied some of the facts alleged in the telegram. There will be ample opportunity to discuss the matter when the bill is introduced and proceeded with, as it will be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will that take place before the adjournment?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment.

[Later:]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, related to one asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. Would the Prime Minister give consideration to tabling (1) a copy of the memorandum of settlement between the shipping federation and the longshoremen's association of the St. Lawrence ports, and (2) all letters, copies of letters and telegrams sent or received by him and the Minister of Labour to or from the unions and their solicitors?

Sone hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Lewis: I ask this now because I understand that Bill C-125 will be coming before this house shortly, and I think it would be helpful if these documents were available.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to give consideration to the tabling of all the relevant documents.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE TROUBLE FOLLOWING IMPRISONMENT OF UNION OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question which I intended to put to the Minister of Labour. I sent him notice, but in his absence perhaps I might ask it of the Solicitor General. In view of the possibility of serious difficulty on the Vancouver waterfront arising out of the imprisonment of ten officers of the longshoremen's union on the west coast, has the government given consideration to the possibility of the governor in council taking action by way of a remission or a pardon in this case so the imprisoned longshoremen may be released from jail shortly, thus avoiding future difficulties?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): I propose to take the question as notice so I will have an opportunity of discussing the matter fully with the Minister of Labour on his return tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TAKEN FOLLOWING U.S. BOMBING OF NORTH VIET NAM CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that he keeps posted on the developments in Viet Nam, can the Minister tell us if the government has officially protested against the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong, and if bombing of those two cities is now being pursued?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister answered that question yesterday. The fact is that we discussed the matter recently with the representatives of the United States.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER RESPECTING MEDICARE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the reservations expressed by the premier of Quebec, Mr. Johnson, on the federal medicare plan, is the Prime Minister in a position to tell the house whether he has exchanged views with the premier of Quebec on this matter?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not on this particular matter, Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, although I will check as soon as I get back to the office.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the views expressed by the premier of Quebec result in a change of plans on the part of the federal government and prevent the bringing down of this resolution before the adjournment?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we expect to proceed with this piece of legislation.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF SUBSIDY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that his announced policy of paying $4 per hundredweight on manufacturing milk has caused serious injustice to dairy farmers, would he be prepared now to announce a revision of that policy to make the payment $4 f.o.b. the farm?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy as announced in this house quite clearly stated, and I emphasize the exact words, "the support level will provide an average net return of $4 per hundred pounds of manufacturing milk testing 3.5 per cent butterfat content, basis f.o.b. the factory."

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, f.o.b. the factory.

Mr. Greene: F.o.b. the factory; that was my announcement in this house at the time the policy was announced. I was very careful also to point out, if hon. members would read Hansard before asking questions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Greene: I was very careful to point out also that the federal government did not have the authority to fix prices within the provinces, and that price fixing would be a provincial matter or a matter for producer organizations within provinces. All this information is contained specifically in the words in which I made the statement in this house at the time the program was announced.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Starr: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the implementation of this policy has caused injustice to dairy farmers, will the minister revise it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Will the minister consider revising—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot include an allegation as part of his question.

Mr. Starr: Would the minister now consider revising the policy so this $4 per hundredweight on manufacturing milk would be f.o.b. farm instead of factory?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as I made clear in my statement there is no constitutional way in which we can fix the price f.o.b. the farm. Naturally, costs of transportation as between one farmer and another vary. I do not think the hon. member would suggest that the cost of transportation to a farmer who has to truck his milk 20 or 25 miles is not greater than the cost to the fellow who lives right next door to the factory. Therefore the actual fixing of price under the constitution is a provincial matter.

I understand that there are some difficulties with respect to transportation and transportation costs which have been raised by the manufacturers. This is a matter which is purely within provincial authority. In fixing the price of the milk through milk marketing boards, transportation costs can be considered. While I am very anxious, as I know all hon. members of the house and others are, to do everything I can for the farmers—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder whether instead of the minister making a speech the Chair would ask him to be concise and to answer the question that was posed to him.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, so we will get right down to it, does the minister say that constitutionally, while he can fix the price to be paid for fluid milk at the factory at $4, he cannot fix it at $4 on the farm? Is that what he tells us?

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I know the right hon. gentleman is far more familiar with the constitution than I, but the government's policy was stated quite clearly, as follows; that it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is not another commodity on the Canadian market which bears transportation costs, in part or in whole, of this sort, would the minister say that he will now change his milk policy so as to make for a more equitable distribution of payments to the farmers?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think in making a 40 per cent increase in a three year period we have effected an increase which is larger than the increase relating to any other commodity. I think the federal government's policy in this regard is most adequate, and I believe the farm organizations have so expressed themselves.

I hope that in conjunction with provincial organizations we can evolve a policy which will be satisfactory both to the manufacturer and to the farmer, and we are working toward that end every day.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, one further supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister to whom is his policy satisfactory, himself or the farmer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he figures that $3.15 is satisfactory to the farmers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roxburgh: It is better than $2.85.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that there are constitutional limits as to what the federal government can do, and in view of the fact that there is a new government in Quebec, would he now invite to Ottawa the ministers of agriculture of these two central provinces, which must co-operate to make this milk policy work, so as to work out with the help of two co-operative provinces a method which is constitutionally sound and which will make it possible to give the farmers what was promised?

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, prior to the formulation of the policy I was in communication with the ministers of the various provinces, and I think I can say we worked together in harmony in arriving at this policy. In view of the teething problems respecting the program that my hon. friend refers to, including transportation costs, I am pleased to let him know that I have teed up a meeting with the provincial ministers of Quebec and Ontario for Thursday morning.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

When the minister informed the house of the government dairy policy he gave a clear and precise impression, throughout Canada, to all farmers, that from now on—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must, at this time, put a question.

Mr. Caouette: —all farmers would receive $4 per hundredweight.

Today, the minister tells us that, due to transportation, the $4 is not paid to farmers. Can the minister take some action so that farmers may get $4 per hundredweight for milk? That is what we want to know.

Mr. Speaker: This question is a repetition of another one which has already been put several times this afternoon.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister meet with the minister of agriculture for Alberta to discuss means of remedying the situation in which Alberta dairymen are receiving $2.81½ cents per hundredweight for milk sold as cream, a price which includes the 75 cents subsidy, and they are receiving for milk sold as manufacturing milk—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon member that though the first part of his question was in order it was becoming a little too involved. Perhaps he will allow the minister an opportunity to answer the first part of his question now.

Mr. Greene: Well, I have not had any request from the province of Alberta for any meeting. I know of no provincial action to fix the price, as the province is able to do. If the provincial minister wishes to meet with me at any time I shall be only too happy to meet him.

Mr. Moore: Is the minister aware that this price does not include hauling charges and that $3.44 is the maximum for milk shipped to manufacturing plants?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The second part of the question is argumentative.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Would the minister give consideration to setting a stabilization figure of $4 under the Agricultural Stabilization Act? If this were done the constitutional difficulty outlined would not develop.

Mr. Greene: The present policy involves a support program which will enable the payment of $3.25 at the factory. Powder, butter, casein and all the other products are supported by the stabilization board to enable the payment of $3.25 which in Ontario is fixed by the province at that level.

This means that the farmer gets $3.25 plus the 75 cents paid by the federal government, plus the 10 per cent export subsidy. So actually the farmer will get $4.10, and this is a stabilization board policy which enables the payment of $3.25 f.o.b. the factory. However, if the provinces do not see fit to take action to protect that $3.25, it is a matter for them. I hope our negotiations will persuade the provincial governments to take adequate action in conjunction with ourselves to ensure a return of $4.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question to the minister. How can he reconcile the present situation in which farmers receive only $3.10 or $3.15 per hundredweight with his statement of March 23 to the effect that this policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is not a proper one at this time.

Mr. Starr: Well, I rise on a point of order so as to clarify the situation. I think the minister misled the house at that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should make it clear whether he is making a charge against the minister. If he is rising on a point of order he should state exactly what his point is, and the Chair will have a chance to rule on it.

Mr. Starr: My point is that the minister made a statement on March 23, as reported at page 3401 of Hansard, that this policy would ensure a price of $4 a hundredweight to Canadian milk producers. This has not been the case, and I believe the minister has misled the country and the farmers of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a proper point of order. It is an argument along the lines of the one on which we have been engaged for the past few minutes. I do not accept the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that he stated a while ago that he will meet with the Quebec minister of agriculture next Thursday about this price of $4 per hundreweight for milk, could the minister take with him, on that occasion, a copy of the Debates for March 23, 1966, when, as recorded on page 3043, the present Quebec minister of agriculture stated here in this house that $4 per hundredweight should be the minimum price for farmers?

[English]

TELEVISION

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF FREEZE ON APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Transport. Now that the white paper on broadcasting has been tabled the Minister of Transport will not be surprised by this question. Will the minister not recognize the concern of many regions of the country, including the eastern and northern parts of Nova Scotia, and announce whether the freeze on the establishment of alternative television service will be lifted soon?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the freeze is lifted as of now except for the four places—I think it is four—mentioned specifically in the white paper that are to be reserved to the C.B.C. I am sure all hon. members who are interested will be glad to know this.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Now that the minister has answered the previous question I wonder if he would not again speak to the Secretary of State and ask her to table the order for return, with respect to television service for the county of Pictou, passed by this house on April 6.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the Secretary of State would find the hon. gentleman's request just as seductive as mine.

[Later:]

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport regarding the freeze not being lifted in the four areas mentioned in the white paper on broadcasting. I would ask him whether this means that C.B.C. stations will not be built in those areas, as it says in the white paper.

Mr. Pickersgill: Evidently I did not make myself clear, and I think it is very desirable that I should try to do so. The white paper indicates—I am speaking from memory—that Saskatoon, Victoria, Sudbury and the Saint John-Fredericton area are being reserved—the alternate is being reserved—for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. What my announcement meant was that in the case of the Department of Transport any other application from any other place for alternate service would be received in the ordinary way and transmitted to the Board of Broadcast Governors for such consideration as they might choose to give it.

Mr. Cantelon: Does this mean that the C.B.C. would immediately proceed to put stations into those areas?

Mr. Pickersgill: That, I think, is a matter which would not come within the responsibilities for which I answer to parliament. I will direct the question to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): I have another question for the Minister of Transport. Does the government or the Department of Transport intend to continue to issue licences to cable television companies in the light of the CATV report in the white paper on broadcasting tabled in this house yesterday?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the intention of the government to continue in exactly the same way as we are now proceeding with CATV licences until such time as parliament amends the legislation, if it chooses to do so, in accordance with the recommendations in the white paper. So, for the time being, and contrary to some reports made yesterday, there will be no change whatsoever.

SHIPBUILDING

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REPEAL OF VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Was the shipbuilding industry consulted with respect to Bill C-216, as promised? If not, will full opportunity be given to these important segments of our industry to make their representations with respect to this bill, part of which repeals the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, which will have such a serious effect on that industry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the bill that has been introduced does not change anything of substance with respect to the act that will be repealed, because its provisions will be incorporated into the Income Tax Act. I also have received many representations from the industry, and in order to make sure there is an opportunity for consultation I am giving sympathetic consideration to the request that the sections of the bill the hon. member has referred to should be deferred.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of an answer he gave a few minutes ago to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. I should like to ask him whether I understood him correctly to say that the proposed repeal of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act is not in any way to modify or reduce the benefits that certain taxpayers now enjoy, but that none the less he was going to withdraw certain sections from the proposed income tax bill until after the recess?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question as asked now is acceptable. The hon. member is posing an argument. He is asking whether he understood the minister correctly. I do not think the question as posed can be asked.

Mr. Barnett: May I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have no intention of being argumentative. However, some strong representations have been made on this matter, and I should like to understand what the minister is going to do. Could I ask whether he is going to withdraw all the sections in the proposed income tax amending bill, Bill C-216 until after the recess so he can reach an understanding on the question of repeal of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the original question I said I was giving consideration to the request to withdraw from the income tax bills those sections relating to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. I did not say they would be withdrawn, because before I do that I would like to look at the technical questions involved when the bill is called.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Can we take it that if the minister does not decide to make a deferment there will be an opportunity for the industry to be heard before the matter comes forward?

Mr. Sharp: That is a hypothetical question. I hope it does not arise.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO TWO PRICE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the government's plans with respect to a two price system for wheat. I did not hear his reply at that time, but it was as follows, and I quote from page 7127 of Hansard:

> If government policy is made in this regard it will be announced in the normal manner.

I now ask the Minister of Agriculture whether this means that the government is planning to renege on its widely publicized election promise with respect to a two price system—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is argumentative and cannot be received in that form.

Mr. Nasserden: Then I should like to direct another question to the Prime Minister. In view of the rising cost of production of grain, has the government under consideration a policy which would enhance the return to producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, this question is of a very general nature and I suggest to the hon. member that it ought not to be asked now.

Mr. Nasserden: It is also a very urgent question. As we know, there have been a number of labour disputes in this country, settlement of which has meant a 30 per cent increase in labour costs. The prices of many of the items needed by farmers have been going up, and I think it is fair to ask the minister whether some consideration is being given to the farmers of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RIVERS, MAN.—REPORTED INTENTION TO CLOSE TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister dispel the report, widely circulated in Manitoba, that all contracts are being terminated at the joint air training base at Rivers, that military personnel are being moved out and that the base is to be closed?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): This is just speculation. No decision whatsoever has been taken in this regard.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): I should like to follow this up. Will the minister tell us whether such action is being considered?

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Mandziuk: Is the department planning to close this base?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, hypothetically, as far as the base consolidation program is concerned, all permutations are being considered. It would therefore be true to say that any base in the whole system was being considered in the light of its future usefulness. Beyond that I cannot go, because no decision has been taken in reference to Rivers or any other base in the area.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF AQUATIC SCIENTISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question to address to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that none of the 29 men recently appointed to the Science Council of Canada has any association with the aquatic sciences, will the right hon. gentleman reconsider these appointments and make the necessary changes in the council so the problems of our fishing industry and specifically those related to our aquatic resources can be examined and studied by someone with knowledge of this subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member place this question on the order paper.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, a series of underwater acoustics studies is to be undertaken this month by Canadian and United States scientists off Cape North, Nova Scotia. Several agencies are co-operating to instal equipment for this project which is centred at a Canadian National telecommunications site. These include the naval research establishment, the United States navy, Canadian Army signals—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would state his point of order.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the fact these people are investigating underwater acoustics in cold water in this area, and since their findings could be of great interest to the science council if there were someone on the council who could appraise them, I think this suggestion should be given consideration.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made very effective representations by means of his point of order. I can only hope, with him, that they will be taken into account.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister or anyone on his behalf written to any assistant deputy ministers or others in the top levels of the civil service to inquire whether they would move to Quebec for a while to perfect their bilingualism?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is not so urgent that it could not be placed on the order paper.

IMMIGRATION

VANCOUVER—DEPORTATION OF JAPANESE GIRL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on June 20 and 21 the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke inquired about a young Japanese girl, Masako Endo, who was ordered deported at Vancouver airport two weeks ago while seeking to visit Canada.

I have deferred making a statement on this case until all of the facts were known and the immigration appeal board had reached a decision on her appeal against the deportation order. The immigration appeal board has heard the girl's appeal, and while they have dismissed it they have recommended that she be permitted to carry on with her visit in Canada. We agree entirely with this decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIA—CONDITIONS RESPECTING POSSIBLE COMPROMISE SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the situation in Rhodesia. Now that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has announced the temporary suspension of Britain's search for a Rhodesian compromise, has the government of Canada agreed that any compromise settlement which is finalized must be acceptable to all Rhodesians as well as internationally acceptable to foreign nations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear what my hon. friend said at the beginning. I will take this question as notice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go over it again. I simply ask the minister this: What is the present position in respect of the suspension of the talks between the British government and Rhodesia; and is the government of Canada in agreement that any final settlement must be acceptable not only to all Rhodesians but internationally as well?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I had not understood the first part of the question. The talks have not been suspended. There have been two series of talks, one in London and a second one in Salisbury. A third round of talks is now under way in Salisbury. I hope those talks will determine whether there is a basis for negotiation—a negotiation, however, which as the British Prime Minister said must be without commitment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says the talks have not been suspended. Does he realize that at Westminster today the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said they had been suspended until later this month so as to give each side time to reflect. Is the minister now in a position to answer the question? Does the Canadian government agree and is it acceptable to the Canadian government that on a Commonwealth matter such as this not only must there be the consent of all the inhabitants of Rhodesia, but such a settlement must be internationally acceptable?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in so far as these talks are concerned the problem involves primarily the government of Britain and the illegal regime represented by the spokesmen for Rhodesia. Canada is not bound in any way by the conclusions of those talks. The arrangement thus far is one between the colonial power and the dependent regime. When we know what the conclusions are we will be in a position to ascertain whether they do involve independent members of the Commonwealth. Until we know the result of those talks it is not possible to make any reply to the last part of my right hon. friend's question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY REVISIONS FOR GROUP B ADMINISTRATIVE CATEGORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that last week announcements were made concerning salary revisions for the administrative support category in group B, can the minister say when the corresponding announcement will be made concerning the administrative category in the same group?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the administrative category was held up due to the reclassification which is taking place. Such reclassification is being carried out by the Civil Service Commission, and we have urged the commission to proceed with this with all haste in order that we might consider this matter.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he is in a position to reply to my question of last week concerning the red circling of employees in the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will answer this question tomorrow.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SUGGESTED FORMATION OF CANADA—WEST INDIES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he given consideration to the recommendation of the association of Atlantic universities for the establishment of a permanent Canadian-West Indies committee by the governments of Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member's question should be placed on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO ARDA PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Since the election of a new provincial government in Quebec, has the minister been in touch with the provincial authorities in the fields of agriculture or lands and forests to ensure the continuation of the ARDA program in order to help the growth of the underdeveloped areas of Quebec?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, has the minister any statement to make to the house, so that we might know where we stand with these authorities?

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that it is not the time to make statements in the house.

Canada Assistance Plan

INCOME TAX

REDUCTION OF CLAIMS FOR CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Could the minister tell us why the receipts for charitable donations which are enclosed with the income tax returns from honest citizens, whether they be for $200, $300 or $400, are now all reduced by half?

Mr. Speaker: That question should be put on the order paper.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TORONTO—REPORTED AGREEMENT TO SELL SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but perhaps in his absence I may be allowed to direct it to the acting minister. Has the government concluded an agreement with the province of Ontario regarding the sale of Sunnybrook hospital to the University of Toronto? If so, can the minister assure the house that veterans will have permanent priority in respect of admittance to this hospital?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed, from Monday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I was commenting about repeated statements of previous speakers from our party regarding the need to provide our senior citizens with higher old age pensions to offset at least partially the effects of the ever increasing cost of living.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I stated that in moving for a $100 a month old age security pension the members of the Progressive Conservative party are not advocating something new to that party. An old age security pension of $100 a month was a plank in our platform during the 1965 election campaign. I referred to this campaign commitment during meetings with senior citizens of my riding, and that is why I now speak on their behalf.

Last night I stated that it should be the duty of each of us in this house to express his or her views on the need for higher pensions for senior citizens who are trying to live on the present old age security payment of $75 per month. The hon. member for Waterloo North agreed that our senior citizens are entitled to fair treatment, and stated specifically last night that pensions provided at this time under the Old Age Security Act are insufficient.

The hon. member for Brantford stated that he had been advocating changes in the Old Age Security Act for the benefit of senior citizens without the requirement of a means test, and I should like to quote his exact words as they are recorded at page 7095 of Hansard for June 30. He was referring to previous speakers when he said:

> I believe the debate indicated that they had a feeling which is shared all over this house that the means test or even the needs test, which is an improvement over the means test, should not be used with regard to the senior citizens of Canada.

I am sure many other members on the government side would express the same opinion if they should take advantage of the opportunity of speaking during this debate. I heard the hon. member for Essex South express views along this line during a radio interview, and perhaps he will put these same views on Hansard.

The records in Hansard to date show clearly that we in the Progressive Conservative party have been pressing for a $100 a month pension since this session commenced on January 18. The records also show that the Liberals with Social Credit support have consistently voted against any pension increase. I mention these facts to emphasize the concern of the members of this party for our senior citizens. We believe they should be treated in a more fair manner. Members of the N.D.P. have attempted to take credit for what we in this party have tried to do in respect of this matter, but this party's record in this regard will stand comparison with the record of any other party.

Let me point out that the record of the former C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan does not indicate that that party was above criticism in its treatment of senior citizens. I recall hearing complaints about a strict means test being applied before supplementary payments to old age pensioners were allowed, and those payments in many cases only amounted to a niggardly $2 per month. I am sorry the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is not in the house at this time to hear these remarks, because he was the leader of that party and the premier of Saskatchewan at that time.

I am speaking in support of a pension increase because I promised to do so in replies I made to many senior citizens in my riding who have written me personal letters or forwarded petitions regarding an increase. I could have brought a whole sheaf of petitions from my file, but I have only brought one or two which I intend to use as examples.

The petition I have in my hand is from the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation and is written over the name of Mr. Nathan W. Medd, president, who lives in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. I shall not read the resolution, but I wish to point out that the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation reaffirmed their request that the federal government increase the old age security pension to $100 per month.

I know personally many of the people who have written about pension increases as well as many of those who have signed petitions, and I know their needs. I am sure the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have received similar letters and petitions because I have received copies of some that were sent to those gentlemen. Surely I need not point out to the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare that public opinion has been aroused regarding the need for more consideration for those individuals who helped build our country but who have now passed the income earning stage.

There are reports that the minister will announce some form of income increase to those in their later years who can prove need. It will be interesting to learn just how far our demands of the past few days have induced the government to alter or add to the legislation before us. I join with other speakers in protesting against what the government wishes to call a needs test but which is actually only another name for a means test. Under such a system, as the hon. member for Queens commented, not only must one be poor but one must prove to some official of the state that one is poor.

I have here a petition from the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation which contains the comment: "By changing the word 'means' to 'need' is just eyewash." I have another petition from the Senior Women's Committee for Pension Increase which says: "Senior citizens and families won't tolerate humiliating needs test."

If the government is not moving to increase the old age pension to $100, for which we are pressing, we hope that the means test or the needs test will be removed from Bill C-207. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare in this regard.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up much of the time of the house on this matter. However, there are two points I should like to bring to the minister's attention which I do not think have been brought to his attention so far in this debate. Before I do so, however, I should like to reiterate the plea made by most members on this side of the house that the minister persuade his colleagues to reconsider this question and provide $100 a month without a means test to the old people of this country who will not benefit under the Canada Pension Plan right away.

The other two items I wish to bring to the minister's attention are these. When regulations are made in connection with this legislation after it eventually passes the house, I hope that particular attention will be paid to the section referring to disabled persons and the disabled persons allowance. This matter has been raised by me many times in the house and by hon. members in various parties, particularly the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith). I refer to the existing regulations with respect to the disabled persons allowance.

At the present time a person wishing to receive the disabled persons allowance practically has to have both arms and both legs off. This works a great hardship on many people. I am sure every hon. member in the house has dealt with this problem many times. I suggest to the minister again, and I hope this time he pays some attention to my suggestion, that he persuade his colleagues that employability should be the criterion whether a person should receive the disabled persons allowance. If people are so disabled and ill that they cannot work for a period of time, let us say six months, they should receive the disabled persons allowance for as long as they are unable to work. If at some time in the future they are able to work, of course the allowance should be discontinued.

At the present time the regulations require that a person be totally and permanently disabled to receive the allowance. Most doctors, probably because they think they will never be in this shape themselves, will not sign a certificate saying that a person is permanently disabled if there is one chance in a million of his getting better. This regulation has worked great hardship on all kinds of people in this country. I hope the government will see that it is changed when the new regulations are promulgated under the act or arrangements are made with the provinces.

The last item I bring to the minister's attention is the question of mothers allowance. Under this legislation the federal government proposes to help pay mothers allowance. I hope that when this measure comes into effect the minister will make certain that some of the regulations that exist in some parts of Canada in this regard are removed. The fact is that if a husband deserts his wife and children the mothers allowance cannot be paid, no matter how much it may be needed by the family, as long as the husband can be found within a certain period of time. If the husband disappears permanently and cannot be found, the wife receives the mothers allowance in respect of her children, but if the husband turns up just once in Timbuktu or somewhere else and is found for just one day the allowance is cut off no matter how practically impossible it is for the mother to receive any assistance from such husband. This is a ridiculous situation. I hope that the minister, when arrangements are made with the provinces or regulations are drawn up under this legislation, will see that this iniquitous situation no longer exists.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of extending the debate and I am not responsible for its extension until this afternoon, because I had made up my mind not to practise any obstruction against the government regarding the legislation now before us and entitled "Canada Assistance Plan."

The fact remains, nevertheless, that so many things have been said and so many stands have been taken that I can hardly allow the debate to end without saying a few words to explain my position. At the beginning of the session, when the opposition introduced a non-confidence motion against the government with regard to a $100 increase in the monthly pension, I then voted with the government, because I realized it was merely a non-confidence motion which, had it been passed by the house, would probably not have settled the problem of older people. It would simply have embarrassed the government perhaps to the extent of bringing about another election. But at any rate, it would have delayed the passage of this social assistance measure promised by the present government at the time. Along with many others I waited with some anxiety to study the provisions of the bill to be introduced and designed to help needy Canadians.

We now have before us this piece of legislation under the form of Bill No. C-207. I am not suggesting that this bill is perfect, because I know of no party and of no government which have ever passed perfect bills in this house, but I say it is nevertheless a noteworthy effort of good will in spite of the inadequacies of the bill. Following this lengthy discussion which has lasted at least a week, and thanks to the numerous suggestions constructive or otherwise, which have been made, the government will certainly be able to improve this piece of legislation.

I, for one, am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, to see that the government respects the constitutional authority of provinces in the field of assistance to the needy, since it intends to support the provinces in the proportions mentioned in the bill. This is quite satisfactory.

I am satisfied to see that the government not only wishes to help the aged, our senior citizens, the old folks, those who are no longer young, but that it also wants, according to the bill, to help those who are in need in all areas, the unemployed, the disabled, the widows, the needy of all kinds.

I think that those who have been saying for a week that there is nothing in the bill, nothing good, that the bill means nothing, are not being fair. We must understand, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, even though it is not perfect, offers something; it is certainly an improvement on what existed before, and we should at least, instead of dragging on the debate interminably, all say together: Well, let us give that at least to the needy for the time being; let us give it to them as soon as possible, and afterwards, we shall consider improving the situation, which is not perfect.

It is sure that if we accepted the suggestion to give immediately $100 a month to the elderly people this would not settle the problem, because there are many elderly people who need more than $100. This bill provides for some medical care, some related aid which would mean to them more than $100 a month. At any rate, is it really fair to give $100 to those who do not need it and then refuse $125, $130 to those in need? We should wonder about that.

The point that we should consider, Mr. Speaker, and about which the opposition has better justification, is the objection to a needs test. Experience proves that these tests are usually made by incompetent persons, who lack tactfulness and the necessary circumspection; they often take the form of an inquisition, which is humiliating for the needy, who have a legitimate self-respect, and in many cases have to go through certain methods of inquiry which are vexatious and unacceptable.

The main recommendation, I believe, that should be made to the government about this bill is that those who are called upon to come into contact with the needy, the elderly people, widows, unemployed, etc., should follow training courses to learn tactfulness and warmth which should characterize all the actions of social service workers, which is charity or philanthropy in certain cases, but which, in the present case, is a service due to all taxpayers.

A great number of these taxpayers have already paid taxes on considerable amounts to guarantee the efficient application of such acts to the needy, and they are entitled to be treated with due respect. I should like to stress that point Mr. Speaker, and in this respect I endorse the criticism of the opposition. The methods of investigation should certainly be improved upon, as should the methods of all who are in contact with the needy in order to eliminate red tape, police investigations, receipts and all kinds of things that add to the hardship of those unfortunates for whom life has not been overly generous.

Now the fact remains, at least in my province, that the program will be administered by the province. If my province were to decide to pay $100 per month to the elderly persons, to the old people, I cannot see what objection the federal government would have; if my province were to decide to pay $125 per month, I do not believe the federal government would object. So I say that the bill, although it may not seem as generous as the members of the opposition, or most of them, claim, it is opening the door in a generous way.

It was urged since the beginning of the debate that the act should be made to apply uniformly, Mr. Speaker. I hardly think the needy can be taken care of in a uniform manner in Canada, because the needs are not the same. At this point I repeat what I said a while ago: to give $100 or $150 to an elderly person who does not need it is too much; yet giving $125 to a senior citizen who needs $150 is too little.

The opposition, Mr. Speaker, claimed that it was not resorting to what the Americans call a filibuster. The claim was made sometimes with a tongue-in-the-cheek attitude. Sitting in this far corner as an independent, Mr. Speaker, the impression I get is that several members have taken the opportunity of this debate for some electioneering, and that is the impression that is gathered here. All sides of the house claimed not to be playing politics, I think. But I feel there has been too much politicking going on, while the contrary was being claimed, at the expense of the old people and of the needy. I do not think this is proper. I do not say that to blame all those who took part in the debate, but simply because I have enough respect for my colleagues to know that they are all aware of their responsibilities toward the Canadian people and particularly toward this least favoured class of Canadians. I say that to appeal precisely to their conscience as Canadians. Even if they have temporarily stilled it to satisfy certain electoral interests, the debate nevertheless should not be prolonged in this tone; on the contrary,we should remember that the poor are waiting for a bill.

The present bill may not be perfect, but it nevertheless represents something. Even if it is not perfect, let us pass it as soon as possible and try to pass others to remedy the situation within as short a time as possible. We will pass other bills sooner if we do not prolong debates in the house indefinitely.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to use subjects such as this one to criticize the government. It is always easy, as a member of the opposition and as an independent member, to tell the government that it does not do enough: $100 is not enough, $125 is not enough. As an independent member I know that I will have nothing to administer tomorrow and no responsibility with regard to the national budget, and I could very well tell the government that it should give old people $200, and then find people in my riding who would say that I am generous towards them. But this generosity would entail no responsibility. One should keep a sense of proportion and administrative responsibility.

It would be easy for me in my position to criticize all those who opposed the bill and say that they only did so for electoral purposes. I think too many did that; but I believe there are many left who were aware of the needs of the poor and I think the government would be wise to hear the demands of those who made objective, positive and realistic representations.

Let us say to ourselves, for the time being, Mr. Speaker, and I believe it is the fairest way to put it—and you must admit I listened to everybody before rising to speak—that the bill as introduced by the government is a very elaborate one, representing a considerable improvement, compared with the present situation.

Countless poverty-stricken or underprivileged people in this country are waiting for those benefits. Let us put a stop to our endless debates, let us pass it as fast as possible and, if it is not perfect, we shall press the government to introduce further measures in order to improve the situation.

The government must remember that in the final analysis the stumbling block of all those measures intended to assist the underprivileged, the needy, is the manner in which the bounties of the nation are distributed among them, the way investigations are made; those are the things that should certainly be improved, humanized and made less vexatious.

Personally, although I know my province simply wants to be given back 100 per cent of the revenue sources and to administer freely all those programs, although I hope there will eventually be an agreement between my province and the federal government to that effect, I say that for the time being, things being what they are, this is a good and thoroughly acceptable bill and, for my part, I intend to support it by every possible means.

[English]

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): It is with some sense of humility, Mr. Speaker, that I take part in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: After listening to the ohs and ahs from across the way I cannot not help but wonder how many hon. members opposite have asked themselves at one time or another how near or how far they are from being in the situation in which so many of the people of our country find themselves today. I believe this is one of the most important bills to come before parliament and I do not believe it is a matter with which we should deal lightly or which we should filibuster. However, I think the remarks of hon. members should be heard on this subject.

First of all, I wish to congratulate the minister on the empire building in which he has indulged to a certain extent in bringing the various segments of the welfare program under one department. This enhances the department and gives him a little more power than he might otherwise have. At the same time it adds to the administrative welfare of the government and therefore I think it serves a worth-while purpose.

I know a great deal has been said about the plight of the old age pensioners in Canada at the present time and about the reluctance of the government to do anything for them. I recall that when this question was before the House of Commons not so many months ago the minister concerned indicated that increases in old age pensions would forthwith be tied to increases in the cost of living index. Somehow along the way, Mr. Speaker, the government or parliament or all of us have forgotten what the government said at that particular time and there has been no substantial increase in the pension as a result of that statement.

I want to draw to the attention of the minister something that has happened for which the present government is not alone responsible. It results from the regulations drawn up with regard to supplementary allowances for old age assistance. A number of cases have come to my attention in which the income of these people was estimated with the help of people from various provincial departments. These people were put on supplementary allowance. After the end of the year, when their income totals were completed, it was found that in some cases the income was $12 above the allowance set. The department has ruled that the entire supplementary allowance must be recouped out of the ordinary pension payments. However, this money has been spent by the individuals concerned. I say to the minister that this works a real hardship on individuals, particularly when the income is so close to the line.

As I look at this bill and recall the election campaign I am reminded of the references to the war on poverty. I say to the minister that if this bill is to be the answer in that regard, then it falls short of the need that exists in our country today. Perhaps it will partially meet some of the problems, and the bringing together of the various welfare programs will make for greater efficiency of operation.

In so far as the old age pension is concerned, I recall that not only was the figure of $105 mentioned but also $125. There were some enthusiastic members of the party opposite who referred to the Canada Pension Plan during the election campaign and stated that the over-all effect would be to give the aged in our country something like $270 per month. This is something that should be borne in mind at this time when this measure is under consideration. All of this may have some element of politics within it.

The second factor that faces our elderly people today is the fact that the cost of living has increased as it has never increased before in the history of our country. They are faced with higher costs for lodging, milk, bread, clothing and almost everything they buy. These factors are the important ones in so far as parliament is concerned when it comes to the consideration of the welfare of these people who have gone through the pioneering era of our country. When you consider that there has been an 8 per cent increase in the cost of living during the last six months you find this puts an altogether different complexion on the adequacy of $75 per month.

I am surprised, sir, that this minister, representing a government whose leader has been stated to be a man who cares, should have been so slow to meet the needs of our senior citizens, so reluctant to bring forward tangible evidence of their good faith in the light of their promises during the recent election campaign.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. May I remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in rising to wind up the debate on second reading of Bill No. C-207 I wish, first of all, to remind the house of the enthusiastic response which the resolution preceding this bill received from hon. members. This enthusiastic support of the legislation took place at a time when the principle of the bill and the provisions of the bill were being considered on their inherent value by hon. gentlemen opposite. This attitude continued until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) intervened with an amendment which was ruled out of order and about which I shall say more in the course of my remarks.

The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) described the Canada Assistance Plan in the following words: "The plan before us is a good plan." The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) stated that this proposal is a reasonably wise one and the sooner it is put into operation the better because it will be of benefit to the recipients. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns), whose words in this debate have more significance than those of any other hon. member because of his experience in this particular field, made this statement:

> —as a statement of intent, this resolution will commend itself readily to members of the house and all Canadians. . . . This measure can be an exciting, revolutionary step, perhaps the most revolutionary among the whole group of public welfare acts . . . The Canada Assistance Plan, if utilized responsibly and generously across Canada, will mean a long stride toward goals which welfare agencies have coveted for Canadian families.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) says that this measure is an attempt to fill the gaps that have been left by existing plans. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand) states:

> I sincerely hope . . . that the idea will be to provide rehabilitation if at all possible as the prime concern of this proposed plan, because I think it is so much more important to human dignity to give people the opportunity to fend for themselves and to provide for themselves.

Finally, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) described it as a brilliant statement of intentions. Even in the pre-amendment phase, the pre-political phase of this debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre told the house that it was most encouraging to learn there had been a wide measure of federal-provincial co-operation, which was very much to be commended, and that the federal government was prepared to share financially in a number of programs in which to this point there had been no federal-provincial participation. He said that when we weld together these programs and have federal-provincial co-operation, federal-provincial participation, the better it will be for all concerned. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated, "I welcome that progress".

This measure might well draw these comments from hon. members opposite in the pre-amendment phase of the debate because the measure, on its merits and because of its provisions, deserves separate treatment and separate decision of the house. The Canada Assistance Plan, as has already been stated, will provide a basis for co-ordinating all public assistance programs in Canada. It will, over a period of time, replace existing categorical programs and enable federal and provincial governments to provide assistance to needy persons regardless of the cause of need. The plan will provide federal sharing for the first time in mothers' allowance programs covering 200,000 needy mothers with dependent children, and make it possible for these mothers and their children to receive assistance on the basis of need and on the basis of the family budget. Hardly a word was said in the debate with respect to this aspect of the Canada Assistance Plan.

The plan will provide federal support for the strengthening of the administration of, and the welfare services related to, social assistance programs. If the plan did not have the capacity to improve administration and to provide proper and qualified welfare services, then some of the comments made by members opposite would have validity.

The plan provides for federal aid for buttressing child and youth welfare agencies. For example, in the field of child and youth services, 50,000 children in the care of child welfare authorities in Canada will receive assistance under this plan.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, all the recipients of public assistance will for the first time have their health care costs met on this basis. There is no federal ceiling on the benefits under the new program, and the federal government stands ready to share with the provinces, on the basis of need, not only in the new categories or new groups which I have already mentioned but also in the improvement of the level of benefits now being paid to the recipients of old age assistance numbering 85,000, the blind numbering 8,000 and the disabled numbering 55,000.

Several hon. gentlemen opposite referred to the severe medical tests under the disability act. Through the Canada Assistance Plan any person who is disabled for any reason by disablement of any kind and to any extent will be able to be assisted without having to meet the severity of the medical test which has been so widely condemned by hon. members opposite.

The new cost to the federal treasury in this year will be $85 million. The total federal outlays in this fiscal year, 1966-67, will be $250 million and the total commitment by federal and provincial governments will be $500 million, affecting one million people who are to be covered under this program. In terms of the size of the expenditure involved and from the number of Canadians to be assisted, this program is to be a very substantial program indeed.

It has been suggested that the Canada Assistance Plan is only a tidying-up operation. It is true, as the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) pointed out, that it will bring together existing programs, we hope and give them a comprehensive foundation. But it is more than that. It attempts successfully to deal with the causes and effects of poverty.

The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) pointed out the necessity for breaking the dependency cycle of families who, from one generation to another, are dependent on public welfare. You can dish out, Mr. Speaker, as much money as you like but this in itself will not break the dependency cycle; more than that is needed. The recipients of public assistance must be given a real chance to get off welfare, to break the dependency cycle, and because the Canada Assistance Plan lays the foundation to do this it is an important milestone in the history of public welfare in Canada.

The preventive and rehabilitative aspect of the Canada Assistance Plan is its positive aspect, and this has hardly been mentioned in this debate which has gone on for so many days. Hardly a mention has been made of the welfare services that will be available to recipients of public assistance, including counselling and training of various kinds, to help to solve these difficult personal problems that keep people on welfare.

Hardly a mention has been made of the work activity projects that will be supported under this plan, giving the opportunity to disadvantaged persons to resume gainful emorientation, or to those who are handicapped ployment on the labour market through reto be able to do something to become part of the productive population in Canada.

There has been hardly a mention in this long debate of the possibility under the Canada Assistance Plan of reaching agreements with the provinces by which the Indian population of Canada will be given an opportunity, in so far as welfare is concerned, to be treated as other Canadian citizens.

Understandably, hon. members have spoken a great deal about the needs test and the means test, and only one who has listened to every speech, as I have done, can appreciate the extent of the contradictory assessments made by hon. members of these two concepts.

Yesterday the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) said that there was no difference between a needs test and a means test and he roundly condemned them both. On two occasions the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) repeated the same claim and condemned both concepts as being unworthy of any place in a public assistance program.

Mr. Winkler: Would the minister permit a question? Does he know that one of his own supporters made a similar statement on Sunday in a nation-wide broadcast?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that particular occurrence. However, the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns), for example, extolled the needs test over the means test, saying that it provides all those things which contribute to the social usefulness of the citizen, and these are included in definitions of need.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who knows something about this field from personal experience, made this comment, as reported at page 6423 of Hansard for June 14:

> My hon. friends in the N.D.P. seem to take great exception to this phrase a needs test, and are apparently equating it with a means test, which deals entirely with financial criteria.

He went on to say:

> —the needs test is an attempt to deal with total needs . . . of the person requiring this sort of assistance but also the cultural, psychological and even the spiritual needs.

Even I, Mr. Speaker, as the minister introducing the Canada Assistance Plan did not make that claim for the bill.

Then in the pre-amendment phase of the debate, the phase when the provisions of the bill were being discussed on their merits, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made this comment, as reported at page 6414 of Hansard for June 14:

> Sometimes people wonder whether a change of name makes for any real difference, but in the field of social work it does make a difference. A needs test is more humane and more realistic than a means test . . . to move from a means test to a more advanced approach, namely the needs test.

So these are the words used to describe the needs test by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre: "A more advanced approach; more humane and more realistic."

There was a day in this house, Mr. Speaker, when hon. members heard supporters of the New Democratic Party asking and beseeching the government of the day to apply the needs test to the public assistance program of this country. I refer to the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who in this house quoted with approval a statement by the Canadian Welfare Council, advocating a program of social security in Canada based on need rather than means. The Canadian Welfare Council urged that categorical programs such as blind and disabled pensions and old age assistance be put on the same basis as unemployment assistance which used the needs test criteria. These are the words proclaimed by the hon. member for Kootenay West. "We in this group say amen to that statement of principle."

Mr. Knowles: Is that your way of filling a spiritual need?

Mr. MacEachen: Indeed, the first member of the New Democratic Party to be elected to this house advocated very early in his stay in the house that programs using the concept of need ought to be applied in Canada. So it is no wonder that those of us who have been working on the development of the Canada Assistance Plan felt that there was a broad basis of support for this concept in every political party, in every part of the house, judging by the statements made in this debate and earlier.

The fact is that the concept of the needs test has been either misunderstood or distorted in the debate. Naturally it is the objective of our other programs, of which we have a variety in Canada, including the Canada Pension Plan, and unemployment insurance, to reduce the area of dependency on public assistance. We are attempting to do that and will continue to do that, but there will be a need for a sound, humane program of public assistance in Canada if we are really serious about dealing with the causes and effects of poverty in this country.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in the most serious speech given from his group said that there were no standards in the Canada Assistance Plan. Well, that is wrong because the bill itself provides that the basic requirements of recipients, including food, clothing, shelter, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements, must be met under the operation of this plan. Provinces must agree, under the agreement to be signed, to meet these basic requirements of individuals and provide them with adequate assistance to meet their needs. That is the standard.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister permit a question? I read, of course, the items which the minister has just stated. But would he indicate what standards are to be applied to those items? What are the standards of need that the provinces are to apply to those items which obviously make up anyone's living?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the standard is that through agreements the provinces will sign with the federal government the basic requirements of persons in need, including the items which I have mentioned, must be met in an adequate manner. That is the standard.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Would the minister define the word "adequate"?

Mr. MacEachen: I had hoped to deal with that point a little later. The provinces will agree to meet these basic requirements. That is the first standard. There is also a further standard, namely, that no residence requirements will be required in the administration of this program in any province. Finally, any person will be able through an appeal machinery, something that has not been provided hitherto, to ensure that his proper rights will be met under this proposal.

The hon. member for York South said—and this was repeated by almost every other speaker after the amendment was moved —that the needs test was inhuman, inquisitorial and degrading. "It is humiliating; it will bring the public to their knees." Those were the words used by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). "It will bring the public to their knees". Imagine these words from a provincial premier who for 18 years administered means test programs in his own province—

Mr. MacEachen:—who later structured his own public assistance programs during his tenure of office and failed to eliminate the means test, who, according to my investigations, never made a request to any federal-provincial conference asking that the means test be removed from these programs which he as the head of that government administered. Yet in this debate when he is discussing this bill he calls the means test an affront to human dignity, humiliating, degrading, and says it will bring the population of Canada to their knees. No wonder at times people on this side of the house use the word "hypocrisy".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: —much has been said in the debate—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. MacEachen: —about the indignities of the means test.

An hon. Member: Does the shoe fit, Stan?

Mr. MacEachen: It was pictured by some hon. members as—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a question.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the references the minister has made to the administration of Saskatchewan by the present member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, can the minister tell me whether at any time the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam introduced in Saskatchewan a means or a needs test in any area where there was not already one in existence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: He condoned it.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe I stated, Mr. Speaker, that he introduced a means test in legislation when he could have brought in legislation on his own volition without a means test and had the liberty to do so.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has not answered my question.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I asked whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam introduced a means test in any area where one did not exist, as the minister is doing in the old age pension area?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am arguing this particular point and I am referring to the stand taken by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam who spoke with such indignation and evangelical fervor in condemning the minister and the government for bringing the Canadian public to their knees. I am reminding the house to judge those comments on the basis of the same hon. gentleman's performance in administering these programs when he was premier of a province.

Mr. Starr: For 17 years.

Mr. MacEachen: This is my only point. The idea has been put forward in this debate that the needs test is some sort of bargaining contest between the recipient of public welfare or public assistance and the welfare worker. I agree that in the past this attitude toward public assistance may have prevailed. But I am satisfied that with the improvement in the administration of welfare, and the provision of more trained and qualified staff, this attitude will go by the board under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I was somewhat amazed that certain members in this house who portray themselves as great humanitarians, suggesting that if they had administrative control over this plan they would apply it humanely, should intimate that all ten provincial administrations, no matter what their political stripe, were made up of inhuman Scrooges who would bring the public to their knees in the administration of this plan. I do not agree with that at all. I believe there is in every provincial administration a sentiment as strong as it is in this house in favour of assisting these disadvantaged groups which are to be helped by the Canada Assistance Plan.

A typical situation arises from the use of budget standards normally set out in provincial regulations based on budget studies. These studies indicate amounts necessary for the various items of food, clothing, hospital supplies and personal needs of people who require assistance. The amounts in those tables are generally schedules derived from budget studies, a method which the hon. member for York South described yesterday as being sensible. The amounts derived from these studies are granted automatically. Frequently they are combined in a single item granted automatically. Additional amounts can be and have been paid to cover such important variables as shelter, fuel, utilities and special needs.

There are many examples in Canada of the needs test being administered efficiently with a minimum of detailed interrogation or investigation while achieving its central purpose of meeting the real needs of the individuals and families affected in addition to providing the necessary supporting welfare services—and this is even more important under the new regime and dispensation—which will rehabilitate these families and individuals and help them remove themselves from a state of dependency.

May I turn now to the unfolding parliamentary situation with regard to the Canada Assistance Plan? During the debate on the resolution stage of this legislation I had occasion to compliment hon. members on the constructive and non-partisan comments and suggestions they had made about this proposed measure. I regret, though I do not complain about it, that this commendable attitude has not been in evidence on second reading, all the more so because tactics of partisan sniping and procedural sabotage have been introduced into the debate by a section of the house which has come to regard itself as the custodian and repository of all that is good in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: During the debate on the resolution the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre described this plan as humane, realistic and advanced. He welcomed the progress which is being made. However, the hon. member appears to have undergone some mental or temperamental metamorphosis during the period between the debate on the resolution and second reading.

Suddenly the legislation has become a retrograde step and the humane and realistic proposal to pay benefits on the basis of need has become something involving merely a change of name, the same old means test dressed up a bit. That was the change which took place between the resolution stage and the second reading. By Tuesday last the hon. member's metamorphosis had proceeded to a point at which he could rise in the house and resort to a procedural device in an attempt to kill the Canada Assistance Plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has tried—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. There is a rule in this house that one cannot impute motives. One has to take an hon. member at his word when he makes a statement. I made it clear that it was not, and never has been, my purpose to kill the Canada Assistance Plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Knowles: I made it clear in a statement stronger than the minister has made that there are parts of the measure which are good and which I welcome. For him to criticize my amendment as an attempt to kill the Canada Assistance Plan is a distortion unworthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MacEachen: As I anticipated, the hon. member is continuing to disguise this effort under a cloud of pontifical verbiage. He has been in the house long enough and is sufficiently an expert on the procedure of parliament to know that no one moves an amendment on second reading, particularly an amendment of the kind he sponsored, without it having the express and calculated effect, if carried, of killing the legislation before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member says he did not intend to do it, that was not what I had in mind. If his effort had succeeded the bill would have been killed. That would inevitably have been the result. And the records of this house would show that he and his group—I was about to say "deliberately" but I will say "unwittingly"—sought to exterminate a measure which has been supported by all ten provinces, by the Canadian Welfare Council and by the Canadian Labour Congress as constituting a major advance in the field of social welfare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member purports to like the legislation while at the same time he recoils at the prospect of its passage. The measure is a good one, but he undertook a procedural program which, if successful, would have killed the Canada Assistance Plan. Mr. Speaker, if that amendment had been ruled in order and had been carried, the Canada Assistance Plan would be dead.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the substance of what the minister has said but I shall not attempt to do so. Is it in order that this discussion should continue with respect to the point of order on which the Chair ruled on June 29.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point is well taken. I am sure the minister would wish to return to the consideration of the bill which is now before the house.

An hon. Member: Can't take it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling. I will turn merely to one other point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he referred to a statement which I had used in introducing the second reading of the bill. I had referred to a quotation from the memorandum of the Canadian Labour Congress to the government. He pointed out that I had used a paragraph and had failed to complete the record because there was something else there. I should like to explain the situation. I was introducing the second reading of the Canada Assistance Plan, not the Old Age Security Act. The reference to which my hon. friend referred and which he accused me of failing to include was a reference to the Old Age Security Act. I repeat what I stated on that occasion as a statement from the memorandum to the government from the Canadian Labour Congress with regard to the Canada Assistance Plan:

> We welcome the advent of the Canada Assistance Plan. We consider it to be an improvement over the categorical assistance programs now in effect. We agree that the change from a means to a needs-tested benefit, however subtle the difference may seem, will provide greater opportunities to provide an adequate benefit to those who will require assistance. We commend you for your decision to share with the provinces in the costs of allowances for needy mothers and medical care for the indigent, as well as the cost of improving administrative standards and of strengthening those rehabilitative services which will help to restore social assistance beneficiaries to a position where they are self-supporting.

As my hon. friend points out, if it is a matter of substance I failed to mention the suggestion that there be a sliding scale of benefit in the Canada Assistance Plan. With that qualification the statement which I have read is a true and accurate reflection of the measure by the Canadian Labour Congress which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) described as a measure having little or no social thinking in it.

These are some of the points I wished to make in the course of the debate as I listened to the debate unfold. For a moment before my time expires I should like to pay some attention to my friend the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). The right hon. Leader of the Opposition had a great deal to say about the position the government has taken on this old age proposition. He accused us of adamantly ignoring the issue until recent days and asked why the sudden solicitude, why the newly cultivated interest on the part of the government and the minister in the old age pensioners of Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the achievements of this government in helping the aged have already been placed on the record. The increase in the flat rate pension, the lowering of the eligibility age to 65 by 1970, the Canada Pension Plan, the measures embodied in the bill now before the house as well as our medicare proposals all have and will have a profound impact on the sense of security of our senior citizens. I suggest that this is a record of interest and concern for the pensioners of Canada which compares favourably with that of any previous government including the government headed by my right hon. friend. I should also like to tell him that his charge that there was an over-night change of heart by this government was unconvincing.

I should like to remind the right hon. gentleman that as far back as March 2 at a public speech in Regina, copies of which have been circulated, I pointed out quite clearly and unequivocally the need for additional assistance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. minister because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Finish.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their agreement. I have been waiting for it since last Wednesday.

Mr. Lewis: We are all waiting for an announcement.

Mr. MacEachen: I was reminding the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that in March at Regina I pointed out quite clearly and unequivocally the need for additional assistance for older Canadians covered only in part or not at all by the Canada Pension Plan. I should like to quote from that speech merely to put it on the record. I stated as follows:

> These people will still be eligible for the flat-rate $75 a month universal pension but clearly this is not enough, or will not be enough, for many of them to live adequately and decently. What is the most practical and effective form of income maintenance for such older persons?

I then went on to examine some of the suggested approaches to this problem and said that various proposals were being examined by my department. I would note that in my statement on the adjournment motion on June 7, page 6123 of Hansard, I reiterated this government's intention to provide additional support for pensioners who are not able to take full advantage of the Canada Pension Plan. I was discussing this matter I believe in reply to a question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I stated as follows:

> I want to tell my hon. friend that this in a sense is the key problem in rounding out or adding to the support for the senior citizens—

I was referring to those senior citizens who will not benefit fully from the Canada Pension Plan. I went on to say:

> Since I have taken over this job I have certainly been grappling with the most effective plan that can meet the problems and the needs of this particular body of people, and this plan—

To which I was referring and with which I was grappling on June 6.

> —will be appropriately integrated with the Canada Pension Plan and the Canada Assistance Plan.

So I wonder how anyone can properly say there has been an over-night or sudden solicitude or change in interest.

Again, on June 14 during the adjournment debate I stated that the interest of the government in this problem will be demonstrated as we develop further programs of support for Canada's older citizens. All the statements had to do with the question of providing a further program of additional support for Canada's old age pensioners. To any ordinary mind, uncluttered with partisan driftwood, they spell out quite clearly that the government is prepared to accept its responsibility in this field and to do something more for these people who are and will be primarily dependent on the flat rate $75 per month payment. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I had in mind earlier in this debate to respond to invitations made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) to make a statement in this regard. But in the light of developments since then, and because of the importance which I attach to the Canada Assistance Plan, I consider it at this moment my duty and responsibility to seek a clear decision on this bill and its provisions aside and apart from any other consideration.

Mr. MacEachen: There are other considerations to which I have been referring and they are important but, as I say, I believe it to be my duty as the minister responsible for developing this bill to seek a clear decision on this legislation and its provisions. All who participated in developing this plan, including provincial governments and welfare authorities, are entitled to have it judged on its own merits. They are entitled to have it accepted or rejected on its own merits rather than by bringing in, no matter how important, any other subject as a basis for removing that opportunity of deciding on the merits of this bill.

It is true that the positive and constructive features of the Canada Assistance Plan have been buried in a long avalanche of vindictiveness and distortion. No person would disagree with that analysis of what has happened. I suggest that this legislation is in fact a realistic and serious attempt to meet the needs in this country of disadvantaged groups including the blind, the disabled, the unemployed, the aged and mothers of dependent children.

I feel beyond any doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this measure before us will bring new hope and the prospects of a more rewarding life to a considerable number of people in this country. This is a view that is shared by governments of all political complexions in this country and by those who are concerned with and involved in the problems of social welfare. I want to know whether this house shares this view, and that is why the Canada Assistance Plan must be dealt with on its own two feet. To paraphrase the memorable words of the Leader of the Opposition, you ask where we stand, I want to know where you stand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: The Canada Assistance Plan deserves to be given its own distinct treatment and to have each of its features judged on its own merits in order to have its beneficiaries, numbering a million people, treated as free citizens entitled to separate consideration by this house, along with other deserving persons including senior citizens.

I do not dispute the high-mindedness of hon. members' purposes or the sincerity of their motives. It is not for me to question the accuracy of their claims, but it is certainly open to me to point out the varying routes by which they come to these sometimes opposite self-assessments, and especially their assessments of this bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre welcomes the removal of the means test provided for by this program while the hon. member for Danforth throws up both hands in horror. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa holds out high hopes for the plan while his esteemed leader labels it a "charade of hypocrisy". The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) is prepared to accept, sight unseen and sound unheard, the constitutional tenets of his party's Quebec leader while the hon. members for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and York South (Mr. Lewis) are almost embarrassingly enthusiastic in their espousals of what I am sure would be heretical nonsense to the N.D.P. co-leader in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: What this house is now considering is the Canada Assistance Plan, a measure which has received the endorsation of Canada's ten provincial governments, of the Canadian Labour Congress and the country's leading social welfare organizations. An amendment having to do with old age pensions was ruled out of order earlier in this debate on the ground that it was irrelevant. It is not unfair to suggest that most of the subsequent debate falls in the same category. The Canada Assistance Plan must stand on its own feet. It must be judged on its own merits and members must now make their decision solely on the individual provisions of this legislation and not on issues which lie outside the scope and jurisdiction of this bill.

The old age pension question is another, distinct issue, and I can assure hon. members that it will be dealt with in another and more appropriate context and, I would add with equal assurance, within a very short time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion has been carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, clause 2 has in it a good many definitions and in fact covers the whole range of Bill C-207. I should like, therefore, in my first words on this clause to say that I am delighted that the House of Commons has supported Bill C-207 unanimously. It appears that there was not a single "nay" anywhere so that it was not even possible for the government to force a recorded vote. I want to say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, despite the things he just said in the speech he made on second reading, that I still think the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to what it does is a good piece of legislation.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I said so very clearly when we were debating the matter at the resolution stage. I said so with equal clarity when we were on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, the Minister of National Health and Welfare found in statements that I made on second reading—

Mr. Grafftey: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —a clearer and more ringing endorsation of this bill than he had uttered himself. But there are some things the minister has said to which attention should be drawn.

Mr. Grafftey: Not at committee stage.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friends are shouting "order". The whole legislation is before us and my hon. friends might as well save their breath as to shouts of "order" at this point. We are in committee of the whole and what is relevant to clause 2 is now before us. Clause 2 contains all the definitions that relate to the Canada Assistance Plan. The whole of this piece of legislation is in effect before us in the very wording of clause 2. It includes, amongst other things, a reference to the needs test.

I want to say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that even though he was waxing eloquent in his rhetorical flight he should not have distorted what I said about the needs test. I said it clearly on two occasions. I said that the needs test is an improvement on the means test. I said I was glad to see that where we now have means testing we are making the forward step of moving to needs testing. When I made very clear my approval of the needs test as better than a means test where there is now a means test, it did not mean that I approve of a needs test being established where there is not now a test of any kind. My complaint with regard to Bill C-207, and it is right here in clause 2 of the bill now before us, is that a needs test is being introduced for persons in the old age security bracket. These people are having a needs test put on where they now do not have a means test or any test whatsoever. It is about this that we complain. It is against this that most of the speeches on this side in the last few days have been directed.

I remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that when I spoke the second time on this question I asked him to be fair and not to misquote what I said on a previous occasion. But he chose to misquote it and interpret my approval of a needs test as better than a means test as meaning that I accept a needs test any place at all. I say again so that anyone other than the minister, I am sure, can understand it, that where we now have a means test it is good to have an improvement and have the needs test put in its place. But it is still a retrograde step, for which this parliament should hang its head in shame, that in the terms of clause 2 of this bill we are introducing a test in an area where we now do not have one.

The parliament of Canada in 1951 took one of the most advanced steps it has ever taken in the field of social legislation by passing an act that removed the means test for persons 70 years of age and over. Only a few months ago the parliament of Canada extended this progressive step by making provision for the means test to be removed year by year right down to the age of 65. It was a good step when we took it in 1951. It was a good step when we took it last year. But what the minister is asking parliament to do now is to take the retrograde step of putting a needs test in where there is no test of any kind at the present time.

My statement, the statements of my colleagues and the statements of members in other parties that this is a retrograde step, that this is an affront to the dignity of our senior citizens, is one that stands up in light of the speech the minister has made. He has invited us to argue this point and I hope we can yet persuade him that whatever the parliament of Canada proposes to do for our older people should be done without a means test or a needs test of any kind.

Clause 2, as I say, covers all the various definitions including that of need, and it includes the word "age", making it clear that at the moment this is what the government of Canada is proposing to do for our aged people, namely, give them only the benefits that are in this bill. Therefore it seemed to me that it was not only appropriate for members of the House of Commons to argue that something better should be done for our senior citizens than was provided in this legislation, but I think it was appropriate for the minister to tell us on several occasions that if we would just let the debate on second reading end he would respond to those suggestions and tell us what the government was going to do for senior citizens. Not only did he tell us that in the house, not only was this his answer and the Prime Minister's answer when we asked for a statement on motions, but in ways this government has the information was leaked out that if only the debate on second reading would come to an end the minister would make a statement telling us the government's intentions with respect to the recipients of old age security.

But now the minister, having finished his statement, decides to get on his high horse and he says he is not going to give us this information at the present time. I submit that the Minister of National Health and Welfare misled the house and misled the country by telling us that this statement was going to be made when he concluded the debate on second reading and then standing up this afternoon and refusing to make that statement.

I told the minister when we were at the resolution stage that it struck me the reason he was not telling us then what was going to be done for the senior citizens was that he was ashamed of it. I suggest that the same reason probably applies now, that he is not prepared to tell us what the government proposes to do later at some time for the recipients of old age security because he knows it will not stand up to the standards that have been established during the course of this debate. He knows it will not stand up to what the Canadian people expect.

I have been in this house a little bit longer than he has. I am a little bit older, and I can tell him—

The Chairman: Order. I must say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the Chair is having some difficulty in relating the remarks he is now making to clause 2 of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, if you look at clause 2 (g) on page 3 of the bill you will find a definition of "person in need". It is a lengthy one and I do not think I need read it all, but it includes the various reasons on the basis of which persons may receive assistance under this act, and one of them is age. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that age is definitely before us as one of the matters with which this piece of legislation is supposedly dealing. I suggest that the minister was perfectly in order in telling us that he was going to deal with this question when we got to the end of the debate on second reading, but that he has in fact misled the house and the country by giving us that impression and now refusing to make the statement.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: I wish to rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Will the hon. gentleman produce any quotations of a statement that I made to the effect that I would make a statement at the end of the second reading along the lines he suggested? Will he show it to me?

Mr. Knowles: It will take me time to find the references in Hansard and to quote them to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members on the opposite side should keep calm. There is plenty of time. One can speak as often as he wishes at this stage of debate and I will have time to look up the references in Hansard. My memory is quite clear in this regard. The minister said that if we would allow debate on second reading of the bill to come to a conclusion he would make a statement at that time.

On one occasion a few days ago both the Leader of the Opposition and I asked the Prime Minister whether the government, either through the Prime Minister or through the Minister of National Health and Welfare, would not make, on motions or on orders of the day, a statement on what the government was going to do with regard to old age security recipients. The Prime Minister answered by saying that the proper place for the minister to make such a statement was in closing the debate on second reading of the bill on the Canada Assistance Plan.

One of my colleagues has handed me a newspaper article headed "Aged Wait As Debate Drives On", a story by Fraser Kelly of the Ottawa Bureau of the Toronto Telegram similar to many other stories I read.

An hon. Member: This is another filibuster.

Mr. Knowles: The plan was that when debate on second reading ended the minister would make a statement. In the statement he has just made he admitted that we were expecting it but he said that since he gave that undertaking he had made the decision that a vote should be taken on the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to the welfare matters it covers and therefore the making of a statement on old age security should wait. The minister can explain it any way he wishes but at a later stage in the debate I will bring before the committee the exact quotations from Hansard in regard to his previous undertaking.

I wish to say to the minister that there will be keen disappointment across Canada tonight, and the bushels of mail I have received in the last few days will be multiplied as a result of the publicity which the minister has given me today. There will be bitter disappointment at the fact that whatever the government had in mind the minister decided not to give it to us. All of this talk that we were preventing him from making a statement because the debate went on for three and a half days, which was called a filibuster, is really ridiculous. It has turned out to be nothing but a sham.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: Some of my colleagues have shown me the references in Hansard. I will read them the next time I rise to speak. I will come back in a moment to what the minister calls the pre-political part of my speech. He can use such adjectives if he wants to but he is inviting a rather heated debate at this point.

I wish to say again, Mr. Chairman, that I think the Liberal government is making a serious and tragic mistake on every count by refusing, at this time and concurrently with this legislation, to deal with the problem of the income of our old age security recipients. It is the kind of mistake which the Liberals have been making throughout the years. They made it by taking so long in presenting old age legislation in the first place and in responding to the requests for an increase. They made it by refusing for so many years to remove the means test, and they made a tremendous mistake in 1957 when they provided a $6 increase. They are making it again when the country wishes to do the right thing by our elderly people who are in financial difficulties, when the country wishes the pension to be increased to $100 a month across the board without a means test, by not even telling us what are their plans after having led the whole country to believe that this would take place. Why are so many members of the press gallery present this afternoon? Are they here to listen to the minister's attack on me?

An hon. Member: No, to listen to you.

Mr. Knowles: They are here because they hoped to hear the statement which the minister was going to make. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that not only will the senior citizens who are affected by this plan be bitterly disappointed but so will all the people of this country because Canadians as a whole are concerned about the plight of the elderly.

Despite the words that have gone back and forth across the chamber this afternoon I wish to say again, as I said at the resolution stage and on second reading, that I think what this legislation does, apart from the things it fails to do, is good. I welcome the proposal that federal money should be allocated to some of these welfare needs. I welcome the proposal that the federal government should support welfare services as well as assistance payments, mothers' allowances, child welfare, Indian welfare, work projects and so on.

I suggest to the minister that he is a little off base when he tries to have it both ways. He quoted the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, myself and perhaps some others as pointing out the good aspects of this legislation, as we did, and then he said that hardly a word was said about the good features of this legislation.

Which way does the minister want it? The fact is there are good features in it and many hon. members both in the opposition and on the government side have said so. I hope, however, that even though we recognize the forward step being taken we can have an objective discussion in committee of the whole to ascertain exactly to what extent we are moving in these various fields.

As I said, clause 2 includes definitions of the various fields which will be covered, such as day care, homemaker services, mothers' allowances, child welfare, adoption services and so on. The minister made a great play about the amount of money that will be put into this plan by the federal government during the first year. He has told us a good many times that it adds up to a sum of $85 million. Whether we consider it under this clause or under some other clause, I hope the minister will be prepared to discuss with us in some detail how this money will be allocated and what the various sections of this program will get in terms of actual dollars. Either the minister can inform us of this or his parliamentary secretary can because, being a member of the committee on health and welfare, she knows that a good deal of this information has been given to us in that committee. Under normal circumstances I would take the position that information given to us in the committee is sufficient but the minister has made such boastful claims about this legislation here in this forum that it seems to me the country should get the whole picture.

I will quote the figures which we were given when we get to another clause of the bill and I will only say at this time that these figures show that the $85 million is broken down into about six or seven different categories. For example, when we wanted to know how much of this money will go to help the provinces pay extra benefits to old age security recipients we found there was no such category but there was a category called "program improvements" with an amount of $15 million for all program improvements. That makes it pretty clear that not much of that sum will go to old age security recipients.

In speaking about the welfare aspect of the program let me say that one of the strong points—and the minister made much of it this afternoon—is that the aim of this legislation is to try to get people free of dependency. He quoted the hon. member for Simcoe East who spoke about the desirability of such action, and we all agree with him. The minister said that this legislation proposes to give people a chance to rise above welfare and he said that the Canada Assistance Plan lays a foundation to make this possible. At that point hon. members on the Liberal side of the house loudly applauded.

In the committee on health and welfare we tried to find out how much of this $85 million, which after all is not very great in total, is going toward the provision of additional services, that is, services as distinct from assistance payments, services to help people get on their own, services to rehabilitate and so on. We could not get an exact figure, but by adding together the various figures we were given by the officials we built the total up to $14 million or $15 million a year. I just do not see that amount, good though its provision is in principle, doing much of a job along the lines the minister has proposed.

I recognize and will assert that in principle it is good for the federal government to get into the business of providing more money for welfare services. I think it is especially good that there is some kind of understanding among the 11 governments of this country, the federal government and the ten provincial governments, to work together in this field.

However, Mr. Chairman, when an offer has been made to the provinces to pay 50 per cent of all the extra money over the base period that the provinces will spend on welfare services, when there has been this agreement and the provinces indicate to the government that the extent or their total calls on this part of the fund for the first year is going to be only $14 million or $15 million, it strikes me that the selling job has not been as good as it might have been. This morning in the committee on health and welfare I quoted a report from one of today's newspapers to the effect that certain services would be available to municipalities in the province of Ontario for example, on a much more favourable basis than has been the case thus far. However, it was open to question whether or not the municipalities would avail themselves of these services. This is something, under the heading of what is good in the bill, that I want the minister to be prepared to discuss in full when we reach that clause. I cannot forget what the measure does not do for old age security recipients, but I also want to discuss what the measure does not do in terms of what the minister says it is good for. I suggest we should have a down-to-earth, realistic discussion of this aspect.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I have said enough at this point on clause 2. I will accept the minister's challenge to read back to him at a later point undertakings he made which I submit he has not kept by not giving a statement on old age security. I say to him, in light of the fact this bill is supposed to do something to meet the needs of our senior citizens, that the position he took in the last sentence of his speech is a bitter disappointment.

I have, as all hon. members have, during the past few days received a tremendous amount of mail from senior citizens. I brought some of the letters with me thinking I might read from them but I will leave that to a later stage. There is one from which I should like to quote a bit.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend says, "Oh, no". Perhaps he would enjoy this letter since it comes from Hamilton. Is there anybody here from Hamilton? I read:

Dear Sir:

So they think you are making a play for headlines (and so you are) and all us old people are behind you. God bless you and your followers; the best of luck to you.

I also received a telegram from Winnipeg which reads as follows:

As I said before, may I again recommend that you continue to explore all possible avenues in an effort to immediately raise old age pensions to $100 per month without means tests.

After a few sentences we find this:

Canada Assistance Plan operated through provinces with means test with various interpretations placed on them is not a satisfactory alternative, to which many Canadian citizens will testify.

I regret to say that I do not know the actual sender of this telegram but he signs himself, "Concerned Liberal Citizen".

An hon. Member: You don't mean he trusts you?

Mr. Knowles: Would hon. members like me to read them all? Far more interesting than the letters I am quoting, Mr. Chairman, would be the letters they are receiving on the government side of the house. As a matter of fact, I think that is what stung the minister into making his statement. I know what the people are writing to me, so I know what they must be saying to the government.

I want to repeat the position I have taken on two previous occasions, and the minister has no moral right to distort it. I took the position earlier, and I take it now, that the parts of this legislation which improve the administration of welfare are good. There are some deficiencies, but I hope we can iron them out as time goes by. In the main they are good and this is the reason hon. members voted for this bill unanimously. However, the failure of this government to face up to the problems of our senior citizens, the failure of the minister to say something in his statement, is a disappointment like so many of the disappointments the government across the way has given us.

I call upon this government to face up to the fact that Canadians want this parliament to do the right thing by our senior citizens. The only thing that is right is to increase the old age security pension to not less than $100 a month without the reintroduction of a means test or a needs test or any indignity of any kind.

Mr. Stewart: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day.

Mr. Rynard: Before we proceed with this motion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a statement he made that nobody had referred to the 200,000 women—

The Chairman: Order, please.

An hon. Member: There is a motion before the committee.

Mr. Rynard: I have a right to make this statement. The minister said no one referred to the 200,000 mothers. If he refers to page 6410 of Hansard he will find that I said this was a good framework within which to gather together all the loose ends such as unemployment assistance and so forth. The minister said that I believed it was a good plan and that is exactly what I said because there were too many loose ends. I also went on to say that the only addition to the plan was the 200,000 mothers. I am sure the minister would like to correct that statement.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I accept the hon. member's correction. I regret that I did not add that point to the commendation he made of the plan.

Mr. Lewis: A motion has been moved by the parliamentary secretary, but would he be good enough to tell us the reason for it?

Mr. Stewart: If it is in order to speak on this motion—

The Chairman: No, it is not in order to speak on the motion. A motion to rise and report progress is not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Motion (Mr. Stewart) negatived: Yeas, 21; nays, 32.

The Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question on clause 2. I have had some difficulty in following the debate with regard to this question and I hesitated to refer to the bill in detail on second reading because I might have been called to order. I want to ask the minister a question with regard to the definition in clause 2 (g) "person in need". I have been trying to discover the very fine distinction which exists between a means test and a needs test. Definition (g) is as follows:

(g) "person in need" means

(i) a person who, by reason of inability to obtain employment, loss of the principal family provider, illness, disability, age or other cause of any kind acceptable to the provincial authority, is found to be unable (on the basis of a test established by the provincial authority that takes into account that person's budgetary requirements and the income and resources available to him to meet such requirements) to provide adequately for himself, or for himself and his dependants or any of them—

I take that wording to constitute a mandatory direction to the appropriate provincial authority, in establishing who is a person in need, to take into calculation the means of that person. I would ask the minister whether I am correct in assuming that the needs test, which is given a statutory definition here, contains an element of the means test.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes, it does contain an element of the means test.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to keep the committee very long. Nor am I going to attempt to deal with the many parts of the minister's speech which I respectfully suggest to him were an exercise in distortion such as I have seldom heard in my life.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I rise to make two points. I am one of those who are unhappy about the requirement of a needs test, though as I said on an earlier occasion it is obviously an improvement on the means test. Of course I knew, as the minister a moment ago admitted, that a needs test necessarily included a means test as well. Certainly to require that account be taken of the budgetary requirements of a person as well as his means is an improvement. That is why I was pleased to vote for the bill, as I said I would on second reading and as also did others in this house.

However, I repeat what I said. No matter how glowing the words the minister may use in describing this bill, no matter how much he may draw upon witnesses outside the house such as the Canadian Labour Congress, welfare councils and the like, and no matter how much his advisers may insist the bill is great, I say to him that, improvement though it may be, the needs test remains a humiliating affair, as does any test for the purpose of dealing with people in need which requires an assessment of their livelihood.

People live in different ways. People expend their resources, large or small, by different choices, and any test that is applied to them is humiliating. If I and others failed to make ourselves clear earlier in expressing our disappointment at the bill, then let me try again.

It is my conviction, one which others share with me, that the only way to eliminate poverty in this country, aside from job provision and the like, is to have some general program of income maintenance. We require some general program providing a guaranteed annual income for a person or a family through the application of a negative income tax or some other method whereby, without the humiliation of a test and by a simple declaration of personal income, society makes up the difference between what a person or a family in fact has by way of income and that which, according to budgetary analyses, that person or his family requires to live on in their way, not in my way or in the way of the social welfare worker but in their way. So long as we are short of the goal of a guaranteed income for the needy, so long we will have humiliating situations, whether caused by needs tests, means tests, or whatever they may be called.

Second, I should like to say that when the minister said if I remember his words correctly, in his speech closing the debate on second reading that by various programs the government intends to reduce the number of people who have to rely on public assistance, I say to him that the major reason that this party—and I can only speak for this party—made the stand it did with regard to old age security recipients is precisely that. In order to reduce the number of persons, particularly among our aged people, who will have to rely on public assistance, let us make a universal payment to the old age pensioners when they reach a certain age—we say age 65, to which the government agree except that they postpone the payment until 1970 in their legislation—of at least $100 a month. In this way you reduce not only the number of people who will have to apply for public assistance but you also reduce the requirement for public assistance of those who still have to seek it to provide the balance they require to live decently.

In this speech on closing the debate on second reading the minister made a point of reading extracts from other members' speeches. He accuses other people of hypocrisy. I have had short experience in this parliament but I am sure that other members, including the minister, are as fed up with this sort of thing as I am. I did not accuse him of hypocrisy but he accuses me of hypocrisy. When I say me, I do not mean me personally. He did not name me but he said at one point in his speech, "No wonder some members on this side used the word 'hypocrisy'". He said that in one of his more rhetorical passages.

Let me tell him in measured words that only a guilty conscience could have interpreted—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. Lewis: —what was said in that way. What we said to him, and what we say to him again, is that we feel it is our duty to keep on fighting for an improvement in the amount paid by way of old age security and we do so with a clear conscience, as we have done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: Clarity of conscience—I am sure hon. members across the chamber will agree with me—exists not only in one part of the house. We can lay some claim to it as well as the minister of mines and energy, and we do so with the same humility which he is showing now.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the minister's attention to this simple matter. The minister interrupted the speech by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as reported on page 7063 of Hansard. I quote the words of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni:

> I wish the Minister of Finance would come into the house right now and tell us why the government does not support the simple and immediate proposal we are making. Somehow I feel it is almost unfair of me to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to stand up and do it. He does not appear to be giving any indication of a desire to get up on his feet at the present moment.
> Mr. MacEachen: May I, Mr. Speaker?
> Mr. Barnett: If he could give me some indication that that is what he has in mind, I would be quite happy to terminate my remarks at this point.
> Mr. MacEachen. I am ready, Mr. Speaker.
> Mr. Barnett: Does the minister wish to ask me a question?
> Mr. MacEachen: I accept the hon. member's invitation if he will sit down and allow me to wind up the second reading of this bill by making a statement.

After an exchange with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, at page 7069 of Hansard the hon. minister said:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to reply to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. He was given a full opportunity to present his point of order and I should like to reply to it by saying that this is the second time tonight hon. members have asked me to reply on this general subject—

And the general subject was the old age pensioners.

> —and make a statement with regard to the intentions of the government. Twice I have volunteered and have been refused. I am waiting anxiously to conclude this debate in order that the bill will be passed and so that the house will be fully aware of the government's plans.

If those words are not a clear undertaking that when the minister closed the debate he would make a statement on the subject of old age security and what the government's intentions are, I just do not understand simple English.

On June 30, as found on page 7080 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, before we leave the order of motions, is it not the intention of the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare to make a statement on the government's intention with respect to old age security?

Canada Assistance Plan

The answer is recorded as follows:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand we are debating the Canada Assistance Plan, and that will be a good occasion for the minister to make a statement.

Following those statements by the minister and by the Prime Minister, and the obvious leaks to the press which had all sorts of stories about what the content of the statement would be, I suggest to the minister, without accusing him of anything, that the time has come, and that time is now, for him to make this statement. He has second reading of the bill. He wanted a recorded vote. He would have got it too but he was slow in rising. He had made a long and tiring speech, as tiring to him as it was to those he attacked. But I say to him that he got approval on second reading. He got unanimous support of the principles of the bill. I say to him that in all honesty to the house, in all honesty to the older citizens of Canada, in all honesty to the people of Canada he owes it to them to rise and to tell us now what his intentions and the intentions of the government are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I can understand, although I could not appreciate, the reasons he appeared to have for refusing to make a statement on second reading. He said he wanted this bill to stand on its own feet.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, second reading of the bill has been passed on by the house after full opportunity for debate. The matter now before the house is clause 2 of the bill. It is not open to hon. members, in the committee stage when we are discussing particular clauses, to use that opportunity to continue the debate on second reading. It is not open, in other words, to hon. members to obtain by that device two opportunities to speak on second reading. The clause before the committee of the whole at the moment is clause 2 and debate now must be relevant to that clause. To continue and rehash the general debate on old age pensions and second reading in the specific form in which it is being done by the hon. member is, I respectfully submit, out of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have not been here nearly as long as the Minister of Public Works. Let me say first on the point of order that, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, clause 2 deals with aged people. It specifically refers to them. It specifically refers to a definition of need with respect to aged people.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Lewis: Certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: On the point of order that I raised, would the hon. member not admit that he has been and is dealing specifically with the arguments on second reading again and that—

Mr. Lewis: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. I understand that the Minister of Public Works is anxious, as we all are, to end the session and to deal with all the business we have before the recess that all of us deserve. But let me, as a relatively new member of this house, tell him that when he uses words such as "rehash" and the like he is going to be here just as long as it is necessary to make our points. And I do not appreciate—

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order—

Mr. Lewis: —any remarks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I merely want to tell the minister that as one member of the house I do not appreciate and I do not propose to tolerate that kind of characterization of anything I have to say when I am on my feet.

I say to the minister in reply to his point of order that the word "age" is in this bill. I have no idea what the minister's announcement may be. According to what I have read in the press the announcement may well deal with the way in which the Canada Assistance Plan will provide, in the minister's opinion and that of the government, additional assistance for the aged. I have no idea what his announcement will be. I venture to say from what I have read in the press that his announcement will be precisely within the ambit of clause 2. The Minister of Public Works, it seems to me, is not on very strong grounds when he objects to my asking the minister under clause 2, which deals with the need of old people, for an announcement which he undertook to make, has not yet made and which the entire country expects him to make.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, we ought to put this into perspective. Last Wednesday night the hon. member for Comox-Alberni volunteered to terminate his speech to allow me to wind up the debate. I said I would do so and I would disclose then and later the intentions of the government. I mentioned today that I was considering doing that at the time. Today I have indicated the intentions of the government with respect to old age pensions. But I wanted to have this measure dealt with on its merits and disposed of, because the other matter is another issue which will be dealt with within a short time. I went much beyond that and stated that we would be dealing with a further program.

Mr. MacEachen: Surely that is completely in accord with any undertaking that may have been given at that time, which was totally conditional upon the opportunity being given that evening. It was not granted, and I do not complain about that at all. Surely I have discharged fully the undertaking, which was conditional, that I would disclose the intention of the government. I have disclosed it today. I have not disclosed the details of any plan and I never said I would. But certainly I have disclosed the intention of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to impel myself into the internecine strife which has broken out between the allies, the Liberal party opposite and the New Democratic Party. It is discouraging to see such a division and I only hope something can be done to bridge the chasm created between them. Throughout the entire session and, indeed, for several previous sessions there has been a beautiful relationship between those two parties and I want to do everything I can to heal the wounds which are apparently being inflicted.

I must say it is most unusual that the Minister of Public Works should rise and say there should be no general discussion on clause 2. This practice has always been followed—

Some hon. Members: On clause 1.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —particularly when what is asked for has a full and complete relationship with the matter before the committee.

I was surprised to see in the Montreal Star metro edition this evening the headline: "Ottawa Prepares To Shelve Debate On Assistance Plan". Apparently the government is prepared to shelve this legislation. The article says:

> Government house leader George McIlraith told the Montreal Star last night he is seriously considering withdrawing the welfare bill and moving on to other legislation "if we are going to continue to sit around here doing nothing."

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would permit me to help him. My first request is that he try to approximate the pronunciation of my name. That is the important point. But the second point, which I might clear up at once, is that there was no suggestion that the government was going to withdraw consideration of the bill. No thought or consideration was ever given to that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So far as the first matter is concerned, I must immediately apologize. I get "micks" and "macs" mixed up sometimes. I did in this case.

But let me read on, because I am disturbed by this.

> Seldom angered by opposition floor tactics, Mr. McIlraith charged: "It has been quite apparent to all that it is not very easy to assess whether the house is interested in proceeding with the consideration of the Canada Assistance Plan."

And this is all in quotes. If the minister says he did not say it, all I have to tell him is that the Star has indiscriminately used quotation marks when they ought not to have been used. I read on:

> The house leader said that "continued opposition to an important piece of legislation such as this is not conducive to maintaining the high opinion which we hope this parliament holds in the minds of the public."

Mr. McIlraith: That is in Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure all of us are exhilarated to think that parliament holds a high position in consequence of the co-operation which has been shown by the opposition. But I cannot understand why the minister would have been quoted in such a blatant way when I now find out from him that he never uttered any of these words. However, I accept his denial.

Now I come to the one question which is in the minds of many members of this committee. I am not making any appeal to the minister in this connection but I suggest to him after his effort today, one which was in keeping with the best traditions of parliamentary debate, that now he has secured the passage of this bill on second reading he ought to make that announcement which everywhere across this country people are panting to hear—the announcement which is going to bring about a new heaven and a new earth to those in need who are over 70 years of age. They are waiting for this announcement. It has been built up.

The minister said he never undertook to make it. I do not challenge his view in that connection but if the ordinary interpretation is placed on what he said and on what the Prime Minister said to me the meaning is clear, that when the minister had been given the opportunity of rising and concluding the debate he would meet head on the question which had been raised regarding the old people of the nation who are in need. I suggest to him he should give second thoughts to his decision not to make an announcement.

The ordinary sense of the words used in the statement made to the house conveyed an assurance that the minister would speak, and every hour, almost on the hour, various press men announced that as soon as he had an opportunity he would speak and explain this new plan which would guarantee to everyone with an income of less than $1,260 a year, a pension of $105 a month. Surely the minister, after his excellent effort today, does not intend to wipe out the accumulated good will resulting from some well directed remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say that when he spoke I could not but agree that some of the things he said needed to be said, because certain hon. members on my left have the habit of wrapping themselves up in the garb of political purity. They indicate that only they have in their hearts the desire to help others. Well, the appropriation of such a monopoly of philanthropy is not in keeping with the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I remember so well in the days of B.D.—that is, Before Douglas—we used to be told in Saskatchewan: All you have to do is elect a socialist government; everyone is going to get social security and it will be paid for out of the profits of businesses to be set up. Well, they went into boots and bunk and woollens. They went into boxes.

An hon. Member: Trucks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot begin to cover the entire political phantasmagoria of promises and schemes. They rolled into action. A business would open, and it was not very long before it closed in bankruptcy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those were the happy, utopian days of the past. I was most interested by what the minister said in this connection. Always I have to conclude that those in the older political parties can still feel that as a result of their efforts a little something has been done for those in need over the period of 100 years during which they have alternated.

I am not here to quote statistics, but if challenged I can do so. I do not feel that way this afternoon. What I am trying to do is to make an appeal to the minister to stand up now and let us know what his policy is.

He used my words on another occasion with equal success and about this he got a unanimous vote. I would have done the same. I now say to him, you know where we stand; I ask you where do you and the others stand?

The Chairman: Order. I should like to make a comment regarding the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works. May I read for members of the committee standing order 78. I wish to read this now because it is one of the standing orders which has bothered me since the new orders were temporarily adopted. Standing order 78 says this:

> 1. In proceedings in committee of the whole house upon bills the preamble is first postponed, and if the first clause contains only a short title it is also postponed; then every other clause is considered by the committee in its proper order; the first clause (if it contains only a short title), the preamble and the title are to be last considered.
> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The question which arises in the mind of the Chairman is this. If clause 1 is to be postponed, does that give the committee the right to have a general debate on clause 2. Further, I might quote standing order 59(2):

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

There is some doubt in the mind of the Chairman whether the discussion so far is relevant to clause 2 of this bill. However, I would hope that those who are going to take further part in the discussion would confine themselves as closely as possible to clause 2.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, if any remarks or exchanges which took place between the minister and myself the other evening so piqued him that he changed his mind about making the statement which was requested, I would take this opportunity of apologizing most profoundly to him because I certainly would not want any remarks of mine to delay the announcement which it has been suggested a great many of the older citizens of Canada are awaiting. If the minister is so sensitive I will offer to go out of the house right now so as not to be in his way when he does it.

We have had some discussion about the definition of a person in need. The point that has been in the minds of a good many of us and which certainly was in the minds of a great many who took part in the second reading discussion is the relevance of including and continuing to include as a person in need persons by reason of their age. As I listened to the remarks made by the minister earlier he suggested I had made an offer and had withdrawn it. I think if the minister will read what I said at that point he will find that I was in effect challenging him to make a statement which would be an improvement upon the proposal advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of clause 2 of this bill certainly could be expedited a great deal if the minister were to accede to the request made by the Leader of the Opposition and by the member for York South and clarify the confusion in our minds as a result of the statements which he and the Prime Minister have made. The minister may recall that not too long ago, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in respect of what might be done in the field of legislation to improve the financial position of the aged, he said he could not say definitely there would be a proposal brought in but he would not rule out the possibility of a proposal being brought in by the government.

This whole thing has now built up to the point where a very relevant question in relation to the definition of a person in need in clause 2 is what other plans, if any, the government has in respect of the aged. I certainly would be quite willing to yield the floor. Not only would I yield the floor but I would withdraw from the house for the time being if that would induce the minister to make the statement which has been requested by so many hon. members of the house.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise to say something on this clause because it seems to me that not only did the minister make it clear during various stages of the debate, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for York South, that he would make a statement with regard to the needs of old age pensioners and government policy in that regard, but also on Friday, Saturday and even today there have been reports in the newspapers that as soon as the debate on second reading was finished the minister would make a statement outlining the government's proposal in respect of how the needs of the senior citizens of this country would be met.

A few minutes ago the minister said he had been prepared to make a statement last Wednesday following the invitation of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni but that the house would not let him make the statement then and he had since changed his mind. I have not been around this place as long as the minister but I have been here long enough to know that when three, four or five competent, experienced House of Commons newspapermen write the same story it is not an accident, that they did not pick the story out of thin air and that in fact the story came if not from the minister himself from the minister's executive assistant or the minister's public relations office. Such stories certainly are inspired.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Orlikow: On the front page of the Toronto Telegram of today's date there is a story by Fraser Kelly. The headline reads: "Aged Wait As Debate Drags On." Here is what Mr. Kelly said:

> Political gamesmanship at the expense of the nation's old people continues—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Surely the situation is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North had the floor and that the only interruption that can be permitted is the calling of private members' hour at six o'clock. In my view that does not give any other member on either side of the house the right to slip in a motion as the hon. member for Kootenay East attempted to do.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I call it six o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: The only relevant rule is that a vote cannot be taken between six and eight o'clock.

Mr. Monteith: It is now after six o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: A vote cannot be taken during that time but there is no question regarding—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my point is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North had not yielded the floor. He did not sit down but was interrupted because it was six o'clock. That does not give another member the right to make a motion on a matter of business other than what is before the house, which, after six o'clock, was private members' business.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business I do now leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, it is my duty to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras), Natural Gas—U.S. hearing on transmission between Canadian points; the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald), Research—suggested establishment of special committee on space research.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many members are aware that it is my intention to carry out an extended discussion on each of the insurance bills on the order paper until a decision is taken which will result in the handling of this type of bill in another manner. There are a number of other bills on the order paper which are not contentious so far as I am concerned and it may be that other members would like to deal with them now. I refer to such bills as those dealing with churches. With the indulgence of the house I suggest that the order for calling these bills might be No. 13, No. 14, No. 16 and No. 17 as they appear on the order paper.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to ask a question. Will the hon. member consider adding to his suggested list No. 6 on today's order paper?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, when you recognized the hon. member for Timiskaming I was about to ask the house for unanimous consent to the second reading of Bill No. S-13 which is No. 19 on today's list. I wanted this bill considered first today during private members' hour for several reasons. It has been the subject of debate for at least an hour on a previous occasion. When private members' hour expired then the hon. member for Timiskaming was speaking on this bill. It was my impression that he had almost concluded his remarks, but because of sloppy footwork on my part the bill was not given second reading. This company, in anticipation of the passage of this bill, has hired a staff and is ready to go into business. Any further delay seems to be somewhat unreasonable and certainly is costly. I ask the house and particularly the hon. member for Timisakming to give consent to second reading at this stage.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make a suggestion in view of the remarks of the hon. member for High Park. Can we reach an understanding that No. 19 on our list will be considered immediately following those items referred to by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the Minister of Public Works? I think there is some merit in what the hon. member for High Park said about the accidental position in which Bill S-13 finds itself on the order paper. If we can have such an agreement it may be possible for the house to consider that order today.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I am always reasonable and willing to compromise. If we can obtain the unanimous consent of the house to consider order No. 19 today immediately after the others to which the hon. member referred I will be satisfied.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the order in which these bills are to be heard is No. 13, No. 14, No. 16, No. 17, No. 6 and No. 19?

Mr. McIlraith: I believe the hon. member for Timiskaming indicated that the order in which these items would be considered was 13, 14, 16 ,17, 6 and 19. Is that correct?

Mr. Peters: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree that this order of business be followed?

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to understand the position advanced by hon. members. I was engaged in another discussion and I was not able to follow what took place. What happens to Nos. 10 and 11 for instance? Is there any understanding with regard to them?

Mr. McIlraith: The point was made at the beginning by a private member that many of the bills on the order paper would require a considerable amount of debate before being dealt with and that these other bills might be called, such as the ones dealing with churches, out of their priority on the order paper. It was then decided that order No. 19 would be added to the agreed list. I hope that is an accurate summary of what has taken place in the last ten minutes.

UNITED BAPTIST WOMAN'S MISSIONARY UNION OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (for Mr. Coates) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-33, respecting United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

CANADIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH OF GOD

Mr. Eric Stefanson (for Mr. Smallwood) moved second reading of the Bill No. S-18, to incorporate Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God (General Offices; Anderson, Indiana).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

• (6:10 p.m.)

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF ENDOCRINOLOGY

Mr. Jim McNulty (for Mr. Harley) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-29, to incorporate the International Society of Endocrinology.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the sponsor of this bill could not give us at least some brief introduction to the bill and its purposes before it is given second reading.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this will be a very interesting bill when it goes to committee because I am sure that many members of the house are not even sure what international society we are establishing or what the society is for.

An hon. Member: Endocrinology.

Mr. Peters: I see the name "endocrinology" and I suppose it is the medical term in connection with endocrine glands, etc. A reading of the bill shows that it is a fairly extensive measure. I presume this society will have a membership that is provincial, federal and international. The schedule of the bill indicates that a number of companies are involved. This is why I would like the hon. member to explain the bill. The schedule indicates that such places as Australia, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, Germany, England, Haiti, Holland and Hungary are involved. The schedule enumerates on two and a half pages societies that are already formed. The interesting thing is that the head office of the international society will be situated in Canada in the city of Montreal.

It is unfortunate that the sponsor of this bill is not here, because I presume the purposes of the bill will bring credit to Canada in that the head office of the society is being established in the city of Montreal. The society will itself determine the type of bylaws it will have in effect. It is interesting to note that, unlike some other bills with which the house deals, there is written into this bill a clause that in my opinion is very worth while and should commend itself to sponsors of other bills. A reading of the bill shows that clause 4 is concerned with the head office of the society, which it says shall be in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, or at such other place in Canada as the society may determine by bylaw from time to time. Then there is this subclause added:

> Notice in writing shall be given to the Secretary of State by the society of any change of location of the head office, and such notice shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette.

This is a very interesting provision and I believe it is something the committee should recommend for future bills, because in the choosing of a head office we have found that a number of companies have had to come before parliament and have new legislation enacted to enable them to change their address. This has been achieved by means of a very cumbersome piece of machinery whereas a very simple appendage to the statement of the location of the head office, which would allow any company to change the address of the head office by applying to the Secretary of State and publishing the change forthwith in the Canada Gazette, would achieve the desired purpose in a much more simple way.

I believe this is a very worth-while provision and it should recommend itself to the members of the committee who are interested in taking out of parliament many of the bills that are nothing but a nuisance when companies have to come before us to change the number on the board of directors or make other changes. If a clause were written into the original act it would allow changes to be made in the number of directors, where the head office will be, where the annual meetings will be held and so on. This method of dealing with the problem would get rid of the difficulty that has existed in changing the name of a company. Also, there has been a major problem in respect of some companies in putting into the French language the title of the company. This has been a difficulty in the past because the titles of some companies are not easy to translate into the French language.

It is interesting to note that the International Society of Endocrinology is in French translated into La Société Internationale d'Endocrinologie, and I suppose our French members would agree that this is a simple, straightforward translation of the English name. The way I pronounced it would not really convey that impression. The functions of the society are not clearly dealt with in the bill. The society has asked for power to develop a constitution and make bylaws, rules and regulations as long as they are not contrary to this act. I presume the bill has been carefully studied by lawyers versed in international and constitutional law who are in a position to assess whether the bylaws of this international agency would be acceptable to the many countries already involved in that they have branches of this society.

I note that some countries, including England, have two such societies. It would be helpful if the sponsor of this bill was able to indicate on second reading whether the fact that England has the Society for Endocrinology, London, and the Endocrine Section, Royal Society of Medicine, London, means that these two societies were established separately. He could also tell us what the relationship would be between these two societies and the international society now sought to be established.

It is interesting to note that in addition to the power to draw up bylaws the society has asked for this power:

> To acquire the whole or any part of the rights and propertise held by, for or on behalf of the association.

They have also asked for this right:

> To purchase, take on lease or in exchange, hire and otherwise acquire by gift, legacy, devise or otherwise.

It would be interesting to note just what the power to acquire properties by "devise or otherwise" would include.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I wonder whether the hon. member for Timiskaming would look at clause 2 of the bill which sets forth the objectives of the society in a very clear and comprehensive manner. May I suggest to him that we now approve the bill in principle, and all the matters which he is now discussing can be dealt with in committee. He will have another opportunity to discuss this bill when it comes back to the house after study in committee.

Mr. Peters: I appreciate advice from one so learned in the law. I have read clause 2 which includes a lot of big words that I really do not understand. I am not capable of grasping the principle of this bill from such phrases as:

> To disseminate knowledge of endocrinology by co-ordinating and organizing international congresses and conferences of endocrinology, by facilitating collaboration among national endocrinological societies and qualified persons interested in endocrinology and by publication of books, reports and other papers relating thereto.

This may be very clear, Mr. Speaker, but to me it is as clear as mud, and it is for this reason that we have a sponsor who usually avails himself of the opportunity to give us an explanation of such bills. I realize this bill will be considered in committee but his discussion may raise a major point in question. Members of this house have a habit of passing legislation on matters which they do not fully understand. While my education may have been neglected, I am of the opinion there may be other hon. members, including the hon. member who raised the question, who may not be too familiar with the meaning of phrases such as "co-ordinating and organizing international congresses" and "facilitating collaboration".

Maybe I need a retraining course, but I think this is one of the reasons for having a discussion of these matters and this may be one of the reasons for a bill incorporating such an agency being brought up for discussion in parliament. I will be very interested to read the committee's report containing the information provided by the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron) that most of the questions that might arise on this bill can probably be discussed in the committee. For this reason I am happy to support its passage on second reading.

However, there are a couple of questions of general interest which I hope the committee will consider. One of them is the reason for this society seeking to incorporate under Canadian law in view of its very international composition which, as the hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out, appears to be virtually world-wide.

There is another matter regarding this bill which has been dealt with at some length by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I will not pursue it further but it is one of principle which I have not noted in any other bills of this nature seeking to incorporate societies for various purposes. I refer to the provision, in a fairly usual clause, which gives the proposed body power to hold property and to engage in financial transactions. Is it to be construed as authorizing the society to issue promissory notes intended to be circulated as money by a business engaged in banking or insurance? Many of the companies coming before parliament wish to engage in the business of insurance. It is refreshing to find a company not desiring to do so.

Mr. Peters: Maybe that is why the hon. member wants this bill passed.

Mr. Barnett: The fact that this particular provision is contained in this bill raises a rather interesting question of principle. Perhaps it is one that should be considered by the committee and one that can be more fully understood as a result of that consideration.

The question that puzzles me is the reason for placing in this bill a provision empowering the society to hold property and make ordinary financial transactions which are usual in the incorporation of such bodies. In concluding my remarks may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite happy to support the passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

MENNONITE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (CANADA)

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-37, to incorporate Mennonite Central Committee (Canada).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it very much if the house would consider at the present time a bill standing in my name to incorporate Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section. Since we are now considering religious orders, this would be the appropriate time for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. Peters: We have overlooked this bill; it was not intentional.

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA—CANADA SECTION

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-39 to incorporate Lutheran Church in America—Canada section.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA

The house in Committee on Bill No. C-111, to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada—Mr. Richard—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

• (6:30 p.m.)

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Western Canada has been a fairly controversial bank. The bill to incorporate it has had a rough passage not only in the house but in the committee as well. If hon. members are interested in the amendments, they may look at Votes and Proceedings No. 41 for Tuesday, March 15, and they will see that there are six or seven pages of amendments to this bill. I am sure the sponsor of the bill would like to say a few words on the amendments that have been moved as well as the problem raised by the fact that some questions have been asked about whether or not there are dummy directors for the company.

One of the directors is the former president of the Bank of Canada who apparently has a very small number of shares but has played a fairly large role in the development of the Bank of Western Canada. Apparently this bank is not in fact, a bank of western Canada at all. It is an additional bank which will be situated in the city of Winnipeg but the financial control will remain in the city of Toronto. There was some discussion of this situation in the committee, and whether or not members were satisfied with the explanations I am not able to say.

This was a simple bill of only three pages but now there are four pages of amendments which I believe raises a problem. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not mention these facts. In my opinion the move to establish the Bank of Western Canada and the Bank of British Columbia should have been taken into consideration after the discussion of the amendments to the Bank Act. At that time consideration could have been given whether or not this bank was going to perform the usual functions of a bank.

It is true that the banking industry in Canada is not under monopoly control, but from the point of view of the borrower and the depositor the banks in Canada are really a monopoly operated in conjunction with the state bank, the Bank of Canada. For this reason there has to be a certain amount of consideration given to any banking legislation because it is obvious that banks play an important role in our country. They are important for the loans they make and for the facilities they provide. They are important too in their relations to the Bank of Canada, which is an establishment that can be used for the good of the nation.

I am therefore very sympathetic to the idea that people in western Canada will have the opportunity of having a bank of their own. I regret the fact that it has been necessary to look at the sponsorship of this bill, and I am not referring to the parliamentary sponsorship. I refer to the provisional directors of the company. One who is not named seems to have a great deal more influence behind the scenes in connection with this bank than the person who has been named chairman of the board of directors, I presume pro tem, Mr. Coyne.

We are well aware of the fact that there are parts of western Canada that have not been served as well as they could be by existing banks. For this reason it was not surprising that the other chartered banks in Canada did not in any way oppose this measure. There are a limited number of chartered banks, I believe only 11, of which six provide the majority of the banking service for most Canadians. The fact that these banks did not oppose this measure indicates they were not prepared to provide the service themselves in many of the areas in which the sponsors of this bill indicated they were prepared to provide service. For this reason the Bank of Western Canada possibly will serve a useful purpose.

I am hopeful that the day will come when not only the Bank Act will be changed so there will be a better opportunity to assess the banking needs of Canada but there will also be an opportunity to see what the policies of some segments of the banking system may be. It is a fact that you can go to one bank in a community with a certain proposition, outline this proposition to the bank manager and indicate what your collateral is, and if you are turned down at that bank and walk across the street to another bank you will be turned down in exactly the same way. In my opinion there is absolutely—I underline "absolutely"—no competition whatever between banks. I suggest that the Bank of Western Canada is going to be no better and no worse than the other banks.

I believe we should not be passing this bill but that we should be introducing a national banking authority to bring all the banks under some central control. It is interesting to note that while we talk about a 6 per cent interest rate for the banks there are indications that is not always the rate. I presume this bank will adhere to the same policy the other banks have. Someone says that the law provides the banks can only charge a 6 per cent interest rate. This is not true. Every one of the banks has a different interest rate for various types of loans. They have an interest rate that includes the 6 per cent, plus insurance and a number of other charges.

I was in a bank and we were discussing the rates of interest on small loans. I mentioned the rate of one bank and the manager said: That is not the rate over there; it is so much. He pulled a form from his desk drawer and showed me the rate on small loans at the other bank. It was interesting to note that the bank interest on small loans was running anywhere from 6 per cent to 8 per cent. The manager was quite willing to show me how they arrived at these charges.

It is interesting to recall that a few years ago the Imperial Bank of Commerce appeared before the banking committee and was willing to testify it had a bank rate considerably higher than 6 per cent. The bank was willing to outline how it arrived at this rate. It was interesting also to note how the lawyers got into the question because some of the officers of the Imperial Bank of Commerce were asked how they got away with having various rates of interest. They said they had legal advice which indicated that if they followed a certain pattern they would be able to increase the bank rate for certain loans under given conditions. The other banks indicated at the time that they were not interested in pursuing this course, their legal advisers having indicated it was not legal. It is interesting to note that since that time all the banks have gone into this business so either the lawyers had a change of heart or the banks saw some reason for the change.

It seems to me we are not taking into consideration the over-all needs of the country and that there is a similarity between these banks and the insurance companies which operate in a monopoly position. It is true that not every Tom, Dick or Harry can start a bank in Canada, although I understand that when my ancestors first came to this country they could and did do so. Whether or not they went broke escapes me, but it certainly has not rubbed off on me and I have not inherited anything from them. Therefore I do not know whether it was a good thing that we allowed at that time a variety of small provincial banks in one community to be owned by one individual.

It is true that in this country the banking industry has weathered the storms which have plagued other countries. I think it is safe to say that for at least the last 20 years no one who has deposited money in a bank has found it less advantageous than depositing it under the mattress at home, and some people may consider it more advantageous and even a little safer.

However, the purpose of this bill, let us face it, is not to provide a service. If we really want to provide a service to the Canadian people we should nationalize all banks and thereby provide the same service to all the people. If such were the case people in Toronto would not find it necessary to say that no money is available for mortgages. In my area the farmers would not complain about no money being available to buy extra equipment or cattle for the farm. They would not say there was tight money or loose money, and they would be able to obtain money as the Minister of Finance decided money should be made available.

At the present moment a gentleman's agreement exists. The minister says "Let us tighten up the money supply". He said that a short while ago and all the banks played the game. I wonder whether those in the Conservative party who a few years ago did not have much faith in Mr. Coyne would expect him to play the game if he were the chief director of this bank. When he was asked to play the game he might not play the game, though he might be an exception. This sort of thing may be good or it may be bad. The situation here may not be the same as with other banks to which we have granted charters, and therefore we may find we will repent that we granted this company a charter, even though I am sure there are many people in western Canada who are looking forward to having a bank on their street to provide service.

It should be quite clear to the Canadian public by now that banks are not only supplying service. A bank is not just a place to deposit money but also a place which provides wealth to those who deposit a few dollars toward its incorporation. The only consolation I have is that these banks will not get rich on the amount of money I deposit in them, whether they have branches in Ontario or elsewhere. Although there is some advantage to those who incorporate a bank, there is less advantage offered to those using the facilities of the bank.

I suggest that in passing this bill we may open a chink in the banking industry of Canada, particularly with the vindictiveness that Mr. Coyne may feel toward some governments for some time to come. If so, this will bring us much closer to the day when we reach the goal of which I am personally in favour, namely, nationalizing the banking industry of Canada and having one large bank with outlets in every town in the nation to supply credit where credit is needed and on a much more equitable base than I have found in many local offices, particularly when they have to call upon the collector for the next two years. If this is the accomplishment in years to come I will be very happy to lend my small support to the passage of this bill.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, as you recall this bill has previous consideration in committee of the whole on April 26 last. It has, of course, been in the parliamentary hopper for quite some time now, along with another proposal to establish what has been referred to as a regional bank, namely, the Bank of British Columbia.

As I have said on other occasion when we have had these measures under discussion, I believe that, properly handled, the development of regional banks in a country as widespread as ours and with the diversity of economic interests we have in different regions in Canada, can serve a useful purpose as long as our basic system of banking as we know it now is maintained. At this moment we do not exactly know what the government may have in its mind in regard to the future of the banking system, except in a very general way. We do know that the two banks being proposed will come under the regulations and rules of the new bank Act, whatever form they may take, and in that respect at least they will be in the same category as any other bank in Canada.

As far as I am aware, the other new bank which is being proposed, the Bank of British Columbia is not being organized in the present bill along the lines which were originally proposed. The former bill would have enabled the provincial authorities in British Columbia to direct its policy in the public interest, but I understand it will be a genuinely regional bank.

So far as the Bank of Western Canada is concerned I am not quite so sure in my own mind that it will operate in accordance with the manner in which the name proposed for it would suggest. The question has been raised, and I think quite well documented, that while it is being called the Bank of Western Canada its control is not going to lie among western Canadians. In this connection I would like to refer to remarks made on April 26 by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands as reported at page 4339 of Hansard, in which he said:

> We have been told that one of the purposes of organizing this bank was to have a financial institution in western Canada, based in western Canada, owned by people in western Canada and directed by people in western Canada. But what do we find?

He then went on to deal with some of the evidence that was adduced in the committee on banking and finance which made it clear that so far as the financial control of the equity capital of this bank was concerned this was not actually going to be the case.

• (6:50 p.m.)

The hon. member concluded his remarks at page 4339 of Hansard. I shall not read everything he said but only his words in conclusion.

> Obviously this bank is not only going to be directed by three eminent financiers from Toronto but is going to be owned substantially by residents of central Canada, not of western Canada.

Then he added:

> I have no objection to people of central Canada owning property such as this but I do not think they should masquerade as residents of western Canada devoted to the interests of western Canada. This is one of the things that give me some concern.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that I share the concern expressed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I only hope that some of the attention which has been focused on the discrepancy between the name of the bill and the actual ownership may serve to put the management of this bank on the alert so that they will make a genuine attempt to prove that some of the fears expressed have been unfounded. I hope that if they are going to portray themselves as the Bank of western Canada they will in fact devote their major attention to meeting the needs of western Canada with respect to banking services to an extent that some of the other chartered banks in this country have not done. I hope that they will deliberately shape and form their policies to that end so that the people of western Canada will derive some benefit from the establishment of this bank and the policies which it will follow. The people have not always derived adequate benefits from the other chartered banks which have their headquarters in the eastern part of the country.

I am not making these remarks in any sense of trying to set one region of Canada against another but only with the idea that all regions of Canada should develop economically and so develop the strength of their industry that the strengthening of one region can serve to make Canada as a whole a stronger nation in the economic and financial field. I hope that this will turn out to be the case in respect of the Bank of Western Canada if it finally receives approval and is incorporated under the laws of this parliament.

I note that the hon. member for Timiskaming made some references to one of the persons who is named in this bill who is widely known in Canada in the field of banking and who has been at one time or another a person whose name has been bandied about freely in this chamber and in the other place. We all know that he is a man of experience and of strong will. We hope that in so far as he has a voice in the affairs of this bank he will do his best to see that it does in fact carry out the purposes previously stated with respect to establishing a bank under the name of "Bank of Western Canada".

With these remarks, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned I am prepared to see this bill pass this stage so that it may be considered in the other stages of the parliamentary process.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 5—Definitions.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I refer to clause 5(1)(a)(i). In that clause there seems to be included the wording of the old clause. The old clause read:

All directors of the bank shall be subjects of Her Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

That is explicit. But in the incomprehensible amendment, if I read it correctly, something appears to have been added. The amendment says:

(i) Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, or

(ii) the government of a foreign state or any political subdivision thereof,

I would ask the sponsor what that means.

Mr. Richard: It means exactly what is in the definition. The clause reads:

(a) "agent", in relation to

(i) Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, or

(ii) the government of a foreign state or any political subdivision thereof, means an individual or corporation empowered to perform any function or duty on behalf of Her Majesty in either such right or on behalf of the government of a foreign state or any political subdivision thereof, other than a function or duty in the administration or management of the estate or property of an individual.

This is just the ordinary definition that is found in such a statute. It is more or less standard.

Mr. Peters: What worried me was that in the previous clause before being amended the wording was:

All directors of the bank shall be subjects of Her Majesty—

Is this new clause inserted to prevent a take-over of this bank by an outside bank, as was the case with the Mercantile Bank? Is this clause designed to prevent that sort of thing?

Mr. Richard: That cannot happen here.

Mr. Peters: Why is there not a simple clause saying that the directors shall be Canadian citizens regularly resident in Canada? The clause as it is now worded says:

Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, or—

Then it says "political subdivision". I was wondering whether this had to do with the provincial danger mentioned by previous speakers. I was curious about this.

Mr. Richard: No, Mr. Chairman. That clause was considered in committee. There was very full discussion about this matter. In fact, all the questions raised here were raised in committee. The same objections were raised and this wording was adopted after discussion.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the said bill be read the third time.

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Mr. Richard moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Time has been consumed—the time which elapsed when we were discussing the orders for the private members hour. I suggest a little extra time might be given for the second reading of Bill S-13 respecting the Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation. I ask consent for this to be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is there unanimous consent to proceed with consideration of Bill No. S-13?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Private Bills

CANADA HEALTH AND ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cameron (High Park) for the second reading of Bill No. S-13, respecting Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to say just two things. Sponsors who are willing to play games should expect to get hurt occasionally. Second, I think it would be wise for sponsors not to sponsor too many bills in their own names, or they also might find it more difficult in these circumstances.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Pursuant to standing order the said bill stands referred to the standing committee on trade, finance and economic affairs.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Could I again seek the indulgence of this house? The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) talks about playing games. This particular sponsor was not playing any games. The bills I have sponsored were all sponsored for personal reasons. In this case the solicitor for the company was a student of mine and a friend of mine for many years.

However, the point I am making is that a number of bills have been sent to the committee. My bill got bypassed in that process. It is a simple bill and, as I understand it, this company is prepared, if this measure receives third reading and is passed, to commence business immediately upon Royal Assent being given.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is that agreeable to hon. members?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): It has been done in connection with other bills. However, the hon. member for Timiskaming has indicated that he, in any event, is not prepared to consent. So that will settle the matter for the time being.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The bill stands referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret).]

The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-207 to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock consideration was being given to clause (2). Shall clause (2) carry?

Mr. Orlikow: When the committee turned to other matters at six o'clock I was developing the point that the minister had made a commitment in the house to make an announcement concerning assistance to old age pensioners. The references he made on this matter in the house have been placed on record by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South.

I wish to point out that the minister went further. He and his staff were busy convincing newspapermen, the people who cover parliamentary proceedings and sit in the gallery, that he was waiting and that he would have made a statement on Wednesday, or on Thursday, or on Friday—he could scarcely contain himself, and if only the nasty people in this corner, the members of the New Democratic Party who for purely political and party reasons were carrying on a filibuster would cease their activities, he would come forward and announce his proposal.

Not only did he indicate to the press that he was ready to make a statement, but details of that statement were spilled out. I do not know whether the minister saw the press himself or whether it was his very competent executive assistant who did so, or whether it was his public relations advisor, whom I saw sitting just above the press gallery only about five minutes ago.

I wish to place on record a few of the press stories which I suggest were inspired from the minister's office. They appeared in the press across Canada, not only on Wednesday of last week, but since then. I would begin with the Winnipeg Free Press which carried a story on Friday, July 1, by Victor Mackie. I start with this because I notice Mr. Mackie sitting in the press gallery. It begins:

> Costing the federal treasury nearly $300,000,000 a year Health Minister Allan MacEachen is expected to make an announcement soon that the federal government has decided to provide a transitional old age pension benefit. It will likely become effective Jan. 1, 1967.

Later, Mr. Mackie says:

> The minister is prepared to make the announcement. He wanted to make it Wednesday. But if he made the statement it could close off the filibuster the New Democratic party has launched calling for an increase in the basic old age pension from $75 up to $100 a month and the lowering of the age limit to 65 years.

Then in today's Toronto Telegram there is a similar story by Fraser Kelly under the headline: "Aged wait as debate drags on". The story begins:

> Political gamesmanship at the expense of the nation's old people continues in the commons today as members enter their fifth day of debate on the Canada Assistance Plan. Several times last night opposition spokesmen refused to grant Health and Welfare Minister MacEachen the floor to make an announcement about increased pensions.
> It is expected the announcement will provide for up to $30 a month assistance beyond the $75 a month now being paid.

On Saturday, July 2, Mr. Fraser Kelly had a similar article in the Telegram. This was headed: "Sham pension fight stalls government offer". I wish to read a paragraph or two from this story:

> The House of Commons is locked in a sham battle as the politicians compete to win the favour of the nation's needy old age pensioners.
> New Democrats won't let commons business continue until the government has promised a substantial increase to the existing $75 a month pensions.
> Health Minister Allan MacEachen has such an announcement to make but he won't make it until the opposition stops calling for it because the government doesn't want to appear to be giving in to opposition pressure.

What was the announcement Mr. Kelly was talking about? The stalemate could end on Monday, the article goes on to say. Then Mr. Kelly says:

> If it does, Mr. MacEachen will announce a program to provide more money for pensioners who won't receive money under the Canada Pension Plan.

The Toronto Globe and Mail of Friday, July 1, has a story by Anthony Westell. The heading of that article reads:

> Ottawa plans extra aid for over-65's in need.

I should like to quote briefly:

> Persons too old to benefit from the Canada Pension Plan are to receive a special payment to supplement the $75-a-month old-age security pension.
> The cabinet has approved in principle the idea of special assistance, though details of the scheme have not yet been worked out. The legislation is expected to be put before the Commons in the fall.

Then Mr. Westell goes on again to deal with the fact that there would be an increase of $30 a month. Who is playing politics with this question; where did these reporters get these stories which are almost word for word alike? They did not pick them out of the air; they were not smoking marijuana before they wrote these stories. They got them from the minister's office. I wish to suggest to the minister that if, as has been said on a number of occasions—

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member for Winnipeg North that again the Chair is having some difficulty in attempting to relate to clause 2 the statements he now is making. I would hope the hon. member would adhere as closely as possible to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Orlikow: I think my remarks are in order, Mr. Chairman, because I am discussing the problem of the assistance which will be given to the needy. What I am trying to do is to indicate that what we propose the minister should do, and what the minister supposedly was going to announce at the end of the debate on second reading which ended today, has not been announced. I do not know whether he did not receive the approval of the cabinet in the matter, or whether he got into a huff.

I suggest to the minister that if, as so many newspapermen have said, he really is a serious contender for the leadership of the Liberal party, one way not to get support is to tell newspapermen in advance that you are going to do something and then not do it. Newspapermen, like anybody else, like to be first with what they are doing. The worst thing the minister could do for himself was to leak a story or an idea to the press and then fail to come across. That kind of thing is not going to do any good to the minister. I am not very concerned about him, but I am concerned about the tens of thousands of people who have been waiting and who had high hopes on the basis of what had been said in the house by members like the hon. member for Brantford, whose presence in the house I doubt for the rest of this debate, because I have a feeling he expected the minister to make a statement which the minister did not make. The people in need had been led to believe there would be an early announcement today about increased assistance, at least of $25 and probably $30 a month.

The minister said he did not intend to make this statement today and that he would make it at some future date. I think even at this late date he would be wise in the interest of himself, his party and particularly the old age pensioners, to make the statement which he obviously intends to make in the not too distant future to the effect that there will be almost immediately an increase in the old age pension.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, when I spoke on second reading of the bill I made my position perfectly clear. I would not repeat some of my words, except that they were twisted this afternoon in the comments addressed to the members of our group. I should like to refer to what I said as reported at page 7048 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, if there are members in this house who would like to see this bill killed or who would oppose it, I am not one of them.

Then at page 7049 I went on to say:

> I am not going to go in detail into the new services, but there are such things as child care, homemaker services, provision for nursing in the home, and other forms of health care which are badly needed and which the people in the field realize are badly needed.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I doubt very much if a member is allowed to repeat a speech previously given.

Mr. Knowles: Provided it is relevant, it is in order.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I thought I might be able to save time by doing this, Mr. Chairman. Am I in order?

The Chairman: I think the hon. member is in order in referring to remarks she made in a previous part of the debate on this same subject.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will not take any length of time. I wished to make our position on this abundantly clear.

> In the third place, I think this legislation will give social workers more scope in preventive and rehabilitative work than they have had heretofore. Instead of having to wait until the families and individuals are in a very bad way they will be able to step in at an early stage of distress and difficulty.
> The social workers will have much more scope to do preventive work and also to pioneer along new lines of rehabilitation. In the fourth place, I think undoubtedly this legislation will help secure more and more highly trained social workers. This is important in an age like ours where training is very necessary. In the last place, I think it is going to be very valuable because it will include the Indians under the same provisions as other people. I think this is a very essential and long overdue form of restitution which we are making to some of the native people in this country.

I wanted to quote that, because it was said this afternoon that none of us made any reference to the good and necessary features in the bill.

Now I wish to go on to deal very briefly with one or two of the features in this bill which I think are long overdue and very necessary in this country. I know that social workers in certain parts of the country are looking to this legislation as a means of getting ahead with child care, day care, nursery care, or whatever you choose to call it. In Canada we do not know exactly what we have or how much we need in the way of day care. We do know that we need a great deal more than we have at the present time. We know that in 1965 there were 2,020,000 Canadian women working for pay outside of homes. Of these, 1,054,000 were married; 191,000 were widowed or divorced. Sixty per cent of the married, widowed or divorced women—about 757,000—had children under the age of 16.

Who takes care of these children while their mothers are at work? The women's bureau of the Department of Labour in Ottawa did some research on this in eight Canadian cities. They found that most of these women, 757,000 of them, do not pay for the care of their children. They do not pay for it because they cannot afford to pay for it. Instead their children are left with the grandmother, with another adult or, worse still, an older child.

This is the situation to date in Canada. I was interested to find out how little accurate information on the amount of day care there is available across Canada. I came across a statistical work prepared recently by the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women, which indicated a shocking lack of day care services in existence in Canada in relation to the need. British Columbia is one province which is a little better off in this regard than many others, yet in that province there are only 311 institutions of this kind available, including private nurseries, private kindergartens, kindergartens, co-operative nurseries and day care nurseries. These institutions look after in the neighbourhood of 15,720 children. In addition there are 33 foster day care homes with an enrolment of 192 children. In that province there is provision of this kind for only 15,912 children.

The business and professional women's researcher discovered that in Alberta there was concern on the part of women's groups and family welfare agencies which resulted in the licensing of day nurseries, nursery schools and play schools by the department of public welfare. All facilities in Edmonton, with two exceptions, are privately operated either through a voluntary organization or a private enterprise. The only figures available show that the total number of children provided day care in the city of Calgary is 2,085. Information available in respect of Medicine Hat indicates that some children receive this type of care, but the number is not available.

In the province of Saskatchewan—and the minister will note that that province is under new management—at the present time there is provision for 90 children. In Manitoba no figures are available as to the amount of care provided, but I have learned that there are only four licensed day care nurseries, an unknown number of private nurseries, unlicensed operators and relatives and neighbours who provide this type of service.

In New Brunswick the day care nurseries look after 703 children. When one tries to find information of this kind in respect of Nova Scotia he is reminded of the Iron Curtain, because no information is available. Even the department of public welfare is unable to provide accurate information on the number of children for which day care provision is made. No information is available in respect of Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or Quebec.

In Ontario information is available only in regard to the city of Toronto and the city of Ottawa. In Toronto some 20,018 children are enrolled in various types of day care schools, and in the city of Ottawa 360 children are enrolled in similar schools.

Admittedly there may be a few more such day care nurseries in operation in Canada than those for which we have figures, but on the basis of our information there are only 39,088 children being looked after through this kind of service. There are approximately 757,000 working mothers; so when you consider that only 39,088 children are being provided with day care, you realize how absolutely impossible the situation is and you wonder what happens to the approximately three quarters of a million children who are being left on their own, without any day care provision.

I believe that this bill will do a great deal to help make funds available for the establishment of day care schools, provided provincial governments and local welfare authorities take advantage of this provision. The next hurdle that must be overcome relates to the lack of information about day care in those provinces I mentioned. I suggest that, because no information is available in this regard, this is a clear indication that provincial governments may not use the provisions of this bill to the greatest advantage. I hope they do, because this is a very far-reaching form of service.

Another form of service which may receive assistance through this measure is the homemaker service, and here again this should be regarded as a preventive service. This type of service which will now become available in Canada I am sure will prevent many Canadian homes from being disrupted and broken. I know nothing more conducive to broken homes than mothers going out to work and leaving their small children without proper care. Homemaker service is a very valuable form of service. I do not know the exact amounts of money that will be made available for this type of service during the remainder of this year, but I hope that when the minister replies he will give us some indication.

Let me make a brief reference to another form of service, neighbourhood services. This is a new service being provided in Canada. There are four agencies at this time in Canada that provide this service and they are located, as might be expected, in the four largest cities. In Montreal there is the Association of Neighbourhood Services; in Toronto there is the Association of Neighbourhood Services; in Winnipeg there are the Neighbourhood Service Centres and in Vancouver there is the Association of Neighbourhood Services. These organizations are all affiliated with the Canadian Association of Neighbourhood Services, the Canadian Welfare Council and the National Federation of Settlements and Neighbourhood Centres.

I believe that these organizations will be eligible for funds under this program because their purposes are: first, to stimulate public interest in the role of neighbourhood services within the total welfare services structure; second, to serve as spokesmen for neighbourhood services on matters of national concern; third, to serve as a medium for the exchange of information and ideas regarding local and international developments in neighbourhood services; fourth, to co-ordinate neighbourhood service projects of national scope; fifth, to foster fact-finding studies and research in neighbourhood services and provide consultative services; sixth, to establish standards of practice for neighbourhood services and seventh, to encourage the development of neighbourhood services in areas not now served.

The Company of Young Canadians expects to place some of its volunteers in positions with neighbourhood services of the nature I have described, for the purpose of assisting the people in underprivileged areas in finding a better and more adequate way of life. They will help these people extricate themselves from the vicious circle of complete dependency on welfare. Some of these people have been dependent entirely on welfare agencies for two or more generations. These programs will assist them to get out of this situation and once more get into the stream of community living. I hope they will be among the agencies which will qualify for grants under this program.

I believe that training of social workers is another area which deserves assistance. While I am referring to this aspect I should like to point out something I forgot to say when I was speaking the other day. One of the biggest arguments for a flat over-all increase in old age pensions under the old age security plan is the relative lack of highly and properly trained social workers. It is a shame to think of taking our few adequately, highly trained social workers and making them spend their time totting up people's incomes and measuring them against a needs test, when these workers are needed for other much more desirable services such as social and rehabilitative work. I think they should be devoting their time to these things, rather than fussing around about means tests, when we have a perfectly good income tax system to take back the surplus from people who do not need it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I believe this legislation offers real hope to welfare people across this country and to provincial welfare departments. If the provinces and the local welfare people will take advantage of it, I think it can be made to create a real advance in our social work outlook across Canada. This is a measure that is long overdue and that will be welcomed. The fact that it does not do the big job of looking after the older citizens of this country in the way in which that job should be done does not mean that we do not recognize its value in so far as it goes. We thought we had made that clear before. If not, I hope I have made it abundantly clear that I think this bill has good features and should be welcomed for what it is.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a few questions about some of the things that are defined in clause 2. The first one has to do with the needs test. Before I deal with that matter, may I just say that it will not now be necessary for me to place on the record the quotations from Hansard which I said earlier I would place on the record, because as the minister knows the hon. member for York South has done this.

I might also say that I hope that now that the minister has got what he asked for today, namely a vote on second reading of the bill on the bill itself, he will reconsider his position with respect to the making of a statement on the situation regarding old age security recipients. I suggest that he might do it when we get back to clause 1 of the bill, or if he prefers to wait until third reading he might do it then. We have had our argument. I now make the appeal to the minister to reconsider his position in the making of the statement that it was earlier his intention to make.

The heart of this legislation, having in mind the things for which it provides, is what is generally referred to as the needs test which it is proposed to establish in place of the means test in various pieces of social welfare legislation. When one looks for the definition of the needs test he has to turn, I would say, first of all to subparagraph (g) of clause 2 which reads as follows:

"person in need" means

(i) a person who, by reason of inability to obtain employment, loss of the principal family provider, illness, disability, age or other cause of any kind acceptable to the provincial authority, is found to be unable (on the basis of a test established by the provincial authority that takes into account that person's budgetary requirements and the income and resources available to him to meet such requirements) to provide adequately for himself, or for himself and his dependants or any of them.

There is more to the subparagraph, but that is the main part. The key concepts in that definition are budgetary requirements, on the one hand, and resources available to the person on the other. The minister has made much of the fact that a difference between the needs test and the means test is that no monetary ceiling is established; we talk, rather, in terms of a person's budgetary requirements. If I may ask the minister to turn back to subclause (a) (i) he will see that there is another reference, which I think is relevant to my question. The reference is to "food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements (hereinafter referred to as 'basic requirements')." These are the things that are provided for under the general heading of "Assistance." On the side of what a person needs, as opposed to the side of what he has, there are two key phrases, "budgetary requirements" and "personal requirements". There may be other phrases that are important, but certainly those two are pretty important.

It must be obvious that the way in which one's budgetary requirements and personal requirements are defined will be crucial to the administration of this act. In subparagraph (g), which I read a moment ago, it would look as though this business of defining budgetary requirements has been tossed to the provinces, because the phrase used there is, "on the basis of a test established by the provincial authority that takes into account that person's budgetary requirements", and so on. However, a little later in this bill we will come to clause 9. I think I am in order in referring to clause 9 at this moment, Mr. Chairman, because there is in it a cross-reference back to clause 2.

In clause 9 the power is given to the governor in council to make regulations for carrying out the purposes of this act. I note in particular that the governor in council will have the power to make regulations—I am now reading from clause 9 (i) (c) defining the expressions "personal requirements" as set out in clause 2 (a) (i) and "budgetary requirements" as set out in clause 2 (g). The definition of these key phrases is to be left to the governor in council. I recognize that there is provision that if there is an order in council changing the definition of any matter that is important to the act, that change cannot be made until the province concerned consents to the making of such regulation that effects a change. But unless I misunderstand this language, it seems to me quite clear that in the first place the definition of the key phrases "personal requirements" and budgetary requirements" will be made by regulation, in other words by order in council of this government.

Just in case there are any other phrases that need to be defined before this legislation comes into effect, the government has protected itself by the provision in clause 9 (1) (b) which says that by order in council they can prescribe or define anything that by section 2 or this part is to be prescribed or defined by regulation.

Earlier today the Minister of National Health and Welfare took exception to some of the language used by my colleague, the hon. member for York South when my colleague wanted the standards spelled out for us. It seems to me that this is where we can get the standards or, if I may use the expression given to us by the Minister of Finance, the guide lines. I would therefore like to ask the minister to tell us what the standards will be and what definition the government has in mind with respect to the phrases that are contained in clause 2. Surely he will admit that the whole case for a needs test being better than a means test—and both of us agree it is—will depend upon these definitions.

I am also waiting to hear from the minister in reply to the question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has drawn our attention to two concepts in the bill: first, the budgetary requirements and second, the personal requirements. As I understand it, assistance means aid to persons in need of any of the following items which are contained in 2 (a) (i) which are food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements. In a sense this provides the basic group of items that must be shared in this particular plan and under which we expect that, in agreement with the provinces, there will be an obligation, as part of the sharing arrangement, to provide these basic requirements, including personal requirements.

I will carry the explanation further by stating that the budgetary requirements are similar to the basic requirements, because presumably in the provinces that follow this budgetary approach, the budgetary requirements will include these basic requirements that are spelled out in 2 (a) (i). It is to be expected that the provincial administrations, on the basis of community studies, will make a determination of what are these basic budgetary requirements to maintain the support of individuals, and that in cases where variability is necessary, such as for example, rent, this could be added to what is regarded in the social welfare field as the pre-added budget.

The expression "personal requirements" is used in the welfare field to include items affecting the welfare of individuals, including personal grooming, smoking, church support, and items of that kind which would be included in the basic budget.

This is my understanding of the situation. I will attempt to answer any further questions which the hon. member may wish to ask.

Mr. Knowles: Since the phrase "personal requirements" will be defined by regulation of the federal government, as prescribed in clause 9, will that definition be the same all across Canada or will it vary from province to province or even within each province?

While the minister is considering a reply to this question, may I put to him another at the same time? I recognize his point that personal requirements represent one of a list of things such as food, shelter, clothing, etc. However, the phrase "budgetary requirements" as set out in clause 2 (g) is an all inclusive concept. When it comes to deciding how much assistance a person is to get, two factors are considered in their totality, as I read clause 2 (g).

There are, on the one hand, budgetary requirements, and on the other hand, the resources available to the person in need. It seems to me that in this case the definition of budgetary requirements is even more sweeping and crucial to the operation of this act than the definition of personal requirements. Here again I should like to know whether the definition of budgetary requirements, which is to be made by federal regulation, will be the same all across Canada or will it vary from province to province.

May I remind the minister that one or the difficulties that has arisen in the administration of the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, and the Disabled Persons Act has been the public conflict which has ensued over the regulations. I think it is an understatement to say that the provinces intended to blame the federal government for the regulations because they were passed here, and that the federal government's reply has been that they were passed in consultation with the provinces. I should like to avoid such a conflict in this case and I would like to know just how these regulations are to be passed. Will they apply to the whole country and on what basis will they be established?

Mr. MacEachen: May I say to the hon. member in reply to his question with respect to the regulations that will be developed, that the same set of regulations will be applied to the whole of Canada but that naturally a certain amount of flexibility will have to be applied in their administration with respect to different individuals, because surely the personal requirements of individuals may vary from one end of the country to another. I presume we would include in the regulations a flexible definition of personal requirements which would be broad enough to cover all the necessary items, but which may not be applicable to each particular province. Presumably the requirements of a person receiving assistance in a fishing village in my riding might be somewhat different from the personal requirements of a sophisticated constituent in the riding of the hon. member for York South. We want to provide some flexibility to ensure that various needs are met.

My hon. friend has asked me to draw a distinction between the concept of basic requirements and budgetary requirements, the one contained in clause 2 (a) (i) and the other in clause 2 (g) (i). The basic requirements are food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements.

Then clause 2(a) continues by referring to prescribed items incidental to carrying on a trade or other employment; care in a home for special care; travel and transportation; funerals and burials; health care services; prescribed welfare services purchased by or at the request of a provincially approved agency; comfort allowances, and so on. The basic requirements are those basic items, and the budgetary items include this additional range.

Mr. Lewis: If I may put it in my words, the budgetary requirements would be the budgetary total of any of the items in clause 2(a) from (i) to (viii), as applied to a particular person or a family. I understood when I read it that 2(a)(i) would apply to everybody because it refers to the basic requirements of life, and the other paragraphs in clause 2(a) might apply to some people but not to others. Some person might need care in a special home, and that would apply to him but not to a person who did not have that requirement.

In view of what the minister has said, I find it very difficult to understand how you can have a federal regulation defining budgetary requirements that would be applicable all over the country. As I understand it, the budgetary requirements would be the dollars and cents application to the total items under clause 2(a) which would be applicable to the particular person or family concerned. This would mean you would put a dollars sign opposite each of the applicable items. I find it difficult to understand how you can do that equally across the country, unless you have a qualitative definition rather than a quantitative one.

Mr. MacEachen: It seems to me, and I am sure this is the situation, Mr. Chairman, that the budgetary requirements would be defined by regulation to include all these items in a broad way. Then, certainly, the provinces would administer these requirements with respect to the needs that were apparent in so far as the individuals were concerned. As my hon. friend pointed out, some individuals would really be affected by the basic requirements, whereas in the application to individuals in the provinces, others may or may not apply but our regulations would be broad enough to cover them all.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to ask the minister a question respecting the disability clause to which he referred when introducing the bill. He said the respective regulations were being lifted. Am I to understand that a fellow who is unemployable would be regarded as disabled? Am I right in that premise? If I am, will this principle be accepted right across Canada as the definition of totally disabled?

Mr. MacEachen: In the application of the Canada Assistance Plan, the important thing is that a person is in need, and the cause of the need is not really a determining factor. For example, under the disability act and regulations a person may be in need but because of his disablement he must, as my hon. friend knows, undergo definite medical tests. What we look at is the fact of need. A man could be unemployable or a man could be employed and receive assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan if in certain circumstances his income is not sufficient to cover his requirements. The cause of the need is not important in our determination, it is the fact of need. In this case, if the case load or if future applications for disability pensions were extended at a given point, that would be a matter of indifference when this program is in effect.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to ask another question. Suppose the wife of this disabled man earns $2,000 a year but, as a result of his disability, he requires a lot of medication and a lot of care; does the fact his wife earns that income take away from his disability pension?

Mr. MacEachen: No, if additional amounts were required to look after both of them, they would be eligible.

Mr. Rynard: Yes, I understand that he would be eligible. Suppose her earnings amounted to $2,340, as they did in a case to which I was referred some time ago, would the disability pension be cut off, as it was in that case?

Mr. MacEachen: This would not be the case under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Winkler: Is there a ceiling on the amount of income a couple may have?

Mr. MacEachen: No, no ceiling.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I repeat the question I asked a while ago? Has the minister a breakdown of the amount of money that the provinces are expected to require for homemaker and day care services? Is there any projection of that kind available?

Mr. MacEachen: I will try, when we come to the section dealing with costs, to deal with this matter as well as I can, in view of certain limitations.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister care to relate the subclause in paragraph 2 that deals with health care services to the prospective medicare program? I ask him to believe me when I say I am not trying now to pull medicare out of him. I can do that at the proper time. Should we not know what is going to be the relationship between the Canada Assistance Plan, in so far as it provides medical care costs, and the medicare program itself?

Mr. MacEachen: This was one policy decision that had to be made in order to develop a consistent relationship between the Canada Assistance Plan and the proposed medical care insurance program. In so far as the federal government is concerned, it is prepared to share in the costs of providing medical care for needy persons in any province until such time as that province has a medical care insurance program in effect. Once it has that program in effect, then of course we will not share under the Canada Assistance Plan, and I do not see why we should. On the other hand, it was a possible position to take, that when the opportunity for medical care insurance was available under another item, we should not even agree to participate under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I took the view that the sensible thing to do was to share until the province in question has adopted a medical care program. Then, we will not share under the federal plan.

Mr. Knowles: Presumably at that point the federal government will be sharing in these people's medical costs under the medical care program?

Mr. MacEachen: That is the idea; my hon. friend will realize there was a decision to be made and if any province refuses, then that problem will arise.

Mr. Smith: In clause 2(g) there is the phrase, "loss of the principal family provider". Perhaps the minister could say a word or two about the exact meaning of that phrase, because we do have situations in which the husband and wife are both employed. If the husband makes a larger salary than the wife, in the event the husband was disabled would the wife become the principal family provider? It is a curious phrase and I think we should have a better definition of those words.

Mr. MacEachen: I suppose that the most definite description of the situation is the death of the husband. Through this definition we apply the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to mothers and their dependant children. In the case, for example, of a disabled husband whose wife is the principal family provider, this would operate to assist the family, in this case on the loss of the mother.

Mr. Smith: Assuming that neither is disabled, and at a certain point the wife is making the larger contribution to the family income, is she to be considered the principal family provider, or is it automatically the husband, regardless of income? I think I understand the intent of this clause, which is to provide for cases where one of the parents is missing and the husband or his widow remains. But I do not think the situation is completely clear in the instance where both have been working and then suddenly the husband becomes disabled.

Mr. MacEachen: I think the use of the words "a person who, by reason of inability to obtain employment, loss of the principal family provider, illness", and so on, is an effort to illustrate the principal causes of need. But all cases of need are covered, and my view is that every case of need, regardless of the cause, will be covered. In this case it will be covered.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Agreement for sharing assistance and welfare services costs authorized.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to speak to clause 4, but I think there is a desire on the part of the government to switch to another item of legislation. We would be quite willing to have clause 4 carry, but we would ask that we carry on with clause 5 at some other time. We are quite willing to switch to another piece of legislation now, if the government so wishes.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, may I move that we rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BANK ACT

DECENNIAL REVISION AND EXTENSION OF CHARTERS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1976, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to authorize the introduction of the bill to make the decennial revision of the Bank Act. A bill for this purpose was introduced on May 6 last year, was given second reading on June 14 and referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs but did not progress further before the end of the session.

Earlier in this present session a bill was passed extending the charters of the banks until November 30 this year in order to provide time for parliament to consider this important legislation. I intend to deal at this stage only with the general approach of the government and with the major features of the proposed legislation, and to speak in more detail on second reading. Even so, Mr. Chairman, this will require my speaking for more than 20 minutes if I am to do justice to even a general explanation of the purpose of the legislation, and I hope that I shall have the indulgence of the house to go beyond 20 minutes when that point arises.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed by the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: I should like to thank the committee very much for their kindness on this occasion.

Introducing the bill last year, the then minister of finance related it to the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance and described the bill as a first step, but a substantial one, toward the general objectives proposed by the royal commission. The central theme of the report of the commission was that all our financial institutions, and particularly our banks, should have broader investing and borrowing powers than any of them had at the time the commission reported in order to achieve a more competitive and flexible financial system which will best serve the changing requirements of the Canadian economy.

The government decided that this central theme of the report should be taken as a long-term objective in the evolution of our financial system and noted that already progress had been made in that direction in our legislation relating to insurance, trust and loan companies. The view of the government remains that we must have a more competitive and flexible financial system which will best serve the changing requirements of the Canadian economy and the interests of all the people of Canada.

We are particularly concerned that the position of the smaller borrower be improved. This view is reflected in the substance of the bill that will be placed before you. Changing circumstances and further considerations have led the government to propose a number of changes in the bill that did not seem necessary or desirable a year ago. I shall mention in a moment the particular points of policy which we have changed, but first let me say something about the general background.

As part of the long-term policy to promote competition and flexibility in the financial system, it is desirable that progress be made in the legislation governing all financial institutions, both federal and provincial, and that the measures taken in regard to the various classes of institutions should be related to one another in such a way as to achieve this broad objective. Already we have done this in considerable measure in regard to our federal institutions, and I expect that we will be able to carry the process further, not only in our banking legislation and our legislation relating to trust and loan companies and insurance companies, but also in subsequent legislation regarding corporations and related matters, especially with regard to the disclosure of information.

Officials of the federal and provincial governments have recently met to discuss these and related matters. Out of this activity of both levels of government will come, I trust, a broadly integrated approach designed to improve our financial system as a whole so that it can better serve Canadian individuals and Canadian business.

I might also note that on May 27 I wrote to the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance of the provinces stating that I am prepared to convene a federal-provincial meeting on the subject of consumer credit and interest disclosure, which is so important to those Canadians who buy on the instalment plan or who borrow from finance companies. Although not all the provincial ministers have yet replied there is general support from those that have and I expect to be announcing a date for the conference some time in the near future.

The constitutional situation relating to the jurisdiction of parliament over banking was reviewed by the minister last year in speaking on the resolution, and on second reading. I shall not endeavour to review it again this year. The bill we are now proposing relates only to the Bank Act without change in the jurisdictional scope of the existing legislation. It has, of course, been preceded by a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act and will be followed by a revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act. The then minister indicated that the government intended to give further consideration to possible changes in the clearing system, including suggestions made by the royal commission, and would bring forward legislation on this general subject, which seems clearly to come within parliament's jurisdiction over banking. We still have this in mind for a future year.

A system of insurance covering deposits in certain financial institutions would I think contribute substantially to our general objective of greater competition and flexibility in our financial system. It should be of help to new banks in getting started and growing, and it should be of help to trust companies and loan companies in developing their deposit business within the ambit of the legislation affecting them.

Events of last summer and the anxiety to which they gave rise concerning the position of a number of financial institutions have confirmed our belief that a system of deposit insurance would reassure the public as to the safety of deposits in insured financial institutions, and would provide in addition a residual source of liquidity for these institutions in circumstances where their liquidity might be in question. Such insurance would need to be accompanied by effective inspection and adequate regulation to safeguard the position of the insured institutions.

The government intends to introduce legislation during this session to establish a crown corporation in which the banks and other federally incorporated institutions would be required to have their deposits insured. Insurance premiums would have to be paid, although we believe these could be relatively low and would reflect the fact that the overall risk involved is likely to be small. The corporation would be authorized to insure the deposits of provincially incorporated institutions where this was desired by the institution and the provincial government concerned. The government will discuss this matter with the provincial authorities.

The bill introduced last year included a number of proposals intended to further the objective of greater flexibility in the working of our financial institutions and greater competition between them. There were for example the proposals to enable banks to make conventional mortgage loans, to exempt mortgage loans from the maximum limit on interest rates, and to reduce the minimum cash ratio required against Canadian deposit liabilities. There were also provisions, to which I attach considerable importance, to prohibit agreements between the banks on interest rates both on deposits and on loans, and to prohibit bank mergers unless approval by the government has been obtained. Similar measures are included in the bill which it is our intention to introduce at the time of the approval of this resolution. In some cases there have been changes of detail. In addition, however, the present bill contains several further changes which will enable the banks to give better service to the public in circumstances which should increase competition among banks and between banks and other financial institutions.

The first of these changes is one to which I have referred in introducing the Bank of Canada Act. It is to accept in principle the recommendation of the royal commission that the cash reserves required on notice or term deposits should be lower than that on demand deposits. This will enable the banks to compete more actively with other institutions for term deposits. The weighted average cash requirement, based on the present distribution of deposits, would be slightly less than the 7 per cent proposed as a uniform ratio in last year's bill. The bill will provide for a gradual transition to this lower cash reserve requirement.

It is also proposed to enable the banks to compete more actively with other institutions for longer term funds. Many of these other institutions borrow a substantial amount of their funds by issuing debentures, whereas banks have been restricted to accepting deposits. Many banks in the United States have been issuing debentures in recent years and there seems no reason why our banks should not be able to do so. It is proposed therefore to allow banks to issue debentures which in priority will be subordinated to deposit liabilities, limited in total amount in the case of each bank to one half of its paid up capital and rest fund. This further source of funds should benefit bank borrowers generally.

The other major change which has been made in the bill is in respect of the ceiling on interest rates. The bill introduced last year would have continued the existing 6 per cent limit. The minister stated, and I am quoting from his speech on second reading:

If at some future time there should be a general rise in world interest rates which would make these proposals unworkable, the government would reconsider the 6 per cent limit.

In fact there has been a general and substantial rise in interest rates in the western world. In the past year the rate of discount in our treasury bills has increased by about one and one quarter per cent, the rate of interest on long term corporate bonds has increased about three quarters of one per cent, and the rate of interest on conventional mortgages has increased by the same amount or somewhat more. As hon. members of the house know, interest rates in the United States and in Europe have increased substantially.

When the bill was introduced last year, the prime rate of interest on loans made by the banks was 5½ per cent. The ceiling of 6 per cent, therefore, did not directly affect the prime rate. Its main effect was to limit the ability of Canadians to obtain the more risky or more expensive kinds of loans from the banks.

Now the general increase in interest rates has brought the prime rate of interest on loans made by banks up to the maximum rate permitted by law. All flexibility is gone. No variation in interest rate is possible to take into account the credit standing of the various borrowers, or other circumstances which would normally have a bearing on the interest rate. For all borrowers in the country, other than the Government of Canada, with perhaps minor exceptions, bank credit is now the cheapest source of credit available. Bank loans are in fact being rationed. In practice, this means that larger borrowers who could and should be seeking funds in the market are obtaining funds from the banks which would otherwise be available to the small borrower.

The royal commission had some pertinent observations to make on this kind of situation. I quote a few sentences from the report:

The distorting effects of the 6 per cent ceiling have been most acute in periods of credit restraint when the banks have been prevented from raising their rates on loans and deposits in line with market forces. At such times they cannot compete equally for funds and thus have no choice but to resort to arbitrary rationing procedures in their lending. The problem is further complicated by the fact that borrowers tend to press in on the banks because their lending rates remain artificially attractive while others rise.

There is no doubt at all what our long-term policy should be. The government accepts the view of the royal commission—and I quote again—that——the ceiling stands in the way of flexible lending by the banks in that it frequently prevents them from making loans on which higher rates must be charged to cover administrative costs and risks. Obviously, this is to the banks' disadvantage; more importantly, however, it discriminates against borrowers such as small businesses which, if they are to obtain funds at all, must turn to other lenders which charge rates well above those the banks would ask if free to do so. The banks have only been able to compete in the personal instalment loan market—in which they have substantially improved the facilities and lowered the average cost of funds—because the authorities have accepted what some might argue is a breach of the spirit of the 6 per cent law. This, however, is not an argument for forcing the banks out of this business, but is instead one for amending an outdated law.

That is the end of the quotation from the royal commission.

I also draw the attention of the house to the Second Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, published in December, 1965. In their conclusions and recommendations relating to monetary policy, the council said:

• (8:20 p.m.)

At the same time, the instabilities which have arisen in Canada's financial markets during the past year urge a careful reconsideration of both the needs and possible methods for improving and strengthening Canada's existing framework of financial institutions. More generally, to minimize distortions and instabilities in credit and financial markets and to ensure easier access by home-builders, consumers and small business to credit, various recommendations of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance deserve careful attention —including measures to promote more competitive credit conditions and removal of the arbitrary 6 per cent interest rate ceiling which currently forces many small borrowers into loans at much higher rates.

That is a quotation from the second and most recent report of the Economic Council. The clear message of both the Royal Commission and the Economic Council is that Canadians should not confuse the shadow with the substance. The present bank interest ceiling which appears to some to protect the smaller borrower in fact only protects those who are fortunate enough to be able to obtain bank credit, and forces the others to seek funds from other sources at higher cost.

The house will be aware, however, that the Porter commission made its report in 1964 at a time of comparative ease in credit conditions and that even in the months since the Economic Council prepared its Second Annual Review there has been a strong surge of inflationary forces which has made it necessary to permit rising demands for credit to have an impact on credit conditions.

The puzzling problem is to decide what should be done in the changed and abnormal circumstances which now prevail when general economic conditions require that the expansion of credit be restrained. Although there is an economic case for removing the ceiling, even now we think this would be unwise, if only because the transition to unrestricted competition under present abnormal conditions could be abrupt and substantial and might well cause serious apprehension.

After considerable discussion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Explain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: —after very considerable discussion, the government has reached the conclusion that the law should provide for an objective test, in accordance with which the ceiling on interest rates will be removed when credit conditions have become substantially easier and when the present abnormal conditions that involve widespread rationing do not prevail. In the meantime, however, we feel the maximum rate should be adjustable to reflect changes in the general level of interest rates, which will help to reduce some of the distortions and injustices produced by the present rigid ceiling.

The interim arrangement in the bill making the ceiling adjustable should alleviate some of the consequences of the present situation in which the banks are the cheapest source of credit for larger borrowers. Some of these larger borrowers should be induced by this change to borrow in the securities market where rates are now moderately above the present ceiling rate on bank loans and this should enable the banks to lend more to other customers. Smaller borrowers who do not have the credit standing to borrow from the banks at a 6 per cent rate should have a better opportunity to get loans from the banks, instead of having to resort to other more expensive sources of credit.

Those who put their savings into bank deposits rather than other forms should be able to get a better return—particularly on the smaller deposits which have not benefited so far from the competition which has led to higher rates on large corporate deposits which can be handled at less cost. In general, we shall be making a start toward the more competitive system which can be brought into effect when the current abnormal credit situation relaxes.

At an earlier stage of consideration of this question, an arrangement had been suggested to me by which the ceiling on rates would be removed on larger loans but retained temporarily on smaller ones. I came to the conclusion some weeks ago, that we should offer no inducement or even excuse for banks to favour larger borrowers in the allocation of credit at this time when the total amount must be under restraint. Consequently the formula proposed in the bill treats large and small borrowers alike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: In our opinion the best available basis from which to fix the maximum rate and eventually to measure the credit conditions under which the ceiling should be removed is the average market yield on short term government bonds. While several alternatives have been considered, the formula that is being submitted is reasonably simple and responsive to underlying credit conditions. I hope that when the bill is before the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, to which I intend to ask that it be referred, the formula which is proposed will be examined with care to ensure that it is the best alternative to achieve our objectives.

Naturally, no one can say just when general interest rates will decline to the point that will release the ceiling on bank interest rates. I would hope it would come sooner rather than later, so that the proper development and evolution of our financial system as a whole can proceed on the basis of effective competition. Meanwhile, the provisions relating to mortgage lending, which have been somewhat modified from those in the bill of last year, will permit a greater measure of competition forthwith in this field, and this, I am sure, will be welcomed by the public. The bill will also permit continuing competition in the field of unsecured personal loans where the competition of the banks has resulted in a reduction of the rates paid for consumer credit. The experience with these consumer loans is, I think, an indication of the beneficial influence we can expect over the longer term by competition between the banks and other institutions.

Turning now to other matters being dealt with in the present bill, I would note that the government has decided to leave unchanged the provision in the present Bank Act that new banks shall be established only by special act of parliament. In last years' bill it had been proposed that new banks be incorporated by letters patent with the House of Commons having the right to nullify such letters patent within a stated period of time. After considering all the circumstances that could be involved, it has appeared to us that this long standing authority should remain with parliament. However, if further discussion on this point should indicate a general feeling that incorporation by letters patent is preferable, the government would be prepared to consider an amendment along these lines. Under either provision we would favour the establishment of more banks as a means of increasing competition.

The clause in last year's bill which would limit the over-all size of a bank in which one shareholder has a substantial interest—that is, a minimum of a 25 per cent interest—by reference to the amount of its authorized capital, has been continued in this bill. A bank which is dominated by one large shareholder, particularly if that one is an able and aggressive foreign bank, is not in the same position as other banks whose shares are held by many investors and which naturally have to increase their capital and issue additional shares from time to time as their business expands. The government does not believe that any bank should be an exception to the general situation in this respect. This measure of control need not involve any inequity.

One other change should probably be mentioned at this time. On second reading of last year's bill, the minister indicated government willingness to consider an amendment which would permit certain agencies of provincial governments, such as pension funds, to acquire modest amounts of bank shares perhaps on a non-voting basis. It has been decided to include this change in the present bill so that certain types of government funds will be able to acquire bank shares on a non-voting basis subject to the same over-all 10 per cent limit for the funds of any one government as applies in the case of other shareholders.

Provisions in the bill of last year limited to 10 per cent the number of voting shares that a bank would be permitted to own in any other corporation and limited to one-fifth the proportion of directors of a corporation who could be directors of any one bank. These provisions we propose to continue and in addition, after the ceiling on the loans interest rate is removed and the banks have come into more direct competition with other deposit-taking institutions, this bill would provide that a director of any such institution, sometimes referred to as a near-bank, will not be permitted to become a director of a bank.

Finally I come to a point that has been the subject of much controversy at the time of previous revisions of the Bank Act. I have reached the conclusion that the shareholders of a bank and the public are entitled to have more complete information with regard to the financial operations of our banks and, for this purpose, this bill contains provisions which will require each bank for the first time to disclose in its annual financial statements the amount of its so-called inner reserves that have been created out of taxable income and the amount of its realized profits and losses during the year on investments and loans. The question of the extent to which the banks may create reserves free of taxation I am leaving until we have had an opportunity to receive and study the report of the Carter commission.

In addition to the more important matters which have been mentioned, there will be a number of minor changes as compared with the bill which was introduced last year. The time available for discussion and comment has enabled us to propose detailed improvements of a technical nature.

I should like to re-emphasize the determination of the government that the fresh winds of competition shall permeate our system of banking and finance. We are determined that the system shall operate in the interests of the greatest number of Canadian consumers and businessmen. We are determined, in particular, that the interests of the small borrower and the small businessman shall be protected and furthered. We believe that the most effective way to achieve these ends is to encourage and to enforce competition. In this view, the government is supported by the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance and by the Economic Council of Canada. If there are many competing sources of loan funds and many institutions freely competing for the custom of the consumer, we are convinced that he cannot help but benefit.

May I, in conclusion, review some of the measures that we are proposing today to bring about the competitive conditions in our financial system that I have been describing.

1. We propose that banks should not, after July 1971, be able to hold more than 10 per cent of the voting stock of any Canadian corporation, including what are popularly known as near-banks with which the chartered banks will be competing for deposits and loans.

2. We propose a number of measures which will cut through the system of interlocking directorates. For example—

(a) a director of one bank may not be a director of another bank

(b) not more than one-fifth of the directors of the board of any single Canadian corporation may sit as directors of any one bank. This will produce a considerable revolution.

(c) after the interest ceiling has been lifted, no director of any near-bank such as trust and loan companies that accept deposits from the public may become a director of a bank.

3. Agreements among banks on interest rates on both loans and deposits will be prohibited. Mergers of banks will continue to require the approval of the government. In other words, the main underlying principles of the Combines Investigation Act will apply to banks.

4. In order to provide maximum flexibility and to ensure that the banks can serve the smaller and riskier borrower as well as the larger and stronger, we intend that the present interest rate ceiling be eventually removed. This will occur when credit conditions have eased sufficiently to ensure that borrowers will benefit from competition. In the meantime, a ceiling realistically related to general interest rates will be maintained.

5. We propose to require the banks to reveal to the public for the first time their inner reserves created out of taxable income.

6. In order that the important questions affecting consumer credit may be examined in relation to all credit-granting institutions, I intend to call a federal-provincial conference in the near future to deal with this matter.

7. We propose to strengthen substantially the competitive position of the so-called near-banks through a system of deposit insurance. This will increase their ability to attract deposits and strengthen public confidence in them.

8. The proposed system of deposit insurance will help promote the creation of new banks by strengthening them in the early stages of their development.

9. We propose to allow banks to make mortgage loans. When the banks entered the personal loan field a few years ago, the interest rates paid by small borrowers were reduced. We expect the same beneficial effect from more competition in the mortgage field.

10. We propose to establish new flexible and reduced cash reserve requirements to enable banks to compete more actively with other institutions for loans and deposits.

These changes now being proposed in the act, as well as others to which I have referred, will permit, encourage and indeed require competition. The Canadian banking system is world renowned for its financial integrity and stability. Our banks now must become more flexible in their ways of doing business and learn to compete more effectively among themselves and with other institutions. It is my intention that the prohibition of agreements on interest rates shall be enforced. I would hope and expect that there will be competition in the rates charged on loans and in the interest rates and other terms offered on deposits. I would hope that we will see more frequent changes in the rates of interest that they charge, and that they offer, in response to market changes. I do not believe that competition should merely extend to the quality of service. There seems to be more room for individual banks to differ in the nature of the services they render. For example, it is surprising that banks have experimented so little with variations of office hours.

The bill will provide a blueprint for competition. I trust that in the next decade we will witness a significant modernization of our banking system.

When the bill has received second reading, I propose that it should be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs for detailed study.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, may I just ask the minister a question. I think he intimated that the ceiling on interest rates of loans would be tied to the average market yield of short term government bonds. Just what is the formula by which means they are going to be tied to the industry?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, that will appear in the bill; but, as I said, there will be a percentage spread between the average rates over a period of short term government securities. When the resolution has been approved the bill will reveal all the terms.

Mr. Fulton: What will be the percentage spread?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is an appropriate question. I have spoken in general about the type of legislation. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to go into the particular terms of each clause.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, with respect, I suggest to the minister that this is one feature of the bill which is perhaps the most difficult as well as the most important. I think it is quite unusual—and I will be restrained in my language—for the minister to skirt so carefully the most important feature of the bill without giving the house and the country some idea of what he proposes. He is asking us to approve this in principle without giving us the information. I think the house is entitled to know what is the interest spread in what the minister has in mind.

Mr. Sharp: There are many details of this kind scattered through the bill. I do not think it appropriate for me to give the details at this time. The details are included in the bill and we propose to bring forward the bill just as soon as the resolution is approved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the committee has listened to a recital by the minister of a variety of generalities. He has refused to give particulars. He asks the house to accept his general view as expressed in the resolution. By his attitude he has indicated that we are supposed to accept a resolution unexplained and apparently unexplainable, a proceeding as unusual as it is unjustified.

I say at once to the minister that he has simply placed before the house a hodgepodge of uncertain plans with a few definite conclusions, unchanged from last year, and he has asked the house in faith to accept from him the assurance that if the resolution is passed there will be revealed to the house various matters which up to the present time have not been elucidated or explained in any way.

I am going to speak for a moment on the general purposes of Bank Act revisions and then deal with several of the matters to which the minister alluded. All of us are agreed that we must share in this nation in the maintenance of confidence in our financial system. A royal commission was set up by the government, of which I had the honour to be the head, under Chief Justice Dana Porter. It studied the banking situation for 30 months. In May of 1965 this government, after 11 months of study, brought proposals before the house and the country with the objective of a more open and competitive banking system and another objective, to remove the restrictions which impede response to new situations and to explain the need for revision long overdue.

A commission is set up and it makes recommendations, and I am going to refer to that in general in a moment. The government found itself in a dispute between the forces of the hon. member for Davenport and the present minister. According to the press, tremendous controversies have sprung up. Unity at any price is apparently the objective. What amendments have finally been determined? Out of chaos and uncertainty the government produces formulae of compromise. I do not have to go beyond this evening's issue of the Toronto Star, which is accepted in Liberal circles as the essence of all that is good, proper and appropriate.

The heading in that newspaper tonight is "When Marchand and Sharp Both Threatened to Quit". In the last few weeks there has apparently been a tremendous division. The article written by Martin Goodman states:

> The threatened resignation from the federal cabinet of immigration minister Jean Marchand was the hidden factor that caused Prime Minister Lester Pearson to order a delay in bringing forward the revised Bank Act two weeks ago . . .
> And, after finance minister Mitchell Sharp forced Pearson to reverse that decision by threatening to resign himself, one of the things that soothed Marchand and kept him in the cabinet was Sharp's agreement to okay increased aid to the aged—but only in the fall.

I emphasize the word "soothed", because when one sees some of the recommendations that were made by the minister this evening it becomes obvious that there was a great deal of soothing syrup used by the minister to bring about a feeling of equanimity. The article states:

> One of the things that soothed Marchand and kept him in the cabinet was Sharp's agreement to okay increased aid to the aged—but only in the fall.

What a government this is. We hoped this afternoon to hear an explanation by the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to what the plans are to end poverty. This article in the Toronto Star states:

> This hidden relationship between two of the government's major decisions—the removal of the 6 per cent interest ceiling in the Bank Act and $30 aid to needy pensioners—has been pieced together over the last week . . .

It is a tale of two threatened resignations, of a holiday weekend spent in feverish negotiations and, at the end, of a political saw-off that saw both Sharp and health minister Allan MacEachen emerge with important cabinet victories.

What a revelation as to the way in which these people in office produce policies for Canada. The article then states:

The Bank Act legislation is ready to be presented to the Commons and, at an opportune time, MacEachen is to announce the government's intention to give more aid to the aged.

The announcements will culminate six months of political manoeuvring by Sharp and MacEachen to win cabinet approval of their goals.

That is a magnificent story and it shows how utterly hypocritical is the attitude taken by the government in connection with this matter. The article then states:

At one point, MacEachen led 26 unhappy MPs into Pearson's office to plead for more assistance.

What a government. It goes on to state:

Early in June, Sharp finally got his way with the Bank Act.

Although the majority of the cabinet had political qualms, Pearson gave his approval . . .

Overworked and under pressure, disillusioned with some of the direction the so-called reformed party was taking, Marchand regarded removal of the interest ceiling as the last straw.

We know now that the ceiling is not being removed, so apparently all of those discordant elements almost threw them, you might say, into the cave of Adullam. The Old Testament speaks of the gathering together of the afflicted, the uncertain and the fearful. These people met together in a cave of Adullam.

The article then states:

At any rate, Sharp, conscious of the need to soothe ruffled feelings within the party over the Bank Act, finally agreed to an increase.

That is a reference to the increase to pensioners of $30 a month. Mr. Goodman then writes:

Meantime Sharp, too, was caught up in the effort to persuade Marchand to stay in the cabinet.

Mr. Sharp: You should get better bedtime stories than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is all a bedtime story and it has been a bedtime story all along. That is exactly what this is. The minister says this is a bedtime story and I shall deal with that in a moment.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

They met together—the most frightful commentary on a hapless government that has ever been given to the people of any country on a matter as serious as amending the Bank Act. They waited. They thought. They compromised. They brought together those on the left and those on the right. Within the cabinet there was disagreement. Outside the cabinet—and it is the only time in Canadian history that there has been a cabinet and a shadow cabinet in the same government—the shadow cabinet under the member for Davenport, with the assistance of the member for Outremont-Saint-Jean, pulled one way. Neither of these former ministers is in the chamber tonight.

Is that a way to bring about amendments to the Bank Act, for a government to play around with this problem for 11 months? They postponed the matter and this evening instead of formidable and important changes to meet the challenges of the changing economy we have a series of uncertain, unstable compromises designed to hold unity in the government among those who support it, regardless of consequences to the country.

Let us examine what the commission recommended. It recommended the abolition of the statutory 6 per cent interest ceiling on bank loans. It recommended allowing mortgage lending by banks. It recommends that all institutions doing banking business be brought under the federal Bank Act. There was no suggestion of that whatsoever in what the minister said this evening. There was a suggestion that if companies incorporated under provincial legislation, and the province which they are incorporated, decide to accept deposit insurance, it will be brought into effect.

The royal commission recommended full disclosure of interest rates on all credit. There is nothing in what the minister said to give effect to that recommendation. The Porter commission went on to say that near-banks should be brought under the Bank Act. This could be brought about by agreement with the provinces. It recommended that there be action taken to stop concentration in the financial community. There is no awareness of the other matters that were recommended, excepting fuller financial disclosure by corporations. The commission might just as well never have sat. What has been produced is simply an arrangement whereby the highest common factor relating to changes and amendments is to be recognized. The caucus, according to the press references, would not stand for removal of the interest ceiling. And what do we get? We get the production of a plan as outlined by the minister, and he will not even give us the full detail.

Mr. Sharp: Yes I will; just as soon as the resolution is passed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister cannot get around it. He went into detail in those matters that he wanted to reveal, but when questions were asked by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Perth the minister immediately hid himself from possible cross-examination and took the attitude, "I cannot give you this information because, after all, we are in committee." What have we got here? A government afraid to face these issues; a government afraid to take a stand on behalf of Canada, lest it risk unpopularity.

Mr. Jorgenson: How could it be more unpopular?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have had a series of reports of what has happened. I have the clippings here but I shall not dwell on them this evening. They show the changes that have taken place. During the election campaign the minister said to his friends, "The ceiling will be removed." Does he say he did not undertake to do that?

Mr. Sharp: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In January after the election the press reported that the interest ceiling would be lifted and the minister was going to take a courageous stand.

Mr. Sharp: The press also said you were going to resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say that I want to have the full benefit of these interpolations. What was the nature of that one?

Mr. Sharp: I said that the press also said you were going to resign.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, it is well to keep silent rather than make interruptions in a voice and manner that cannot be heard. The caucus convened. In February he sent his parliamentary secretary to placate the members of caucus, according to the press. On February 1 it was reported that in the first week of January the hon. member for Davenport sent a letter to the finance minister setting out his views and warning the finance minister that he might have to state them publicly. He suggested in the letter, as reported in the press, that the Minister of Finance should consult him before acting; but the minister did not do so.

It is a strange situation. Where tonight is the member for Davenport? Have the ideas he uttered a year ago, accepted by the Prime Minister and the government as orthodox finance, become unorthodox in the last year? What has brought about the change? What has happened? As one press man with the Toronto Globe and Mail who seems always to know what is going on in Liberal circles said on February 15, there really was not a revolt among the members of the Liberal party. He said there was no revolt. They could not revolt because—and the second "because" was this—the minister had not yet declared his position on the interest ceiling. He went on to express the assured hope, in consequence of discussions with an individual usually most reliable, that the minister was going to insist on the removal of the 6 per cent ceiling. He did say as did the minister this evening, that the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Davenport, had stated that if at some future time there should be a general rise in world interest rates which would make these proposals unworkable, the government would consider the 6 per cent limit. What have they done? Are they going to bring about competition, to which the minister paid lip service? Will they ensure that the near-banks and trust companies are brought under federal supervision which could be achieved by arrangement with the provinces? What has been the actual reason for the concessions and changes that have been made? There were two essential issues: first, the ceiling—now forgotten.

All through the last few months we have been following the situation. We read in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 15 "Interest ceiling bedevils Liberals". Then, on April 15, it said: "Sharp likely to remove 6 per cent bank interest". On May 26 it said: "Liberals split over banking act changes". On May 21 Victor Mackie of the Winnipeg Free Press wrote "Bank rate to be raised". On May 27 the Toronto Star wrote "P.M. follows 'Walter Sharp' line". On June 31 it wrote "Bank act is coming and the 6 per cent ceiling on bank loans will be lifted".

The minister produced this unsatisfactory compromise which bears no regard whatsoever to the recommendations of the Porter commission. Where is the courage about which the Prime Minister spoke on April 23, 1963? Where has it gone? It has certainly not come to rest in the soul and heart of the Minister of Finance.

Arguments have been advanced on all sides in support of the freeing of the bank rate. The public argument is that it would permit the banks to enhance their profit position; that it would compel a shift to higher rates; that it would increase the cost of doing business. On the other hand the counter-argument is advanced that if the ceiling were removed, it would actually bring about expansion and development, would be beneficial to the small borrower and would assure depositors of higher rates.

What has the government done after all these months and months of gestation? It produced after much postponement a monstrosity on the subject of interest rates. It would have taken courage to have followed the recommendations of the Porter commission, but the minister's stand in the election campaign was the 6 per cent interest rate ceiling should be removed. He told us he did not hold that view, but all I can say to him is that in the city of Toronto there are many of those in high finance who must have misunderstood what the minister had said.

Here is the finest example of this government's attitude. Its major characteristic has been to act in the wrong way at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They speak about weightlessness in space: We have it in the present government. What is the position of the government? I can see the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance sitting down together and discussing the matter. They say to each other "If we remove the ceiling, what will happen to the support in our party? What of the two leaders in the shadow cabinet?" They say: "If we don't do something we will be in trouble. Isn't there some formula that we can produce that will fool everybody?" That is what they have done.

Talk about a bigamous government—a government committing political bigamy. It is married to those who want an increase in interest rates and it is betrothed to those who oppose it. It is an amazing performance, and we are asked to take seriously the recommendations of the minister in this connection.

The delay in bringing in these amendments has been harmful to Canada. It has been seriously harmful to small businessmen, who have found it impossible to get necessary funds because the banks do not know what the rate will be. The government's tactics have contributed to the tight money situation in this country, and nothing whatsoever in the amendments proposed in connection with the interest rate will do anything to help the businessmen in our nation—not a suggestion.

Mr. Basford: What is your policy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the finest contribution the hon. gentleman can make from a sitting position.

The minister says to us "Don't worry about this. When the bill comes in, you will understand." All I can say is that it would have taken courage for the government to have faced the issue.

An hon. Member: Which they have not got.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the distinctive quality of the present government. They are asking the members of the opposition to bail out the government in the division in which it finds itself—its members divided, uncertain, critical and threatening. That is indeed an unusual type of incubator for the production of legislation beneficial to the nation.

What about some of the other recommendations? I do not want to take more than a short while to deal with them. The minister laughs.

Mr. Sharp: I was not smiling at what you said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He laughs. I want to tell you that those people to whom he has promised the removal of the ceiling would enjoy seeing him as he smiles derisively at the substitute for action that he has produced. He did not dare face reality. He admitted tonight that he started off with a plan whereby the interest ceiling would be maintained up to a certain level of loans. I believe the figure he mentioned was $25,000. That would have destroyed small businesses in every part of Canada. The banking institutions would not have made loans at the lower rate of interest, realizing that they would be getting a larger rate of interest on larger and more compact loans. When that did not work, they came up with a further alternative.

What are the other plans to alleviate the general situation? The minister did not deal with that in any detail. It has been taken for granted that the chartered banks will be allowed mortgage lending at the going rates.

But if the restrictions are similar to those that were provided in clause 77, subclause (2), paragraph (b) of last year's bill, which indicated that land itself was the only acceptable security, they would exclude many other securities that should be available.

• (9:10 p.m.)

What about the bank from New York? What is going to be done about the Mercantile Bank? I should like to have heard something about that. I know the review was as elusive as the explanation regarding interest. What changes were made in the plan that was evolved last year by the former minister of finance?

Mr. Sharp: No change.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No changes; so, the position is this: On the one hand, the minister says we are going to encourage competition and, on the other hand, he says he is going to place that bank in a position of being subject to retroactive legislation, the most dangerous kind of legislation that could possibly be brought before a House of Commons. I hold no brief for the Mercantile Bank. I was not a visitor or a guest of those connected with that bank, but it is unfair, it is unjust that a bank that came in under the law as it was should be subject to the arbitrary ipse dixit of a government.

Why were near banks not brought under control? What action was taken in this connection? Why is it that the actual rate of interest which is to be charged by the banks should not be revealed? The 6 per cent rate is regularly eluded. Indeed, most borrowers find themselves paying 8 per cent or 8½ per cent, even though there is a ceiling of 6 per cent, simply by means of requiring the borrower to leave a certain percentage of his loan on deposit as well as by way of certain service payments that have to be made.

Now then, we come to the next idea. You know, Mr. Chairman, it was interesting to listen to the minister. When he was dealing with unimportant things, he spoke with power. When he dealt with the interest rate, he spoke in a rather low, uncertain voice. When he came to deal with interlocking directorates and share ownership between banks, you would have thought this was going to do something to save the nation. Will it mean that the Royal Trust and Montreal Trust will have to be separated from their banks within five years, as was provided last year? Will provision be made so that banks can split their stock and have as many vice-presidents as they wish, as was provided last year?

The minister says it means an individual cannot hold more than 10 per cent of the issued shares of one bank; that was the plan last year. Will last year's plan that no bank can issue more than 25 per cent of its shares to non-residents be maintained? The minister indicates that that term will be there. The Royal, the Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Bank of Montreal may have exceeded this term already. But these are comparatively trivial matters. The essential recommendations were, as I said a moment ago, first, the removal of the ceiling on interest; second, the bringing of near-banks under the authority of the government. Why were these things not revealed and examined?

They talk about a revision. Last year the bill ran to about 110 or 112 pages, of which no more than 12 pages represented any changes. If I may summarize, Mr. Chairman, I say what is being done is simply a repetition of old acts. I went back through the years and read all the Hansards back to confederation on this subject. I read the Porter commission report in detail, and carefully. The changes that are being made in the revision represent less than 5 per cent. The material changes that have been made are founded on political expediency; they are pallid, timid, fearful.

I looked forward to this new, aggressive Minister of Finance, expecting changes that could not be agreed upon by his predecessor. What we have is simply a bill with a few slight changes based on expediency and compromise. The interest ceiling provision is neither fish, fowl or red herring. The section that was placed before the house by the minister shows "Sharp" manipulation rather than economic need. I should like to hear the views of the former Minister of Finance. He has dealt with these things in his book. Apparently he has converted to his philosophy many of those who sit opposite. He did not succeed in securing everything he wanted, but he did succeed, through the power of those who fell in behind him and his leadership in bringing about an unsatisfactory series of compromises. This is a bill not in keeping with present day conditions.

I say to the minister, if you had faced the issue courageously you would have commanded universal approval, even though there might have been some criticism. I say this to you that we, in Her Majesty's opposition, do not intend to play that game, the game of pretence. We do not intend to bail out the government. We do not intend to be pawns to bring about unity in the Liberal party.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, to begin with I think I should say that I am not particularly interested in the details of the real or imagined or reported split and division within the government and the Liberal party. I have never been interested in the squalid details of domestic quarrels. I am concerned with what the minister told us and even more concerned with what he has not told us tonight.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, we have had a remarkable exhibition today of two cabinet ministers both performing a sort of dance of the seven veils, and refusing to take the last veil off, out of modesty one presumes. Perhaps they realize that they were intellectually related under the seventh veil. At any rate, we are not told. One can be more kind and suggest that what we have seen has been a very skilful operation of the old pea and shell game. We are asked to guess what is under the shell, which pea is under it and which shell it is under. We cannot say, of course, because we are kept in the dark.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I have been very disappointed in the minister's presentation. I did not expect that I would altogether agree with him but I did hope that I was going to hear a reasoned case for the adoption of a certain policy, about which I might well have had some reservation. But we did not get that tonight. We had a number of rather discursive remarks suggesting certain things might be done, but nothing definitive and positive was told us.

The question of the 6 per cent interest rate is, of course, one which has engaged the public attention, and I am surprised that the Minister of Finance was not able to marshal respectable intellectual arguments in support of the rmoval of the 6 per cent limit and to present to this house a policy of substituting some other method of control of the banking system.

Instead of that he took refuge in extraordinarily vague statements. We were told that a ceiling will be retained—a ceiling. We are not told where it is, how high up it is, or what the ceiling is. There was mention of some approximation between the permitted interest rate and the average short-term yield on government bonds. But again, no definition and no suggestion as to who was going to impose the regulatory functions upon this particular issue.

While I have not been entirely persuaded that it is essential at this particular time to remove the 6 per cent ceiling on bank interest rates, I am quite aware, of course, of the arguments in favour of a greater degree of flexibility in interest rates by the chartered banks. But having said that, sir, I think we then have to face something else that the minister refuses to face.

In fact, his speech tonight was in main a complete denial of something that I thought he would have recognized, something which I am sure most people in Canada, and I would suggest almost the entire business community in Canada, are all too well aware of, namely that the banking system of Canada is a monopoly. It is sheer nonsense and poppycock to talk of competition in our banking system. It is a monopoly, and I am not at all sure that it is not a good thing that it is a monopoly. It is a monopoly that has been given a privileged position in our society and our economy, to the degree that no bank in Canada can possibly fail, because no government can allow any bank to fail.

Twelve years ago, at the last revision of the Bank Act, I asked the then Governor of the Bank of Canada whether, in his opinion, it was possible at that time for a bank in Canada to fail. Mr. Towers, who was the Governor at the time, with commendable banker's caution, said well, he did not want to give a categorical statement that it was impossible for a bank to fail in Canada, but he would say that it was extremely unlikely and could only take place in conditions of virtual economic collapse.

So I think we have to face this fact: We have a monopoly with ironclad guarantees of survival and protection from any disaster. Because this is the case, we then must have some method of controlling it. If the minister is not prepared to devise a more sophisticated method of controlling it than he has suggested tonight, then I would submit to you, sir, that the safety of the Canadian people impels us to insist on the maintenance of the present 6 per cent limit, clumsy, unselective and inadequate as it may be, as a means of controlling this monopoly which has a privileged position and which, in the final analysis, is and must be supported by the Canadian government and the Canadian taxpayer. As I say, I was surprised that the minister appeared to be unable to bring forward a more sophisticated approach to this problem.

It would appear to me that having granted, as those who have studied the matter must grant, that there must be some greater flexibility in our banking system, we must then turn our attention to this problem of just how to exercise the controls that we must exercise on this monopoly. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the answer will have to be the institution of a regulatory body before which the banks will have to present a case for an increase in interest rates; that this regulatory body will have to have the power to control the whole range of interest rates to prevent the banking monopoly from demonstrating its monopolistic character in the most disastrous way by discriminating between various classifications of borrowers.

I cannot understand why the minister continues to talk nonsense, using such lovely phrases as "the fresh winds of competition blowing through our banking system". Is the minister going to blow those fresh winds himself? Is this the case of the wolf in the child's tale—that "he huffed and he puffed till he blew the house down"? I am afraid that the minister will huff and puff but will never succeed in blowing any fresh winds of competition into an industry which, by its very nature, is a monopoly.

The minister talks nonsense about how he will have the banks brought up for examination under the Combines Investigation Act. If the minister does not know that that is nonsense, then he has no business to be Minister of Finance. If he does know, then he has no business to have made this ridiculous suggestion to us.

What is he going to do in this regard? Is he boing to call the president of the Royal Bank of Canada and the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia into his office and say: "Look, boys, I have discovered that each of you has made loans at 6¼ per cent. Obviously this is a combine. You must have different interest rates, otherwise I will charge you under the Combines Investigation Act"? What utter nonsense. Why produce these ridiculous straw men, suggesting that you can do something with a monolithic—and it is—and monopolistic institution?

I am not holding back against the idea of the banking system in Canada being an integrated system, virtually a monopoly in the performance of its functions, because it must be stable. There must be some uniformity. To suggest that we are going to gain anything by pretending that we can bring the banks under the Combines Investigation Act is not worthy of the Minister of Finance of this country; it is sheer nonsense and an insult to our intelligence.

I would very much urge on the Minister of Finance, Mr. Chairman, that before he brings this bill before the house, or, having brought it before the house, before he appears before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs in support of it, he seriously consider devising a much more sophisticated manner of ensuring flexibility in our major lending institutions and protection for the borrowers of money under the Canadian banking system. That this could be done I have not the slightest doubt. A regulatory body that could perform these functions could be easily devised, and it would not be without precedent in our history.

We have been faced with this sort of thing before, and on every occasion when we were faced with an industry that was in a monopolistic or semi-monopolistic situation, the operations of which were of great concern to the whole economy, we have established regulatory bodies. We have established such things as the Board of Transport Commissioners and the National Energy Board. These bodies were meant to deal with exactly the same powers and privileges that are enjoyed by the banking system, though not quite so wide; therefore there is even more necessity for such a provision under the Bank Act.

The minister also tells us that he is going to protect us from the evils of competition by making it illegal for the director of one bank to be the director of another bank, or to be the director of a near-bank. In July of 1971—and I do not know why July, 1971 should be the date chosen—banks can hold only 10 per cent of any other corporation's stock.

I wonder whether the Minister of Finance is so naïve as never to have heard of a breed of animals that used to be known in Great Britain as guinea pigs? They sit on the boards of directors of large corporations, not knowing anything about them. Very often they are impoverished nobility in need of extra income. They sit on boards representing certain interests in the operation of that corporation, and they of course give the whole thing an air of respectability. Their chief function is to sit there on behalf of interests that do not want to come into the open. Can you imagine for a moment that you are going to be able to root out every guinea pig that takes a position on a board of directors in defiance of this ruling by the Minister of Finance? If certain interests want those guinea pigs on boards, they will have them.

The minister tells us that he thinks more banks will permit more competition. I suppose "permit" is the right word. He did not tell us why he thought that more banks would ensure more competition, because I suppose he felt that was too much even for the House of Commons to swallow. We are all aware of what has happened to the banking system in Canada, and it is very difficult to persuade us that by establishing a number of banks you thereby establish competition. You may be able to develop a more effective system, providing a wider range of services, but as to competition, no; there can be and will be no competition. When the minister continually insists that it is going to be possible to permit competition, I think he is insulting our intelligence. Instead of doing that, instead of wasting his time, he should have been devoting his intellect to really dealing with the problems of banks in the modern world. If he is not prepared to do that, I want to say this, that we must retain the 6 per cent clumsy club of control that we now have over the banks.

If he does not provide a workable, sophisticated method of control, and one that does not give relief to the banks in order that they make more money, it will not be only the opposition in this chamber that he will have at his throat, it will be the people who write letters to me and, I imagine, to all members of this house on this question of the removal of the 6 per cent. The people writing will be business people and individuals viewing with great alarm and despair the thought that the banks are going to be set free to take an even greater tribute from our economy than they are taking at the present time.

Indeed, there was one phrase the minister used that rather disturbed me. I shall have to see Hansard tomorrow to find out exactly the text, but the minister spoke about carrying out his plans without changing the scope of the Bank Act.

The Porter Commission—and I have been waiting for an opportunity to say this for some time—made a very unsatisfactory report. It was one of the most poorly compiled technical reports I have ever seen. It was a mess. It left a great many loose threads dangling in the air. But it said that the near-banks should be brought under the Bank Act. It did not say how that was to be done. It made one suggestion: that there should be a definition of banking that would bring the near-banks under the Bank Act. I think that might be possible. However, I should first want to refer to a constitutional lawyer to find out whether we can remove from provincial control an operation that is licensed by the provincial government, merely by defining that operation in this parliament. I do not know whether it is possible. Certainly, you will not be able to bring these concerns under banking legislation, in order to control them, until something like that is done.

I think we must be careful not to take any action that will encourage the growth of these so-called near-banks in our banking functions. Despite all the faults of our banks, despite their greed, if you like, and their ruthlessness, the minister is quite right; the banks and banking system of Canada are extremely efficient, and we should not encourage less efficient institutions to carry on functions that should be carried on by the chartered banks of Canada. Unless we are prepared to bring the near-banks under control, I do not know how we shall prevent their unrestricted operation. Apparently they will be enticed to come under federal control to some extent by the offer of taking part in the insured deposit system, which is to be carried out by a crown corporation, about which we heard very little.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that as the minister has seen fit to withhold his confidence from us, not telling us anything about what this legislation is going to be, but merely offering disturbing hints in much the same way as the Minister of National Health and Welfare did this afternoon, and because it is extremely important for members of this house to discuss the possible consequences of the legislation that is still locked in the minister's mind that we have been abused. I think it was an abuse of the rights of members of this house for a minister of the crown to come before us with a resolution leading to a most important piece of legislation—one of the most important that will come before us for many years to come—and to take the position that he has the right to wrap the whole thing in mystery until tomorrow morning. We shall come across this bill in our mail boxes—

An hon. Member: Not tomorrow.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We probably will not get it tomorrow morning, but we shall eventually get it.

We are asked to buy a pig in a poke. We are asked to agree to this resolution being passed, when the minister will not treat us with proper decency and respect, and when he will not tell us what to expect in the bill.

An hon. Member: It is a hoax in a poke.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, it is suggested that it is a hoax in a poke. I do not know whether it is a hoax. It may be that the minister has a very good plan. But why did he not tell us? Why did he not say what he proposed to do? Why did he not tell us, if he is going to maintain a ceiling, what that ceiling is going to be and how it will be determined? Where does that ceiling apply, and is there going to be the same ceiling for each type of borrower, or will there be graduated ceilings? He does not tell us these things at all.

I think it is sad that apparently no one in the Liberal caucus or the Liberal cabinet had sufficient knowledge or sufficient intelligence to overcome what my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition has described tonight as the shattering divisions within the party and within the cabinet, as they should have been overcome. The minister should have adopted a more intelligent and a more sophisticated approach, and one which would have presented to his colleagues a means of procedure which would have appealed to the economists of this country as a sensible procedure, and while which would not on the one hand have fallen into the error of assuming that by removing the 6 per cent limit we are saving the people of Canada from some frightful disaster or on the other hand, suggested that in order to bring more flexibility into the banking system we must let the banks run loose, at their own discretion.

A case could have been made for a logical and intelligent revision of the existing structure of the banking system that would have appealed to all intelligent members of the Liberal caucus. I say sincerely, and this is the sad part of it, that the majority of the Liberal caucus members are intelligent. I think it is a disgrace that they have not been given by the Minister of Finance the opportunity to endorse a rational, sophisticated plan for the banking system of Canada in the future.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition mentioned toward the end of his speech a matter which I think deserves a word or two. He asked, what is to be the fate of the Mercantile Bank of Canada. As you may recall, sir, I asked the minister a question about this some weeks ago. There have been stories in the papers that the minister had yielded to pressures and had changed the policy that was introduced by his predecessor with regard to containing the expansion of this bank, which is now owned by the First National City Bank of New York.

At that time the minister was indignant that I should even suggest he would yield to pressure, so one presumes he intends to retain the rights of control defended by his predecessor. I put it to hon. members that here is another place where the Minister of Finance might have taken a more courageous and intelligent stand. It is perfectly obvious that no matter what we do about the Mercantile Bank of Canada, so long as it remains in the hands of its present owners it will be a burr under the saddle of this government. I would suggest to the minister that he should consider killing two birds with one stone—removing this source of future trouble for himself, because it is obviously going to be troublesome; they will be up here bugging him every week—by taking this bank under public ownership as a means of ensuring that it will remain under Canadian ownership and, second, as a yardstick by which to measure the operations of other sections of the banking community and, in the third place, as a means of establishing some proper scale of behaviour and discovering something which may not be known even to the minister—the real, inner workings of the banking system of Canada.

In making this suggestion I do not pretend to be doing anything very revolutionary, because two of our sister countries in the Commonwealth, Australia and New Zealand, have for many years—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret but there is not unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue his speech.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Who said no?

Mr. Ricard: You have just said it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Oh, yes; we have said it now. I should like to know. I don't think anybody did.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I should have liked the previous speaker to be allowed to complete his remarks, because they were very interesting. But since a single dissenting voice is enough to prevent someone from speaking, it seems that such a voice was heard this evening to prevent him from completing his remarks.

I cannot allow this resolution to be passed without saying a few words on behalf of the Ralliement Créditiste, even though this resolution took us somewhat by surprise, this evening. Frankly, we were expecting that the bill regarding the Canada Assistance Plan could finally be passed this evening, but since the minister has decided otherwise and the house had to revert to the resolution concerning the Bank Act revision, I had to let go our expert on banking, because he had to attend a public lecture tonight. That is why we have been somewhat off our guard.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution under consideration, which is not very lengthy, reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the extension of the powers of the existing savings banks till July 1, 1976, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the Act.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, the resolution is quite limited and, above all, it is being introduced very late. We are wondering why the government, after 110 days of session, introduces the most important piece of legislation of the session at this time.

It is introduced just before the end of the session. That is the most surprising thing. During the first 50 days of the session, bickering went on about everything and anything, discussions on all kinds of nonsense such as the Spencer affair and the Munsinger affair. Important questions were completely overlooked. Tonight, one of the last nights of the session, the resolution is brought in. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this government is operating contrary to all good sense. I am asking that the government program be prepared so that the main legislation is brought down at the beginning of a session, so that we may consider it for as long as necessary. I have the impression that the measure or the ensuing bill will be sent to the appropriate committee and may be considered during recess. That is why, Mr. Chairman, I was saying at the outset of my remarks that this resolution comes too late to be seriously considered. It should not be forgotten that this Bank Act is important.

It is not the first time it is brought before us. The first time, an extension was granted; the second time, a so-called amendment was introduced bringing down the reserves to 7 per cent. Now, as far as I can make out from the parables of the minister—tonight, he spoke in parables more than in anything else —it seemed to me that he was again trying to reduce the bank reserves. Before the last reduction, with $8 deposit in the Bank of Canada, banks could lend $100. Now with $7 deposit, they may lend $100. Possibly, under this bill, it will be enough to have $6 deposited in the Bank of Canada to lend $100. And if the interest is increased to 7 per cent, that will be quite an interest for an investment of $6 or $7.

There is some worry over the banks, Mr. Chairman, I have never been worried over banks. Let me have the powers the banks have and I shall be making money. I will not go bankrupt.

In his statement, the minister told us that the purpose of the bill was primarily to promote competition. To my mind, that is the main purpose of the bill: Competition between banks. When I consider the greatest monopoly in Canada which is that of the banks, I wonder where the competition can be? Whether the interest ceiling is set at 6 per cent, or at 6½ per cent or at 6¾ per cent, you can be sure—the decision is made in advance—that if one bank lends at 6 per cent, all the banks will be lending at 6 per cent. How can you expect them to compete?

Let us suppose, for instance, in the commercial field, that 100 or 150 stores constitute an absolute monopoly, such as the banks, and they determine that the price of a pair of shoes shall be $7 and that no store shall have the right to sell them neither for less nor for more. Do you believe there would be competition between those stores? No, Mr. Chairman, no competition would be possible. It would be an absolute monopoly and competition is not a feature of monopolies.

I would have thought that the minister would have wanted to talk about competition from the service standpoint—which would have made some kind of sense—and that each bank would have sought to give the best service. But, a little further on, the minister stated that it is not this kind of competition at all. Well, then, I was astounded, because it would have been possible to establish some kind of competition between the nine or 10 chartered banks. But we know that it is a monopoly.

If these banks had been able to compete with regard to service and ways of serving the customer, that would have been something. But the minister warns us beforehand that it is not a question of competition with regard to service.

I would ask the minister to tell us where this competition is? I see none at all. He always speaks in veiled terms. They play on words. They are going to do something, but they do nothing. The ceiling rate will not increase immediately; but, eventually, banks will be allowed to exceed the 6 per cent ceiling.

Well, Mr. Minister, I will tell you—and I may surprise you—that the banks have forestalled you. They have exceeded the 6 per cent ceiling. In fact, banks today do not lend at 6 per cent, but at 7, 7½, 8, 8½ and even 9 per cent. I have been doing business with banks for 30 years and I know their rates. Now, I assure you that banks do not lend at 6 per cent. That is why I say it is useless to raise the ceiling now, for they have exceeded the present one.

I would suggest to the minister that he should maintain the present ceiling and allow the banks to make loans in cases where some aid is indicated, instead of fiddling with that ceiling. For instance, if the government wishes to help borrowers, small merchants, consumers, small manufacturers, let the banks be allowed to charge a percentage for insurance or administration; this would in no way upset the ceiling, but if the banks rush blindly into loans to consumers, small manufacturers and small merchants, this will increase administrative costs.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be preferable if the government allowed some extension to the banks on their service and, above all, on their insurance. We know what the insurance rates are. For instance, if a bank makes a mortgage loan, it is entitled to keep some amount to guarantee the insurance premium on the mortgage. If the bank buys an insurance policy as a guarantee on another loan, this, I believe, will be to the advantage of the small borrower. Indeed, this will allow him to pay more than 6 per cent, but will prevent him from borrowing. In fact, this will prevent him from borrowing from the large companies; today, these companies offer money on loan at an interest rate of 10, 12, 15 and even 20 per cent. I believe the minister wants to protect the small buyer and enable him to finance his credit in advance, at reasonable rates of interest. Obviously, banks cannot finance small loans for the same rate as loans of $50,000, $60,000 or $100,000; we understand that very clearly.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to see a fixed ceiling of 6 per cent, but variations in rates for the auxiliary facilities. In that field variations should be allowed. It seems to me the banks could then set a reasonable rate of interest for credit in each field while making up their additional expenses. Let us get on with this bill to amend the Bank Act; we have been expecting this bill for a year now, and more particularly for the last six months.

At the present time, banks are at a standstill and restricted, and no longer promote trade expansion. I am a businessman myself, and for the past six months, we have been waiting for this famous legislation which has been slow in coming, being deferred from month to month. I therefore ask the minister to conduct special studies, since his purpose is to help small borrowers, private enterprise and to make mortgage loans easier. I am not against mortgage loans being granted by banks, because I am sure that, in such a case, the borrower will save from 4 to 5 per cent in interest.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock?

• (10:00 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I heard several members suggest that we carry on. If it is the wish of the committee that we carry on that will be agreeable.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I think the comment was made for the purpose of allowing the hon. member who was speaking to use the full 20 minutes allotted to him.

Mr. Hellyer: We are agreeable to that suggestion.

Mr. Knowles: If that is all that is being asked we are agreeable, but perhaps in fairness we should also allow the hon. member for Medicine Hat to make his speech and then call it a day.

Mr. Hellyer: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am nearly through. I also noticed that in his statement the minister warned us that in the future, in the studies made concerning banking reforms, provincial governments and companies will be able to acquire bank shares subject to a 10 per cent limit, but unfortunately, he added: not voting shares.

Mr. Chairman, I think this will be a matter of discussion during consideration of this bill and we intend to put our opinions forward in that connection. As we will base ourselves on the Royal Commission on Banking during these discussions on banking reform, I hope the minister will allow for once the Bank of Canada to take its true place in our financing system.

The analysis of our financial system has shown that the Bank of Canada plays second fiddle; I therefore submit that, during the future studies, the Bank of Canada recapture its natural part, the leading outstanding part it should play in our financial system, in short that it be called upon to finance all public sectors, in order to leave to chartered banks the financing of private sectors.

Thus we will no longer see chartered banks lack credit every season. When everyone is in his place and does his part, we will say that the Bank of Canada is the national bank; it must finance national affairs, national departments and not look after private affairs. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that as soon as we begin to study this bill, we will be able to shed some more light on the banking system, so as to inform everyone.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to thank the members of the committee for their indulgence in sitting past our regular adjournment hour so that I could make a few comments respecting the statement made by the Minister of Finance when he introduced this resolution. I would say at the outset that while we can agree with many of the objectives stated by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the resolution, it seems to me that there is not very much in the remarks he made that would appear to give effect to those objectives.

For example, the minister talks about this new Bank Act being a blueprint for competition. From the information that we have thus far respecting the amendments which will be in the new Bank Act when we receive it after first reading, there does not appear to me to be very much that will assure any greater competition in the field of banking, particularly in so far as the chartered banks of Canada are concerned.

I want to state very briefly that we certainly hope that the changes that will be in the bill when we see it are not changes or amendments or compromises, or whatever you wish to call them, that have come about because of divisions within the Liberal party. The amendments to the Bank Act are so important that this should not be a matter of compromise between any ministers of the crown in trying to bring in changes that are of benefit to Canada and Canadians generally.

I want also to say that I hope there is no substantive foundation to the press report that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition read from the Toronto Star, to the effect that these compromises came about as a result of sharp divisions of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the minister of manpower, because I believe that the old age pension, the Old Age Security Act and even the Canada Assistance Plan are far too important to have amendments based on some compromise that can be reached respecting the Bank Act.

We in this party agree that there ought to be more competition in the banking field. There is no question about that. But it seems to me we have not as yet heard from the Minister of Finance how he intends to achieve this end. Yet there has certainly been plenty of time because, for example, there were the 10 years that expired in 1964 when the Bank Act should have been revised. In addition to that, the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have had the benefit of not only the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, that took some 30 months looking into this matter, but they also have the reports of two years from the Economic Council of Canada in which comments were made about banks and banking in this country. In addition, we are now two years overdue in coming to grips with the changes that are needed in the Bank Act. Therefore I do not think the minister can plead that he has not had sufficient time to come forth with the kind of amendments that will make the banks and banking in Canada more effective and in keeping with modern requirements.

I was interested in the minister's comment that all financial institutions will be brought under the umbrella of the Bank Act and that to achieve this end he has issued an invitation to the provincial governments to come to a federal-provincial conference, in an attempt to work out some kind of agreement and arrangements as to how this will be done.

I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands when he suggested there might be some constitutional conflict in simply naming these other types of institutions that are close to banks, and thereby in fact requiring them to comply with the federal legislation. I am convinced that to bring a provincially organized institution within the terms of the federal act will be far more complex than that. However, Mr. Chairman, I suppose we will hear something more about this. I hope the Minister of Finance is prepared to tell this house what he intends to ask the provincial ministers of finance to do to bring these other institutions in line with a uniform banking policy.

The minister has also spoken about a crown corporation which would in fact provide insurance covering deposits, not only in banks but in some of these near banks. He suggested it would encourage people to place deposits in the banks. This may be true for some of the so-called near-banks, but all it will do with regard to chartered banks that are concerned will be to increase the cost of depositing.

I am therefore not impressed with the suggestion that the existing chartered banks in particular should require any kind of insurance for depositors. What is more, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any satisfactory argument for insurance coverage of deposits even in the new banks which may be formed in the immediate future because, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands suggested, when banks in this country receive a federal charter they are required to put forth such a substantial foundation that if they are to operate within the ambit of the existing Bank Act there is small likelihood of any insurance being required for those deposits. The only time it would be necessary would be in case of a complete economic collapse of this country, and we certainly hope that this will never come to pass.

We also agree that chartered banks should be allowed a wider scope in the loans that they can make, such as mortgage loans and others. We were somewhat disappointed that the minister did not spell out some new conditions in this Bank Act which will legalize what we have considered to be a breach of the Bank Act in the statutory 6 per cent limit which has been set up to this time. I am speaking of small personal loans in particular. I am convinced it costs more to service this kind of loan and I am therefore prepared to consider, and perhaps to approve, some amendments to the Bank Act which would allow the banks to charge a slightly higher fee for such loans. I believe that some of those details should be spelled out in the act because at the present time the provisions of the act are being violated by the charging of a higher effective rate than that allowed by the statutory limit, and other ways, such as the date of discount and the date of repayment, and other similar practices. I do not believe that this is the proper way of increasing the limit even for those loans which in fact carry a higher service cost. I hope therefore that in the course of our debate on this bill we will evolve a provision spelling out these new conditions.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, that the banks should be allowed to raise funds in some way other than by deposits. As the minister suggested, they should be allowed to issue debentures. This is in keeping with the practices of some of the near-banks and I find it to be satisfactory. However, in so far as these small loans are concerned, I am not prepared to agree that the great growth of the near-banks and other public financial institutions has been wholly due to the legislation, even as it is contained in the present Bank Act.

I believe that several years ago the chartered banks of this country failed to provide the kind of service that Canadians needed and wanted. Therefore, almost as a result of the default of the banks, these other types of institution have flourished in the personal loan field and small business loans. I think that perhaps in the last two or three years, or even a little longer than that, the banks finally woke up and realized there was a large, new market that they had missed which resulted in the growth of these other financial institutions. I believe we need to recognize that the banks failed to provide the service that was desired.

The minister suggested that in so far as the statutory limit is concerned, it could not be changed suddenly. He did not say very much else about it except there would be some interim arrangement pending the complete release of the statutory limit. This interim arrangement will be tied to the effective rate on short term government bonds and will be set at some undisclosed percentage above that rate. I feel the minister should have and could have given this information to the house, because if you look over all the changes that have been suggested, this is the most important one with which he dealt. Surely the house ought to have heard what kind of formula is suggested, or at least what the percentage of spread was going to be over this so-called effective interest rate.

There are many other things that we want to discuss, such as this requirement concerning directorship and the percentage of stock that any individual may hold. However, there will be plenty of time to do that on second reading of the bill. I want to say again that while the minister calls this a blueprint for competition and he talks about the fresh winds of competition that will permeate the banking system, there is very little in what the minister said that will give effect to this statement. He did not say whether or not the prohibition against agreements so far as interest charges by the banks are concerned was going to be enforced by the Combines Investigation Act, or under some similar arrangement. If the minister means what he says, and he is going to give effect to it, then we will have to have some additional laws with some teeth in them. Otherwise, his suggestion that there will be competition between chartered banks is, in my opinion, simply so many words.

There has been no effective competition in the banking industry in the immediate past. There may have been a measure of competition between the managers of local branches, but so far as conditions generally are concerned, there has been no competition in the banking system. We do not see anything in the minister's statement that would indicate conditions are going to be any better. We would be interested in knowing, as quickly as possible, under what conditions the minister is going to release the statutory limit on interest altogether. He said this could not be done now because of current conditions in the financial market. We would like to know when we can expect this information to be released. I hope the minister will come back to parliament for additional amendments before it is, in fact, released.

[Mr. Olson.]

• (10:20 p.m.)

I will not keep the committee longer because, as I said, I appreciate the indulgence shown me in permitting me to go beyond the regular adjournment hour. As I said when I began my remarks, we agree with many of the objectives of the minister, particularly the state objective that there needs to be more competition in the banking field. But up until now the explanation given by the Minister of Finance has failed to spell out how that competition is to be made effective.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Churchill: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It being after ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, before the questions commence I might give the order of business for tomorrow, which is, first, the continuation of the banking resolution, then the resolution on the Quebec Savings Banks Act, then the Canada Assistance Plan, and then any other business on the order paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATURAL GAS—U.S. HEARING ON TRANSMISSION BETWEEN CANADIAN POINTS

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, some ten years ago a proposal to build a natural gas pipe line from western to eastern Canada was the subject of considerable bitter debate in this house with far-reaching consequences. Nevertheless, the pipe line was approved and its subsequent operation has been a great success, so much so that just eight years later the capacity of the original line requires immediate expansion.

During the debate over this matter in 1956 Hansard indicates accord on one major related point, and that is the routing of the pipe line. Speaker after speaker from different parties stated his conviction that this should be all-Canadian. As a result, the line was built from Alberta through Saskatchewan, Manitoba, northern Ontario and thence to Toronto. It is claimed that the highest cost portion of that route was in northern Ontario, and this was known to be likely before construction began. But the decision of that day was to bear this additional capital cost, so as to keep this vital energy resource on Canadian soil and under Canadian control. And, Mr. Speaker, I say that this was a wise choice.

This year we face a similar decision. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has applied for approval to build a second line, this time through the northern states. From the exit at Emerson, Manitoba, to the re-entrance at Sarnia, this facility would be on United States soil, subject forever to the control of the United States. Today it appears possible that all the sound arguments presented for an all-Canadian route may be in danger of being forgotten.

The public hearings before the National Energy Board of Trans-Canada's application were completed in March. We do not yet know what the decision might be, and quite properly the members of the National Energy Board will not indicate their reaction until their ruling is announced. I have confidence in the vast knowledge often displayed by the chairman and members of that board, but I rise tonight to bring this matter to the attention of the final Canadian authority, parliament itself, because I feel that it is a much too important decision to be made without discussion in this house. We are facing a major choice of principle in dealing with this application to place forever on foreign soil and under foreign control a major Canadian resource asset.

We are asked to accept this proposal, when there is an acceptable alternative course open to us which would retain this program as an all Canadian facility. Such an alternative does exist in looping and adapting the existing northern Ontario pipe line to provide the necessary increase in capacity. As a northwestern Ontario member I have a parochial viewpoint of course. We are conscious of the economic impact in our area of the capital expenditure of some $240 million to $260 million in northern Ontario if the existing line is looped.

Already our industries are using more than twice as much gas as was originally estimated. Several industries and communities in northwestern Ontario are not yet serviced by natural gas. A number are not assured of an adequate supply from the present line for immediate needs, let alone future expansions and new industrial growth.

So I will not deny a local bias. But I am also vitally concerned about the danger to the national interest, if the U.S. location is approved.

Beyond identifiable and concrete economic factors identified in light of present laws and attitudes of the United States, we feel concern about future change in those attitudes and regulations. Such changes might be difficult to foresee now, but in any number of ways, and at any time, they could present a threat to the transmission system and the Canadian public interest—if the line is built in the United States. The Canadian route would eliminate that worry and danger, which must be considered as an intangible but significant factor.

When I appeared before the National Energy Board in March I supported the intervention of the Fort William/Port Arthur and District Council to the Trans-Canada application. Among other comments, I specifically requested that, before a decision is rendered, there be made, published and publicly discussed, an independent cost analysis and comparison of the total economic effect of both routes. No reply or indication of reaction to my request has been given by the board. This, partly, gives rise to my concern and to my action in bringing this before parliament tonight.

We are told by Trans-Canada that the difference in capital cost between looping the existing northern Ontario system and building a new line through the United States could amount to over $30 million in favour of the United States route. Even if this were so, we say there is great wisdom in keeping this all Canadian for the reasons I have already outlined.

In addition I should like to draw attention to these other disadvantages of the United States route: First, the amount of United States dollars that are going to have to be invested initially by Trans-Canada; second, the continuing drain of United States dollars required to be paid by Trans-Canada to Great Lakes Transmission, Trans-Canada's United States partner, which would own the United States pipe line in question. So, for these and many more reasons, we should not depart from the principle established ten years ago. But, in final argument, I want to introduce an important new fact that to the best of my knowledge was not presented during the National Energy Board hearings. Throughout Trans-Canada has claimed that by taking the United States route as opposed to the looping of the northern system, natural gas would be delivered at a lower price to the consumer in eastern Canada.

Today, I am in possession of a brief that purports to refute that claim. This was prepared by the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company of New York and the Trunkline Gas Company of Houston, Texas—both United States corporations. It was tabled with the Federal Power Commission, in opposition to Trans Canada's application to that United States regulatory body, and is a matter of record there.

It was developed by experienced specialists in the field of pipe line engineering and cost accounting, using the detailed engineering and cost data supplied by Trans-Canada to the National Energy Board. Because it obtained that information from presentations to the Energy Board in March—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, all other things being equal, I am sure that all members of this house and most Canadians would prefer an all-Canadian route for a natural gas pipe line bringing gas from western Canada to central Canada. I say, all things being equal, that is so. One of the fundamental considerations would, of course, be that the route followed would deliver gas at the lowest possible price. It is conceivable that an all-Canadian route would do this. However, there have been submissions to the contrary.

• (10:30 p.m.)

The National Energy Board was set up in the late fifties to assess these projects in the Canadian interest and to take into account various technical aspects of the submissions made by the pipe line companies, by the producers and by the consuming utilities, most of them, in this case, being in eastern Canada. Trans-Canada has applied for permission to run, not north of the lakes but via an international route. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras) has said new evidence has recently been made available in the case of an application by Trans-Canada now before the United States power commission. This takes the form of a submission to the effect that Trans-Canada's costs, were it to follow an all-Canadian route, would be lower than Trans-Canada has contended they would be.

[Mr. Andras.]

The National Energy Board is fully staffed with accountants and other experts. It makes continuing studies of the costs of all Canadians as well as international routes. I am confident that the information tabled by the Panhandle Pipe Line Company is available to the National Energy Board and that the board is able to take critical note of that statement.

The National Energy Board will make a recommendation to the governor in council who can, of course, take into account any other information or policy consideration it deems fit. Normally, the governor in council will accept the recommendation of the National Energy Board. But I wish to assure the hon. member for Port Arthur that not only is the energy board capable of doing a first class job in this connection, but that the government itself will take a hard look at the recommendation of the National Energy Board with a view to protecting interests in northern Ontario and elsewhere which require natural gas in large quantities at the lowest possible price.

RESEARCH—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SPACE RESEARCH

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): I should like to direct the attention of the house to the substance of a question I raised on July 4 as will be found reported at page 7,128 of Hansard with reference to a policy on space research for this country and the present position of space research.

I suppose each generation has before it a special challenge which stands out from the others as being of special importance, possibly as expressing the spirit of the age itself. When we think of the 'sixties our attention will undoubtedly be turned to the whole question of space. Outer space is the frontier of this half of the twentieth century. Many of us have spent hours viewing with fascination some of the great adventures which have taken place in space brought to us by means of television. Unfortunately, even though Canada has in the past few years begun to work in the area of space research, public opinion generally has been uninformed and it has certainly not been clear to myself, and, perhaps to other hon. members, that we have had a clearly defined policy in this regard.

Perhaps our policy can best be described as reflecting the attitude: Ignore it, and perhaps it will go away. Unfortunately, our space program, if it can be called that in terms of being in harmony with interests of the Canadian people, does not possess the spirit, the purpose, the direction or the policy we might like to see. Space research has been divided among many departments and organizations. The National Research Council and the Defence Research Board are two groups which have taken some part in it. There have been a number of university projects, the high altitude research project at McGill among them. We even find in a place like Churchill a space research project which is Canadian. At least, Canada pays the bill, though the people employed are for the most part Americans.

Frankly I am at a loss to know—after all we have not been in the space business very long—why we have not had more parliamentary interest and a definite outline of our policy with regard to space research. More recently we have instituted a Science Council; but space research is more than science. It involves communications, transportation, defence, and ramifications involving industry. It even has a cultural effect. This is such a large and important question not only to the world at large but even to this country that we must not wait too long before we institute a parliamentary committee to examine this in detail. We are losing many well-trained people. I am told that only one person in ten who applies to work in space research in this country finds employment. We need to encourage our scientists; we need to develop a thorough-going policy in space research. In the United States for some time now there has been a full fledged congressional committee devoted primarily to space research. In the United Kingdom they had a minister who was responsible for this same area of space research.

I think it is time to see what is going on, and not just at the level of the civil service. I know we have in the civil service a number of people who are very competent in this field. I think it is time the representatives of the people had an opportunity to sit down and ask what are the facts, what are the capabilities of our country in the field of space research, and what are the kind of things we might be doing. We might complement the facilities developed in the United States. Money is not the main obstacle in terms of space research. It is ideas, far-sighted and well designed policy. I would hope the government would see it in their power when we come back after the recess this fall, if there is going to be a recess, to have appointed immediately a special parliamentary committee which will do more than examine the many possibilities which are before us.

Let me quote in conclusion three or four suggestions made by an outspoken man, a space engineer, Dr. Gerald V. Bull:

> An arctic radio television satellite system that would provide reliable reception in the far north.

How important this would be in respect of northern communications.

> A navigation satellite that could determine precisely the geography and mineralogy of the country.

That would be quite an improvement. There are a number of other suggestions all of which could be within the competence and financial resources of this country. I am most anxious to hear the views of the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) in this regard because I feel we can look forward to great and enlightened things from him. I would hope that we can begin to look for an exciting and important policy in space research for this country.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for his interest in and enthusiasm for space research, which he has described as a new frontier. While there would be those who would argue that Canada still has frontiers of a terrestrial character, I do think there is effort to spare and that certainly the time has come for us to look beyond the terrestrial limits. There is no doubt that in North America, and this is going over into Canada, there is a great interest in space research.

The hon. member has suggested the formation of a parliamentary committee to seek the answers to a number of questions concerning what we are doing, what we can do, what possibilities are open to us and how we can fit in with the programs of other nations, and perhaps make use of our talents. I should like to say that in my view, before this kind of program can be effectively tackled by a parliamentary committee, it is necessary to assemble the facts and to get some valid scientific views, particularly on future possibilities.

To this end the science secretariat of the Privy Council office early this spring commissioned a full scale study and review of what is being done in respect of space research in Canada, not only by the various government departments but also by universities, and an assessment of future areas in which we might be more active than we have been in the past. There is no question but that space research is a costly operation. With the limited resources of a country such as Canada we cannot attempt a complete space program on our own. We must do it in co-operation with others, and in those specialized fields to which our particular talents lend themselves.

It is my hope that this study will be presented to the Science Council not later than December of this year. When we are in the position to get the views of the Science Council, whose object the house will recall is precisely to lay out general guide lines for scientific research activities for the whole of Canada in the future, and when we have had the benefit of a review and an assessment exposed to the Science Council, I think it would be extremely useful for a parliamentary committee to look at the situation and give the necessary enthusiasm and impetus to this whole field.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 6, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUIREMENT THAT INJURIES TO CHILDREN BE REPORTED

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-219, to amend the Criminal Code (maltreatment of a child).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Irvine: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to call upon members of the medical profession to report to the attorneys general of their respective provinces within a week any bodily injuries to a child which may, in their opinion, have been caused by maltreatment. This move is prompted by the many cases which have been reported recently in newspapers. I believe this is a worthy amendment, and I do not believe any further dilation upon it at this time is necessary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN PORT DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Question No. 1,199—Mr. Gundlock:

1. What is the time allowed in Canadian ports for ships waiting to load grain for export before demurrage is charged?

2. What is the amount of demurrage charged?

3. Who collects the demurrage?

4. What is the total amount paid in the last five years?

5. Who is charged demurrage and who pays the charge?

6. On the average how many bushels of grain can be loaded onto a boat in a day in each port?

7. On the average how many boats per day can be loaded in each port?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture and Finance as follows:

1 and 2. The time allowed in Canadian ports for ships waiting to load grain for export before demurrage is charged, and the rate of demurrage charged, is a matter of contract negotiation between the shipping company and the exporting company.

3. The shipping company receives the demurrage.

4. Information not available.

5. See 1, 2 and 3 above.

6. The volume of grain that can be loaded into an ocean going vessel in a normal working day, based on past maximum performance and favourable weather conditions, at the following ports, is: Maritime ports, 750,000 bushels; Baie Comeau, 600,000 bushels; Quebec, 500,000 bushels; Trois-Rivières, 400,000 bushels; Sorel, 600,000 bushels; Montreal, 1,800,000 bushels; Prescott, 400,000 bushels; Churchill, 500,000 bushels; Victoria, 100,000 bushels; New Westminster, 150,000 bushels; Vancouver, 1,500,000 bushels; Prince Rupert, 225,000 bushels.

7. The usual grain cargo requires more than one day to load. The number of ocean vessels that can be loading simultaneously, given favourable weather conditions, based on past maximum performance, is: Maritime ports, 7 vessels; Baie Comeau, 2 vessels; Quebec, 2 vessels; Trois-Rivières, 1 vessel; Sorel, 1 vessel; Montreal, 9 vessels; Prescott, 1 vessel; Churchill, 2 vessels; Victoria, 1 vessel; New Westminster, 1 vessel; Vancouver, 9 vessels; Prince Rupert, 1 vessel.

FINANCING OF HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION, B.C.

Question No. 1,502—Mr. Howard:

Since January 1, 1960, has any person, government, or organization made any representations regarding the possibilities of financing the construction of Highway 16 in British Columbia (being in the area between Prince Rupert and Prince George) and the construction of a road between Prince George and Jasper, Alberta, and, if so, what is the name of each such person, government, or organization, and the date upon which each such representation was made?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Prime Minister's office is concerned. Yes, four representations have been received by the Prime Minister, recommending federal financial participation, from the following organizations: British Columbia Chamber of Commerce, Vancouver on three occasions dated August 29, 1963, undated but received on August 17, 1964 and August 16, 1965; and Associated Chambers of Commerce of Central British Columbia, Kitimat, B.C., dated December 3, 1963.

In so far as the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is concerned:

Yes, the Greater Kamloops Chamber of Commerce on July 10, 1963, and the Jasper Park Chamber of Commerce on December 11, 1963.

In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned:

Yes, the following letters were received: March 9, 1960, F. J. W. Fane, M.P., March 10, 1960, P. J. Lester, Mayor of Prince Rupert; January 4, 1962, Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, Minister of Highways for British Columbia; January 24, 1962, Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, Minister of Highways for British Columbia; March 23, 1962, Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, Minister of Highways for British Columbia; March 27, 1962, Greater Kamloops, Chamber of Commerce; November 8, 1962, District "B" Farmers' Institute, British Columbia; December 18, 1962, Northern Trans-Canada Route Association; October 24, 1963, District "B" Farmers' Institute, British Columbia; December 16, 1963, Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, Minister of Highways for British Columbia; December 2, 1964, District "B" Farmers' Institute, British Columbia; November 3, 1965, Prince Rupert, Chamber of Commerce.

TROIS-RIVIÈRES AIRPORT

Question No. 1,509—Mr. Isabelle:

1. What was the total amount spent for Trois-Rivières airport?

2. What was the amount spent for (a) the air terminal (b) the landing strip (c) the land and who was the former owner (d) the cost per acre and the extent or area of the acquired land (e) the evaluation of the land according to the municipality's records at the time of the acquisition?

3. How long is the landing strip?

4. How many of Air Canada's daily flights stop at Trois-Rivières, and (a) where do these flights come from (b) what is their destination?

5. How many commercial planes stop at Trois-Rivières every day and to what companies do they belong?

6. Can jets of the Boeing 707 or DC8 type land on the strip?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

7. What was the revenue of Trois-Rivières airport in 1963, 1964, 1965?

8. What were the operating costs in the same years?

9. By whom and for what reason was the airport built?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. $773,727.00.

2. (a) $25,940 by the Department of Transport. The terminal building was actually built and financed by the city. (b) $747,787. (c) The land was purchased by the city and sold to the federal crown for $1. (d) and (e) Information not available in the Department of Transport.

3. 6,000′ × 150′.

4. The management of Air Canada advises as follows: Air Canada has one eastbound, daily except Saturday and Sunday service (flight 450) operating from Ottawa to Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec, and one westbound, daily except Saturday and Sunday service (flight 443) operating from Quebec to Trois-Rivières and Montreal.

5. This airport is operated by the municipality and not by the Department of Transport. This information should therefore be obtained from the municipality since it is not a matter of record with the department.

6. No.

7 and 8. See answer to part 5 above.

9. The Trois-Rivières airport was built by the Department of Transport in order to provide a suitable airport for Trois-Rivières and to permit Air Canada to serve this community with Viscount aircraft.

SUBSIDIES TO AIR CARRIERS

Question No. 1,534—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Does the federal government in any direct or indirect way subsidize any air carrier in Canada, other than Air Canada in (a) the domestic mainline service (b) the regional regular and non-scheduled service field?

2. If so, in what manner and to what extent?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Post Office and Transport as follows:

Insofar as the Post Office Department is concerned:

1. (a) Air Canada is the only carrier providing a complete domestic main line service on a transcontinental basis (b) Numerous regional air carriers convey mail on routes licensed by the Air Transport Board. In some instances the licensed air carriers have a virtual monopoly in the region. The Post Office Department negotiates for the most realistic rates for mail conveyance. Generally these rates are related to the charges established by the carriers for other commodities and for passengers, but take into account the priority requirements of mail traffic. Under these circumstances, it is not possible to ascertain what might be interpreted as an indirect subsidy. The Post Office Department pays no direct subsidies.

2. Not applicable.

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

1 and 2. The federal government has provided direct subsidies to air carriers on an interim basis on a few occasions. At present, the payment of a direct subsidy has been authorized for one carrier, TransAir. This subsidy has been authorized to reimburse TransAir for losses sustained in continuing to operate its class I scheduled service to points in the prairies, which it had applied to suspend from April 16, 1966. The subsidy will be provided on a temporary basis for such time as is required for the Air Transport Board to hold a public hearing and determine the future operation of these services.

* REGULATIONS RESPECTING COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION

Question No. 1,564—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Have any new or amended regulations, by or under the direction of the Department of Transport with respect to community antenna television, been prepared or are any being prepared?

2. If so, will the Department convene a meeting of interested organizations and holders of C.A.T. licences before any new regulations are put into effect?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the regulations made under the Radio Act are kept under constant review by the Department of Transport.

It is not administratively feasible to arrange formal meetings with all interested organizations and all licence holders every time an amendment in regulations is contemplated, but it is the practice of the government to consult regarding major policy development and representations have been received on several occasions from the Community Antenna Television Association of Canada, and any further such representations will be welcomed and given full consideration.

Questions

WILLIAM NEVILLE

Question No. 1,579—Mr. Ormiston:

1. Is Mr. William Neville at present filling a position in the government of Canada and, if so, what position?

2. Was his appointment made by order in council and, if so, what was the date of the order?

3. What is his present salary?

4. What was the nature of the four previous positions he held outside of the federal government prior to his present position?

5. What specific training or experience has Mr. Neville had as a writer, producer, director, story editor, or researcher or interviewer since 1953?

6. What undergraduate and graduate university degrees does Mr. Neville hold?

7. What oaths of office or of service has Mr. Neville been sworn to, if any, and upon what dates were the declarations taken?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. Yes. Executive assistant to the Secretary of State.

2. No. The appointment was made under the provisions of section 71(1) of the Civil Service Act.

3. $15,000.

4. February, 1965 to September, 1965: staff writer, Canadian Press; February, 1964 to February, 1965: Canadian news manager, United Press International; June 1962 to February 1964: Ottawa bureau manager, United Press International; June 1957 to June 1962: parliamentary reporter, United Press International.

5. All 4 positions mentioned in part 4 involved continuous work as a writer, producer, editor, researcher and interviewer, of parliamentary and other national news.

6. Bachelor of Journalism 1957, Carleton University.

7. Declaration under the Official Secrets Act, September 20, 1965.

EXPENDITURES ON PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCES

Question No. 1,612—Mr. Skoreyko:

What was the total expenditure in each year since the first of January 1960 to date for (a) materials and fixtures (b) repairs and alterations (c) labour (d) furniture (e) bathroom fixtures and other equipment at the official residence of the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive, and at the country residence of the Prime Minister at Harrington Lake?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 24 Sussex Drive

NATO—MILITARY COSTS TO CANADA

Question No. 1,625—Mr. Herridge:

1. What is the capital investment to date, since Canada joined the NATO Alliance infrastructure in all countries in Europe?

2. What is the capital cost of the squadrons of the R.C.A.F. stationed in Europe?

3. What is the annual cost of maintaining these squadrons in Europe?

4. What is the annual cost of maintaining one brigade of the Canadian army in Germany and other countries?

5. What is the annual cost of transporting defence forces and their dependents between Europe and Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. Total contributions paid by all NATO nations to the NATO commonly financed infrastructure program since it began in 1951 have amounted to approximately $2,694,000,000 up to March 31, 1966. Canada's contributions paid during the same period have amounted to $152,300,000.

2. The estimated capital cost of the aircraft presently supplied to No. 1 air division as at April 30, 1966, amounts to $211,600,000. Additionally, the capital costs of the fixed facilities at the Canadian bases of No. 1 air division are estimated to have cost $14,700,000, of which $11,000,000 was spent in France and $3,700,000 in Germany. These costs do not include the costs of those facilities commonly financed by the NATO infrastructure programs referred to in 1 above nor do they include the cost of facilities in Germany financed by Germany as a charge to occupation and defence support costs.

3. The total estimated annual cost of maintaining No. 1 air division is $85,300,000. This figure includes certain elements of annual cost incurred in Canada in support of the air division such as operational training and airlift support.

4. The estimated total annual cost of maintaining No. 4 CIBG in Germany is $64,500,000. This figure includes the cost of ammunition supplied from Canada and air-lift support costs.

5. The estimated annual cost of transporting defence forces and their dependants between Europe and Canada is $7,500,000. This amount includes costs of moving and storing household goods in Canada and air-lift support costs for passengers.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Question No. 1,626—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What is the total staff of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission?

2. How many of these are professionally trained in the fields of economics, law, business administration, engineering, accounting and planning?

3. How many of these have post graduate training?

4. What are the salaries in each of these fields in the commission?

5. What vacancies exist in each of these fields in the commission?

6. Is it the intention of the commission to enlarge its staff?

7. How many of the staff are engaged in economic research and planning?

8. What research projects are in progress by the commission?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. The restrictive trade practices commission has a staff of five of whom four are secretarial and one is an economist.

3 and 4. The economist has postgraduate training and is paid a salary of $13,006.

5. None.

6. Not at the present time.

7 and 8. The commission does not carry on economic research except with reference to statements of evidence placed before it by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BRANCH

Question No. 1,630—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What is the total staff of the Combines Investigation Branch?

2. How many of these are professionally trained in the fields of economics, law, business administration, engineering, accounting and planning?

3. How many of these have post graduate training?

4. What are the salaries in each of these fields in the branch?

5. What vacancies exist in each of these fields in the branch?

6. Is it the intention of the branch to enlarge its staff?

7. How many of the staff are engaged in economic research and planning?

8. What research projects are in progress by the branch?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): 1. Permanent staff: 72 (officers: 32; other: 40)

Temporary, technical or special assistants (sections 24 and 25 of the Combines Investigation Act): 16

Students are paid in accordance with the salary schedule established by the Civil Service Commission (T.B. 648683) and these range from $400 to $430 per month depending on length of university training.

Other temporary and special assistants are paid according to qualifications. Some are paid on a per diem basis and others on a monthly basis.

5. There are two vacancies in the professional staff. Steps are being taken to fill these vacancies.

6. Yes. See report of the director of investigation and research, Combines Investigation Act, for the year ended March 31, 1965 at pages 77 and 79.

7. In every major case some economic research is involved but in addition there are 9 persons working full time on economic research.

8. General inquiry into mergers in Canada in the period of 1945-1961. Study of services presently not within the purview of the Combines Investigation Act.

SATELLITE APPLICATION, STATION CJCH TV

Question No. 1,659—Mr. Coates:

1 Did the government impose a freeze on the consideration of an application by CJCH TV to the B.B.G. for an increase of power for its satellite that serves the Cumberland-Westmorland area of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and, if so, on what date?

2. Will such an application be considered by the B.B.G. from CJCH TV and, if so, when?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The freeze on the extension of alternative television services was in effect prior to the receipt of this application.

2. See statement by the Minister of Transport on July 5, 1966, in response to an oral question from J. B. Stewart, M.P., parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works on page 7187.

ELECTRONIC LECTURE SYSTEM, NATIONAL GALLERY

Question No. 1,672—Mr. Stanbury:

Is consideration being given to the installation of an electronic lecture system in the National Gallery of Canada, similar to that in the National Art Gallery in Washington, to enhance both the educational value of the exhibits and their enjoyment by the public?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Gallery of Canada as follows: Yes.

BARLOW-CÔTÉ LABORATORY, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,695—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Has the government knowledge that the Barlow-Côté Laboratory situated in Quebec city distributed S.D.M. tablets containing sulfamethoxypyridazine when they should have contained sulfadimethoxine as per the label?

2. Have any measures been taken against this laboratory?

3. Have legal proceedings been instituted?

4. Who are the owners of this pharmaceutical company?

5. How long has it been in business?

6. How many products classified as "new drugs" have been put on the market by this company?

[Translation]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Barlowe Drug Laboratories, Registered, previously known as Barlowe-Côté Drug Laboratories, distributed a product containing sulfamethoxypyridazine which was labelled as containing sulfadimethoxine. This labelling error has now been corrected.

2. Not for the situation referred to in Question 1. However, measures against this company have been taken on several occasions.

3. Yes.

4. Mrs. Jeannine Côté Van Ular is the sole owner of Barlowe Drug Laboratories, Registered.

5. Since 1961.

6. Five.

RECOMMENDATIONS ON DRUG PATENT LICENSING

Question No. 1,700—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Has the government decided to follow the recommendations contained in the Hilliard report on patent licensing tabled in the House of Commons on May 12, 1966?

2. Has the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare advised anyone that the recommendations of the above-mentioned report cannot be enforced under the Food and Drugs Act and, if so, what measures, if any, does the government intend to take to enforce them?

[Translation]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Hilliard Report contained recommendations which related to both the Patent Act and the Food and Drugs Act. The Department of National Health and Welfare is prepared to implement the recommendations as far as the authority provided in the Food and Drugs Act will permit.

2. The recommendations of the report have been discussed with appropriate officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Commissioner of Patents and representatives of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, as well as individual pharmaceutical manufacturers. While not all these recommendations can be implemented in the exact form proposed by the Committee, it is considered that their general intent can be met under the present Food and Drugs Act. Action has already been taken in regard to several of these proposals and the remainder are under study.

ANTI CIGARETTE SMOKING CAMPAIGN

Question No. 1,707—Mr. Noble:

What action has been taken since January 1, 1966, by the Department of National Health and Welfare in respect to the promotion of the anti cigarette smoking campaign?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The health educational material intended for the long term Canadian smoking and health program requires a lengthy production schedule but is progressively becoming available for distribution. Since January 1, 1966, two films produced for the Department of National Health and Welfare have been completed and released. One film is now being shown to the general public in theatres across the country; the other, a documentary film of the Canadian youth conference on smoking and health of May, 1965, is being distributed through public health and educational channels. In addition, the Department of National Health and Welfare has continued its experimental series of display advertisements in a national monthly publication, Canadian High News, directed to high school students across the country. The distribution of pamphlets, reprints, fact sheets, films and bibliographies as well as the exhibition of special displays has also continued. A number of new items have been initiated including publications, posters and short films for television showing and will become available later this year.

The promotion of research into the extent and nature of smoking habits in Canada and the motivational aspects of smoking has been continued. A number of reports have been received since January 1, 1966 and are being reviewed or analysed.

INTERNATIONAL AGENCY FOR CANCER RESEARCH

Question No. 1,716—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Has the Canadian government given consideration to joining the world health organization's international agency for research in cancer?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Health and Welfare): The relationship of Canada to the international agency for research on cancer has been under active and continuous study since the original initiative was taken in 1964 by the five founding governments and the agency was established by the 18th World Health Assembly in May 1965. The present position is to observe further developments and to reassess the question of membership on the basis of additional information to be made available in future reports of the agency and the World Health Organization.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,725—Mr. Godin:

1. How many Canadians from (a) Ontario (b) Quebec were members of the Canadian armed forces from 1939 to 1945?

2. Of this number, how many have left the armed forces and receive a pension (a) with respect to the province of Ontario (b) with respect to the province of Quebec?

3. How many Canadians from (a) Ontario (b) Quebec were members of the Canadian armed forces during the Korean war?

4. Of this number, how many have left the armed forces and receive a pension (a) with respect to the province of Ontario (b) with respect to the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) 413,364; (b) 179,705.

3. (a) 46,278; (b) 22,307.

2. and 4. Information is not now available to provide an accurate answer to these questions and the necessary expert staff is not available to undertake the large amount of work which would be required to gather the necessary information.

PAY OF ELECTRICIANS, DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 1,740—Mr. Madill:

1. When was the rate of pay per hour for electricians in the Department of National Defence last reviewed?

2. Are staff requirements being filled by unskilled labour as a result of the rates of pay being below that of electricians in the surrounding industrial area?

3. Are carpenters and plumbers being paid a higher rate of pay per hour than electricians by the Department of National Defence and, if so, is this resulting in transfers within the Department?

4. Will a review of the wage status of civil servants working for the Department of National Defence be made in the near future?

5. Has any adjustment been made in the past three years?

6. Is the quality of maintenance and construction in the Department of National Defence falling short of requirements because qualified electricians cannot be obtained owing to rates of pay?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. The rates of pay for electricians and other prevailing rate classes are reviewed annually by the Treasury Board and the Department of Labour, each locality having its own date of review. Consequently the rate of pay for electricians in each locality has been reviewed within the past year or is about to be reviewed.

2. No.

3. (a) Depending upon the locality, the rate of pay for electrician may be equal, higher, or lower than the rate of pay for carpenters and plumbers. (b) No.

4. As the previous questions deal with prevailing rate employees it is presumed this is what is meant by "civil servants" and the answer is the same as in 1 above.

5. Yes. In the last three years, there have been at least three reviews at each location and adjustments approved where warranted.

6. No.

Questions

RAIL DIVERSION, SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN DAM PROJECT

Question No. 1,746—Mr. McLelland:

1. What is the estimated cost of the diversion of the C.P.R. railway track between Brownlee and Elbow, Saskatchewan, due to the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project?

2. What is the estimated cost for the overpass being constructed over the C.P.R. line on No. 19 highway?

3. What engineering firms were hired for this project?

4. Were tenders called for this project?

5. Who was responsible for determining the location of this diversion?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. $1,552,000.

2. $105,000.

3. Underwood McLellan & Associates Limited, Saskatoon, were hired by the Province of Saskatchewan to design the highway overpass.

4. Yes.

5. The general location was developed by engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the department. At the request of the province of Saskatchewan three alternatives on the north side of the valley were considered by the South Saskatchewan river development board, having regard to the effect on the recreation development and project cost. The present location was agreed to by the two governments and was subsequently approved by the Board of Transport Commissioners on application of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

FOREST ACCESS ROAD, CHAPLEAU CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,759—Mr. Laprise:

1. What was the cost to the government for the clearing and construction of the forest access road built in the townhsip of Mégiscane in the constituency of Chapleau?

2. How many men were employed in the construction of this road?

3. What contractors took part in the construction of this road?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. The cost to the federal government for the clearing and construction of the forest access road in the township of Mégiscane in the constituency of Chapleau between April 1, 1962 and March 31, 1966, amounted to $144,572.24.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

2. The number of men employed in the construction of this road were as follows: 1962-63, 26 men; 1963-64, 17 men; 1964-65, 24 men; 1965-66, 24 men.

3. Nil—Construction of road by use of day labour.

R.C.M.P. QUARTERS, HAMPTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,763—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police renting or has the government purchased, the building they occupy at Hampton, New Brunswick?

2. If the building is rented, what is the monthly rent and, if the building is owned by the government of Canada, how much did it cost?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. The R.C.M.P. are renting the building they occupy at Hampton, New Brunswick.

2. $180 per month.

*GNU DEVELOPMENT'S LTD., BANKRUPTCY

Question No. 1,769—Mr. Macaluso:

1. Is the superintendent of bankruptcy taking steps to investigate the bankruptcy of Gnu Developments Limited, Hamilton, Ontario, and its mortgage dealings with Traders Realty Limited?

2. Is the Department of Justice actively investigating the same matter to determine whether charges of fraud or other criminal charges may be laid?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): As the hon. member for Hamilton West knows, Mr. Speaker, the superintendent of bankruptcy has a number of investigations under way at present. However, I do not think it would be in the public interest to disclose which of the estates in bankruptcy is presently under investigation.

Question No. 1,775—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

SPECIAL SECRETARIAT ON BILINGUALISM

1. What are the names of the officers appointed to the special secretariat on bilingualism in the public service?

2. What previous experience has each such officer had?

3. Does any such officer have duties in the public service other than those appurtenant to the special secretariat?

4. If so, what duties?

5. To whom does the special secretariat report and which minister will report to parliament for its activities?

6. Have any terms of reference or other statement of duties and functions been formulated for the special secretariat?

7. If so, in what manner and what are such terms of reference or other statements of duties and functions?

Mr. P. E. Trudeau (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. John S. Hodgson, director. Robert Elie, associate director.

2. Previous experience is outlined in the following biographies:

John S. Hodgson was born in Montreal, March 1, 1917, and educated at Montreal High School and McGill University. He was selected as a Rhodes scholar in 1937 and attended St. John's College, Oxford University. He was awarded his D. Phil. degree in economic history in 1940.

During 1940-41, Dr. Hodgson was in the Department of Labour where he worked on the drafting of the Unemployment Insurance Act. He served in the Canadian navy during the second world war 1941-45, for part of that time as assistant director of naval plans. He was awarded the O.B.E., and when demobilized held the rank of commander.

In 1946 Dr. Hodgson joined Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and in 1957 was appointed executive director. In 1959, he was appointed assistant secretary to the cabinet, a position he held until September 1, 1963, when he was appointed assistant deputy minister of national defence. He became principal secretary to the Prime Minister January 6, 1966.

From 1946-52, Dr. Hodgson was secretary of the Rhodes scholarship trust committee of the province of Quebec and in 1953 was its chairman. He is a director of the centennial commission and of Defence Construction Limited. He is Canadian government representative on the Canadian Council on Urban and Rural Research. He is an officer of the Canadian Club of Ottawa, the Boy Scouts Association of Canada and member of the Canadian Political Science Association and the Institute of Public Administration.

Robert Elie was born in Montreal, April 5, 1915, received his Bachelor of Arts from the University of Montreal in 1935 and studied literature at McGill University 1936-1940.

He was a member of the founding group of the newspaper "La Relève" and was associated with the publication from 1935-1944. He was a reporter and arts critic for "Le Canada" and "La Presse" 1940-1943. He then joined the C.B.C. as editor of the information service and later became director of conference services.

In 1947-48 Mr. Elie was chief editor of the Montreal publication "Architecture". He returned to the C.B.C. in 1949 as assistant director of the press and information service for the province of Quebec. In 1953 he became the director. In 1957 he left C.B.C. to become director, École des Beaux Arts of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Elie was appointed cultural counsellor to the agent general of the province of Quebec in Paris in 1961.

He is the author of several novels and plays and was co-editor, with Jean LeMoyne, of "Poésies complètes" and the "Journal" of Saint-Denys Garneau.

3 and 4. Yes. Mr. Hodgson is principal secretary to the Prime Minister.

5. The Prime Minister.

6 and 7. Yes. On April 6, 1966, in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister outlined the government's policy and program on bilingualism in the public service of Canada. In that statement the Prime Minister announced that the secretariat on bilingualism was being established within the Privy Council office, and indicated that "working in close consultation and co-operation with the Civil Service Commission, the Treasury Board and all deputy ministers and heads of agencies, it will be responsible for ensuring the co-ordinated and progressive implementation of the government's policy and program regarding bilingualism in the public service".

P.F.A.A. EMPLOYEES UNDER CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Question No. 1,784—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to bring the permanent employees responsible for the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act under the provisions of the federal Civil Service Act, and as a consequence provide a much better sense of security for these valuable employees?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): This is a matter of government policy and when a decision is reached, an announcement will be made.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, affecting those members who have questions on the order paper now, as well as myself. We have continuously asked the government to co-operate with members who ask questions which are ruled out on orders of the day and which have to be placed on the order paper. We expected these questions would be answered within a reasonable time. Many of these questions have been on the order paper for months, far beyond a reasonable length of time. We plead again for the government to concentrate upon answering these questions.

In my own case I want to direct attention to the fact that question No. 1,692 was placed on the order paper on June 14. It is a very straightforward question that does not necessitate any great deal of research, yet it has remained on the order paper for approximately three weeks. I would ask the government whether they would co-operate and answer these questions.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, respecting question No. 1,777, while it has not been on the order paper for a long period of time I understand that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is intending to close something like 30 to 40 offices during the summer months. Inasmuch as this may be the last day before the recess when questions will be called, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour will give some consideration to giving us this information so that by the time the question is answered all these offices will not have been closed.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I will give the suggestion very serious consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I too along with the other hon. members should like to bring to the attention of the house leader or whoever is responsible question No. 894, which has been on the order paper since March 1. This is not a complicated question by any means and does not require any research. I was wondering whether I could have a reply to it as soon as possible.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, to accept this motion would involve disclosure of virtually the complete departmental file, which would be contrary to accepted practice. Therefore I must take the position that this motion should not be accepted.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Then may I ask that this motion be transferred for debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 47 this motion is transferred to notices of motions (papers).

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State that I have yet to receive the papers covered by notice of motion No. 118, although the said motion was agreed to on April 27.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions for papers Nos. 147 and 148 which appear on the order paper come within the purview of the Department of Trade and Commerce and I wonder whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) could answer them before the end of this part of the session?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, both these motions are acceptable, with the usual reservations about privileged correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that these two motions referred to by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) be deemed to have been accepted, subject to the reservation mentioned by the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PAUL LABRIE AND D.B.S.

Motion No. 147—Mr. Grégoire:

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED STRIKE OF PROGRAM STAFFS IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has been made aware of the emergency situation created in the C.B.C. which has had the effect of putting the administration of its public affairs department in a shambles? Is he aware that the program staffs of "Seven Days", "Compass", "Document' and the new bilingual program "Quarterly Report" have gone on strike and suspended operations, and that ACTRA —that is the Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists—are co-operating with the producers association in the dispute?

What does the Prime Minister intend to do regarding this matter? What action is the government going to take?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any emergency situation in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but I should be very glad to bring to their attention the observations of my right hon. friend and ask them to report on that matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State might be able to supply or supplement the lack of information the Prime Minister has given the house. What action is being taken in this connection? I ask this because I came in here originally intending to move the adjournment of the house, it is so serious a matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Instead of doing that I felt information should be forthcoming.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had a telegram at noon from Mr. Leiterman giving the text of a statement he had given out. I have not anything further from him, from management, or from the individuals named. The telegram indicates that Mr. Leiterman understands that two other producers are considering similar action. The programs mentioned are "Seven Days", "Document" and "Quarterly Report".

I should imagine that management will be dealing with this statement and with any action taken by Mr. Leiterman and the other two men, if such action is taken. There is also a reference to the "Compass" series.

I do not know that a delay of a day or so will constitute any sort of emergency with respect to the matter. The programs are prepared over some length of time in advance. It would seem to me that this is the kind of decision for which parliament selects managing officers and instructs them to manage. I would not suggest to the house that any of us would be in a position to decide whether this could be a matter of emergency. Certainly it will be some months before the fall season starts, some time in September or October. Another day or so surely will not have any effect on the matter.

I have no doubt that the president, vice president and the board will be making some statement later in the day and taking appropriate action.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. lady, the Secretary of State, feels that the proposed move to Toronto of Mr. H. G. Walker by the corporation is within the spirit of the Keate report, or the report of the parliamentary committee on broadcasting, or the white paper for that matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this question in this form is acceptable. The hon. member will recognize that when he asks a question about the removing or moving of employees and the spirit of a report, that is certainly not a question which should be asked now.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): My question to the Secretary of State is supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State confirm whether the production staff ceased working at noon today? Also, I point out to her that the program "Compass" is not a fall program, but is scheduled for this Sunday.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not know whether in fact that action has been taken, but Mr. Leiterman is a very determined man. He says in this telegram which I received at noon that he is going to stop his staff working at noon, and I assume he did.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State inform the house whether it is true that Mr. Walker has been appointed vice president for the Toronto area following the director's meeting yesterday?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I heard this rumour yesterday, and I at once had the president contacted. I was informed that he had made a statement; I am not certain whether it was yesterday or this morning. Perhaps I might read it to the house:

> I note that rumours are circulating that Mr. H. G. Walker had been appointed to the senior vice presidential position at Toronto referred to in the recent parliamentary committee report and in the statement which I issued yesterday on behalf of the C.B.C. board of directors. These rumours which began in Toronto yesterday afternoon and have since been given further currency on radio and television are false. The idea of establishing positions of certain V.P.'s at Toronto and Montreal was accepted by the board less than a week ago and there certainly has been no time to consider appointments to them.

MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Could the minister tell the house whether it is true that construction of the C.B.C. building in Montreal has slowed down and that this is not one of the immediate projects of the C.B.C.?

[English]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I think I know to what the hon. member refers. The new minister without portfolio apparently did not understand the situation in Quebec. The statement which was given at the time at a press conference a week or so ago in Montreal is an accurate statement, and the maquette which was shown represents the building to be constructed.

It will be noted that the white paper tabled the day before yesterday indicated the government's approval of the construction. It also indicated that construction itself will not take place until past the peak of Expo construction, for the obvious reason that sufficient skilled people in the building trades are not available for all building tasks. So construction will be delayed in order to take the pressure off the demand for construction at Expo in the last month or so before its opening.

I am informed by Mr. Ouimet that the call for tenders has gone out. To my knowledge no replies have been received as yet. Excavation will not be started until October. I am told this will be one of the biggest excavations ever made. The digging will go on and the forms for the building and the foundations will be laid. It is not anticipated that the excavation will be completed until the spring of 1967 when construction will probably commence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. After hearing the minister's reply I have come to the conclusion that the question should have been placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that the question is not so urgent that he must obtain the information immediately, and I would suggest he put it on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSAL BY UN SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask this question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In fact I gave him notice of it, but in his absence I should like to address it to the Prime Minister.

In view of the continuing escalation of the war in Viet Nam would the Prime Minister give consideration to the possibility of consulting with the governments of the United Kingdom, France and other countries of western Europe for the purpose of making a joint appeal to the government of the United States to implement the proposal of Secretary General U Thant that the bombing of North Viet Nam be stopped as a first step toward possible peace negotiations.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would be glad, of course, to give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion, but I would point out that we are in close touch already with the governments to which he has referred and which share our concern to find a basis on which negotiations can be started looking toward peace in Viet Nam.

I am not convinced, however, that we have reached the stage where public appeals to one side or the other are likely to be more productive of results than the kind of diplomatic efforts upon which we have been engaged over recent weeks and months. With regard to the particular proposal of the Secretary General of the United Nations I do not think I can go beyond the reply given to a similar question by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on June 21.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ACCIDENT RESEARCH CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry who is responsible to the house for the National Research Council. It is based on a National Research Council news release issued today in which the statement is made that a council study group has urged the Canadian government to establish a national motor vehicle accident research centre to find ways of reducing the number and seriousness of accidents on Canadian roads and highways. I should like to ask the minister whether the government is giving serious consideration to this recommendation and when we might expect an announcement with regard to it.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the government is giving serious consideration to this recommendation and would not like to set a deadline for an announcement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have any of the provincial governments requested that a meeting be held between the provincial ministers of health and himself regarding the medicare legislation which is expected to follow the medicare resolution, No. 82 on the order paper today? If so, does the minister expect to call such a federal-provincial conference in the immediate future?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the minister of health for the province of Alberta has requested me to convene a meeting of ministers of health and I sent out telegrams, almost immediately upon receipt of that request, to all the other ministers of health in Canada. It will depend on the response received whether such a meeting will be convened. Certainly if there is an interest in having such a meeting at an early date I shall be happy to convene it.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT BY BUSINESS COMMUNITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Were the results of his conference with businessmen in Toronto yesterday such as to convince him that Expo '67 will receive the necessary support from the business community in Canada to make it a resounding success?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we had a very good conference yesterday in Toronto at which four companies and the Salvation Army announced their participation in and sponsorship of projects at Expo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winters: Expo, however, is still not receiving the full measure of support it merits from private enterprise. Participating in Canadian institutions is one of the important principles of good corporate citizenship. The principles of good corporate citizenship were uniformly well received, and on the strength of that I expect that more Canadian companies will now wish to participate in Expo.

[Mr. Drury.]

BROADCASTING

STUDY OF COAST TO COAST SERVICES IN BOTH LANGUAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State which relates to the recently released white paper on broadcasting. On page 9 it states:

> The time has also come to consider full national network services in both official languages from coast to coast, and a detailed study of all aspects of this question will be undertaken forthwith.

In view of that statement is the hon. lady in a position to tell us when this study will be undertaken and by whom it will be carried out?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, it has been undertaken. The word "forthwith" was inscribed on paper some weeks ago before the document was printed. I understand it is being done under the aegis of my learned and cultured friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Secretary of State. I wonder whether the hon. lady could tell us how the regional broadcasting councils which are mentioned in the white paper on broadcasting will be established, and if it is possible that these councils will be set up without reference to parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the question is out of order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF BRIEF FROM HALIFAX "DOCKYARD" COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, to give more gravity to our discussion may I direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence and ask him would he advise the house whether he has received a brief from the dockyard trades and labour council in Halifax and, if so, will he assure them and the Atlantic community, and indeed the whole nation, that he will meet with them in the very near future for the purpose discussing the contents of that brief?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received that brief, and I am pleased to inform the hon. member that I have written this morning to the president of the dockyard trades and labour council, telling him I am trying to arrange the requested meeting with representatives of the Department of National Defence and Treasury Board, and I hope it will take place within two weeks' time as requested.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TORONTO—REPORTED AGREEMENT TO SELL SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I take this opportunity to answer a question asked of me yesterday by the hon. member for York-Scarborough concerning Sunnybrook hospital in Toronto. A draft agreement with respect to this hospital has now been completed and concurred in by representatives of the government and the province of Ontario. It has not been signed, as it must await the passage of enabling legislation by the province.

The agreement will actually be with the governors of the University of Toronto and a new corporation, to be known as Sunnybrook hospital, rather than with the province directly. I am pleased to report also that veterans will continue to have priority of admittance to Sunnybrook hospital.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF BOX CARS TO MOVE GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as reporting to the house for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that there are only 21 shipping days left before the end of the crop year, July 31, will the minister confer with his colleague the Minister of Transport in order to see that sufficient box cars are directed to several grain congested areas in western Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the Canadian Wheat Board within the last 24 hours and they are doing everything possible to equalize quotas. I think the railways this year have done a magnificent job, and I would like to put that on record.

LABOUR RELATIONS

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING ALLEGED PROVISION OF COMPULSORY ARBITRATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has he received complaints from members of the I.L.A. regarding the industrial inquiry commission to be set up? Further, has he been informed that during the progress of discussions, at which the Prime Minister was present, it was made celar by the representatives of the International Longshoremen's Association that nothing that was done in the setting up of a commission should in any way bring about final and binding decisions? Would the minister tell the house and the country what actually took place in this regard, and what representations were made by the I.L.A. representatives and accepted by the government?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part, the premise to the right hon. gentleman's question, I can say that that statement is not accurate. When the legislation comes before the house, certain of my cabinet colleagues and I will have full, detailed statements to make, statements that could not be made on orders of the day. In the meantime we will give consideration to the request made to the Prime Minister yesterday by the right hon. member for York South for the tabling of certain documents. They will be filed, I hope, within the next 24 hours.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you for calling me right honourable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For the sake of clarity, what did the minister mean when he said that the first part of the question was inaccurate? What portion of the question was inaccurate; and I ask this because I was depending entirely on information from the I.L.A.

Mr. Nicholson: It is hard to take statements out of context but I can say this, as I did in answer to a question put by the hon. member for York South some days ago; that before the settlement was agreed upon there was an assurance that legislation would be introduced, and the longshoremen had full knowledge of that fact before the settlement was reached.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it also understood that any decision made by the commission would be binding and irrevocable?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nicholson: This is part of the difficulty when you get into debate, and this is becoming a debate. I think when the documents are tabled, which I have assured the house will be done within the next 24 hours, I hope, that this will be clear to all hon. members.

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE TROUBLE FOLLOWING IMPRISONMENT OF UNION OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour which I asked yesterday of the Solicitor General with respect to the imprisoned longshoremen on the west coast. In the minister's absence I asked the Solicitor General whether consideration would be given to using the powers of the governor in council by way of pardon, remission or otherwise, to have these men freed as soon as possible. The Solicitor General said he proposed to take the question as notice so he would have an opportunity to discuss it with the minister. Has the minister any information on that point?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when the question was put yesterday I was on my way back from the west coast. After prior consultation with the Prime Minister and while in Vancouver on Monday of this week, I met with representatives of both parties, including two of the leaders of the I.L.W.A. I have been able to give a brief report to the Prime Minister, relating to the request for clemency, but I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss the information I gathered with my colleagues the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. I hope to do so today, and the matter will shortly come before cabinet for consideration.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister with respect to the important meetings now being held here in Ottawa with delegates from the Caribbean nations. Will the Prime Minister give the house a report and reassert the government's determination to make the results of these meetings lasting and fruitful?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I will be glad to give that assurance of our desire and intention. If I leave the house in the next minute it will be for that purpose.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD MEASURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government house leader, and ask whether he would consider bringing forward order No. 83 which has to do with the measure to establish an immigration appeal board. My purpose in making this suggestion for his consideration is that it would give an opportunity for Canadians of ethnic origin and others to study the bill and prepare their briefs. We in our party on this side of the house are prepared to pass this resolution without any debate provided the government house leader can obtain the same assurance from the other groups in this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): We are ready to say to the Minister of Public Works that there will be no objection from our group.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is our position too, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): We are in agreement with such a suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the splendid co-operation we could call it as the first item today.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the same matter, I should like to ask the government leader to hold public meetings of house leaders in the House of Commons, in order that we might always obtain such speedy results as we had today.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO RECLASSIFICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on June 30 the hon. member from Halifax inquired of me about the classification revision program as it affects the Department of National Defence. I am informed that the department is today issuing letters to its personnel officers across Canada defining the effect of the classification revision program and outlining how employees are to be informed of the effect of the program as it concerns them.

Hon. members should also not lose sight of the fact that the revision program is being carried out as a prelude to the era of collective bargaining. One of the basic purposes of the pay conversion rules is to provide, as far as is possible, a system of classifications that will enable collective bargaining to be carried out in an orderly fashion. I must also point out that contrary to the impression that seems to have been created, a good number of employees are benefiting from the conversion; that is, they are green circled.

One further point is that the conversion program is not, as some quarters have indicated, a device to save money, since the additional cost of implementation of the program is expected to be about 2 per cent of the present payroll.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask this question of the Prime Minister, but in his absence I should like to direct it to the Minister of Industry. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has received a letter from the provincial member for Bruce in which that member states that unless a commitment made by the government concerning the designation of the Kincardine area is honoured, he would in future not be able to associate himself with any further declarations.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not believe the original question was in order. The hon. member might try to put a separate question.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, with all deference the minister did answer the question; but I will rephrase the question I wish to put to the Minister of Industry. Is the minister aware that in regard to the request put forward by this particular Liberal member of the Ontario legislature, this was proposed by his supporters and by the government in the last election campaign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question appears to be out of order for many reasons.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION REGULATING PRIVATE PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when we may see on the order paper the legislation regulating pensions which come under federal jurisdiction.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I expect the hon. gentleman will be able to satisfy his curiosity tomorrow or the next day.

AIRPORTS

SYDNEY, N.S.—POSSIBLE OPERATION ON PART TIME BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to that learned and cultured gentleman the Minister of Transport. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he is in a position today to reply to the question I posed on Monday in reference to the reported curtailment of operations at the Sydney airport.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, sir. Since I do not seem to be able to find the answer among my papers I will do it by memory and correct it tomorrow if I am wrong.

It has been the opinion of the technical officers of the department that between midnight and I think eight in the morning the local air traffic control is not necessary because other arrangements are being made to meet that problem. As for the airport itself, it will be open all the time.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the hon. gentleman whether similar steps are going to be taken in the province of Newfoundland with reference to airports in that area.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there have been equally great curtailments in the province of Newfoundland. I regret any curtailment of any sort in either of these provinces.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask the Minister of Transport, who laments the curtailment of air facilities, whether he has the same dismay over the curtailment in respect of the maintenance base of Air Canada at Winnipeg.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to rejoice over the immense new air cargo base being built by Air Canada at Winnipeg, and I am sure the hon. gentleman does too.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR NEW VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport to answer the question I asked on Monday.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I would be glad to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I could remember what it was. Perhaps he might refresh my memory.

Mr. MacEwan: May I say on that point that the minister made quite a good announcement on the Canadian Coast Guard vessels and so on, and it is something he should not forget.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is expected that the first tender will be called before July 15.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CUSTOMS OFFICERS—PROTESTS RESPECTING CLASSIFICATION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I should like to ask him whether he has received a resolution passed by the branch presidents of the customs and excise officers association protesting the implementation of the classification revision program, particularly because of the fact that as a result of this reclassification as many as 40 per cent of their members in an administrative support category have been reduced and downgraded. What is the reaction of the minister to the complaint received from this very responsible body?

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not as yet seen the particular telegram mentioned by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I should point out to him, however, that as a result of the group B revision which took place last week a good many customs and excise officers will be taken out of the red circled positions. In addition, officers of the association were in touch with my deputy minister last week and within the department we are examining all the people who are red circled. We are considering whether they can qualify for movement to other positions, and so on.

Also I should like to point out that every person who is red circled has been red circled by the Civil Service Commission and the individuals have the right of appeal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the information I have is from a telegram of the day before yesterday. I should like to ask the minister this. What is the reaction of the government to the request for a regulatory group distinct and separate from the clerical group for people performing regulatory functions?

Mr. Benson: As I said, this particular telegram has not yet come to my attention. Therefore I could not react to this particular question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will you tomorrow?

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to advise hon. members that the question period has expired. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) may ask a supplementary question tomorrow.

• (3:20 p.m.)

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish an Immigration Appeal Board and to make provision for appeals thereto in respect of certain matters relating to immigration and to provide for the appointment, remuneration and expenses of the members of the board and the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the conduct of the work of the board.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution to establish an Immigration Appeal Board. Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Marchand thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an Immigration Appeal Board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BANK ACT

DECENNIAL REVISION AND EXTENSION OF CHARTERS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 5, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Rinfret in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1976, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, after the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) last night outlining the decennial revision of the Bank Act, I am pleased to support the attitude of the government which is giving the public a thorough reform of our financial system.

However, before discussing that resolution in detail, allow me to make a few comments on the reactions we have had about it so far. It is interesting to note that in the house last night the various spokesmen for the opposition parties adopted rather surprising and unrelated stands.

The Leader of the Opposition blamed the government for disregarding the proposal made by Mr. Justice Porter who recommended in 1964 the complete and immediate removal of the ceiling. He seemed to misunderstand the attitude of the Minister of Finance who said that in the present economic circumstances it is not possible to remove the ceiling immediately but that when the monetary situation has improved in the country, we will be able to remove it. Moreover, if he had paid the slightest attention, he would have understood that the recommendation of the Porter Commission will eventually be implemented in our present system.

As far as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) is concerned, it is surprising to hear him say that he is not against the principle of removing the interest ceiling but that on the other hand, he is against the removal.

It is hard to understand that one can be in favour of a principle and against its application.

As far as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) is concerned, he says that his business experience has led him to make numerous transactions with banks and that, although there is a ceiling on the interest rate, he has always paid more than 6 per cent, and he is asking the government to maintain what he himself considers useless, namely a ceiling rate of 6 per cent.

And, of course, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) agrees that more flexibility is needed in our system, that some loans at 6 per cent are not adequate and do not bring the banks enough, and I think that he shares the government's opinion on that matter.

I was pleased this morning to note that despite certain insinuations that we read in the newspapers, the president of the Royal Bank, Mr. McLaughlin, seemed very annoyed and dissatisfied with the present reforms. But, Mr. Chairman, we did not take action in the interest of banks, with all due deference to Mr. McLaughlin, but in the interest of the Canadian public.

This decennial revision will certainly be welcomed by the newspapers and the public as the most radical measure since the institution of the Bank of Canada about 30 years ago. It will likely increase the confidence of the public in our banking institutions and in any future decisions of the government concerning the monetary policy of our country.

Since the submission of the Porter report in February 1964, a great deal has been written and said on the reform of our financial system, on the evils paralysing the efficiency of that system and on the possible cure. To sum up what the public in general pointed out, it is the absence of an actual and aggressive competition between the various financial institutions.

It is easy to note that the Minister of Finance has decided to implement the necessary reforms for such a competition between all levels of financial institutions in Canada, and I think he should be very warmly commended.

Analysing the minister's statement, we realize immediately that the present banking reform deals with the very structure of our institutions and extends to their methods of dealing with the public.

Contrary to what the newspapers and commentators led us to believe recently, the minister's plan goes much beyond a simple change in the ceiling of interest rates. It grapples also with the very structure of the board of directors of banks, the qualifications of directors, and requires the disclosure of their reserve, of all kinds. It increases their field of action by allowing them to make mortgage loans; it sets up insurance for deposits and, moreover, it prohibits agreements between banks to fix interest rates.

The first point I should like to discuss, Mr. Chairman, is that of the ceiling on interest rates which has given rise in the last few weeks to much public curiosity. The Minister of Finance has just announced in his speech that the government intends to remove the present ceiling on the rate of interest charged by banks, when economic and monetary conditions in Canada are such that the decision of the government will not lead to unduly high rates of interest on bank loans.

The 6 per cent ceiling was adopted some 40 years ago, when the money market was entirely different from what it is now.

Indeed, at that time the rate of interest on bank loans or government loans was 1, 2 or 3 per cent, while the ceiling was 6 per cent. That ceiling gave a great deal of flexibility and elasticity to the banks, as there was a differential of at least 3 per cent between the normal rate on the market and the ceiling provided for by the act. That statutory ceiling has not been changed in 40 years. What was a ceiling then, is almost a floor now. Obviously, it is now an obstacle to normal money transactions; it has fostered the development of certain institutions which, using this lack of freedom for the banks, take an unfair advantage of such borrowers as have little credit, and occasionally charge them usurious rates of interest.

Under the present system, Mr. Chairman, big borrowers definitely have an edge over small people who need money. As banks have become the cheapest source of capital supply for corporate and individual borrowers, since there is a 6 per cent ceiling on interest rates, there developed recently a practice which clearly discriminates against small borrowers.

Generally speaking, the small borrower who comes to a bank gets a loan at a rate higher than 6 per cent, since the banks have found a legal way to make personal loans at 9 and 10 per cent. This means that small borrowers, whom some people want to protect through a 6 per cent interest rate, enjoy no protection whatsoever in the present context.

It follows that the 6 per cent bank loan market is available to two particular types of borrowers, that is small businessmen and industrialists and big businessmen and industrialists.

As banks are limited to a 6 per cent ceiling, there is absolutely no leeway possible—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member is now seriously misleading the house. A while ago, he said that banks lend money at 9 and 10 per cent and then he says that there is a 6 per cent ceiling. The hon. member would have to make up his mind between the two. Is it a 6 per cent ceiling, or do banks lend at 10 per cent?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by the hon. member—he should first allow me to finish my speech—I actually said the ceiling of interest is set at 6 per cent, but that banks have the right, nevertheless, to grant personal loans at a higher level than 6 per cent.

Mr. Grégoire: There is no ceiling.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member should know that there is a difference between a business loan, an industrial loan and a personal loan.

Mr. Grégoire: There is no ceiling, then.

Mr. Chrétien: Just listen, and you will understand. We are advocating a sound system rather than a money printing machine.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, banks are restricted to a 6 per cent ceiling and they are strictly prevented from speculating on the rate of interest when called upon to consider granting a loan to a particular person. Instead of diversifying their loans according to the risk involved and charge 6 per cent to some borrowers and 7 or 8 per cent to others, according to the risk, since they are not allowed any latitude at all, banks are forced to make loans at the best possible risks, at the expense of small borrowers who always have less security to offer than big borrowers. This ceiling results in an imbalance, because it deprives the banks of full discretion to vary the rate of interest according to the risks involved.

Right now, the small manufacturers and businessmen who cannot do business with the banks are forced to deal with other financial institutions from which they borrow at considerably higher interest rates, sometimes up to 15 and 20 per cent.

The irony of it is that those financial institutions other than banks, lending money at rates much higher than the banks, are often supplied with capital by the banks—

Mr. Grégoire: They are supplied by the banks.

Mr. Chrétien: —at the rate of 6 per cent, and then they lend such capital at higher interest rates to small consumers who cannot at this time do business with the banks.

Mr. Gauthier: They belong to the banks.

Mr. Grégoire: Those institutions belong to the banks.

Mr. Gauthier: They have the same directors.

Mr. Chrétien: Obviously, it is hurting the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) to hear us talking of bank reform—

Mr. Grégoire: It does not hurt me, it makes me laugh.

Mr. Guay: Read the speech of the member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and you will have more to laugh about.

Mr. Chrétien: Consequently, Mr. Chairman, there appears, between the small borrower and the banks, a useless middleman who increases considerably the cost of money. If the present ceiling on the interest rate were inexistent, the banks could possibly be in a position to lend to the small businessman or the small manufacturer with less security at a rate of 7 or 8 per cent. The banks would then be able to cover the additional risk and these people would not have to turn to finance companies.

The removal of the ceiling on the rate of interest, when financial conditions allow, will result in greater competition on the money market and banks will be able to compete with other financial institutions with regard to all sorts of loans. This competition will then diminish the rate of interest.

The following is the best example of this fact. A few years ago, when only finance companies gave personal loans—for the banks had not found a legal way to do it—the rate of interest was much higher.

When banks began to deal with personal loans, competing with finance companies and other similar institutions, the rate of interest on personal loans fell to about 9, 10 and 11 per cent instead of the former 15, 16 and 17 per cent.

Thus we have seen, these last few years, the rate of interest on small loans become stabilized at around 10 per cent. Therefore, if the present reform allows banks to deal with all types of loans, including mortgage loans, this additional competition on the Canadian loan market will lower the rate of interest, for there will be greater competition to attract borrowers, and I think everyone will profit thereby.

You will perhaps allow me to give you an example—

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Will the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Chrétien: After my speech, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: After your speech?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Grégoire: And what about Lacombe Act?

Mr. Chrétien: I will answer the hon. member for Lapointe that, personally, I am not a graduate of the Lacombe Act.

Mr. Grégoire: In financial law?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to a case which struck me tremendously and shows very clearly the existing gap in our system.

Some large companies and municipal corporations misuse the system in this way: as bank interest rates for company loans to the corporations cannot exceed 6 per cent, some big borrowers request short-term bank loans at this rate under the usual pretences.

For instance, a company intended some time ago to go on the security market to finance an undertaking of $5 million. Those people went to a banker and explained their problem. They said: We will go on the security market in three months to borrow $5 million; since we urgently need funds, could you lend us immediately $5 million at 6 per cent for three months?

Of course, the bank which is an institution to finance large companies on a short-term and long-term basis agreed to lend them $5 million at 6 per cent. When the three-month period expired, the banker asked that company to reimburse the $5 million. The company which, three months before, has given the banker a letter saying that it intended to go on the market in the following weeks told him: Unfortunately, we are not in a position to pay you back, we are no longer interested in going on the market, because if we do we will not pay 6 per cent but 6½ per cent.

And so, instead of giving a temporary loan of $5 million for three months, the bank had to extend the term of the loan over a period of months and even years. Consequently, it did not have that $5 million to loan small borrowers. Moreover, there was no way for it to force the company to borrow on the market. Naturally, this unbalance was due to the fact that banks are not supposed to finance long term projects; they are intended to provide short term loans to those companies.

The net result is that the banks' important source of short term funds is exhausted for the benefit of large companies; the small borrower, the small merchant and the small industrialist must turn to the near-banks, to which the ceiling does not apply, to borrow money at interest rates of 12, 14 and 15 per cent instead of borrowing from banks for perhaps 7 or 8 per cent, depending on their ability to reimburse and their credit rate.

May I be permitted, on this score, to quote from an editorial published in the newspaper Le Devoir for Tuesday, June 28, 1966 over the signature of Mr. Claude Ryan:

If the banks are to play a dynamic role within our financial system, for what reason should they be bound by limits which, if they were strictly observed, would reduce them to marginal factors in the system. In fact, the current situation breaks down the borrowers into two classes: the safe borrowers (generally the large borrowers) who are the primary beneficiaries of the 6 per cent loan system and the others—the small businessmen, the small manufacturers, the thousands upon thousands of individuals—who are being blindly cast into the maws of the 10 per cent and over lenders. Paradoxically, those who favour higher interest rates are running the risk of being considered as big, bad wolves while, in fact, the puritanical maintenance of the prevailing dichotomic situation seems much more contrary to the real benefit of the public.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

I could also quote another editorial from a newspaper which is the mouthpiece of small businessmen, asking for the removal of this ceiling, which is unfavourable to the small businessmen.

[English]

We have said before in these columns that small business is often too big a risk at the rate of six per cent interest for the bank to touch him. We have often said that the ceiling should either be raised or removed altogether to make small business more attractive to the banks.

[Translation]

And this newspaper is the official mouthpiece of small businessmen in Ontario.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair to say it is of the utmost importance for us to take the necessary steps in order to rectify the situation as concerns our banking system, namely: to play an energetic and positive part in our economy and, to this end, our banks must, by all means, compete with one another, so as to secure the best rate and service possible for consumers. At present, there is no competition at all between banks, since they have no freedom at all, and with such a system, instead of providing loans under some kind of competition, they are using discretion that often promotes only the interests of the friends of the system and the people close to our major banking institutions.

On this point, I am happy to see that the Minister of Finance mentioned in his speech that he would take the necessary steps to prevent banks from agreeing among themselves to set a rate of interest to be paid on deposits and a rate of interest they would charge on the loans they make. The rate should be fixed by competition, and that is how we will see real competition between all our financial institutions. That will be greatly helped if this liberalization of the Canada Bank Act promotes the establishment of new banks in Canada.

I am also happy to see that the house passed yesterday the bill establishing the Bank of Western Canada. I am glad the minister mentioned in his speech yesterday that the government wishes to see many new banks established, so as to promote competition between these vital institutions in our system.

As the hon. member for Lapointe is familiar with the banking system, he may try to have a bank of his own.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for St-Maurice-Laflèche but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: He may continue—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Chrétien: Just one more word, Mr. Chairman. I referred only to one point of this banking reform. There are many other measures which are important and which should be taken into serious consideration.

For instance, there are mortgage loans and consumer credit; in fact, the minister announced that there would be a federal-provincial conference to consider the subject of consumer credit in Canada. The minister also suggested that bank directors should not be directors of trust companies or "near-banks" in the future, that banks will not be able to hold more than 10 per cent of shares of any Canadian corporations.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the present reform of the Bank Act is a reform in depth, a necessary reform which will renew our banking system; it will allow, between a great many institutions, a competition that will be of great benefit to our system and to all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member who has just spoken very kindly said I could ask him a question at the end of his remarks. We are at the resolution stage but he went into quite a bit of detail. I plead with him and the minister to make public the details of how they intend to permit the interest rate to be relaxed. Otherwise the opposition, which is not going to see the bill since it is not going to be moved to the second reading stage, will not be able to debate the details of the measure. The government is aware of these details. Will the parliamentary secretary or the minister reveal these details at the resolution stage, even though this debate has been almost a second reading type of debate. This would enable the opposition to have details it does not have—

Some hon. Members: Ask the question.

Mr. Grafftey: All right. Would the government make known the details of how they intend to let the interest rate go up so the opposition can have the same advantage as government members.

Mr. Chrétien: That is not a question; it is a statement.

Mr. Sharp: May I be permitted to reply to the hon. member. No member of the house, other than the ministry, is privy to the contents of the bill so everyone is debating on the same basis. We are discussing now the advisability of introducing a bill. I went further in explaining the general principles of this bill than I would ordinarily have done. I do not think it would be proper for me at this stage to give the details of the actual contents of the bill itself. If I were to put these details on the record I would be required to give several paragraphs of explanation. I hope hon. gentlemen will accept my explanation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why the selective information? Why don't you give us the full story?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said that it would require several paragraphs to give the committee this information. I think it really should have been given. We do not know how the interest rate is going to be raised. We do not have that formula, and I believe it is unfair to ask us to debate the measure in the light of the existing situation. The first part of the resolution, Mr. Chairman, reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1976,—

I wish to deal with this first part of the resolution for a moment. It is a very simple resolution thus far and quite understandable. The Bank Act must come up for revision every ten years and the charters of the banks must be renewed at this time. Actually this revision should have taken place in 1964. We distinctly remember the delay which occurred at that time. Eventually, I think on May 6, 1965, one version of the Bank Act revisions was presented to us.

Second reading was given to that particular version and we were supposed to have studied it in committee last autumn. This opportunity never came about because of the election being called. Subsequently, of course, we did extend the Bank Act for a period. I believe it runs out now on December 30, or November 30 of this year. I agree completely with the first part of this resolution. However, the second part of the resolution reads as follows:

> —and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

This is where we have some difference of opinion, in relation to these certain changes in connection with the administration of the act. As we all know, I am sure, the banking system in Canada has given excellent service to the people of this country. I think Canadian citizens have a feeling of security which not all the citizens of other countries have. We have considered the banks to be a bulwark, and in this connection we must pay credit to the Inspector General of Banks, who for many years has had the policing job to do. I believe he has done it energetically and efficiently. It must be remembered that while the banks are in business to make money, and I have no quarrel whatever with that objective, I do feel, however, that they should be considered as a rather select group of corporations which have an obligation to serve the Canadian people. Our job as members of parliament is to see that Canadians are served to the best of their interests by the banks.

I do not think that the citizens of Canada, Mr. Chairman, are being so served by this government in its present amendments to the act. This government has not met the threat of inflation or the rising cost of living and is not doing anything to meet those situations now. I have in mind the interests of the small businessman, the farmer and the small borrower. These people are not going to receive any benefit from the proposed amendments to the Bank Act. I have heard and read that the tight money which we now have is probably going to get tighter. This cannot be allowed to happen. But this government, Mr. Chairman, is obviously accepting the situation and doing nothing about it.

The minister last evening outlined in general terms what he referred to as certain proposed amendments to the Bank Act. I cannot help but emphasize that they were certainly in very general terms. Of course, the one main item of the whole group of amendments that is of interest to all of the Canadian people is the interest rate amendment. The present ceiling on interest is 6 per cent, but in this respect we are really very little wiser than when the minister began his comments. The minister suggested that it should be tied to the average market yield on short-term government bonds. I am assuming that there will be some fixed percentage over and above the average yield but at the moment, of course, we do not know. We are told that we will find out.

[Mr. Monteith.]

The minister also suggested last evening that when this bill goes to the finance, trade and economic affairs committee for study it would be a good idea to examine this formula very closely to see whether it is the best alternative. I can assure him, Mr. Chairman, that that examination will be given.

However, let me repeat that we are still in the dark as to just what the interest rate is going to be and how it will operate. I suppose that a floating rate of this nature, as you might call it, might have some merit in the case of very credit-worthy risks, but I do not see how this can be of any assistance, as I said earlier, to the small businessman, the farmer or the small borrower. They are the ones who are going to suffer. They are the ones who will be forced to go to other money lenders and will have to pay much higher interest rates.

While there may be some connection between the rate on government bonds and the general requirements of the economy, there are other features affecting the price of government bonds, such as stock market prices, whichever stock happens to be the more attractive, the United States money market situation, deficit or surplus financing of the Canadian economy, balancing of international payments and so on. They may or may not be consistent with the needs of the economy and of business but, sir, all these factors are going to affect the interest rate for business borrowers. It is like trying to find the correct price of bananas by analysing the demand for and supply of fish eggs, or you can use any other comparison. It is going to be just about as difficult as that.

On the whole, as far as these amendments go I claim that the Porter Commission report might just as well have been forgotten. The commission might just as well have not met. The minister could have produced the amendments which he has put before us and has outlined in such a vague way without any report at all.

I should like to refer to the two main recommendations made in the Porter Commission report, and I think they go hand in hand. One was to the effect that the near banks should be brought under federal control. The other was the removal of the interest ceiling. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that these two go together hand in hand.

If such a procedure had been adopted, then I think it would be fair to all concerned. As it is, we are not getting competition. The near banks are going to be left to operate on their own. These institutions should be brought under federal control so that banks and what we call, for facility's sake, near banks, should all have to meet the same competitive situation. This is not so today. This piecemeal effort does not improve the situation at all.

I claim, Mr. Chairman, that these amendments are only a smokescreen to try to cover up and preserve some semblance of unity in the Liberal party. The government did not have the intestinal fortitude to face up to the situation. It has waffled for months. The legislation has been on and then off; the government just would not take a stand.

One of the suggestions outlined by the minister last night—we do not know the details of this either, of course—was that the banks are to be allowed to lend money on conventional mortgages. We do not know what formula is to be used, and I am assuming we will learn this when the bill is presented.

I agree in principle with this move and also with the suggestion of the minister that banks be allowed to borrow money on debentures. Otherwise, where in the world would the small businessman and the small borrower come into the picture if the banks were not allowed to borrow money on debentures or to borrow in some other way? Certainly if they are going to supply the mortgage market someone will suffer unless the banks are in a position to receive more deposits. I realize that these debentures will have a secondary position to deposits, and that is understandable. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, these funds have got to be available to the banks if the conventional borrowers with whom we are concerned are not to be penalized.

Another point mentioned by the minister was that the government is going to continue with the retroactive legislation in respect of Bill C-102. The legislation will be similar to last year. This is to penalize the Mercantile Bank.

I have no brief for the Mercantile Bank as such but I do suggest to the minister that he is inviting retaliation by bringing in such legislation. I also suggest that it is anything but a good principle to make legislation retroactive. I think the dangerous part of the particular item in the suggested amendments is that the legislation is going to be retroactive. The minister is asking for serious trouble and retaliation by bringing forward this measure.

The minister did not tell us how the cash reserves are to be reduced somewhat. The cash reserves on deposit now are 8 per cent. The minister said, I think, that they are going to be reduced to something less than 7 per cent.

Mr. Sharp: May I, for clarification, ask the hon. member if he did not look at the speech to which I referred in my remarks yesterday which I made when I introduced the Bank of Canada Act and in which I set out the basis on which the cash reserves would be fixed?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I point out that I am not quarreling with this move but we should know something about it. The reduction in the reserves from 8 per cent to something in the neighborhood of 7 per cent will allow the banks to earn money on 1 per cent, plus a fraction, of these reserves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On which they do not get any interest.

Mr. Monteith: They get no interest on the 8 per cent. Frankly, I do not think it is quite fair to ask any business to have 8 per cent of its funds cached away, if you like, without that money earning interest. Perhaps those reserves should be put into treasury bills and thereby earn something. Treasury bills are as good as cash reserves. I am not quarreling with the fact that the banks will earn interest on the extra 1 per cent. But that fact should be kept in mind.

I simply repeat, Mr. Chairman, that we know nothing really at this stage of the proceedings and yet we are asked to support the resolution. I cannot support something we know nothing about. Last evening the hon. member for Kamloops and I both tried to find out what people will be asked to pay in interest rates. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi this afternoon tried his best to find out, but the minister would not tell us.

I am convinced, sir, that true and proper competition is not being provided by this resolution. The 6 per cent ceiling on all types of loans is not maintained now. We all know about pre-discounts which are given to evade the 6 per cent rate. I am not prepared to speak of the legality of this practice.

I recall that in the discussions on this subject when the banking and commerce committee sat in 1954 on the then revision of the Bank Act there were legal opinions one way and another. The situation as it stands should be remedied. There are different opinions about the Bank Act, and I think the legality of the question I have raised should be straightened out.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, if the government had followed the Porter Commission report in its entirety and particularly if the government had brought the near banks within the jurisdiction of the Bank Act, thus providing real competition and giving the small business person and the large business equal opportunities, my position would be different. As the situation is, sir, I cannot support the resolution.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, there has been evidence in the speeches on the opposition side, both this afternoon and last evening, of some dissatisfaction with the statement that the minister made on the basis that it did not provide sufficient information for the opposition to deal with this matter. Notwithstanding that complaint, the opposition nevertheless has been able to make statements of far reaching consequence which would seem to contradict their earlier statements. I think it is consistent, however, with the procedure at this stage of debate that this matter should follow the course that has been followed with regard to resolutions. There is nothing inconsistent in relation to the practice of this chamber in debating the resolution stage of a bill. Therefore I do not think that the complaints stand on any solid foundation.

One of the responsibilities, it seems to me, of government and parliament in this matter is to look at the effectiveness of our existing financial policy in order to determine ways and means of strengthening that policy so that it may better serve the requirements of our economy. In this discussion we must be concerned about the adequacy of our financial system to meet the needs of our society in an efficient and creative way. We must have a properly functioning financial system which will serve the needs of the greatest possible number of people.

In attempting to achieve this laudable goal we ought to take into consideration the past record and effectiveness of our financial policies and financial system. We must have as far as possible a reasonable understanding of the changes which have taken place in our economy, and we must also consider wider problems which confront our economy so that we may be better able to understand the role that financial policies may be expected to play in the country's development.

[Mr. Monteith.]

If a financial system is not adequately fulfilling its functions, or is fulfilling them in an improper or imperfect way, the result will surely be an adverse effect on the economy. I would therefore suggest once again that providing as much flexibility and as much scope as possible to meet the demands for highly developed borrowing facilities which are part of any complex economy is something that is necessary.

One of the main requisites of a financial system in the present day and in the future Canada is a high degree of flexibility. One of the most frequent criticisms of the present system and the present policies has to do with the lack of flexibility and the desirable degree of competition to meet adequately the present needs of our economy.

This criticism comes from many quarters. We have heard it in the house before and in the debate so far. There are suggestions that our present system discriminates against certain classes of borrowers and savers and—this is of particular interest to me—against certain regions because it does not provide services to all. In some instances the services provided are of an inadequate nature. It seems that our criticism perhaps is aimed directly at the financial institutions, because these are the vehicles for transmitting financial policy.

The challenge before the government in introducing this legislation is to bring forward a measure which will have the effect of increasing competition and flexibility in our banking system. I was pleased, therefore, with the references made to this subject in the minister's speech. At this point in the debate it is reasonable to assume we are talking in terms of principles and not in detail. Opposition speakers have expressed an interest in detail but, as they well know, this is not in keeping with our procedure at this stage.

If this country is to develop its economic potential to the maximum it has to afford to all of its people the greatest possible opportunities to participate in our economic development and one of the essentials of such a plan for progress is a creative financial system, one which is not just passive but innovating and capable of meeting changed circumstances with new ideas and new approaches.

As I have indicated, my particular concern is the role of financial policy and of our financial institutions in those regions of Canada which have not yet achieved the degree of development reached by some of our more fortunate areas. In many other fields the government, in fact, successive governments, have introduced policies aimed at developing these less-developed parts of Canada. We are all aware of the activities of the Atlantic Development Board, the Area Development Agency and similar agencies. But we shall only achieve the desired goals in this sphere if our financial system also plays its full part in the development of equal opportunities in all areas of Canada. At the present time our system lacks both the flexibility and the element of competition which are so badly needed and the absence of which has had a particularly adverse effect on those regions of Canada which are removed from the centre.

Since the thirties, when banks in the United States failed, we have continued to believe something which is in many ways a myth, namely, that the Canadian banking system is vastly superior to that of the United States. However, I suggest there are many features of the United States banking system which are attractive, particularly to those of us who do not come from the central regions of Canada. We have, in a sense, suffered because of the branch banking system, and any efforts which can be made to assist the growth of regional banks and to create more flexibility and competition in the system would surely be of benefit to us.

Naturally we hear protestations from bankers in this country that there is no such thing as discrimination, that all areas are treated alike. Undoubtedly this is a subject which will be discussed at considerable length when this bill goes before the committee. But while there may be evidence to suggest that in the province of Nova Scotia, for example, the amount of money lent is related to the amount collected by the banks in that province in the form of savings, I nevertheless feel there is a rigidity which has a particularly adverse effect on regions far removed from the centre.

There are other details which were mentioned by the minister and which will have the effect of helping to create an environment for more flexibility and competition. Hon. members opposite have directed their remarks to the question of deposit insurance. I believe this is a good measure. It will certainly make the establishment of new banks easier. I also believe it will strengthen near-banks and make them more creditable institutions.

One result of this legislation will be a provision under which banks will find it necessary to declare their inner reserves. This is important because there is always a certain amount of mythology surrounding banks and the banking system, and close to 100 per cent of it is pure mythology. Many of the attitudes adopted by bankers and others in the system who tend to be over-cautious are interwoven with the mythology which surrounds our banking institutions. I welcome this move to have inner reserves made public and to provide for a system of deposit insurance.

There has been some discussion about the recommendations of the Porter Commission concerning near-banks. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Perth, if I remember correctly, was critical of the Minister of Finance for not dealing with this subject. However, no less an authority than the distinguished member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands spoke of the constitutional difficulties in this field. Both hon. members were unsatisfied, but I believe the intention of the minister to call a federal-provincial conference to discuss the broad theme of consumer credit represents a most important step toward resolving the whole question of the relationship between near-banks and banks.

Mr. Fulton: That conference has nothing to do with near-banks.

Mr. Cashin: The conference will have some relationship to those institutions which are dealing in credit.

Mr. Sharp: That is right—including the banks.

Mr. Cashin: I suggest there is a relationship and that this conference will be a meaningful one. More important still, I believe the government ought at the earliest opportunity to give detailed study to ways and means of surmounting the constitutional difficulties which, according to some hon. members, prevent our bringing the near-banks under the control of the Bank Act. The relationship which I see between this and the forthcoming federal-provincial conference is that we shall be discussing with the provinces the whole question of consumer credit. I do not believe any province would have a strong case for wishing to prevent provincial institutions being subjected to uniform regulation and control, since this control would be of benefit to borrowers. It would certainly be of particular benefit to small borrowers, and I doubt that any provincial government would wish openly to oppose a course of action beneficial to this group.

The approach taken by the minister in introducing this legislation suggests he is well aware of the need for flexibility and competition, that he is aware of the problem presented by the near-banks, and that these important questions, which are matters of concern to members on all sides, will receive greater attention from the present Minister of Finance than they have had for some time.

There has to be a philosophy behind our approach to financial policy. Our philosophy, it would seem, is to afford as far as possible an equal break for all who are dealing with the system, whether it is a small borrower or a particular region of the country which now suffers certain disadvantages. Notwithstanding the advantages of confederation there are still certain disadvantages suffered by regions removed from the centre. I believe it is within the ambit of this philosophy that the present administration is approaching this measure for the revision of the Bank Act.

An important factor is the attitude of those in financial institutions. I have never been particularly cognizant of any progressive or enlightened attitude on the part of many of them. They seem to have a standard routine of rejecting anything that suggests government control or government interference. In many ways our financial institutions are the last preserve of the old laissez-faire attitude in our economy.

I am sure many hon. members would agree that notwithstanding the changes in economic attitudes during the last 30 years one thing has remained consistent, that no matter what attempts have been made to increase opportunities in Canada and no matter what success we have had in giving more people more wealth, those at the top of the system always seem to do well. There should be a greater awareness on the part of financial institutions of what we are trying to do in the economic development of Canada. They ought not to be restricted by prejudice or preconceived notions regarding the role of government. Such a change of attitude is very necessary because these institutions are not very popular. They do not really belong to the community.

This is particularly correct if, as those of us on the outer fringes have to do, one deals with branches of the various banks. They are impersonal and because of their operation they are to a large degree divorced from the needs of the people. Notwithstanding the merits of the branch banking system this factor is of considerable importance, but it is one that can be rectified by a greater awareness on the part of the financial institutions of the role that they must play in our economic development.

For example, from time to time in the field of monetary policy we are confronted with philosophical decisions regarding the flow of credit. Such a philosophical decision is the responsibility of the Bank of Canada, but once it is made on the basis of what is good for Canada as a whole its application is left up to the individuals in the various financial institutions. This is a great weakness because in the first instance it is generally due to inflationary pressures that a course of action is taken. But I suggest these inflationary pressures are not universal and therefore in my view our monetary policy ought to reflect more the regional differences that exist in this country. If this is not being done by regulation, then it seems to me those within the system have a responsibility to bear these factors in mind in their own administration.

Individuals in the system with whom I have discussed the matter have told me that at no time would they discriminate against any group or individual. My reply was that this is exactly the point, that there are groups who, because of lack of opportunity or lack of development, need special concern and there are other special factors to be taken into consideration, so that some kind of philosophy in this regard should be more in evidence in our financial institutions.

It may be said that this is not good economics, the only criterion being the return in a monetary sense, but I challenge that because I do not believe it is a sophisticated view in Canada today in that other value judgments are made. This was the basis of the laissez-faire attitude, that what was best in terms of dollars was best in terms of people, but it is many years since we discovered that this is not true. The relationship of our financial policies to our development policies should be emphasized more.

By expressing his recognition of the need for flexibility in competition the minister has gone farther than any of his predecessors in meeting this problem and in suggesting what is going to be in the bill and, like other hon. members, I look forward to seeing the bill so that it may receive the kind of in depth study that is not and should not be possible at this stage of the proceedings.

Before resuming my seat I wish to mention one other matter which may not be completely relevant, namely, the relationship of the Industrial Development Bank to the Bank of Canada. The minister ought to give serious consideration to that relationship and to the greater use that may be made of the Industrial Development Bank in assisting the development of various regions. I know there will be objections raised to this by the financial institutions themselves, but perhaps some of them might pick up their socks and fill some of the void.

I would like again to congratulate the minister for introducing this measure which he has described as a blueprint for competition. Lack of competition has been one of the big weaknesses in our system. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has pointed out some of the difficulties to be overcome in introducing competition within the system, but I think the minister has outlined the most positive approach we have ever had to this vital problem.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the discussion of a resolution preceding extensive revision of the Bank Act should involve some consideration of the general principles governing our approach to banking legislation in Canada. I regret that the minister did not devote somewhat more attention in his speech to the question of the general principles which he feels should be embodied in the revision, if only for the purpose that when we get the bill we can test the details of the legislation against the principles which it might be agreed should be served by that legislation and reflected in it.

Not having the advantage of any statement in detail by the government as to its views in this regard, nevertheless I feel it is important a statement should be made, and with some trepidation I would like to outline what I feel are some of the general principles which we should now wish to see incorporated in a revision of the Bank Act, looking forward to the future and to the enabling of the financial and monetary system of this country to meet the problems of today and of years to come.

I would say that the first general principle is the maintenance and, when necessary, the extension of effective jurisdiction over the banking system, something which is essential to any government which claims effective control of monetary policy or, indeed, monetary and fiscal policy. If we do not have that effective control of the banking system, then to say we intend to exercise control over monetary policy is a mere pretence.

A second and corollary principle is that a strong and effective banking system—and the word "effective" here includes the qualities of flexibility and competitiveness—is the indispensable right arm of government in the exercise of that effective control over the monetary system.

Third, parliament and government must therefore be concerned to maintain the integrity of the banking system, and by this I mean not just the strength of existing banks but the integrity and viability of the entire system, as well as the integrity of their control over that system.

Fourth, parliament and government must be concerned not only to maintain the soundness and effectiveness of the institutions within the banking system as presently officially constituted, but must assert and extend control over any other institutions or trends which, if left unchecked, would erode the strength of and the control over that system.

Fifth, in approaching our responsibilities in these connections we must remember that our concern is not just for the strength and well-being of the system and its institutions in isolation but also for the establishment and extension of a system and institutions which will serve the needs of the economy as a whole and the interests of depositors and borrowers individually. We must therefore always be concerned, in legislation and regulation of the institutions, to reconcile the two cardinal requirements of safety or strength on the one hand, and effectiveness or competition on the other.

I must say as a personal opinion, from looking at the present situation in the Canadian banking system and the institutions which officially constitute it at the moment, that in our system and in the legislation for the future we could safely place considerably more emphasis on flexibility and competitiveness both in the interest of the financial community and of the public. I regret that in my view the outline of the legislation given by the minister does not go far enough in that direction.

The legislation which we are to examine, and which will be based on this resolution, in my view should reflect at least those principles—and I have only summarized some which are applicable. I do not think anyone would disagree that the Porter Commission's approach certainly reflected those principles. I would have hoped that the legislation would reflect more faithfully not only those principles but also the approach and recommendations of the Porter Commission. In my view it falls very considerably short of that desired objective and falls short especially in connection with control in the interest of small businesses and small borrowers.

When I use the word "small" here I do not mean in matters of loans of, say, $1,000, because in terms of the size of Canadian business today I think we have to realize that even $100,000 in relation to what is going on in the financial institutions of Canada is relatively, and I am speaking relatively only, a small business or small borrower. Although $100,000 dollars seems a great deal of money to me, yet in terms of the size and sophistication of the Canadian financial system I think anything up to $100,000 probably should be classified in the field of the smaller business and smaller borrower.

As I said, I regret that the legislation does not reflect the recommendations and the approach of the Porter Commission, anything like as completely as I would like to see it do. In considering the extent to which we would like to see the recommendations of the Porter Commission followed it is helpful to examine some of the authoritative statements which have been made about that commission and its work. I should like to refer the committee to an article that appeared in The Canadian Banker in the summer of 1964, by Professor Slater, a professor of economics at Queen's University. Not all of what he said was uniformly flattering. However, at pages 8 and 9 he gives his assessment of the work of the commission as a whole. I think these passages are of very great significance. He said:

> The independence, honesty and frankness of the report are particularly noteworthy. This commission has struggled hard to avoid being in anybody's pocket.

In other words, the recommendations made are not just in the interests of the banks as such but are in the interests of the economy as a whole. He went on:

> Each set of ideas coming before the commission has been examined carefully, confronted with the tests of logic and experience and put into relationship with other ideas and evidence.

Again, he said:

> For the most part the report is competent and judicious. The analysis in some sections is markedly superior to that in the comparable British and American documents. Nearly every issue of banking and financial policy is examined; the pros and cons are given at least a quick and rough weighing, and at most a careful and balanced evaluation. In my judgment the report will be immediately helpful in the review of Canadian banking and financial legislation, and in the formulation and exercise of financial and related general economic policy.

He said further:

> In my view, one of the most attractive features of the report is its neutrality and cleanness with respect to the social and political climate. The commissioners are firm that economic affairs are subsidiary to political and social choices. The effect of many of their recommendations is to facilitate the responsible exercise of government power.

Finally:

> In a general appreciation of the report, the comprehensiveness of the work also deserves comment. The commission has taken on nearly every major issue of financial performance or policy which has concerned people during the last two decades. A special effort has been made to use effectively the best of the modern theoretical and empirical studies of money and finance.

Mr. Chairman, that being an impartial assessment of the merits of the Porter Commission's studies and recommendations, it is interesting to turn to the brief statement of objectives which the commission itself sought to achieve in the recommendations it brought down. These are the broad economic objectives which Canada should attain and which the commission felt would be facilitated by its recommendations. They are stated as follows in the report at page 398:

> (a) Rising productivity;
> (b) A high and stable level of employment;
> (c) Stable prices;
> (d) A sound external financial position.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to conceive of a better statement of financial and economic objectives for Canada. Therefore it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that, to the extent that the recommendations of the Porter commission would bring about these objectives, it is regrettable in the extreme that those recommendations are not followed. I have said that I think the outline of the legislation given by the minister indicates several important areas in which they are not followed. I should like to refer to them briefly at this stage.

The first omission is that the Porter commission recommended that near-banks and similar institutions should come under the same umbrella by way of banking legislation as the present banking institutions themselves so that they would all be made competitive with a view to avoiding, as they clearly point out, the situation in which certain borrowers are compelled to go where they must pay 14 per cent, 16 per cent, 18 per cent and up to 24 per cent on their money with disastrous effect. The only result of such excessive rates is inflation in respect of the cost of goods and services that are produced and purchased by Canadians. The Porter Commission wanted all these institutions made competitive under the one legislative umbrella.

In the legislation outlined by the minister the only approach in this regard is to introduce the device of deposit insurance. I think there will be general agreement that deposit insurance is a good and desirable development so far as it goes, but in respect of this particular problem may I suggest it is of dubious value so far as dealing with the whole area is concerned because there are so many gaps and so many parts of the problem which will not be tackled effectively by the device of deposit insurance.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps at the end of my remarks, if the minister would not mind.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am most interested in the hon. member's speech and this is really to help the hon. gentleman in his argument.

Mr. Fulton: I am always susceptible to flattery, Mr. Chairman, but this may be at the expense of some of my time.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman is very learned in the law and I am not. Would he not agree that if there were doubts about the jurisdiction with regard to these institutions it would be better at this time at least to proceed along lines which do not raise jurisdictional questions?

• (4:40 p.m.)

I quite agree with the hon. member. If we had had a clear indication that we could apply our banking laws to these institutions, we would not have hesitated; but we hesitated for reasons that I think will be appreciated by the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: I am not denying that there are difficulties, Mr. Chairman. I am pointing out, however, that the device of deposit insurance does not meet the whole problem. With respect to that matter and the question just asked by the minister I would say that in so far as he is going to introduce deposit insurance on the basis he has outlined, he will weaken the effectiveness of it by saying, as he did, that it will apply to companies provincially incorporated only with the consent of the provincial government concerned. I do not think it is necessary for the provincial governments to be consulted. If you simply say: "Here is a system of deposit insurance, if you wish to take advantage of it," and if provincially incorporated companies do take advantage of it, it does not seem to me that there is any infraction of provincial jurisdiction in their so doing of their own accord. I think the minister is making unnecessary problems for himself if he makes this provision subject to provincial consent.

But the minister does say that he is going to consult the provincial governments in this and other fields. Why does he not instead consult them about bringing all these types of institutions within a unified inspection and control system under the federal umbrella? There is no indication that he is going to discuss this matter. That is my main answer to the question the minister asked me. There are difficulties, but why not face them and try to solve them?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I give an answer to the question now for the sake of continuity in the argument? The indication we have is that our jurisdiction would be disputed.

Mr. Fulton: I am not one to minimize the constitutional problems and the difficulties that sometimes confront us in relations between governments. But I think this matter should be discussed with the provinces on a co-operative basis, and without denying the right of the provinces to incorporate these companies and to lay down regulations which must be complied with within the province, it could be pointed out that because many of these institutions do business outside the province a degree of co-operation within the ambit of federal legislation is desirable and is in the interests of the protection of depositors, borrowers and the economy generally. I think it would be difficult, if proprly approached, for responsible provincial governments to refuse at least to discuss the problem and approach it along these lines. Such a solution would be in keeping with the Porter Commission recommendations.

The importance of this matter can be understood by recalling the appalling situation brought about by the collapse of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation just last year, a collapse of which we are still feeling the effects with respect to the availability of credit in th Canadian economy. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister and the committee, that it is doubtful whether the Canadian financial system could stand another such collapse. Certainly confidence in the system would be totally destroyed in so far as overseas money is concerned, investors from outside Canada, and I doubt whether even the system within Canada could stand another such collapse.

Therefore any approach along the lines recommended by the Porter Commission to place these and related types of institutions under the umbrella of the federal banking laws would be most desirable, and it is regrettable that the minister does not indicate a greater determination in pursuing such a solution to this part of the problem.

Next, the Porter Commission recommended that lending companies and lending charges —here I am thinking of the small loan companies—be also regulated in the same way and placed under the banking legislation. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the recommendation found at page 382 of the commission report, which reads:

> At present the small loan companies and licensed moneylenders are regulated by the Superintendent of Insurance under the Small Loans Act, which sets limits on the charges they may levy for cash loans. As noted in the previous chapter, we believe that all cash lenders—including the banking institutions—should be subject to uniform regulation, and we think it appropriate that supervision of the amended legislation be transferred to the Inspector General of Banks.

I regret that this step does not appear to be forecast as one of the features of the legislation to be introduced.

Third, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the legislation, in the outline given by the minister, repeats the damaging and dangerous position taken by his predecessor; that is to say, there will be a feature in the legislation involving the punishment of a certain bank by way of retroactive legislation, a bank incorporated under laws as they existed at one time and placed in an invidious and very inferior position as a result of a change in the laws introduced after it had properly applied for and received its incorporation. It is, further more, a situation brought about by means of a device which if resorted to elsewhere would very seriously and adversely affect the branches and agencies of Canadian banks operating outside Canada.

[Mr. Fulton.]

In addition to these objections to the provisions of the legislation I wish to raise certain other considerations in connection with the legislation about which I feel very strongly. I am thinking of the whole course followed with respect to this legislation, the delays, uncertainties and the consequent adverse effect these have had upon the plans and operations of the Canadian financial community. After all, the Porter Commission report was brought down in 1964. The decennial Bank Act revision was due in 1964. The introduction of the legislation has been held up by quarrels, delays and uncertainty within the Liberal cabinet ever since. The legislation is now two years overdue and, as is well known without my rehearsing the detail, plans have recently had to be revised substantially as a result of further very serious disagreements within the ranks of the government.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it will take only a very short time to complete my remarks.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. What I am concerned about in this connection is that we are now, it seems to me, in a situation where the timetable indicates that we may well have a summer recess, and we are only going to have first reading of the bill before that recess. We will not be able to have the debate on second reading until we come back, and we do not know when we are coming back nor does the financial community. My experience and that of others is that the debate on second reading and the study in committee of this legislation will occupy two to three months, and one assumes, on the basis of past experience again, that there will be a prorogation of this session toward the end of the year. Where does that leave the minister, the legislation, the banking system and the financial institutions of Canada? Will we have to start all over again in another session of parliament? I only point out these things to emphasize the serious position in which the delay and inability of the government to get on with this legislation have placed our economy.

The final point I want to make is with respect to the matter of the central feature of the Porter Commission's recommendations and one of the essential features of the bill, namely, the question of the interest ceiling. What are we told? We were told by the minister last night that at some time in the future the interest ceiling on bank loans will be lifted but that in the meantime a formula will be provided for a flexible interest ceiling related to the yield of short-term government bonds. This leaves us with tremendously important questions as to the principle of the legislation, questions to which we were denied answers last night and still are denied them. First, with regard to when the ceiling would be lifted the minister slid over this question in his speech. He said, as reported at page 7236 of Hansard:

> Naturally, no one can say just when general interest rates will decline to the point that will release the ceiling on bank interest rates. I would hope it would come sooner rather than later, so that the proper development and evolution of our financial system as a whole can proceed on the basis of effective competition.

But we were given no indication as to when it will come. The question remains: will the point of time at which the changeable formula and the ceiling are removed, be determined or fixed by the legislation or by some device embodied in the legislation or will it be fixed at the whim of the executive? This is a tremendously important matter of principle, that the control of banking legislation reside in parliament and that fundamental changes in the banking legislation not be made without reference to parliament. I submit that most certainly the question of a change in the method of fixing the interest ceiling, or indeed the question of the removal of the interest ceiling—the movement from one stage to another—is a most important and fundamental matter which should not be decided without reference to parliament. And yet we are not told how this is dealt with in the legislation. This is the kind of information which we sought last night and which unfortunately we have been denied up to this point.

And so I say, together with my colleague, the hon. member for Perth, that we are not prepared to support this resolution because of the serious omissions from the legislation as outlined by the minister, and because of the objections to the way in which it has been introduced and the lack of information on it. While maintaining a flexibility of decision with respect to the legislation when we see it, we are not prepared to support at present a resolution which seems to us to beg many of the fundamental questions which should be faced and dealt with in the revision of the Bank Act.

When the legislation itself comes in, we will measure it against the principles I have outlined and the recommendations of the Porter report, and to the extent it conforms to them we will support it; to the extent it does not conform to them, we will oppose it.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, in discussing the resolution calling for the decennial revision of the Bank Act may I say that I listened last night with great interest, together with other hon. members, to the speech of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I called it a speech but possibly it could more properly be called an entertainment because it most certainly was an entertainment. I have come to the conclusion since coming to this house that if we had advance notice of the time when the right hon. gentleman was going to speak we could sell tickets to the gallery and probably pay off the mortgage on this building with the process. I suspect he walked into the house last night with two speeches prepared, one prepared perhaps by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and the other by his good friend, Senator McCutcheon.

An hon. Member: Who prepared yours?

Mr. Basford: No one prepared mine.

Mr. Churchill: That is obvious.

Mr. Basford: After listening to the minister give a Liberal speech on the revision of the Bank Act calling for greater competitiveness and flexibility, the right hon. gentleman gave Senator's McCutcheon's speech.

He also had great fun with a Toronto Star story alleging a great fight within the cabinet. I can understand the right hon. gentleman being intrigued with such alleged stories. In view of the fact he himself is such an expert on cabinet resignations I can understand that he would be intrigued with the possibility of resignations from another government.

He also had great fun with certain press statements referring to a discussion within the Liberal party about what the revision of the Bank Act should contain. It is apparent that the right hon. gentleman and hon. members opposite are of the opinion that what is contained in the press about them is invariably false but what is contained in the press about us is invariably correct and should be taken as gospel. I should think hon. members opposite would have learned by now that they should not believe everything they read in the press.

It does not disturb me, Mr. Chairman, that there has been discussion within the Liberal party about the revision of the Bank Act and I am proud to belong to a party which allows such discussions. After having had a full discussion on the revision of the Bank Act we were able to come before the house and the country with a policy advocating greater progress, competitiveness and flexibility in our banking system.

Mr. Aiken: We have not seen it yet.

Mr. Basford: It seems to disturb hon. gentlemen opposite that a party should go through this process of democratic discussion and debate within its own ranks.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Basford: Not now, not before the end of my time limit.

We also listened to the statement of the right hon. gentleman at the end of his speech that he was not going to be a pawn coming to the rescue of the Liberal party and its unity. I am not aware of any disunity, but if we did have any disunity the right hon. gentleman, who is such an expert on it, is not one to whom I would go and ask for help.

I also listened last night with great interest to my friend from British Columbia, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I looked forward to his speech with interest and respect because he is a member with great knowledge on this subject and one of the few members who has been present at the previous revision of the Bank Act. I say to him with respect that I was disappointed with his submission last night. In spite of his great knowledge and experience in the field of banking he was only able to make very vague references to a regulatory body and to greater sophistication in our approach to banking, all of which was rather meaningless to me.

I was also disappointed with his speech for another reason. In the past my friend from British Columbia has thundered about my province calling for nationalization of the banking system, and yet last night we heard nothing from him about nationalization. We only heard a whisper about regulatory bodies and sophistication. I hope this is not due to the advancing years of the hon. member taking a toll on his enthusiasm for nationalization.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is the hon. member's hearing failing? Is he suffering from that disability?

Mr. Basford: I listened to the critical remarks made by the hon. member relative to the Porter Commission. While hon. members from the Progressive Conservative party have fully relied on the Porter Commission for their speeches, I for one am a little tired of recommendations from royal commissions containing solutions to this country's problems without any reference to the constitution which governs our country.

Mr. Churchill: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Order, please. It being five o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, before you call private members' business, I wonder whether the house would consider trying to complete consideration of the Bank Act resolution today? I believe there is one hour and nine minutes left in which to complete debate on the resolution.

Mr. Churchill: I understand the house leader's desire to move ahead with these matters but in view of the fact there is no settled arrangement with regard to the termination of the session this week, I think we should carry on with the ordinary business as outlined on the order paper.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: It is quite accurate to say there is no settled arrangement for the termination of business, but in the event we were able to reach such a situation tomorrow it would be of help if this resolution were completed today. I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. Grégoire: I should like to point out to the Minister of Public Works that the debate on the resolution has not been completed yet because members of his own party have been speaking. There have been four speakers from the government side and we have had only one, so we are not the ones who are blocking the resolution. If the Liberal members would keep quiet for a while, perhaps we would have an opportunity of completing the debate on the resolution. Inasmuch as they have been talking and talking it has not been completed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS IN PRINCIPLE

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to amending the Canada Pension Plan in such a way as to insure that it and complementary pensions and retirement allowance legislation in Canada are based upon the following principles:

(a) the immediate increase of the old age pension to $100.00 per month to all present recipients, and the integration and payment of such pensions out of the pension fund as amended;

(b) the establishment of a plan to provide a national minimum retirement income, participation in such a plan to be available but not compulsory to all;

(c) that a national retirement pensions plan should not be compulsorily superimposed on existing pension and retirement plans, but should be supplementary to them, on the basis of filling in gaps in coverage of existing retirement and superannuation plans so that all are covered up to the level established under sub-paragraph (b), participation being, however, elective to those who are already covered to or beyond that level;

(d) that true portability of pensions as between industries and areas, which is not affected by the present plan, be the continuing aim of pensions legislation and negotiation;

(e) that certain specific and foolish anomalies, such as those whereby more than one employer may be compelled to make a full annual contribution in respect of the same employee, with no right of recovery from the fund, and whereby some housewives will be compelled to make deduction from the wages of domestic help while others will not, although the basic wage rate is the same, be eliminated

He said: I should like, Mr. Speaker, to mention briefly the fact this notice of motion has been on the order paper since January 20. We have all had ample time to consider it. As a matter of fact, this is the fourth opportunity, I believe, that the house has had to consider this subject. There are important clauses in this notice of motion, but I would draw your attention to clause (a):

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to amending the Canada Pension Plan in such a way as to insure that it and complementary pensions and retirement allowances legislation in Canada are based upon the following principles:

(a) the immediate increase of the old age pension to $100 per month to all present recipients, and the integration and payment of such pensions out of the pension fund as amended;

I do not believe I need to say anything else. We realize the need for this payment to our elderly citizens. As I say, we have had the opportunity of considering the matter this session and I know hon. members will want to have an opportunity to voice their opinions in favour of the notice of motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A few minutes ago the Minister of Public Works proposed that we continue debating the Bank Act resolution. I would be ready to accept a suggestion that we take a vote immediately on this notice of motion, after which we could go on with the Bank Act resolution and complete it tonight. We are ready to agree to sitting a little later so we will finish the resolution on the Bank Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I listened with interest, Mr. Speaker, to the opening remarks of the hon. member. He was very generous in giving up a portion of his time so that other members might have an opportunity to speak, and I thank him for his kind consideration.

Mr. Monteith: I was only assisting an early vote.

Mrs. Rideout: The hon. member has a quite lengthy notice of motion and to deal with it fully in the proper perspective would take longer than the time we have at our disposal today. I should like to be as generous as the hon. member and give others a chance to speak. I should like for a few moments to speak about clause (a) in the notice of motion which refers to an immediate increase in the old age pension to $100 per month to all present recipients and the integration and payment of such pensions out of the pension fund as amended. I am sure all hon. members are aware of the fact the government has given consideration to various proposals and indeed has been giving these matters consideration for some time.

With regard to the resolution before us, I may say a decision has already been taken by this government to lower the age of eligibility for applicants for old age security to 65. This decision was contained in Part IV of the Canada Pension Plan which was passed by both houses several years ago. Commencing January, people aged 68 or over can start drawing this pension and by the end of 1969 everyone reaching 65 who meets the residence requirements can claim his or her old age pension.

Under the proposal in this notice of motion the old age security outlays for the calendar year 1966 would be increased to $862 million. If the proposed increases were retroactive to January of this year and were paid immediately to all persons aged 65 or over, by 1970 the additional cost would be $527 million a year. In the first five years the additional cost would be $3.5 billion.

It is interesting to note that the resolution contains no mention of the way in which these large additional costs should be financed.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mrs. Rideout: This is in contrast to the resolution of the Conservative party a year ago in which they advocated—

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. lady has just mentioned the exact point I was going to raise. The resolution does not deal with the things with which she is dealing and the resolution is what she is supposed to be debating. The hon. member is talking about old age security and the resolution deals with an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mrs. Rideout: I am looking at the notice of motion, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that it is in order for me to speak about the old age pension increases mentioned therein. I am leading up to my remarks about the Canada Pension Plan. I cannot see that I am not staying within the confines of the notice of motion. If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the resolution contains no mention of the way in which these large, additional costs should be financed.

[Mrs. Rideout.]

Mr. Mandziuk: From the money in the fund.

Mrs. Rideout: I should like to continue my remarks if you do not mind. This is in contrast to the proposal of the Conservative party a year ago in which they advocated that a similar increase in the old age security pension should be financed out of the Canada Pension Plan. That proposal was, of course, unacceptable because it would have used contributions collected in nine provinces to pay additional benefits to persons residing in all ten provinces.

I wonder whether the hon. gentleman who proposed this resolution would recommend that his proposal be financed through an increase in the earmarked tax on personal incomes, the earmarked sales tax or the earmarked corporation income tax, some combination of these, or through other tax increases? Though there is some surplus in the old age security fund at the moment, the great magnitude of the additional outlays required would necessitate additional tax revenues at once.

The Canada Pension Plan is a long-range program. It will be several years before a substantial proportion of the aged population will receive benefit from it although it will only be ten years before full retirement pensions are available. One of the objectives of the Canada Assistance Plan is to meet the needs of those people now retired who will draw no Canada Pension Plan benefits and those who will retire in the next ten years and will be unable to build up full retirement pensions during the transitional period.

The federal government now shares through unemployment assistance any supplementary payments made by the provinces to recipients of old age security, old age assistance, blind and disabled persons' allowances. The Canada Assistance Plan will continue to make this federal assistance available. In so far as the federal government is concerned, it will under the Canada Assistance Plan share without any upper limit the cost of supplementation and the provision of medical care and welfare services to those in need. The Canada Assistance Plan will provide federal assistance to the provinces to meet fully the financial and service requirements of those who are in need. The extent to which this objective is fulfilled for people in each province will depend upon each provincial government carrying out the responsibilities which have been allocated it under our constitution.

The federal government's sharing of medicare costs, mothers' allowances and child welfare costs under the Canada Assistance Plan will relieve provinces of existing expenditures. The lowering of the age under old age security is also relieving the provinces of expenditures under old age assistance. The federal government hopes that the provinces will use these funds to improve supplementary payments for old age security recipients as well as other assistance recipients.

An aged person who needs $100 a month to cover his basic monthly needs and receives only the $75 old age security pension will be able to get an additional $25 from the province under the Canada Assistance Plan. If he needs $140 and has only $75, he will be able to get the additional $65 under the Canada Assistance Plan. If the old age security pension were raised to $100 a month—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. lady permit a question? Could she tell us how much money out of the $85 million allocated for this year is earmarked for the purpose of supplementing the pensions of old age security recipients?

Mrs. Rideout: I think the hon. member will appreciate that it would be difficult for me to provide him with that information, but I am sure that he has had the opportunity to obtain it and will have further opportunity during the clause by clause study of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. lady not, with me, a member of the committee on health and welfare, and does she not know that we have been given a figure which is next to nothing?

Mrs. Rideout: Then I am wondering why the hon. gentleman is asking me a question if he already knows the answer.

Mr. Knowles: Because I think it is unfair to throw out this figure of a pension of $140 a month when it is not being provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mrs. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I would rather not get into an argument with the hon. gentleman, but I should like to add that certainly if there is a need the need will be met. The hon. member will also have an opportunity to speak on this question.

If the old age security pension were raised to $100 a month it would provide incomes to many people, expecially those who are married, where the payment would be $200 a month, much greater than the cash incomes of many younger people engaged in primary industries in marginal communities. At the same time, a $100 pension would not meet all the needs of aged persons living in the higher-cost urban centres.

A $100 a month pension would require tax increases under the 3-3-4 formula in order to prevent deficits from arising in that fund, or additional allocations from general revenue to cover the deficits that will arise. Increased federal expenditures for old age security would have an effect on the over-all priorities for other federal expenditures. For example, increased taxes for this purpose would affect the revenues available for university aid, medicare, federal-provincial fiscal equalization adjustments, and any future adjustment in family allowances and youth allowances, to mention only a few programs.

The Canada Pension Plan and old age security will provide a maximum combined benefit of $179 a month. The level of the Canada Pension Plan will be adjusted upwards with changes in the cost of living during the transition period and thereafter in line with changes in wages. These provisions will be automatic and thereby provide for a built-in escalation of expenditures. However, amounts raised from contributions will also increase as the ceiling is raised and will thus assist in financing these added expenditures. The resolution before the house makes no provision for financing the added expenditures it entails.

I should like to say in conclusion that I wish to draw to the attention of the hon. member the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) in winding up the second reading debate on the Canada Assistance Plan. I think the minister made it quite clear that all of us on the government side are concerned for our elderly citizens in Canada, to whom we have indeed been giving serious consideration. The minister has indicated on several occasions that he is trying to resolve this problem, and I should like to read into the record if I may, Mr. Speaker, the words he used in concluding his speech, which appear at page 7205 of Hansard:

> The old age pension question is another, distinct issue, and I can assure hon. members that it will be dealt with in another and more appropriate context and, I would add with equal assurance, within a very short time.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Canada Pension Plan

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Québec-Montmorency): In taking my turn in this debate on the member's motion, I just wish to call to the attention of the house some speeches made in the last few days and in particular to point out with what insistence some hon. members seem to talk of increasing the old age pension, for strictly political reasons of course. They want to get $100 a month without any means test. Well, not a single member mentioned that, among those who could benefit from social security measures, there are a large number of citizens who not only could but had the right to benefit from the distribution of all the national wealth.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that can be described as altering completely the basic principles of any well understood social security system. If all the national wealth enables one class of society or another to benefit from social security measures, I think that we must admit that one or the other must also benefit from it and I do not understand the insistence with which some hon. members ask for an increase in the old age pension, without a word being said about the other classes of society, namely the widows, the needy mothers and also the children with regard to family allowances.

I would like to know if there is a member of the New Democratic Party who is in a position to say that, at the present time, an old man needs an increase in his old age pension more than a mother needs an increase in family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that if we take an important part of income out of the national wealth to distribute it to a particular class without taking the others into account, we are altering the principle of social security. I am convinced—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. To correct what the hon. member is saying, I would like to point out to him that when I spoke about that matter, I said that it was necessary also to increase the family allowances. Therefore, I would like him to make the distinction for those who spoke about that.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for Lapointe and I respectfully submit that if he referred to that, he is coming close to what I believe to be the basic principle of social security, namely the fair distribution to all classes of recipients of the surplus or of the whole of our national wealth. How can one reconcile the facts otherwise?

[Mrs. Rideout.]

Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the point in this house where we try and prove that social security measures are based on the cost of living and on what is necessary for a person to live on. Now, I respectfully submit that such is not the basic principle of social security, for social security is redistribution of our national wealth. If that redistribution is done according to what everyone needs for a living, the idea is all wrong; all welfare measures would then be quite insufficient.

How can a mother support her children with $6 or $8 a month? Is that enough to live on? How can an elderly person live on $75 a month? Those are assistance measures. But when an increase of the old age pension is considered, hon. members of the opposition should also have the guts to ask, as I intend to do personally, that if there is in the public funds $100 million to redistribute, all classes of society should be considered and not one in particular.

I am not, Mr. Speaker, against an increase of the old age pension; on the contrary, I believe that to belong to the political party which launched all the welfare measures which the Canadian people now enjoy—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Laflamme: Certainly.

Mr. Winkler: In view of what the hon. member is saying I wonder if he would prevail upon his colleagues to remain in their seats so that the whole house could express its feeling on this question by a vote. We would know then. For the fourth time the hon. member will be able to vote against the old age pensioners.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of speaking at length on the question of whether one may or should vote against the old age pension. I shall simply state freely and sincerely, without any political partisanship, what I personally feel is the basic principle of social security which does not rest upon the living requirements of a person, but on a fair distribution of the whole national wealth between all social groups entitled to share it, specifically the children, the disabled, the blind and all the other groups of pensioners, including of course, the old age pensioners.

And if the federal treasury is rich enough to increase, without raising taxes, the old age pensions by $25 a month, which I am not in a position to say—so much the better, but the other social security measures should also be increased at the same rate.

That is my personal view of social security which is not based, in spite of attempts which have been made in the house for the several months, on the principle that so much is needed to live on, and that it must be made available and, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he said: "Could you live on $75 a month?" That is not the question. To my mind, that is sheer politics.

It is important to say how much the federal treasury can contribute, what are the amounts the federal treasury can supply without strangling the taxpayers because it is a well known fact that approximately 25 to 30 per cent of the population pay more than 80 per cent of the taxes.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Does the hon. member know how much money is in the old age pension fund now and for what purpose it is there? We will know at six o'clock how you feel about the old age pensioners.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I know there is an amount of approximately $275 million under legislation adopted by the present government, eligibility to the old age pension is being brought lower from year to year down to age 65 and if the taxes are not increased, this surplus will be considerably—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: That is wrong. That is wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: This surplus will—

Mr. Grégoire: That is not what the minister said.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: I know the hon. member for Kootenay East wants me to make a statement. If he will read the departmental figures and consult with the officials he will know that this is wrong—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Winkler: I have no intention of making a statement.

Mr. Byrne: I will.

Mr. Winkler: You will because you have to.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: The minister said that it was accumulating at the rate of $2 billion in ten years.

Mr. Laflamme: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the opposition are in favour of higher old age pensions. I believe it sincerely, but what I cannot understand, as regards the position of members of the official opposition and the New Democratic Party, is that they are calling for an additional expenditure of several million dollars per year by the federal government, in favour of persons over 69 years of age, without taking into account the other classes of society.

And now I return to the principle which I established and I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to contradict it if he can. Does he not believe, since he is obviously trying to assert himself as an expert in social security measures, that if the Canadian government has $100 million to distribute, this amount should be distributed to all classes of society in need thereof? He cannot say, any more than I can, that a mother does not need larger family allowances just as much as the old people receiving the pension.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Laflamme: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is he not aware of the fact that we support welfare measures across the board? For example, we support the Canada Assistance Plan, but we want both. We want welfare measures where they are needed, as set out in the Canada Assistance Plan, and we also want an increase in the pensions of retired people as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: I am very glad of this. Does the hon. member also mean that he is in favour of an increase?

Mr. Knowles: Yes indeed.

Mr. Laflamme: I am glad to hear him say so, because we have been hearing about social security measures for the past month, and I might ask him whether a homemaker also needs an increase in family allowances in order to raise and educate her children.

Mr. Lewis: Family allowances are not being discussed.

Mr. Laflamme: It is the principle of social security. I merely wish to say to my friend that social security measures are nevertheless paid for with the money of Canadian taxpayers. Now, if this is paid out of the money of Canadian taxpayers, how is it possible to understand that a great number of members want only one class of people to take advantage of the money available from the national income?

I personally feel that if we have $200 or $300 million available without overburdening the taxpayers, all classes of society should share equally in the benefits.

I ask the members from either group to say whether a mother raising five children has less need to have her family allowances increased by $2, $3 and $5 a month than an older person needs to have his pension increased?

Mr. Grégoire: Does the member allow me a question? Is the member for Quebec Montmorency implying that the government intends to introduce a legislation so as to increase family allowances by $5 a month?

Mr. Laflamme: I express myself freely within the party to which I belong and which set up the whole framework of social security. I, for one, believe in an equitable distribution of national wealth to all classes of society and not to the old people only.

Not that I am against increasing the old age pension—and I want that to be well understood—for I know that, while the hon. members opposite spent days talking, many old people did not have enough to subsist on $75 a month. They were not in the least concerned with social security, but rather with small politicking, because social security cannot be based on what a person needs to live on. If a social security policy is to be based on what a person needs to live, then I say that a mother must have $10, $15 or $25 per child, because that is what she would need to support her family fairly and decently. Do you really not admit it?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Grégoire: Does the government intend to present legislation to this effect soon? That is what I was asking earlier.

Mr. Laflamme: What I am saying, both publicly and within my party, is that I am in favour of increasing all social assistance; but I object to the use of the principle of social security to increase social assistance through pressure and pure partisanship, when a considerable amount of money will be spent on one class and the others will be deprived, because the hon. members are unable, as I am—

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I would like to ask the hon. member—

• (5:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

If Canada is rich enough for both, I am sure the present government will increase them all, and very soon.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a further question? We might be inclined to agree with him in a certain area of this debate, but does he realize that we are discussing old age pensions and that the federal old age security fund is for that purpose alone, whether the hon. member likes it or not?

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: What I respectfully submit on that point, on the question of the pension fund, is that we will obviously have to know within a year or two, what will be the cost of the gradual decrease in the years of recipients, and this is lower, as you well know, from year to year. At this time, I respectfully submit it is not possible to use part of the fund for old age pensions and divert it to other social security measures. The money distributed to those who need it comes from the taxpayers. There cannot be created a privileged class of recipients, out of tax revenue, in the distribution of national wealth, to the detriment of other classes. If we have sufficient funds, we must pay—

Mr. Winkler: But you are not doing that, because the fund is set up for this specific purpose and it is increasing at an appreciable rate.

Mr. Laflamme: Still, Mr. Speaker, this money comes from the taxpayers. I repeat, the basic principle in which I believe is that the money of the taxpayers should benefit all classes of society through social security allowances. I defy the hon. members of the opposition to say that the other classes of citizens do not need a raise more than old people. If we are rich enough to give our old people an extra $25 without overburdening the taxpayers, which will, of course, be decided by the government, we should also be rich enough to increase the other social security allowances proportionately.

When we are to do so, by burdening—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: And for that purpose only.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I should like to be allowed to give my opinion. When we have to do so by burdening the Canadian taxpayers with new taxes, then we will have to think twice about it. Anyway, this is my basic concept of social security and I invite the hon. members to tell me what they think of it.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise one question to be answered by those opposite who may wish to continue this debate. If the formula of the hon. lady is correct, the average assistance to old age pensioners across Canada for the remainder of the year would work out to something like 40 cents a month. I wonder whether she prefers that formula to the one offered in the resolution of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith)?

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate without making any apology for doing so. I shall not merely be taking up the time of the house, because I wish to get two or three things off my chest which are relevant to pensions and more particularly to old age pensions.

I have rarely heard it stated by any hon. member, either in this house or outside it, what the cost of these various measures would be and I believe the people of this country have the right to an accurate accounting of what the costs are likely to be. I believe most people want those costs translated into taxes on the incomes of individual wage earners in this country.

An increase in old age pensions from a flat rate of $75 a month to $100 a month, which is taken seriously by all members of this house and which is firmly advocated by several parties in the opposition as being a plank in their election platforms, should be translated into monthly payments by wage earners of this country. An additional $25 a month has been proposed for elderly people in this country. There are now one and a half million of them and within the next decade there will be more than two million.

The cost of such an increase would work out to something around $9 a month. This would have to come from the paychecks of people who are working in this country today. After all, somebody has to generate the income which is then taken from them and turned over to others on social security in Canada.

There are many cases of need among the elderly, and I am not one to deny it. But I believe that any member who acts responsibly in this house should always give the other side of the equation. And the other side is this: How much must we take from the working people of this country in order to be able to pay these additional benefits and how much will it mean in deductions from their paychecks? I am sure the vast majority of people in this country have no conception of the amount of money involved in programs of this kind.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Give us your calculation.

Mr. Davis: I intend to do so if I am permitted to continue.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member aware that the $215 million surplus in the old age security fund as of March 31 this year is more than enough to pay the increase of $25 a month, which we are advocating, for the balance of this fiscal year?

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that windfalls—and perhaps I should not refer to $215 million as a windfall—should be regarded as a feature that could be incorporated into a plan that is going to last for decades. If we are overtaxing in respect of the old age security $75 flat rate at the moment, then we pay a few more dollars a month or reduce the taxes. What I am saying is that we should be frank and truthful with the people of this country and say what our programs for increased welfare mean in terms of increased tax dollars taken from them. I do not want to deal with a fortuitous accumulation in any plan at the moment—

Mr. Knowles: But before saying an additional so many dollars would have to come from every person, should the parliamentary secretary not take into account what is already being taken away from the people in taxes to build up the old age security fund? I agree with him that we should know what the tax collection requirements are, but these are taxes which have already been paid for old age security.

Mr. Davis: I am quite sure those taxes which have accumulated over a period of years—

Mr. Knowles: One year only.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If hon. members wish to ask questions of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano I am sure he will indicate whether or not he is prepared to answer them.

Mr. Lewis: Can the hon. member tell us how many years it took to accumulate the fund?

Mr. Knowles: One year only.

Mr. Davis: That has been accumulated in the last couple of years, to my knowledge. I would prefer now to finish my remarks. I think the hon. member has raised a good point. It is one of the substantial arguments which the N.D.P. is using and, to a lesser extent, the official opposition, in order to justify an even larger outlay in respect of pensions. However, I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Rideout) and the figures she gave were prepared by civil servants competent in this subject. She said that on average over the next five years an increase from $75 to $100 a month would run around $700 million a year.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is suggesting that an over collection of some $215 million over the last year or two should be applied immediately to meeting part of this increase. I say we should be frank with the people of Canada and say that $8, $9 or $10 a month is going to have to be taken off the pay packet of every working citizen in order to meet an increase in the flat rate of the old age pension from $75 to $100.

Mr. Lewis: Would the hon. member be kind enough to give us the calculation which arrives at $8 to $10 out of each wage packet?

Mr. Davis: I assume the hon. member will accept the $700 million a year figure produced by the department as the cost of the flat increase. The parliamentary secretary said it would be $3½ billion over five years or $700 million a year on the average. Taking the working population of Canada, which is of the order of six million people, more than $100 a year has to come from each member of the working population. If you divide this by 12 months of the year you get $8 to $10. I have more accurate figures in my office, and the result I arrived at was $9. That is the order of magnitude of the cost.

This private member's motion is mischievous in another sense. It does not say where the money would come from. It implies that it would come out of the Canada Pension Plan. In fact it specifically says:

> —the government should give immediate consideration to amending the Canada Pension Plan in such a way as to insure that it and complementary pensions and retirement allowance legislation—

Will produce $100 per month. In other words, the Canada Pension Plan must be amended to supply this money and not the old age assistance legislation as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was inferring. The Canada Pension Plan was negotiated with the provinces collectively and individually, and ten provincial governments of different political stripes would have to be consulted before the federal government could give effect to this amendment.

In other words, it would be impossible for the government of Canada to give immediate effect to an increase from $75 to $100 if it were thinking of getting the necessary money, at least for the short term, by robbing the Canada Pension Plan. The Canada Pension Plan was worked out very carefully in economic and financial terms. It was scrutinized by many experts not only here in Ottawa but in the provinces, and was examined thoroughly in committee by experts from insurance companies. Now the hon. member for Perth is asking us to dismiss summarily all the calculations that were made in the preparation of it.

Mr. Monteith: Has the hon. member read the evidence presented before the Canada Pension Plan committee, which sat about a year and a half ago, and which indicated that most of the insurance companies and the province of Ontario suggested that $25 a month be given to old age security recipients from the Canada Pension Plan?

Mr. Davis: I have read a good part of the evidence and skimmed over the rest of it, but I did not find any conclusion that that sort of surplus, or indeed any surplus, was accumulating in the Canada Pension Plan. Each of us individually is making a payment into that plan and we all have every right to expect that we will get our contributions back out of the plan. I do not think it would be proper if suddenly this government were to dip into the Canada Pension Plan funds to jump old age security payments from $75 to $100 a month.

I should now like to refer briefly to a point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare how many elderly people would benefit under the Canada Assistance Plan and he implied, I think quite properly, that the $85 million would not all go to old age pensioners. I have looked up the introductory statement made by the minister on June 27 and, as recorded at page 6921 of Hansard, he itemized the various groups which will benefit from the Canada Assistance Plan. He said:

> These include some 85,000 persons still covered under the old age assistance program—

I personally have no idea how much money they will receive. This depends upon what the provinces individually will decide. But I am quite sure that many of the provinces, and ultimately all of them, as a result of the Canada Assistance Plan will increase their welfare payments to all people who come under its provisions, and naturally those over age 65 who benefit will be assisted in a significant way.

Mr. Knowles: We shall find that out tomorrow.

Mr. Davis: No member on this side of the house expects the Canada Assistance Plan to do everything for the aged. That plan deals with many groups, including people receiving blind persons allowances, disabled persons, and 200,000 needy mothers. Incidentally, for the first time federal money is being made available to that category. It also covers 600,000 people receiving unemployment assistance, and 50,000 orphaned children. Therefore it is obvious that the $85 million having to cover all these groups cannot do a great deal for the elderly.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I think we must look at the problem of the elderly in another way. Personally I am very much intrigued by Senator Croll's report, the Senate report entitled The Final Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging. I am very much intrigued, as I am sure are many other members, with the concept of minimum income maintenance. This is going to be expensive, but I prefer it for several reasons. I prefer it in view of my first hand knowledge which I gained back in the 1950's when, out in Vancouver, we carried out an assessment of needs of people on social assistance. That was nearly ten years ago. After assessing the minimum requirements we came to the conclusion in respect of individuals on social assistance that for food, clothing, shelter, utilities and so on an individual needed at least $100 a month. Also, behind this analysis there was an assumption that that individual was the best possible manager in the world. We worked out the figures as to food requirements with the advice of home economists from the University of British Columbia and so on. With the best possible knowledge and after shopping around in Vancouver to get the lowest possible prices for food, clothing, rent, etc., we found that $100 a month was the absolute minimum for an individual on social assistance. They were getting $55 in those days. As a result of our study for the community chest, it was bumped up to $65. I think another $10 was added later.

Most of us recognize that the payments to these people on social assistance are not adequate. We must move progressively to a system of minimum income maintenance, and we must carry out thorough appraisals such as that one in each region because the cost of living differs across the country. We must do this and we must make allowances. It must be done in co-operation with the provinces, because they have a major responsibility in this area. The Canada Assistance Plan goes part way down the road. Perhaps ultimately, if the provinces live up to their responsibility, it may go a long way toward meeting this problem of need.

I should like to go back to the matter of old age pensions. I should like to think that eventually the federal government will adopt a plan similar to that outlined in the Croll report, and that we will have figures developed as to minimum needs regionally across the country. We would have to help those people who are in need. They do not add up to all of the one and a half million elderly in our country. They are a small fraction of the total, but they are the people who have nothing other than the present flat rate pension; they need a supplementary income. I believe in the long run it will be up to the nation to provide that supplementary income so that they can live in dignity at a minimum standard.

I think this motion is mischievous because we have debated this subject—

Mr. Winkler: Mischievous against whom? Against the people who need money, as you say?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. gentleman is interrupting. He is not asking a question.

Mr. Winkler: A typical Liberal stand.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) objects, but I would say it is mischievous for several reasons. One is that the essence of this subject was debated at great length in this house a few months ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who now has the floor has the right to continue his speech without being interrupted.

Mr. Churchill: He should have some appreciation for the senior citizens of this country.

Mr. Winkler: We want the old people to understand where he stands.

Mr. Davis: As I said, the substance of this motion was debated at length in this house at the beginning of the session and there was a proper vote held on it after considerable discussion. This is merely an attempt to debate it again during private members' hour. I suggest it would be financially and legally wrong to rob the Canada Pension Plan by stripping it of the funds necessary to increase old age pensions from $75 to $100 a month.

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member allow a question? Would he call it robbing the fund when the fund is set up for that very purpose and that purpose only? Tell me that.

Mr. Davis: I call robbing, among other things, something that is illegal, and I say that is illegal because the money we are paying into the Canada Pension Plan is money paid in trust to look after us when we reach age 65. That is wrapped up in the legal phraseology in the act making the Canada Pension Plan law in this country.

[Mr. Davis.]

Mr. Winkler: I am glad I do not have to depend on the Liberal party.

Mr. Davis: The suggestion that the government should out of hand dip into the funds being accumulated for the Canada Pension Plan and pay the money to people now aged 65 and over certainly is inconsistent with the concept of the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Grégoire: Would the hon. member permit a question? If we take the money which is there now, in 25 years there will be money to pay our pensions and to increase the old age pension.

Mr. Davis: We debated the Canada Pension Plan for a good many days and I think it is a reasonably good plan. The hon. member contributed many words and many ideas to the debate at that time.

An hon. Member: Sit down and let us vote. We have two minutes.

Mr. Starr: Get the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) in here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano has one minute left of his time.

An hon. Member: Just time left to vote.

Mr. Davis: To summarize, Mr. Speaker, we need more responsibility in respect of the old age pensions in this country. We are paying among the highest old age pensions in the world in Canada today. We are going to pay more. We can afford more, but we must, however, say from whom we are going to take the money. We are going to have to say whether we are going to take it away from the head of a young family who is earning $300 a month and give it to an old couple who are receiving $200 a month.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

• (6:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether there is a minister present, or someone substituting for a minister, to announce the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: Where is the cabinet?

Mr. Grégoire: There are no members of the cabinet here.

Mr. Starr: Is there any backbencher who is prepared to announce what the business is going to be?

Mr. Churchill: Where is the shadow cabinet?

Mr. Pilon: I delivered a message to the other side five minutes ago, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: We have not yet received the message.

Mr. Knowles: Then can the hon. member for Ontario tell us what the business of the house will be?

Mr. Starr: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we should go on with—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (St. Ann) presented the second report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

[English]

First and second reports of standing committee on privileges and elections—Mr. McWilliam.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I beg to present, in English and French the eleventh report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

[Translation]

In that report the committee refers back to the house a bill concerning an insurance company.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Patrick T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe) moved that the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Tuesday, July 5, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie) moved that the first report of the special joint committee on penitentiaries, presented to the house on Tuesday, July 5, be concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, once again I want to talk about the quorum of the committees being reduced. At the beginning of the session we objected to the quorum being reduced and the committees sitting at the same time as the house. On many occasions, the government house leader (Mr. McIlraith) and even the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) told us that they would study the situation in order to solve that problem. Nothing has been done yet and every day new committee reports are presented asking for permission to sit at the same time as the house or as is being done today to reduce the quorum. That is not the solution and we ask the government house leader to find a solution as quickly as possible, so that we will no longer be faced with the same problems. That is why we object to concurrence in that report; if it is concurred in, we ask that it be on division.

[English]

Motion agreed to on division.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AGREEMENT FOR RECIPROCAL TRANSFER OF PENSION CREDITS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with Hon. James Allan, provincial treasurer of Ontario, in announcing a reciprocal agreement for the transfer of pension credits for civil servants transferring from the government of Canada to the province of Ontario or vice-versa.

This agreement is designed to assist a person wishing to transfer his employment from one government to the other to transfer at the same time the pension credits which are acceptable to the other government's pension plan. Details of this procedure authorized under the respective superannuation acts have now been completed. September 1, 1965 is the effective date, and transfers on and after that date will be covered by this authority.

With the agreement of the house I should like to table copies of the agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to table the documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR REGULATION OF PRIVATE PLANS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a notice was sent in the usual way to enable a bill having to do with pension benefits standards to be placed on the order paper. Through some pure inadvertence on the part of the clerical staff the bill does not appear on Votes and Proceedings of today as it should have. I should like permission to have this bill dealt with as if it had appeared where it should have, and to have the mistake rectified in that way. I ask for the concurrence of the house in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Does the Minister of Public Works propose that the bill to which he referred a few moments ago be moved?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-221, respecting pension plans organized and administered for the benefit of persons employed in connection with certain federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the minister shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister should have been given an earlier opportunity to give an explanation. Is it agreed that the Minister of Finance shall be given an opportunity to explain the bill now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: This legislation deals with the portability and solvency of private pension plans applicable to employment in works, undertakings and businesses under the jurisdiction of parliament. This bill was contemplated in a statement to the house on December 18, 1964, by the then minister of finance. It is based upon and is very similar to legislation which has been enacted in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Alberta.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST BY INDIAN PRIME MINISTER FOR RECONVENING OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs would the Prime Minister be in a position to advise whether the initiative taken by the Prime Minister of India, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, calling on Russia and Great Britain to reconvene immediately the 1954 Geneva conference on Indo China had been discussed with Canada before being announced by the Prime Minister of India? Also, is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that in the British house the foreign secretary mentioned this initiative, and that the British government would consider the Indian plan with sympathy and hope?

What is the attitude of Canada in this regard? Does Canada support the basis upon which the Prime Minister of India asks for the reconvening of the conference, which is that all foreign troops must be withdrawn from Viet Nam; that Viet Nam must be insulated from what she calls "foreign interference", and that the Geneva conference should guarantee the integrity and independence of a neutral Viet Nam as well as of the neighbouring states of Laos and Cambodia?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We have more than once expressed the hope that the Geneva conference could be reconvened by the chairman with a view to bringing the conflict in Viet Nam to an end. I should not like without further consideration to express an opinion on the conditions laid down by the Prime Minister of India for the calling of such a conference. My first reaction is that if the requirements were insisted upon, it would be very difficult indeed to call such a conference with any chance of success.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say whether there has been any consultation with India or with the United Kingdom with particular reference to the ad hoc suggestion made by the Prime Minister of India? Have any tentative approaches been made to the United States to discover whether such terms would be acceptable?

Mr. Pearson: We have discussed the reconvening of the conference from time to time with both the United Kingdom and the government of India. I am not aware that the particular conditions reported to have been attached to reconvening a conference by the Prime Minister of India were sent to the government of Canada before she made that statement. I had not seen them. Possibly they had come to hand before this morning; I would be glad to look at once to see whether that has happened.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MEDICARE—CONSIDERATION BEFORE SUMMER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and I ask it in the light of certain reports which are current in the press. Is it still the intention of the government that the legislation respecting medicare shall be dealt with before this session recesses, as the Prime Minister indicated on June 1?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is our intention to introduce, I hope within a very few hours, the resolution dealing with medicare, and it is still our hope to get the legislation through all its stages with the least possible delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): The Prime Minister says the medicare resolution will be introduced within a few hours. Was he in communication with the leader of the house before making that statement?

Mr. Pearson: When I say "within a few hours" I mean anything between two and twelve hours.

Mr. Starr: How about three months?

Mr. Pearson: I hope we shall get this resolution introduced into the House of Commons and passed perhaps before the end of the week. That is only a few hours.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question based upon press reports. Is the Prime Minister aware of the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the effect that there have been some conversations with Liberal members in this house who are anxious to join the New Democratic Party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Could the Prime Minister say what are his opinions with regard to this statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is theoretical.

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, I think it might be theoretical if the Prime Minister stated it was not so, but on the surface I think we can only take it for granted that the statement is the truth.

Mr. Speaker: I really think the question is not acceptable at this time.

Mr. Starr: I believe the Prime Minister wishes to correct this situation. I feel certain he does.

Mr. Pearson: I do not wish to be out of order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Further to the statement made in this house yesterday by the minister to the effect that construction of the C.B.C. building at Montreal was delayed by a shortage of skilled labour in the building trades, could the minister tell us whether she has received protests from building labour unions of the province of Quebec and from the Province of Quebec Builders Association to the effect that there was enough competent labour available to work on the C.B.C. building at Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have received protests from no one, and indeed I should not; for it is proceeding exactly as the government planned.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister report on the progress of the talks now going on with the heads of the Carribean governments; and can he assure the house that everything possible is being done to encourage an increase in trade between that area and Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while we are in the midst of the talks I can only say that they are going on extremely well. A committee has been set up to deal with the matter to which my hon. friend refers, to find ways of increasing trade between the Caribbean area and Canada, and we have also discussed other important subjects. We expect to complete our meetings tomorrow evening, and I hope to be in a position to make a statement about the conference when the house convenes on Monday.

Mr. Thompson: As a supplementary question could the Prime Minister tell us whether the government has sought to hear the views of the Caribbean nations on the question of Canadian membership in the Organization of American States?

Mr. Pearson: That has not yet been discussed, Mr. Speaker, but I suspect it will be tomorrow morning.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO RETIREMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence related to the recent announcement of retirements and promotions at senior levels of the armed forces. Can the minister offer the house any explanation for the retirement of three very senior serving officers in the armed forces, two of them four years before normal retirement age and one of them seven years before normal retirement age? Have these retirements any connection with the program for the armed forces now being insisted upon by the minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not urgent. It refers to retirements which have already taken place, and I suggest the question should be placed on the order paper or debated at adjournment time.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to take up the time of the house at the adjournment hour; but the implications of this matter are serious and urgent, as my question will suggest. Since the minister was rising to reply I wonder would Your Honour stretch a point?

Mr. Speaker: I always like to stretch a point for the hon. member for Kamloops.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the retirements are by mutual understanding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: As a supplementary question is it normal understanding or normal policy that at a time when these senior officers should be producing and giving of their maximum contribution, they should retire four and seven years respectively before normal retirement age?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the second question is acceptable.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Were the recent compulsory retirements of senior officers made on the advice of the chief of the defence staff, or is the minister acting as commander in chief of Canada's armed forces and dismissing all those who are critical of his innovations?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the alleged facts in my hon. friend's statement are inaccurate.

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF STANDARD UNIFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has a decision been reached to date to provide a uniform uniform for Canada's armed forces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Not as yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Will he again assure the house, as he did when his estimates were before us, that the kilt will be retained as part of the dress uniform for highland units?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is my intention.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REPORTED FAILURE TO PAY AVERAGE PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister report to the house whether he has found a solution in regard to the payment of $4 milk to producers, in keeping with his election promise?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe that solution was properly announced on March 23 in the house.

Som hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that is not so, and I wonder whether he can report anything further with regard to his meeting this morning.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CUSTOMS OFFICERS—PROTESTS RESPECTING CLASSIFICATION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition asked me yesterday whether I had received a resolution passed by the branch presidents of the Customs and Excise Officers' Association, and asked what was my reaction to this resolution. I did receive, on Monday last, a telegram listing a number of resolutions passed at the branch presidents' meeting last week end, and I have reviewed the contents of the telegram.

As I mentioned yesterday, the results of the pay revision announced last week will have the effect of removing a substantial number of employees from holding classifications, established as a result of the pay conversion program. Furthermore, the chairman of the staff side conference of the public service has endorsed and supports the pay revisions announced last week.

With respect to the second question asked by the right hon. gentleman regarding the government's position toward establishing a regulatory group distinct and separate from the clerical group, the government feels that the pay revision program should be completed as planned, and consideration for changes in the occupational groups should be postponed until the legislation concerning collective bargaining has been passed and initial experience demonstrates that changes are required.

All the questions raised in the telegram have been and will continue to be the subject of consultation between the independent Civil Service Commission, which is responsible for reclassification, the Treasury Board, which is responsible for final decisions on rates of pay, and the major employee organizations. These organizations include the staff side conference and the Civil Service Federation of Canada, to both of which the Customs and Excise Officers' Association is affiliated. Many of the problems involved are extremely complicated and will be worked out only as a result of hard work by all concerned in the normal process of consultation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister answer the suggestion made in this telegram that as a result of the reclassification in the administrative sections to which reference is made by the president of the Customs and Excise Officers' Association, 40 per cent of their staff will find themselves reduced in so far as their salaries and allowances are concerned?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, reclassification does not reduce the salary of any civil servant. What happens in the reclassification which is carried out by the independent Civil Service Commission, and which will increase the federal government payroll with regard to civil servants by 2 per cent, is that when persons are in a classification where they are red circled they will not receive advances until the classification has a ceiling beyond the salary they presently are receiving. In each case employees involved have the right of appeal to the Civil Service Commission with regard to classification.

I should like to point out also that many civil servants are being green circled rather than red circled, and their salaries are being increased.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whether they are green circled, red circled or purple circled, is it a fact, as they allege, that 40 per cent will find themselves in a lesser position than today, and that the appeal of those who are dissatisfied will be to the very body that has fixed the order against which they complain?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that none of the civil servants are blue circled, and that their right of appeal of course will be considered through the departments involved. In my particular department, to which my right hon. friend referred, we are looking to ways of reviewing the status of people who are red circled and of moving them to other classifications if they have the necessary qualifications to move to such classifications. In this case they no longer will be red circled.

I think ultimately all civil servants will be quite pleased with the method of classification and particularly the method of collective bargaining which will result from the reclassification of the civil service.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I was going to ask on this subject yesterday. I should like to ask the minister whether he and the Treasury Board have given consideration to a method of red circling which involves permitting the incumbent on the job to obtain the increases during his term of service and a new person taking that job accepting the rate established, rather than freezing the incumbent without permitting him to get an increase during his term of service.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think this question should be asked at this time; it is very general in nature. I suggest it might be placed on the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF LABOUR SAFETY CODE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Would he consider referring Bill S-35, which is item No. 85 on the order paper, to the appropriate standing committee of the house, in view of the fact that a number of people and organizations who are interested in this bill wish to present briefs and make representations?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think representations from several of these organizations already have been made to a committee of the Senate, but if there are further requests from interested bodies, I certainly will give serious consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

INQUIRY AS TO BUSINESS FOR TODAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to the question asked by my hon. friend for Ontario concerning the business of the house. I wonder whether the government house leader could tell us exactly what the routine is for today, because it was left rather in mid air last night.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not admit there was an error last night.

Mr. Starr: There was nobody here to give the business.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, there were some ministers here. I do not wish to reopen the debate of last night other than to say that there are some things in Hansard that are perhaps not as complete as they ought to be about that. There were two ministers here at the time.

In any event, I understand the hon. member's question concerns the business for today. As the first item we will proceed with the banking resolutions and complete them. Then we will proceed to the income tax bill, the crop insurance bill, the appropriation bill and interim supply, in respect of which I wish to say something in a moment. Then, depending on the hour, we will proceed to the Canada Assistance Plan, and possibly we might wish to call the bill in respect of the national art centre, depending on what members are available.

On interim supply I understand it would be agreeable that debate would proceed without a discussion on Viet Nam until the minister could be in the house. He is in another quite important conference at the moment. When we are dealing with interim supply we might want to ask for some kind of an understanding that this matter would not be debated while he is out of the house.

I should add that there has been some discussion about private members' hours for today and tomorrow. If it were agreeable to hon. members it might be in order to ask for an order of the house suspending private members' hours today and tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the minister's suggestion regarding private members' hours, there are four or five bills which have received the approval of the private bills committee. It would be desirable, and I do not think it would take too long, to have these bills receive third reading today.

Mr. McIlraith: To clarify this point, I understand that private bills do not come up today or tomorrow in private members' hour.

Mr. Fulton: Let us put them on today and tomorrow by agreement.

[Later:]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer again to the business of the house and make a suggestion to the house leader. My comments are related to the proposed change in respect of private members' hours. Perhaps some arrangement could be made by unanimous consent to deal with a few bills now on the order paper sponsored by private members. Members of all parties of the house were very generous of their time in committee this morning in an attempt to see that the business was expeditiously handled. In the interest of seeing that bills are properly handled, I think all interested parties would be happy if some arrangement could be made.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the house leader, in connection with the suggestion that the private members' hour be dispensed with today, that a discussion be held to see whether it would be agreeable to substitute for the consideration of notices of motion for the production of papers, an hour on private bills. There are a substantial number of them, some of them urgent.

An hon. Member: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: I am only suggesting that there might be some discussion on the point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must realize that in order to give effect to the proposal there would have to be unanimous consent, and obviously at least one hon. member has indicated that he is not in agreement.

Mr. Fulton: I am only suggesting that the house leader, with his well known powers of persuasion and ability to get along, discuss this matter with hon. members, and perhaps then the hon. member who indicated his dissent would change his mind.

LABOUR RELATIONS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING STRIKE SETTLEMENT TERMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): May I say, Mr. Speaker, that yesterday I assured the house I would be filing today certain correspondence among the International Longshoremen's Association, their legal advisers, the Prime Minister and his office, and myself and my department. It is taking a little longer than I expected to prepare the documents, but I can now give a positive assurance that they will be filed tomorrow morning.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REFUNDS TO EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and arises out of the announcement he made this afternoon concerning the reciprocal arrangement between the province of Ontario and the federal government for the transfer of pension credits for civil servants. Was any arrangement made for the abatement of over payments on behalf of the employer in this case, which is similar to the situation that prevails with regard to thousands of employers throughout Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that subject is either covered or should be covered in the agreement.

Mr. Hales: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has he as yet arrived at some plan by which overpayments by employers to the Canada Pension Plan can be refunded?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have been considering this matter very seriously but up to the moment we have not found a way of refunding overpayments to employers. Our position in this regard is no different from the position of every other western country which has such a national pension plan.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) asked me whether I had received a request for financial help from the apple growers of St. Pie, St. Paul, St. Hilaire, Rougemont and St. Jean-Baptiste, who incurred serious damages because of hail-storms on June 14 and 17 last.

The same question was directed to me by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) on June 20.

As the hon. member knows, such assistance rests with the provincial government. Until now, the federal government has received no request from the provincial government asking to share in an assistance program to help these fruit growers.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

If such a request were made, would the minister give serious consideration to the losses incurred—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is becoming hypothetical.

[Later:]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In his reply to me a minute ago he informed the house that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) had dealt with this question on June 20.

Would he say whether the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville dealt with this question here in the house, orally or in writing?

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I feel I am entitled to a reply, and to a complete reply.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question of the hon. member is not one which can be entertained in the circumstances.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the reason I insist is that I was unable to find in Hansard for June 20—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not as urgent as the hon. member seems to think or would indicate. If he feels that the question should in fact be considered by the minister, he is free to serve notice that the question will be brought up under the adjournment motion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—RESOLUTION OF CANADIAN UN ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs received a resolution from the United Nations Association of Canada over the signature of Willson Woodside, stating that the association supports the stand taken by U Thant on June 20, 1966, and the following three recommendations; a halt to United States bombing of North Viet Nam; a scaling down of operations by all sides, and the calling on all parties to enter into discussions with all those participating in the fighting? What action does the government plan to take in respect of this resolution?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this resolution may have reached my office but I do not recall having seen it. I will check into this immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I cannot get a satisfactory answer from the Minister of National Defence, so I will not ask another question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED ADMINISTRATION BY TRUSTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the conflict which exists in the C.B.C. is widespread, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the serious trouble that exists, will the government consider creating a trusteeship for this organization and, if so, would it be possible to appoint Mr. Ernest Bushnell to this assignment?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): That is quite a novel idea, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO DUTIES OF H. G. WALKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether, in view of various rumours and statements in the press, she can inform the house as to the present functions and duties of Mr. H. G. Walker.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the position of Mr. Walker is vice president of C.B.C. He has within the last 24 hours, since we met yesterday, removed himself from consideration as a possible candidate for the new vice presidency in Toronto, responsible for public affairs programming.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

PROTESTS RESPECTING LACK OF BILINGUAL R.C.M.P. OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Solicitor General.

Did he receive from the city of Hull protests against the fact that Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers patrolling the National Capital Commission territory are almost all exclusively unilingual, English speaking that is? Can he also advise the house what he intends to do to put an end to this anomaly?

Mr. Speaker: This question could easily be put on the order paper.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO ORGANIZATION OF YOUTH PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. Is that hon. lady now in a position to advise the house as to whether the centennial commission of Canada will proceed now or next year with initial planning for a centennial youth parliament to be held next year?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this matter has now gone to the centennial commission and from there to the cabinet for consideration. I am grateful to the hon. member for providing me with this opportunity to thank members of this chamber and the upper chamber for the many hours they spent studying this situation, because the Fair proposal was inadequate; and for giving the best of their advice to the centennial commission in order that it may be possible to hold a youth parliament.

I will make an announcement as to whether it will or will not be held as soon as a final decision has been taken. Let me add that should parliament not be in session I shall notify all members by mail.

HOUSING

REPORTED SHORTAGE OF MORTGAGE MONEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the very important statement made a day or so ago by the head of C.M.H.C., is the government now considering further action in order to fill the needs of prospective home owners?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the head of C.H.M.C. makes many important announcements, and I am not just sure which one the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Grafftey: The one I have in mind relates to the fact that there is a serious decline in house building this year from last year and many Canadians who need homes are going to be without them. Has the government given any consideration to immediate constructive and positive action in this regard?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the government has given and is giving serious consideration to this matter and has taken positive action. I have some very interesting figures here about house building in Canada, and I will be glad to furnish the hon. member with them on request, but I do not think I should do so on orders of the day.

Mr. Grafftey: May I ask another supplementary question. In spite of the figures the minister could give the house, is it the opinion of the government that the needs of prospective home owners are not being filled under present circumstances?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now asking for the expression of an opinion.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General, but in his absence I should like to direct it to the acting minister. My question is consequent upon the reply of the Minister of Industry as recorded on page 7273 of Hansard of July 6. Will the Postmaster General commence an investigation to determine the possible loss in the mails of a letter from Queen's Park, Toronto, dated May 19, 1966, written by

Inquiries of the Ministry

Ross M. Whicher, member of the legislative assembly for Bruce, addressed to the Prime Minister?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): May I clear up what may have been a misunderstanding on my part yesterday in giving a negative answer to the hon. member's question. I thought he was asking whether this letter had been addressed to me, to which my answer was no.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question that is in order, contrary to the previous one.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, since he had talks this morning with the Quebec and Ontario ministers of agriculture, whether he is in a position to report to the house on these talks and also to indicate to the house what conclusions have been reached during such talks?

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): This morning I had a very interesting and useful meeting with the provincial ministers from Quebec and Ontario. These discussions are under my consideration and that of my officials at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether Mr. Clément Vincent, provincial minister of agriculture, has reiterated to the minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Choquette: I do not see why they applaud a man who repudiated them.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture—

[English]

Anyway, he left the Conservative party because he did not feel at home within that party.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough—

[Mr. Loney.]

Mr. Choquette: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, if my friends opposite have the courtesy to let me.

I want to ask the minister whether Mr. Vincent has promised to carry out the commitments he made during the election campaign to the effect that he would implement the proposals of the Liberal party—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to inform the house that the Conservative party has not repudiated Mr. Clément Vincent. On the contrary, we are very proud of him and I think he can do much to instruct the federal Minister of Agriculture who is far from an expert in this field—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Choquette: There is no room for a French Canadian within the Conservative party.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we please have order in the house.

[Later:]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises out of the very commendable action of the ministers of agriculture of Ontario and Quebec on behalf of the dairy industry in requesting a meeting with the minister. May I ask the minister whether these gentlemen have requested any other meetings of this kind in regard to other segments of agriculture?

Mr. Greene: Not to my knowledge at the present time.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): May I put a supplementary question to the minister. The night before last the minister said on television that he was a fatalist. Does this mean he is fatalistic about the dairy farmers ever getting the $4?

Mr. Greene: I am sufficiently fatalistic to believe we shall remain on this side for a long time.

AIR TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—THREATENED WALKOUT OF RADIO OPERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will put it to his parliamentary secretary. It is a somewhat urgent question related to air traffic safety. Has a telegram been received from the radio operators in the British Columbia region asking for an early and firm date to be set to settle their wage classifications so as to avoid the possibility of a walkout?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this is a question which can be asked at this time.

Mr. Mather: I hope the parliamentary secretary has taken notice of the question.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATION OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and it arises out of the recent visit by hon. members of this chamber and of the other place to the Expo site in Montreal. Will the minister assure the house that the Canadian agricultural industry will have suitable and prominent representation, displays and exhibits at Expo '67, particularly for the Canadian dairy industry and other products which we sell on the world markets?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, I do not think this question can be asked at this time. It can be placed on the order paper or discussed later.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—PROVISION FOR INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport but in his absence I will put it to his parliamentary secretary and ask him to take it as notice and give the answer tomorrow. In the estimates for the Department of Transport there is an item regarding the installation of escalators at the Winnipeg international airport. Is the minister now in a position to tell the house when this work will be commenced?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not so urgent as to warrant it being asked at this time.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—REVISION OF REPORT RESPECTING STUDENT NEEDS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): My question, Mr. Speaker, is addressed to the Minister of Finance and concerns the student loans program. On June 11 of last year the former minister of finance tabled a report in this house which appears in Hansard of that day. The report contains a section entitled "Approved Report of the Federal-Provincial Standing Committee on the Concept of Students' Need." My question is whether this section of the report has been revised. If so, will the minister consider tabling the revision in the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It appears to the Chair that this is a question of general nature and therefore cannot be asked now.

SHIPBUILDING

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REPEAL OF VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance and concerns Bill C-216. This week the minister said he was considering the deferment of some of the sections of this bill. In view of the fact that the bill may come up for study this afternoon, can the minister tell us the results of his consideration?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. When the bill is called I will move to have the sections dealing with the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act deleted and reconsidered later in the year.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the minister's intention to introduce a further bill to amend the Income Tax Act dealing with those budget resolutions which are not contained in Bill C-216? If not, are we to assume those budget resolutions have been dropped?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. There are some sections of the resolutions, particularly those dealing with deferred profit sharing plans, which have proven to be extremely difficult to translate into legislation, so rather than hold up the bill which contains some provisions which should be enacted immediately it was decided to introduce legislation later, to cover these resolutions. I have no intention of dropping any of the proposals.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): At this session?

BANK ACT

DECENNIAL REVISION AND EXTENSION OF CHARTERS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 6, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1976, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, which concerns something about which we had an agreement at a house leaders' meeting earlier today. I am sorry the point was not raised while the government house leader was present. It has to do with the length of time remaining in this debate, which is one hour and nine minutes. Hon. members will recall that at the start of this session when we amended the rules so that the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition would not be limited to a 20-minute period at this stage of debate, it was agreed that if either of them took more than 20 minutes that time would be added at the end of the debate.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that at the house leaders' meeting this morning there was no contention or argument about it at all. It was agreed that the 37 minutes extra that were taken between them by the Minister of Finance and the Leader of the Opposition would be added at the end of this debate, thus making it possible for two more speakers than would otherwise be the case. I am sure the house leaders who are present can confirm this agreement.

Mr. Starr: I think the time just taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should be added to that time also.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

The Chairman: The standing order which governs the time allocated to this debate is standing order 61A which reads as follows:

When a resolution preceding a bill involving the expenditure of public money has been referred to the committee of the whole house, the time allowed for consideration thereof in such committee shall not exceed one sitting day. For the purposes of this standing order, such a resolution shall be deemed to have been considered for one sitting day, provided the order to go into committee of the whole house is called as the first item under government orders on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, and provided it is continued, if necessary, until the normal time of adjournment on any such day. Such an order having been called on any Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, it shall have precedence over all other business until the time of adjournment on that day, unless it is disposed to earlier. Under any other circumstances, a total of five hours shall be deemed to be the equivalent of one sitting day.

This is the standing order by which the Chair is governed. If, however, it is the wish of the committee to do otherwise, I shall of course carry out the necessary procedure. Up to this point the Chair has not been advised of any agreement having been reached, other than what has been said in the committee this afternoon.

Mr. Pennell: On behalf of the government house leader I am pleased to concur in the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that the extra 37 minutes be added to the time allotted for this debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: I just hope the five minutes taken to reach this agreement will not be taken off my time. When I was caught by the clock last night I was dealing with the Porter Royal Commission and expressing some criticism of that and other commissions making recommendations in a constitutional void, that is to say, making recommendations for action without careful study of the constitutional considerations which apply to their recommendations. I was even more startled by the remarks yesterday of the hon. member for Kamloops, who gave us a very interesting and learned discourse on banking and financial policy. He did so in the never, never land of constitutional unreality, because he called for a number of reforms and courses of action without reference to the British North America Act.

For example, the hon. member did what the royal commission did and called for far greater control over what has become known as near-banks. I take it that the hon. member for Kamloops, in referring to near-banks, was referring to deposit-taking institutions. I should like to inform him, Mr. Chairman, that there are in the country only eight federally incorporated trust companies which are doing approximately one-third of the trust business in Canada. The huge trust companies such as National, Montreal, Royal, Crown and Trust General are all provincial institutions. I hope the hon. member for Kamloops is not suggesting that at the moment we in this house have the constitutional power to deal with those trust companies or near-banks.

We also have federally incorporated mortgage loan companies under the Companies Act. There are, I think, some 12 of those, some of which are deposit-taking institutions. They are doing two-thirds of the business, leaving about one-third for provincial institutions. I say, with regret, that we in this house do not have the power to pass amendments to the Bank Act to deal with these provincial institutions.

I am one of those, and I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops is, who favour more uniformity in our financial legislation and greater regulatory powers to deal with the various banks, near-banks, finance companies and loan companies. However, I say it is unrealistic for the hon. member for Kamloops and other hon. members opposite to make suggestions without reference to the constitution. I would remind them that we are discussing the revision of the Bank Act, not the revision of the British North America Act. Much as that act, in my view, needs amending and revising, much as the constitution needs revising, we are dealing with the Bank Act and not the constitution.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Basford: I am very limited as to time and perhaps I could answer the question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Fulton: It is a short one. The hon. member is aware—

Mr. Basford: I am sorry, but my time is limited. I would hope we could have a revision of the British North America Act. Possibly if it were not for the stand the right hon. gentleman opposite took in this house some time ago with regard to what had become known as the Fulton-Favreau formula, we might now have in Canada a formula for amending the constitution.

The hon. member for Kamloops and other hon. gentlemen opposite have also made reference in the course of their speeches to the collapse last year of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation and British Mortgage Corporation which caused real concern in the financial community in Canada. This situation is of great concern to all of us. Surely the hon. member for Kamloops does not suggest that we in this house have the power at the present time to pass legislation dealing with a corporation like British Mortgage Corporation.

I think that the course suggested by the minister in introducing the resolution, in which he called for a federal-provincial approach to the problem of getting greater uniformity in our financial legislation, is the only approach that can be taken at this time. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have forgotten or have completely left unread the statement by the minister which appears at page 7233 of Hansard for July 5 when he said, in stating government policy:

> As part of the long-term policy to promote competition and flexibility in the financial system, it is desirable that progress be made in the legislation governing all financial institutions, both federal and provincial, and that the measures taken in regard to the various classes of institutions should be related to one another in such a way as to achieve this broad objective.

Then in a later paragraph he said:

> Officials of the federal and provincial governments have recently met to discuss these and related matters. Out of this activity of both levels of government will come, I trust, a broadly integrated approach designed to improve our financial system as a whole so that it can better serve Canadian individuals and Canadian business.

In view of our constitution I think that is the only approach that can be taken to this question of uniformity.

As chairman of the special joint Senate-House of Commons committee investigating consumer credit, I am sure that that committee, which is now writing its report, will have a good deal to say, judging by the evidence it has heard, about the need for uniformity in legislation and the need for legislation. It will be making recommendations dealing with federally-incorporated small loan companies and federally-incorporated finance companies. But until the report of the Senate—House of Commons committee is before the house I suggest it is too early to do something about the matter right now. That committee has carried on an exhaustive examination into the situation, and I think its report should be awaited by this house and by the Minister of Finance.

However, Mr. Chairman, I welcome the minister's statement that there will be a federal-provincial conference on the question of consumer credit. The question of interest disclosure, or truth in lending as it is often called, has become one which raises very difficult federal-provincial considerations. The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, which I think put a very restrictive meaning on the word "interest", has further complicated the situation when dealing with actual consumer costs. Interest, in its restrictive sense, is only one small part of the total consumer credit cost and unless we in this house have the power to deal with interest and finance charges as a cost to consumers, we will be in difficulty.

We have seen other provinces taking action in the consumer credit field. I refer to Ontario, Alberta and New Brunswick. We in this house and the federal government itself have some constitutional authority in this regard. I would hope that we have a great deal, but the extent of our power is somewhat in question at the moment. Therefore, if we are to have a total approach to the protection of consumers against those who want to charge exorbitant and excessive consumer finance charges, we will need an integrated and co-ordinated federal-provincial approach which can only be arrived at under the aegis of a federal-provincial conference.

In referring to the revisions of the Bank Act I should like to make reference in the short time allowed me to only two other points. One is the right of banks to enter the conventional mortgage field and to take as security mortgages on real property.

We have heard from members opposite contentions that the revisions of the Bank Act must protect the little man or be concerned with the little man, and we have been criticized because our revisions do not do this. I suggest that one aspect of the revisions does take into account very seriously the situation of a great many small home owners in the country. During the period 1954-59 the chartered banks of Canada acquired a great many National Housing Act mortgages. The banks invested a great deal of their funds in this type of security. As the interest rate on National Housing Act mortgages went up, the banks withdrew from this field and at the present time are virtually not lending any money for this type of mortgage because the interest rate on such mortgages exceeds the 6 per cent ceiling.

Under these revisions, Mr. Chairman, the banks will be allowed, as I think they should be, to take up this type of mortgage business again. A great problem is being faced by the many small home owners in this country who presently have their houses financed through National Housing Act mortgages. When they come to sell these houses they sell them on terms of cash to mortgage. As these mortgages are reduced or become amortized, it becomes increasingly difficult to get terms of cash to mortgage unless the homes are refinanced with another mortgage, which is not available from the banks today. Allowing the banks into this area will mean that home owners who are anxious to sell their houses and can only do so by refinancing will be able to refinance them through the present holder of the mortgage, namely, one of the chartered banks. By allowing the banks into this area, Mr. Chairman, we are also bringing about competition with the conventional mortgage lenders.

However, there is another important aspect which has not been mentioned in this debate. The chartered banks, by having thousands of branches across Canada located in every community, will be able to provide to people in those smaller communities mortgage services which are not available to them at the present time. Most of the big conventional mortgage lenders' offices are located in the large centres of Canada only and people living, for example, in Kamloops, Prince George, Nanaimo or Nelson in my own province have difficulty raising mortgage funds from conventional lenders. If the banks which are located in all these smaller centres are allowed into this area, this will provide the people there with a very much needed mortgage service.

Much has been said about the intimation of the minister that the bank interest ceiling rate will be raised. I suggest that this will increase the degree of competition existing between the banks and subsidiary lending institutions such as finance companies and loan companies.

I suggest that over the years, in building up what is undoubtedly one of the safest and most secure banking systems in the world, we have in fact placed our banks in a strait-jacket within which they must operate. I suggest that because the banks are in this strait-jacket, which we have imposed upon them through legislation, the banking system of Canada is no longer serving the nation as it should. Because of this strait-jacket, we have seen over the years a fantastic and tremendous growth in near-banks, trust and loan companies and finance and acceptance corporations. At the same time, many of these corporations are filling needs which the banks must be allowed to fill if they are to serve the nation. Because of the strait-jacket into which we have put the banks, over the years they have become no longer able to fill the need for credit which exists. I suggest that we must remove or untie some of that strait-jacket and I contend that this is what the revisions will do.

Much has also been said by members on the opposite side of the house about the small businessman, the small farmer, the fisherman and the truck logger. I come from a province of such people, people who under the present Bank Act are unable by and large to go to a bank now and obtain credit or loans for their business operations in order to buy their trucks, farm equipment or fishing boats. Because of the restrictions imposed on the banks by the Bank Act, these people are forced into the hands of the loan sharks and acceptance companies, which are lending money obtained from banks at a low rate of interest to these farmers, small businessmen, truck loggers and fishermen at greatly increased and inflated interest rates. I suggest that by lifting the interest ceiling on the banks and allowing them to compete more effectively with the existing lending institutions, we will help these small people.

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted him has expired.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, one of the important objectives of the Conservative party is to do whatever we can to help bring down the interest rates which are paid by the average Canadian on the money he needs to operate his business or his farm, or for his own personal needs. We believe that this can be best done by bringing all lending institutions in Canada under the Bank Act, thus enabling them to operate under the same ground rules and to engage in all-out competition for the loan business of the Canadian people. We are convinced that this kind of competition will provide the lowest interest rates and the best service possible to the people of this country.

All financial institutions can be brought under the Bank Act by consultation with and co-operation by the provinces. It is just a question of sitting down and explaining what we have in mind and what objectives and benefits are to be derived therefrom. The provinces are just as anxious as we are to have the lending institutions under their jurisdiction come under the provisions of the Bank Act, because they know that this will make possible a general lowering of interest rates charged on loans to the people they represent in their provincial jurisdictions.

We all know that the interest rates which are charged on loans vary according to the security which the borrower is able to put up to secure his loan. Because of the differences existing in the various kinds of security that borrowers can provide, naturally there is a wide variation today in interest rates charged in all parts of the country. In merchandising goods and services, practice has clearly proved that prices are lower and service to the customer is better where competition for the customer's dollar is the keenest.

The same principle applies, of course, to the business of lending money. It was for that reason that the Porter Commission recommended that the best way to ensure the greatest availability of loans to the public and the lowest rates of interest on all types of loans would be for all lending institutions in Canada to be brought under the Bank Act. In this way, when this is done, they will be in a position to compete freely and fairly for the business of those who wish to borrow money in this country. Having talked to officials of a number of our chartered banks I know, as I am sure other hon. members know, that the banks would welcome this kind of competition against the near-banks for the loan dollar of the Canadian people.

In fields where greater competition between the banks and the near-banks has been allowed for instance, in the personal loan field, rates have been reduced very materially from somewhere around 18 per cent to approximately 10 per cent, which is a very important reduction indeed. If this kind of competition were allowed to take place for all types of loans the interest rate on the great majority of loans would be greatly reduced by the far greater competition which there would be for this business.

We in the Conservative party agree with the recommendations of the Porter Commission which was established by our government some years ago to develop thinking and recommendations for such time as the Bank Act would come under revision. We strongly condemn the present government for not carrying out the recommendations of that commission, recommendations which were clearly and carefully thought out after many months of extremely hard and careful work. We condemn the government for not incorporating the commission's recommendations in the legislation now before the house.

Turning to the resolution we are debating today we see that it provides for a raising of the bank rate according to a formula which is not based on any business principle geared to the needs of business or agriculture. We are reliably informed that the formula was worked out a very short time ago after a great deal of controversy within the government and is geared far more to bringing harmony to the warring factions within the government party than to any business or economic need. This resolution completely disregards the most important recommendation contained in the report of the Porter Commission, which was that the removal of the interest rate ceiling must be coupled with bringing the near-banks under the Bank Act.

Today, Mr. Chairman, as we in this house know very well, industry and agriculture in all parts of the country are suffering from the tight money policy which has been imposed by this government. This policy is making it impossible for many farmers and businessmen to obtain the capital they need to carry out the normal business expansion they must carry out each year in order to handle the additional business which a growing economy in a country such as Canada makes available to them. If they are not able to expand and take advantage of the additional sales which they could otherwise make, these sales, particularly in the export market, will go to other customers in other countries and they will be very difficult, if not impossible, to regain.

Anyone who has been in business knows that once a customer becomes used to dealing with somebody else, he will very likely find out that the other person can provide just as good a standard of service, or perhaps better, than you can, and the customer tends to remain with the other supplier even though you are able to come back into the market and offer him your goods again. The only way that our farmers and industrialists can cut costs and thereby make a better return on the capital and labour they put into their operations is to expand production and, by making use of the economies of scale, cut their initial costs as much as possible.

We in the Conservative party are convinced that the proper role for government to play in business and agriculture today is to help these people about whom I have spoken help themselves in every way possible. We believe that the government should be assisting our businessmen and our farmers in every way possible to expand their operations, thereby providing more jobs for our people and more prosperity for our country.

We believe that the best way to do this is to take steps to provide adequate credit at the lowest possible rates of interest. This, we are convinced, will be done if all our financial institutions are brought under the Bank Act, as was strongly urged by the report of the Porter Commission. If this is done these financial institutions will be able to enter into fair and wide open competition for the lending dollar of the Canadian people. This, we are convinced, will result in the average Canadian being able to borrow the money he needs at a considerably lower rate of interest than he has to pay today.

We in this party have decided that when this government does decide to follow the recommendations of the commission that was set up to give very deep and penetrating study to this matter and when it decides to bring the near-banks under the Bank Act and thereby make possible a general lowering of interest rates by greater competition, we shall then be very pleased indeed to support this measure. Until then we intend to oppose it.

Mr. Sharp: Since the hon. gentleman's time has not expired I believe, may I ask him a question? I followed his remarks with great interest. I was not clear on one point. Perhaps he could elucidate to me the connection between bringing these institutions under the Bank Act and the maintenance of competition. I failed to follow the argument there.

Mr. Hees: If all our lending institutions are not brought under the Bank Act, and if they do not operate under the same ground rules, some of our financial institutions will be faced by unfair competition from other members of the lending community. The competition will not be fair, free and wide open. As the Porter Commission said, the only fair way in which all our lending institutions can compete, and the best way to make sure we get the greatest possible competition and the lowest possible rates of interest, is to bring all these lending institutions under the Bank Act.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, it is always strange to hear a minister being criticized for doing what the critics are accusing him of not doing. If there is any criticism to be made of the minister it is that he has slavishly followed the Porter Commission recommendations. If we examine the proposals he has introduced we will find they have been taken almost word for word from the report of that commission. The argument about whether or not near-banks should be brought under federal jurisdiction is, I suspect, a piece of camouflage.

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite should save their applause; I have some things to say about which they may feel differently. The advisability of bringing near-banks under federal jurisdiction is questionable at this time though one might well be tempted to ask the government why it does not try to do so. The government has indicated its intention to introduce this legislation and there will be time in the months ahead to consider carefully what precisely is meant by "bank" and what authority the federal government possesses in this field. These questions might well be referred to a court which could adjudicate upon them, because I think definitions of this kind are badly needed.

With the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who hinted at it, everybody seems to have overlooked the fact that the federal government does have clear-cut jurisdiction over interest rates under the British North America Act. If the federal government were really serious about regulating the financial institutions of this country it would have no need for any jurisdiction or authority beyond that which it already possesses.

I suggest to the minister that the federal government could, if it wished, control interest rates throughout Canada and that it is within the framework of its authority to do so. If the minister does not do so in this particular case, it is a clear indication that he has no intention of using control over interest rates in order to remedy national problems as he sees them.

We should be well advised to take a careful look at the sugar-coated pill which the doctor is introducing into this house and intends to administer to the Canadian people. He has made some accommodations. He has suggested certain reforms which are long overdue, and in these areas some credit is due him. I have in mind particularly the hidden reserves of banks. For the first time in Canada we have a Minister of Finance who is beginning to realize that this business of hidden reserves has not always worked to the benefit of the Canadian people and of the tax collectors of this country. I am pleased an attempt will now be made to obtain disclosure of information concerning the relationship between profits and hidden reserves.

The sugar coating covering this measure does, however, hide an extremely bitter centre. At the core of this entire measure is the question of interest rates. Whatever may be said about the fringes, at the heart of this legislation is the question: what will happen to interest rates? Will they rise, will they fall, or will they be allowed to float with the market?

What is happening here is typical of what is happening to the Liberal party. By permitting this legislation to come forward as an instrument of their policy the Liberal party is moving unequivocally to the right. Any idea that there might be a left wing or reform movement within that party should now be completely dispelled. I do not hold the minister responsible for this. The Minister is a right-winger; he has an integrity of his own, and what he has brought in is a right-wing policy.

I listened with some sadness the other evening to the hon. member for St. John's West when he talked about the needs of his particular area, criticized some members of this house for wishing to return to a laissez-faire economy and welcomed the fact that the government was prepared to play a role in Canadian finance. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what is not happening. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West should have a heart to heart talk with the Minister of Finance. What his minister has in effect said is that we are now returning completely to a laissez-faire economy. The controls which now exist will be dropped in favour of market regulation and the only restraints, the only restrictions, will be what the traffic can bear and what the market will accommodate itself to accepting.

Our economy has its problems and it is interesting to see the way in which the minister, after an analysis of those problems, has arrived at solutions. Questions have been asked in the house many times concerning the shortage of mortgage money in Canada. We know there is such a shortage. We know the cost of mortgage money has risen. The minister's answer to these questions—and he has only one answer—is: First, we shall raise the ceiling, then we shall free the rate and the competition will take care of the situation.

I suggest to the minister that this is not what will happen. In some circumstances such as a major recession—and I suspect the minister knows the circumstances—the applying of these rates in an economy where some elements are competing fiercely for money might lead to those levels finding a proper and just point at which to settle. But we are moving toward a managed economy to a considerable extent, an economy within which no government will permit a serious recession to take place. It is obvious that interest rates cannot be completely fluid in circumstances of this kind.

We know the banks are lent out. All financial institutions are lent out. How will the minister get more mortgage money unless it is diverted from other sources? How will he get cheaper money in the circumstances he is developing for us? If the bank rate in this situation is freed from restriction or permitted to increase, I have no hesitation in saying that Canada will face the highest interest rates, the highest cost of money, in all history.

Nobody can say where that level will settle, whether it will be 1 per cent more, 2 per cent more, or what. If in this situation the bank rate goes up by 1 per cent you may rest assured that the trust companies, the near-banks and other financial institutions will increase their rates by that differential and in effect what you will have is a competition for money.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I am very interested in his comments, and I think this is something that seems to engage the attention of his party more than anything else, namely, whether one moves to the right or to the left. Is he suggesting that the members of the Porter Commission made their recommendation because they unanimously favoured a move to the right?

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Saltsman: I do not know the members of the Porter Commission. However, I have read their recommendations and if ever I have seen recommendations suggesting a return to a laissez-faire economy they are the recommendations of the Porter commission. Whether they knew they were doing this I do not know. However, the minister has followed them quite faithfully, and this is my conception of a return to what I would have thought was an outdated doctrine in the 20th century.

Mr. Sharp: Does the hon. member think that Mr. Gordon L. Harrold and Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, distinguished members of the commission, would have recommended a turn to the right?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Minister, you too are a very distinguished member of this house despite the fact that you are a right-winger. Being a right-winger does not make you any more or less distinguished. It is merely an indication of the way you think.

Returning to the question of mortgage money I would refer to an article in the Financial Post of July 22 headed "Mortgage Drought Is A Red-Hot Issue Now," which quoted a Toronto businessman as saying:

> I won't pay 7¾ per cent—8 per cent for a mortgage. If I can't do better, I'll have to forget about buying a house for the time being.

I assume that Toronto businessman is doing a little better than the fellow who works in a factory; yet he cannot afford to buy a house now. So what happens to the fellow working in a factory if interest rates go up, and they will go up under the conditions described by the minister?

If interest rates on mortgages increase from 7 per cent to 8 per cent this means a difference of $106 per year. In other words a 1 per cent rise costs the home owner $106 per year. Translated into weeks this comes to $2 extra per week. But if the working man goes out and says he needs more money, then everybody in the country suddenly throws up their hands at the spectacle of the dreadful working man asking for more money.

From the viewpoint of inflation, how much more inflationary can anything be? Take that extra cost in every business and pass it on to the consumer and you really have got a cost-wage spiral position, and there will be nobody to blame but the minister for introducing this kind of legislation. I hope the minister will remember this if he hears the cry that the working man needs more money and is asking for more money. In that case I hope the minister will be very sympathetic to the working man's demands. He should be, because if this legislation goes through in its present form he will be largely responsible for the inflation that will take place.

The minister says that the necessity of removing the ceiling on the rate is so that small businessmen will be not be the victims of loan sharks. This is very commendable and I appreciate the minister's concern for small businessmen. Everyone in this chamber shares the same concern. But is the minister really helping the small businessman? Has he discovered the percentage of small businessmen who are really going to the sharks and paying high interest? If the minister would take a statistical look he would find that the vast majority of small businessmen still go to the banks and get accommodation from them. If the bank rate is raised the vast majority of small businessmen will be hurt, and the increased cost they will pay for money will be passed on to the public.

If the minister wants to correct the abuses that exist in the system, and there are abuses, I again mention the remedy I suggested which is within the minister's jurisdiction, namely, control interest rates in Canada. The federal government has the authority to control them. We can do it in the same way as we do under the Small Loans Act and the Moneylenders Act. If the minister is going to have a managed economy from the fiscal point of view he should also consider it from a monetary point of view, and I suggest this is a more useful instrument for ensuring that Canada would not become an expensive money country, certainly more useful than freeing the rate and letting the market determine what interest rates should be.

We have also heard that the bank rate has to be freed in order to help consumers who borrow money. On this point I might digress for a minute to say that one of the most salutary events that has taken place has been the entry of the banks into the consumer lending field. They have done an admirable, excellent job despite the fixed 6 per cent interest rate. As we all know, that rate is not maintained in this field. The banks cannot engage in that kind of business at 6 per cent, but their entry into this field has been most useful. It should be encouraged. But why do we have to take the interest ceiling off in a blanket way? Why remove it completely?

Why couldn't the banks be freed of the ceiling in the area of consumer lending and allowed a special rate? Even in the area of mortgage lending they could have a special rate. There is no reason to believe that the banks have to be either restricted or completely free. There are intermediate ways of accomplishing the necessary objectives.

However, the minister has taken a look at a situation that needs correcting and has come up with a one-note answer—free the interest rate. This is supposed to be a new panacea, but it is only a return to 18th century mercantilism. That is not good enough. If the minister is doing this with the thought in the back of his mind that by making Canada a high interest rate country he can attract foreign capital, then he had better tell us so.

Because my time allotment has almost expired I want to reserve the last few minutes for a brief summation of what I think the effects of the Bank Act revision will be. To remove the interest ceiling without proper safeguards is to raise the cost of every single thing in this country. It is to put the cost of money in Canada at a height it has never achieved previously, and one that no one at this point can calculate. Interest rates of 8 per cent and 9 per cent on commercial lending may be possible through this type of approach. The present 6 per cent ceiling on the banks may be rigid, may in some ways be unfair and may require some changes, but to remove the only protection we have and not bring in some other assurance that there will be regulatory factors in the economy, is to invite a disaster of the greatest proportion for everyone who uses and needs money in Canada.

• (4:20 p.m.)

If the minister feels that some rates have to be increased then the minister alone should not determine what that increase shall be. He should set up a board to which those who require the increase, and who can present a good argument for it, can come, and it can then be decided in the national interest whether such an interest rate should be permitted. One way or another an increase in the interest rate will affect the entire cost of living in this country. Everyone, whatever he may do and whatever he may buy, will be affected because interest rates are as much a component in the cost of products as is labour. If he is concerned about low-cost housing he might as well forget about it. It will be dead. There will be no low-cost housing and there will be no medium-priced housing. There will only be high-cost housing in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might have the indulgence of the house for a minute.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to thank all members of the house. I shall be only a few minutes more. Every cost of government borrowing will move up. The taxpayers will have to share this burden. Municipalities will find that bonds will rise with the rise in the bank rate. We will reach a point where either we will be paying far more than we should for municipal government developments or we will not be able to afford them at all.

In short, then, unless a regulatory body to control interest rates is brought in or unless the federal government is willing to set a ceiling on interest rates throughout the country I, and I am sure many other members of this house, will not be able to support the proposals of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Chairman, it was important to introduce before the recess the resolution dealing with the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the existing charters until July 1, 1976.

After first reading, all those who are interested will have the opportunity to study the bill. And, as stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), they will be able, later this fall, to express their views and recommendations to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs to which it will be referred.

This bill affects practically all Canadians, because banking operations play a vital part in our economic and social life and our banks must be able to play that part without being hindered by obsolete legislation which does not take into account today's economic realities.

Our banking system is fortunately, as mentioned by several hon. members, one of the best in the world, but it is certainly possible to improve it to the greater benefit of the people in general. It is readily agreed that our banks play a very important role. And our hopes for greater economic independence in the future may depend on the way the government will legislate in the banking field. We are already late in making this revision, but in 1964 when the bank charters expired, it was necessary to extend them in order to be able to study the long and complex report which the royal commission on banking and finance had just submitted.

It is a very detailed and exhaustive study which constitutes an excellent work of reference and the fact that it is approximately seven times heavier than the MacMillan report published 30 years ago shows to what extent our financial system has become complicated.

Of course, that shows the commissioners' very commendable preoccupation to present a complete report. In 1965, the adjournment of both houses prevented the study in committee of the bill after the resolution stage. After what the Minister of Finance has said, it seems that the government has decided to limit and prevent foreign control of Canadian banks. And that decision will meet with the approval of all those who take an interest in our economic future, because previously nothing prevented a foreign bank from acquiring an important part of the shares, if not all of them, of an existing Canadian bank.

If, on the one hand, customers could derive some benefit from the fact that those banks might bring new ideas and initiatives, a different way of doing business, however, they would certainly be less receptive and sympathetic when it came to following the recommendations and suggestions of the Canadian authorities as pointed out in the report of the Porter commission.

Moreover, it would be disastrous for many Canadian businesses whose operations might be transferred elsewhere. If a bank, for instance, were controlled by American interests, it could then easily obtain the patronage of a Canadian subsidiary, of a company which would already be its customer in the United States.

The government wants to encourage the greatest competition and variety possible in the service of loans and savings to meet the needs of Canadians during the next decade. And this can be done by allowing an increase in the number of banks in Canada; the government has wisely decided that the new banks will have to be in the hands of Canadians.

It had been recommended by the royal commission on banking and finance, which is based on the experience of several generations of banking transactions, that the Bank Act be extended so as to include several institutions which are not subject to it now, and which are under the provincial jurisdiction instead.

It is certain, Mr. Chairman, that several of our institutions could come within the banking system without its soundness being affected, and they would benefit thereby, but the important question of the constitutionality of that measure must be taken into consideration and the government has taken a wise course in attempting to incite them to come freely within our banking system. This is certainly a field where there should be co-operation and consultation between the various levels of government.

The minister has given to understand that the provinces or their agencies will henceforth be allowed to invest in bank shares without voting privileges and I think he is well advised to open such an investment opportunity to provincial funds, because normally a province or one of its agencies should be empowered to invest all their funds in gilt-edged bank stocks and there is no reason to deprive them of this right in the present circumstances.

The minister has also announced a federal-provincial conference on consumer credit this fall and I hope that, by then, it may be possible to come to an agreement to require all credit firms throughout the country to indicate and clearly publish the actual interest charges, so that all credit institutions, whether under federal or provincial control, may be on the same footing and obliged to disclose the actual rates charged to the customer for any given period.

The Minister of Finance is providing for changes in the reserves which the chartered banks are required to maintain with the Bank of Canada and it is his intention to reduce these. Such reserves, made up of an 8 per cent statutory reserve and a secondary reserve equivalent to 15 per cent of all deposits payable in Canadian funds held by the chartered banks, leave them in an unfavourable position as regards the competition of other banking institutions not subject to such restrictions, and the royal commission has recommended a lowering of the cash ratio. Considering that the protection of the depositing public is involved, I hardly think there can be any question of eliminating them.

It was also announced that the government intends to prevent the directors of a bank from sitting on the board of another bank, and also to prohibit all agreements between banks on the interest to be charged on loans or to be paid on deposits and this measure should encourage free competition between such institutions so that the public may benefit from the best possible yield.

Because of the ceiling on interest rates and of other restrictions in the Bank Act preventing them, for instance, from granting mortgage loans, the banks closely associated themselves with trust, mortgage, loan, investment companies and others. It has been specified, I believe, that chartered banks will not be allowed to have more than a 10 per cent equity ownership in a Canadian corporation. It may be necessary to read the bill to obtain further details, but through the amendments to be made to the act, banks should not find it necessary to get involved so much with competitive financial institutions. In order to promote competition, it is necessary to control the purchase of shares, mergers or the establishment of subsidiary or satellite companies.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss all proposed or commendable amendments, but rather deal briefly with the two main questions of greater concern to the average citizen and which seriously hinder free competition: first, the interdiction to grant mortgage loans, a provision to be deleted, and then, the ceiling on interest rates which is being changed and may be adjusted according to the economic situation of the country.

The fact that banks will be allowed in the future to grant mortgage loans at the current market rate is welcome news, because the present situation was unsatisfactory, both for the public and for the banks. The latter never had that power, except since 1954, with the exception of loans granted under the National Housing Act. They did not hesitate then to enter into that new field and loaned over one billion dollars, which proves that with their network of branches throughout the country, they can render tremendous services to the people in that connection.

However, when the rate of interest on such loans was set at more than 6 per cent, they had to withdraw from the market, due to the ceiling being imposed on them. The coming of banks into this important segment of our economy will promote greater competition and activity and will contribute to check any increase in interest rates by making available new capital in the field of mortgage loans.

This will also allow them to improve their commercial loans services, particularly with regard to small businessmen who, thanks to this additional guarantee, will be able to borrow greater amounts and more easily from the banks, at a rate certainly more advantageous than elsewhere. Big mortgage companies undeniably grant loans more easily in large cities than in small municipalities and distant regions. Local institutions such as credit unions, which are familiar with the needs and characteristics of a given region, give very efficient service there, and the banks, thanks to their branches here and there, will also be able to help decentralize mortgage funds and balance investments in the various regions.

I also hope that, in the future, private institutions, like those of the government, for example the Industrial Development Bank, will expand and improve the services they give small enterprise by putting at their disposal economic and technical advisers and giving them financial information and advice, so as to help them manage and control their business better. This legislation concerning mortgage loans will be welcomed by all and will undoubtedly improve service in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, according to what the hon. Minister of Finance indicated, the 6 per cent ceiling on the bank rate will be periodically readjusted until conditions on the money market improve, when it can be eliminated.

In introducing the resolution in May 1965, the former minister of finance had specified that, if there were a general increase of the rate of interest in the future, the government would then review the situation. Since then rates have increased considerably, quarterly treasury loans, for example, increasing from 3.82 in 1965 to a recent 5.10, and rates of interest must now be considered in a totally different perspective.

Nobody can dispute, Mr. Chairman, that the existing rate of 6 per cent does not correspond to the current rate: indeed, it was set up during a period when the conditions of the capital market were very different from what they are today. It favours the use of indirect means and the multiplication of related financial institutions that escape that ceiling and are not under the control of the federal authorities.

[Mr. Forest.]

The current rate of 6 per cent applicable to commercial loans, that is loans to small businesses, small industries and small businessmen, works against those whom the law intends to protect against the abuses of lenders, and compels them to turn to companies charging higher and often excessive rates of interests. One needs only to be convinced to read the reports of the finance companies which, in recent years, have multiplied average-term commercial loans. The progressive and controlled increase of the ceiling would certainly have the effect of balancing the capital market and, by extending the field of action of banks, the competition will help to limit that of institutions with much less control and responsibility than our banks.

The fear of those who anticipate a general increase of interest rate as a result of this measure is not justified and is indeed denied by the great majority of experts. The future will show, I am sure, that that fear was not founded. Such an increase in the ceiling would rather adjust and balance the rates. Actually, that was the main recommendation of the Porter commission; page 364 and the following pages of the report set forth major and convincing arguments in favour of a higher ceiling, and I quote:

> The 6 per cent interest rate ceiling introduces undesirable rigidity in the financial system and hampers and distorts the working of markets. It also has arbitrary effects on the institutions' competition for business and on their ability to serve the community well which were not contemplated when the ceiling was originally introduced and subsequently amended.
> We recommend that it be removed regardless of other changes in the legislation. The ceiling stands in the way of flexible lending by the banks in that it frequently prevents them from making loans on which higher rates must be charged to cover administrative costs and risks. Obviously, this is to the banks' disadvantage; more importantly, however, it discriminates against borrowers such as small businesses which, if they are to obtain funds at all, must turn to the other lenders which charge rates well above those the banks would ask if free to do so.

Mr. Chairman, another group of independent experts, the Economic Council of Canada, supported unreservedly that attitude, and in its Second Annual Review, page 187, made the following statement:

• (4:40 p.m.)

> More generally, to minimize distortions and instabilities in credit and financial markets, and to ensure easier access by homebuilders, consumers and small business to credit, various recommendations of the royal commission on banking and finance deserve careful attention—including measures to promote more competitive credit conditions, and removal of the arbitrary 6 per cent interest rate ceiling which currently forces many small borrowers into loans at much higher rates.

The vast majority of financial and economic experts hold this opinion as well. It has also been claimed that banks already show large profits and that this measure will only serve to increase them even more. Now, the government can easily control them and reach them, through taxes on profits or otherwise; at any rate, it is not a logical reason for preventing them from playing a more efficient and more advantageous role with regard to the people generally, and the financial system of our country. This would be preferable to transferring those powers or leaving them to similar institutions at a higher cost to the public.

In order to enlarge their share of the market in the face of competition, banks will have to improve their services, make loans at reasonable rates and pay higher rates of interest on savings. In order to obtain additional funds, they will have to increase the rate of interest on deposits, thus benefitting millions of people who, as a precautionary measure and for security, entrust their money to banks. Incidentally, more open competition might be favourable to banks but, above all, the good of the community as a whole must be considered and promoted.

The Minister of Finance, who has already given us proof of his experience, his competence and wisdom, has once more formulated a realistic, practical and constitutional policy, to enable our banking institutions to make an even greater contribution to the progress and growth of our country; a policy that will also contribute to the economic and social well being of the Canadian people as a whole.

This act, Mr. Chairman, will bring progress to our financial system in its evolution, will give it greater flexibility, firmness, dynamism and competitive stamina; the Minister of Finance must certainly be congratulated.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest as the hon. member who spoke before me talked about the banking system, about the services rendered by banks to industry, business, individuals, etc. Strangely enough, there seems to be an attempt to compare banks to other Canadian financial institutions; to compare a bank to an ordinary finance company, when the two are absolutely not similar.

Ordinary finance companies must have in their tills the amounts they can lend or wish to lend, while chartered banks do not have to have in the till the huge amounts they lend.

Last night, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) spoke at great length on this resolution and on these amendments to the Bank Act. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has read the speech made by his parliamentary secretary, he must have died laughing this morning. His dear parliamentary secretary blundered, he contradicted himself flagrantly, he made about the most ridiculous speech ever delivered here in this house. Indeed he said:

This decennial revision will certainly be welcomed by the newspapers and the public as the most radical measure since the institution of the Bank of Canada about 30 years ago. It will likely increase the confidence of the public in our banking institutions and in any future decisions of the government concerning the monetary policy of our country.

And then he added:

It is easy to note that the Minister of Finance has decided to implement the necessary reforms for such a competition between all levels of financial institutions in Canada, and I think he should be very warmly commended.

A little further, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) stated:

The 6 per cent ceiling was adopted some forty years ago—

Well, 40 years ago the ceiling was at 5 per cent. A bank could not charge more than 5 per cent interest on a loan. Here he said:

Under the present system, Mr. Chairman, big borrowers definitely have an edge over small people who need money. As banks have become the cheapest source of capital supply for corporate and individual borrowers, since there is a 6 per cent ceiling on interest rates, there developed recently a practice which clearly discriminates against small borrowers.

And he went on to say:

Generally speaking, the small borrower who comes to a bank gets a loan at a rate higher than 6 per cent.

Please note that the small borrower who goes to a bank where the ceiling is 6 per cent manages to get funds at a rate higher than 6 per cent since the banks have found a legal way out. I wonder if the minister agrees with that. The banks have found a legal procedure which allows them to make personal loans at 9 and 10 per cent. It means that the small borrowers we are trying to protect by setting the rate at 6 per cent are not protected at all by the present banking regulations. Such is the statement made by the secretary to the Minister of Finance last night: the ceiling is 6 per cent but legally the banks have succeeded in making loans at 9 and 10 per cent.

At the beginning of my remarks, I said that the banks are lending something they do not have. If a bank has a $100 million reserve with the Bank of Canada, it has the right under the federal legislation—and I am calling the Minister of Finance to witness what I am saying now—to lend $1.4 billion, based on the $100 million reserve with the Bank of Canada. And it has the right to ask for 6 per cent on $1.3 billion it has just created.

The bank has the power to do that. That means $78 million in interest for a year; $390 million for five years; and $1.56 billion for 20 years, whereas the bank had only $100 million in reserve with the Bank of Canada.

That is the power of the chartered banks in Canada. It cannot be compared at all with that of the other loan companies. And if the minister is so solicitous about the small Canadian borrowers, then instead of removing the ceiling on the interest rates charged by the banks, why does he not force the finance companies to reduce their usurious interest rates to protect the small borrower whom the government wants to protect, as it is trying to make us believe, with this bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is a way to help the small people, and it is certainly not by helping the big people to get bigger that you will help the small people. We live under a system where the big people get bigger in smaller numbers and where the small ones get smaller in greater numbers, and no solution is found to that problem. Let us reduce the interest rate and force the finance companies to reduce their interest rates instead of allowing them to charge 24, 20 or 15 per cent interest, and let us impose a ceiling on those companies.

Another thing could help the small borrowers: why does the Department of Finance or the federal government allow the banks to create a shortage of money and credit in Canada? Why? If the government assumed its responsibilities and told the banks: We need so much credit for the normal business of the country and you will create the credit or we will do it through the Bank of Canada. It would be a solution but the government does not do that. Instead, to help the small people, it allows the banks to increase the interest rate.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Another way for the government to help the little fellow would have been to stop gathering the savings of the small and average citizens, and to leave them in circulation. Instead of piling them up here, in Ottawa, the government should help, for instance, in lowering income tax. No, the government does not think of that. It introduces a bill to amend the Act. This is the greatest monetary reform since the creation of the Bank of Canada. Imagine, in the twentieth century, in 1966, to tell us that in the House of Commons. Why? Because the majority of government members understand nothing of the mechanism of chartered banks of Canada.

I understand that one may laugh but it is believed that the chartered banks are financial institutions like the Traders Finance, the Household Finance, the Beneficial Finance and any other finance company. But it is not true. The finance companies, the "caisses populaires" the savings banks, cannot lend more than what they have. However, the chartered banks can lend any amount even what they do not have. They can take my own savings and multiply them by 14 to lend to the public at 6 per cent. Six per cent interest on credit created out of nothing is not enough. That is what control by the chartered banks means in Canada.

I understand and I repeat it, the finance companies practice usury; I understand that. The government has the power to bring these people to book. Mr. Chairman, I realize that this bill in abolishing the ceiling on interest rates for chartered banks agrees to direct theft, legalized by the federal government. Instead of simply allowing the thief to remain as it is, it gives him the means to grow bigger. The small thief goes to jail. As for the big thief, the financier, let us allow him to charge more interest. That is the fine monetary reform of the federal government. It has been spelled out in full and explained by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance himself said the day before yesterday that the rate of interest is too low and should obviously be raised to help such borrowers, and that banks must be able to compete with private lenders.

Mr. Chairman, what is to prevent banks from lending to whomever they please? I do business with finance companies, with Traders Finance.

We are told here: When the rate of interest is higher, banks will lend more easily to small borrowers. The borrower who wants a loan at 6 per cent and who does not seem to have all the security required by the bank does not get a loan. If the rate of interest were 8 per cent, does the minister think this man would then be able to get a loan? No. I know of one particular case where a man went to a chartered bank to borrow a sum of money to pay for a car. The bank manager told him: My friend, you do not have enough security for a loan. Then this person went to the Household Finance Company, borrowed the money to pay for his car, signed a promissory note attached to his contract including interest, insurance, and so on. Household Finance took this note to a Canadian chartered bank, whether the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian National Bank or the Toronto-Dominion. The bank accepted the note of this same man who was not solvent ten minutes ago and bought it at a discount rate of 85 to 90 per cent. This means that the finance company immediately got all of its capital plus part of the interest charged. Immediately. This man who, according to the bank, was not solvent ten minutes ago—how is it that his credit is better at 24 per cent? Why does the bank accept his note from the finance company, but not directly from him? Mr. Chairman, we will be told again that an increased rate of interest would allow banks to help small borrowers more. That is not true. The banks do not help the small borrowers but the big ones, as the Minister of Finance is well aware.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance made another point the other day. The banks must reveal their hidden reserves. They do not pay taxes on them at the moment. How would the minister force the banks to declare their hidden funds? What means would the government use. They do not tell us. We are told: We will take the necessary measures; we will request the banks to declare their hidden funds on which they do not pay any taxes at present.

Mr. Chairman, the minister nods his head. But by what means will he accomplish this, since the banks have done many things behind this government's back, and behind the former government's back? The banks have always played hide and seek with the government. And today, the minister tells us: We will force the banks to declare their hidden funds. By what means will we do so? Everyone has to declare his income. Everyone is supposed to declare hidden income; yet, a large number of Canadians hide money away. Not only banks, oh no. There are others still who do not declare anything to the government.

How is the government going to find out who hides money with a view to evading income tax? Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary to the minister added this, yesterday:

> It follows that the 6 per cent bank loan market is available to two particular types of borrowers, that is small businessmen and industrialists.

What an amazing discovery.

> As banks are limited to a 6 per cent ceiling, there is absolutely no leeway possible.

Poor banks. Up against a depression. Will higher rates improve slums in Canada? Let the minister compare bank buildings in in Canada with the dwellings of little old Canadians who have to borrow money. Then you can tell me if those poor banks are to be pitied so. I have nothing against banks that deal with the public on a private basis, that is all very well. Provincial or federal governments, or school boards, should not have to kotow before a chartered bank that has the power to create credit 14 times the amount it holds in reserve. But let the Bank of Canada service public undertakings; and let chartered banks continue to serve private enterprise, not at exhorbitant rates of interest, not at rates without a ceiling, but at a rate that has a ceiling. When that ceiling was 6 per cent, banks did not starve to death. They knew no economic recession, they did not suffer. But the Canadians suffered.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain the monetary reform advocated by the Minister of Finance is nothing but a hoax. And some people believe in it. A while ago, a member made a speech on banks, on those poor banks which do not have the right to ask the same rate of interest as the small private companies. There was applause because people do not know what control banks have in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, Social Credit has a solution, it may still provoke laughter, but he who laughs last laughs best, because, Mr. Chairman, in the present system, with unrequited strikes right and left, if one seeks the root of the problem, one will find a question of money and credit and so long as the present or future governments fail to alter the present financial system in order to make money serve mankind instead of forcing mankind to serve money, grave days, dangerous days are in the offing for Canada as other countries of the world have experienced.

If we must perforce follow in the footsteps of world revolutions, very well. But if we can avoid this, if we can react soon enough to bring about monetary and fiscal reform so that money and credit may serve the people then, Mr. Chairman, we will have saved the country and specially the Canadian people, which is what counts in the long run.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Surely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Laflamme: Would the hon. member explain what he means, when he talks of making money serve mankind, instead of making mankind serve money and how he would proceed?

Mr. Caouette: The first step—and I shall not take up the time of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Thompson)—would be the distribution of a national dividend to each and every Canadian, to give them the purchasing power to go and buy the goods, the production of Canadians for Canadians. Then, money would be serving the people.

Mr. Laflamme: A second question, with your permission, Mr. Chairman.

Where are you going to find that dividend?

Mr. Caouette: At the Bank of Canada. My very good friend has still not grasped the idea, though it has been taught to him for 25 years.

Mr. Laflamme: I am sorry to say that I understand even less when I hear him talk.

Mr. Caouette: There you are. Dunces neither die nor fade away.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I realize the time left in the debate on this resolution is rather short so I will attempt to keep my remarks to a minimum in order to allow at least one other speaker to take part in the discussion.

The resolution before the committee provides for the decennial revision of the Bank Act, a revision which is already two years late, and will extend the charters of the present banks to July 1, 1976.

Apart from the remarks of the Minister of Finance, the details of the present legislation are not known. The minister has outlined his policies relating to the legislation which is to follow this resolution. He has enunciated some points with which we agree and some others which we do not find acceptable. But we do say that this resolution should pass in order that the legislation can come before us.

At this point I would urge the Minister of Finance—I believe that if he will do this all members of the committee will be in agreement—to refer the subject matter of this resolution to the standing committee so that it can get down to the hard work which must be done in coming to the highest common denominator of agreement so far as the legislation is concerned. After that work has been completed the matter can come back to the house for final decision. If this is done I am sure that much of the committee work can be accomplished while the house is in recess.

However, the passage of this resolution does not mean, and I make this very clear, that we are in agreement in principle with what may be the policies of the minister in the legislation. We are in agreement with the principle that the Bank Act must be revised and that this legislation must be passed before the end of this session. We in our party believe that the subject matter of this resolution should go to the committee as quickly as possible. We should not wait until after second reading before making such referral because there would not be sufficient time then to debate the decisions that are made in the committee.

Perhaps the most important revelation was when the minister said that the banks will be required to disclose their inner reserves. To this we give our complete agreement. These hidden reserves represent a privilege which has been grossly abused. Therefore we believe that the minister is to be commended for this announcement. Likewise, it is good that the different banks will be prohibited from making agreements on interest rates on both loans and deposits.

We in the Social Credit party also agree that the interlocking of bank directorates should be prohibited. We believe also that the relaxing of restrictions prohibiting banks from participating in the area of mortgage loans is fair and sound. The minister outlined his policies, some of which we believe are good. However, there are others with which we cannot agree.

The reduced cash reserves allowing flexibility in reserve requirements can only be fair if the near-banks are likewise brought under the umbrella of this banking legislation. If the Minister of Finance really means that greater competition is a good thing for banking, then it seems to us that he must also include those institutions, other than credit unions and treasury branches, operating in the same areas as the banks, and they should be brought within the legislation controlling banking with which we will be concerned when this resolution has passed.

The second major area of difference, and the one which is the most vital in my opinion, is the decision to lift the 6 per cent interest ceiling on bank loans. With this we cannot agree. The banks have advanced a strong argument in favour of this policy. They have developed the argument that by lifting the ceiling on bank loans there would be a general reduction in interest rates. True, it would lower the interest rates presently charged on mortgages through trust and finance companies, which today are operating at rates of 8 to 12 per cent and in some areas even as high as 20 per cent and more. These interest rates are wrong. They are immoral and unjust. Yet we must seek to correct the problem at the top level and not just equalize the situation by raising the bottom level.

I believe that the desired objective of lower bank interest rates rather than raising them can be better effected by including those institutions which to day are operating at extremely high interest rates under banking legislation, so that the total picture of interest rates will be reduced. It is only in this way that we can help those sections of the economy which need help the most, that is, the small borrower, the independent businessman and the farmer, for whom today there is not adequate credit available.

Again we come back to the principle that this government actually lays down in its policies, those principles which affect the nation's monetary policy. While we hear so much about inflation today, the truth of the matter is that there is not too much money in the country. There is an inflation in prices. As this comes about there is a lack of money in the country and the section of the economy which needs help the most is not getting that help. Therefore we would say to the minister that it is essential that this section of the economy be our concern.

The banks today, Mr. Chairman, are not facing bankruptcy. Their facilities are the best in the land. All you have to do is to note the new buildings and the improvement in banking facilities which has been brought about over the last few years. Likewise, their profits are among the best in the country.

This does not mean that the banks should not operate at a profit. They should. It does not mean that we are not in favour of private banking. It is the best form of banking ever devised so far as the private sector of the economy is concerned. But it does mean that we must protect those areas of our economy which are not able to protect themselves and which do not receive at the present time the protection and justice they deserve.

If Canadians really believe in free enterprise, they must see to it that the financial institutions are allowed to operate in an equitable atmosphere of fair competition. But on the other hand, just by raising bank interest rates we are not going to make the operations of these sectors of the economy as equitable as they should be. Today some small businessmen, including farmers whom I know pay up to 24 per cent on money which they cannot get through the private banks, money which I think it is the responsibility of private banking to supply in addition to supplying the capital needs of big business and industry.

However, to oppose this resolution as it now reads would be irresponsibly because it simply states that which must be done. It does not state what is the actual policy of the government. Again I would urge the Minister of Finance—and I think he would receive the support of the house—to permit the subject matter of this resolution to be referred to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs so that we can really get down to the hard work of discussion and hearing the necessary witnesses so as to arrive at what I described as the highest common denominator of agreement.

There are several other points of importance, Mr. Chairman. I should like to refer to the Porter commission report which has been called a dead report; at least, it seems so. However, there are a few important recommendations made by the commission which we may be in danger of forgetting.

Again here I must emphasize the need of some form of control over the near-banks. The British Mercantile and Trust Company collapse, after the failure of the Atlantic Acceptance Corporation, makes this an urgent question which has yet to be dealt with and which I trust will be dealt with as we go through this legislation.

What we need in Canada today is a desirable economy. Banking is the means by which this desirable situation within the economy can be reached. I believe a desirable economy may be expressed as an economy which utilizes all modern methods of production but which at the same time offers equitable employment for all. I believe there is a national inventory of purchasable production which, when maintained by effective demand, would bring about a desirable economy. Effective demand is that which places in the population's hands the necessary purchasing power to buy those things that are necessary to make possible the standard of living of which we are capable, while at the same time solving the problems of distribution presently facing us. It is in this area, Mr. Chairman, where banking as it relates to the supply of money and to the supply of capital, which it is so imperative to have and which is actually the responsibility of the banking system, that this legislation is involved.

Finally, I would say that we must return to the part of sanity so far as our financial policy is concerned. The basic reforms which are talked about as being essential in our banking system are twofold. A permanent money supply is needed to cope in quantity with all sorts of needs. It is needed as a medium of exchange. With our tremendous potential in Canada and our tremendous know-how, there is no reason why our monetary supply for our monetary needs and our capital should not be adequate to develop to the limit that which we are willing to work at. Also, our financial system should be one that will distribute incomes to large numbers of our citizens so that everyone can have a certain reasonable standard of living quite apart from whether or not our citizens are able to obtain employment.

Again this comes back to a satisfactory money policy. I believe it is imperative for our banking legislation to be such as to provide for the supply of the public or social capital with which we have to build our bridges, schools, and hospitals. This is not capital which makes a profit, but it permits the development of the public sector of the economy without our having to pay the high rate of interest that we talk about in relation to the private sector where profits are permissible. Unless our banking legislation will permit the creation of that capital, and unless we can meet the needs of the people in supplying the required medium of exchange necessary to move, economically, that which we produce within our economy, an unnecessary burden will be placed on our people.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we again urge the minister to make sure that the subject matter of this resolution be referred to the committee where it can be discussed in appropriate detail in full debate.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate let me say that one cannot help but realize that once again the hon. member for Red Deer not only has swallowed himself, so to speak, but has reiterated the position that his party has taken over the last several months and even years in supporting the government when it finds itself against the wall.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask the hon. member a question? Does the hon. member not agree that it is necessary to provide legislation to revise the Bank Act?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks made by the Minister of Finance in bringing forward this measure the other day. One must realize that as he spoke he was thinking back to what has happened in this country during the past several years and what is happening today. The Canada of today is very much different from the Canada that existed when this government came to office a few short years ago.

As we look at the remarks which the Minister of Finance placed on the record we realize that the actions proposed in connection with the revision of the Bank Act are heavily influenced by the conditions existing in Canada at the present time, which the minister and other members on the government side have referred to as abnormal. These conditions prevail not only in Canada but also in the United States. It is interesting to hear the Minister of Finance of this country proposing that we bring forward legislation to meet an abnormal condition but which will have a long-term effect on the nation as a whole.

I come from an agricultural constituency where new industries are being developed today and, as in many other parts of this country, we know what tight money is. I say to the government that raising the ceiling on interest rates under the Bank Act will not solve the problem of tight money in this country.

Reference has been made to the arguments put forward by this country's banks which say that they have a problem with respect to lack of money. One of the reasons why the banks have this problem is the utter failure of successive governments to deal with the consumer finance companies of this country which today operate under scarcely any regulation. Let us take a look at the over-all situation.

The banks tell us that all the money they have is in circulation. The finance companies take up the balance of the lending field. Raising the interest rate simply will not by itself solve that problem. What is needed today is legislation to deal with the finance and other consumer credit companies of this country. Such legislation would save our people some of the money that the Minister of Finance proposes should be expended on higher interest rates.

One need only look at the increased cost of housing, of development and of almost every other factor in our economy to realize that if the resolution is passed, as the minister explained it in his speech the other evening, this nation faces an increasing spiral of costs such as it has never known in the years gone by. At the present time this government has the reputation of bringing about the highest cost of living in the nation's history. Apparently the government now wants the nation to have its highest interest rates in history, which will lead to an even higher cost of living. For these reasons I cannot see how any thinking member of the House of Commons can support this resolution before us.

There are other aspects I cannot possibly deal with in the short time available to me which have to do with the economic prospects facing this nation and also with our relations with the other nations of the world. Those nations demand that the action proposed by the government opposite be not taken at this time in our history.

For the last few days the Minister of Finance has been going around with a long face. We on this side and some hon. members on the other side of the house cannot help but know why this is so. The minister himself must have serious doubts as to the seriously detrimental effects that this legislation, if put into effect, will have on the economy of this nation now and in future.

Those who put their money into deposits should not expect the same returns that people who put their money into development are entitled to expect. The government and the minister suggest that we should pay a bonus to the person who is cautious, who is afraid to go out and try to develop this nation. That sort of thing is almost a denial of everything that we in this nation believe in. Another effect this legislation will have will be to attract tremendous amounts of money from across the border, which is something that hon. members opposite seemed to be worried about in the months gone by.

When a home owner pays close to $20,000 for his home and the rate of interest he has to pay is increased by 1 per cent, he is immediately faced with having to pay approximately an additional $200 per annum. Taking the amount he has to pay over a 30-year period it can be seen that the additional cost the home owner has to pay is more than the total cost of many homes built in years gone by.

We cannot but realize that this government not many months ago brought in amendments to legislation concerning farm credit which permitted an increase in the cost of credit to the farmers of this country. If the measure now before us were allowed to proceed there would inevitably be an increase in the cost of credit to those in the agricultural industry desiring credit for development.

But the man who cannot escape the consequences of higher interest rates, the man who cannot pass the cost on, is the man who carries a dinner pail. He, together with all those on fixed incomes and all those who must live on small incomes, has no redress. Once again in the measure before us we find the government loading down the man who carries the dinner pail with an additional charge on his income and one which he certainly cannot afford at this juncture in our history when Canadians are facing the highest cost of living ever known in exchange for the privilege of having a Liberal government.

I cannot but feel that regardless of where hon. members sit in this house, if they are to do their duty as protectors of Canada's financial soundness and her place in the world and help to provide a future for our citizens in their desire to earn a decent livelihood, they have no choice but to vote against this measure.

I believe the banks of this country have been doing a worth-while job. Today they boast, and we should take this into consideration, that they have made all the funds at their disposal available to the people of Canada for their use. If we study their balance sheets we find they compare favourably with the balance sheets of other businesses in this country. In these circumstances one can only ask: Why has the government chosen the avenue of rising interest costs as one of the instruments not only of banking policy but apparently of economic policy in this country as well?

I should like to read from an article which appeared in the World Economic Review and Forecast, 1966, published by the New York Times. I will give hon. members some indication of what has been done by the government opposite during the past year.

The Chairman: Order. Since the time provided for the consideration of this resolution has expired, it is my duty pursuant to standing order 61A to interrupt the proceedings and put the question forthwith.

Motion (Mr. Sharp) agreed to: Yeas, 86, nays, 59.

The Chairman: I declare the resolution carried.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sharp thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-222, respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

DECENNIAL REVISION AND EXTENSION OF CHARTERS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the extension of the powers of the existing savings banks till July 1, 1976, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On the same division.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sharp thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-223, respecting savings banks in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-216, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall give just a few brief words of explanation on second reading. This bill is to implement the Income Tax Act resolution which was debated at considerable length in committee of ways and means some weeks ago.

Because there has not been time to complete the drafting of the complicated provisions concerning deferred profit sharing plans and the related subject of supplementary unemployment benefit plans, this bill does not contain amendments based on paragraphs 11, 12 and 13 of the resolution. Legislation to implement the proposals in these paragraphs will be introduced as a separate bill later this session, possibly when parliament reconvenes.

It will be noted that the bill is entitled "An Act to Amend the Income Tax Act and to Repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act." When the house is in committee I would like to move to delete all references to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, not because the government has changed its views about the desirability of the amendments but simply because members of the industry feel they would like to have an opportunity of having further consultation with the government before the act is repealed. It was not our intention to repeal any of the provisions of that act but simply to incorporate them into the Income Tax Act.

As is usual, the bill contains a few amendments of a technical nature dealing with administration which were not described in the resolution. The most important are found in clause 11 which deals with the Tax Appeal Board, and in clause 18 which concerns the communication of information.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) says, this bill is entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act" and I suppose the principle of the bill is described in those words. It is not my intention to launch into a lengthy dissertation on the principle of the bill—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barnett: —but with a little more encouragement from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) I might be disposed to do so. However, I hope I am not going to be provoked into making a lengthy speech. The point to which I wish to address myself is related to what appears to have been a general disposition on the part of the minister, as well as on the part of quite a number of his predecessors, to be more concerned in the annual bill to amend the Income Tax Act with the principles in that act have to do with making rather complicated deductions in respect of the profits of corporations rather than being concerned with the principle of providing equity under the act for those who file their income tax returns as individuals.

Over the years a good many of the sections of the act have been amended, and one could argue that each section, at least in some measure, stands on its own feet in relation to the principles that are involved. I believe that the basic principle we should argue on second reading is whether the proposals of the minister contained in the bill are designed to achieve equity and fairness in the application of the income tax law. In my submission the principle of this bill is inadequate in that respect, at least in one direction.

During an earlier stage of discussion on the Budget I made reference to what I think are serious omissions in the minister's proposals. I much regret that he did not see fit to agree with the arguments I advanced then and that this bill does not provide a long overdue amendment to section 5 of the act which deals with the deduction of expenses incurred by workers in the course of earning their living.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

We are trying to get a copy of Bill No. C-216, but there is none available in French. Therefore, I wonder whether it is all right for us to carry on, at this stage, with consideration of Bill No. C-216 so long as we do not have a French copy of the bill. For that reason, I would suggest that the house should suspend consideration of that bill and that we should come back to it once we have a French copy of the bill. I believe that is only fair and I would ask the minister to move that himself, so that we defer the study of the income tax bill until a French copy is produced. If we get the copy tonight or tomorrow, then we will resume consideration of the bill. We have been looking high and low for the French version, but in vain. I think the minister will have to take action.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I regret to say I was unaware that the bill was not available in French. This comes to me as a great surprise.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: This does not surprise us so much, because it often happens that we get the French copy of a bill much later than the English. I feel, however, that is not good enough on the part of the minister, and he should ask instead that the study of this bill be deferred until we get French copies.

Mr. Caouette: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, will the minister tell us when we can get a copy of this bill in French?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must refer the house to standing order 74, which is as follows:

> All bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

If the bill is not available in French perhaps the Minister of Finance will wish to make some comment.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to continue the discussion without the French text being available. I do not think I have any responsibility for having a French text available, but I express apologies to those whose native tongue is French. Would it be agreeable to the house if the hon. member who is speaking now were to complete his remarks and then we could adjourn the debate until the text of the bill is available in French?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to the hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for Villeneuve, who raised this legitimate question of privilege, I would be quite happy to complete my remarks at this point and then follow the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable to the house that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni shall continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are ready to agree to this, but afterwards we shall defer consideration of the bill until we get at least one copy in French.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that at that point the debate shall be adjourned until the French text is available?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the bill before us does not contain provisions which I feel would have greatly improved it in principle. I was about to draw the attention of the house to the absence from the bill of what I consider to be a vitally necessary and long overdue amendment to section 5 of the act. As the minister may be aware, this omission is not one which is new. I do not wish at this stage to argue the point at length, particularly in view of the situation which has developed in respect of the availability of the French text.

I believe that this bill would have been greatly improved had it in fact contained an amendment to section 5 along certain lines which would have provided equity in the application of the tax in respect of expenses of workers which are incurred necessarily by them in the course of earning their living. I suggest that if the minister had adopted the proposal contained in Bill C-51 on the order paper this bill would have been much improved.

Bill C-51 suggests that section 5 of the Income Tax Act should be amended by adding a new subsection 3 which would have allowed the taxpayer to deduct from his gross income in a year expenses necessarily incurred by him for board and lodging by reason of his employment at a distance from the place where he maintains a self-contained domestic establishment; expenses incurred by him for transportation between his ordinary place of residence and his place of employment where, by reason of distance, he is required to live away from home to perform the duties of his employment; and expenses incurred by him for depreciation and replacement of tools and special equipment or clothing which are necessarily required by him in the performance of his duties. If this section had been included in the bill which the Minister of Finance has placed before us, then I for one would have been happier.

I feel that the discrimination between taxpayers whose incomes come from wages or salaries, those who are classified as being self-employed, and corporations in respect of the deduction of expenses has been in the act far too long. As I indicated during a previous stage of the debate, I am looking forward to the day when the Minister of Finance in his budget proposals will take firm action to rectify this longstanding discrimination.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Lapointe drew attention to the fact that there was no French copy of the bill available. I understand that one copy is now available. I do not know whether this would be sufficient or whether, as indicated earlier, we should adjourn the debate for the time being.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should not want to be unfair to any member of this house. If I am given a copy, it is unfair to the members for Hull, Lafontaine, Beauce, Mount Royal, Québec-Montmorency, Chapleau, Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Messrs. Caron, Lachance, Racine, Trudeau, Laflamme, Laprise and Ricard), in a word to all French-speaking members, including the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Émard).

Mr. Lewis: And also to the member for York South.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if a copy is handed to us on this side or accepted by me, I am convinced beforehand that 25 members from this side will rise to protest. I therefore object and ask that the study of the bill be deferred.

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I have never authorized the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) to speak on my behalf.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: I have no objection whatever. I entirely agree with the hon. member for Lapointe. I merely took advantage of this opportunity to say that we have at least one copy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is there unanimous agreement that the debate on Bill C-216 will be adjourned?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: If the government would pull itself together it would be a good idea. There has been terrible mismanagement.

Mr. Speaker: There has been unanimous agreement that the debate be adjourned.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION, EXTENDING OPERATION, ETC.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the resolution stage of this bill I outlined briefly the current position of crop insurance in Canada and the roles of the federal and provincial governments in this important agricultural policy. At that time I indicated that I would go into more detail on the actual amendments when the bill came before the house for second reading. The intention in these amendments is to make crop insurance more attractive to farmers and more widely applicable to the risks of nature over which they have no control.

One of the basic problems has been that for large areas of Canada policies which are possible under the act in its present form do not appear to provide enough protection to the farmer. I am confident that these amendments will do much to rectify this situation and to make crop insurance universally more attractive and useful to Canadian farmers. The amendments to the Crop Insurance Act which you have before you make three major changes and two relatively minor ones in the current legislation.

At the present time the act authorizes the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for crop insurance programs where the coverage does not exceed 60 per cent of the long-term average yield of the crop in the area. Many farmers, particularly those in areas where severe losses due to adverse weather conditions are not common, have felt that a coverage equivalent to only 60 per cent of the long-term average yield for the area was not in fact useful to them. Their position very simply was that they were good farmers and that seldom if ever did their production fall below this level.

The proposed amendment, by increasing the permissible level of coverage to 80 per cent and by permitting the calculation of the average yield on an individual farm rather than an area basis, is designed to provide protection commensurate with each farmer's needs and with his ability as a farmer. The proposed 80 per cent level is a maximum level. Policies could be sold at any level of coverage up to 80 per cent. Obviously, however, the higher the level of coverage under any given circumstances the higher must be the premium rate. A condition of the legislation is that the premiums, including, of course, any payments made by either this government or a province toward this cost, must be such as to make the program self-sustaining.

The second major amendment increases the premium share payable by the federal government from the present 20 per cent to 25 per cent of the total premium. Let us assume that the premium rate for an insurance policy is $1 per acre. Under the current legislation the farmer pays 80 cents and the federal government pays 20 cents. Under the amendment the farmer will now be required to pay only 75 cents, with the federal government paying the remaining 25 cents. This action should go some distance in reducing to the farmer the costs that will be associated with the upward movement in the level of coverage. It means that farmers across Canada taking out policies under this program will, on the average over the long term, receive a return of $1 for every 75 cents they pay into the program, since 50 per cent of the administrative expenses are also paid by the federal government and in all agreements to date the other 50 per cent is paid by the province concerned.

Under the existing legislation the coverage is limited to crops. Thus what might loosely be called production units such as apple trees or stands of perennial forage crops cannot by themselves be covered. Yet losses of these production units can have very severe and far-reaching effects for producers. In the case of fruit trees, not only does the farmer lose the crop for that and several ensuing years but he suffers direct financial loss in having to replace the trees that have been lost through adverse weather. A parallel situation exists for many other crops including certain long-term forage stands.

Another and somewhat similar problem exists in the case of summerfallow. In certain areas land that has been summerfallowed during the previous year with attendant costs accruing to the operation sometimes cannot be seeded because of excess moisture. The amendments make provision for coverage for losses of this kind. For this extended coverage, as it is called, the amendments authorize the making of contributions by the federal government equivalent to those made for crops per se.

Two minor amendments are included. The first of these alters slightly the deductible amount payable by a province under the reinsurance scheme. Under the present legislation the deductible, that is, the amount that must be paid in indemnities by the province before the federal reinsurance becomes operative, includes the premium receipts for the year, reserves from past years and an amount equal to 2½ per cent of the total liability of the province under policies in force. The amendment reduces the deductible amount payable by the province by the amount of any reinsurance premium that it may have paid in that year. This is considered necessary since, because of the method of payment of the reinsurance premiums at the end of any insurance year, the amount of money in the fund for the payment of indemnities has been reduced by the amount of reinsurance premiums paid by the province.

Under the present wording of the act a province with no reserves for the payment of indemnities would be in the position of having to pay an amount equal to the reinsurance premium from its own resources together with the 2½ per cent deductible before the federal government would share in the cost of further indemnities.

For the success of any program one of the most important features is that its users understand it fully. This was clearly brought out during the resolution stage of this bill by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) who indicated that there was great need for more information on the program at the producer level. Accordingly, the act is also being amended to provide that agreements with provinces specify the manner in which policyholders are informed as to the benefits accruing to them because of participation in the program.

During the debate on the resolution stage of the bill the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) asked why the experience of P.F.A.A. had not been fully utilized in the development of crop insurance. He also asked for assurance that P.F.A.A. would not be discarded or the act revoked at the present time. The experience of P.F.A.A. has been used extensively in the development of crop insurance programs. The yield statistics and the administrative experience of the P.F.A.A. organization have been available and continue to be available to any province to assist in the developing of their crop insurance programs. In addition, the present director of crop insurance is a former director of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He is thus able to bring to the development of crop insurance the knowledge and experience gained by that organization in a period of 25 years.

I agree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should remain in effect until such time as experience has given farmers an opportunity to judge the relative merits of crop insurance and P.F.A.A. for themselves. I suggest to the house that we can depend on farmers to indicate by their participation in crop insurance programs which of these measures, in their opinion, offers the most useful protection.

In summary, then, the amendments increase the maximum permissible level of coverage from 60 per cent to 80 per cent, permit coverage on the basis of individual farm yields as well as area yields, increase the federal contribution to premiums from 20 per cent to 25 per cent, and permit coverage for fruit trees and perennial plants.

These are amendments which I am confident will result in a most useful and workable crop insurance program being made available to Canadian farmers.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I realize it is not exactly six o'clock but so there will be no interruption of a speaker I wonder whether I might now suggest to the house that we move to the consideration of private members' bills. There is a disposition to pass a number of bills which were sent to the standing committee this morning and have been reported. Almost all of them deal with churches and church organizations. There is one exception but I understand there is a disposition to pass it as well. That bill stands in the name of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley). These bills are Nos. S-33, S-18, S-29, S-37 and S-39. If there is unanimous consent to pass these bills perhaps that could be done and then we could return to the business now before the house.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot is now calling it six o'clock.

Mr. Ricard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A it is my duty to inform the house that the question to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight is as follows: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack), Expo '67—inquiry as to representation of agriculture.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, private bills and public bills. I understand there is unanimous agreement of the house that we now consider private bills.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: As specified in the hon. member's request.

Mr. Speaker: We will consider the private bills specified by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. S-33, respecting United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces—Mr. Coates.

Bill No. S-18, to incorporate Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God (General Offices; Anderson, Indiana)—Mr. Smallwood.

Bill No. S-37, to incorporate Mennonite Central Committee (Canada)—Mr. Enns.

Bill No. S-39, to incorporate Lutheran Church in America—Canada section—Mr. Winkler.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF ENDOCRINOLOGY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-29, to incorporate the International Society of Endocrinology—Mr. Harley—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Objects.

Mr. Peters: Before this bill is passed I would just like to say that I am very pleased with the fact that this international society of specialists in endocrinology has decided to locate its headquarters in Canada mainly because its secretary general, who is a doctor in one of our Montreal hospitals and also a professor at McGill University, is a Canadian. I think it is a credit to Canada and particularly in keeping with the recognition which the Canadian medical profession has received from the international brain and heart organizations. I think our medical profession should be proud of this fact.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): May I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is time that the hon. member for Timiskaming extended the same courtesy to other bills on the order paper as he has to the one we are now dealing with.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, before we move back to regular business I should like to thank all members of the house for their co-operation. It indicates to me that we are very efficient in the dispatch of business in this house, and I cannot agree with the pessimists that we will be unable to complete the balance of the business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. By agreement the house will now revert to the business interrupted at six o'clock, second reading of Bill No. C-208.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION, EXTENDING OPERATION, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Greene for the second reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-208 gives me an opportunity to make a few remarks and I do not intend to delay unduly the business of the house.

We welcome the introduction of this legislation in the house, since it merely supplements the one we had proposed ourselves while in power. We give our hearty support to the improvements that will be made in the existing legislation. If I meant to be nasty, I would avail myself of this opportunity to say that the hon. minister has stolen a plank from our platform, since before the November 8 election, one of our electoral slogans was the improvement of the Crop Insurance Act so as to make it more readily available to farmers.

As the minister wishes to take advantage of such an improvement, we heartily support his efforts and hope the legislation will be enforced as soon as possible.

For a certain group of farmers, this measure is extremely important. In order to show the importance of crop insurance, I would just like to recall the two hail-storms that affected recently my constituency as well as that of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon). As to the havoc created in my riding, in the sole parish of Saint-Pie de Bagot, many farmers have seen the efforts of many months of work completely ruined.

Crops of farmers cultivating beans, peas, tomatoes, corn, strawberries and even tobacco were heavily damaged on the evening of June 17 last. For instance, the bean crops of 35 farmers were affected and the assessment of the damage is between 80 and 90 per cent, while the damage to the acreage varies between four and 40 acres. These figures give a clear idea of the damages.

When crop insurance will be put into force, it will surely be a relief to the farmers who are at the mercy of the vagaries of weather.

Another disaster also struck the orchards in one part of my riding as well as in the riding of my friend from Chambly-Rouville, as I said earlier.

I have here a brief sent me by the secretary of the Société Pomologique et Fruitière du Québec in which it is stated that 5,300 acres of orchards were damaged by the two storms on June 14 and 17 last. Representations are now being made to get subsidies from the federal and provincial governments.

Even if crop insurance were put into force immediately, the farmers and the apple growers concerned would suffer heavy losses.

Before closing, I would like to ask the minister to whom I wrote to receive favourably the representations which will undoubtedly be made by the Quebec Minister of Agriculture.

I hope that this bill on crop insurance will get the full support of the house and I assure the minister of my full co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone will be interested in the proposition contained in this amendment to the Crop Insurance Act which has already been amended once since it was originally passed. It was passed in 1959 and amended in 1964. It is now being amended for a second time in a major way.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) can perhaps learn a lesson from the two pieces of legislation which he recently brought into the house, namely, the so-called $4 milk policy and this piece of legislation. In both cases there is the presupposition that the federal government has no jurisdiction in this field but that jurisdiction must be exercised by the provinces and that the federal government should hold out to the provinces a carrot which is large enough to provide an incentive to the provinces to do something about the situation.

I am aware of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) during the election campaign last year indicated to the farmers, particularly in Timiskaming where he started his campaign, that the federal government was going to solve the problems we were experiencing in that area where there was an almost total agricultural disaster as a result of weather conditions. Hay had been lost, and this was followed by the loss of a large portion of the grain. In some areas almost a 100 per cent loss of hay and grain was suffered by the farmers.

The promise made at that time was that assistance would be available as soon as it was asked for. A hasty retreat was then beaten because this request could only come from the provincial government. The minister of agriculture of the province of Ontario told the farmers there were so many disaster areas in the province that if the riding of Timiskaming, which is almost identical geographically with the district of Timiskaming, were declared a disaster area, numerous areas throughout Ontario which were seriously affected would also ask for assistance and the province of Ontario would not be able to pay its share and assistance would not be forthcoming.

If there had been an insurance program in effect it would have covered the major cereal crops as well as the forage crops in Timiskaming. In addition, it would have looked after the drought areas in Renfrew and eastern Ontario. These farmers would have found themselves in a position of being able to ask for fairly sizeable payments as the result of the provisions contained in the bill before these amendments were introduced.

There is an indication that such an insurance program as is being undertaken by the federal government will probably be a good thing, but whether or not provincial governments will be able to conduct a successful crop insurance program that will be within their means is something else again. The situation in Timiskaming, in my opinion, has been drastic. It has been drastic in other areas and not merely because of a disaster in one year but because of the cumulative effect of disasters over a period of years. The Minister of Agriculture is well aware of the situation because of conditions in his own area over a period of time.

If we pass this legislation we are again asking the provinces to do something. We are adopting a philosophy that has been apparent in Canada, particularly when governments want to adopt it, of saying that something lies within provincial jurisdiction but at the same time passing overriding legislation in other areas. The minister mentioned P.F.A.A. I was interested in the detailed investigation of P.F.A.A. which occurred when the officials of that organization were here. They were asked whether recommendations had been made for the extension of this type of program all across Canada and in other fields. They have had a fairly good record in western Canada of preventing disasters at what we in Ontario would consider a reasonable cost. I am referring to those areas in particular where there is not a one-crop economy.

In the riding of Timiskaming a farmer will put about one-third of his farm in hay. There will be a considerable acreage put into hay and quite often it is allowed to go to seed. We have been producing about half of the timothy seed in the province of Ontario during the last two years. A great deal of the farm land in the area is put into either hay or seed production. Another one-third of the area is put into mixed grain and the remaining third is usually put into ensilage or temporary pasture which will be broken up in the fall. Therefore in the area there is a variety of cereal production as well as forage crops. This production is augmented by several other cash crols such as corn, potatoes and vegetables.

I have found that when farmers have discussed crop insurance they have discussed it in terms of the total crop. I am pleased to note that Ontario has taken steps to bring forage crops under their crop insurance scheme. However, if a farmer insures hay he will probably find the cost is more than the risk warrants. If he insures corn the same condition arises. If you are feeding beef cattle or dairy cattle and you are not operating your farm for off-farm sales but as a production unit, you can cut some of your grain for forage if your hay crop is a failure.

You can increase the amount of grain you feed your cattle and probably utilize the straw. Therefore the loss that you would suffer in total agricultural production would not be exceptionally great. For this reason the farmer feels it does not pay him to insure these crops. In the last three years in Timiskaming, particularly last year, what happened was that some farmers had a total loss. They did not get any hay and they lost their total grain production. They were not even able to get any straw that would cover their need for bedding material. The loss for these farmers was almost total; yet to guard against this loss they would have had to insure the grain, the forage crops and probably the pasture as well. The cost, therefore, is not sufficient to warrant the carrying of this type of insurance.

I believe the federal government has a responsibility in this area. What amuses me is the fact that we say we have jurisdiction in one field and yet not in another. I do not consider the prairie provinces to be a provincial unit. They still have representation on a provincial basis individually. I believe, therefore, that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act did take into consideration the fact that these were three provinces for which the federal government was able to provide crop insurance on a limited basis. If it was possible to have jurisdiction to enact the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, it should be possible also to enact a crop insurance program. I believe the reference to provincial jurisdiction is an excuse for not implementing federal legislation.

I would be very happy, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Agriculture would decide to enact a crop insurance program that would cover all the provinces of this country, and let the Supreme Court declare it ultra vires. I know the province of Ontario is not going to challenge the legislation because that government has been plagued ever since it thought of a crop insurance program in trying to find a program the farmers would support. I believe it is fair to say this program will not get the support of 50 per cent of the farmers. This is not an indication that 50 per cent of the farmers in Ontario do not need crop insurance. I think it is safe to say that about 90 per cent of the framers in Ontario are in desperate need of crop insurance that will allow them to count on at least the 80 per cent return which it is within the statistical ability of the crop insurance program to provide. I should like to see a real shuffle in the federal government in terms of the legal advice it receives. I know that when four or five constitutional lawyers get together you will get four or five different points of view.

I should like to see an action with respect to the matters I have raised brought before the Supreme Court. Sometimes, however, it makes little difference what happens in the end result because the problem usually crops up in a different way next time.

We must face the problem of providing the type of insurance that is not tied entirely to payments made to a provincial agency. We shall have to operate this program on the basis of income. The crop insurance will have to be in terms of the income that is involved in the crop. I believe that there are ways in which this can be done.

I am sure the minister will agree that the insurance premium will not be collected as easily as if one were to levy, say, one cent per bushel going at the elevator or by doing it under any system similar to P.F.R.A. It will not be that easy. No matter whether the agricultural commodity involved is hay, feed grain, seed or any other crop that is handled as a direct sale, or whether it is something that comes from a farm production unit such as beef, poultry, swine or any of those commodities involved in the field of milk production, a percentage system based on the price of sale of those commodities I think could be worked out to enable the premiums to be paid as the sales of the end products are made. In this way the program could be universal and could be applied to all farmers.

I know that the Department of Agriculture will not recommend this. As we have heard in the committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development, the department has had considerable problems in making arrangements in various fields of farm endeavour to get farmers registered in the various programs. I suggest the program would further complicate the department's problems immeasurably.

I am concerned that those in my area who need insurance most are the ones who can least afford it. It may be true that many farmers cannot afford to have this program if they have to insure a number of commodities. It is easy if you can insure one particular crop such as wheat, hay or corn. That is particularly so if you are in an area that is involved with only one particular commodity. I am sure this is true around Delta and in some of the southern ridings where tobacco is grown.

I suggest to the minister that the program will not work better now than before but that it will be extended to an additional number of farmers. What we are really doing is holding out a carrot not to the farmer but to the provincial governments so that they may implement this sort of program.

I have been critical of crop insurance since we first passed the legislation because I do not think it is universal and because I do not think it can be universal, not because the farmer does not want it but because he thinks he cannot afford it and that it is not designed for his particular need.

The federal government having raised its contribution, I think it is worth while to bring under the Crop Insurance Act fruit trees and perennials. They are found in limited areas in Canada and are a one-industry crop. It will not be difficult to insure crops in these areas under this act. The amount of money involved in losses and the amount of money that will be demanded as a premium by the provincial government will probably make this program feasible in those areas. They will benefit from this sort of insurance, and I am very pleased that this amendment has been included in the over-all amendments to the act. This amendment will be beneficial and is an answer to the requests of associations that have come before parliamentary committees in the past asking for this extension. These associations have shown us the unique problems of one industry areas that are dependent on one very perishable commodity.

I would be remiss in my duty, Mr. Speaker, if I failed to ask the minister if he has taken into consideration a bill I have on the order paper which will be increasingly important in this field as days go by. The bill proposes to the Department of Justice and other departments the national licensing and regulating of rain-making equipment. I should like the minister to draw an inference from what happened in his own area of the country. For several years the Renfrews were plagued with a very serious drought of long duration. The provincial government as a last resort, and it will admit it was a last resort, brought in rain-making equipment. I can remember being in the Ottawa valley at fair time. I am sure most members agree that the weather in southern Ontario is at its best at that time. Most of the fairs, including many little fairs in the Renfrew area, were rained out because of not only minor showers but torrents of rain. The farmers of that area not only had drought for four or five months throughout that year but because of the intervention of the Ontario Department of Agriculture they were deluged with rain in the latter part of the season. So they had two disasters in one year.

I admit I am exaggerating but I am raising the matter so that hon. members may consider this proposition. If the federal government undertakes to cover disasters with crop insurance and allows agencies not connected with the Department of Agriculture to interfere with the elements and bring about disasters, it will have to pay the losses caused by such disasters. I can remember the tears that were shed last year when we wanted to adjourn the house to discuss this matter.

There is some indication that we can interfere in a limited way with the elements. We may find ourselves, on the one hand, agreeing by government action to a situation with regard to which, on the other hand, because the elements have been interfered with, we have agreed to pay compensation. It is a little like saying that we will insure all the houses in an area that are burned down but we will not get rid of the arsonist in the area who is burning everybody's houses. You cannot insure the house if you cannot take care of the man who wants to burn it down.

I have raised these matters because I think they must be considered. I do not know how many farmers will take advantage of this program. It is very hard to put a figure on the damage that might be anticipated through natural causes and it is very hard to extend the liability to damage brought about by other causes.

• (6:40 p.m.)

The minister showed considerable initiative. At any rate, shortly after his appointment he was brave enough to take on the C.P.R. With a temperament of this type we would expect him to encourage the federal government to give more positive leadership in fields such as crop insurance and not to content itself with providing substantive legislation as a basis for action by provinces which may desire to make use of it in a limited way. We are paying a large percentage of the money and the provincial governments get the credit. At least under P.F.R.A. in days gone by the federal government got the credit and, moreover, used the patronage machine to great advantage. Today this aspect of the legislation has grown less important and it may be more of a liability than an asset.

Today we should look at these things from a national point of view and ensure as far as we can that real initiative is taken by the provinces, many of which are now unwilling to assume liability. In Timiskaming last year we, like other parts of Canada, were facing disaster conditions and very often farmers were unable to cope with the situation. As a result farmers in my area had to borrow money to buy seed. Germination from the corn harvested last year was less than 10 per cent. They had to obtain bank loans to buy hay which cost as much as a dollar a bale. I know that similar conditions existed in the Ottawa valley. I say we must provide more positive protection against disasters of this type than we have in the past.

As I say, I support this legislation because I believe it is creeping in the right direction. But I hope the minister will come back to parliament in the fall after considering this matter with the other agricultural ministers of Canada and present to the house a much more extensive form of insurance which will take into consideration not only the loss of crops but the income farmers receive from the sale of their products. If he does this I believe he will receive the support of most members of the house as well as the backing of all farm organizations for bringing into being a program which is likely to prove much more equitable to all concerned.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has touched on many of the points I had intended to raise. First, I should like to tell the minister how pleased I am that there is at last a policy to extend crop insurance to the eastern provinces. This program enabled western farmers to survive in a great many instances when they needed help, though I still have some hesitation about its application generally.

I was glad to learn that the ceiling is to be raised to 80 per cent. Crop losses in western Canada cannot be assessed on the same percentage basis for purposes of insurance as those in eastern Canada. Losses incurred in eastern Canada seldom result in a yield going below 60 per cent. Nevertheless they can be disastrous. Western farmers too must be pleased with the higher ceiling and with the provision which is being made to cover a wide field of farm production, including both raw products and modified products.

It is true there are many products that need to be covered. One is feed grain which is sold to nourish dairy cattle, beef cattle, poultry and swine. In the eastern regions of Canada there are a great many varieties of farming while in western Canada, at least in the prairie provinces, production is limited to beef or grain. In British Columbia fruit growing is important. There are a great many orchards in Ontario and in Quebec as well as in the Maritimes. In the Maritimes large crops of potatoes are grown and this crop too should be covered by the insurance program.

I do not know exactly which agency in Quebec will deal with this plan. So far I do not believe there is an agency in existence. But I shall be watching to find out how this process works. The federal government will be handing out money to the provinces to cover the losses incurred by farmers and, as the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned, I certainly hope that without unnecessary interference in provincial affairs the administration here will keep a watchful eye on the manner in which these moneys are dealt with.

I have been a witness to some of these federal-provincial goings-on. The provincial authorities had a high hand in them but when it came to helping those who needed help there was a little favour shown to one and a little disfavour to another, or what we commonly call patronage. This should not be the case. If this is a public insurance plan no consideration should be given to political affiliation. When a farmer suffers from crop failure he needs help and usually he needs it immediately, not in three or four years time. A farmer in eastern Ontario seeds in the spring and in all likelihood he needs the money from that crop to pay his debts. Some farmers have been waiting for a year or more for back payments on dairy products. If there is to be a similar delay in handing out crop insurance payments the prospect is an unhappy one. It may be said that payment will be made eventually. But in the meantime farm creditors are pressing and farmers cannot wait that long. For this reason I hope payments under this scheme will be made as quickly and as fairly as possible.

Another difference between agriculture in eastern Canada and western Canada is the price per acre paid for land. In the east farms are smaller and prices tend to be larger, though, of course, there are high prices and low prices. Production on the farms of eastern Canada, particularly in Quebec except for the Richelieu valley, is largely confined to poultry, swine, beef cattle and dairy cattle. Wheat and grain production do not amount to much because the land is not suitable for that purpose. The farmer has to depend on pasture and forage, and if crop insurance does not cover all these things it is useless to him. As the hon. member for Timiskaming said, the purpose of crop insurance is not to make money on it. Its purpose is to help a farmer get through a bad year without going into debt. As matters stand now, if some mishap occurs many farmers have to leave that industry.

In my own region there are some poor farms. Beef cannot be raised on stones. These farms are useless for growing crops or hay. Even mountain goats would have difficulty surviving on them. But some good farms in the area have closed down because of crop losses. I hope the provincial government of Quebec will expedite its legislation and work in co-operation with the federal government. Farmers must be helped in many ways whether they are engaged in the production of beef, swine or feed grain. If a farmer loses his hay crop and has to import feed at high price from a distance he may as well stop farming, considering the price he gets for his cattle today.

Judging by the energy the minister has displayed I am sure he will do his utmost to provide a better standard of living for the agricultural sector of the economy and without discrimination between east and west. Western Canada has appreciated crop insurance for some years, but the program will have to take into consideration different factors in eastern Canada where farms are smaller and there is a greater variety of production.

I hope the minister will keep a vigilant eye on the provincial governments to see that they do not start fooling around with the funds given by the federal government. I hope the provincial governments will not delay in making payments to farmers in distress. If they do delay the farmers will have gone out of agriculture completely.

The remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming about rain-making machines caused me to smile because he said the provincial Department of Agriculture in Ontario sort of ordered things about to get rain. The former minister of mines and natural resources in Quebec, Mr. Rene Levesque, authorized the placing of these machines and I know that where he did there was plenty of rain. One year the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) swam around his constituency, and the same thing happened in Lac-Saint-Jean.

I do not know how good these machines are but I do know that where they were operated plenty of rain fell. In fact, where previously we had a drought we ended up with a flood. Both conditions are equally bad. There should be some control over the use of these machines in order that they will not produce more damage than they are designed to prevent.

When payments are made under crop insurance I hope they will be just and honest without taking into account a farmer's political affiliations, and I emphasize that last point because in the past there has been some discrimination. We look forward to the passage of Bill C-208, and after it has been in effect for some time and experience has been gained in its administration we shall look forward to future amendments to the legislation.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the minister's answers to some of the questions I raised when the resolution was being discussed. I know that some of the people in the department have had a great deal of experience in the administration of P.F.A.A., particularly one official, and what I would like to know is whether the minister and his officials gave serious consideration to expanding P.F.A.A. so that it could provide a measure of crop insurance.

The $800 maximum that is available now certainly does not cover even the basic cost of putting in a crop on most farms, and of course it is not applicable to all the areas in Canada. But with the experience which the personnel of P.F.A.A. have in its administration and the data contained in office records, it seems to me the government could have moved into crop insurance in a better way than by having each of the provinces plow new ground in trying to develop a satisfactory crop insurance program.

The minister has not indicated whether serious consideration was given to extending P.F.A.A. into other areas of Canada, increasing the levy presently being imposed on farmers, including other products in addition to cereal grains, and increasing the benefits provided. Crop insurance is essentially a plan to provide payments to remove the element of tragedy or disaster resulting from the loss of a crop in any one year. It is not intended that payments be large enough so that farmers would find it profitable to operate under crop insurance. In 1939 payments under P.F.A.A. were as low as $300. They now go up to $800 but, as I said previously, this does not cover the cost of putting in a crop. But it does provide that the farmer does not have to go on municipal relief.

If they have crop losses year after year such as happened in one part of my constituency for seven years in succession because of hail storms and so on, then even with the assistance of P.F.A.A. it is necessary for the provincial and municipal governments to provide additional service. I will just leave that for a moment. I am pleased to support the part of the bill which changes the coverage from 60 to 80 per cent.

In clause 3 there are amendments allowing the amount of the insurance to be effective on any crop in an area, or on any farm in the area. It is to be based on the average yield of the crop or on the farm, whichever is the greater. I suppose the details of administering this part of the amendment to the act will be left up to the provincial government and the provincial crop insurance administration. However, I should like to point out that there is a really serious administrative problem here in trying to establish what the average for a crop may be on a single farm experience. When the act will say from now on, if this bill passes, that it is permissible to issue insurance and to pay benefits on a single farm experience, it is not clear to me how this is going to be arrived at. Are we going to ask the farmer to keep records? That is one way to determine what the average crop may have been for that farm.

It seems to me in this regard that we might be entering an area where losses in yield may fall within the category of losses over which a farmer had some control; in other words, he might be following poor farm practices. If he were able to buy insurance based on the average for that entire area, which naturally would include a number of farmers who practiced proper husbandry and who had reasonably good crops year after year, his would be a farm unit within a whole group which would be able to obtain insurance at the same rate as his neighbours who were practising good farming methods. Almost continually every year he would be collecting insurance.

I do not see anything in the federal act which prevents this kind of abuse. I raise this point because I know in certain parts of Saskatchewan, and even one or two places in Alberta, charges have been made that there are farmers who simply farm for the dry bonus, the P.F.A.A., and scratch in a crop in the spring without any particular diligence in so far as seeing that a good job is done, because they can collect P.F.A.A. in the fall. I am not saying this practice is widespread, because I do not think it is; but there are a few, and this irritates the good farmers who are around them.

Unless I am incorrectly interpreting this part of the bill, any farmer may buy insurance at the same rate in an area based on the average yield of the area or the farm, whichever is greater. If the average for the entire area is greater than the average for his farm, a farmer will be able to buy insurance up to 80 per cent of the average for the area. There probably are cases where an individual farmer may have been unable to produce 50 per cent of the average in the area, and if he continues that kind of practice, then he can collect 30 per cent every year.

I think we should be a little more careful and not allow this kind of abuse to creep in.

I suppose when the minister replies he is going to suggest that the provincial crop insurance legislation and administration ought to be set up in a way which would prevent this happening. But, Mr. Speaker, so far as the federal legislation is concerned this is permissible. I think this is something we should be careful about.

There is another point I should like to mention to the minister and the parliamentary secretary. In a number of statements the minister has indicated that the federal government apparently is rather anxious to expand crop insurance to as many areas as possible, and very quickly, so that it will be unnecessary for the federal government to move into an area with emergency assistance in an emergency year. Because of the problems involved in working out the details, we come to a situation where we have a federal crop insurance scheme in respect of which it is unfair for the federal government to try to force crop insurance at an accelerated pace by withholding assistance for emergency purposes. I do not believe that a crop insurance program is something which can be forced.

I would hope that the pilot projects which now are operating in Alberta, and to some extent in Saskatchewan where they have been in it a little longer, and even in Manitoba, will not be forced to expand because of this kind of attitude. There will be agricultural years, not only in the prairies but in many other parts of Canada, when there will be disasters due to weather, drought, flood, hail frost, or other reasons. I think the federal government should be disposed to co-operate with the provincial governments in taking care of these emergencies without holding up the crop insurance program and saying that it will take care of these things, because up until now six out of the ten provinces have not even tried it at all. Even in those areas where there have been pilot projects going for some time, both the provincial departments and the farmers concerned are not satisfied there is sufficient experience to say that it is entirely satisfactory.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say that I think we are a long way from having worked out all the details of a completely satisfactory crop insurance scheme, taking into account the variations in climate, soil conditions, and also the many products that are produced in Canada. Therefore, I would hope that we do not try to move too quickly. I would hope also that we do not disregard programs such as P.F.A.A., which have been satisfactory in the past. I should like to see some change of attitude; that is, a recognition that the federal and provincial governments have a responsibility to deal with emergencies when they arise. I should not like to see it suggested that we are going to withhold this because we want to get crop insurance in as quickly as possible. If there was some kind of near perfect scheme, near perfect bill, and near perfect administration in existence at the present time, then I think there would be some justification for this attitude. In the meantime I do not believe it is fair to force on provinces or municipalities some kind of an alternate scheme to meet emergencies, in view of the fact that these schemes are far from perfect at the present time.

• (7:10 p.m.)

Mr. W. H. Jorgensen (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up a great deal of time, but I do wish to say that I am pleased by the amendments now before us. Perhaps I am in a somewhat different position from the three preceding speakers, because in the late 1940's I was instrumental in urging Manitoba farmers to press the provincial government to carry on an examination of the possibility of adopting a crop insurance program. As a matter of fact, I owned a grain farm, and I spent my winters travelling through the province encouraging farmers to take some action. As a result of the action taken the provincial government set up a commission in the early 1950's to study the whole question of crop insurance.

At that time I had made some examination of the programs that were in existence in the United States. I presented a brief on behalf of the farm organization to this commission, in which we recommended certain things in respect of a crop insurance program. That commission quite rightly recommended that a crop insurance program be set up, but only if there was federal assistance made available. No such assistance was forthcoming from the Liberal party, which was in office until 1957.

In 1957 this party assumed office and that year a bill was presented and enabling legislation was passed. In 1959 the province of Manitoba embarked on a crop insurance program on a trial basis. Test areas were set up throughout the province in order to gain the experience necessary to implement a crop insurance program which would be successful.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) went to great lengths to point out the need to go slowly on this measure. As a matter of fact, the government of the province of Manitoba has urged these amendments on the federal government because in its experience it feels they are necessary in order that it may expand its crop insurance program to cover more crops, giving a wider range of coverage.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not say that the federal government should go slowly in dealing with these amendments. I suggested it should proceed slowly and cautiously before extending crop insurance to areas where it has not existed before. I am sure the hon. member wants to be fair.

Mr. Jorgenson: I accept the hon. member's explanation of what he intended to say, but his explanation does not make sense, because in the final analysis the provincial government requires this legislation in order to adopt or enlarge crop insurance programs. This decision rests with provincial governments, and rightly so. The provinces must decide what crops should be covered and what areas should be covered.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was advocating a national crop insurance program on the one hand, while on the other complaining because farmers could not participate in existing programs. If they cannot participate in a program that has been developed by a provincial government to suit a province's needs, surely it is unreasonable to expect them to participate in a program that is supposed to have national application. The experience that is necessary for the development of crop insurance programs must be gained in particular areas where the crop insurance is to be applied.

I do not wish to assume the minister's task of explaining some of his comments, but because of my experience—I happen to be one of the few farmers in this chamber who has participated in a crop insurance program in my province—I do know something about crop insurance and I should like to make a few comments.

I cannot follow the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, who suggested that P.F.A.A. should be expanded in relation to a crop insurance program. At the same time, he complained that farmers in certain areas were taking advantage of P.F.A.A. by sort of dipping their fingers into the till. If we enlarge the provisions of P.F.A.A. to cover crop insurance across the country, we would be creating a greater opportunity for this sort of thing to take place.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat also complained that certain farmers may not be following good farming practices, yet would benefit to the same extent as others. He suggested that some provision should be adopted to prevent this from happening. Under the Manitoba crop insurance measure there is a provision which allows the Manitoba crop insurance corporation to exclude any farmer from coverage if it is felt he is not following good farming practices. In the final analysis the determination as to whether or not a farmer is going to participate in a crop insurance program must be left to the farmer himself. This is one of the strongest arguments against a nationally applied insurance program. Only by looking at insurance rates applicable in certain areas and by considering crop prospects can a farmer decide what type of crop he is going to grow, and whether or not it will pay him to take out crop insurance. For that reason and many others the type of program that was developed in 1959, now being amended, is the type of program that in our experience in Manitoba works to the best advantage of the farmers, and those people charged with the responsibility of administering it.

This bill provides that summerfallow will be eligible for insurance coverage. This was not so in the past. Again I do not wish to take credit for the adoption of this principle, but I must say that for years I urged the Manitoba provincial government to adopt this type of amendment. In many instances in my area the farmers were not able to seed crops because of excess moisture. That is one condition that could arise to prevent the seeding of a crop. It is rather difficult to apply this type of insurance to second year crops because one has no way of knowing whether or not a second year crop can be sown. Even at this time, when the amendments are now before us, there has been a change in respect of summerfallow. This is the result of improved marketing conditions for grain. Many farmers now are not putting any land in summerfallow, but because of reasons beyond their control they are going to be in the position, of not being able to collect insurance if they fail to seed a crop in a particular year. In this area perhaps the minister will have to project his thinking further. I am not criticizing the amendment—I think it is a good one—but we have reached the point where we should consider action on a larger scale.

There can be no objection to the raising of the coverage from 60 to 80 per cent. However, I doubt very much there will be many farmers on the prairies who will wish to participate in a program on such an increased level of coverage. In connection with that, I should like to ask the minister a question with which he might deal in his statement. I wonder whether he could supply us with figures in regard to the increase in the premium rate when the coverage is raised from 60 to 80 per cent. In other words, could he tell us what are the premium levels at the present time and what they will be in the future. I am sure his officials have done some calculations on this matter and can provide us with the answer.

So far as the intention of the federal government to increase its participation in the premiums is concerned, again they are behind the times because the 5 per cent increase in the federal government's contribution to the premiums has already been swallowed up by the application of the 11 per cent sales tax on farm machinery, by the increased interest rates which will accrue as the result of the recently stated intentions of the government, and by the increased cost of living. And so the farmer gains nothing from this 5 per cent increase, although the minister may try to take credit for doing something that is supposed to have some appeal.

I was rather amused at the reply which the minister gave to some previous observations which were made during the resolution stage of the bill. Clause 3 of the bill contains a provision under which the provincial governments are asked to specify the manner in which the province will inform each person to whom a policy of crop insurance is issued of Canada's participation in the insurance scheme under which the policy is issued. The minister said that the reason for this provision was that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) in his statement during the introduction of this resolution outlined the need for greater effort in informing farmers of the program. I can just see the minister, after listening to these appeals by the hon. member for Mackenzie, dashing out to his officials and saying: "This clause must be inserted". I suspect, Mr. Speaker, there is another motive which is apparent to all of us behind this amendment, but I will not go into it.

In summing up, Mr. Speaker, let me say there can be little if any objection to the amendments that are now before us in this particular bill. We support them, although we question the value of certain measures that are proposed in the bill. I am thinking in particular of the 5 per cent increase in the premium rates which has already been dissipated, and the clause, which I have just mentioned, dealing with the publicity angle. However, I wish to assure the minister that we on this side of the house, intend to support the amendments that are now before us. We hope that more provinces across Canada will avail themselves of the provisions of this legislation in implementing crop insurance programs for the provinces, or for the commodity groups within the provinces. We think this is worth-while legislation which will be of tremendous assistance to the farmers.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I do not intend to spend any time on this bill, Mr. Speaker. First of all I wish to say that I was very impressed by the comments made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson). They were like a breath of fresh air, after the statements made by the three previous speakers, who went on at great length and really said very little.

I should like to ask the minister whether, in commenting on the amendments, he might inform us of Nova Scotia's interest in moving into this field and providing this type of insurance to those farmers who might find this legislation to be of benefit to them. I may say that in Nova Scotia we do not have large farming operations; we have a good deal of mixed farming. In those areas crop insurance is of no great value because the types of losses we suffer are never so extensive as to offset the premiums.

However, the inclusion of fruit trees in the coverage under the act will be of real benefit to the fruit growers in the Annapolis valley. I think much interest will be shown by those farmers in participating in such a scheme. Farmers in my constituency will also be especially interested in the coverage of perennial plants such as blueberries and strawberries. Cumberland county is one of the major blueberry producers of the maritime provinces. I believe it is the largest producer, to quite a substantial degree, and in recent years we have noticed an increase in the production of strawberries, which might also be covered by this legislation. This additional coverage will therefore be of great interest to the farmers. May I also point out that farmers are at present participating in a more specialized way of producing for the frozen food plants, which have been increasing in number.

I will therefore appreciate hearing anything the minister might have to say which would indicate the attitude of Nova Scotia with regard to these amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Berger (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, if you allow me, I should like to make a few remarks regarding Bill No. C-208.

Coming from a mostly rural riding, it is only natural that, like my colleagues, I should be interested in a legislation designed to improve the Crop Insurance Act. Considering the several disastrous years we have experienced lately, especially with regard to agriculture, of course, our interest in this bill is quite understandable.

I know that other members who do not share my political views, had the opportunity to speak at the resolution stage. Going through Hansard for June 21, I found that some members from Quebec were prevented, for lack of time, from showing their interest in the matter.

A few, last minute items of information make it possible for me, first of all, to congratulate properly the Minister of Agriculture for his interest in a situation which surely deserves our fullest consideration.

Obviously, the improvements which will be brought about will be a valuable contribution to the output of our farmers. I knew for a fact that Quebec—I am referring to the administration which has now been superseded—had indicated its intention to introduce crop insurance in the province of Quebec, but no legislation had yet been brought forward to implement such a hope entertained by so many of our farmers. I am convinced that with the increasing and imperative consideration agriculture requires, the new administration will also examine the problem. Meetings such as we witnessed today, between the federal and the provincial Ministers of Agriculture bode well for certain agreements. Some aspects of Bill C-208 have especially interested me, namely section 3, subsection (2), paragraph (fa) which reads:

—specify the manner in which the province will inform each person to whom a policy of crop insurance is issued of Canada's participation in the insurance scheme under which the policy is issued;

• (7:30 p.m.)

This is one more commendable step which I support readily; it might do away with the goings on that have occurred too often in the past where, under joint programs, the federal government unfortunately did not get the credit it deserved in the case of similar legislation. This happened not only in my province but also in others where the provincial authorities have used such legislation to their sole benefit. I believe this provision will convince our constituents that their representatives in Ottawa—which we call at home the far-off federal capital—consider at least the problems which face them.

This increase from 20 to 25 per cent of the federal government contribution in respect of the premiums is praiseworthy. I trust that when circumstances allow in the future, and with the blessing of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), the contribution can be increased again perhaps, so that more help may be given those provinces which are less fortunate than others.

I also notice, with regard to extended coverage, that it is stipulated in clause 5A(1)(b) as follows:

—loss arising when the seeding of summerfallowed land intended to be used to grow an insured crop is prevented by excess ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards.

I did not have time to discuss the matter at length with the minister, but several weeks ago I had the opportunity of advising him in writing of a rather special problem, in my riding at any rate, with regard to the fairly extensive damages caused each year, and even twice a year, to fodder crops by migratory birds on their arrival or departure, on the islands in my riding and especially on the south shore.

The problem is this: we have, and with reason it goes without saying, laws protecting migratory birds, which laws were introduced by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing). Migratory birds are of great importance to the economy of my riding which is always in need of help, like many others of course. We want to protect the Canada goose, but if our farmers' crops are devastated completely when the birds swoop down on their fields, or on the strand, the farmers should be allowed to include those losses under the crop-insurance program. I am thinking in particular of the inhabitants of the islands whose crops are more severely affected by what constitutes, after a fashion, a devastating pest.

Of course, looking at it from the standpoint of sports, particularly during the hunting season in the fall, we are always pleased to welcome, for the greater part, our neighbours from the surrounding constituencies, from the city constituencies, even people from Montreal, and in particular the many Americans who, each year, have the good habit of hunting migrating fowl in our area. Then we are faced, if you want, with measures to protect that sector of our economy, but also to handicap it. I would be very pleased if this item was included in the improvements to the Crop Insurance Act, in order to kill two birds with one stone or two good birds with two stones, if you will, Mr. Speaker.

The reason I took part in this debate was simply to thank those who had the excellent idea of making further improvements to this act. We know that a first improvement will open the way to others, and I dare hope once more in concluding these brief remarks that the new administration which took over in our province, will carry on with the good intentions at least shown by the previous administration to introduce, as soon as possible, in the province of Quebec, which, I am convinced, surely needs it, legislation with such an important scope in the interest of the agricultural class, which was unfortunately neglected for too long and not sufficiently assisted.

I hope these few remarks will be taken into consideration, and I wish to assure the minister that, thanks to the assistance and the valued advice his department will provide us with, and mainly the information that the Department of Agriculture will be pleased to forward to us occasionally, we will be able to become happy and particularly skilful propagandists who will succeed in selling the idea to a greater extent in our province, so that the Quebec farmer may benefit from legislation which will be entirely to his advantage.

[English]

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): I am prompted to rise, Mr. Speaker, because of the remarks made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson). It seemed to me that in his handling of this subject he really illustrated the hesitancy that has characterized the lack of action of the government of Alberta. He remarked that, this legislation is far from perfect; that he was afraid that in the event the farmers had insurance they would not be able to come to the government for help in case of disaster; that he did not consider the scheme feasible as it is now. All of these remarks, Mr. Speaker, are occasioned by what I believe to be a fundamental failure to grasp the general idea behind this measure.

Of course it is not perfect. This is a new field. We do not have a model or a pilot program because of the varying climatic conditions and the different crops grown in Canada. It was thought the most feasible insurance scheme that could be worked out would be one worked out by each province, cognizant of its own conditions and problems. The federal government therefore merely provided the vehicle by which they would co-operate with the provinces in any scheme that the provinces developed. The federal government would share the cost, allowing the provinces, because of their special conditions, to develop the scheme. Certainly if the hon. member for Medicine Hat had paid any attention to the idea behind the development of the scheme, we would not have heard the speech that we did hear. It is left to the provinces to develop the type of insurance scheme, the type of coverage best suited for that province. The scheme might only cover certain areas or certain crops; it may only be taken a certain distance and the province would find that would be about the limit of the practical coverage needed.

The whole idea was that the scheme would have to be developed by the province itself. I say the attitude of the hon. member for Medicine Hat is reflecting the slowness of our own provincial government in Alberta, which only last year started to take a tentative look at this act. They should have been developing ideas as they have been doing in Manitoba for the last four or five years, and by now we might have a substantial number of farmers receiving some benefit from this act. I cannot for a moment imagine how the hon. member could use the argument that these farmers, having been covered by insurance, would be unable to ask for aid in case of some disaster. He is probably referring to the number of times that farmers, because of drought or flood, have had to come to provincial and federal governments, hat in hand, and ask for special grants. I suppose that is a nice position in which to have the farmers. Certainly I cannot understand the hon. member's failure to realize the number of minor tragedies —minor because they are isolated—where the losses suffered by individual farmers would be alleviated by insurance. These are instances where it is not a serious enough matter nationally, perhaps even provincially, for the provision of any other source of aid.

• (7:40 p.m.)

I do not want to take any further time of the house, but I do hope that the province of Alberta might go to the province of Manitoba now, find out what they have learned, perhaps receive a lot of good help from them, and be able to make up for the last three or four years which the province has wasted by not developing this scheme. They should start right away, as are other provinces, to develop a crop insurance scheme which would be of considerable benefit to the people of the province.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, several questions were asked. I hesitated to ask the minister to do this on second reading, but perhaps he would be able to answer them now.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three questions which I believe were pertinent and appropriate. I am afraid I cannot answer all of them because there are not complete or absolute answers to all of them.

The hon. member for Provencher asked a question with respect to the increase in premium by increasing the coverage from 60 to 80 per cent. I believe that was the question about which he was exercised. There is no categorical answer in this regard. It depends, of course, on the nature of the area being covered.

As hon. members know, the agreements with the provinces will prescribe the particular divisions of areas which are made, and alternatively, as conceived in the bill, this could even be on an individual farm basis. If a province, in its wisdom, saw fit, that would be an applicable method. The increase in the premium will depend on the nature of the area, the crop and the losses in the particular area. But certainly the increase from 60 to 80 per cent indicates a very considerable increase in coverage; and, like any other form of insurance, you pay for what you get.

I am sure that many farmers will find that the 80 per cent increase in a particular area which is growing a particular crop will be more than they wish to pay. I do not think that all of them by any means will want to buy an 80 per cent coverage policy. However, under the scheme they have the chance to buy even lower than 60 per cent coverage if they so wish.

I regret that I cannot give any categorical answer to this question. I am informed that in a high risk area, with probably a high risk crop, the difference between 80 per cent coverage and 60 per cent coverage could involve as much as double the premium; but this is merely an illustrative figure. Certainly the cost would be higher, and in the case of many crops it may well be that the farmers do not wish that type of coverage.

Judging from the many discussions which we have had, the added coverage is particularly attractive to growers, such as fruit growers, tomato growers and people engaged in these areas, where a 20 per cent loss represents a very serious loss. They are the ones who particularly require this coverage. I regret that I cannot be more categorical, but to the best of my knowledge there is no absolute answer to the question posed by the hon. member, except that which we will gain from experience.

The hon. member for Cumberland posed a question as to whether Nova Scotia is more likely to participate in crop insurance as a result of the amendments. My instructions are to the effect that, as a rule, when the maritime provinces suffer a loss it is not complete or total. Apparently the sovereign province of Nova Scotia enjoys such a salubrious climate that this type of complete catastrophe does not occur too often, or as often as in agricultural communities in other provinces.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, at the federal-provincial meeting which was held last February, I believe, to determine the directions in which the various provinces wished to move in the area of crop insurance, the officials from Nova Scotia indicated that the 80 per cent coverage in particular was of great interest to them. This is the specific aspect of this bill that seemed to indicate that it would be of interest to them, and that it might encourage the province of Nova Scotia to make further inroads into the area of crop insurance. I take it this is probably because of the fruit growing areas there. Since that time we have had no further indications as to what are the intentions of the province of Nova Scotia in this regard.

With regard to the hon. member for Medicine Hat, I am not going to give him a hard time, as did the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, but I will try to answer one or two of his questions. He was concerned that the premium structure might be conceived on an area basis, whereas the amount payable on loss would, on the other hand, be returnable on a farm unit basis. I may not have made that too clear in my original presentation.

[Mr. Greene.]

This could not be the fact. The premium structure has to be conceived either on one basis or the other. Either the premium structure in the provincial agreement may be on an area basis, in which event the loss ratio or risk in the particular area is calculated actuarially and both the premium and the return in the event of loss are based on an area basis, or alternatively, if the provincial agreements so prescribe, the coverage may be on a per unit or per farm basis, in which case the premium is calculated on the risk for that particular farm unit in light of the number of years required experience. The loss is then based similarly on the premium paid. In other words, you cannot have it both ways. Either your premium is based on an area basis, in which event so is your loss; or your premium is based on an individual farm unit basis, and so is your loss.

• (7:50 p.m.)

I might point out that this latter incentive in the act may not be achieved in all provinces overnight. It may well be that before a premium structure can be conceived on a per farm basis, some considerable experience is going to be needed before an actuarial calculation which is meaningful can be arrived at. But the aim toward a per farm coverage is, I think, a very desirable one, as pointed out by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, in that this will be the ultimate encouragement to the individual who is a good farmer and has an efficient production. He can insure his own farm according to the productivity and risk of that particular unit, which in the case of the efficient and productive farmer costs obviously less than if he insured on an area basis, where he may have to take some less efficient farmers in with him in the calculation of the premium structure. So, I think the hon. member points to the ultimate idea, namely a per farm coverage on an experience of a sufficient number of years determined adequately and actuarially, which will enable the good farmer to buy his coverage more cheaply than if he were less productive.

I do not need to tell my friend, who is extremely knowledgeable in this area, that this matter has been one of the complaints with respect to P.F.A.A. The good farmer pays in and never collects, and the others take money out almost every year. Twenty five years out of 27 I think is the record. This is the reason for having this matter within the ambit of this statute, so that ultimately coverage can be made on an individual basis. Such coverage will be most economical for the effective farmer, and it will encourage efficiency, because efficient farming will lead to a lower premium structure. In very much the same way, if you have not had an accident for 25 years driving your car, and if nobody under 25 years old drives your car, your insurance will be at a much lower rate than it would be if you were a high risk.

I might also remind the hon. member that the premium structure has to be approved by the provincial government, and therefore here we have to safeguard to the effect that the premium structure, when conceived under any agreement, will be sound actuarially. As a result greater participation in this scheme will be encouraged.

Those, I think are the major questions of which I have made a note, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, this is the clause about which I questioned the minister, and I am grateful for the additional information he gave a moment or two ago.

I wish to raise another point, for clarification. We talk about premiums and we talk about payments. I think the minister must agree that a third factor is involved in these insurance policies. The coverage now will be up to 80 per cent on a farm or on an area, whichever is the greater. This, however, is not going to happen in all cases. Certainly if clause 3 is passed, this will be permissible within the ambit of the premium, the coverage, and the award that may be paid.

Although it does not say so in clause 3, may I ask the minister whether a farmer may purchase insurance on the basis of the 80 per cent coverage of an area, and then collect, if there is an award, on the basis of the performance of his individual group?

If you take that paragraph apart, it says:

> —the amount of the insurance to be effected on any crop in any area or on any farm in any area, which shall not exceed eighty per cent of the average yield of the crop in the area or on the farm, whichever is the greater,"

It does not say that it has to be on the same basis. The premium is something else if there is a group premium, and this can be adjusted for an individual farm, or with respect to an individual farm experience over a ten year period. Perhaps that would be a high enough period for anybody attempting to abuse this to be prevented from so doing.

I wonder if it is possible for a farmer to buy the insurance on the basis of the 80 per cent of the average crop in the area, and then to collect on the basis of his single farm experience?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that if the coverage is taken on 80 per cent of the area, that then the premium structure is on this basis, and the loss will be an area loss and not an individual loss. But, if you cover an individual farmer, then you pay your premium on the ten year average on a farm once the statistics are available with respect to that farm. The loss then could be on an individual unit basis. At least that is my understanding.

I must admit that the section does not make that specifically clear. It is my understanding, in any agreement, that that is the interpretation which will clearly be made of the section, because any other basis I do not think would be actuarially sound.

Mr. Olson: Will it be necessary, then, for a farmer to elect at the beginning of the year, or when he buys the policy, as to whether the award will be made to him on the basis of an area group loss, or on the basis of his individual farm loss, whatever the reason of that loss. Would the farmer have to take that option when he pays the premium in the first place? Would he have to decide whether the loss should be collected on the area or on the single farm basis?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that the specifics of the coverage will be covered in the federal-provincial agreements. In the early years, in all probability, there will not be sufficient statistics to determine what will be the acturial structure per individual farm. We will not have 10 year or 25 year records for each individual farm in the early stages of the program. If my understanding is correct, in the early years of the program in most provinces a per farm or per unit policy will not be available until the statistical data has been built up, and the records have been built up over a period of years to enable an actuarially sound program for individual farms to be conceived.

When that day comes you will have your choice, I understand, in electing what to do. You may ask yourself: "Do I go in with my group and pay the lower rates, or do I take the alternative policy, which is now available, because they now have the data enabling me to be covered individually? If I am an efficient farmer, one who has never had any loss, it may be that I shall elect to go in on an individual basis." In that case the premium structure would be more attractive.

I think I should stress that we are not enunciating that individual policies on individual farms will be available in all provinces right off the bat. The legislation makes this permissible, once the provincial organizations controlling the actuarial part of the plan have determined that there are sufficient statistics to enable individual coverage to be entered into.

We are not indicating here—and I do hope there is no misunderstanding on the part of the public—that we can make individual coverage, or the choice as between individual and area coverage, available immediately.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I am not too sure that the minister is certain of the facts he is stating. If he is, I am not too sure that the prospect he has held out is one that would be brought about by this legislation.

My view of this particular clause is that it sets out that if you have an area where you cannot get enough farmers to form a group insurance area, that the one or two farmers who wanted so to elect could elect to be insured on an individual basis. This sort of thing would provide the province with an opportunity of going ahead in a limited way with the act, as it developed.

It seems to me that it is a little far fetched to say that this act was designed to provide a group insurance plan based on an individual farm record basis, regardless of the individual farmer. That is a long, long way from what we have, and it certainly would be misleading to the farm population of Canada if they were to think that.

I have not, in the brief time I have had to look at this measure, formed an opinion whether this is a good or a bad idea.

• (8:00 p.m.)

Generally speaking, my first impression is that it would not be particularly to the advantage of the farming community to proceed on that basis. I may be wrong in this view and may wish to amend it later. But that is my first impression. Bearing in mind the plans which some of the provinces are bringing in, or want to bring in, I wonder whether this is one way of introducing crop insurance into areas where there are not enough people interested in the plan to form a substantial group at the present time.

Mr. Greene: Obviously we cannot solve all the problems in this one amendment. What we are trying to do is this: We are attempting to give a wider degree of choice and a more attractive choice—to make the package more interesting and bring in as many people as we can. Obviously, the concept of crop insurance will have little success if farmers do not think they are getting a good deal, and refrain from using it. The act as it stands obviously failed to attract a sufficient number of farmers. For this reason we now seek to make the selection as broad as possible, so that many more farmers will feel that this is attractive, and in their interest, and will buy it.

A plan which had the support of less than 30 per cent of the farmers within a province would obviously not be doing the job properly. It is only when we get a substantial majority of the farmers covered that we can feel the measure has been worth while.

With respect to this question of area coverage and individual settlement I should like to say, so that the hon. member who has just spoken, as well as the hon. member for Medicine Hat, may be clear on this point, that provision can be made for both. In the latter circumstances the premium would certainly be higher, but it is possible within the scope of the act for a province to issue a policy envisaging this type of coverage.

Mr. Olson: Let me be clear on this point. Is the minister saying that if a farmer purchases coverage on the basis of 80 per cent of the average crop in an area, and if he elects to receive an individual settlement or award in the case of loss, such farmer would pay a higher rate than the area rate?

Mr. Greene: Those are my instructions. A province, if it so wishes, can provide for this kind of coverage, subject to the fact that the premium structure has to be approved by the governor in council. The premium structure must be calculated according to actuarial rules on an area basis, and a farmer would get coverage on his own farm based on those calculations. If such a policy were available, the premium would be higher.

Mr. Olson: I appreciate the minister's remarks to the effect that it would take some time to accumulate records required to set up the premium basis and the coverage offered. But suppose, in 1967, the first year by which these agreements would be operative, a farmer bought insurance on the basis of 80 per cent of the average yield in his area, at whatever the premium for that area happened to be. Then suppose that for some reason he lost his crop because of a flood or a hailstorm confined, for the most part, to his own farm. He would not be covered because he had not elected an individual settlement when he bought his insurance.

Mr. Greene: If in its wisdom the province saw fit to make it available he would have that kind of alternative. Whether the province would do so we shall not know until the agreements have been settled. But it is possible to do so within the legislation as drawn up.

Mr. Olson: Turning to subclause (2) of clause 3, I note what the hon. member for Provencher has referred to as being, possibly, a little advertising. I do not know who the minister expects will get the benefit of this advertising but perhaps, in the back of his mind, he thought the credit might properly go to the Liberal party. Perhaps the minister would tell us what formula he intends to use to ensure that the provinces, who receive contributions under this measure, inform the farmers, who will benefit from this legislation, of whatever he thinks they should know.

Mr. Greene: I can assure the hon. member that I do not have in mind that there should be anything about the Liberal party, or even about the Minister of Agriculture, on the policy. But I think the farmers will support a measure of this kind better if they understand it completely. When everything is made clear, they are in a better position to pass judgement on it. I think it is extremely important that the policies should indicate clearly (a) the coverage (b) the actual cost of the premium and (c) who is paying for it, and in what proportion. This is the idea. It will be made clear within the policy so that the individual farmer can see exactly what he is getting, what it is costing him and what contribution is being made by agencies other than himself.

Mr. Olson: I take it the minister intends to state this on the back, or on the front, of every policy as issued. Is that the method by which he intends to make sure that every insured person knows where the contribution is coming from?

Mr. Greene: That is the thought behind it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Definition of "extended coverage".

Mr. Barnett: Will the minister tell us briefly what the situation will be in the commercial fruit growing areas of British Columbia when the proposed section 5A comes into effect? Since there is no commercial fruit growing in my constituency I am perhaps not as well informed on this subject as I should be. In a general way this provision for coverage against the loss of an orchard of trees could be important to many areas of British Columbia.

Mr. Greene: Here, again, the extent and flexibility of coverage will be subject to the agreement with the province but the idea, as I understand it, is to enable fruit farmers in particular to cover the loss of their trees, not only with respect to the cost of replacement of the trees but against loss of income in the interval before new trees become productive.

Again I think there will have to be a broad area of coverage in order to make the policies saleable and attractive, because I think there is a wide variety as to the method of operations, and as to the extent which tree farmers rely exclusively on fruit farms for their income. It would be a very expensive policy that would encompass one year's loss of crop, plus the cost of replacing the trees, plus six, eight or ten years before another crop was produced. There will have to be degrees of coverage available so that each individual farmer can select what is best suitable to his particular operation, bearing in mind what he can afford to pay.

The attempt being made here is to make the clause as broad as possible to enable the most flexible agreements to be entered into with the provinces, so that policies will give as wide coverage as possible. We have not tried to be dogmatic and specific. We appreciate what is best for one region may be different from what is best for another.

Mr. Barnett: Has the minister's discussion with British Columbia led him to believe that this clause will be applicable in that province?

Mr. Greene: In respect of losses in the fruit tree areas, we have had extensive negotiations with the minister in B.C. As the hon. member knows, serious losses occurred there in the very recent past, and the experience in B.C. has been important with respect to our drafting of this clause. I feel certain the clause as drafted meets the needs of the B.C. fruit growers, to the best of our ability to draft it.

Mr. Barnett: Part of the clause reads:

—loss arising from the destruction in whole or in part of stands of fruit trees or perennial plants other than trees—

Is nursery stock covered by this? Losses have occurred recently in the southern area of Vancouver island where nursery stock is quite an important part of the agricultural industry, and these losses were due to an invasion of the balsam woolly aphis. Some nursery stock has been rendered unsaleable, and in fact has had to be destroyed. Further, the holly growing industry is important in certain areas in that part of the province. Would holly trees be classified as fruit trees?

Mr. Greene: The judicial officers who advise me in these matters say that wording the clause in this way encompasses such plants and crops as the hon. member has referred to, including nursery stock. The intent is to cover that entire ambit. I am no longer in the legal business and would hate to hazard an opinion whether the draftsmen have been successful, but that has been the intent.

Mr. Barnett: I do not have the advantage of knowledge of the law that the minister has, but trees which do not bear fruit might be ruled by a law officer to be excluded from the benefit of coverage.

Mr. Greene: It may be that my hon. friend has discovered something which has not been thought of previously. I shall take the matter up with the officers to see that this is the correct interpretation. As laymen sometimes do, the hon. member may have stumbled upon a legal defect, but I shall take the matter up with the officers concerned.

Mr. Mather: Will this clause be applicable to the small fruit growers in the lower mainland of B.C., such as strawberry growers, who were hard hit by crop losses a year or two ago?

Mr. Greene: I can assure the hon. member that the strawberry growers of B.C. were also very much in our mind because we heard much about their losses. I am not sure whether it is this particular clause which extends coverage to them, but I believe it does. Certainly they are covered somewhere within the ambit of the bill.

Mr. Johnston: A few moments ago when dealing with the loss of fruit trees the minister referred to an amount of income from other sources. Would this enter into any complete crop insurance system? One of the thorny problems with other aid programs is the amount of outside income which is taken into consideration. This is something that should be avoided and cease to be a factor in a crop insurance scheme. Possibly I misunderstood the minister.

Mr. Greene: I regret that I may not have made myself clear in this regard. I can assure the hon. member that under this legislation there is neither a means test or a needs test. The point I was trying to make is that we need the broadest possible flexibility with regard to coverage of fruit orchards in particular.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I understand there are many people who have small orchards which do not represent their total income, but which is additional to their income. The rest of their income may be derived through other farming, or through work in industry, and they may have a few acres in fruit trees. Such a farmer may not wish to have as expensive a coverage as someone who depends for his entire livelihood on fruit trees. Therefore, I think the widest choice should be available so that the man who does not wish to buy comprehensive coverage may have available to him a more limited coverage at cheaper rates. He may not want coverage which is as expensive as that required by someone who is depending on the crop for next year's living. I believe the widest choice should be made available to the people.

Mr. Olson: With respect to subsection (b) of section 5A in clause 4, where it says:

—loss arising when the seeding of summer-fallowed land intended to be used to grow an insured crop is prevented by excess ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards.

I am wondering whether it will be necessary for the farmer to state his intentions early in the season. When will the administrators of the crop insurance scheme in the province have to know whether or not the farmer intends to seed this particular parcel of land? What I am most concerned about is the word "intended". I am wondering what will be the interpretation of this word and whether or not there will be a date. Will it be May 15 or May 30, or when will a farmer have to make it known to the administration that he did in fact intend to seed this land. Surely most farmers in most areas will not be purchasing an insurance policy until they have the crop seeded.

Mr. Greene: Well, Mr. Chairman, again this is one of the areas in respect of which up until now many provinces have thought it would be impossible to insure in any meaningful way. One of the reasons it has been difficult to expand crop insurance into areas such as this has been the doubt as to whether or not it would be practicable. The best answer I can give is that the purpose is to permit the provinces to carry policies which have the maximum flexibility, so that the coverage can be such as to enable the individual farmer to meet his needs. I do not think I can give my hon. friend an adequate answer in respect of subsection (b).

Mr. Olson: What I am particularly interested in is whether or not a farmer will be able to buy insurance after it is clear that he would not be able to seed the land because of excessive moisture.

Mr. Greene: My understanding with regard to that specific question is that the only time he will be able to buy that kind of insurance will be prior to the normal seeding time, and that it would not be available to him thereafter.

Mr. Hales: In respect of section 5(a), it is my understanding that this covers fruit, but the word "fruit" is not included here. It says "fruit trees", but my interpretation is that it covers the fruit crop.

Mr. Greene: Subject to correction, I believe one could include fruit under the existing act.

Mr. Hales: I should like to have the point cleared up as to whether or not fruit definitely is covered. In subsection (b), we have the expression "ground moisture". It is one thing to have an act and another thing to administer it. In this regard I think the minister will run into one of the greatest problems he ever has had in enforcing an act. What does excessive ground moisture mean? I can see the minister as a lawyer in a court room developing an entire case around what is excessive ground moisture. To me this phrase is very wide, and should be narrowed down much more than it is.

I also feel that if you are going to give crop insurance to people with summerfallow, and it is flooded over one year, probably because it has not been properly tiled, and then the next year it is flooded over again, that man should tile the land. Is he entitled to insurance? I think this will be very difficult to enforce. We speak of fruit trees. How will their value be established? They may be young trees, half-bearing, or full-bearings trees. I think there is a real problem for the department in this.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt there will be problems. One of the small mercies within all this is that I will not have to administer it. It will be administered within the ambit of the insuring authority in the provinces. Again this is an attempt to broaden the scope of the act to enable the making of agreements which will give coverage in mixed farming areas in respect of fruit trees and forage crops which has not previously been available. In all fairness, and without taking anything away from the western farmer, I think I should say this act probably was more beneficial as previously drawn in respect of a one-crop farm, such as that which produces wheat.

The province of Manitoba used the act as it exists very extensively, and this was very encouraging. This is an attempt to break new ground in an area where up until now it has been thought that it would be too difficult to insure. Such being the case, I think undoubtedly there will be problems such as are envisaged by the hon. member. It must be remembered that in any particular area this must be actuarially sound; the losses must be covered by the premium structure. Certainly the insuring authority, be it a board, commission, or whatever administrative agency is created to administer the program, is going to have to assure itself that this scheme is acturarially sound.

With regard to the coverage involving excessive ground moisture, I think the policy itself likely will have to spell this out specifically. I believe we run into the same thing with a fire insurance policy which covers water damage. The arbitrating authority has to determine whether this is water damage caused to the items which are covered under the policy.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Certainly I am not trying to minimize in any way the difficulties or problems that will have to be faced in making available policies that give coverage for such things as excess ground moisture and an appropriate interpretation by the authority which will determine the loss—that of course will be the insuring authority—but I feel sure this measure will give an opportunity for broader coverage than presently exists.

While I feel very certain there will be difficulties such as the hon. member has envisaged, I do believe this measure will make coverage available on a sound and effective basis. In early years of coverage I am sure there will be some problems in respect of forage crops, and that there will be some people who will feel that the coverage has not been what it should be. This always happens in respect of insurance. However, I do believe that this is the only way we can give an opportunity for coverage, particularly to eastern mixed farmers to whom it has not been available before, because the act was not sufficiently broad.

I am not minimizing the difficulties envisaged by the hon. member, but I feel confident we will be able to work these things out and thereby afford a wide choice of coverage on a premium structure which will be advantageous to many areas of agriculture which are now not covered under the act.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Mr. Greene moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

House in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

Mr. Benson moved:

Resolved, that toward making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967, the sum of $825,462,241.67 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could assure the house that this resolution is in the same form as resolutions of this type have taken in the past?

Mr. Benson: The bill to follow this resolution will grant full supply for the main estimates of the ten departments whose estimates have been approved by the committee of supply.

[Mr. Greene.]

One of the things this bill will do is point up the extent of the accomplishment of this parliament during the current session. The committee of supply has approved the estimates of ten departments including Citizenship and Immigration, Defence Production, Forestry, Indian Affairs, Industry, Legislation, National Revenue, Post Office, Privy Council and Veterans Affairs. What we are proposing by this bill is that full supply be granted for these departments, the estimates of which have been approved by the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think it should be said by at least one person that this is a welcome move and one which seems to me ought to have been adopted years ago. I refer to the approval of the estimates of those departments which have been finally dealt with by committee of supply. This should be noted in particular, in case someone makes reference in the press to the fact that we voted nearly a billion dollars in just a few minutes. What we are doing is finalizing what we have dealt with in great detail in committee of supply.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that what the hon. gentleman has said is quite true. What is happening now is in effect the culmination of a great deal of effort by members on all sides of the house in dealing with supply for the departments mentioned. Let me also say that it might be appropriate in future, after this house approves the estimates of a particular department, to introduce an individual supply bill, thus recognizing the fact that we have dealt with the estimates of that department for a complete year.

Mr. Knowles: I have just one other comment to make. I take it that once we pass the bill to follow this resolution, any interim supply bill brought forward will cover a lesser amount than otherwise might have been the case?

Mr. Benson: Yes.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Benson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No C-224, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Benson moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with those who are pleased to note a change in the formula and that we are not agreeing to twelve twelfths of certain requirements. I suggest that this new formula should be followed, but that it would be more realistic to follow it twice a year, rather than after the estimates of each department.

I do not wish to make a speech, Mr. Speaker, but—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peters: By popular demand I shall now have to make a speech, and I appreciate the invitation.

One of the departments covered by the bill is Veterans Affairs. There is a great deal of concern in the minds of many veterans because they will not have the opportunity of speaking about a certain problem following the passage of this bill, in view of the fact that it covers the total appropriation for the Department of Veterans Affairs.

The problem to which I refer relates to something we have been talking about for several days, the old age pension increase. Certain veterans feel that an increase in old age pensions will be granted in some provinces through the passage of supplementary legislation by provincial legislatures, and that 50 per cent of that increase will be paid by the federal government.

Of course this will be fine as far as it goes, but I am told that the veterans have already been informed that if they receive this supplementary benefit as the old age pension increase, then their war veterans allowance will be reduced by the same amount. It seems to me a very sad state of affairs that the Department of Veterans Affairs should send out this notice on a nation-wide scale to compensate for the information which has been disseminated by another federal department through the provincial election machinery, all of which is not normal procedure. I think it has been generally agreed by all members in this house that veterans allowance is a reward for services rendered, that it is not gratuitous but that it is deserved by the veterans. This payment is made under very strict conditions and in a limited number of cases.

I should therefore like to know what remedy the Minister of Finance, or maybe the Minister of National Revenue, will apply to correct this situation in which provinces pay an additional supplement to the old age pensioners, and the veterans affairs department reduces the payment made under the War Veterans Allowance Act by a similar amount.

We have always tried to maintain the pension structure in such a way as to keep pace with the payments in other sections of our social security program. In my opinion the veterans of this country should not be the ones to be unfairly treated. For this reason I should like to receive some information regarding the intentions of the government in dealing with this problem, and an explanation of the stand taken by the Department of Veterans Affairs according to which the supplementary payments made by the province are deducted from the allowances of the war veterans. I do not wish to belabour the point, but I think it should be raised and answered because I think it is doubtful, unless pension legislation is introduced in this session, that there will be an opportunity to raise this matter.

This may be one of the reasons for the reluctance shown by the department in passing the estimates before this situation is clarified. I think veterans all across Canada should be assured that if there is any advantage to be gained from the additional amount being paid by the provinces, which I understand approximates $25, $12.50 of which would be paid by the government, this amount should not be reduced from the war veterans allowances.

What this measure means, in my opinion, is that the ceiling of the allowances which the war veterans collect is changed, old age pension and other forms of aid being included as income. They should therefore be assured that this limit will be raised sufficiently to allow the veteran the benefit of living in a particular province where this extra payment is made.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): I should simply like to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I point out that if the Minister of National Revenue speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Benson: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the questions raised by the hon. member are certainly worthy of consideration by this government. I should also like to add that no government has been more sympathetic toward the position of veterans in Canada than has this government. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) is a distinguished veteran. As the hon. member knows, he is now away in Europe paying proper tribute to individuals who gave their lives for Canada in the last two wars. I wish to assure the hon. member that the question he raised will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and of the cabinet in a most sympathetic manner.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we are told that there are no French copies of the bill. This is exactly the same thing that happened this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Benson: I understand there are copies of the bill in French.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Benson moved the third reading of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, before giving leave to proceed to the third reading of the bill—does this mean that from now on, when we come to supplementary estimates, as we are going to do immediately, according to the order paper, if we accept to proceed to the third reading of this bill tonight—we shall not be able during the study of supplementary estimates to analyse the expenses of the departments, the budgets of which will be approved tonight? Does this mean that, if we discuss supplementary estimates immediately afterwards, we shall not be able to deal with the estimates of the departments mentioned in the bill?

• (8:50 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to indicate what this procedure means. It means that these estimates, which were approved by this house, will proceed to final approval through a supply bill. Where, for example, a department may require a supplementary estimate for any particular item, then of course that department will be available for discussion. If, for example, a department obtained its supply through this particular bill and had no supplementary estimates, then it is completed. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is just and proper. If the committee has completely considered the estimates of a department, then unless that department comes back for further consideration by way of supplementary estimates, the consideration of that department should be completed. This is really the only way in which we can proceed in a businesslike manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that supplementary estimates will come before us immediately afterwards and also that I would have a few words to say as regards one department, and I would not like to delay the business of the house by speaking to this bill, I would ask that the motion for the third reading be made tomorrow instead of today.

[English]

Mr. Benson: I would like very much to have third reading of this particular bill so that it could go forward to the other place, where they might consider it. I would say, on behalf of the government, that if my hon. friend has anything to raise about any government department in this particular bill, the government will not object to his raising it tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in view of the goodwill of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) and since what I had to say concerned precisely his department, I shall do so on consideration of interim supply with the permission of the Minister of National Revenue and, then, in view of the fact that the minister pledges to let me say a few words on interim supply about his department, we agree to give third reading immediately, if the minister agrees to our suggestion.

[English]

Mr. Benson: That is quite acceptable; I am sure he could not say anything derogatory about my department.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the minister provokes me into it, I am ready to do so right now, and I believe that what I have to say about his department will bring a little shameful red to his cheeks.

[English]

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY

House in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Benson: I move:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $1,662,982,-791.93, being the aggregate of—

(a) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, not otherwise provided for, except Finance Item 15 for which the proportion is three-twelfths, and Transport Item 103 and Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40 for which no proportion is granted—$1,252,481,028.67;

(b) an additional four-twelfths of the total amounts of Dominion Bureau of Statistics Item 10, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L75 and L80 (Schedule A) of the said Main Estimates—$4,299,-333.83;

(c) an additional three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 15 and 70 (Schedule B) of the said Main Estimates—$1,902,250.00;

(d) an additional two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 55 and 75, Secretary of State Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L30 and L95 (Schedule C) of the said Main Estimates—$25,681,300.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Items 5 and 55, Finance Item 10, Fisheries Item 10, Justice Item 1, Mines and Technical Surveys Items 20, 25, 35, 45, 60, 80, 85, National Film Board Item 1, Northern Affairs and National Resources Item 15 and Transport Item 5 (Schedule D) of the said Main Estimates—$16,293,-229.17;

(f) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates A for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$193,924,378.08;

(g) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Item 35a, Defence Production Item 20a, Finance Item 4a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40a, Transport Items 102a and 103a (Schedule E) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$5,709,522.67;

(h) two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Finance Item 15a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 75a, and National Research Council, including the Medical Research Council, Item 10a, (Schedule F) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$8,459,-333.34;

(i) one-twelfth of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40a (Schedule G) of the said Supplementary Estimates —$966,666.67;

(j) seven-twelfths of the total of all the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates B for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$103,265,750.00;

(k) four-twelfths of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L32b (Schedule H) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$50,000,000.00, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967.

Mr. Danforth: I cannot allow this opportunity to pass, Mr. Chairman, without trying once more to bring before the government the sorry plight of the agriculture industry and the trouble it is having with the gap between the cost of production and returns from the sale of products. I should like to dwell for just a moment tonight on the fact that men who have been engaged in this noble industry are selling their farms for whatever the market value may be, and going to the cities with their families to try to obtain employment in whatever fashion they can in order to provide a living comparable to that of their neighbours. I am very much concerned that here, in the province of Ontario as in the other provinces of Canada, we find men leaving the land in ever-increasing numbers.

Tonight, I should like to dwell for a few moments on the troubles of the dairy industry. I do not wish in any fashion to display partisanship in relation to this subject, but to point out as honestly and fairly as I can some of the major troubles facing this industry. Certainly the government should be concerned over the fact that in the last 10 months that there have probably been dispersed, principally in Ontario, as many valuable dairy herds as in the preceding five years. Certainly something is terribly wrong when these men put on the market blood lines that are the results of perhaps two or three generations of concentrated work. The same thing is happening in the poultry industry. In the last three or four years perhaps half of the small producers of eggs in the province of Ontario have gone out of production. They no longer produce eggs even for their own consumption, because they feel it is no longer economic under the conditions that exist today.

These are not the so-called marginal and submarginal farmers; these are professional farmers. These are good farmers. These are farmers whose family enterprises were the pride of the neighbourhood. What is wrong? Why are farm delegations approaching every provincial capital and the federal capital in the hope that some assistance of a financial nature may be forthcoming to relieve them of this terrible burden? I have before me a small table from which I should like to quote. It has been compiled by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board and I think, in some small measure, indicates what is wrong. I know there are many figures that can be cited pro and con. I know there are figures to show that dairy production units in Canada are receiving ever more money for their produce. These figures are available. However, the fact still remains that farmers are not receiving enough money to cover their expenses. These are figures put out by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board and they show that in the period 1955-65 the price received by farmers per hundred for milk has gone up 17 per cent. I believe it has. However, please note that in the same period farm wage rates rose 54 per cent; farm machinery prices increased 46 per cent; taxes and interest rates were up 58 per cent. The composite index for farm required goods and services rose 36 per cent. We do not need a mathematician to calculate that when this happens there is bound to be trouble in the industry.

There have been discussions in the house and questions asked of the Minister of Agriculture about his new dairy policy. There is no doubt in my mind and in the mind of every man in the industry that this government did try to do something to help the dairy industry. In other words the government was familiar with the problem which existed. But it has been found—I think there is general agreement on this on all sides of the house—that under the very workings of this policy not every farmer will get an average of $4 per hundredweight for his milk; this is not going to happen.

I would point out that the very report of the minister himself, whether intentional or not, and the advertisement carried in all of the trade papers in the field of agriculture across the country, led the milk producers to believe that they would receive a return of $4 per hundredweight for their milk. I should like to quote one of these ads put out by the Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, under the signature of the Minister of Agriculture. In large headlines it states:

> The new federal price support benefits all milk producers. Average return $4 per hundred.

[Mr. Danforth.]

On reading this, any dairyman would be of the opinion that he is going to receive $4 a hundred average return for his milk. When he does not receive that price, even though you tell him to read the fine print or put up any alibi you want, whether it is right or whether it is wrong, the farmer concerned will be of the opinion that the policy is not working for him.

I should go on to read the fine print because I know the Minister of Agriculture would wish me to do so in order to be perfectly fair. It states:

> The federal government, through export assistance and direct purchases of such products as butter, will create a demand which will enable processors to pay $3.25 per hundredweight of manufacturing milk with a 3.5 per cent butterfat content.

I must be absolutely fair to the Department of Agriculture and the minister, because I point out that it goes on to say:

> However, the government has no authority to set the prices processors pay producers. It is in your own interest to negotiate the best possible price for your milk through your farm organization.

That statement was made and perhaps it is the fact. However, the fact still remains that when the government asserted that the factory would pay the farmer $3.25 per hundred for his milk, and that the government subsidy of 75 cents a hundred would bring the price up to $4 average to the producer, every producer of milk felt that that was true. But when he goes to the factory and does not receive $3.25 for 3.5 per cent butterfat content, but only receives $3.08, or $2.95, or $2.60, his arithmetic soon tells him that adding 75 cents to that price cannot give him the prescribed $4 per hundred, and he feels he is being gypped. He feels this program is not giving to him what it promised him, and if that is the case then something is drastically wrong.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that if this policy is not being and cannot be administered so as to guarantee $4 per hundred, then the headlines of this advertisement should not have been worded in this fashion—that the new federal support benefits all milk producers and gives an average return of $4 per hundred. I maintain that this headline is misleading. The department that administers this act has assumed that the average price paid to the producer of manufactured milk will be $3.25 per hundred and that a subsidy of 75 cents will give them $4.

It is very easy to go to every farmer who produces milk and explain small details. The federal government says that the guarantee of $3.25 lies within the purview of the provincial governments. The whole program is based on a price of $3.25 f.o.b. factory. This is where we run into the greatest difficulty. The federal government says that the provinces should see to it that the price is $3.25. The provincial governments say that they have no right to ask for an additional subsidy because this would create unfortunate competition between provinces. They say they cannot guarantee a price of $3.25 by legislation. The provinces say that because the federal government is paying a partial subsidy and promoting the price of $3.25, jurisdiction lies within the federal government.

The farmer does not care which government has authority or where the responsibility lies; they know that they are not getting $4 per hundred for their milk. I agree with them that something is wrong. That is the kind of policy which is driving the farmer off the farm. What the farmer needs is dollars, and they cannot get them by unfulfilled promises, misleading advertising or from quarrels about jurisdiction. The time has come when this policy must be changed.

I was very encouraged yesterday to learn in this house that there was going to be a meeting between the ministers of agriculture of Ontario and Quebec and the federal minister to look into this question. I think that this is a step in the right direction. This is where we have to act. We must work as a coordinated body not as individual segments. In this way the farmers themselves will have more of an opportunity to express their views and influence the governments.

This meeting of minds is nothing new, Mr. Chairman. This is the program which was initiated in 1961 when we were the government. We felt that since Ontario and Quebec were the largest producers of dairy products in Canada, the only method from which we could derive a system whereby the producers would receive a fair return was by having a uniform policy with both the provincial governments and the federal government playing their part.

The provincial government of Ontario—and I must give them credit for this—carried out their part of the agreement and tried to establish through the Milk Marketing Board a price of $3.25 per hundredweight f.o.b. factory. Unfortunately in the province of Quebec, instead of the government then in power establishing this price which had been agreed upon, it turned to a policy of direct subsidization of 35 cents per hundredweight in the wintertime and 17½ cents per hundredweight in the summertime, which threw the whole arrangement out of gear. It just could not operate in that way.

Yesterday, as I pointed out, we were encouraged by the fact that the minister of agriculture of the new government of the province of Quebec, as well as the minister for Ontario and the federal Minister of Agriculture are returning once more to the federal capital to look into this entire dairy program and into the reason that it is not paying $4 per hundred or more to the primary produces.

It is my hope that since he has a second chance the Minister of Agriculture will convince his colleagues that the policy which he has enunciated in its present form will not, and I maintain cannot, achieve the goal they were satisfied it would achieve.

I think that the ministers acted in good faith and were sincere in their belief—and I must give them credit for this—in advertising to the farmers, the primary producers, that they would receive $4 per hundred. But, Mr. Chairman, as a result of representations both outside the house and inside the house and from the provincial governments concerned, they must surely be convinced that other steps must be taken to guarantee the floor price of $4, which no one in this house on either side has, to my knowledge, has said that the farmers should not have. There seems to be unanimity of opinion in this regard; everybody feels that the farmers are entitled to this price.

My request to the government tonight is that it look at this matter in its proper perspective, that it make its own inquiries into the industry, and that it sees to the farmers getting what they want. The farmers who bring their problems to us are satisfied that they will not get what they want. And how is that, Mr. Chairman? How do they know they are not getting what they want? By the simplest and most positive way that I know. When they get their cheques in their hands, those cheques do not add up to $4. If the cheques do not add up to $4, then this is not a good policy. Farmers are not considered, whether the matter falls within provincial or federal jurisdiction. All they know is that they are not getting $4. My sympathies are with the farmers, Mr. Chairman.

Now that the minister has had an opportunity of learning what the problem is from the ministers of Ontario and Quebec, who are closely associated and connected with this matter and who are constantly meeting with members of the dairy industry, I hope that he has learned that the formula devised by the government is not working. I hope he will devise ways and means of achieving the objectives that all members of this house wholeheartedly desire, namely that the dairy farmers receive a minimum price of $4 per hundredweight.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that the National Dairy Commission, as introduced by this government, will in 12 months have had an opportunity of achieving its desired purpose of administering the entire dairy industry in Canada.

In conclusion I want to say this: My plea tonight was on behalf of the dairy farmers. Every other segment of industry in Canada today is in a terrible economic squeeze, and something has to be done. Mr. Chairman, something has to be done now. Farmers face increased prices on everything they buy; they face increased taxes, higher labour costs, higher prices of farm machinery, and they are facing a desperate strait. When I see in my own neighborhood dairy herds that have been established for two or three generations being indiscriminately sold on the market because the family no longer thinks that it is economically feasible to keep those herds, there is something terribly, terribly wrong. As mentioned by the hon. member for Oxford, these herds are being exported out of the country. They are not being bought by neighbours, friends, or anybody going into business. They are lost to us.

I am sure the government can quote figures showing that the situation is not as bad as portrayed, and that production is almost the same as one year ago. The increase in production has been slightly under 3 per cent. This increase in production is caused by the fact that farmers are selling the less productive animals and keeping the more efficient ones. Farmers are deperate, trying in every way possible, by additives to feed, by fertilizing pastures and by a varity of methods, to increase production per annum in a desperate attempt to survive. This maintenance of production, as in many other sectors of the country, is not permanent. It is only temporary, because it is the last ditch stand of Canadian agriculture. Unless help comes from the provincial or the federal level this country will be importing all its food at a very high cost, to the shame of those men responsible for the collapse of this once great and proud industry.

[Mr. Danforth.]

Mr. Winkler: I would ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Greene: Did you give him notice?

Mr. Winkler: No. I did not give you notice, either. Referring to the conclusion of the hon. member's speech, does he not feel, because of the constitutional problem in regard to subsidies and because of the minister's promise during the election campaign, that the minister should take over the total responsibility, not only as it relates to subsidies but also in whatever other areas are concerned, in order to bring the $4 a hundredweight to the producers?

An hon. Member: That was a nice speech, Eric.

Mr. Winkler: Thank you.

Mr. Danforth: May I answer this question? The fact remains that the quarrel about provincial and federal jurisdiction is of minor application in the field of policy. The federal government states, and I believe correctly, that within the law it cannot establish a price at any level, whether it be f.o.b. the factory or f.o.b. at the front gate of the farm. At least, the government cannot do this without going into the field of provincial jurisdiction. Perhaps this is so.

On the other hand the provincial governments claim, I think equally correctly and equally within the law, that if the federal government is taking measures under the Agricultural Stabilization Act to promote a price which this act says may be paid, but not "must be paid", then they will not accept the same degree of responsibility as they should.

If the government is providing a method of maintaining a price to the farmers by having legislation saying that it may, will, or can establish a price, but not saying it shall or that it must, the division is too fine, and the farmer understands only that he has got a certain number of dollars in his pocket. That is the attitude he takes.

Mr. Winkler: The minister should keep his promise.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: As I should have done before, I should like to thank hon. members, including the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, for allowing me to introduce my resolution. I very much enjoy sitting here and listening to the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, criticizing the provincial government in Ontario.

An hon. Member: You do not understand.

Mr. Winkler: You are against the farmers.

Mr. Benson: Not at all. I love all farmers having been a farmer in my youth.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say, as I should have said when the resolution was introduced, that the resolution is with respect to interim supply in the amount of $1,662,982,791.93, which will carry us through to October 31, 1966, and deals with all departments other than the departments which were just previously approved by the House of Commons, with respect to expenditures for the current year.

These expenditures which are included as interim supply are amounts required by the departments in order to carry on their ordinary business until October 31, 1966. I wish to assure hon. members that the granting of supply with respect to individual items in these estimates will not in any way preclude debate on the particular items in future, when supply is brought forward in order to complete the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this opportunity pass without expressing my disappointment about the dairy policy of the present government.

When the minister announced the $4 per hundredweight policy, he assured us that all farmers would receive that amount. And even today we are still trying to make him understand that some farmers, or most of them, are not getting and will not get those $4. And in spite of that I notice that the minister seems convinced that the farmers who are not getting those $4 are probably to blame because, as it was said this afternoon in committee, if the producers, the processing plants do not pay the amount of $3.25, the farmers should bring some pressure to bear on the processing plants to get it.

That, Mr. Chairman, is an answer which surprised me greatly coming as it did from the minister. And he tells us to clear himself that the setting of the price by the plant is not a matter of federal jurisdiction. He is right about that. But such is not the case at all when he publishes in all the newspapers his announcement to the effect that from now on farmers will certainly get $4 per hundredweight for their manufacturing milk.

And we are trying to prove to him—besides we have the evidence—that right now in my region it is impossible for the farmers to get those $4. As a matter of fact, I have here the photostat of a document showing the amount paid to a farmer; he gets exactly $2.86 per hundredweight plus 75 cents added to that. That is far from the $4 guaranteed by the minister. That is for one plant only and it varies from plant to plant.

Well, I say that the minister spoke to the newspapers to get some publicity. It would have been much better to say: We are just giving 75 cents and we are not responsible for the rest; we do not guarantee anything and it is impossible to guarantee anything because it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Once again you are getting into a provincial field. Therefore you cannot guarantee anything. All you can guarantee is 75 cents. Why not say it and then you will not get all the farmers mixed up. Just say: We are paying 75 cents. It remains for the provinces or the farmer associations to reach an understanding with the plants to get the best possible price.

Thus, you will not disappoint a whole region. The farmers tell us: They promised us $4 and look at what we are getting. It is not what they are getting now which is abnormal but the promises, the advertisements which have warped the farmers' views.

I wish to say to the minister tonight that we have proofs and that he must have some too because there have been complaints.

I have here the periodical La Terre de Chez-nous dated June 29; it is the organ of the Catholic Farmers Union, the largest farmer organization in my area. It states that the milk policy of Ottawa is inadequate. That is clear. It is inadequate. In this publication, the milk policy is discussed on two and a half pages. I shall not impose the whole thing upon you, but I shall read the significant parts. On the front page, it says:

> At a regular meeting held in the head office, on June 6, the executive committee of the C.F.U. took note of the results of the recent efforts undertaken by its representatives in Ottawa. On that occasion, the members of the executive committee were informed that a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa, the Hon. J. J. Greene, produced no practical results.

Well, that is factual, sir. They came, they stated that they had obtained no practical results. It was then unanimously resolved to send a telegram to the Minister of Agriculture. The telegram was published in the June 15 issue of La Terre de Chez-nous. We are re-stating it here:

Hon. J. J. Greene
Minister of Agriculture
Ottawa

The C.F.U. executive committee, meeting this week in Montreal, has considered the latest development of the 1966-67 federal milk policy. It was also informed of the results of last meeting between yourself and Messrs. Lionel Sorel and Roger Perreault. The C.F.U. executive committee considers present Ottawa policy clearly unsatisfactory, because it will not ensure the remittance price of $4 per hundredweight for manufactured milk and particularly unfair to important groups of producers, such as cream shippers and producers whose milk is powdered through the cylinder process or processed into casein, etc. . . . Stop

• (9:30 p.m.)

In such circumstances, the C.F.U. executive committee has decided to inform and warn all Quebec farmers and their regional and local organizations to consider means to obtain satisfaction, that is a guarantee by the Ottawa government of $4 per hundreweight for all industrial milk, in view of totally unsatisfactory results so far achieved regarding the demands and expectations of the producers. Lionel Sorel, General Chairman of the C.F.U.

Mr. Chairman, if these statements are not proof of the discontent and dissatisfaction of the Quebec farmers, I wonder what the minister is waiting for to at least try another survey and, for that purpose, the minister must first of all recognize that the farmers are not getting and cannot now get $4 per hundredweight.

I think the minister will have to meet again with the organizations, because if a price of 75 cents per cwt. is unsatisfactory, another basis will have to be established. If it is truly wished to help the dairy producer, he cannot be left any longer in doubt owing to the prices being changed from week to week by manufacturers, processors or, at least, the minister should not say he wants to help the farmers. Nowadays, farmers are expecting action from governments. One thing surprises me on the part of manufacturers. I wonder whether it would be possible, during federal-provincial meetings or conferences between Ministers of Agriculture, to see to it that a processor is obliged to pay a certain price, if a minimum price is finally to be established for the milk producer. Otherwise, I feel that any federal reform on the present basis is absolutely worthless, because it is realized that as soon as the federal government offers a 20 cent subsidy or increase, manufacturers and processors reduce their prices by 20, 25 or 30 cents.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Consultations will have to take place at all costs so that farmers no longer will be the victims of such haggling. Mind you, I am not accusing the federal government any more than provincial governments, but I say that some action will have to be taken so as to urge milk processors to stop any such haggling with, and pilfering of the farmers by all sorts of means. The latter is being short-changed on the butterfat content, in a word, he is being cheated in every way in an attempt to recover 10, 20, 30 or 40 cents. It seems to me that the various Departments of Agriculture, both provincial and federal, should come to an agreement to try and guarantee a reasonable price to our farmers so that not only would they no longer be exploited but could sell their production at a fair price.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to call this particular point—actually it is the one about which my electors feel most bitter—to the attention of the minister.

I do not know whether the situation is worse in Quebec than in the other provinces but, to my mind, the evil is widespread. According to some of the members on various committees, it seems general, and I do know that, as far as Quebec is concerned, all our associations are clamouring for help from the federal government. Let us start with something definite, then we can find out what the Quebec government can do in this respect.

One more word about the farmer to prove, in passing, that if Quebec farmers sometimes complain, they have a right to do so, because they are often treated most unfairly. We have proof of this in the report of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) on loans granted under the Farm Improvements Loans Act.

We have been saying for four years that when it comes to collecting taxes, Quebec is right there in the forefront, but when it comes to giving the people something in return for their taxes, then it is quite another story. In the field of loans guaranteed by the federal government, out of 46,285 loans made in 1964, Quebec has had exactly 873 compared to 1,224 in British Columbia, 13,528 in Alberta, 14,790 in Saskatchewan, 6,181 in Manitoba, and 8,473 in Ontario. And some claim that Quebec has its share, that Quebec is well protected. Well, if that is the general opinion, you can be assured, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the opinion of Quebec farmers. And the proof is there. Every time we can obtain details, we notice such glaring inequities with regard to assistance to farmers, the other provinces come first and the Quebec farmers get only the crumbs.

Well, I suggest that the present Minister of Agriculture will have to look after the province of Quebec if he does not want to lose support of 100 per cent of its farmers because if things do not improve, we will urge Quebec farmers to look after their own needs, to withdraw their federal taxes and to look after their own business as it is no use counting on receiving help from the federal department.

[English]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate the fact that hon. members who have spoken are most concerned with the problems of the farm community, as indeed am I, and as I am very certain the government is. I quite appreciate that in many respects the farming community has not kept abreast of the burgeoning income and very prosperous and buoyant economy we have enjoyed in the last couple of years.

It may be in the nature of things that when an economy expands very rapidly, when industrial wages and industrial prosperity grow up at the pace they have in the past two years of full employment, the farm community is slower to catch up than many of us would like. Hence I share the concern of hon. members opposite for the needs of the farm community, for the importance in seeing to it that we have policies which enable the farmers of this country to enjoy the very high standard of living and the great economic opportunity that have been afforded to their confreres in the industrial world in the past two or three years under this administration.

But, Mr. Chairman, I think we do little service to the farm community, and I think I know enough of the farmers now and the integrity with which they are prone to behave, if their case is misrepresented. I think we do the farm community the greatest service if we put their case on a factual basis, and I have every confidence in the rest of the Canadian community, and the Canadian public at large, that if we put the case of the farm community on a fair, honest and upright basis, other sectors of the Canadian economy do not wish to be subsidized by that farm community.

I do not think other Canadians would want the farm community to live at a lower standard of living than they do. I feel sure that if their case is put honestly and fairly before the Canadian public, the Canadian public would wish that the policies of government and otherwise would be such that the farming community would be able to enjoy every opportunity they enjoy in the other booming sector of the economy. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it is incumbent upon me to set the facts and the record straight in this regard in the interests of the farmers of this country. I think that is the way they would wish it.

There has been some reference to the government's dairy policy. To the best of my ability I should like to set the record straight in this regard. In the first place, as has been said by many more able and better men than I, this is a very difficult country to legislate in in respect particularly to marketing legislation of any kind, by virtue of our constitution and the judicial interpretation of our constitution, especially the judicial interpretation of the constitution with regard to the farm marketing legislation made in the 1930's.

I think all would agree, as did the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) quite candidly, honestly and forthrightly, there is no power in the federal government to fix prices within a province. The other day I think the hon. member for Grey-Bruce read a portion of an article from the Canadian Farm Economics. Although I feel sure he did not do this deliberately—possibly it was because he did not have time to read it all—I believe he may have left some misconceptions on the record. He read from page 11 of the Canadian Farm Economics, volume 1, number 1, of April 1966, published by the Economics Branch of the Department of Agriculture. He read as follows:

> The Federal Government has jurisdiction over the market for manufactured dairy products—

I believe the record indicates that that is as far as he read. I feel sure he would want me, in the interest of stating the whole picture correctly in Hansard to read the rest of the paragraph. That paragraph says:

> The Federal Government has jurisdiction over the market for manufactured dairy products to the extent that products move interprovincially and into export markets.

I feel sure he would want me to add those latter words in order that the record be very clear that milk products of all kinds within a province are purely within the ambit of provincial jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had some representations by the hon. member who last spoke, and some inference by the hon. member for Kent, Ont., that the government's policy as announced and as advertised in some way misled or was intended to mislead. I should like to quote from my statement in this house when I enunciated the government's dairy policy on March 23 at page 3041 of Hansard. At that time I knew the interest of members opposite and knew that they would want to know exactly what this program was and how it would be carried out. The words I stated were:

> The support level will provide for an average net return of $4 per hundred pounds—

As all advertisements have said.

> —of manufacturing milk testing 3.5 per cent butterfat content, basis f.o.b. the factory.

I cannot think of any way in which it could have been put more plainly than that. In order that there might be no misconception, no misunderstanding, and no delusions in this regard, I further stated as follows:

> The policy will apply in general as follows:
>
> For producers of manufacturing milk, the board—

This is the stabilization board.

> —will take measures designed to permit processors to pay a price of $3.25 per hundred pounds for 3.5 per cent manufacturing milk. Direct payments to producers from the board of .85 cents, minus a 10 cent export assistance levy, will be used to bring producers' average net returns up to the $4 level.

Again, so that there might be no misapprehension and so that all members of this honourable house would have the policy as clear as crystal in their minds, I enunciated the following caveat:

> However, the federal government has no authority to set the prices that processors pay to producers. I feel it is important, therefore, to stress that it is incumbent upon producer groups and boards to do all they can to see that this market price level is achieved.

I can think of nothing which could have been clearer than that. This is exactly what has happened and is what we have done. I feel sure that if hon. members wish to be candid about the policy, how it was enunciated and how it has come to pass, they will agree that we have done exactly what we said we would do, which was the only approach we could take within the ambit of our constitutional responsibilities.

Again, with regard to the needs of the farm community, let me make it very clear that this program means the farmers of Canada will get between 14 and 15 per cent more gross return for their milk, and therefore for their manufactured milk, this year than they did last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: I heard considerable comment from the other side with regard to labour wage settlements which invoked an alleged 30 per cent increase over a two year period. I think that surely on this side of the house we can be rather proud that even though these wage increases for labour were very appreciable we were able this year to give to the dairy farmers of Canada the same increase in the nature of 15 per cent. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that this involves the spending by the federal government of some $90 million which again is a very very considerable sum. I think it is an indication of the concern that this government has for the farm community of Canada, for the eastern farm community of Canada which had been so badly neglected in past years, that it saw fit to establish at the federal level a program that would benefit the dairy farmers of Canada.

Again let me set the record straight by placing some statistics before hon. members of this house. When we talk about the price of farming products let us remember that in respect of the dairy policy of the federal government in the days when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, just as now, the government did the only thing it could do at the federal level; it set the price f.o.b. the factory. So, any recriminations which are coming now are rather hollow in the light of the fact that when the gentlemen opposite had the responsibility their policy was geared to this basis just as it always must be at the federal level.

Let us see what has happened in respect of price since we have been in office. When we assumed office the net return to the farmer for manufacturing milk at the farm gate, at the farm house, was $2.70 in 1960. It was $2.68 in 1961—not too great improvement in that year by hon. gentlemen opposite. It was $2.64 in 1962—down 4 cents. That was not a very good year for the eastern farmers when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. In 1963 it was up one cent to $2.67. In 1964 it went up to $2.77, and last year with the supplementary payments it went from $2.77 to $3.26.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Greene: I do not have much time and I should like to complete my statement.

Mr. Danforth: The minister is misleading the house.

Mr. Greene: This year the price at the farm gate will average somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3.75 with an average transportation cost of 25 cents. This leaves an average price increase of 50 cents which is the highest in the history of this country.

I do believe that the records should be set straight. The United States to the south of us has the highest standard of living in the world and the highest wage structure. Wages in the industrial sector are such that our industrial workers crave parity with their counterparts in the United States. Let us compare what we have done for our dairy farmers in marketing milk with what has been done in the richest nation of the world.

As of April 1 this year when our policy became a $4 policy f.o.b. the factory, the United States policy—I am not criticizing them in any way because they are doing a wonderful job—was $3.50. Singularly important is the fact that just four days ago, three months after this government gave leadership in this regard, the United States amended its policy and pushed up their support level. They make no direct payments such as we do here, in order to keep the cost to the consumer down. The United States increased its support level so that in respect of 3.73 per cent milk, which is a higher percentage than ours, the level will be $4. With 3.5 milk the level would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3.75, or 25 cents lower than ours.

I am not saying for a moment that the needs of the farmers are not great or that we here in this house and this government need not do all that we possibly can to improve their lot. I have said on many occasions that I would be the first to agree that farmers of this country have not kept up on a commensurate basis with improved income conditions in this country, or with the lot of their industrial counterpart. Again the record should be set straight and I am sure the farmers would want it that way.

Let us see what the income of the farmer was when hon. gentlemen opposite were in government and let us see what has happened to it since. I refer to statistics contained in a pamphlet entitled "General Information on Agriculture in Canada", prepared by the economics branch of the Canada Department of Agriculture. It is dated October, 1965.

The total income of farmers in millions in 1959 was $2,791. It went down to $2,777 in 1960. That was not a very good year. It went up from $2,777 to $2,952 in 1961, an increase of roughly $180. In 1962 it went up to $3,116; in 1963 to $3,185 and in 1964 it went up to $3,456. Let me point out that during the period of time following our assumption of office the farmers' income position improved by 23 per cent.

Let us take a look at the cost of farm operations during the same period of time. According to the statistics I have in this same pamphlet farm costs during the same period increased by 22 per cent. Hon. members are 100 per cent correct, and I quite agree, that during the same period the industrial worker did not just hold his own as did the farmer; he surged ahead. This is the kind of thing we must do for the farm community as well.

I want to make sure that the complete story is told in an accurate way, and I know that hon. members, just as do the farmers, want the same thing. There has been some difficulty with respect to manufactured milk even since our policy was announced. I am not suggesting that we have achieved a millennium. I hope to do much more for our dairy farmers if I am able, have the ability and can see how to do that. Every farm organization in the country supported our policy which was based on the recommendations of the Federation of Agriculture and the Farmers Union of Canada. They approved this policy and I still believe that it is no worse two months later than April of this year.

What has happened in the interim to create the difficulties which have exercised hon. gentlemen opposite? The province of Ontario fixed a price, quite properly, as we anticipated it would. I commend the minister of agriculture of that great province for so doing. The province of Quebec has special conditions in respect of the production of casein, which is a submarginal product. Unfortunately that province, rightly or wrongly, felt it could not fix the price.

The province of Quebec decided to pay a special subsidy, as an hon. gentleman has said. I did not intend to discuss this matter until the hon. gentleman did so, because I think that is the source of many of the problems with which that hon. minister is faced. In any event, the payment of this extra subsidy in that province has influenced the Ontario dairy farmers to suggest that if Quebec can pay an extra subsidy of 17½ cents in the summer and 35 cents in the winter, the rich province of Ontario ought to be able to do likewise. I do not intend to minimize the problems of the minister of agriculture of Ontario, but this is one problem he has encountered. I should like to see the day come when stabilization programs are completely federal, because I think they would work best that way. In any event, the province of Quebec decided in its wisdom to pay these subsidies and Ontario farmers are now asking for the same.

Some Ontario manufacturers increased the cost of transportation to the farmers and cut off the subsidies on farm storage tanks. The Milk Marketing Board of Ontario has now enacted a regulation to prevent added transportation costs from being tacked on the farmers' costs. Surely this is a clear admission that this is the responsibility of the province. They have now quite properly assumed that responsibility. With those facts being as they are, it would be completely incorrect to imply that these added costs of transportation were in any way within the control of the federal government.

I saw statistics today in respect of the province of Quebec which indicate that not everyone is receiving $4 per 100 pounds. There are marginal areas where there is no competition or market for milk, and because the province of Quebec has not seen fit to fix the price the producers in those areas are receiving less. On the other hand, these statistics show that 80 per cent of milk produced in the province of Quebec is being sold by the farmer for $3.25 or more. They are receiving in addition 75 cents per 100 from the federal treasury and 17½ cents from the province of Quebec.

Eighty per cent of the milk is getting $4.17 or more from the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the minister a question?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Greene: I should like to finish my statement, first, if I may, and then I will answer all the questions you like.

I do not wish to minimize the difficulties with which the minister of agriculture in the province of Ontario is faced. I say, with all candour and irrespective of political persuasion, that I found him to be an extremely capable gentleman and a fine minister of agriculture. I have tried to work with him, and I am sure he has tried to work with me in the best interest of the farming community. It is an unfortunate set of circumstances that the provincial subsidy paid in the province of Quebec has made life politically difficult for him. As I say, I did not intend to raise this matter or to add in any way to his problems until the hon. member for Kent, Ont., raised it in the house tonight, and I therefore felt bound to defend our position.

I do think that this problem between Ontario, Quebec and the federal government has to be worked out. I do not think they contribute to its solution by trying to shove the blame on to the federal government so as to get rid of the difficulty which exists between the two provinces. I realize that that is the name of the game, and that is what they are trying to do. I do not think this will contribute to an ultimate solution which will be in the best interests of the farmer. We have to arrive at some method whereby the stabilization program will be handled at the federal level without provincial subsidies upsetting the applecart. In saying this, I take the very same view as that taken by the Ontario minister in the current year. We may have to find some method of effecting the resolution of this difficult imbalance in Ontario. We have to look into the question of whether the support price enables the factories to pay $3.25, because that is the policy to which we are pledged. If the support price is not sufficient, we will review and revise it whenever necessary to enable the factories to pay that price.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that our policy is the best ever conceived. It is one that is even superior to the policy in the United States of America. It is the greatest increase that the dairy producers have ever received in any one year. I disagree with the allegation that the program has deteriorated in the last two months. It is what the dairy community of Canada wanted, and we have given it to them. I do not think we are doing any service by trying to tear down the federal program because of these teething problems that have arisen between Ontario and Quebec. I think this criticism will in the long run be doing a disservice to the farming community, rather than remedying the difficulties as we should all be trying to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) most admiringly, but I may say that the progress he has just reported is more a product of his imagination than a reality on the farms of Quebec and Ontario. This progress exists in his mind, but let him go and see the farmers of our regions, and he will not find it.

My hon. friend, the member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), mentioned earlier the official organ of the Quebec Catholic Farmers Union, La Terre de Chez Nous, which bears the headline:

The Ottawa dairy policy is inadequate.

I think the minister should take the trouble to go and see what is happening with our farmers, instead of merely consulting his technical advisers who live within four walls in an office of the federal Department of Agriculture and have no contact with the conditions prevailing among our farmers.

They mention the increase of the price of milk, but they forget to tell us about the increase in the present cost of producing one hundredweight of milk in Canada. They say: there has been an increase in industry. Yes, but this has brought about an increase in the cost of producing one hundredweight of milk, and the minister gave us no statistics on this subject, because he would have noticed that the production costs have increased far more than the sale price for our farmers.

The minister tells us that the Quebec farmer receives $3.25 per hundredweight of milk, that the federal government pays a subsidy of 75 cents and that the Quebec government pays another subsidy of 17½ cents, which makes a total of $4.17½ per hundredweight of milk, but I challenge the minister when he says that 80 per cent of the farmers receive such an amount of $4.17½ per hundredweight of milk; I challenge him to stake his reputation on the fact that 80 per cent of Quebec farmers receive $4.17½ per hundredweight of milk.

We know that the amount is not $3.25 but $2.86—

[English]

Mr. Greene: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. In order that my hon. friend, who I am sure is not doing it deliberately, does not misquote me, may I say that I saw figures this morning which established that 80 per cent of the milk that is sold in the province of Quebec receives $3.25 or more at the factory. Again, the producers of this milk will receive the 75 cents from the federal government and 17.5 cents from the provincial government. This, of course, is f.o.b. the factory, as all the prices I have stated are, except the one set of statistics we transposed, to show the difference between 1959 and 1965.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, that proves exactly what I said earlier: the minister knows what happens in his office but he is unaware of reality. Besides, is the minister referring to manufacturing milk or fluid milk? Because we have here reports dealing with manufacturing milk, and the amounts indicated are not $3.25 but $2.86. I am asking again the minister if he is ready to stake his reputation on the fact that 80 per cent of Quebec farmers receive $3.25 per hundredweight, that is $3.25, plus 75 cents, plus 17½ cents for their manufacturing milk. Is the minister ready to stake his reputation on that since he is the one who asserts that 80 per cent of our farmers receive—

Mr. Berger: Eighty per cent of the production not of the farmers.

Mr. Grégoire: —of the production—

Mr. Berger: Exactly, that makes a difference.

Mr. Grégoire: —receive $3.25, plus 75 cents, plus 17½ cents. And I should like to know from the minister what he means by milk. Does he refer to manufacturing milk or fluid milk because the two are not quite the same.

[English]

Mr. Greene: I rise on a point of privilege again. I am not sure whether the translator is making the error or the hon. member is. I said that 80 per cent of the manufacturing milk that is sold in Quebec receives $3.25 at the factory without any subsidy. Now, how many farmers deliver that 80 per cent of the milk, whether it is 70 per cent of the farmers deliver 80 per cent of the milk or not, I have no statistics to show. I am only quoting statistics of which I am certain. I said 80 per cent of the milk receives $3.25 without a subsidy.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, would the minister tell me where he took his statistical data?

[English]

Mr. Greene: I saw the records at our conference with the provincial ministers, and I accept them as reliable. They came from the province of Quebec.

Interim Supply

• (10:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if the minister wants to quote statistics in this house, he should also be ready to give the source of such statistics. Otherwise, how can we know what they are worth? He did not quote the source of his statistics. What is the source of his statistics, that is what we want to know from the minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Statisticians.

[English]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, they were used at the Quebec conference and I am satisfied they are correct. I do not know whether the hon. member has more authentic statistics. I have listened to some questionable evidence which he quoted earlier this evening, but if he has any more reliable statistics I would be interested to see them. However, if his statistics are no better than his usual fiscal theories they will not be too good either.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if one must conclude from this that the Quebec minister of agriculture, who was in Ottawa today, showed him statistics indicating that 80 per cent of manufacturing milk in the province of Quebec got a minimum $3.25 per hundredweight, plus 75 cents in the form of a subsidy from the federal government and 17½ cents from the provincial government.

Must we conclude, Mr. Chairman, that those figures were given to him by the Quebec minister of agriculture?

Mr. Chairman, I think that our statistics are worth more than the minister's, because ours come from the farmers. As a matter of fact, they tell us: The policy of $4 per hundredweight of milk has never been applied and we are far from getting $4 per hundredweight of milk.

I think that the best statistics are what the farmer is getting. That is what I call statistics. The way they are compiled is probably another matter, but what the farmer is getting is what counts. Here is the concrete, realistic and practical fact of life: how much the farmer is getting for his manufacturing milk. Those are statistics for you.

Mr. Chairman, the minister has given us comparative figures. I would also like to give him the increase in the farmers' production costs.

[Mr. Greene.]

Since the minister does not want to give us an answer, I would also like to have the opportunity to check if his statistics were given him by the provincial minister of agriculture. He told us: that was given us at a meeting with the provincial minister of agriculture, but he did not tell us if that was given him by the provincial minister of agriculture. That makes all the difference.

Mr. Chairman, we want to check the few facts given by the minister; we want to have the opportunity to pursue that matter and that is why I ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, shall I—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether there is any disposition to go a little further with interim supply tonight for a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Grégoire: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree to proceed for a few minutes?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed I think we should know just when we should stop. It might not be fair to any other hon. member who might wish to speak if it was suddenly decided that we should call it ten o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: I would prefer to go until eleven o'clock, but if members want to fix another period—

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed by hon. members of the committee that we sit till eleven o'clock?

Mr. Grégoire: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: There does not seem to be unanimous consent to enable the committee to sit.

Mr. Winkler: Who is voicing objection?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I must tell you that personally I would have no objection to continue until eleven o'clock. The only reason why I asked to call it ten o'clock is that I wanted to check some statistics given by the minister; I also wanted to check statistics about the increase in the cost of production. Even if we are to sit until eleven o'clock tonight, I would have no objection to doing it tomorrow, but since we are not going to finish tonight, I do not understand the request to extend the sitting.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Let us have a count.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I report that the committee have considered a certain resolution, made progress thereon, and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the house continue to sit this day until 11 p.m.

Mr. Peters: I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I refer hon. members to standing order 6(2). It is my duty under the standing order to request those members who object to rise in their places.

And more than ten members having risen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall ask the Clerk to count.

Mr. Winkler: I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the standing order, 11 members of the house having risen, the Chair will not put the motion.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall be considering the Canada Assistance Plan legislation, interim supply, and medicare.

Mr. Winkler: I would have hoped we could have considered those items tonight.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

EXPO '67—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I bring a matter before the house this evening arising out of my question put to the hon. Minister of Agriculture this afternoon, in which I asked the minister if he would assure the house that the Canadian agriculture industry will have suitable and prominent representation in the form of displays and exhibits at Expo '67, which will be Canada's great centennial exhibition next year at Montreal. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, knowing the minister, that the answer to this question, as I hope, will be in the affirmative.

My question also arises as a result of the recent visit which some of us of this chamber, and members of the other place, made to the site of Expo. We were all very much impressed by the progress being made on this unique project, and I know that every Canadian wishes nothing but success for this great world's fair, this world in 1,000 acres, rising on the bosom of the St. Lawrence river, with our great Canadian metropolis, Montreal, as a backdrop, and truly the urban sponsor of this fair.

We know now that from April 28 to October 27, 1967, more than 70 nations will be exhibiting here in Canada their traditions and cultures, their industrial development, and their products, and of course all their hopes for the future.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Canada, in turn, will be showing her best to the world. Since in any brochures we have received I have not noticed any prominent mention of our third oldest primary industry, agriculture, that is why I have asked my question. As a result of this I would hope that this industry would have prominence at this fair.

I know all hon. members will agree that we must not only maintain, but that we must annually increase our export trade in agricultural products. I was particularly impressed this afternoon by the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) when he spoke on the banking resolution and stressed the imperative value of export trade. Exhibits covering all our agronomy with each province represented under the suzerainty of the federal Department of Agriculture will be a most effective factor in promoting and increasing our export trade.

Hon. members will agree that our oldest industry is probably fisheries, dating from the days of John Cabot. Our second oldest industry is the fur trade, dating from the days of Cartier and Champlain; and then the third in age, but most important of all, is agriculture, dating from the life of Louis Hébert, Canada's first farmer who tilled the rough and unwilling soil outside Quebec city in 1620.

The theme that has been accepted for this exhibition "Man and His World" is indeed an inspiration leading down through many lanes of endeavour—Man the Creator, Man the Explorer, Man the Producer, Man and the Community, and Man the Provider. Each of these themes is an attribute to agriculture. In these times when we are becoming, in a sense, more self-assertive and more confident in our accomplishments in our provinces and in our various communities and regions across this great country, this theme and its five sub-themes should certainly be the factor which will unite all Canada and all Canadians and all communities and all Canada's provinces heart and soul into one federal whole, as we play host to the world in our centennial year.

This is why I say that agriculture, now our most important primary industry, must have proper prominence at this exposition. Canada, barely one hundred years old and with a population of not quite twenty million is already, and has for a long time been, a "have" nation. For this heavenly blessing alone we should be very thankful. Think of the many nations of the world who are the "have-nots."

Here is our opportunity—the opportunity for Canadian agriculture to serve our fellowmen the world over, and to feed the hungry. Here is an opportunity for Canadian agriculture to feed our own people better because, in spite of our abundance, there are many people in Canada who can benefit from more food.

I represent the riding of Prince Edward-Lennox, famous for the products of the soil, the farm, the orchard and the dairy industry, and I know my people are always mindful of the importance of advertising and making known the value and high quality of their many and varied commodities.

We know that because of automation and more efficient farm machinery, one man can now produce as much as four did 50 years ago. But we are also concerned because of the fact that many of our broad Canadian acres that used to produce food lie dormant and forgotten, their former agricultural masters now only a memory.

The responsibilities and the inspiration of Expo should be enough to urge Canadians and the Canadian agricultural industry into a rejuvenation, into reorganization of this industry to break new ground, and take our rightful place as the feeders of millions of hungry mouths in the world. That is why I urge the minister and the Department of Agriculture to bend all their efforts to this task.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I speak for the minister, and I am sure for the whole house, in expressing our appreciation to the hon. member for his very eloquent address on this most interesting and agreeable subject. We are all tremendously interested in Canada's 100th birthday, which we plan for in 1967. Associated with it, of course, will be Expo '67 when Canada will be putting her best foot forward, and displaying herself in this show window of Canada, for the world to see.

As the hon. member has said, agriculture is the third oldest industry in this country. It is fair to say that agriculture primarily developed this country, and certainly the group who played such an important part in developing Canada are not going to be missing when we celebrate our 100th birthday.

At Expo there will be a special agriculture pavilion in which the great wealth of our agricultural products will be displayed. Not only will the primary producers in agriculture be present, but a lot of corporate citizens who are associated with the agriculture industry and perform a great service to this country in the food business, the machinery industry, or in the dairy products industry will also be represented and pulling their full share of the load.

I am not exactly sure what the hon. member's question was, but I have pleasure in assuring him that Canadian agriculture will be represented and that we will be putting our best foot forward.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAMERON, NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS—UNAVAILABILITY OF BILL AMENDING BANK ACT

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of privilege which stems from the passage yesterday of the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Bank Act. As you will recall, Your Honour, this was passed yesterday. I discovered that within minutes the press gallery had copies of this bill; not only copies of the bill, but a precis of the salient points. I myself have not yet received a copy of the bill, and when I telephoned this morning to try to get a copy I was told that while there were some copies they were being reserved for certain individuals, and were not available for members of parliament.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is an intolerable affront to members of parliament, and I for one do not propose to submit to it.

Mr. Starr: This is arrogance of the worst type.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I heard of these circumstances only this morning. If there has been any discourtesy to members of parliament—and it has not been due to any action on my part—then I apologize. My understanding is that there was a greater demand for copies of this bill than is usual because of the great interest of the banking community and of the press. I do not understand why copies are not available for all members of parliament now.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on this point of privilege may I inform the Minister of Finance that there is a considerable demand by members of parliament for this bill. Surely they should be recognized first. This is a continuation of mismanagement on the part of this government, with bills not prepared in both languages. Here is one of the most important bills of the session which is not made available. There is no bill in my possession based on the resolution that was passed yesterday. Surely there should be an explanation from the Prime Minister, who is the leader in this house, with regard to this type of mismanagement.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is an example of arrogance that cannot be justified. As Leader of the Opposition no copy was made available to me. I want to say immediately that we have had altogether too much of this attitude. We are going to take a stand strongly against the view of this government that we here are to be treated as secondary to others outside the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we wish to add our strong protests to those expressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and the present government. It is indeed incomprehensible, unjustifiable and intolerable that the government should distribute copies of a bill to other persons before handing any to members of parliament. We want to join in the protest and ask the government to change its attitude.

We cannot accept that the government should exist in order to comply with the requests of a few bankers, because we feel that members of the house should receive copies of the bill in both languages before people outside the house. We also believe that this is the continuation of a standard policy of the government because, only yesterday, we did not even have one French copy of the bill under study.

• (11:10 a.m.)

[English]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want only to say that we do not accept the explanation that there was an unusually large demand for copies of this bill. It was passed to members in the banking community and to the press prior to members of this house receiving copies. In this morning's paper we read some of the details contained in the bill, and so far members of the house have had no way of confirming these details from the official document that as members of this house they are entitled to receive before anyone else receives it, regardless of the interest in the bill other persons may have.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I say I am sure we are all in agreement with what the hon. member who has just spoken has said. Parliament is entitled to receive copies of all its bills first, and no one would support that contention more strongly than the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Tell him that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance proposes to look into the matter, as will the government and the house leader. But it is wrong to attribute the error in this instance to the government. It is the responsibility of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is the government that has the responsibility.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend understandably takes the position that the government is at fault.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who else?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I remember that on two occasions, when he was prime minister, similar complaints were made by the then opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the reply of the Leader of the Opposition was not as succinctly stated as I am now doing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but it was the same thing. I hope the right hon. gentleman will agree with the explanation—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; that is not factual.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had hoped he would, but he will not. I have stated—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The government's position, is that parliament must get these measures first. If parliament has not got this bill it is not because of the government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did the press gallery get it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —nor, as suggested by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre, is it because of the Prime Minister, who has been engaged in a very important conference, nor was it as the result of any action taken by the Minister of Finance. We are going to look into this matter, and parliament's rights in this situation of course will be protected.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Starr: That is wrong.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to find out who distributed these copies to the press gallery and not to members of parliament.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The Secretary of State for External Affairs claims that this very serious affront to parliament is not the responsibility of the government. Nevertheless I think parliament has the right to know on whose orders this limited number of copies were distributed first to the press and to the banking fraternity before they were distributed to members of parliament. Did the Minister of Finance order the distribution of these copies and the precis outlining the main content of the bill? Who distributed these copies? Were they distributed on the minister's orders? Surely these bills should go to members of parliament prior to going to the press gallery. The minister may say that the house has a right to copies of the bill, but the fact is that the members of parliament didn't get the bill first, and the responsibility for what has happened lies at the door of the government.

Although the minister says this matter is the responsibility of parliament, the ministers opposite are shirking their responsibilities. It is their responsibility, first, to see that a sufficient number of bills are reserved for members of parliament and, before bills have been distributed, that an adequate supply of copies is held in reserve so that each member may have a copy. I think if the government were half as interested in seeing that members get the information they are entitled to as they are in looking after their publicity, things would be much better for all concerned.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): I think the importance of this affront to parliament goes a little deeper than a mistake made by someone on this occasion. The whole attitude of this government has been that parliament is just a nuisance, and it is the development of this attitude which makes it so easy for this sort of mistake to occur. I think the cries of derision which were raised by Liberal backbenchers when this question of privilege was first put forward by an hon. member protesting that the privileges of the house had been breached indicated that supporters of the government do not recognize the responsibility which each member of the house has to ensure that these privileges are retained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege arising out of a statement made by the Acting Prime Minister. I challenge him to give one example of our government handing over a bill to the press gallery before parliament had it. I ask him to do that. I challenge him, and say he cannot do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to hon. members that the point has been well considered and discussed. I may say I am in full sympathy, in full agreement, with the grievance. It is difficult to determine to what extent it is a question of privilege or to what extent it is a grievance, but certainly the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has a legitimate grievance. I would hope that the general procedure regarding the distribution of bills can be reviewed so there shall not be a repetition of this incident.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): On the question of privilege, in his cavalier manner the Secretary of State for External Affairs tried to pass off this matter as something of no consequence, outside the responsibility of the government. On behalf of all members of this house I ask him whether he will undertake that as soon as the sitting opens on Monday he or the Prime Minister will give a complete report on who ordered whom to distribute this bill to the press.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is merely repeating what has been said in the course of the discussion which has been completed.

BROADCASTING

FAILURE TO MOVE CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning motions.

Some days ago already, the chairman of the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts presented a report to the house which has not yet appeared on orders of the day. Such a motion could be agreed to by the house. The report was presented to the house, but the motion for concurrence therein was never put forward. Now, since the report belongs to the house and since it has been tabled in this house, I suggest it would be in order to put it on the orders of the day and that it be concurred in or rejected some day or other. But, at this time there is absolutely no reference thereto.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member is erring in his interpretation of standing orders. There is no requirement that a report presented to the house be necessarily concurred in by the house. Very often a report is simply tabled without it being necessary to ask the house for concurrence therein.

DOMINION DAY

PROVISION FOR OBSERVANCE OF NATIONAL DAY

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-225, respecting the observance of Dominion day.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Gray: The purpose of this bill is to help ensure that Canada's national day can be observed in an appropriate manner throughout our country.

[Translation]

By prohibiting certain commercial activities, the purpose of this bill is to try to have a true national commemoration day for all Canadians throughout our beautiful country.

IMMIGRATION

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS AND SPONSORING OF IMMIGRANTS

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, could we revert to motions? I rose earlier but failed to be recognized. With the consent of the house, I should like to make a statement on immigration.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce a new policy governing those persons who come to Canada as visitors and then endeavour to remain as immigrants, in this way circumventing the normal immigrant channels.

This problem has become increasingly serious. My department has approximately 20,000 applications from visitors for landed immigrant status. An unknown number of other visitors in Canada undoubtedly hope to be allowed to stay but have not yet filed formal applications. This situation amounts to a wholesale circumvention of our normal systems of immigrant selection and control. Unless remedied it means that criminals and other people who are not legally admissible to Canada may succeed in establishing themselves here.

I should explain how the present alarming situation developed. In August, 1958 under similar circumstances a policy was introduced whereby most visitors then in Canada, and seeking to stay permanently, were allowed to do so. Future arrivals were warned that they would be refused permission to stay. Under this policy over 5,000 persons were granted landed immigrant status and stringent rules were applied to new arrivals.

Unfortunately these rules were found to be overly strict and exceptions began to be made. In 1961, in keeping with a world wide trend, Canada began to waive visas for visitors from many friendly countries. This greatly stimulated the tourist traffic but also made it possible for those who were unable, or who doubted their ability, to meet immigrant selection standards to gain entry as tourists.

The government has no desire to adopt measures which will impede the tourist traffic, or to impose irksome new procedures for the travelling public. Nor is it desirable to adopt a rigid policy toward bona fide visitors who come here and like our country so much that they want to stay. But it is essential that solutions to the present problem are found which will deal with the cases now on hand and prevent another recurrence of the problem in a few years' time. Accordingly the government has approved the following policy:

1. First, visitors who have arrived in Canada on or before today's date, and who have already applied for permission to stay or who do so by July 25, 1966, will have their applications approved provided:

(a) they are not within the prohibited classes described in the Immigration Act;

(b) they did not gain admission to Canada by any fraudulent means other than concealment of their true intentions; and

(c) they qualify in one of the following categories:

(i) those who would be acceptable as sponsored or unsponsored immigrants if they were applying as such abroad; or

(ii) those who have married citizens or legal permanent residents of Canada on or before today; or

(iii) those who have established a successful legitimate business in Canada; or

(iv) those who have been steadily employed in Canada for at least eight months; or

(v) those whose education in their own country is equivalent to ten years successfully completed in our school system.

The department will deal with these applications as quickly as possible and give most applicants notice of the decision in their cases fairly soon. The actual mechanics of granting the legal status of permanent resident to so many people will, however, take some months to complete.

Those who fail to qualify for permanent residence under these conditions will be given a reasonable time to leave Canada voluntarily, failing which deportation action will be initiated. The conditions I have outlined are sufficiently generous not to result in any large number of deportations.

[Translation]

The second aspect of this policy pertains to future arrivals and those persons now in Canada who do not apply for permanent residence on or before July 25, 1966. The applications of such persons for landing will be approved only if:

(a) They are not within the prohibited classes described in the Immigration Act;

(b) they have not gained admission by any fraudulent means;

(c) they do not have immigrant applications pending when they come to Canada;

(d) they apply before the expiry of their period of authorized stay and have not violated the conditions of their entry; and

(e) they come within one of the two following categories:

(i) those who would be acceptable as unsponsored immigrants if applying as such abroad; or

(ii) those who were, before admission, the spouses or minor children of citizens or legal permanent residents of Canada.

To deter those who might deliberately use this method of gaining admission rather than applying for immigrant visas at immigration missions abroad, the actual granting of permanent resident status to these persons will be deferred for one year from the date their applications are conditionally approved. Approval will be revoked if, during this period, there is definite evidence of criminal or other tendencies which establish that the applicant is undesirable as a future Canadian citizen.

Those applicants who fail to comply under this policy will be asked to leave Canada voluntarily, failing which deportation action will be initiated. Should parliament approve the bill to establish an immigration appeal board which is now before the house, persons ordered deported will have the right of appeal to an independent, judicial body which, in all but a limited number of exceptional cases, will have the power to deal conclusively with their appeals, subject only to a further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The third and most important aspect of this policy consists of better controls to prevent recurrence of the present situation. The new policy will be widely publicized in Canada and abroad to ensure that persons in Canada and the travelling public are well aware of our laws and requirements. A better documentation system for visitors will be instituted to identify visitors and to verify their departure without burdening them with undue formalities. Other improvements will be made in the internal methods of the department to enable efficient detection, apprehension and deportation of those who violate the conditions of their stay.

This new policy will apply to all categories of non-immigrants, except students and seamen who will continue to be governed by special policies and procedures. I would also like to emphasize that the procedures I have outlined affect only those who seek to migrate to Canada outside the proper channels. The qualified migrant seeking admission to Canada in the legal manner will not encounter any barriers. Nor do we intend that the new procedures will impede international travel or cause delays at Canadian ports of entry.

[English]

I also wish to announce, Mr. Speaker, that the government intends to introduce as soon as possible revised regulations governing the admission of persons sponsored by relatives in Canada. The proposed changes will remove all discrimination on grounds of geographic or ethnic origin of immigrants—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand: —and will create uniformity of standards for admission for all countries. Persons who have made a deliberate choice to identify themselves with Canada by becoming Canadian citizens will be eligible to sponsor, on a universal basis, a broader range of relatives than at present. Moreover, Canadian citizens who feel aggrieved by departmental decisions regarding the exercise of the rights of sponsorship will have recourse to the immigration appeal board in accordance with the terms of the bill which is now before the house.

Modifications and improvements in security features will give effect to the regulations in such a way as to remove the existing limitations and allow the movement of all eligible sponsored immigrants from eastern Europe and other parts of the world where such limitations now exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand: Non-citizens will have some restrictions on their present sponsorship privileges from Europe and the Americas, but still will be eligible to sponsor their dependent relatives from all countries. Details of the changes in the regulations I have outlined will be incorporated in the white paper on immigration which soon will be available. The study and debate which will follow, of course, will determine the precise form the new regulations will take.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the problem of the illegal entry of persons circumventing our immigration laws is not a new one, but recently it has grown very greatly both in volume and in intensity. With the general principles enunciated by the minister this morning it would be difficult to quarrel, but I confess that I do have mixed feelings—yes, grave qualms—about the interpretation and enforcement of those principles. A great deal more will have to be known about the actual procedures which are proposed by the department before a final judgment on the new policies can be rendered by the house. I am by no means sure, after listening to the minister this morning, that he has solved the headaches either for the department or the individuals concerned.

Personally, sir, I believe that the first principles ought to be generosity and sympathetic understanding to those already in the country who can meet health, security and crime free standards. This country can afford some genuine humanitarianism in its immigration laws. My own conclusion is that only a full amnesty for those already in the country is a realistic solution at this time, coupled with a clear enunciation of the principles to be followed in the future in dealing with illegal entrants and the adequate and uniform enforcement by the department and the new immigration appeal board of those principles.

I confess that I had some particular concern about what the minister said in relation to those who come to the country in the future as visitors and who seek to remain. He said they would be admitted if they would have been accepted as unsponsored immigrants or if they were spouses or minor children of citizens or of legal permanent residents of Canada. Later on the minister said there would be a complete revision of the regulations dealing with sponsorship, and he did say that a broader range of relatives than at present would be included.

Let me say I had an ominous feeling that in this particular first sentence the minister was giving us a forerunner of his intentions and that he might be about to adopt the proposals made by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C. as to restrictions on sponsored immigrants. If he were to do that I think he would strike terror in the hearts of many immigrants. The minister shakes his head. Let me say to him that I believe this is part of the policy which ought to be clarified at the time he is bringing forward his white paper. There is no reason why these proposals related to persons entering on non-immigrant visas should be confined to those who are spouses and minor children.

The minister in his statement said the policy for the future will remove all discrimination on the grounds of geographic or ethnic origin of immigrants. I remind him that basically that was the policy and regulations laid down in 1962.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the minister and hon. members of this house will read the statement made by Hon. Ellen Fairclough at that time they will see words that are very similar to those used by the minister this morning. If there has been discrimination it is because of what hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing since that time. I want to say to the minister that we on this side of the house will be vigilant to see that those words are not merely window dressing but that they mean precisely what they say.

What satisfaction we may have this morning in some aspects of the principles stated in the minister's announcement is tempered by what I would describe as a piecemeal approach to immigration policy. In December, 1964 the Prime Minister promised a white paper on immigration before the next session. Two sessions have passed and we are on the eve of a recess of a third session without the fulfilment of that commitment. The introduction of legislation to establish a genuine immigration appeal board, facilitated by the opposition, and this announcement are but—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, facilitated by the opposition—these are but segments of the problem, and I submit it is impossible to view what has been said this morning in perspective without this long overdue white paper and a full revision and modernization of the Immigration Act itself. That, sir, is what we shall demand of the ministry, and as rapidly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like my words to be an unqualified and warm welcome of this announcement. I think the minister and his advisers are to be congratulated on the improvements and steps forward that are embodied in these proposals. We in this party have for many years, to my knowledge, advocated three basic changes in the act and the administration of the regulations. We have advocated the elimination of all racial discrimination; we have advocated that the problem of visitors who seek to stay in Canada be dealt with properly, and we have advocated fair hearings for those who seek admission to Canada.

Dealing with the first point about the elimination of racial discrimination, we warmly welcome the statement of the minister. The regulations which were introduced—apparently the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has forgotten this—during the time of the previous administration expressly contain discrimination in respect of the sponsorship of would-be immigrants to Canada. I have the regulation in front of me, and it provides far stricter rules in regard to those who come from Asia and Africa than in regard to those who come from Europe or the United States. I was glad to hear the minister say in his statement that this discrimination is to be eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister, although it is not appropriate that he should deal with it now, that there remains in the Immigration Act the explicit authority to the governor in council to discriminate on the basis of ethnic origin. This authority is contained in section 61 of the Immigration Act. I call upon him to follow up what he has done so far by assuring us that we in this house will be invited to remove from the Immigration Act the authority given by parliament to discriminate on racial grounds.

The next point deals with the question of visitors. We welcome two aspects of this measure as mentioned today. The first is that those who come in through the lax application of the administration will be given a chance to show that they are qualified to stay in Canada, and that their suspense in this regard will be relieved.

I merely wish to point out one detail, and perhaps this is a matter that has been overlooked. The minister in his statement said that those who were in the prohibited classes described in the Immigration Act would not be entitled to have their applications approved. I remind the minister that the Immigration Act includes, in paragraph (t) of section 5, a prohibition against admission of anyone who does not comply with the regulations, so every single one of these people in theory could be eliminated under this general description on the ground that, for example, they had not complied with the regulations because they did not have immigrant visas. I ask the minister that the absence of an immigrant visa, which has been frequently used in the past as an excuse, without any reason given for refusal of admission, will not be used in denying admission to those who will apply under this proposal and who are now in Canada. Indeed, I hope this method of dealing with applications will not be followed at all.

I want to tell the house and the minister that despite these improvements there remains a procedure applied by the department which is dangerous and vicious; that is to say, that those who apply to come can be excluded, not because of any specific objection but because they have not got an immigration visa, which the department has refused to give without telling the applicant why. This is unjust. It is wrong. It is a practice that is being carried out now, and I urge the minister to review it.

Last is the question I mentioned before, namely that of providing fair hearings for all applicants. The whole immigration appeal procedures which have been brought forward in the bill which has been given first reading in this house are immensely improved by the proposed legislation, in that an independent appeal tribunal will be set up. But this will be meaningless unless it is made perfectly clear that the objections to the admission of an immigrant are made known to the applicant, so his hearing before the immigration appeal board and the special inquiry officer is meaningful and not just a hearing with regard to a piece of paper which the department decided the immigrant should not have.

I am also glad to hear that the question of security procedures with regard to immigrants from eastern Europe is to be reviewed. For a long time we have had a ridiculous situation in this regard whereby, for example, 400,000 people emigrated from Yugoslavia to West Germany, France and other parts of western Europe and made a tremendous economic contribution to those countries; yet we were told in Canada that because our security procedures did not enable us to look into the cases of people who came from a country such as Yugoslavia, they could not be admitted, as though some security risk existed in bringing in a few skilled people to Canada from Yugoslavia, which security risk did not exist at all in West Germany and other parts of western Europe.

I am delighted to hear that changes are to be made in this field. I would be less than generous if I did not say that after years of waiting for some action in this regard we are delighted to see that we are moving in the right direction. We will wait for the white paper. We want the committee to go into this matter thoroughly. There are many other things in the Immigration Act that require changing, but at last we are on the move.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, we in this group welcome this announcement. As has been stated, this step is long overdue. I think the proof that it is long overdue is contained in the remarks of the minister when he says there has been wholesale circumvention of the immigration regulations by the large number of visitors who apply for landed immigrant status. We certainly hope this procedure will be changed in practice in addition to lip service being paid to other changes.

We welcome the announcement about a broader range of relatives being allowed into Canada on a sponsorship basis, because this has caused most of the members of this house some difficulty from time to time. It is all well and good for the hon. member for Carleton to say that his party did in fact pay lip service to removing all the geographical and ethnic discrimination that exists in this area, but we are more interested in what the practice will be in removing these discriminatory features from the immigration regulations. So we will watch with interest to see that what comes as a result of this announcement in actual practice is in keeping with what I hope the minister had in mind when he made the announcement.

BANK ACT

DISTRIBUTION TO PRESS OF PRECIS AND AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask whether last evening he had distributed to the press a summary in detail of the various items, changes, amendments and terms of the new Bank Act. Was this done by him, rather than by some unidentified personage? Why was it done, and why was parliament circumvented?

Mr. McIlraith: Parliament was not circumvented.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take responsibility, of course, for the distribution of this document. I would not do anything else. I considered that it would be helpful to the press to have the summary. If I had known that this would have involved the public knowing of the contents of the bill before members of parliament, I would not have authorized this procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is not the minister's explanation now quite contrary to that given earlier by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Acting Prime Minister?

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Starr: He said there was no blame on the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that there was no blame on the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The second question asked by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is argumentative. The first question he asked has been answered by the minister, and I suggest that at this point this should be satisfactory.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance, and I ask it quite sincerely. When can I expect to get a copy of the Bank Act bill; because I need it?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): See the press.

Mr. Sharp: I do not think this is within my control, Mr. Speaker. The distribution of copies of bills is of course a matter for the distribution office and the printing bureau. As I say, if I had known there would be a delay like this, I would have had a double reason for not following the procedure I did.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am advised from the table that there has now been received a limited supply of copies, which I assume will be available to hon. members.

Mr. Ricard: In both languages, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I understand so.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could see that we get copies of the summary which he prepared, or do we have to go to the press gallery to get them?

Mr. Sharp: I would be only too happy to supply copies of this summary. It was done for the convenience of the press, and of course if it would be helpful to hon. members I would be very happy to see that they get copies.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister who prepared the summary?

Mr. Sharp: It was prepared in my department under my direction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister this question, Mr. Speaker. Did he also arrange that copies of the bank bill will accompany the explanatory notes? Did he do that too, or did they just naturally become available through some extraterrestrial means?

Mr. Sharp: I only heard of that particular circumstance this morning, and I have not inquired fully into it. I do not take any particular responsibility for that but I would not deny it, if the right hon. gentleman wants to add this to his grievance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say it is my grievance rather than parliament's grievance?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. If he is speaking on behalf of the house I would accept this responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Finance explain to the house why he considered this explanatory precis would be more useful and desired by the press than members of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, like all the other members, we have asked for a copy of the bill of the Bank Act and we are told that there are no copies in French. Could I therefore ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), when he has had the kindness and the civility to have the bill translated from English into French, to provide us with a copy in French?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Clerk informs me again that a certain number of copies in French will be available for distribution to the members within a few minutes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED VISIT TO RUSSIA BY CANADIAN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the appeal of the Prime Minister of India for a reconvening of the Geneva accord powers, and the fact that the Prime Minister of Great Britain is planning to visit Moscow to appeal to the Soviet government, which is one of the co-chairmen of the Geneva accord powers, I would ask the government whether they have given any consideration to having either the Prime Minister of Canada or the Secretary of State for External Affairs visit Moscow in the near future to make an appeal to the Soviet union, as a co-chairman, to reconvene the Geneva conference in the hope that an end to the hostilities in Viet Nam may be brought about.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The appeal made by the Prime Minister of India yesterday, Mr. Speaker, did not only concern the Geneva conference. It involved a proposal for a cessation of bombing and a cease fire throughout Viet Nam. As the Prime Minister indicated, I think the day before yesterday in answer to a question, Canada of course is in favour of such a conference as is proposed, providing it can be arranged. For some months now we have been engaged in talks with other countries in trying to bring about the calling of a conference. We have had discussions with the government of India, the government of Poland, the government of Britain and a representative of the Soviet union. Only this week I have had a discussion with a high personage in the government of the Soviet union here in Ottawa with regard to this matter.

If it is possible for present objections on the part of one of the co-chairmen to the calling of such a conference to be overcome, I am sure this would be welcomed all over the world. I believe there are some very difficult impediments in the way. If they were removed Canada, of course, would be happy to support that course.

With regard to whether I would be prepared to go to the Soviet union, I can say we have had some discussions here in Ottawa recently about this matter, and I do hope to go to the Soviet union some time later.

Mr. Douglas: I am sure the house and the country will welcome the news that the Secretary of State for External Affairs plans to visit the Soviet union. May I ask if it would not be advisable to advance the date and, if possible, have the Prime Minister visit the Soviet union as well, since Canada as a member of the international control commission has a great stake in urging one of the co-chairmen to convene this conference and to do it within a matter of weeks?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister and I had important discussions about this matter and related matters last Monday night with Mr. Polyansky. I will be having further discussions with him on Monday next.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Lapointe wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Grégoire: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the Canadian government will consider issuing a statement endorsing the main theme of the statement made in London yesterday by Australian Prime Minister Harold Holt, and expressing this country's unqualified gratitude for the job the United States is trying to do in Viet Nam and throughout southeast Asia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not had a full opportunity of reading Prime Minister Holt's speech. In any event I would say to my hon. friend that I am sure he would agree, on reflection, that foreign policy is not decided in the simple way in which the question is suggested, and particularly on orders of the day.

Mr. Starr: Is it ever decided?

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY UNIONS— THREATENED STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the rejection of the conciliation report of Mr. Justice Munroe by the non-operating railroad union employees and the plans being made by all three non-operating union workers numbering some 93,000 workers, can the minister tell us what action the government is taking or what information he may have to pass on to the house in relation to this matter?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): The conciliation reports were delivered by me to the non-operating unions and the railway companies within the last 48 or 50 hours. I have had no official communication from either of them since. I can only say my department and my colleagues in government are watching the situation very closely.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question. Having in mind the fact that it will take a few weeks before a strike vote can be completed, in view of the serious situation is the government not planning to appoint some mediator now in order to give him time to try to negotiate a settlement?

Mr. Nicholson: All relevant factors are being considered by the government.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister could say whether he or the government is considering some sort of policy to institute compulsory collective bargaining in order that we may avoid all these unnecessary strikes.

Mr. Nicholson: I have nothing to add to the statement that I made in the course of the presentation of my estimates within the last few weeks.

SHIPBUILDING

DELAYS IN PROCESSING APPLICATIONS FOR TRAWLER SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Minister of Industry. It is reported that applications for subsidies on steel fishing trawlers made as early as January have not yet been processed and subcontracts are being held up or cancelled awaiting decisions on subsidy applications. Can the minister state when it is expected these applications will be processed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): If the hon. gentleman will give me details of the particular application involved I will be glad to look into it right away.

Mr. Crouse: May I ask a supplementary question. There are a number of these applications which I am sure the minister will locate when he investigates this matter. My supplementary question is, has a letter gone out from the Department of Industry advising those interested in trawler construction for the fishing industry that there may be some change in the regulations after August 1, 1967?

Mr. Drury: I will check on that, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare is prepared to make the statement for which we have waited so long during the debate on the Canada Assistance Plan, concerning what action is going to be taken or is expected to be taken on behalf of the old age pensioners of this country.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am holding myself in readiness to make such a statement at the appropriate time.

Mr. Churchill: Will you make it to the house or just to the press?

Mr. MacEachen: This is in accordance with the statement I made on Tuesday last.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister, is it a fact that instructions have been given by the Department of National Revenue to have a number of senior employees work on a plan for a capital gains tax, with the proceeds from which the plan the minister has in mind will be financed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition the question as asked is argumentative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then may I ask this simple question of the Minister of National Revenue. Has he, within recent days, had a number of senior employees directed to work on a plan for a capital gains tax?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): I have given no such instructions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whether or not instructions have been given, has any such examination been made?

Mr. Pickersgill: What a spectacle of irresponsibility.

Mr. Starr: What a spectacle of irresponsibility on the part of the government.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a supplementary question. Will he be making the statement which he says he is holding himself in readiness to make in the house before this session recesses?

Mr. MacEachen: It depends on the length of the session.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the government house leader. Does he intend to proceed with the business of the house today as outlined in his remarks last night, when he said we would be considering the Canada Assistance Plan legislation, interim supply and medicare?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last night I did not indicate that they would come in that order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: What I said appears at page 7371 of Hansard, namely:

> Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall be considering the Canada Assistance Plan legislation, interim supply, and medicare.

I was asked very early this morning which item would be taken first and I said interim supply, but I am in the hands of the house on this subject. I regret that my statement last night was not clearer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, so that the clarity will be made even more clear, as soon as the Canada Assistance bill is before the house will the minister make the statement that he undertook to make on more than one occasion during the debate?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the undertaking will be carried out, but I would prefer to have the Canada Assistance Plan disposed of so that the other issue can be dealt with subsequent to the passage of the Canada Assistance Plan. Nothing would please me more than to get on with the Canada Assistance Plan now.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question for the government house leader, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the statement just made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, would the government house leader agree that we first pass the social security plan and, once consideration of that bill is completed, that we resume debate on interim supply? Then, the Minister of National Health and Welfare could make the statement he wants to make.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am in a somewhat embarrassing position.

Mr. Starr: No; wait a minute.

Mr. McIlraith: If this can be done quickly it might be possible, but I am in the hands of the house with regard to getting these measures through.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which is based on a remark made by the government house leader. Surely he must admit that there has been excellent co-operation in trying to dispose of the business of this house. I do not think it is necessary to impute any motives to the opposition or to hold a hammer over our heads as to how soon legislation can be passed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a point for discussion, and I suggest to hon. members that we do not appear to be making much progress with the question period.

Mr. Starr: Not when we hear remarks like that.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Minister of Public Works has a point of order.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should clarify what the business will be. I did not impute any motives to anyone. I have acknowledged publicly, and I will do so again, that I have been receiving excellent co-operation from the official opposition, and I have made no secret of that fact.

What I said, and the reason for my embarrassment, is this. I indicated the business of the house last night in a rather clumsy way, as anyone who reads my remarks carefully will see, and certainly as I saw when I received my copy of Hansard this morning. I said with some certainty that we would be considering all three measures today, when no one could say that. You can see how embarrassing it is, and I have sought never to put myself in that position. I was called very early on in the morning by the house leader for the New Democratic Party, who asked me what was the first order of business for today, and I said interim supply.

Mr. Churchill: At his suggestion.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the position we are in. If the house wishes to take the other measure first and hon. members think we can deal with it, then it is up to the house. I have no wish to dictate to the house. I must say in fairness that I had understood the N.D.P. members had indicated they wished to discuss some matters on Viet Nam.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Now we see whom you spoke to this morning.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have laid the facts before the house, whatever the house wishes to do with the situation. We should like to get the Canada Assistance Plan through for consideration by the other house so that they would have adequate opportunity to consider it. We should like to get interim supply through because we have need for the authority to spend the money. That is the situation. I will call whatever the house wishes as the first item of business in the light of these known facts.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not have a complicated mind and it is obvious to me that what the government house leader said yesterday is completely clear, that we would take as the first item of business the Canada Assistance Plan legislation. We are agreeable to continuing on that basis.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as far as the members of this party are concerned, we understood that interim supply was coming up. I believe the Leader of the Opposition had indicated some days ago that we should have a debate on Viet Nam. We, of course, are very anxious to have that debate, but we are not going to hold up the house. Whatever order of business is acceptable to all parties we will, of course, follow.

I rose to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who said he was anxious to make a statement but that he did not want to make it on the Canada Assistance Plan. I want to ask the minister, since he is anxious to make the statement and we are anxious to hear it, whether he will undertake to make his proffered statement on interim supply, whenever it comes up. If it does not come up today it will come up on Monday. Then it will not be related to the Canada Assistance Plan, and the occasion will give the minister an opportunity to make the statement, rather than having to make it after the house has recessed. May we have that assurance from the minister?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have stated that I would be prepared to make a statement following the passing of the Canada Assistance Plan, for reasons which I would have stated in the course of the debate. I still intend to carry out that undertaking. I do not intend in any way to play tricks with members of the house with respect to whether the statement ought to be made on interim supply or on any other occasion. I would have to confer with the Prime Minister and my colleagues before replying directly to that question.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, and may I have a specific answer from the minister. Will his statement be made in the house before the summer recess? We do not care whether he makes it on interim supply or on something else, but would he make it in the house?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will give that undertaking.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not give it in the first place?

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): As the government house leader has left us up in the air with regard to the business of the house, and since he has so far failed to cope and has finally abandoned his duty of leading the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Nugent: —would he care to turn it over to the opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question does not help anything.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FAILURE TO PROVIDE PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND WITH TELEVISION STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the government white paper on broadcasting reserves four areas in Canada for the establishment of C.B.C.-operated television outlets, can the minister explain why, of all the provinces in Canada, Prince Edward Island would then be the only province not provided with at least one C.B.C. television transmitter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative, and I do not think it should be asked at this time.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to quarrel with your ruling, but this matter has very urgent implications which may not be directly apparent on the surface. If the minister is prepared to give some answer I would greatly appreciate it, as I am sure would the broadcasters generally in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a nice point whether this matter in any way comes under my jurisdiction. I should be very happy to confer with the hon. lady, the Secretary of State, and with the Prime Minister to see if some statement could not be made at the earliest convenient opportunity after such conference had taken place. That might perhaps be Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I would ask the Secretary of State a related question on the same general subject. I would ask the hon. lady to explain what change of government policy is represented by the fact that the 1965-66 annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation makes no mention of providing C.B.C. television service for Prince Edward Island, although such a provision has been mentioned in previous annual reports.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I have only been responsible for the C.B.C. for six months.

REPORTED RESIGNATIONS OF OFFICIALS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the hon. lady whether she has any report on current C.B.C. resignations, and whether it is a fact that three of the persons who are among the best creative television producers in this country, who have won the highest international awards, resigned today. Can she also report to the house what available information she has with respect to the matter. The other day when I asked her the question in general, respecting the position of affairs, she said she would try to secure information, as I recall it. Certainly the events of the last couple of days indicate that the situation is becoming more serious with passing days.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as of eleven o'clock this morning I was advised that the C.B.C. had issued a statement. It might be better, perhaps, if I were to quote the words of the statement:

—it is the C.B.C.'s view that no useful relationship can be continued at this time with Mr. Leiterman beyond the expiration date of his present contracts.

I was also informed that the only resignation of which the C.B.C. had official word was that of Mr. Reeves Haggan, general supervisor of the English public affairs network. I heard rumours respecting Mr. Watson and Beryl Fox, neither of which I was able to confirm before coming into the chamber. Nor have I received any information since. There does not appear to be any suggestion that beyond the people identifiable with "Seven Days" there is any likelihood of resignations or a slowdown or a stoppage of work. A press report, which I am sure hon. members have seen, indicates that the work is continuing, but I have been unable to ascertain whether this is the case.

I think all hon. members regret the difficulties of the last two or three months, and in particular those of the last couple of days. The way in which the matter has resolved itself is disappointing. I would hope that perhaps now the corporation, the purpose of which is to serve all Canada, will settle down, yet that Canada will not lose the services of people who have already demonstrated such great ability.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In expressing that hope, has the minister communicated with C.B.C. management so there will be no unnecessary merit in the words used by Mr. Reeves Haggan, an outstanding producer, when he said there have been sordid manoeuvres by the corporation?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Haggan was a supervisor and not a producer. I have not conveyed my opinion to the corporation, as I did not think it was any particular concern to the corporation. It is parliament's opinion and not my individual opinion that the corporation is concerned with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was a committee set up in that respect.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Regarding the resignation of Reeves Haggan, I would ask the Secretary of State, as a supplementary question, whether this was a voluntary resignation or one which was requested by the corporation. Do the terms of reference with respect to Mr. Leiterman also apply with respect to Mr. Haggan?

Miss LaMarsh: My only information is that Mr. Haggan tendered his resignation and that he issued a statement, a copy of which I do not have at this time, using the phrase that the right hon. gentleman quoted a moment ago. I do not know what if any direction was given by management to Mr. Haggan. I suppose that would be within the corporation's knowledge. I know of nothing, aside from the statement given by the C.B.C. following the board of directors' meeting earlier this week.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to ask a supplementary question. May I ask the Secretary of State if it is true that management offered Mr. Leiterman a contract on condition that he specifically would not hire either Mr. Laurier LaPierre or Mr. Patrick Watson? Is this the usual type of contract which is offered to producers, naming certain people that they may not hire in order to produce programs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the series of questions being asked at this point are not turning into a debate. I do not think that is the purpose of the question period. I suggest to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam perhaps that this question is not the type which should be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask this question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has just stated that it is not for her to give direction or expressions of opinion to the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and that this is the responsibility of parliament. I would ask the government, therefore, if any opportunity is to be given to this parliament to express its opinion with respect to a series of events which, if carried much further, will result in the C.B.C. consisting of a great number of executives but very little talent.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, there are many more producers, of course, than Mr. Leiterman or others perhaps associated with him, who appear to be staying and working for the corporation.

With respect to my hon. friend's question, I understand from the statement of the C.B.C. that a contract was offered with a particular clause that is unusual in contracts, that Mr. Leiterman, if he accepted it, would be required to undertake to follow directives and to follow the policy of the C.B.C.

I understand that implicit in this was also the decision of the board of management with respect to the two gentlemen who had been the hosts of "Seven Days", that the question was closed and neither one could be hired as a host, so that in effect what my hon. friend suggests is the situation. So far as I know that is a unique contract, but it is certainly within the rights and responsibilities of management in hiring anyone to state what shall be in the contract, and that has been recognized I think by the producers' association in Toronto as a general principle.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—TABLING OF TERMS OF SETTLEMENT AND CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the week in response to questions from the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York South I undertook to file the terms of the agreement of settlement between the Shipping Federation of Canada and the unions concerned with the labour dispute in the three St. Lawrence ports, and also certain correspondence.

I now wish to table the terms of settlement and a letter dated June 20 that I received from the solicitors for the unions with an enclosure. Also I wish to table my reply dated June 27, copies of telegrams received by the Prime Minister and myself on June 30, our replies to these telegrams, and certain other telegrams that have since come in, dated July 4, 5 and 6.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to thank the minister for his courtesy in carrying out this undertaking and to ask him a question, simple and short. Did he, in the presence of the Prime Minister, say to the longshoremen's officials that a settlement having been made there would be no binding order or anything in the nature of compulsory arbitration in the setting up of the commission to look into the questions which were particularly to be referred to it?

Mr. Nicholson: I made no such statement. In fact, at a meeting shortly before the one which took place in the Prime Minister's office I made the contrary known to the parties who were there, and a statement to that effect was later made by the Prime Minister in the presence of myself and several of my colleagues.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement, summarized, is that there will be compulsory arbitration in the circumstances?

Mr. Nicholson: I think the phrase "compulsory arbitration" was carefully avoided; but the fact that there would be a binding solution, a recommendation to parliament —that legislation would be introduced to make the terms binding, that is, the recommendations of the industrial inquiry commission on certain aspects—there is no question about that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In order that we may not have to guess what was said may I ask the minister—and this may be of some importance—whether he would consider, possibly in consultation with the Prime Minister, tabling also any memorandum from which any statement was made to the parties on June 13 or 14 and any correspondence, including telegrams to and from the Canadian Labour Congress, the Prime Minister and himself?

Mr. Nicholson: With regard to the tabling of any memoranda which may have been used, and which might reflect only part of the conversations which took place, I question whether such memoranda should be filed, but I shall be glad to discuss this suggestion with the Prime Minister. With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, namely whether we would be prepared to table letters and telegrams, an exchange of correspondence, with the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, in order that all hon. members may know the contents of these communications I will be very glad to read a telegram which came to me from the president of the C.L.C. and a reply that I sent on behalf of the Prime Minister and myself yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nicholson: A telegram was sent to me by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress dated July 6. It reads:

As indicated to you during negotiations concerning the International Longshoremen's Association I wish to reiterate to you that as a firm matter of policy the Canadian Labour Congress is unalterably opposed to any type of legislation indicating compulsory and binding arbitration. This type of legislation is completely contrary to democratic methods and to normal collective bargaining.

Claude Jodoin, President C.L.C.

An identically worded night letter or telegram was sent to the Prime Minister. The reply I sent to the president of the C.L.C. on behalf of the Prime Minister and myself reads as follows:

In reply to your telegrams of July sixth to the Prime Minister and to me I would say that the traditional opposition of organized labour and management to the practice of compulsory arbitration in disputes over interests as distinct from grievances affecting rights is well known and I appreciate and respect the basic considerations underlying this attitude. It is equally well known and documented in the settlement of some disputes that labour and management have resorted to arbitration on specific issues that cannot be settled otherwise and which stand in the way of complete settlement. Likewise labour and management have agreed to settlements which provide for binding arbitration within prescribed limits. Previous governments of Canada have enacted legislation providing for binding solutions. As you are well aware most of the issues involved in the recent longshore dispute were settled by agreement and those directly concerned realized that legislative action was necessary and was promised to solve the remaining issues and thus bring about a complete settlement.

There is ample proof of this fact. As one instance, you will recall that on June thirteenth while you were present the Prime Minister read a statement to the ILA representatives concerning the two or possibly three issues remaining in dispute in which he suggested that the ILA drop its demand for the application of retroactivity to overtime and that the shipping federation accept the following proposal with respect to the four-hour recall "that this item be submitted to the commission for examination and that the recommendation of the commission with respect to this item be binding in precisely the same way as the recommendation with respect to gang-size. The four-hour recall would then be dealt with and included or not within the contract in the manner specified by the commission". You will also recall that also in your presence the suggestions of the Prime Minister in this regard were later accepted by both parties.

John R. Nicholson,
Minister of Labour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder whether the other documents which the minister filed can be appended to today's Votes and Proceedings in order that we may have a full record.

Mr. Knowles: As an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Nicholson: I have no objection. I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that these documents appear as an appendix to Hansard?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of documents above referred to, see appendix.]

Mr. Speaker: I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the question period expired some four or five minutes ago. I suggest we move on to orders of the day.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, then, with great respect, because we spent some time on business other than questions, I draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that the telegram last read by the minister referred to an extract from a statement by the Prime Minister when the parties were present. I submit that in view of the reference to that statement in the telegram, the statement itself ought to be tabled.

Mr. Nicholson: I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, in answer to this suggestion that I would consult with the Prime Minister to determine whether we agree to tabling it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Nugent: On a point of order which has to do with the business of the house, bearing in mind the statement made by the leader of the house last night, the discussion in the house today and the minister's last words to the effect that he was in the hands of the house, I do not think the business before the house has been determined. I do not believe it should be settled by the Clerk.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the rules of the house. The calling of business is in the hands of the government, and it will be known in just a moment what business is called.

Mr. Nugent: I think the government should indicate it.

Mr. Speaker: It will be indicated in a moment what the business is to be.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ASSIST PERSONS IN NEED

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-207, to authorize the making of contributions by Canada toward the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last Tuesday we were about to discuss clause 5.

On clause 5—Amount of contributions.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the important clauses of this bill. In fact it is the one which sets out the formula under which contributions will be made to the provinces on the one hand with respect to assistance payments made by them and on the other hand with respect to the costs of welfare services maintained or established by the provinces. It would be useful if the minister would make a statement giving the terms of the formula in simpler language than is contained in the clause.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, in response to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I shall begin to reply, and if he wishes further information I shall be glad to try to provide it. The rate of contribution for assistance, which is referred to in paragraph (a), is set out at 50 per cent of the cost to a province and to municipalities within the province. Federal sharing is limited to expenditures made by a province and municipality, although if a voluntary agency provides assistance that assistance will be supported by the federal government only in respect of that portion of the cost paid by the province or one of its municipalities. This gives an opportunity for voluntary agencies to participate in the plan.

Paragraph (b) provides a basis of contribution toward welfare service costs. It is divided into two parts which set out alternative methods by which the federal government may make contributions to a province at the option of the province. Under either alternative 50 per cent is the rate of sharing by the federal government.

During discussion of the Canada Assistance Plan at the conference of welfare ministers early in the year there was some consideration of how we might be able to participate, in as administratively simple a manner as possible, in sharing in the additional new service costs incurred by a province. As hon. members will note, in one case the federal government will pay additional amounts incurred by a province over and above the costs incurred by it and its municipalities for welfare services during a defined base period. The base period is set out in subparagraph (B)(1) as the cost to the province coinciding with or ending in the period commencing April 1, 1964, and ending March 31, 1965. In that case there will be the use of a base period. In the second case there is not the use of a base period but simply a cut-off point, which is March 31, 1965.

In a sense this really is not a crucial point to the principle of the bill. It provides some administrative flexibility to the provinces. In the second case, by using a cut-off period the province of Quebec in particular felt it would be more simple administratively and would not involve as great a federal involvement in ascertaining their actual costs under this program.

Provinces may choose either option. Indeed, they may choose a combination of both options. There is the 50 per cent generally. Then there are the two alternative methods for meeting the additional costs of welfare services and then, of course, there is the method of dealing with regulations for the determination of capital costs which generally will be excluded from federal financial support.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with the minister that there is nothing crucial with respect to the alternative choices granted to the provinces in subparagraph (B), and I am not going to suggest there is something crucial with respect to the rest of the clause, but I would like to be sure that we clearly understand it. In clause 5 we are dealing with two main areas in which contributions will be made by the federal government. One is in the area of what is called assistance, actual dollars that are paid to people in need. The other is in the area of welfare services, people put on staff to render services even though some of those services may get through in terms of equivalent dollar value to people.

Is it clear with respect to the first category, that of assistance payments to people, that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of whatever is the total cost to the province, municipality, or any other approved body? Does the minister want to say yes at this point?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: In respect of what are defined as welfare services and with regard to the putting of people on staff and providing services, the federal government will not pay a portion of the amount the provinces or municipalities have been spending up to the base year but rather will pay 50 per cent of the excess of cost from then on?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right, Mr. Chairman. Naturally the provinces would have preferred that we pay all costs. The purpose, however, really is to provide an incentive to the provinces to engage the additional personnel who will be required to make the Canada Assistance Plan work along the lines expected. We expect that incentive is provided by sharing one-half of the cost of additional staff according to either of the options set out in the clause.

Mr. Knowles: May I pursue this a moment longer. I thank the minister for his statement and I welcome the suggestion that this is set up as an inducement to the provinces to expand their welfare services. I take it that this is in line with the view generally expressed that we want not only to make dollars available to people by way of assistance but also want to help people get off welfare as fast as they can.

I do not wish to get into a matter of detail at this time which would interfere with general discussion by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa and the hon. member for Simcoe East, but at some point I should like to have two breakdowns in respect of the total amount of money the government expects to pay in the first year under the provisions of clause 5. My two breakdowns are these: On the one hand I should like to know how the $85 million which the minister is talking about is broken down among the various categories under which these moneys will be paid. My second request is for a breakdown with regard to how much of the $85 million would be under the heading of assistance and how much would be under the heading of welfare services. If my friends wish to pursue a more general discussion before we get into this detail I do not mind, but at some point I should like to have these detailed figures put on the record.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether the federal government takes any part in the establishment of regional offices. Could he also outline to us where these regional offices are, particularly with regard to my own province of Ontario? Does the federal government have any part in the choosing of the regional offices? I am asking this question because in the province of Ontario regional offices are now being established. In the areas where regional offices are being established now does the federal government pay 50 per cent of the cost of operation and of staff?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the location of any regional office which is set up under the Canada Assistance Plan would be, as the hon. member for Simcoe East appreciates, a matter for decision by the provincial governments, but we will be sharing through the federal parliament, if this bill is approved, 50 per cent of the additional staff costs in any office.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the minister grasped the last part of my question. Will the federal government pay 50 per cent of the total cost of the operating staff of the regional office?

Mr. MacEachen: We pay 50 per cent of the staff salaries.

Mr. Enns: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up this line of questioning. I believe I understand the clause correctly, but perhaps the minister would be able to define again the actual participation of the federal government in the payment of services so far as existing offices are concerned. As the minister has defined, and as it states in the clause, I know that any extension of services will be met by a 50 per cent contribution from the federal government, but if there is no extension and merely a salary increase, let us say, will the salary increase also be covered by the 50 per cent formula?

Second, in the event that there is no extension of services or even a salary increase, the municipality or agency will not benefit through the Canada Assistance Plan unless it does extend its services. Is that correct? I am not saying this in a negative sense because I agree there is an incentive here. When I spoke on this bill earlier I deplored the lack of standards. Perhaps it is a better way if the plan is providing incentives to improve standards.

Mr. MacEachen: With regard to the first question concerning whether salary increases aside from staff additions would be supportable, the answer is yes, if the province selects option 5(1)(b)(i)(A). My hon. friend asks whether there is any way in which welfare services can be supported except in the case of an extension. Welfare services can be supported if these welfare services are purchased under the definition of assistance in clause 2, welfare services purchased by or in the name of a provincially approved agency. In other words, 50 per cent will be shareable if these services are purchased for recipients of social assistance or public assistance. To that extent, the existing welfare services will be supported under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Enns: I have one follow-up question. I agree that services and direct assistance are supportable but there seems to be no provision for capital cost support. Is that correct?

Mr. MacEachen: This is correct. In clause 5 the right to assistance does not include any capital cost as defined by regulation for the purpose of this paragraph. The general effect of the paragraph is to exclude capital expenditures from the calculation of the costs of assistance. There may be some exceptions to this and we will deal with these exceptions by way of regulations. For example, we hope through regulations to deal with situations such as those which pertain to homes for special care where capital grants for such homes will not be considered by the plan but where debt charges, both principle and interest, may be included in setting per diem rate charges for the maintenance of persons in need.

• (12:50 p.m.)

This carries forward a policy that was adopted under the Unemployment Assistance Act. Similarly, in the area of items of special need referred to in the paragraph defining assistance, the intent is to cover small items of furniture and household equipment where these are matters of urgent necessity. But the intention is to provide for limitations which will keep such expenditures within the intended scope of the measure. It is intended really to look after the day to day costs rather than capital costs.

Mr. Enns: I am interested in the minister's interpretation of these regulations. My question now is, does this extra provision apply only to the needs in the area of health or does it also make it possible for welfare needs to be met? I am thinking of the establishment of institutions such as child care centres.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think it would apply in that area as well.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to what the minister said in respect of clause 2 in that cost does not include any capital costs as defined by the regulations. If I heard him correctly, he did say that under the regulations there might be some exceptions. I should like to raise a question and perhaps I can best do so by giving him a particular example of a situation with which I am personally familiar.

It concerns some handicapped people who have been endeavouring to maintain themselves by banding together in a group as self-supporting persons. Capital costs have been one of their major problems. I note in the interpretation clause of the bill under (a)(ii) it states:

> Prescribed items incidental to carrying on a trade or other employment and other prescribed special needs of any kind,

Farther on in the interpretation clause under (n) it states:

> "Welfare services provided in the province" means welfare services provided in the province pursuant to the provincial law to or in respect of persons in need or persons who are likely to become persons in need unless such services are provided;

Some time ago I made inquiries as to the possibility of the existence of any legislation by which federal assistance could be made toward capital costs which would enable this group, rather than as persons or individuals, to obtain assistance in respect of capital costs. This would be covered, I think, by the words "incidental to carrying on a trade or other employment". I discussed that situation with the Minister of Labour in his capacity as the minister answering for Central Mortgage and Housing and I was informed there was nothing under that act which would cover it because dwelling accommodation was not involved. I also had a discussion with the minister and the officials of the Department of Labour as to what might be available under the vocational technical assistance plan in the field of capital costs and I was informed that there was nothing because that program is limited to the carrying on of a trade.

I hope the minister can appreciate my concern about whether or not there can be some participation in capital costs to provide a building and working equipment for a group such as I have mentioned. The people in the group are under great difficulty but they have managed to maintain themselves as self-supporting individuals in spite of their physical handicaps. I hope that some assistance of this kind can be provided under the bill we are now considering because of the inclusion of exceptions under the regulations. I hope there can be participation by the federal government with the provincial authorities in providing some form of capital assistance to groups such as I have been attempting to describe.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the Canada Assistance Plan is basically a program for assistance to persons, and is not really intended to be a program for capital assistance. It is only incidental to the requirements of individuals in need that any kind of capital sharing would be undertaken. That is mentioned, of course, in clause 2 (a) (ii) which states:

> Prescribed items incidental to carrying on a trade or other employment and other prescribed special needs of any kind,

We can foresee that if the province puts forward items of a capital nature, equipment, for example, that individuals such as my hon. friend mentioned might require, we could conceivably share on the basis of the experience and policy adopted under the Unemployment Assistance Act. We propose by way of regulation to make it possible to accept participation in capital costs to the extent of the payment of interest and principal when these are involved in the per diem costs of looking after people. Beyond these limited instances the Canada Assistance Plan will not be a capital assistance program.

Mr. Barnett: I am sure that the minister would be inclined to agree with me that the kind of situation I have described does not seem to fit into any program. These people are not asking for a welfare grant in the ordinary sense but they are asking for assistance in the acquisition of premises and some equipment which will enable them to carry on successfully as a self-supporting organization. If the minister feels in his mind that this program is not designed to meet the situation I have described, can he tell me whether the government has any program in mind which would meet this obvious gap and the needs of these handicapped and disabled people in order that they can maintain themselves as self-supporting citizens?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the nature of the problem my hon. friend mentions in respect of handicapped and retarded children and persons. The Canadian Association for Retarded Children has made a proposal to the government for rather major assistance. Included among the projects of that proposal is provision for the kind of support mentioned. At the present time my department and the vocational rehabilitation division of the Department of Labour are considering what can be done in this field. Only last week a meeting was held with these groups in order to determine what our final position will be. This matter is under active consideration at the present time.

Mr. Barnett: I thank the minister for that information because I realize there is a relationship between the situation I have described and the proposals put forward by those interested in the matter of sheltered workshops and so on for people who are mentally retarded. I hope the minister will assure me that when such a program is being considered it will be considered in relationship not only to the mentally retarded who need special help to become self-supporting but also groups whose handicap is physical in the normal sense of that word.

• (1:00 p.m.)

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing this bill the other night I raised the question of whether there were projections of how much the provincial governments would be requiring this year. I asked for a breakdown in regard to first, day care centres and second, homemaker services, The minister was good enough to say that he would give me some information along this line when we got to this particular clause of the bill. Can he give me that information now?

Further, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni raised a point in which I am interested in connection with day care centres. Is there going to be any provision from the federal end—I presume there will be for the training of personnel for day care centres—in connection with the capital costs of these centres or is that left out of this bill entirely?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the comments I made earlier with respect to capital costs generally would apply to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. When we discussed the clauses of this bill last time I promised her that I would try to reply as well as I could to the points she raised when speaking about day care and homemaker services. In replying to the hon. member I should like to associate myself with her in her concern and assure her that I recognize the importance of such services and that the Canada Assistance plan has been designed to provide appropriate federal support in this field.

The hon. member is quite correct in telling us that too little information is available about the extent and nature of day care services for children in Canada. I think she is quite right in pointing out the lack of information in this respect. I hope she will be pleased to know that the department has for some time recognized the need for such information and has agreed to finance a special study of this particular aspect to be conducted by the Canadian Welfare Council.

The total cost of the survey will be covered through the national welfare grants program, and because of the interest of the Department of Labour, especially the women's bureau, and the department of manpower and immigration we will be involved in a special interdepartmental committee to advise on the study. This will be an intensive survey of the extent of services and facilities in Canada at the present time, the attitudes of people toward the provision of day care services and the extent to which new facilities should be provided. When this survey is completed we will obviously be in a much sounder position to move ahead with the development of additional facilities.

I also agree with the hon. member that day care facilities for children are an important preventive measure and should be given full support. The fact that at the present time there are relatively limited facilities in Canada for this purpose means that a great deal has to be done to develop new services. I am hopeful and confident that the new funds available for this purpose will go far to help stimulate and encourage welfare departments and voluntary agencies to push ahead as quickly as possible.

Hon. members may have read the article which appeared on June 5 in the Toronto Globe and Mail concerning the development of day care facilities in the province of Ontario. The article stated that as soon as the Canada Assistance Plan passes through the House of Commons and as soon as provincial regulations are drawn up, the offer of the provincial government to subsidize day nursery operators will become more generous. The article stated that 80 per cent of day nurseries' operating costs will be paid by the senior governments, leaving the municipalities to pay 20 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Wasn't that July 5?

Mr. MacEachen: June 5, I believe. Perhaps my notes are incorrect in this respect. This is an interesting example of the effect—

Mr. Knowles: It was just this week, Tuesday.

Mr. MacEachen: —that the Canada Assistance Plan can have in encouraging the development of new day care facilities. I am hopeful that the municipalities in Ontario will respond to the provincial department's proposed offer and I can assure the hon. member that federal funds will be available through the Canada Assistance Plan to the extent that they are needed and can be used by the provinces.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway also referred to the importance of homemaker services as a preventive measure and asked that I give some indication of the exact amount of money that will be made available for this type of service during the remainder of the year. I regret that my answer has to be that I am not able to say precisely what amount will go to these kinds of services during the current year. The lack of information on existing services and the various methods of financing used make this impossible.

In some provinces, including the province of British Columbia from which my hon. friend comes, such services can be paid for through general assistance and the amounts provided are therefore varied in these general assistance costs. I can, of course, reiterate my assurance that the Canada Assistance Plan will make funds available in these areas in any amounts claimed by the provinces. That is the main thing. While we cannot say what will be spent, we know that amounts claimed in any magnitude by the provinces for these services will be made available through the Canada Assistance Plan.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway for having drawn this matter to the attention of the house and having highlighted the important concepts through her participation in this debate. I conclude by assuring the hon. member that one of the objectives of the Canada Assistance Plan is to reach the people she mentioned, namely, the women and children of Canada. I believe that through this plan these services can be developed.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister very much for this report. He mentioned that Ontario was going to start out in a big way to avail itself of this money for day care services. Is there any indication from any of the other provinces as to the extent of their interest or that they are interested?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the only indication I can give is that at the conference we had with the health ministers and their officials there was a great deal of interest in this aspect of the plan, especially among the officials. In the federal and provincial governments there is a very keen awareness of the real possibilities in these areas, which may not be as well publicized as others. But there has been considerable interest. The passing of the plan will make it possible for the provinces to participate, and I hope they will.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, is the minister now in a position to give the figures I asked for some minutes ago? I asked for a breakdown of the figure of $85 million which he said will be the federal government's anticipated contribution in the first year this plan is in operation. I asked if that figure could be broken down into general categories and if he could also break it down as between assistance and welfare services.

• (1:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wishes to have the components that went into the estimate of $85 million as the fresh amount that will be required in the current fiscal year for the Canada Assistance Plan. I should like, first of all, to give the items involved, then the preliminary estimate of federal cost—these are both preliminary and estimated—and then the clause of the bill involved so that hon. members may refer to the bill. The first item is mothers' allowances, and the preliminary estimate of fresh federal cost is $27.2 million. This is covered in clause 5 (1)(b)(i)(A) of the bill. The second item is health care costs, and the preliminary estimate of federal cost is $22 million. The relevant section of the bill is clause 5(1)(A). The next item is the extension of staffs and welfare services, and the amount if $4 million. The relevant clause of the bill is clause 5(1)(B). The next item is additional child welfare costs. The federal preliminary estimate of cost is $16 million and the relevant clause of the bill is clause 5(1)(A) and (B). The next item is work activity. The preliminary estimate of federal cost is $500,000 and this is covered in part III of the bill. The final item is other program improvements and extensions, $15 million, and the clause of the bill is 5(1)(A) and (B).

These are the components of the proposed fresh amount of $85 million. Of course, it is an estimate and will depend for its validity, either up or down, on the extent to which provincial governments utilize the availability of the funds under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Douglas: Before the minister sits down, may I ask him what the cost will be of the federal government's share of supplementary payments to old age pensioners over and above the regular $75 per month which they get under the old age security plan?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, we have no estimates. The estimates here have been drawn up on the basis really of unknowns in that field. For example, when these estimates were drawn up we had no idea that the province of Prince Edward Island would proceed on the basis of supplementation as they have. The proposal of that province is to pay, as I said in committee and the leaders of both parties in Prince Edward Island have agreed, a supplementation up to $100 for every old age pensioner in Prince Edward Island. It is applied right across the board.

The provincial government will then come forward and claim under the Canada Assistance Plan for that part of the population in need. At the moment, therefore, we have no way of knowing the extent of the costs involved, even in that province. We do know that they will come forward. What they have done, of course, has been to rely on the fact that this bill will be passed. The payments will be retroactive to April 1, 1966. Accordingly, they have made the $25 available retroactively and have sent out the cheques, I understand, bringing the total cheques for the strategic end of June period up to $150 a month. They are relying, of course, on this bill being passed by the parliament of Canada so that a share of these costs will be met by the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan. I think this illustrates the difficulty of making appropriate estimates.

Mr. Douglas: I appreciate the fact the government has to make estimates and that these estimates may be completely confounded by the actions of the provinces which may choose to make larger payments than had been anticipated. Naturally they will call on the federal government to pay its share.

However, in computing the $85 million the minister and his officials must have had some estimates as to how this would be broken down. The minister has just given some of them to us. What is his estimate of the amount, out of the $85 million, that will be attributable to demands from the provinces for supplementary payments to old age security pensioners?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Chairman, this question involves all sorts of related decisions or related policies. For example, another step may be taken by the parliament of Canada with regard to old age security recipients which will considerably influence the extent of provincial supplementation necessary or desirable. Whether old age pensioners receive $100 a month or $105 or an even higher amount under other old age income security programs, it seems to me there will still be a need for the kind of supplementation that is provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

For example, I mentioned, or I had intended to, the cases of elderly people who may be in special care homes, the monthly cost of which may be $300. The Canada Assistance Plan has a role, it seems to me, over and above any other flat rate income program, so under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government will be doing its part in sharing in the cost of supplementation. The federal government will share half the cost of supplementation, but we do not intend to place any upper limit on this federal share as it relates to income maintenance payments or health and welfare services. Since both traditionally and constitutionally the responsibility for persons in need of assistance rests with the provincial governments, the federal government cannot go much farther than this.

The federal government, of course, has made additional funds available to the provinces through action with respect to old age security programs and has indicated to the provinces our expectation that these funds would be used in supplementary and other assistance payments and welfare services. It is estimated that in 1966-67 the provinces will save $12.3 million through a reduction of the age eligibility from 70 to 69 and having that group of the population removed from the old age assistance case load. This figure will rise substantially until, by 1970, the provinces will be relieved entirely of their share of the cost of old age assistance, with a saving we estimate in that year of approximately $50 million. The sharing of the existing provincial costs of mothers' allowances and child welfare will, of course, provide the provinces with another source of additional new revenues, not only to improve these programs but also to provide funds for improvements of other aspects of their assistance programs, including supplementation.

The effect of any action to be taken by the federal government through other legislation with regard to additional income security will, of course, influence the extent to which supplementation is needed. So the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is in a position to draw very optimistic conclusions from the estimate that we have proposed, if he wishes, in this particular breakdown. It will influence the extent to which supplementation is needed. Any other action which is taken will depend on the extent of supplementation required by a province.

It would be my expectation that it would be wholly desirable in certain cases for that supplementation to be forthcoming regardless of any other action that might be taken. I can assure hon. members that the $15 million estimate to provide for supplementation and improved general assistance rates would be much higher were it not for the fact that a type of provision other than the Canada Assistance Plan is contemplated.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I should like first to beg the indulgence of the minister because I will try to pose my questions in the best English I can muster, out of courtesy to the minister I understand that this bill has been discussed with the authorities of the provincial government of Quebec. I should like to know from the minister, and I apologize if this question was asked when I was not here, whether the Quebec government accepts this bill. Is it ready to participate in the bill as it is or there is to be any special arrangement made? If there is, what is the arrangement and on what basis is Quebec's share of the $85 million going to be given to that province?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, this bill was discussed at several meetings with the provinces. Earlier in the year we had a meeting of welfare ministers at which the minister for the province of Quebec was present. In a general way we secured the support and agreement of the province of Quebec, as we did of all the provinces, with respect to what is in this bill.

There is, for example, in this particular clause an option by means of which provinces may choose to secure their support for welfare services, and one particular choice was included to meet the particular requirements of the province of Quebec. In clause 19, to which we will be coming later, there is provision for the extension of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to the Canada Assistance Plan.

Canada Assistance Plan

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, may I follow up the question I asked the minister a moment ago? I completely agree with the minister that there will always be need for the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to special cases of need among the old age security pensioners, but I am particularly anxious to find out about the whole question of supplementation. As I understand the minister's breakdown, there is an estimated $15 million as the federal government's share for making payments to the provinces for any supplementation that they may provide. That is for the different plans covering elderly people.

What I am not clear about is this. The minister says that the reason it is relatively small is that it has to be viewed in the light of other legislation which may be forthcoming. Does that mean that the provinces have made their plans on the basis of the federal government introducing other legislation to supplement old age security pensions or old age assistance pensions? Did they know that the federal government intended to do something, other than what is provided in the Canada Assistance Plan, for the old age security pensioners?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Chairman, the provinces have not been made aware of any proposals that may be in the offing in the pension field. They have not been given any indication except the indications they may have gained from what has gone on in the house. These are estimates. But the point is that any amounts claimed by a province in any program of supplementation would be made available under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, to follow up that question with another, it seems to me that this situation is somewhat unfair to the provinces. If the minister is contemplating other legislation to assist old age security pensioners, in what position does this put a province like Prince Edward Island which has now committed itself to meeting half of the cost of paying a supplementary pension of $25 a month? In the event that the federal government decides to bring in additional legislation providing for some type of annual guaranteed income, would this leave a province like Prince Edward Island in the position of having committed itself to meet half of the supplementary costs when, if it had waited till the government brought down other legislation, the entire supplementary cost would be borne by the treasury?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the point made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that any further step taken by the government and the parliament of Canada will affect any provincial program. To that extent the action of the government of Prince Edward Island has been taken in the absence of complete knowledge of what may happen in the future. I do not know how to overcome that except that it might be possible, if and when further action is taken by the parliament of Canada, for the province of Prince Edward Island to adjust its program accordingly, if it found it in its own best interests to do so. That is the only thing I can suggest.

Mr. Douglas: The situation could have been avoided by drafting both programs at the same time.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the debate I rose because I wanted to ask the minister a question but I was not recognized. Then I had to be out of the chamber, with the result that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières asked the question I wanted to ask. As a supplementary I should like to ask the minister whether he has come in contact with any members of the new administration in the province of Quebec to ascertain if the views of the new administration are the same as the views of their predecessors.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I have received no negative word from the new administration in Quebec, and neither have my officials, with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan. I am hopeful that the provisions of the plan will be acceptable to the province of Quebec because I believe that they are in line with the thinking which has been developed in that province. And, of course, clause 19 applies the contracting out provisions to the Canada Assistance Plan, so that at a future time, as my hon. friend knows, these provisions will become operative.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, my question would be supplementary to that of my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard)—

[English]

Perhaps I did not make myself too clear when I put my question, so may I ask the minister again. In addition to these preliminary discussions at which ministers and officials from the welfare department of the province of Quebec were present, were any agreements made with the former government? If so, under this basis what would be the share of the province of Quebec in the $85 million for this year which we have talked about?

• (1:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I have no special agreements with any province, excepting the provisions of this bill which take into account the discussions that we have had with all the provinces. There is nothing in the bill that represents anything that has not been discussed, although in some cases we have attempted to accommodate the special wishes of particular provinces, including Quebec. The province of Quebec will participate in precisely the same way as other provinces with respect to the benefits available under this plan except that the contracting out provisions of the Established Programs Interim Arrangements Act will apply.

Mr. Mongrain: Could I ask another question, Mr. Chairman? Suppose the new government of Quebec comes to Ottawa and says to the minister: We are not ready to participate in this plan as it is but we should like to have all the money that was supposed to be applied to the province of Quebec and we shall distribute it as we please. My question arises out of certain declarations which have been made by the new premier of Quebec. What would be the reaction of the government in that case?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan will appeal to the new government of Quebec. Of course, if any new proposals were made by the new Quebec government the government of Canada would consider them. We are operating on the assumption that all governments have generally accepted the provisions of the plan. We have had no contrary information, and I believe this plan will be of great value to Quebec, as it will be to other provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the minister invited me to be optimistic on the basis of the breakdown of figures that he gave a while ago. I can only say to him that I am optimistic in spite of the figures, not because of them. Nevertheless I am optimistic. I am referring, of course, to the position of old age pensioners generally and to old age security recipients in particular.

When I say that the breakdown of figures given to us by the minister does not in itself lend to optimism, it is because I am looking at the figure of $15 million which is listed for program improvements. I understand that this is the amount of money the federal authorities estimate they will have to pay out in the course of the first fiscal year in response to provincial requests where the provinces improve various programs of assistance.

I understand, therefore, that this covers possible supplements to the old age security pension, as is being done in Prince Edward Island. This also covers other programs. Perhaps the categorical programs will receive most of it. At any rate, the $15 million is not all available for old age pensioners. If we are to assume that dividing that money among four or five programs is what will happen, that reduces the amount to a mathematical figure of $5 million or $6 million, or perhaps less, which will be available to the recipients of the old age security pension.

If the federal government is making available or expects to make available $5 million in the first year for the old age pensioners of Canada, since there are 1 million of them that averages out at $5 a year per pensioner, or 40 cents a month. That is not something that would directly make me optimistic. But, Irish though it may sound, it does make me optimistic precisely because I realize that the government knows it cannot get away with doing that little for the old age pensioners of this country.

If it had not been for the things the minister said this morning I should be going after him pretty strongly with respect to what we are now talking about, namely, the $15 million for program improvements. To try to fob off the old age pensioners with the amount of money that is available for such program improvements just would not do. For the minister to tell us that he does not know what the provinces are going to ask for hardly squares with these estimates in the six categories that he has given us.

I assume there have been consultations between the officials of the minister's department and the officials of the corresponding departments of the provinces, and that this is a reasonable guess or estimate as to what the provinces will do in these areas on the basis of which they will be able to get fresh or extra money out of the federal government.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is pretty clear that the government does not expect the provinces to avail themselves of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to any significant extent for the purpose of helping our old age pensioners. It is obvious that the government assumes that the provinces are faced with other claims, with other priorities. Since the provinces will be calling on the government, according to what is in the estimate, for only $15 million for program improvements in the first year, it is obvious that not much is going to be done under the Canada Assistance Plan for our old age pensioners.

This comes as a disappointment on several counts. For about a year we have been told to wait for the Canada Assistance Plan. We have been told that it would be the legislation under which something would be done for our old age pensioners.

I have also been disappointed at the many references to $125, $140 or other outlandish figures that people will get under the Canada Assistance Plan. Obviously the government knows that is just talk and that the provinces will not pay such pensions; otherwise there would have been a figure to cover that in these estimates.

However, the minister can be assured that the harshness of some things I may have said on this subject is softened by his assurance this morning on orders of the day that when this legislation is put through he will consider making, while parliament is still in session, the government's statement relating to old age pensions. That also holds true because of the minister's statement, in response to an inquiry from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam a short time ago, that what the government does or what the provinces do by way of supplementation under the Canada Assistance Plan depends on what the flat rate pension is.

All I can say is that the message has got through to the minister that it is not good enough to leave the flat rate at $75 and to call upon our senior citizens to rely on social assistance, such as the Canada Assistance Plan, for any supplementation. The message he got was that first of all he has got to do something about that $75 flat rate.

In his speech on second reading the minister made a statement with which I completely agree, namely that we should minimize the reliance on social assistance of people who are in retirement. If the minister leaves the figure at $75 he would actually be maximizing the reliance of our people on social assistance.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I am glad the message has got through. What the minister's response will be we shall have to see when we have got this bill through the committee stage and third reading. But surely it is clear that all the talk as to what was going to be done for our senior citizens under the Canada Assistance Plan was just talk.

• (1:40 p.m.)

I want to say again that I like these other sums of money which are being made available for sharing the cost of things like mothers' allowances, child welfare, administration and so on. I am glad to note there is money available to improve programs of social welfare at what I might call the social welfare level. But let it be clear: if we were to stop at this legislation this parliament would not now be doing anything significant or realistic for our old age pensioners. I submit it has been worth while that parliament has been discussing this question. It has come to a point at which the minister is talking in this debate about the other legislation which is to be brought in for our old age pensioners and where we have an assurance there will be a statement on this matter before the recess.

Mr. Rynard: I understood the minister to say there will be $85 million available plus further sums as required.

Mr. MacEachen: Up to the amount required. Frankly, I do not attach any real importance to these figures. I do not attach any real importance to the $85 million or to the $15 million referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. They are estimates, and if the demand is greater there can be supplementary estimates. Depending on the reaction, greater amounts could be asked for by the provinces and any amount will be available to them under this plan.

Mr. Knowles: Provided the provinces pay their half.

Mr. Rynard: I had been attaching importance to this figure because an hon. member opposite said in the debate the other day that $85 million could not accomplish very much if all these groups are to be covered. He was speaking on a private bill. He is a parliamentary secretary and I thought that when he spoke he did so with some authority. This caused me some concern. I also felt some concern about the old age assistance situation. According to the figures he gave, there are some 85,000 people across Canada who are covered by old age assistance benefits.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

Mr. Rynard: That was the figure quoted the other day by the parliamentary secretary, not the parliamentary secretary to the minister but the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. On the basis of this figure of 85,000 even a modest increase of $25 would involve a sum of approcimately $25 million. Half of that comes to $12,500,000. Of course, if this figure can go to any limit, as the minister suggests, the problem is covered.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Every time it is said that a provincial government can go as high as it likes, should it not be noted that there is the proviso that the provinces must pay half?

Mr. Rynard: That is correct. There is another thing which bothers me. There are no rules. One province can lag behind another. In other words, there will be an absence of uniformity across Canada. The minister introduced this measure with high-sounding phrases and I was inclined to go along with them. My own speeches have always been intended to bring help to the underprivileged. I thought the present bill would do this. I am now beginning to suspect it is an old piece of barnacle dressed up in a new dress.

I see no provision here which would take children out of the slum areas of our towns and cities. The hon. member to whom I have referred said the other day there were 600,000 people receiving unemployment assistance and 50,000 orphan children. But he said nothing about children who are living in the slums and nothing about illiterates. How are these people to be helped? If we do not provide such help we are not attacking poverty. I am very disappointed in this bill. Merely giving a hand out does not correct the situation at all.

I hoped we would assist these people by taking them out of slum areas and re-educating them so as to bring the cycle of dependency and poverty which has haunted them for generations, to an end. I still hope the minister will rise and say he intends to do this. I should like to know how.

Mr. MacEachen: What the hon. member is asking for is made possible through this bill.

Mr. Rynard: I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. MacEachen: It depends, of course, upon action taken by the provincial governments within their own field of jurisdiction. I have sufficient confidence in the sense of justice and the sense of humanity within provincial administrations in all parts of Canada to believe that they are as alive to the needs of the public as we are. This measure will give them the opportunity of which the hon. member for Simcoe East has spoken to apply programs exactly along the lines of those he mentioned.

Since concern has been expressed on this score both by the hon. member for Simcoe East and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think I should refer in more detail to the estimated cost of the Canada Assistance Plan. When I introduced the resolution I referred to the estimated cost of a number of the elements of the plan and mentioned the total would involve an increased federal expenditure of some $85 million in 1966-67. I also pointed out, however, that the full impact of federal expenditures would be felt as the provinces are able to strengthen and improve their programs.

I should like to emphasize this point and make it clear that this program, when enacted, will obligate the federal government to meet all expenditures duly claimed by the provinces that come within the scope of the act. Thus the amount of new cost to the federal government may well be greater than the $85 million to which I have referred.

Since these estimates were prepared some time in advance of the introduction of the bill the provinces, while able to make some extensions and improvements to their programs on the basis of the federal commitment to introduce this measure, have not been able to develop their plans fully until the Canada Assistance Plan is enacted. I mentioned the components of the $25 million—

An hon. Member: You mean $85 million.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, $85 million. I was thinking of the coal industry of Nova Scotia. The first item concerns mothers' allowances where costs are now being borne substantially by the provinces. The estimate includes increases in rates of mothers' allowances which have been made in the last fiscal year and in the present year, in anticipation that half the cost of all these payments would be shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. While it is difficult to forecast what further steps may be taken in this regard for the balance of this year, we are sure this estimate is on the conservative side and it is quite possible that these costs may reach $30 million.

In the area of health care costs our estimates indicate that the federal share may be about $22 million for 1966-67. This includes costs of new developments such as the new program of health care for social assistance recipients in Quebec. As I mentioned earlier, any medical care costs shared under the proposed medicare program commencing July 1, 1967, will mean a reduction of costs shared under this program. However, the Canada Assistance Plan would continue to carry the costs of assistance recipients for health care services other than hospital and medical care.

The next item concerned the extension of staffs and welfare services. In considering the $4 million provided for welfare services it should be recognized that this amount relates almost entirely to salaries for personnel who provide the services. The recruitment and effective deployment of such staff is a time-consuming process, and we can expect steady but not dramatic development in this area.

There is a shortage of welfare personnel across Canada at the present time which may have a limiting effect on the rate of expansion. However, it is expected that both through the Canada Assistance Plan and the national welfare grants program substantial federal funds will be made available to assist in training the additional personnel required.

The demands on the federal treasury will increase significantly as new staff are added to provincial and municipal welfare departments and voluntary agencies. The important point with regard to this aspect of the program is that federal support will be provided to the extent that it can be utilized.

I now wish to say a word about additional child welfare costs. We consider that the $16 million estimate for additional child welfare services may be on the low side. It should be pointed out that some child welfare costs were being covered under the unemployment assistance program. These expenditures are for children in need of assistance in their own right who are in foster homes and who would ordinarily have been covered under mothers' allowance programs. The additional child welfare maintenance costs included in these estimates are over and above other federal expenditures now being made in this area. One of the considerations in these costs is the very rapidly changing situation in the child welfare field. For example, in Ontario, a large province where program developments would materially affect our earlier cost estimates, a substantial strengthening and improvement of child welfare services is now under way.

In discussing this estimate with my departmental officials they have indicated to me that these costs could, on the basis of recent developments, be as high as $20 million or even $25 million for this fiscal year. In our estimate of $85 million we included $16 million for child welfare but that may rise to $20 million or $25 million. That is why we cannot attach a firm determination to any of the figures.

Then there is the part dealing with work activity, for which we have included $500,000. In this regard we are embarking on a new, experimental field. It will take some time for the provinces to develop projects of this kind, but we would hope that the type of projects that have been developed in the United Kingdom and the United States might prove helpful, along with others which the provinces may have in mind, to do the kind of thing in the field of work activity that has been mentioned by the hon. member for Simcoe East and others. It would be a wrong conclusion to say that this $500,000 represents the potential value and potential cost of this program. It is bound to be an important component of the future effort to rehabilitate people in Canada, and $500,000 is a nominal figure.

In the figures I have given there is no reference to Indian welfare. We anticipate that there will be some new expenditures this fiscal year but it is difficult to assess how much these will be. Here again the provinces will have to be prepared to develop provincial welfare services before they enter into agreements to take over this responsibility. This will take some time, but the fact that the federal funds will be available and that the provinces have a firm federal financial commitment will be an incentive to them to provide for the extension of welfare programs to Indians on the same basis as other residents of the provinces.

The final component in the $85 million estimate was other program improvements and extensions. The estimates for mothers' allowances, health care and additional child welfare costs have included in them the costs of improvements to these programs as nearly as they can be gauged. Thus the estimates for these categories include both existing expenditures and new costs arising from improvements and extensions. In each case we believe our estimates to be modest, and on the basis of recent developments our estimates could be as much as $10 million on the low side.

In the case of cost estimates for welfare administration and services and for work activity programs, only new expenditures are involved and they will be complemented by an equal expenditure by provincial governments.

Over and above all these expenditures, which include provision for improvement of the rates of assistance and expansion of services, there is an item of $15 million for other program improvements and extensions. This includes expenditures in categories that have been referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I think the same conclusion can be applied here as was applied in earlier remarks. The estimate here is based entirely upon an appreciation of existing conditions, prepared by the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. It was drawn up without, for example, foreseeing what might occur in the field of social welfare in the province of Prince Edward Island, and I think that development indicates how impossible it is to forecast.

All I want to say to members of the committee is that there is no limit on the degree of federal support for provincial supplementation undertaken in any field, including that of the aged. There is no limit on that federal support. If hon. members find this figure low then they can conclude optimistically that there may be other programs in the offing that will reduce the necessity of supplementation. But hon. members cannot have it both ways. They cannot complain about the small size of the estimate and then castigate the minister for not doing something more. If the minister does something more, then this figure will be low and hon. members will be happy.

I do not know how to conclude except to say that I have not lost any confidence in the ability of the Canada Assistance Plan to participate in any program of supplementation put forward by the provinces. All I hope is that the provinces will participate in the supplementation aspects provided under the Canada Assistance Plan to the full extent necessary to allow all recipients of social assistance to live in adequacy. If the provinces do not have to supplement, because of other action to be taken, so much the better, but so long as there is need to supplement the opportunity to do so is available under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Rynard: I thank the minister for the explanation of his hopes and aspirations. Now that he has told me this plan is going to cover the children, if the provinces participate in educating the ones below par before they go to school as is done under the United States scheme, this gives me a lot of hope. I am sure the minister will have little difficulty selling the enthusiasm he has shown today when he meets with provincial ministers. We in this chamber will expect him to do that.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear that the minister hopes he will be called upon to spend more money under this legislation than was suggested by the $85 million estimate. I express the hope that he will be called upon to spend a good deal more money under this act with regard to the categories of people for whom it is mainly designed. I also share his hope that he will not have to increase the estimated figure for old age security recipients precisely because he is going to do something else for them.

May I say to the minister that he will realize that one thing here is very obvious; no one can miss it. I recognize the right of the minister to adjust the estimate as he has done this morning, but when the estimate was prepared it was assumed there would be some reliance on it so far as old age security recipients were concerned, so a figure was put in. At that point neither he nor the provinces knew that something other than the Canada Assistance Plan might be provided in the near future for our old age security recipients. The change is pretty obvious. When it took place we do not know but it looks as though it took place in the last week or so. But since that change has taken place, will the minister not admit that we could discuss this legislation more intelligently if we knew what it is the government is going to do for old age security recipients?

I realize the minister has made the commitment that he will tell us after the legislation is passed, but from time to time this morning he has found it necessary to refer to something else which is going to be done and I am sure that if he would tell us what is going to be done we could discuss the present legislation in the light of the government's intentions. I suggest he might go one step farther than he promised this morning and tell us what is going to be done. In this way I think he would find not only that we would be in a position to discuss this legislation a little more intelligently but that we might get along faster too.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: As the only independent in the house, I am beginning to wonder if some members are not carrying on a filibuster or rehashing the same old things in order to delay the very legislation we would like to see passed. There is no doubt that everyone wants the old age pension to be increased or improved. I think there is no difference of opinion on that matter.

I am one of those who, at one time, voted with the government against increasing the pension to $100, because I had been assured that a bill dealing with social security would be introduced; and I had been led to believe that there would be a bill dealing with the old people. Since then, the minister has told us on several occasions that when he had met the needs of all the poor, the destitute in all classes of society, including the old people, since they have marginal needs, for instance medical care, etc., he would have a statement to make about the old age pension. I am one of those who find that obstinacy and stubbornness almost inexplicable from some opposition members who want to push the minister into a corner, as we say in Quebec, to wrench a statement from him. And in the end that delays the passing of the bill under consideration.

I would like to submit to the house in all objectivity, as an independent—I am not blaming the opposition for stressing the importance of increasing the old age pension, I think the opposition did something useful—but I think that we have come to the point in the last week or two where we are overshooting the mark and going against the objective sought.

I think that we should in this house come to an agreement to pass that bill which is an improvement anyway, which was conceived after consultation with the ten provincial governments. Therefore, it was studied seriously, it brings some advantages and we are all anxious to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) make his statement about the old age pension.

Let us therefore pass that bill as soon as possible; we will then have the opportunity in the months to come, if we are not happy with the minister's statement, to criticize him. As a matter of fact, I undertake to do it. If we are not happy with the implications and repercussions of that bill, we can amend it. But we will know only after it has been put to the test.

Therefore, since the minister has given us his word, which I take as his word of honour, that he would make a statement as soon as the bill is passed, and in view of the fact that this bill was studied by the ten provincial governments and that we are all anxious to hear the minister's statement on the old age pension, I humbly submit to the house that we should co-operate to speed up the passing of this bill, and I promise to do my share right now by cutting my remarks to a minimum, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to prevent the minister rising right now and making this statement. It would serve the additional purpose of putting this legislation in the current context. I am sure he realizes the context has changed and that it would be a good idea to have that statement now.

As my hon. friend from Trois-Rivières says, some of us have been discussing pensions for the past week, but may I also tell him that some of us and our predecessors have been discussing the question of pensions in this house for 45 years. With a Liberal government on that side of the house most of that time this had to take place in order to get any action on the pension question.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? He mentioned that they have been discussing pensions for 45 years. Would he admit that in the last 45 years a good deal has been gained in the way of pensions?

Mr. Knowles: Not only do we admit it, we assert it. May I ask the minister a question or two with regard to another aspect of clause 5? When he gets to his feet to answer he can answer on the other matter if he feels so inclined. I should like him to look at subclause 5 on page 7 of the bill where reference is made to health care services not excluded because a needs test is not given. I confess I am a little confused about the language. When I read that marginal note it sounds as though it applies for all time—"health care services not excluded because test not given." However, when I read the language of the subclause I wonder how long that holds. Can the minister give us an explanation of the last part of this clause?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, subclause 5 is a transitional provision under which the provinces may submit claims for the costs of health care services provided to recipients by way of cash benefits provided the need of these recipients for health care has been established before March 31, 1967. If this requirement is met, any cost incurred back to April 1, 1960 would be shared. This covers recipients of old age assistance, blind and disabled persons allowances, and those persons covered by the old age security and old age assistance programs. I think the basic reason for this provision, or the basic explanation for it, is that some provinces have programs under which they provide health care to recipients of pensions or allowances on the basis of a means test and they now will require some time to shift the case load. This gives them that opportunity.

Mr. Knowles: So this is just a transitional provision. It is not a case of saying, for example, to old age security recipients that their health care services will not in the future be provided under this act unless they are needs-tested.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I think the assurance the hon. gentleman wants is given under this clause.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know that is an assurance I want because, as I interpret what the minister has said, the right to obtain health care services under the Canada Assistance Plan without needs being tested expires in 1967 and thereafter in order to get health care services under this act a needs test is necessary.

Mr. MacEachen: This is a transitional provision to give the provinces an opportunity to shift from current programs under which a means test prevails and under which health care may be provided. There are some programs of that kind. We are giving the provinces the opportunity for a full year to move under the Canada Assistance Plan and we will still pay back their claims for a full year. Beyond that date, in the absence of medicare insurance the people who require health services will receive it under this program.

Mr. Knowles: Then after this transitional period, and I am assuming that medicare will also come into effect, do I understand it correctly that persons in provinces participating in medical care programs will not receive health care services under the Canada Assistance Plan because they will get them under the health care program?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: However, persons in provinces which do not participate in the health care program will have their health care costs covered under the Canada Assistance Plan only if they meet the needs test?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad this is going to be covered but I wish that even in that case the needs test was not going to be applied.

Mr. Douglas: I should like to ask a follow-up question. What will happen in the provinces where either the provincial government or the municipality pays the premium for both medicare and hospital insurance on behalf of needy persons? Will they be able to collect any part of that payment from the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. MacEachen: No, they will not be able to claim in that regard.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister to explain the basis of the distinction? If a province does not have a medicare program and provides medicare for needy persons it will be able to charge half the cost, but if it pays the premium on behalf of needy persons why should it not be able to collect half of that cost?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government will share 50 per cent of the actual claims submitted by a provincial government in respect of any person in receipt of medical care coverage under the plan. We will do that on the basis of the actual claim, but it seems to me if we also engaged in paying the premiums for plans provinces may employ to support these individuals we would be sharing on a double basis.

Mr. Douglas: The medical care plan will at the very earliest come into effect on July 1, but from April 1 of this year the Canada Assistance Plan will be in operation. In those provinces which do not have a medicare program the federal government will be sharing in the costs of medical services to needy persons if the provincial government or municipality is supplying that service.

In provinces like Saskatchewan which has a medicare program the provincial government pays the premiums in some classifications such as old age assistance recipients, old age security pensioners, individuals receiving mothers' allowances, blind persons and physically handicapped persons. In the case of unemployable persons under social aid the municipality pays the premium. For this year, until the federal government is participating in a medicare plan, is there any reason why a province such as Saskatchewan should not be able to recover part of the cost of the premiums paid on behalf of needy persons?

Mr. MacEachen: Under the Canada Assistance Plan we will pay half the costs incurred by persons in Saskatchewan in respect of those persons for whom claims are submitted.

Mr. Lachance: I have a supplementary question to that asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers. Will the minister tell the committee whether or not this will be the case in provinces which adopt the plan either before or after the commencement of operations of the plan before us?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan are subject, under clause 19, to the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. For this reason we have included the explanatory note which reads:

> The purpose of this clause is to permit a province that has entered into a supplementary agreement under the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act wholly to administer and finance its program of assistance and welfare services operated in accordance with the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Provisions to be included in agreements.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions I should like to ask the minister on clause 6 with specific reference to subclauses 1(a) and (c). Reference is made in (c) to:

> —any home for special care or any provincially approved agency that is listed in a schedule to an agreement—

There is a cross-reference as I understand it in subclause 1(a) to interpretation subclause (d) which describes a home for special care. It states:

> —"home for special care" means a residential welfare institution that is of a kind prescribed for the purpose of this act as a home for special care . . . . but does not include—

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry for intervening. Could not the house be asked to adjourn the debate for half an hour so as to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to have a good lunch?

[English]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in reference to the point of order and while the hon. member is having his lunch, may I ask a question in respect of clause 6?

Mr. Tardif: This is all part of the filibuster anyway.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I seriously object to that kind of interjection from the opposite side.

An hon. Member: You may object but it is the truth.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: I hope the usually congenial member who made the interjection will not provoke me into indulging in the kind of thing of which he has accused me. I consider this to be an important piece of legislation for many people in this country, even if the hon. member does not think so. I believe it is important, not only to those of us in the house but to those who may be following the discussion of this plan in Hansard, to understand what it is all about.

The thing that concerns me in connection with the subclauses to which I have referred—I hope the minister has not lost track of the references because of the questions of privilege that have been raised—is just where we stand in respect of this question of the difference between a home for special care and a hospital. In the minds at least of a great many people to whom I talk there is difficulty in this regard. One gets into the area of semantics in deciding what is a hospital, what is a nursing home and what is a home for special care.

I know that certainly in the minds of a great many people in British Columbia there has been a good deal of confusion. I should like to have from the minister a clear picture of where the application of this bill lies and where the application of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act lies. With regard to the question of homes for special care as distinct from hospitals, I should like to know whether in point of fact there is in effect complete coverage in the two acts in respect of assistance in regard to the expenses of people who require special care, whether it be in a chronic care hospital or a home for special care.

We have in British Columbia, for example, the two types of institutions. There was a good deal of discussion during the last session of the legislature in my province as to the distinction between non-profit hospitals and private hospitals. The discussion concerned the question of providing care for people in these institutions. Usually they are aged and unable to look after themselves.

Many of these services are not covered under the British Columbia hospital insurance scheme and the cost falls directly on the individuals concerned except in so far as they are in receipt of social welfare. Could the minister make it clear whether it is possible for a province, either under this bill or the hospital insurance act, to provide hospital services, whether one calls them hospitals or talks about homes for special care? I have been told—I am not sure whether I am correctly informed and perhaps the minister could also clarify this point when he is replying—that certain types of institutions in the province of Ontario are covered by the hospital insurance plan but similar institutions are not covered by the British Columbia plan and that the federal legislation will allow them to be covered. I should like to know whether this is so and whether in the minister's view these two acts will provide complete coverage.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the first point, namely, the possible variation of institutions that may be covered from one province to another, this is a decision that must be made by the provincial government which decides whether institutions are regarded as hospitals under the hospital insurance act for which it wishes to make a submission under that act to the federal government. As I understand it, these institutions are listed and are well defined under the hospital insurance act as hospitals. We, of course, would not share in any services provided by the institutions in regard to which cost sharing already takes place under the hospital insurance act. We are ready, of course, to share in the cost of services provided in homes for special care. These homes will be listed in the regulations or schedules referred to, but they must be in all cases institutions and agencies approved by provincial governments.

To give the hon. member an idea of what is covered by the expression "homes for special care" I would refer to the Unemployment Assistance Act where in one section homes for special care are defined as including nursing homes, hostels for indigent transients, homes for the aged, poorhouses, almshouses and hostel facilities. We prefer to use the expression "homes for special care" without further definition. But in general, provided provincial acceptance is accorded, institutions would either be listed as hospitals and the costs shared under the hospital insurance plan or they would be listed in these schedules and the costs shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. There could be a larger area of applicability, but that would be a matter for determination by the provincial government.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect of this matter which I should like to have clarified. I should like to know what, if anything, will be done or will be required to be done under this bill in respect of reaching an agreement that is acceptable to the federal government to deal with the kind of situation where a person who might have an income or resources which would enable him to be self-sufficient would be freed of any requirement to exhaust his resources if he went into what the province of British Columbia at least has termed a private hospital, where care costs $300 or $400 and upwards per month. I should like to know what the situation will be if they are limited to a very small expense allowance of the order of, say, $10 a month.

Will the agreement require that the province, if the institution is not specified as a private hospital or is dealt with in such a way that it comes under the hospital insurance act, provide this kind of special care under an arrangement which does not involve an individual falling completely under welfare jurisdiction, and will there be any restriction in regard to the rights of the individual to his own resources? As it stands now, in British Columbia it is either totally one thing or totally another. In other words, an individual has to be completely dependent upon welfare assistance or individual assistance from his family or has to be completely independent of any payments. What impact will the terms of an agreement made under this legislation have on this situation?

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, in our agreements we will not insist upon the total liquidation of resources by any individual in order to be eligible for assistance. It is the practice in some cases in the application of the needs test to exclude home ownership. It is the practice also in some cases to permit the individual to hold in liquid form certain assets, say $1,000 or something of that kind. We do not preclude this situation in the bill and I do not think our regulations would preclude it.

Mr. Barnett: I have one other question. I understood the minister to say he would not preclude the possibility of an individual retaining some liquid resources. The point I want to get clearly in my mind is whether this legislation would preclude a province from entering into any agreement under which individuals would not be allowed to retain any liquid resources. Under such circumstances will the federal government agree to participate financially in a province with respect to special care homes?

Mr. MacEachen: We will not impose a regime on a province and to that extent the bill is silent or neutral. We will certainly make it possible in the agreement with the province that the approach can be taken, for example, that home ownership can be left out and a certain amount of liquid assets can be left out. In our consultations with the provinces we would point out that this practice is a good one and ought to be considered by the province. However, we cannot impose it upon any province.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have a question, Mr. Chairman, similar to the one raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I am sure the minister must know that many invalid and disabled people are being cared for in their own homes. I think of one example. One of my constituents who has worked steadily all his life came down some time ago with cancer of the lung, necessitating very serious surgery. He is now home, an invalid, but is precluded from drawing any disability pension by reason of the fact that his faithful wife is employed at a modest salary. The salary is sufficient to make this man ineligible for assistance. We have tried to get assistance for him to no avail.

[Mr. Barnett.]

I think the minister and his department have an opportunity to see that people in this category are looked after. I note that clause 6 of the bill refers to homes for special care. Would not a private home in which a disabled person was cared for by his family under adverse financial circumstances qualify as a home for special care just as any nursing home, rest home or hospital? I want to impress upon the minister the importance of this seemingly insignificant example because I know there must be thousands of people across Canada who are in that predicament. I feel we have an opportunity now under the Canada Assistance Plan to alleviate the hardships to which they are subjected.

Mr. MacEachen: In reply to the question raised, Mr. Chairman, may I say that one of the new features embodied in the Canada Assistance Plan is the provision of homemaker service. A provincial government can provide homemaker service directly or purchase it from a voluntary agency. If the agency is approved by the province, we will contribute 50 per cent of the cost of providing homemaker service, which would be available to the individual in question if the cost of that service were such as to bring him within the scope of the bill, namely, that he is in need and requires assistance. This is another feature of the plan which meets the problem of looking after people in their own homes, which we ought to try to do if possible, I think, because it is more economical and at the same time brings more satisfaction to the individual.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I thank the minister for his remarks and his explanation. Will the minister assure me and the house that in dealing with the provincial authorities across the country he will say to them, these are the people we want to help? Can we be assured of that?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, indeed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Prittie: I should like to ask a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox. In the case the hon. member cited the wife was working. If she gave up her employment could she receive some financial assistance for staying at home and looking after her invalid husband? It is income that is lacking in this situation. Would the provisions of this bill permit her to receive income if she left the employment she has now?

Mr. MacEachen: The Canada Assistance Plan does not propose that payments will be made for services except in so far as those services are provided to a person in need through a provincial welfare department or through a provincially approved agency. While I appreciate the point made by the hon. member, I think he should appreciate the difficulty and the potential abuse with two individuals living in a particular residence and one of them being eligible for salary with respect to the other. The homemaker service will be available to look after people through either of the two avenues mentioned. If both of these persons were in need under the terms of the bill, then they would be eligible. I do not think we anticipate that a person should stop working to look after an individual and be paid for that service unless there were some supervision through a welfare or voluntary agency or a provincial welfare department.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to ask a supplementary question. As I understand the Canada Assistance Act, the man would qualify for a disability pension in this particular case. The second question is: Would that money be included with his wife's income for taxation purposes?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, my answer to that question would be no. I cannot possibly see how payments made to a person in need could be regarded as income of a spouse. I would think that if both individuals in the household were applying for assistance, the total needs, and also the total income, would be taken into account to determine the amount of assistance to be made available. But, as I say, I cannot see how public assistance payments made to one spouse could be taxable with respect to the income of the other.

Mr. Rynard: I think the minister had better look into this because it is a very important point. With war veterans allowance, for instance, any earnings of the wife are immediately deducted from the husband's income in arriving at their taxable income.

Mr. MacEachen: I would be glad to check into that.

Mr. Douglas: I wonder whether I might ask the minister to clarify one point. Subclause (f) of clause 6 provides for an audit by the minister or by someone designated by him of the records and accounts respecting the provision of assistance and welfare services and leaves it to either the agreement or the regulations to set out the terms and conditions of such audit.

Am I correct in assuming that this audit is purely for the purpose of ascertaining that the amounts claimed by the province have indeed been spent on welfare assistance or services? Do I take it that there will be nothing in the regulations which will attempt to set ceilings or define in arithmetical terms any maximum which may be paid? In other words, I take it that the question of defining need will be left exclusively to those officials of the provincial governments who are responsible for welfare in that jurisdiction. I have in mind, for example, the old age assistance plan which at the present time is a shared program between the federal and provincial government under which payments are made from age 65 to 69 now and formerly up to age 70. I take it that any provincial government that wants to do so under the Canada Assistance Plan will be entitled to raise the pension of the old age assistance group to any amount it thinks necessary and that it will be able to collect 50 per cent from the federal government under this legislation. I take it there will be nothing in the audit which would set any maximum as to what the provinces could pay, and with regard to their collecting 50 per cent of that payment from the federal government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the answer to the first question is that the purpose is solely to maintain interest along the lines mentioned, as has been the past practice. There would be no effort made to set ceilings. A provincial government can provide additional amounts to recipients of old age assistance either by transferring their case load from old age assistance to the general case load under the Canada Assistance Plan or, indeed, by providing direct supplementation under the concurrent program.

Mr. Douglas: To whatever figure the provincial government feels it is prepared to share?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—Duration of agreements.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would make a comment or two on clause 8, which deals with the time during which agreements made between Canada and the provinces remain in effect. I realize that there is a constitutional problem involved when we discuss agreements between the federal government and a province. There is the whole problem of the sovereignty of parliament and the legislatures. At the same time, I am concerned over what seems to me to be a rather short period of permanence.

Let me agree with the minister that we are passing pretty good legislation. Yet the length of an agreement might be for a total of only four years. As I read this clause, any time after March 31, 1969 notice can be given by the federal government to terminate an agreement. It could be given by a province as well, but I am looking at the question from the point of view of the federal government. It takes only one year for such notice to come into effect. It seems to give a guarantee to these agreements of a period of only four years. What comment has the minister to make on this point?

Mr. MacEachen: Clause 8 sets out the term of the agreement and according to subclause (1) the agreements are to continue in force so long as the provincial law remains in operation. That means that if the law of a province providing welfare assistance lapses or ceases to be in force, the agreement ends.

Subclause (2) establishes the conditions for amending or terminating agreements. Under paragraph (a) an agreement may be amended or terminated at any time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, by mutual consent of the minister and the province. That seems to me to be reasonable.

An exception to this is made in paragraph (b), which says that any schedule to an agreement may be amended at any time by mutual consent of the minister and the province. Paragraph (c) permits a province to give notice of intention to terminate an agreement at any time, with the notice taking effect not less than one year after the date on which it is given. If a province wishes to end an agreement and gives one year's notice, it seems to me it is reasonable that it should have the opportunity to end the agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Let us go on to (d) and assume that a province does not want to end the agreement. It was (d) that I asked about in the first place.

Mr. MacEachen: We have made the term a period of four years. Is that not right?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MacEachen: Three years, with one year's notice. So we are giving the assurance that an agreement with a province will not be terminated before four years have elapsed. Paragraph (d) says:

> Canada may, at any time on or after the 31st day of March, 1969, give to the province notice of intention to terminate an agreement;—

Thus the agreements will presumably be in effect from April 1, 1966, and no notice may be given by the federal government before 1969, which is three years, and then there will be another year's notice. That shows to a province a pretty solid expectation that there is some stability in the arrangement.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not make my point to the minister as clear as I thought I had. We are agreed as to the facts, namely, that there is a certainty of four year. My suggestion was that if this legislation is as good as the minister says it is, and I agree with him as far as it goes, that this is not a long enough period for this sort of program really to get into full effect or for its benefits to be fully felt.

Mr. MacEachen: The assurance is given to the province, and when I say that I mean to any province, that the program will have a life of at least four years. This matter was discussed with the provinces and they took no objection to this period. If my hon. friend is afraid that at the end of four years the program may be terminated by the federal government, I would regard that contingency as highly unlikely unless good, alternative arrangements had been made with the provinces. I appreciate that in a period of four years the full potential effects of the program may not be visible or obvious. So far as I am concerned though, this arrangement seems to be reasonable.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to belabour the point but there is another factor that the minister has not mentioned. Not only will there be difficulty about the full effects of the program being apparent in four years, but I think the assurance of some degree of permanence is essential if the provinces are to come into this program in a wholehearted way.

Let us assume that a province wants to advance its welfare programs very significantly and that it does so with the assurance under this legislation that the federal government will pick up 50 per cent of the tab. If at the end of four years the Governor in Council can terminate the agreement into which the province and the federal government have entered, what will be the result? The result will be, I suggest, that the province will be left with the welfare programs to which it has committed itself with the additional responsibility of having to carry the entire financial load. I would think that if the provinces felt there was any danger that at the end of four years the whole responsibility with respect to programs which they would build up in this period would be landed in their laps, they would approach welfare programs with much more caution than if they could be assured that the plan was likely to be a continuing one.

If, as the minister says, the provinces have expressed no concern about this, then we shall have to accept the position of the provinces. I think the minister is aware that provincial governments are always reluctant to commit themselves to expenditures in conjunction with the federal government if they feel that at some time or other they may be left holding the bag.

We have had some experience of this. Some years ago we started a physical fitness program. The federal government suddenly decided to withdraw from it. The provinces had one of two alternatives, either drop the physical fitness program entirely or pick up that share of the cost which the federal government had dropped. The program I have referred to was not a very big one, and therefore it had nothing like the significance of the program about which we are now talking. Nevertheless, the fact must be considered that by the end of four years the federal government's contribution under this program will be very considerable. If the provinces felt that they were at all likely to be left with the entire burden of implementing the program outlined here, I think they would be very reluctant to expend moneys on the program at the rate that we all hope they will be expended.

Mr. MacEachen: I can only repeat, Mr. Chairman, two considerations for the benefit of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. First, the provinces raised no objection to the particular item he referred to. In that connection may I mention that under the Unemployment Assistance Act at present the federal government can end an agreement by giving one year's notice. That program involves more than half a million people and more than $100 million a year. Presumably the four-year term is much more favourable to the provinces than the term now available under the Unemployment Assistance Act. Presumably the provinces will be shifting their emphasis from the Unemployment Assistance Act to the Canada Assistance Plan.

Second the only real assurance of permanence in this program is that in any event the government is unlikely to take action to place a province in a more unfavourable position than it would have with respect to the Unemployment Assistance Act. What the hon. member fears will take place in this field is certainly, very remote, although I appreciate that strictly speaking the guarantee in law does not go beyond the four year period.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Regulations.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when we were on an earlier clause we were able to discuss some of the aspects of clause 9 because there was a cross-reference. I will not repeat any of that discussion. There are, however, two questions I should like to put to the minister about the making of regulations under this part of the legislation. My first question arises out of the well known fact—at least, it has been well known to members of parliament for many years—that in shared programs there is a fair amount of buck passing as to who is responsible for regulations.

Let us take the Old Age Assistance Act, or the Disabled Persons Act. When, in dealing with people, we run up against the regulations and complain to the provincial authorities about them the answer is:"These regulations were passed at Ottawa." when we draw this matter to the attention of the federal government in Ottawa, the federal government replies that the provinces agreed to the passing of the regulations in question. I cite what has gone on in the past merely as a basis for asking my question now.

On what basis are these regulations to be passed? Are they to be passed initially on the basis of agreements between the government and the provinces or is the wording of this clause, as is, to be followed, namely, that the federal cabinet will make the regulations? That is the first question.

My second question has to do with subclause (2). It is stated there that no regulation that has the effect of altering an agreement shall be effective without the consent of the province that is affected. May I ask if that subclause applies only to the altering of a regulation or does it apply to the making of a regulation in the first instance?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the point of view expressed by the hon. member. We have all met the problem he has referred to in replying to people who write to us about welfare cases and old age assistance. There is a tendency to pass the buck. I do not think that the passing of this bill will eliminate that tendency from human nature or even from governments.

Let me say what we intend to do, if and when parliament approves this bill, with respect to drawing up the regulations. We intend to have officials of the department go across the country and consult with the provincial governments with respect to draft regulations and to reconsider the matter following that consultation.

Ultimately of course the governor in council will have to pass the regulations and take responsibility. Subclause (2) places a limit on the effect which amendments by regulation may have. It provides that by regulation the governor in council shall not be in a position to alter an agreement with a province without the consent of the province. If I am not mistaken, it has been possible for a governor in council to change agreements by regulation without reference to the province. This says that no change in regulation can alter such an agreement without the consent of the provinces. This limitation is necessary because of the contractual nature of cost-sharing agreements. This provides greater flexibility in the administration of the act than has been possible under the categorical assistance acts in which the comparable clause reads:

> No regulation by reference to which an agreement with a province has been made shall be altered except with the consent of the province and in accordance with the regulations to which it had agreed.

Mr. Knowles: As I see it, the legal position is clear. Once an agreement is in effect the provincial authority is in a position to require that it give its consent before a change is made. As I say, it is clear that a province has the right to require that its consent be given to a change. But in the first instance, even though he admits the government may still pass the buck, the minister has told us that the ultimate responsibility for passing the regulations has to be taken by the federal government. This includes, in this legislation, the definition of the factors which go into the needs test. So it is clear that the operation of this legislation will depend very largely on the needs test, and that it is the federal government which will finally define the needs test. Is that right?

Mr. MacEachen: The federal government will be obligated to make regulations with respect to defining such expressions as personal requirements and budgetary requirements, which are part of the concept of the needs test.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does "budgetary requirements" mean?

Mr. MacEachen: There is a category of items known as basic requirements—food, clothing, shelter, fuel, utilities, household supplies and so on. Then there is the other range of services including health care, provision for travel where necessary—a whole range of services which go into a budget. It is expected that under the plan a budget can be developed which will meet the normal requirements of individuals.

Mr. Douglas: Will those requirements be set down by the federal government in the regulations?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, they are set down in the law.

Mr. Douglas: I understood from the minister earlier, when I asked him about the audit, that the concept of need would lie entirely with the province.

Mr. MacEachen: The determination of the amount will be up to the provincial government. As I mentioned the other day, there will have to be a degree of flexibility in the federal regulations which will make it possible for provincial governments to administer their own programs according to the needs of their people and their areas. There may be requirements in one area which do not exist in another. So there will be a range of personal requirements and further optional requirements the cost of which will be shared by the federal government. Then the province must select from the available range those services or items which it thinks are necessary for the adequate support of its own citizens.

Costs are bound to vary from one part of Canada to another. Rent, for instance, is bound to vary from region to region. We would not put in dollars the amount of rent we would support.

Mr. Douglas: Is it the minister's idea that the regulations will set a range within which the provincial governments might make provision, let us say, for food and clothing, and that the provinces must operate within that range? In other words, would there be a ceiling on how much would be paid in any particular case?

Mr. MacEachen: I am afraid I am not making myself clear. We shall require, as part of an agreement, that the province shall provide adequately for the basic requirements of individuals—food, clothing, shelter, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements. But the dollar value which is placed on these items either individually or in total is up to the province. We shall share any amount. Then, of course there is the other range of services in whose costs we shall share—items incidental to carrying on a trade, care in a home for special care, travel and transportation, health care services and so on.

Mr. Knowles: I think it should be clear that even though there is to be consultation, the ultimate responsibility for writing these regulations which will define the key elements of this legislation will belong to the federal government. The minister has admitted that the government will define "budgetary requirement" and so on. It will also define, under clause 9, anything which "by section 2 or this part is to be prescribed or defined by regulation".

I admit this has to be done. I admit that ultimate responsibility has to rest somewhere. I just hope there will not be the buck-passing with respect to this legislation that we have seen with respect to other measures of a similar kind. The minister has said that these definitions will ultimately be made by the federal government. He has said that while they are definitions, they are not dollar values. This applies to the elements of the needs test.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not take exception to that. We have to make regulations. But if they are not satisfactory to the provinces, they will not sign agreements with us.

Mr. Ricard: Are we likely to have as many agreements with the provinces under this legislation as there are provinces? In other words, would one set of regulations apply to one province, but not to the others?

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: They will be the same basic regulations. They will have to be the same set for all of Canada, and they will have to be within the framework of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can understand that the federal authority will have to set forth the basic classifications, but does this means that each province will define for itself which of these classfications it will assist, and to what extent each individual province will determine the share—if I might use that expression—in the various categories?

Mr. MacEachen: As a condition of an agreement, they must include willingness to meet the basic requirements of the individual. With respect to additional items, to take one example, say, health care services, a province may decide that it will provide those services to individuals in need. The province makes the decision and the federal government shares. There is that range of choice on items like travel and transportation, funerals and burials, and health care services, but the province undertakes to meet the basic requirements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That clarifies the matter to some extent, but in the determination of the food item does that food item bear a proportionate share to the total amount, the basic amount in each province, or can it vary from province to province?

Mr. MacEachen: It can certainly vary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So, there is no determination made as to the proportion each of these items shall bear to the whole?

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Indian Welfare; définitions.

Mr. Barnett: This and the following clauses come under Part II of the bill dealing with Indian welfare. I would draw attention to paragraph (b) where it says:

> "Indian to whom this part applies" . . . means an Indian
> (i) who is resident on a reserve in the province—

That is readily understandable; but I cannot get clear the meaning of subparagraph (ii) where it says:

> —who is resident on land in the province the legal title to which is vested in Her Majesty or on land in any territory in the province that is without municipal organization—

Does legal title of land vested in Her Majesty mean Her Majesty in right of Canada or Her Majesty in right of a province?

Mr. MacEachen: In this particular case it would be Her Majesty in right of a province.

Mr. Barnett: Then what is the significance of the phrase "on land in any territory in the province that is without municipal organization"?

Mr. MacEachen: This is intended to cover Indians who are living on crown land or on land without municipal organization. It covers groups of Indians who may have moved away from reserves, in areas such as Northern Ontario, and who have not yet established any effective link with a non-Indian community.

Mr. Barnett: What is the difference between the situation of those who have moved off a reserve into non-organized territory and those who have moved into municipally organized territory?

Mr. MacEachen: If Indians move into a municipality and live there, they become integrated within the population, and they receive welfare assistance on the terms applicable to every other resident. The whole purpose of part II of the bill is to provide a basis, through agreements, by which the federal government will participate in bringing normal welfare services to the Indian population. In other words this paragraph which defines "Indians" indicates a group for whom higher rates of contribution will be available under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Rynard: Where the federal government presently has a doctor appointed to look after Indians on a reserve, will this situation continue?

Mr. MacEachen: Any services provided by the federal government will be continued.

Mr. Rynard: On a reserve?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, until an agreement is reached with the province for it to provide the same services as are provided to other citizens, and only with the consent of the Indian band. Once agreements are effective with the provinces, the federal contribution will be adjusted to take account of whatever additional burdens the provinces may meet in providing services to the Indian population.

Mr. Nasserden: In that regard what did the minister mean when he said, "with the consent of the Indian band"?

Mr. MacEachen: I mean that the Indian band must agree. We had already signed an agreement with the province of Ontario, and at one point there was some misunderstanding with the Indian bands as to whether they had been consulted or had agreed. The matter was then held in abeyance and full consultation was entered into. Now the Indian bands have agreed, and we would want to follow that practice in every other province.

Mr. Douglas: Do I take it that if the federal government enters into agreements with the provinces to provide welfare services to Indians on reserves, it will be on a different sharing basis than the fifty-fifty basis which obtains generally throughout this legislation?

• (3:20 p.m.)

In view of the fact that the federal government now has sole responsibility for the Indians, if the provinces then take this over, I assume the federal government will be meeting the major part of the cost. Has the minister worked out any division of cost in an instance of that kind?

Mr. MacEachen: The transferring of administrative responsibility for the provision of welfare services has been discussed at various meetings with the provinces. A draft agreement which would give effect to what you have in mind has been discussed with all the provinces. This agreement was tabled in the House of Commons on January 19, 1966. Under the cost sharing formula set out in the draft agreement the provincial and federal governments would share the cost of assisting Indians under part II on a matching basis up to the per capita level of cost incurred for assisting the non-Indian population in the province. The federal government would assume the full responsibility for any cost of assisting Indians in excess of this per capita cost.

Under present circumstances this would have the result of making the federal contribution vary from approximately 85 per cent to 97 per cent of the cost, depending upon the level of dependency of Indians in each province. So the percentage of assistance will be very high. Presumably, as the effects of the Canada Assistance Plan are felt and dependency levels are reduced, our contribution in respect of Indians would be the same as for other members of the population, which would really reflect the full integration of the Indian population with the rest of the population.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I am entirely in support of integrating the welfare services for Indians with the general welfare programs in the provinces. I think this will remove unnecessary duplication and also will make for some uniformity, and will aid integration as people move off the reserves into other communities of the provinces. I am not clear, however, with regard to the minister's statement. I thought I understood him to say that up to the average that is being paid the federal and provincial governments will share the costs 50-50, and above that average the federal government will assume the full cost. Why would the provinces assume 50 per cent of the basic costs for a group of people who are the sole responsibility of the federal government at the present time?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, the provinces presumably, like the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, wish to see the Indians integrated, and the Indian population is a population resident within the boundaries of the province. That is the basic reason that Ontario, which already has taken this action, and others who have shown complete interest, would be willing to take the per capita level of cost applicable to the general population and match it with the federal government for the Indian population. Anything above that would be paid fully by the federal government, bringing it up to 87 or 97 per cent of the total cost which, it seems to me, indicates the high levels of dependency which exist among the Indian population.

Mr. Douglas: I do not wish to drag this out, because I think the minister ought to go and get something to eat or have a cup of coffee, since he has been engaged in this discussion for quite some time, but I do not understand the relationship between the 50-50 sharing and the minister saying that the federal government will be bearing 87 to 97 per cent of the total cost. Does he mean that the amount paid above the average paid in respect of the general population could bring the federal government's contribution up to 87 or 97 per cent?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes; that is what I was trying to point out. It shows really the high cost of providing the services to the Indian population, in comparison to the cost in respect of the average citizen. It reveals something about conditions.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to ask the minister whether he can tell us how many Indian bands in the province of Ontario have signed an agreement to go along with the province. I am wondering what roughly is the proportion; is it half or three-quarters? I do not want the exact number.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I must admit that I do not have the detailed information. I will obtain it and give it to my hon. friend later.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to relate back to the questions asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. This has to do more or less with the definition of an Indian. In subclause (b) (iii) of clause 10 it says it does not include an Indian who is designated in or under an agreement, and so on. What kind of an Indian is that and why is there the exclusion?

Mr. MacEachen: The purpose of this paragraph is to provide for situations which we may not foresee at the moment, but which occur. This is a discretionary clause under which it would be possible to cover any possible situation which may be encountered. Among these will be situations where Indians live as squatters on the fringes of organized municipalities but who have not become part of the community in an economic or social sense. In general such a group does not own property or engage in regular employment, and therefore the communities in which they live are reluctant to make any contribution. This is an effort to meet that situation.

Mr. Pugh: Would they not be classified as residents, just on the broad definition of a resident, for instance in the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MacEachen: No. This is a special part to deal with Indians. Accordingly we have to cover the concept as fully as we can, because special sharing arrangements are anticipated for Indians. This is the reason some effort is made to make the definition as clear as possible in order to meet every conceivable situation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I think I understood the explanation given by the minister in respect of the cost formula. If I understood him correctly, the fact that the federal contribution will be a very high proportion of the total is a reflection of the higher incidence of welfare situations in the Indian population in comparison to the incidence in the non-Indian population within the provinces. Is that a correct understanding of what the minister was saying?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes; that is the conclusion I would draw from the result that would obtain from undertaking to pay the full cost of amounts in excess of the per capita provincial cost of providing services.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in this connection I am wondering whether the minister has a breakdown in respect of the incidence or ratio in the Indian population for each of the provinces. I am not necessarily asking the minister to give those figures to the committee now, but perhaps that information could be supplied.

Mr. MacEachen: We have that information available and if I cannot give it now I will certainly provide it later.

Mr. Barnett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the minister understands the point of my question. We should like to have the picture as it applies to each province.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question regarding this part, dealing with Indian welfare. Is there any special provision made in this measure or in any agreement with the province of Ontario dealing with non-treaty Indians, those not on reserves and without Indian status who have very little contact with communities or province of Ontario welfare offices?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is provision for this particular category of Indian, and I refer to subclause (b) paragraph (iii). This provision would cover the cases to which the hon. member has referred. We are making an effort to meet the problems of Indians who are not integrated, in residence in a municipality, on crown lands or on a reserve.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11, 12 and 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—Definitions; "work activity project".

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I should like to question the minister about part III, clause 14 respecting work activity projects. Can the minister give us some idea of the scope and type of activities that are envisaged and the groups that will be included?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, part III, work activity projects, provides a basis for future contributions toward projects designed to provide work orientated activities for persons who are not able to take advantage of normal employment, vocational training or rehabilitation opportunities. This type of program has been requested by several provinces which feel that a new factor is required in their programs.

Under clause 14 (a) projects are defined in terms of the purposes for which they are to be set up. Their objective will be to prepare for entry or return to employment persons who, because of environmental, personal or family reasons, have unusual difficulty in obtaining or holding employment, or taking advantage of training or rehabilitation programs. Many of those involved will be persons who have a history of chronic dependency because of a variety of problems which, it is felt, can best be dealt with under a welfare system.

It should be emphasized that a significant distinction of a work activity project is that it is a social service relating to trade or work, so that a participant and his family will receive counsel and support in order that the family will be strengthened by assistance to the head of the family whose employability is a difficulty. In essence, the purpose of this project is to provide appropriate training and work activity for persons who can take advantage, and whose dependency may be decreased or whose employability may be enhanced. This is an experiment and involves new territory.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have in mind one or two specific categories. I have received a great many letters from women who are either unmarried, divorced or widowed who have reached their middle fifties. They are too young to qualify for old age assistance or old age security pensions, but too elderly to find employment readily and, in most cases, have not had the training required in order to qualify for jobs that are more plentiful today. They are too elderly in most cases to undertake the heavy work required of waitresses and others employed in heavy service occupations. Does the minister envisage projects of this kind, both in the nature of training and occupation? What sort of projects are envisaged for people of this type?

Mr. MacEachen: Some of the cases mentioned by the hon. member may involve special training or placement efforts, and this can be provided through other programs. The real purpose of this provision is to support work activity projects which will enable persons to enhance their employability. It applies not only to those persons but to projects which are designed for individuals such as the severely retarded, whose limited employment potential can be enhanced if they are given some form of meaningful activity.

It is envisaged that this type of activity for the severely retarded will be given under conditions of sheltered employment, so there is that aspect to the plan. An example of one kind of work project can be found in the re-establishment centres operated by the national assistance programs in Britain. In the main, the types of persons referred to these centres are those receiving assistance, who have been continuously unemployed for a long time—in some cases a year or more—and those who have in consequence lost the habit of work and have become unaccustomed to the ordinary daily routine which is the pattern of the life of a man or woman in regular employment.

In the United States a program similar to this envisaged under the work activity projects takes the form of community work training programs under the social security act, and work experience programs under the income opportunities act. In both cases the programs are operated on a federal-state basis and administered by the department of health, education and welfare. In the United States over $100 million is being expended this year for this kind of program. Canada is now moving into this field by the provisions in this part of the bill.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Does the minister envisage a kind of program in which The Company of Young Canadians might take a large part?

Mr. MacEachen: At the moment I cannot foresee how The Company of Young Canadians could be involved. These are provincially initiated programs and it will be up to the provinces to decide whose assistance they wish.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): This program could be used to help elderly people who are unemployed and without skills to obtain necessary employment before retirement age?

Mr. MacEachen: Where there is a reasonable chance of increasing the employability of an individual, I think this program would have a role.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, in regard to those individuals referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, both men and women. I should like to know whether this program will assist individuals to quit jobs and become retrained? I am thinking particularly of persons who obtained jobs in the labour market following the end of hostilities in the second world war, and who now wish to train for employment which will give them higher salaries.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: This would be the kind of person we ought to assist. I think the best place to do so would be in our vocational training or vocational rehabilitation program, because I believe this clause is intended to cover a person whose work experience may not be as great as the example given.

Mr. Nasserden: I have been told by some people that it is very difficult to secure training under the vocational training program if you are employed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, this brings us into another area of consideration, namely what programs are in existence for the training of the employed. There are various programs for employed persons that involve joint federal-provincial participation. Of course the training allowances that have been enacted by the parliament of Canada will make it even more possible for unemployed persons to gain good training, with very substantial assistance.

Mr. Nasserden: I appreciate what the minister has said, but the person I am thinking about at the moment is someone in a salary range that does not give him what today is considered a decent standard of living, who is employed and would like to secure further training. Will this or any other plan of the government enable such a man to take training and receive assistance while taking it?

Mr. MacEachen: This part is not intended to cover the person the hon. member has in mind.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen moved the third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to hold up this matter in any way; I know how anxious the minister is to make a statement regarding the government's plans and proposals in connection with the old people of this country. We are now on third reading of the bill dealing with the Canada Assistance Plan. The opportunity is now available to the minister to make the statement which has been promised over and over again, and as often postponed.

We look forward, now that discussion on the Canada Assistance Plan bill is drawing to a close, to the minister's producing his blueprint so long promised, in connection with the wider field of rights and privileges for the older people of this country. In fact, it was promised as far back as the election campaign, and as long delayed. I am sure the minister this afternoon will have every opportunity to make his statement, and I would suggest to him that he should not again postpone it.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I asked certain questions today based upon information that was not without foundation. I said that discussions had taken place among members of the administration; and out of those discussions had evolved a plan whereby assistance would be provided to the old people of this country whose income is less than $1,260 a year, the difference to be made up by the state and to be financed by a capital gains tax. My information is that this is the basis upon which agreement was secured among hon. gentlemen opposite.

I know that Canadians as a whole will not want to see this question delayed any further.

There is no reason why the older people in need in this country should have to wait until Monday. What a wonderful opportunity the minister now has to stand in his place, at the conclusion of discussion on this bill, open up this box of secrecy and let the people of Canada know what is going to take place. Why leave these older Canadians in a state of suspended animation, hoping for the best and fearing the worst?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party may I say at this point that, as we said at earlier stages with respect to this legislation, we welcome this bill and are glad to vote for it. As we made clear at the earlier stages of debate, we see in this legislation provisions that improve the administration of social welfare in Canada. We have spelled that out in some detail, so that it is not necessary to do so on third reading.

However, it is still our view that it was a bitter disappointment that when this legislation was brought in it failed to meet the hopes which the minister and other members of the government had held out to our older people for over a year, indeed for 14 months. We have been told for a long time that the Canada Assistance Plan was legislation under which, amongst other things, there would be improvements with respect to the pensions of our retired Canadians. It turned out that there was no such provision in this legislation, and we have drawn attention to that fact as forcefully and as energetically as we could.

I think it would be appropriate to say that this is another example of the value of parliamentary debate. During the course of it, it is quite obvious that the government has got the message and has come to the realization that it cannot leave our old age security recipients relying on the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan for increased pension income. It is obvious that the government has come to the realization that it has to do something else. That is why we debated this measure as we did.

I think it was a shameful performance for the people of this country to be led for three or four days to believe that the minister would make a statement on this matter at the end of second reading, a statement which he then refused to make. But that is now part of history. What is significant today is that the minister has assured the house and the country that before this session recesses a statement by the government will be made in the house telling us what the government's plans are with respect to old age security recipients. He not only gave that assurance on orders of the day this morning but he alluded to it half a dozen times when we were in committee of the whole today.

It now being clear that there is a statement with respect to old age security which the government is going to make, and it now being clear that this legislation is just about passed and will soon be approved by the House of Commons, it seems to me that the appeal just made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is one to which the minister ought to respond. He disappointed the older people of Canada when he did not make a statement last Tuesday. I think it would be compounding that disappointment to say now that they must wait until Monday.

Here is an excellent opportunity, I suggest, on third reading of this bill for him to make the statement. I suggest to him that, if he feels there is some procedural reason that he should not do it on third reading of this bill, immediately this bill has been approved we understand the next item of business will be consideration of interim supply. At that point the bill will have gone through all the stages of debate in this House of Commons. It will have met all the conditions he has laid down and has added to as the days have gone by.

I suggest if he is not prepared to make his important statement during the third reading debate, he should be prepared to do it while we are discussing interim supply and before the debate on interim supply is concluded. We are glad to join with the government and other members of the house in supporting this legislation for what is in it. We regret that it did not have in it what must be done for our old age security recipients. We are glad the debate has resulted in the government's being prepared to make the statement, and we urge that the statement be made now.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I want to say is to express my appreciation to the members of the house for the manner in which they have discussed and dealt with the Canada Assistance Plan. I appreciate the extent of the debate and the sincerity of the motives of all hon. members who have participated in the debate at the various stages of the bill, especially the renewed appeal that has been made this afternoon by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) with respect to a further statement affecting the older citizens of Canada.

I had been asked several questions earlier today and finally, on the advice given to me by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam who associated himself with the Leader of the Opposition and others, I agreed to make a statement before the end of the session. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said it was a matter of indifference—these are not his exact words—where or when the statement was made, as long as it was made in the house and before the end of the session.

Mr. Lewis: Before the summer recess, he said—not the end of the session.

Mr. MacEachen: I accept the correction—before the summer recess. I feel that is a reasonable attitude to take, and I undertook to make this statement in the house before the summer recess. I can only conclude by saying it is a matter of deep regret to me that I am unable to respond positively to the seductive appeal made to me by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

(a) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, not otherwise provided for, except Finance Item 15 for which the proportion is three-twelfths, and Transport Item 103 and Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40 for which no proportion is granted—$1,252,481,028.67;

(b) an additional four-twelfths of the total amounts of Dominion Bureau of Statistics Item 10, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L75 and L80 (Schedule A) of the said Main Estimates—$4,299,-333.83;

(c) an additional three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 15 and 70 (Schedule B) of the said Main Estimates—$1,902,250.00;

(d) an additional two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 55 and 75, Secretary of State Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L30 and L95 (Schedule C) of the said Main Estimates—$25,681,300.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Items 5 and 55, Finance Item 10, Fisheries Item 10, Justice Item 1, Mines and Technical Surveys Items 20, 25, 35, 45, 60, 80, 85, National Film Board Item 1, Northern Affairs and National Resources Item 15 and Transport Item 5 (Schedule D) of the said Main Estimates—$16,293,229.17;

(f) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates A for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$193,924,378.08;

(g) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Item 35a, Defence Production Item 20a, Finance Item 4a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40a, Transport Items 102a and 103a (Schedule E) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$5,709,522.67;

(h) two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Finance Item 15a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 75a, and National Research Council, including the Medical Research Council, Item 10a, (Schedule F) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$8,459,333.34;

(i) one-twelfth of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40a (Schedule G) of the said Supplementary Estimates —$966,666.67;

(j) seven-twelfths of the total of all the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates B for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$103,265,750.00;

(k) four-twelfths of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L32b (Schedule H) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$50,000,000.00, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, without exhausting my right to speak, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would now place before the committee and the country a general summary of the present position regarding Viet Nam, so that we may discuss that matter through the opportunity provided us by supply? I was not very successful in my appeal to the minister who has just sat down, but knowing the desire at all times of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to furnish the house with the information he has, I ask him to place before us something of the facts, unhampered by generalities and uninhibited by any consideration except the security of the state.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I understood, Mr. Chairman, that hon. gentlemen wished to make some statements on the Viet Nam problem and I thought I would give them the opportunity of doing so before participating myself in the debate. What I might say might be based on their comments. I know the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, as well as the Leader of the Opposition, wish to say something.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I endeavoured to secure a statement from the minister and was as successful as we usually are in having answers from the minister in the chamber on a matter that is causing ever increasing concern in all parts of the world. We have no idea, nor has any information except of a general nature, been given to the people of Canada relating to the stand of the government in connection with this matter. Escalation has taken place within the last few days. The minister has indicated that the government regrets the expansion into the areas being bombed. But, further than that, we do not know what is the stand of the government of Canada. The government sent a messenger on two occasions in the person of a well trained Canadian diplomat, Mr. Ronning, to Hanoi. The second visit was made known to the Canadian people only through references in the United States press.

• (4:00 p.m.)

What is Canada's position? Certainly to listen to the minister expound generalities on this problem one would conclude that Canada's position is neutralist in consequence of membership on the truce commission. What has been the value of the journeys to Hanoi? What reaction has there been? Is there any suggestion by the government that the enunciation by the Prime Minister of a few months ago, demanding a pause in the bombings, is still an integral portion of Canada's policy?

These are matters which we have a right to know. We are getting back more and more to the days of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, who believed that information on external affairs was the monopoly of the Prime Minister, who was at the same time the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What attitude are we taking? I do not come before the house to suggest that the United States should withdraw from South Viet Nam, that it should get out, as is demanded by certain groups of individuals. Were it to do so, the result would be the overrunning not only of Southeast Asia but of other countries as well.

Where does the government stand, Mr. Chairman, outside of generalities? We recall very well that during the campaign for the presidency of the United States, the proponents were divided into the classifications of doves and hawks. Mr. Goldwater belonged to the latter classification, the President to the former.

However, in the intervening months the stand taken by President Johnson to all intents and purposes seems to have taken on the same considerations incident to, and part of, the policies advocated by Senator Goldwater. What knowledge did Canada have prior to June 29, when the President extended bombing to strike at the industrial and oil storage areas of Hanoi and at the port of Haiphong? What information was given to Canada in this regard?

Certainly the decision to take that course was a new initiative. It implied the adoption of a hard line by the administration of the United States. The result has been that fear has touched the hearts of men everywhere. No longer is there any question that what is taking place is the waging of a war. What has been the reaction of the Soviet and Chinese communist leaders? Up to the present it has been described as cautious. For how long will that attitude be maintained by the communist countries?

The United States is pouring out its gold and its blood on behalf of the maintenance of freedom for us all. Will this new phase bring about an alteration in the powers of resistance of North Viet Nam, or will it have the result of uniting the communist nation, alienating the friends of the United States in all parts of the world, and finally bringing about a challenge to world peace? We have a right to know where the government of Canada stands. We have a right to suggest that the concealment of Canada's position behind a barrage of words is not an answer to the Canadian people.

In the latter part of June the Secretary General of the United Nations set forth certain basic principles as being appropriate to a peaceful settlement. The first was the cessation of bombing in North Viet Nam. His suggestion in that regard was met by intensification and an expansion.

The second was the scaling down of action in South Viet Nam. His expressed hopes that this might be done had been answered by the North Vietnamese by an ecceleration of infiltration into South Viet Nam.

The third point was that there should be inclusion in the talks that will take place of all who are actually fighting there, meaning that the Viet Cong should have representation at any conference. The last of these three points seems to be a reasonable one, a necessary one, one that should be generally acceptable.

I realize how terrible is the problem, as do we all. But surely we are entitled to information that is provided by United States and British newspapers every day of the week. We are denied information in this house that they provide in their news columns. The London Times and the New York Times provide more information than this house is able at any time to pry from the government. That is why, instead of giving us generalities, I suggest that the minister place before the house and the country something of the plans, something of the ideas, something of the initiative of Canada.

Much has been made of the fact that we have sent Ambassador Ronning, on two occasions. Strangely enough, the impact of this did not result in more than two or three lines in any of the world's newspapers.

A few days ago one of the great leaders of democracy in the western world spoke in the House of Lords. He is a man who in the darkest days of the 1930's saw the message and meaning and dangers of Hitlerism. When he was unable to arouse the British people or the government to which he belonged, he resigned. Ill health struck him when he became prime minister. In 1956 he followed a course in Egypt that brought about his withdrawal from the House of Commons. But Anthony Eden still remains as one of the world's great men, in my belief, the most knowledgeable now in the western world on international affairs. He too is concerned. He wonders. He asks, how far can the United States continue to expand its bombing attacks without ultimately touching that point beyond which acquiescence will be translated into active antagonism, by communist China and the U.S.S.R?

The report I have is a press report, and I am going to quote from what he said. He spoke to a crowded House of Lords that realized that with his vast experience, his fears would not be unfounded. He said among other things, that he was not convinced communist China was set upon the conquest of Southeast Asia; and then proceeded to say:

> There are other possible explanations for the very dangerous tensions which now dominate Southeast Asia.

That is the speech delivered on Wednesday, as I said some moments ago, at Westminster, in the House of Lords:

> It is conceivable that the Chinese are as convinced that the United States intend their destruction as the Americans are convinced of Chinese long-range ambitions. One of these convictions we know to be wrong. The other might have a margin of error—

But if military victory cannot provide the full answer for either—and it cannot—a neutralized area might be acceptable to both. I do not believe there is any other way out.

I suggest there is a great deal of wisdom in this suggestion made by the Earl of Avon.

Canada is a member of the commission of three. Canada is unable, of course, to bring about the reconvening of the Geneva conference. What is Canada's attitude? Does it believe that there is any possibility of success being attained for the advocacy and concept of Viet Nam as a neutralized area?

Certainly, the expansion of bombings, however effective it may be militarily, cannot break the spirit of the people. Indeed, nothing brought about that comradeship of standing together more than did those bombings of London during 1940 when the British people were virtually unarmed and when we within the Commonwealth were alone.

What possible victory can come from bombing the gasoline tanks? When the United States originally went into this area, it was for the purpose of assuring the preservation of the line drawn between north and south. The numbers in the armed forces of the United States have been greatly increased, and will be brought to 400,000 within a very few months. Is there not something that Canada can do openly—not clandestinely—but openly and dramatically?

I believe that were we, in this nation, to press toward a neutralized zone in the areas of South Viet Nam and the other areas directly affected, we might be able to bring about at least a degree of potential agreement that might ultimately lead toward the conference table.

I am not critical of the minister for what he has done, whatever it may have been. But I am critical of the fact that on every occasion when we have asked for information, what we have been given is a monologue of uncertainty clothed in magnificent language. I ask the minister, will he not do what is being done in the other capitals of the western world: place before the Canadian people something of the ideas that he has in mind, so that the world will know that Canada at this time has not only the desire which the minister possesses, but has something to present as well. It is all very well to talk about secrecy and, to say: "We must be very careful lest plans get out". Why? When Eden presented a plan, which, after close examination appears to have possibilities, he was not afraid.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I have brushed aside the easy solutions advocated by the New Democratic Party. Strangely enough, their solutions are not the solutions of Prime Minister Wilson. He, although the head of a socialist government in office, has been far removed from the plans advocated by members of the socialist party in this house. The plans which have been placed before parliament by hon. members to my left from the New Democratic Party are, in general, and I say this not by way of criticism—those of the left wing of the Labour party in the United Kingdom—ideas which have been disowned, excoriated, condemned and cast aside by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

This is not an easy matter. I am deeply concerned about the events of the last few days. So that there may be no mistake as to what I mean, I refer to the intensification and expansion of bombing. But we do ourselves injustice as a nation if, having those ideas, we proceed to wide condemnation of the United States and its policies. I disagree strongly with the latest initiative. I find it difficult to understand how, in the light of the experience of history, a nation can believe that however powerful its bombing capacity may be, it can destroy the fortitude and determination of a people. I think Canada should make it abundantly clear to the United States that this is the view of Canadians as a whole regarding this recent venture into extended bombing. Taking this stand however, we should not, as a nation, with the freedom of all mankind dependent on the United States and its forces, engage in the easy course of condemning without offering an effective alternative.

I ask the minister this: Will he not, when he speaks, give Canada and Canadians some hope? The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom is going to the U.S.S.R. in a few days. A week from now he will be there. Will he carry a message not only from the United Kingdom but from other parts of the Commonwealth?

I have some knowledge of the reaction of the U.S.S.R. to anything in the nature of a conciliatory attitude. We had an example of this very recently at a dinner given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in honour of the parliamentary delegation from the Soviet Union. The Deputy Premier spoke out in a way which could not but be a contravention of accepted protocol. What he said has been said over and over again, it represents nothing new. At the same time, I say publicly, now, what I have said personally to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the manner in which he replied that evening in circumstances which were difficult and trying, was most worthy and deserving of the highest commendation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The stand he took was clear and definite while at the same time polite and considerate. There was no multiplicity of words to hide the meaning he wished to convey. He spoke in a way which left no doubt as to where Canada stood. I thought that evening that if he would follow the same course in the House of Commons he would indeed earn for himself the highest of encomiums. I hope the stand he took that evening represents a new venture for him, a course of action which will enable him to tell us in short, terse and clearly interpretable language what Canada stands for in terms of the situation in Southeast Asia.

It is very frightening. It fills one with apprehension. History proves that however powerful a nation may be it cannot, in its dealings with other nations, throw the dice and always be sure it will come up with a winning combination. That is what I am concerned about. The latest venture has that kind of attitude about it in the field of international affairs. It is a dangerous game to play.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I want to assure my right hon. friend that there has not been, and will not be, any concealment of Canada's position with regard to this matter, but in my official capacity I have to determine, together with my colleagues, the circumstances and the occasions when we, too can enjoy the same freedom of exposition which rests with those who do not have the immediate responsbility of deciding the course that Canada must take in this or any other international matter.

I have examined the debate in the British House of Commons. I have read carefully what the Prime Minister of Britain said yesterday, and what Lord Home said yesterday, and I suggest to hon. members that there has not been, in any free parliament that I know of, more questions answered about this particular problem. While hon. gentlemen may complain about the generality of some responses, I suggest if they will examine the responses made by other foreign ministers they will find that Canada has been as forthcoming as she has a right and a responsibility to be at this time in regard to a matter, which the right hon. gentleman said, is one that gives him great concern, as it does all of us.

Of course I am aware that there is widespread concern here, and among Canadians generally, about the most recent course of developments in Viet Nam. The right hon. gentleman spoke of the speech made the other day by Lord Avon, the former British Foreign Secretary. Lord Avon was not referring to the current situation in Viet Nam. He was dealing with what he thought would be a desirable ultimate solution, a solution not unlike the proposition which the prime minister and I have put forward on two occasions, once in the house and once in the external affairs committee, as to what the ultimate disposition might be of this problem.

But we are addressing ourselves today not to what is going to happen when the conflict is over, but to how we are going to bring this conflict to an end, and to what we can do to realize this objective, and to what our view is about what is alleged to be a recent escalation in the pattern of war carried on by the United States against North Viet Nam.

Let there be no doubt we are all concerned about this problem. On a number of occasions the government has expressed its reservations with regard to the bombing of North Viet Nam and about the whole sequence of events which led the United States to the conclusion that it had no option but to adopt this course. I made my views known before the recent bombings took place, and in a manner which I believe was the most effective way to engage in consultations with a country with which Canada has such close ties.

One could be dramatic. One could engage in particular public postures that might bring acclaim, but I want to say that as long as I am Secretary of State for External Affairs, and certainly with regard to this situation, I am going to carry on in the way which I believe will most likely yield favourable results, rather than seek acclaim by some public position that is not capable of yielding a satisfactory solution.

The Prime Minister made clear on June 29 that we would be glad to see the bombing stopped, that we would be glad to see the infiltration of North Vietnamese troops into South Viet Nam stopped, and that we would be glad to see unconditional negotiations for peace started. This has always been our position. We urged a ceasefire before the President of the United States said he was prepared to enter into peace talks without any preconditions. When we now urge a ceasefire we must take into account some of the implications which were mentioned yesterday by Mr. Wilson. We could have talks if the parties were so disposed, without waiting for a ceasefire, and these talks in turn might lead to a ceasefire.

I think it important that we understand fully the implications of the action which has now been taken to bomb the oil storage facilities in North Viet Nam. I do not think we can limit our analysis merely to the military aspects of this operation. I propose to go beyond these aspects, to go into other implications which seem to me essential to a full appreciation of the present situation.

So far as the strictly military aspects are concerned, it can be argued that the general pattern of activity has not been significantly altered by the bombing of the oil storage facilities of North Viet Nam. On the understanding that has been communicated to me, it is not the intention of the United States government to extend the bombing to targets which are not directly related to the infiltration of men and supplies from North Viet Nam to buttress the insurgency in the south.

The fact is that the oil storage facilities which have been the target of recent attacks are located in close proximity to major concentrations of population in North Viet Nam. I take it from the preliminary reports that have been made available to the government of Canada that every care has been taken to spare civilian life in those operations. Nevertheless I would be less than frank if I did not say there is a risk inherent in these operations in terms of giving this conflict a character, a complexion which I am sure all of us would be concerned to avoid, and which my right hon. friend himself said he was concerned to see avoided.

There is a further aspect to these latest operations which is bound to cause concern. That is the possibility, as my right hon. friend mentioned, of a greater engagement in this conflict by those who have supported and actively encouraged the policies and the efforts of the government of North Viet Nam. It is not possible, I think beyond a certain point, to estimate what the threshold of that greater engagement may be, but it must be clear that everyone in every country, in all of the continents, is concerned about the dangers flowing from any change in the pattern of the present conflict.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

It seems to me exceedingly difficult to guarantee against a miscalculation on the part of one or other of the powers concerned who may consider the course of developments in Viet Nam as carrying a direct risk to their national security. All I can say at the moment is that, from all the information that has been made available to us, there appears to be a continuing recognition of the need for restraint on the part of all the governments directly concerned in the conflict.

I wish to deal with a matter which seems to me to be crucial from the point of view of the Canadian government and of other governments which believe that a negotiated solution is the right way of resolving the Viet Nam conflict. The question we must ask ourselves is whether these latest developments, or any future developments tending in the same direction, are likely to help or hinder the prospect of such a solution. This has been the cornerstone of Canada's policy and the guiding consideration in the efforts which we have been making in recent months.

I am bound to say on balance, that whatever the rights or wrongs of the situation may be, it is the judgment of the Canadian government that there is a relationship between this whole matter of bombing and the prospects of arriving at even a beginning of a process which might in due course yield an honourable accommodation of the interests of the major parties in the conflict in Viet Nam.

I should like to take this point a little further by explaining to the house the positions of the government of North Viet Nam and the government of the United States, as I understand them, on the basis of what has been said publicly and in private discussions. The government of North Viet Nam has called for a permanent and unconditional cessation of all bombing and other acts of war against their territory. This is one of the elements in a letter which president Ho Chi-Minh addressed to the Prime Minister on January 24, and in the absence of which the government of North Viet Nam does not appear prepared to envisage a political solution. The argument behind this formulation is that by bombing targets in North Viet Nam the United States is encroaching on the sovereignty of that country, and that this is a violation of accepted standards of international law and international relations. The government of North Viet Nam accordingly does not think that a willingness to cease this bombing should be qualified by any conditions whatsoever, or that it warrants any countervailing undertakings by the North Vietnamese government in respect of its own policies.

I think the North Vietnamese point of view is well reflected in a statement issued by the Chinese authorities in Peking on July 3 last. The following extract is relevant to this matter:

> U.S. imperialism long ago completely violated the Geneva agreements and broke the line of demarcation between South and North Viet Nam. It has now further broken this line by its bombing of the capital of the heroic Vietnamese people. The United States must be held responsible for all the serious consequences arising therefrom. With the breaking of the line of demarcation by the United States, the Vietnamese people have ceased to be subject to any restrictions.

This is a significant statement. The house will note that it refers twice to the demarcation line which, however temporary it was designed to be, was laid down in the Geneva cease-fire agreement of 1954. The statement appears to argue that, so long as this agreement has not been superseded by a permanent settlement of the whole Viet Nam question, that line must to all intents and purposes be regarded as a de facto political boundary between North and South Viet Nam, and must be respected as such.

This interpretation of the provisions of the Geneva agreement is, I think, one which Canada, as a member of the international Commission in Viet Nam is bound to take seriously. It is also, I think, an interpretation which lies at the root of the whole position of the government of the United States as regards the matter of support and sustenance which the government of North Viet Nam has afforded to the insurgency in the South. I regret to say, however, that it is only partially accepted in the statement from which I have read to the house. For, having placed due emphasis on the inviolability of the line of demarcation between South and North Viet Nam, the Chinese statement goes on to say that "all support and aid rendered by the North Vietnamese people to South Viet Nam are within the sacred right of the Vietnamese people". It is this evident inconsistency which is the crux of the problem we are facing in Viet Nam and to which we must address ourselves if there is to be any prospect of a peaceful and lasting settlement of the present conflict.

What is the position of the government of the United States? It is in the following terms as they have been given to us. The United States is prepared to stop the bombing of North Viet Nam at any time as part of a mutual reduction of hostilities on both sides. They regard the military activities in North and South Viet Nam as forming part of a single problem. If the North Vietnamese were prepared to respect the demarcation line in terms of the assistance they are providing to the insurgency in the South, the United States, for their part, would be prepared to match such a move by halting the bombing of targets in the north which are associated with that assistance.

This, then, is the impasse as I see it. There is a relationship between this matter of bombing and whatever moves it may be possible to make toward an eventual settlement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question at this stage? Today's press refers to an Associated Press dispatch which reads as follows:

> An unpublished report by Canadian and Indian representatives on the International Control Commission in Laos was cited Thursday by Conservatives attacking the Labor government's Viet Nam policy.
> Anthony Royle, Tory MP for Richmond, Surrey, said the report gave Prime Minister Wilson firm arguments and firm evidence to enable him to give full public support to American bombing of oil installations.

What is the nature of the report by Canada which has not yet been published but which was utilized in debate in Westminster? What is the meaning of the statement that Canada had spoken, along with India, in such a way as to justify what was done in this connection.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not object to the question. I will deal with it right away. This was an interim report made by the commission—and it has been tabled—calling attention to activities of certain elements which were opposed to the government of the south operating in Laos.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was it tabled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think about two months ago. I do not have the exact date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the report to which reference is made?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question. Is the report to which the right hon. gentleman referred the one that was tabled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it is not that report, I do not know what report it is. When the question was directed to me I assumed it must be that report. I do not know of any other such report in respect of Laos in recent months.

The North Vietnamese government believes that the bombing of their territory should be stopped by a unilateral commitment on the part of the United States. The United States government, on the other hand, argues that it is unrealistic to expect them to give a unilateral commitment of this kind which would leave North Viet Nam without any commitment in respect of their infiltration of men and supplies into the south.

What is to be the position of the Canadian government in this situation? I believe that there are two choices open to us. We can take strong public positions on any or all of the issues involved in the present conflict. That is the easiest thing we can do. Alternatively, we can continue to do what we have been trying to do. So long as I am in this office that is what I propose to continue to do, because I believe this is the only effective way available of achieving the objectives we have in mind. We will continue to conduct quietly and through diplomatic channels our efforts to find the basis for an accommodation in Viet Nam.

I would seriously suggest to the house that we can follow one or the other course I have mentioned. We cannot effectively follow both at one and the same time. I think we have to admit to ourselves that there are no simple solutions to this conflict. And, because there are no simple solutions, a settlement in Viet Nam will not be achieved overnight; it can only emerge from a patient probing of positions.

It will have to go right to the roots and the origins of the conflict in Viet Nam and it will have to be such as to hold out an assured prospect of peace and stability, not only in Viet Nam but in Southeast Asia as a whole. This is what Lord Avon had in mind when he talked of neutralization; not now, not as a meand to bring this conflict to an end, but as the kind of solution that would follow a negotiated settlement. If this is what we are working toward, then I think it will be agreed we must take first steps first.

It is being put to me from time to time that Canada, either by itself or in co-operation with other countries, should issue a call to a new Geneva conference. Before we set out to determine the proposed new role for the commission, we had already done that. Before we sent Mr. Ronning to Hanoi and Saigon and elsewhere we had already done that. I now resist this course, not because it is unreasonable or because it does not represent a long-term objective of the government of Canada. We have had discussions with the government of India, and I mention India because of the speech made yesterday by her distinguished prime minister to the effect that there should be a conference called.

This proposal was made over a year ago and again last November before we contemplated the proposed role for the commission, and before we decided on the Ronning missions. I have now resisted this course, in the sense that I have resisted it before, because all the information available to me indicates that a call of this kind will not have the desired results in present circumstances, much as I would like to be able to say that the situation was otherwise. We have been told this without going to Moscow, on the highest authority. It is one thing to call for a conference; it is quite another thing to ensure its being attended by those who must be there.

It seems to me that a conference lies at the end of the road, not at the beginning. If one could be held now, and if the Soviet union, as co-chairman, acquiesced in the suggestion of the prime minister of India to join with Britain in calling such a conference, all of us would support this. But I would have to say, as I have already implied, that knowing what I do I would be greatly surprised if the representations that must be at such a conference would be prepared to attend one at this time, whether it would be on Viet Nam or indirectly on Laos or Cambodia.

Mr. Churchill: Do you mean Russia or the United States?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I prefer to leave my statement as it is.

Mr. Churchill: It is ambiguous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not ambiguous.

I cannot foresee what intermediate steps may have to intervene before the time for such a conference is ripe. But, on the basis of all the discussion we have had, it is my assessment that it is likely there would have to be some preliminary undertakings, and I emphasize the word "undertakings", about the points of substance which are at issue in this conflict. What this means, in Canadian terms, is that we must do all we can to try to create the conditions in which the processes which will lead to an ultimate settlement can be started. This is precisely the task to which we have addressed ourselves.

I say again that we welcome the proposals made yesterday by the Prime Minister of India. The purposes and objectives behind her proposals are shared by the Canadian government and they are shared by all of us in this house. If these proposals commend themselves to the parties concerned, and if the parties concerned would attend the conference—I am sure the United States would be among those that would—and if progress on that basis were possible, I can assure the house and the government of India that Canada is prepared to do whatever may be required of us to see that these proposals are translated into action.

My right hon. friend spoke of Mr. Ronning's two visits to Hanoi. I would like to underline certain aspects of this initiative which may have been lost sight of in the great volume of publicity, and on this I regret to disagree with my right hon. friend, which Mr. Ronning's visits have generated.

First, I have said that this was a Canadian initiative and that it was carried out by Mr. Ronning on the instructions of the Canadian government, and not on the instructions in any way of any other government. I reiterate this today because the impression has been created in some quarters that Mr. Ronning's mandate may have been something other than it was.

Second, I would like the house to understand that the assignment we have taken on is essentially in the nature of a good offices assignment. It is inherent in such an assignment that we would be concerned to understand the positions and attitudes of all the parties, and that we would do our best to interpret and clarify the positions and attitudes of one side to the other. That, broadly speaking, has been the form which Mr. Ronning's assignment has taken.

Third, I would like to restate the ultimate object of this initiative. It has seemed to us that if a beginning is to be made in the long and patient process which we hope will lead to ultimate peace in Viet Nam, we must find a basis on which both sides would be prepared to see such a beginning made. The mere calling of a conference, desirable as that is, does not meet this essential objective, as we have learned in our discussions with both sides. This is the only potentially useful channel through which there has been contact with both sides in a long time. I will not say it is the only channel, but it is the only channel which has access to both sides. I regard this as a tribute to our country as well as to Mr. Ronning himself.

I do not wish to give the house a misleading impression of our results so far. We have not achieved any spectacular results and I think I can quite frankly say that we have had no illusions as to the pace at which progress was likely to be possible.

As I have explained previously to the house, we regard the two visits which have now been made to Hanoi—there may be others —as phases of a continuing effort. Over how long a period of time this effort may extend I cannot say. What is significant is that we have had a fair hearing, and on both occasions with the top personalities of the north and the south and, of course, with the government of the United States. I can say that if the channel we have established remains open, and if its potential usefulness is not called into question by any of those concerned, I do not think, in a situation where a failure of communication may be crucial, we can discount the significance of such a channel for the time when the circumstances for the solution of the Viet Nam conflict are ripe.

The situation facing us in Viet Nam is as serious as any which has faced us since the Korean war. Since that time there has been growing confidence on the part of the international community that it has the means of bringing its influence to bear on situations of this kind, and to put an end to armed conflict, and to lay the groundwork for political solutions. That is the essence of the concept of peacekeeping which Canada and others have tried to develop and strengthen through the United Nations.

We accepted the suggestion of the president of the United States that he would welcome any effort by any country to try and bring about at least preliminary talks that might lead to serious negotiations, which in turn might result in a negotiated settlement. It was in the light of this situation that we thought last December there was a role for the international commission. Canada, India and Poland, as members of this commission, have had experience in Indochina now for 11 years. Being the only body that has a continuing link with Hanoi and Saigon we thought that, quite apart from any authority given to that commission under the Geneva agreement, it might undertake the effort to try and bring about a narrowing in the position taken by the various parties.

To that end we have had useful and fruitful exchanges with India and Poland. Our view was that the time had come to use the commission for this purpose. We did not suggest they were not as sincerely interested in peace as we were. One of the countries took the position that perhaps this was not the particular moment in which to establish a role for the commission as a mediating instrument. But we continue, all of us, India, Poland and Canada—and this was rearffimed yesterday by the Prime Minister of India—to look upon the commission as having a role in this situation.

The government of India reaffirmed yesterday that they would be happy to see the commission used to try and bring the parties together. Because we felt there would be some delay in trying to use the commission for the purpose I have mentioned, the government asked Mr. Ronning, a man born in China, who speaks Chinese, who knows many of the personalities involved, to undertake, if this could be arranged with the support of the governments concerned—the United States, North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam—a series of discussions to find out if there was a basis for a preliminary discussion between the parties.

We have made a commitment, and we intend to respect it, to the parties concerned that what went on in Hanoi is a matter that must rest with the government of Canada until such time as we are in a position to report, finally, success or failure. It cannot be any other way. My hon. friend the member for York South the other day asked me whether I was in favour of the three proposals made by the Secretary General of the United Nations. He knows my views in these matters; he has known them for a long time. He knows where I stand and where this government stands. But if I had replied in specific terms to that question, I would have violated a commitment which Mr. Ronning, speaking for the government of Canada, made in discussions he has had. I do not propose in any way to endanger or destroy the credibility of a channel that is still open, and which may yet be used to deal with this very serious situation.

We have had discussions only this week with representatives of the government of the United States, right here in Ottawa. I have had discussions, as the Prime Minister has, with the Deputy Premier of the Soviet Union who is visiting Canada. We will continue these discussions next week. Other countries are engaged in similar processes. I want this house and the country to know that there is no item on our agenda that is more important than trying to bring about some process of discussion between the parties concerned, in order that we can bring an end to the conflict in Viet Nam. That is the objective of all of us.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a military solution of this problem of course is not possible by itself. We are all aware of the dangers that flow from the conflict that has raged in that area. We are dealing with the situation as it is now; we are not dealing with its genesis. We have sought not to emphasize the history of this situation, but to try and see if we could not make our position as a mediator more effective by taking the most objective position possible. I think thus far we have succeeded in doing this.

I can tell the house that no opportunity will go by without our making every attempt that we can, by ourselves, as a member of the commission or in concert with other countries, to try to bring about peace talks. When they do take place, whether by a Geneva conference or as a result of the kind of situation that developed in Korea and Malaysia, namely by gradual process, then we will address ourselves as one country in the international community to those methods by which we hope to bring about an effective neutralization of the whole area.

The objective that Lord Avon spoke of the other day will not be achieved without, of course, the use and support of the international community, through the United Nations or otherwise. Mr. Chairman, I resume my seat after saying that this undoubtedly is one of the most serious situations the world faces. It is not a conflict in which we are engaged. It is not a conflict in which we have any intention of dispatching Canadian armed forces. This, we continue to repeat, would be inconsistent with our role on the International Control Commission, just as Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom yesterday said that it would be improper for Britain to send forces to Viet Nam because of her role as one of the co-chairmen of the Geneva conference powers.

Mr. Churchill: The same situation would apply to Russia, the other co-chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think so. We have done everything we know, with our friends, to put forward our point of view. We have done so as a result of the accommodation extended our representative, Mr. Ronning, in Hanoi. We intend to respect the nature of the conversations that have taken place there and elsewhere, in the hope that we might be able, as a result of this instrument, to bring about the beginnings of peace in Viet Nam. If we do not succeed, it will not be because Canada has not tried. We are not wedded to this method alone. If there is some other way by which peace negotiations can be begun, we will support it. But I want this house to know that we are not weakening in our effort to try to bring about peace in Viet Nam.

Progress reported.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether this is altogether fair?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I agree.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No opportunity has been given to the hon. gentlemen of other parties to express themselves. I, for one, feel that we should agree not to be concerned with private members hour, but that hon. gentlemen to the left, who have not had as yet the right or opportunity to speak, should be given it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I concur in this suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I think that we would want to give other parties, particularly the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the opportunity to speak.

Mr. Douglas: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression that private members hour had been eliminated for both yesterday and today by an order of the house. Am I mistaken in that view?

Mr. Churchill: It was not actually an order; there was a bit of confusion yesterday, as we may recall.

Mr. Thompson: It was our impression that private members hour would be dispensed with today and we would go on with the business in committee of supply.

Mr. Peters: As one of those involved, Mr. Speaker, I am in complete agreement with this procedure. I think it should be noted that this action has been taken by the private members and we should probably continue the procedure until our recess.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $1,662,982,791.93, being the aggregate of—

(a) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, not otherwise provided for, except Finance Item 15 for which the proportion is three-twelfths, and Transport Item 103 and Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40 for which no proportion is granted—$1,252,481,028.67;

(b) an additional four-twelfths of the total amounts of Dominion Bureau of Statistics Item 10, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L75 and L80 (Schedule A) of the said Main Estimates—$4,299,333.83;

(c) an additional three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 15 and 70 (Schedule B) of the said Main Estimates—$1,902,250.00;

(d) an additional two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 55 and 75, Secretary of State Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L30 and L95 (Schedule C) of the said Main Estimates—$25,681,300.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Items 5 and 55, Finance Item 10, Fisheries Item 10, Justice Item 1, Mines and Technical Surveys Items 20, 25, 35, 45, 60, 80, 85, National Film Board Item 1, Northern Affairs and National Resources Item 15 and Transport Item 5 (Schedule D) of the said Main Estimates—$16,293,229.17;

(f) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates A for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$193,924,378.08;

(g) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Item 35a, Defence Production Item 20a, Finance Item 4a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40a, Transport Items 102a and 103a (Schedule E) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$5,709,522.67);

(h) two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Finance Item 15a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 75a, and National Research Council, including the Medical Research Council, Item 10a, (Schedule F) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$8,459,333.34;

(i) one-twelfth of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40a (Schedule G) of the said Supplementary Estimates —$966,666.67;

(j) seven-twelfths of the total of all the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates B for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$103,265,750.00;

(k) four-twelfths of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L32b (Schedule H) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$50,000,000.00, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate on interim supply that the committee should take some time to discuss the very serious situation which has developed in Viet Nam. I have listened with great interest to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I must say that about all the minister has done has been to tell us about all the difficulties there are. He has given no leadership whatever, nor has he set forth any program which the government intends to pursue with a view to finding a solution to the unfortunate debacle in Viet Nam.

We have waited now for three years to get some statement of policy from the government. All we have had in three years, and again today, has been a series of platitudinous bromides calculated to put the house to sleep and to lull the fears of the Canadian people. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the fears of the Canadian people cannot be lulled quite so easily. The recent escalation of the bombing to include the areas of Hanoi and Haiphong has touched the conscience of the world. World leaders, some of whom had in the past supported United States intervention in Viet Nam, have now spoken out with alarm at this most recent escalation of the war.

The fact is that by this recent step, the government of the United States is now gambling with human survival and is, step by step, bringing this conflict to the place where it will inevitably spread into what may be a major world war. The President of the United States has been assuring his people that there really is not anything to worry about, that the Chinese will not react very violently, and that the main thing to do is to get the war in Viet Nam finished before the November elections. It almost seems as if the President has succeeded in brainwashing the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who referred today to the recent escalation of bombing as an alleged escalation of bombing.

Well, Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to have been merely an alleged—and I put the "alleged" in quotes—escalation of the bombing. The bombing has now been brought to the capital city and to the chief port of North Viet Nam, and dangerously close to the borders of mainland China. If this process of escalation continues, it can only be a matter of time until mainland China becomes militarily involved. In an appearance before a congressional commission General John P. Lavelle, on March 5 said that American military forces had all their plans laid by which they could easily bomb the major centres of mainland China. He said there really was not anything to be concerned about if mainland China entered the war. What we have to ask ourselves is, after we have bombed the main centres of China where does the United States go from there?

• (5:20 p.m.)

You cannot defeat a country just with air raids. If the United States seeks to land troops in mainland China and becomes involved in a land war with 700 million people, it would be like a fly on flypaper. Not only will it be involved in Asia, with a billion Asiatics violently hating the white man for the barbarous bombing of Asiatic communities, but if the United States becomes involved in a war with mainland China it will have to blockade China and insist that Canada stop trading with China, and that we do not feed the people of China. If anyone is so naive as to believe that the United States would continue to allow Canada to send wheat to China, I am sure that they are due for a very rude awakening.

Whether or not the military intervention of mainland China will bring the Soviet Union into such a conflict, we do not know; but we do know that this most recent escalation has probably brought the world closer to a major world war than anything which has happened in the last 21 years.

We have made no secret of where we in this party stand. We have said all along that we believe that the United States has no business in Viet Nam; that she is there in violation of the Geneva accord agreement that she is there in violation of the charter of the United Nations. The only possible solution is, first, for the United States to discontinue the bombing unconditionally; second, the United States should be prepared to treat not only with North Viet Nam but also with the national liberation front in South Viet Nam. Third, the United States must be prepared to withdraw its forces, to be replaced by peacekeeping force; to give to the people of Viet Nam an opportunity to decide in supervised, secret ballot whether or not the want to unite North and South Viet Nam; and to determine the kind of government which they shall have. That has been our position, and it has not altered.

The Leader of the Opposition said that our position has not been the same as the position taken by the prime minister of Great Britain, and that is true. I have differed with Prime Minister Wilson, both publicly and privately, on this question. However, I would point out that even Prime Minister Wilson, who has up until recent days supported the position of the United States, has now dissociated himself from the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong, and has expressed his strong disapproval of this most recent escalation of the war.

Mr. Wilson is not the only one who has altered his position somewhat with reference to the Viet Nam situation. My friends to the right in the Conservative party, who a year ago last May were making speeches completely in support of United States intervention in Viet Nam, are now beginning to have very serious doubts about the long-term effect of that military venture.

This is because what both the official opposition and the government have failed to recognize, Mr. Chairman, is that it is only a difference of degree between bombing the villages and the hamlets of North Viet Nam and then starting to bomb the cities of North Viet Nam. The first step was bound to lead to the next step, just as the step now taken of bombing Hanoi and Haiphong will inevitably lead to a further escalation—either the destruction of the port of Haiphong or the mining of the port, or the destruction of the railway leading into mainland China.

I fear that the United States is making the same mistake which it made in Korea, when the President of the United States and General MacArthur assured the people of that great country that there was no danger in United States troops going up to the Yalu River, and that the Chinese had been so intimidated that they were not likely to intervene. But they did intervene.

Fortunately the world managed to get itself out of that débâcle, but I am not so sure that it can get itself out of this one unless the leaders of the western world are prepared to take more forthright and courageous steps than the Canadian government has indicated it is prepared to take today. The Canadian government—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question. Does my hon. friend agree with the initiative that we have taken both with regard to the commission and with regard to the services of Mr. Ronning? If he does agree, as I must assume he does, knowing his interest in these matters, does he think that we would in any way strengthen the Ronning mission, and what all parties hope will be the result of this mission, by taking some of the positions which he asks us to take?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I will deal with that in detail in a few moments. May I as a preliminary answer say to the minister that of course we agree that any attempts which Mr. Ronning can make to find some basis for agreement are all to the good. But that does not relieve the government of the responsibility which it has to lay out a program, to state its position clearly to all the nations of the world, and to follow that program.

I want to say to the minister that we are in a new age of diplomacy. These are no longer the days of Metternich and Disraeli. We no longer need the diplomacy of Talleyrand-Périgord. It is a new kind of diplomacy and leadership which is needed today. This is not all going to be done behind the scenes; it is going to be done by governments and by men like the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs giving some leadership among the nations of the world.

That is exactly the point to which I am coming. Canada has always placed as the cornerstone of its foreign policy the effectiveness of the United Nations and the building of collective security as the best means of maintaining world peace. United States intervention in Viet Nam has been carried out in complete defiance of the charter of the United Nations, which requires nations to negotiate their differences and to report immediately to the United Nations any alleged measures of self-defence which they propose to take. The United Nations has been scrupulously ignored and avoided by the United States in this whole sorry mess.

Appeals by the Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, have been ignored and brushed off abruptly, and sometimes not too courteously. Recently he set forth a proposed program not too different from that which I suggested a moment ago as a possible basis for a solution. He received no answer at all from the United States. Secretary U Thant has described what is happening in Viet Nam as the most barbarous war in history. Yet this man who is the spokesman for the United Nations gets no hearing, and no action is taken on the proposals he is making.

When we talk about the idea of collective security, is the United Nations only for small powers? Is it only to be used to police the conflicts in Gaza, or in Cyprus, or only to intervene in Suez? When a great power like the United States or the Soviet Union, or when some other major power is involved, is the United Nations supposed to creep away to a corner and pretend that a war is not taking place?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not.

Mr. Douglas: Yet, this war is going on. The minister says "Of course not". The United Nations should not ignore it, and yet the United Nations has been ignoring it, and the minister has done nothing to take this matter to the United Nations, to attempt to obtain a clear statement of opinion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the hon. member not aware that the Secretary General of the United Nations said last January when the United States took the Viet Nam question to the Security Council, that that was not the place for the Viet Nam question, and that it could only be decided within the framework of a Geneva conference, because the parties concerned were not all members of the United Nations organization. That is why this is not before the United Nations.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just made an excellent point. Yet, not more than half an hour ago he argued that he was going to resist calling the Geneva powers together for a whole series of reasons. He gave us reasons as to why that course would not succeed. Now he is stating that the United Nations can do nothing.

Having ruled out both these international organizations, what does the minister propose?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We did not rule out the Geneva conference.

Mr. Douglas: I did not interrupt the minister while he was making his statement, and I would appreciate his not interrupting me. May I tell the minister that one of the reasons why the United Nations cannot be effective in coping with this problem is because the nations most vitally involved are not members of the United Nations.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Douglas: And why are they not members of the United Nations? Because the government to which the minister belongs, or governments which have preceded this one have never had the courage to support the admission of mainland China to the United Nations. The minister is still prepared not to support such a measure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How do you know?

Mr. Douglas: If the minister is prepared to support that measure I shall sit down now, to give him a chance to make a statement. As a matter of fact, I tell the minister that he will never support the admission of mainland China to the United Nations until the day that the United States government admits that it is prepared to admit mainland China to the United Nations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is your view.

Mr. Douglas: That is when the Government of Canada will move on this matter.

Since the United Nations is not able to cope with this problem, by virtue of the fact that some countries most vitally involved are not in its membership, this leaves only one international body that has any hope of resolving this problem. I refer of course to those nations which attended the Geneva conference in 1954 and which signed the Geneva accord. That is why some of us have been urging now for some years that the Canadian government, as a representative on the International Control Commission which was set up by that Geneva conference, should insist upon the reconvening of that conference.

We are playing a ludicrous part in an international farce. We are a member of an International Control Commission on which there are Canadian personnel and on which we have spent millions of dollars. Yet the body that set up that commission has never been reconvened to deal with the report of the commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes it was; in 1962.

Mr. Douglas: It has done nothing to meet, and to endeavour to implement the recommendations of that report. The minister is not telling me that anything was done to implement the recommendations of the report of 1962?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that the body concerned had met in 1962, having met in 1954.

Mr. Douglas: Yes. Nothing has been done to call the conference together, or to take the recommendations made by the International Control Commission, and to seek to implement them.

In 1962 Canada and India signed a majority report complaining about the violation of the Geneva accord by both sides. Nothing was done about this. Canada has never insisted that something should be done about it. We have reached the stage where we ought either to insist that the two co-chairmen reassemble the Geneva conference, and do something to exercise the authority which that body gave to the International Control Commission, or we ought to ask the commission to absolve Canada of any further responsibilities, and to recognize that that phase of the whole story is at an end.

The minister says that it will not be easy to get the Geneva accord powers together. I suggest that the first thing to be done is for the Canadian government to call on the United States government to unconditionally stop the bombing. Nobody is going to attend a conference while the bombing is going on.

The minister spoke as if he thought it was too much to ask the United States to stop the bombing unconditionally. Why? Here is a great power bombing a small nation with which it is not legally at war. It has been bombing that small nation for over one year killing its civilian men, women and children, laying waste its villages and destroying its crops. Surely it is not too much for Canada and for the other western powers to say to the United States: "In the hope that we can reconvene the conference, in the hope that we can begin negotiations toward peace, we want the bombing stopped".

The United States will not be making a concession because it discontinues the bombing. In my opinion it had no moral right to begin the bombing. It is not too much to ask that country now to discontinue, in the hope that the Geneva powers can be brought together, so that they can seek and find the solution to this conflict.

The second thing that will be necessary, if you get the Geneva powers together, is for the United States to state clearly, at this conference that it is prepared to negotiate not only with the government of North Viet Nam but also with the National Liberation Front in South Viet Nam. We may not like the National Liberation Front. We may not approve of its politics. The fact is that it represents over 50 per cent of the population, and occupies between 60 and 70 per cent of the territory of South Viet Nam.

The minister referred this afternoon to the National Liberation Front as "the insurgents". You will have some difficulty convincing the people in South Viet Nam that they are the insurgents, when what they sought to do was to obtain the benefits that were promised to them under the Geneva agreement. The people had been promised elections for July of 1956. They did not get them. The people had been promised that the demarcation line between North and South Viet Nam was a temporary line, and not to be considered a national boundary; that they were to have the right of self determination as to whether or not North and South Viet Nam would come together in a single and sovereign state; that they would have the right to determine what government they would have.

Instead of that they had a government foisted on them with United States bayonets, and maintained with United States financial and military power. The minister describes the people who object to this as insurgents. Whether or not they are insurgents, the fact is that there can be no hope of any solution until they are given a seat at the conference table, and until they have some voice in working out and negotiating a peace in South Viet Nam.

There will be no peace in Viet Nam until all foreign troops are withdrawn. We recognize that to withdraw them without replacing them with some international peacekeeping force would probably introduce wholesale slaughter. A civil war cannot go on for more than ten years without a good deal of bitterness and hatred, as we saw even in Europe after the occupation by Nazi Germany. It therefore seems to me that, once the Geneva powers reach some basis of agreement between the conflicting parties, there will have to be an international police force supplied either by the Geneva accord powers or by the United Nations, stationed there for the purpose of maintaining law and order, for the purpose of supervising elections and for helping to set up a stable government in that war-torn country.

I readily concede that there is no easy solution. The minister is right when he says a solution cannot be found overnight. But this situation in Viet Nam has been going on for ten years and United States intervention on a large scale has been going on for the last four years. The minister has been Secretary of State for External Affairs for over three years. I am not asking him to settle this conflict overnight, but unless the government takes some action fairly soon the world will see a long night descend upon it.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question? He said the United States has been intervening for the last four years. Prior to that he said the government in South Viet Nam had been foisted upon them by American bayonets. Is it only in the last four years that there has been a government in South Viet Nam?

Mr. Douglas: Oh no. As the hon. member knows, the so-called United States military advisors have been there, and military aid has been given to South Viet Nam ever since the Americans set up the well known Diem as a virtual dictator. However, the National Liberation Front which began to oppose Diem and his successors carried on guerilla warfare throughout the period from 1956 onward. But it is in the last four years that American intervention has been on a major scale. First it was military advisors. Then that pretext was brushed aside and the American forces which in 1964 numbered around 25,000 have been stepped up to a quarter of a million. Moreover, it is estimated that by next winter their strength will have reached 400,000.

Thus United States military participation has been growing steadily. It has ceased to be merely a small military effort buttressing that of the government. It has become a matter of America waging the war and the government of South Viet Nam merely going along for the ride.

Mr. Churchill: The decision to intervene was made by President Kennedy.

Mr. Douglas: That may be, but the decision to bomb North Viet Nam, the decision to escalate the war, the decision to raise the number of troops from 25,000 to 250,000, the decision to bomb Hanoi and Haiphong was taken by President Johnson who was elected in opposition to the very program which he is now carrying out. The Goldwater program which president Johnson opposed in 1964 is now being put into action by the man who opposed it.

Before I was interrupted I was saying that I do not suggest for a moment the solution is easy. When a conflict of this kind is allowed to build up over a decade and when it is not possible to undo the past, it is naturally not easy to find a solution. But neither this government nor this parliament can continue to commit the crime of silence. We cannot stand silent while a war is being carried on, a large part of it directed against defenceless civilians. We cannot stand idly by while a war is being escalated to the point at which it may involve all mankind, without speaking out.

I had hoped that the minister would make today a clear and specific pronouncement as to where Canada stands. Instead, he contented himself by supporting the United States decision while at the same time regretting that we were in the mess we are in. In one breath he says there was no hope of a military solution and in the next he was saying there was not much use calling a conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I am sure he would not want deliberately to misinterpret what I said. The statement I made was a careful statement prepared by the government so that it would reach all concerned. We were trying to explain in this statement the role we had undertaken—

Mr. Douglas: What the minister is saying is that he proposes to work quietly behind the scenes. If the minister thinks that is the role for Canada to play, that is his decision. All I want to say is that silence at this stage of events is, in my opinion, criminal. I believe that in the world today Canada should be taking a position alongside those who have spoken out.

The Prime Minister of India has spoken out and called for the reconvening of the Geneva accord conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So have we.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister of Britain has dissociated himself from the most recent escalation of the bombing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So have we.

Mr. Douglas: He is going to Moscow to try to persuade the Soviet union and the other co-chairman of the Geneva powers to agree to calling a conference. General de Gaulle has spoken out. He has as much right to be diplomatic and to work behind the scenes as has the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: I must inform the hon. member that the time allowed for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. Thompson: Some of the rest of us would like an opportunity to speak, too, and there is only ten minutes left.

Mr. Churchill: For our part, we are prepared to go on beyond six o'clock to enable hon. members to speak on this very important subject, on the understanding that we shall complete the discussion on Viet Nam this evening and do not resume it on Monday. I decided to forgo my opportunity to speak under those conditions.

Mr. Douglas: I will take only two minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to go on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: I was saying to the minister that Prime Minister Gandhi, Prime Minister Wilson and President de Gaulle who have much more reason to be cautious and diplomatic than the minister has—have spoken out. Senator Fulbright, chairman of the foreign affairs committee of the United States has spoken against it. Senator Mike Mansfield, who is majority leader for the Democratic party in the United States Senate, has opposed his own president on this matter. Senator Robert Kennedy has spoken out in protest against this most recent escalation of the war. I am saying to the government that if these world leaders can speak out now, not as enemies of the United States but as men and women who recognize that unless something is done, and done quickly, mankind could slide into a nuclear holocaust that could destroy our civilization and everything that it means to us, then I hope before this debate is over the minister, or the Prime Minister, will make a statement to the effect that either one of them is prepared to fly to Moscow to reinforce Mr. Wilson's plea for a reconvening of the conference.

It may be, as the minister has said, that there are difficulties. He has told us all the difficulties. He should be known as the minister of difficulties. Of course there are difficulties. We don't need him to tell us of the difficulties. We need him to tell us what he is going to do. So far all he has told us is that he is going to work quietly behind the scenes. This country needs dynamic leadership in the present world situation, but we are not getting it. Silence at this critical moment in the history of mankind is criminal.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, the time is now six minutes before six o'clock and I would like to know whether we are going to continue this debate past six o'clock, because if there are only a few minutes left I shall have to adjust my remarks accordingly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was a good one. I thought we had all concurred in it so that my hon. friend could speak.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would accept a slight modification. We are prepared to sit on. In fact we are prepared to sit to hear the hon. member for Red Deer and one of the Creditistes who may wish to speak; but there are other hon. members who wish to speak in this debate and we would not want to have it ended.

Mr. Churchill: That was not my recommendation. I was willing to forgo a speech myself, if the subject of Viet Nam were concluded today; but if it is to continue on Monday then we should not sit beyond six o'clock.

Mr. Thompson: In view of this I think we should call it six o'clock because it is impossible to speak on a matter of this importance in such a limited time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just before doing that, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a correction. I was asked a question about a report. I thought it was a report that I had tabled, but apparently the report referred to in the United Kingdom yesterday is that of the international commission in Laos dealing with an attack in March, 1965, by forces of North Viet Nam on a royal Laotian government training school at Dong Hene. The report has been forwarded by the commission to the two co-chairmen, but they have not yet given authority to publish it. I shall make it available as soon as appropriate action has been taken by either one of the co-chairmen.

Mr. Churchill: Since there are a couple of minutes left before six o'clock I would like to ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam a question with respect to his suggestion that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should insist that the co-chairmen of the Geneva conference re-assemble that conference. How does one insist; and if the insistence fails, then what action would be taken? If you are going to insist on something, then unless it is a bluff you have to do something else.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs cannot use force to make them call the conference together. If they do not, then is the only action left in his hands withdrawal from the International Control Commission, or what is the action he would take if his insistence fails?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know this was not in my hon. friends proposal, but in view of the fact that two party leaders have spoken, would he agree to sit on so that we could hear the hon. member for Red Deer?

Mr. Churchill: Not under those circumstances.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, if there is no agreement to sit beyond six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I was asked a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Canada is a member of the International Control Commission and if the two co-chairmen are not prepared to carry out their responsibility for reconvening the conference I do not see why we should continue on the commission. I do not think the commission has any value.

If the two co-chairmen do not consider it sufficiently important to call a meeting to deal with the reports of the commission, and to deal with the situation which is their responsibility, Canada must say to them, "Either you call a conference, or there is not any use in continuing the farce of having a commission in Viet Nam." If we know that neither of the chairmen can agree to reconvene the conference, then the only world organization left is the United Nations. Otherwise we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that there is no collective security and no hope of maintaining the rule of law in the world.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there is no agreement to go beyond six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the order:

Government notices of motion—The Minister of Public Works—the following proposed motion:

1. "That notwithstanding the provisions of standing orders 2(1) or 6(1) or any other standing order, the hours of sitting for the remainder of this week shall be as follows:

Thursday, July 7—2.30 p.m. to 11.00 p.m.
Friday, July 8—11.00 a.m. to 11.00 p.m.
Saturday, July 9—11.00 a.m. to 6.00 p.m.

2. That notwithstanding the provisions of standing orders 15(3) and 39-A or of any other standing order, the adjournment proceedings on Thursday, July 7 and the private members' hour on Friday, July 8 shall be suspended.

3. That the order of business and procedure on Saturday, July 9 shall be as for a Friday, except that there shall be no private members' hour."

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the consent of the house to withdraw the notice of motion appearing on the order paper under my name, and having to do with the hours of sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the withdrawal of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I should add that I propose putting a new one on the order paper for Monday. Because of a curious anomaly in our rules it is not possible to have a motion to extend the hours of sitting brought forward without unanimous consent, unless two day's notice is given. The same anomaly arises about adjournment of the house. The purpose of the motion is to have a vehicle on the order paper should, as we hope, those two considerations require the attention of the house very early next week.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the business we propose submitting for consideration by the house on Monday is interim supply; then the bill respecting conditions of employment at the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec; then the income tax bill; then the National Arts Centre bill; then the Canadian Film Corporation bill, and then the medicare resolution. If the measures mentioned first are not completed on Monday, we would ask the house to consider the medicare resolution on Tuesday. I make that statement on the assumption that interim supply will be granted Monday, because I think hon. members appreciate that a need for it will have developed by Monday night.

Business of the House

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are we to understand that the business announced for Monday will be called in the order indicated by the minister?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

QUEBEC LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—TERMS OF SETTLEMENT AND CORRESPONDENCE

TERMS OF SETTLEMENT FOR TWO-YEAR COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT

BETWEEN

THE INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S ASSOCIATION LOCALS IN MONTREAL, TROIS-RIVIERES AND QUEBEC

AND

THE SHIPPING FEDERATION OF CANADA

1. Each employee will receive 40c. for every hour worked as of January 1, 1966, made up as follows:—

20c. increase per man-hour worked retroactive to January 1, 1966, and effective up to but not including the day work resumes; and

20c. per man-hour worked retroactive to January 1, 1966, effective up to but not including the day work resumes in compensation for improvements in productivity.

From date of resumption of work the above increases shall be applied on overtime as well.

2. An additional 15c. per hour increase in wages to be effective January 1, 1967; and a further 25c. per hour increase in wages to be effective on May 1, 1967 also in compensation for improvements in productivity. These increases shall be applied on overtime as well.

3. Call up of Montreal gangs for Monday morning to be before Saturday at 1:00 P.M. for ships in port except for gangs working on Saturday afternoon, Saturday night and/or Sunday.

For vessels arriving after 1:00 P.M. Saturday, orders for gangs to be given between 3:00 P.M. and 5:00 P.M. on Sunday.

The companies will co-operate with the Union Local 375 in the establishment of a mutually acceptable system to handle the reception of such calls with the installation and rental charges to be paid by the Union to the communication company.

The companies and the Union agree to meet with Judge Lippe as soon as practical to work out the details of such system.

4. Paper cups to be provided for use with drinking water containers.

5. All cargo hooks to be fitted with tongues.

6. When closing hatches, all hatch beams, including the centre beams, to be in place.

7. When men are ordered out on any vessel it is recognized that the work of opening and closing hatches, other than mechanical type hatches, is to be performed by members of the Union. In the event that the mechanical type hatches are opened by ship personnel it is agreed that the hatches shall not be opened before the commencement of the period. When closing mechanical type hatches with ship personnel men shall leave the hatch fifteen minutes before the end of the period. In the event that any hatches are opened by ship personnel prior to the commencement of a period the gang concerned shall be entitled to fifteen minutes pay.

8. An additional 3c. per hour to be paid to checkers and coopers in Montreal as of date of return to work plus a further 3c. per hour on January 1, 1967.

9. An additional 5c. per hour to longshoremen and checkers in Quebec as of date of return to work plus a further 5c. per hour on January 1, 1967.

10. An additional 5c. per hour to longshoremen in Trois-Rivières as of date of return to work plus a further 5 c. per hour on January 1, 1967.

11. Vacation pay to be increased from 4 per cent to 5 per cent on earnings as of date of return to work.

12. A four hour guarantee for each recall to be introduced as of date of return to work to be provided in agreements of Montreal Locals 375 and 1552, and Quebec Locals 1605 and 1739.

The agreements terminating on December 31, 1965, shall be amended by incorporating therein the terms of settlement set out above and these amended agreements shall remain in effect until December 31, 1967, unless amended by negotiations or otherwise. The parties agree to attend a meeting convened and presided by Judge Lippe for the purpose of signing the new agreements in accordance with the above. It is understood that all of the above is subject to ratification by the membership of the respective I.L.A. Locals and of the membership of the Shipping Federation of Canada.

Re: Terms of Settlement as between I.L.A. St. Lawrence River Ports Locals and The Shipping Federation of Canada

Dear Sir:

With regards to the "speculation" on the part of certain persons concerning possible legislation by the Parliament of Canada on gang crews productivity or similar matters, our position is quite clear and unchanged.

Throughout mediation with Judge René Lippé, the various Ministers, or the Prime Minister of Canada, it was made clear as to terms that:

1. We have not and we are not asking for any legislation, since we take the view that productivity in the above ports has continually increased;

2. On the other hand, in the event that The Shipping Federation of Canada or others should ask for legislation, we do not join them or support them, either directly or indirectly;

3. Should legislation be introduced in the Parliament of Canada on the request of the employers or otherwise, we will of course study the proposed legislation in order to determine our position. However, we will continue to oppose any final and binding arbitration, as we have throughout the negotiations and mediation and as shown in the "terms of settlement" wherein there is no reference to final and binding arbitration despite the various attempts of The Federation of Canada to include such terms;

4. Should parliament adopt legislation amounting to final and binding arbitration contrary to the "terms of settlement", it will be despite our every licit opposition in cooperation with the Canadian Labour Congress policy as stated to the Prime Minister and the other Ministers by President Clause Jodoin;

5. Should it be decided to have an inquiry, but without final and binding provisions, and only for the purpose of guiding the parties and clarifying the situation, it is my opinion that we should cooperate, and of course we will make all necessary proof to show the fallacy of the position taken by certain employers with regards to productivity which has in fact increased over the years in these ports.

There is no hesitation in giving you this opinion, since you will recall that again and again was this stated throughout the negotiations and we will not allow any pretence of a tacit agreement or other hidden understanding between the parties or with representatives of the Government of Canada.

There is only one document containing all the "terms of settlement" and these terms are clear and precise in themselves and cannot be added to or in any way changed.

Trusting that this will comply with your request for our opinion, we remain,

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. Cutler:

I have received your letter of June 20 and appreciate your action in forwarding a copy of your letter of June 16 to Mr. Gerard Tremblay, Vice-President of the Atlantic Coast District of the International Longshoremen's Association.

In order to clear up any possible misunderstanding with respect to the settlement reached on June 14 between the International Longshoremen's Association Locals in Montreal, Trois-Rivieres and Quebec and The Shipping Federation of Canada, there are a few observations which I would like to make on your letter to Mr. Tremblay.

During our discussions on June 13 and 14 and previously on June 11 and 12, both Mr. Pickersgill, who was the Acting Prime Minister in Mr. Pearson's absence over the weekend, and I stated that, provided the parties reached agreement on all of the other items in dispute, the government was prepared to establish an Industrial Inquiry Commission to carry out an independent and objective study of problems in connection with improvements in productivity, job security and related matters, and to take steps to have the conclusions reached as a result of this independent Industrial Inquiry Commission implemented by legislative enactment.

You will recall that the same commitment was made by the Prime Minister during the meetings held in his office on the night of June 13.

This commitment was directly associated throughout our discussions with the wage settlement for both 1966 and 1967 which, as you know, was only accepted by The Shipping Federation of Canada on the strength of this commitment.

It was also connected, you will recall, during our final discussions with the question of calling up and recalling of men.

You made it clear that the International Longshoremen's Association was not requesting the establishment of an Industrial Inquiry Commission or that legislation be introduced in this respect. You did say, however, that the International Longshoremen's Association would co-operate with the Industrial Inquiry Commission and that, if legislation were passed which provided for the implementation of the conclusions of this Commission through legislative enactment, the International Longshoremen's Association would not oppose the legislation and that you, as counsel for the International Longshoremen's Association, would advise that the law be respected.

The Terms of Settlement signed on June 14 include the following statement: "The agreements terminating on December 31, 1965, shall be amended by incorporating therein the terms of settlement set out above and these amended agreements shall remain in effect until December 31, 1967, unless amended by negotiations or otherwise." It was my understanding, and this has been confirmed by both Judge Lippe and Dr. Haythorne, that the words "or otherwise" were included to provide for conclusions reached by the Industrial Inquiry Commission to be implemented by legislative enactment.

It was, as you will recall, agreed that there would be no reference in the Terms of Settlement to the Industrial Inquiry Commission or to the mediator's recommendations with respect to its Terms of Reference or to the way in which its conclusions would be implemented.

The absence of any reference to the Industrial Inquiry Commission in the Terms of Settlement must not be interpreted, and this was made clear to you and to the members of the International Longshoremen's Association during our meetings, as an indication of any change in the understanding which was reached with both parties with respect to this Commission including the manner in which its conclusions would be implemented.

Yours sincerely,

Re your telegram June 30 copy of which you have indicated was sent to commissioner Picard am greatly surprised at contents of your wire especially in view of my letter to your Mr. Cutler dated June 27 which you indicated you had received an which I understood you accepted as a factual statement of the situation Stop Mr. Cutler will recall that in final stages of negotiations the crucial issues in dispute were the size of the wage increase and job security and calls and recalls on the one hand and technological changes on the other Stop After weeks of negotiation and lengthy bargaining it proved impossible to agree on the one without the other Stop The position of the union members re wages and job security was acknowledged by the federation through the substantial wage increases agreed to by them only on condition that an independent inquiry commission would be established and that its conclusions would be implemented as early as possible in 1967 as result of legislative enactment Stop The commitment of the government to establish such a commission and to recommend to parliament implementation of its conclusions through legislation was made in course of those final negotiations and as set forth in my said letter to Mr. Cutler it was made on the distinct understanding that the parties would reach agreement voluntarily on all other matters as in fact they did on June 14 Stop Pursuant to the statement we made at the time, the terms of reference of the commission are restricted to technological changes and related matters job security and calls and recalls of men Stop There had been throughout full opportunity for free collective bargaining on all these matters and after several months of negotiations after five weeks of a costly strike and after strenuous mediation efforts voluntary agreement on such matters had proved to be impossible Stop The terms of settlement signed on June 14 contain a reference to amendments to collective agreements being made by negotiation or otherwise Stop It was clearly understood that these last two words were inserted in the terms of settlement in order to ensure that findings of commission would form part of collective agreements should the commission recommend any changes Stop It is a fact that the International Longshoremen's Association made it clear during final stages of the negotiations that it was not requesting the establishment of an industrial inquiry commission or that legislation be introduced in this respect but Mr. Cutler did assure me and my cabinet colleagues in presence of union officials that the International Longshoremen's Association would co-operate with the industrial inquiry commission which we stated would be established and that should legislation be introduced by government providing for the implementation of the conclusions of such commission through legislative enactment your clients the International Longshoremen's Association, though they would not support the legislation, would obey the law and that he as counsel for the association would so advise them Stop The terms of reference of the industrial inquiry commission now provide for meritorious cases to be included under job security plan as determined by the commission Stop The government is proceeding to fulfil its commitment Stop

Lester B. Pearson
HO Montreal Que 4 213P EST

The Honourable Lester B Pearson Prime Minister of Canada

Re your telegram June 30th apparently you were unaware of following facts Stop

When I.L.A. St. Lawrence river ports locals delegation left Montreal for Ottawa it was determined that no member of delegation would meet alone or without witnesses in seeing any minister or any representative of federal government Stop

While such an attitude may appear hostile it was the unanimous decision of the 18 delegates who having met with government representatives on two previous occasions in same dispute refused to go to Ottawa unless that rule be observed Stop

In fact no member of the delegation ever saw or spoke to any minister or government representative without being accompanied by Claude Jodoin, President, Canadian Labour Congress, Gerard Tremblay, I.L.A. Vice-President, Phil Cutler, one of the three attorneys present Stop

Furthermore, it was determined that the question of final and binding arbitration in all its aspects be left to President Jodoin as the spokesman on this issue Stop

At the very first meeting with several of your ministers when the Honourable Pickersgill put a question concerning final and binding arbitration to Phil Cutler, attorney, President Jodoin immediately and emphatically intervened to inform the various ministers present and all others that he, as Canadian Labour Congress President was mandated to reply and to state categorically that the I.L.A. was opposed to final and binding arbitration in any form as a settlement of this dispute and that Canadian Labour Congress supported this position of its affiliate as being identical to congress policy Stop

While we assume, Mr. Prime Minister, that you were not aware of the above facts, you will however recall that in your office and in your presence, the Honourable Nicholson raised the question of final and binding arbitration and again president Jodoin strenuously opposed final and binding arbitration being part of any settlement as a threat to free collective bargaining Stop

You may further recall, Mr. Prime Minister, that it was on that occasion that the Honourable MacEachen intervened concerning a recent speech he had made and assured president Jodoin and all others present that there was no decision on the part of the government to impose final and binding arbitration Stop

In any event, Mr. Prime Minister, since President Claude Jodoin was always present whenever any member of the I.L.A. delegation or any of the three accompanying attorneys met with you or other government representatives from the time we arrived in Ottawa until the time you, as Prime Minister, announced the settlement of the strike, we have communicated with President Jodoin and we understand that he will communicate with you so that knowledge of the facts be complete as to the reasons why the I.L.A. St Lawrence River Ports Locals continue to oppose final and binding arbitration as emphatically as stated to you personally and to your ministers by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress on behalf of its affiliate prior to your announcement of the strike settlement.

Copy of these telegram sent to Mr Claude Jodoin.

We have now received and we are sending you under separate cover a signed copy of the report sent by Judge Rene Lippe acting as Commissioner of an Industrial Inquiry Commission appointed in law by the Honourable John R. Nicholson, Minister of Labour. Stop

You will note that the reports sets out in chronological order inter alia on page 9, and we quote a text prepared in close cooperation with officials of the Department of Labour end of quote for the establishment of a commission of inquiry to investigate the structure of gangs and other matters and we quote the text was acceptable to the federation but not to the association end of quote. Stop

Having set out that the I.L.A. St. Lawrence River ports locals had rejected the text for an inquiry, Judge Lippe then goes on and from the same page 9 we quote terms of settlement for a two year collective agreement between the parties were signed in Ottawa on June 14, 1966 end of quote. Stop

Nowhere in the cited terms of settlement is there any mention of either the establishment of another industrial inquiry commission and certainly nowhere in the terms of settlement cited by Judge Lippe is there any question of final and binding arbitration by special legislation or in any other way. Stop

These terms of settlement are shown to bear the date of June 14 1966 and they are signed by Judge Lippe and the others. Stop

We particularly draw your attention to page 13 of Judge Lippe's report which sets out quite clearly that on June 23rd or some ten days after the terms of settlement were signed, he, Judge Lippe, recommends to the Minister of Labour that there should be an industrial inquiry commission established concerning the size and structure of gangs and other matters and that the conclusions should be implemented by legislation. Stop

Since Judge Lippe was at all times present during the sessions in Ottawa and when the terms of settlement were drawn up and signed and he himself signed the terms of settlement and still found it necessary some ten days later to recommend the establishment of an industrial inquiry commission and special legislation, it is clear that Judge Lippe's report refutes those who have pretended that an industrial inquiry commission with a final and binding decision through the enactment of legislation was already agreed to some ten days before his report. Stop

No doubt the good ministers of the Crown in Ottawa will agree that Judge Lippe would not recommend on June 23rd something already agreed to on June 14 or before. Stop

Since we have already informed the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour that the International Longshoremen's Association St. Lawrence River Ports Locals, as an affiliate of the Canadian Labour Congress, prefer to have you, President Jodoin, take up any difficulties or misunderstandings in order to avoid any further conflict in the concerned ports, this information is being sent to you.

Ottawa, July 7, 1966.

Mr. Claude Jodoin, President,
Canadian Labour Congress,
100 Argyle Avenue,
Ottawa

In reply to your telegrams of July sixth to the Prime Minister and to me I would say that the traditional opposition of organized labour and management to the practice of compulsory arbitration in disputes over interests as distinct from grievances affecting rights is well known and I appreciate and respect the basic considerations underlying this attitude Stop It is equally well known and documented in the settlement of some disputes that labour and management have resorted to arbitration on specific issues that cannot be settled otherwise and which stand in the way of complete settlement Stop Likewise labour and management have agreed to settlements which provide for binding arbitration within prescribed limits Stop Previous governments of Canada have enacted legislation providing for binding solutions Stop As you are well aware most of the issues involved in the recent longshore dispute were settled by agreement and those directly concerned realized that legislative action was necessary and was promised to solve the remaining issues and thus bring about a complete settlement Stop There is ample proof of this fact Stop As one instance, you will recall that on June thirteenth while you were present the Prime Minister read a statement to the ILA representatives concerning the two or possibly three issues remaining in dispute in which he suggested that the ILA drop its demand for the application of retroactivity to overtime and that the shipping federation accept the following proposal with respect to the four-hour recall quote that this item be submitted to the commission for examination and that the recommendation of the commission with respect to this item be binding in precisely the same way as the recommendation with respect to gang-size Stop The four-hour recall would then be dealt with and included or not within the contract in the manner specified by the commission unquote you will also recall that also in your presence the suggestions of the Prime Minister in this regard were later accepted by both parties.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 11, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GENERAL A. G. L. McNAUGHTON

TRIBUTES ON DEATH OF LATE PRIVY COUNCILLOR

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to members of the house the death this morning of a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council, General A. G. L. McNaughton, after a career of continuous service to his country in war and peace, service of the greatest distinction, extending over more than 60 years.

The value to his country of General McNaughton's services was equalled only by the courage and unselfishness he always showed in performing those services. On the military side perhaps he was best known as the first commander of Canada's First Army overseas, and for the magnificent way in which he prepared that army for the great part it was to play in the liberation of Europe.

After the war, when General McNaughton had so richly earned rest and retirement, his activities if anything increased. Among other things he represented Canada very ably at the United Nations when our country was first elected to the security council. He also served with distinction for many years as chairman of the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission.

General McNaughton was always active and vigorous in public affairs, right up to the day of his death, especially in promoting what he considered to be right policies in the preservation and the development of our natural resources. In a very real sense he died in action and he would never have had it any other way. My own friendship with General McNaughton, which I shall always cherish, goes back for many years. He was a warm hearted, whole souled and high minded gentleman.

There was nothing mean or small about him, but much that was brave and good and wise. Canada has lost one of its most distinguished sons. I send my deepest sympathy to Mrs. McNaughton and the members of the family.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I join with the Prime Minister in the expression of sympathy to General McNaughton's widow and the members of his family. He served his country in many capacities. During the first world war he gave distinguished service and through his initiative brought about changes in artillery warfare which are still being followed today. After the war he resumed his position in the scientific world and gave of his best.

During the period between the first and second world wars he continued to take an interest in the armed forces, and then took the Canadian army overseas. The circumstances in which he ceased to command that army in action will be for historians to determine. The Prime Minister mentioned the fact that he was a member of the Privy Council of Canada. I well recall the circumstances in which he assumed the position of minister of defence in succession to Colonel Ralston. During the period of his life in active politics he took stands which were not generally acceptable, but he was able to do so because of the great respect he had built up in the years of service to his country. I believe that when history writes the story of his life it will be said of him that, while he served well in many capacities, and combined as it were, two careers, that of science and that of the military, his outstanding contribution was his devotion to Canada in connection with those matters which came under his jurisdiction as the chairman of the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission.

To his widow and his family the condolences of this house will be conveyed. This was a Canadian who in his day and generation, whatever the differences and the difficulties may have been, followed the course that he determined was for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The members of the New Democratic Party desire to join hon. members of all parties in paying tribute to General McNaughton and the very great services which he has rendered to this country. As hon. members know, he was born in Moosomin, Saskatchewan, and the people of that province always looked upon him as one of their native sons who earned great distinction. They will always remember him with great pride.

As the commander of the Canadian army in the second world war he won the esteem and affection of the men who served under him. As minister of defence he gave this country great leadership. I owed a personal debt to him because while he held that office he arranged for me to visit Saskatchewan personnel overseas, and I shall never forget his many kindnesses to me on that occasion.

In the field of science, as head of the research council, he did valuable work for his country. As chairman of the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission I for one can testify to the effective way in which he upheld Canada's rights on the commission. I remember one or two disputes we had about conserving Canadian water, which was a very scarce commodity on the prairies, and because of the battle which he put up so effectively we were able to carry out programs which otherwise would have been impossible.

However, I think his most distinguished feature was that as he grew older in years he remained eternally young in spirit. In recent years he became the chief proponent in Canada of policies for the conservation of Canada's water resources, and while for a time it seemed he was a voice crying in the wilderness I think the aroused public interest in this question today is a credit to his tenacity and his foresight.

I am sure members in all parties in the house will want to join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, in conveying to Mrs. McNaughton, and the members of the General's family our deepest sympathy, along with an expression of our pride in one of the great Canadians of our generation.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, General McNaughton was unquestionably a great and, in every way, a distinguished Canadian.

The members of the Ralliement Créditiste join the right hon. Prime Minister in offering Mrs. McNaughton and her family their deepest sympathy. Many Canadians considered the general as their hero, and I am sure all of Canada mourns this great loss to the country.

[Mr. Douglas.]

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that we all share a feeling of loss at the death of General McNaughton as we join in the expressions of sympathy that have been uttered by the right hon. Prime Minister and the other party leaders in the house. He was indeed a great soldier, a statesman, a scientist, a humanitarian, a Canadian of tireless energy and great intellectual capacity.

But what is more important, Mr. Speaker, is that in this day of conformity he dared to be an individualist. He held strong opinions and expressed them clearly and forcefully without waiting first to see which way the political wind was blowing. Those who knew him well and worked with him will remember his warm personality and will remember him as one whose insight into the needs of his country and whose powers of persuasion played a great role in preserving our national status.

General McNaughton never let the problems of a situation or the fatigue of advanced years thwart him from the duty at hand. Even after he had retired he continued to take an active role in public affairs. We sometimes had occasion to disagree with him, but we always respected him as a sagacious gentleman.

Historians will discuss his views for many years to come. His opinions on the second world war, his statements on the cold war, on our relationship with the United States, on our national water resources and on a host of other subjects will form the basis of many a learned debate. One thing is certain; he had the courage of his convictions and the more people we have like him the better off we will be. Canada has lost a great and devoted servant. Our deepest sympathy is extended to Mrs. McNaughton and the family, whose grief the nation shares.

EDUCATION

TABLING OF REVISED REPORT ON CONCEPT OF STUDENTS' NEEDS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, recently I have been asked a number of questions by hon. members concerning the procedures being followed by the provincial authorities in issuing certificates of eligibility to students to entitle them to loans under the Canada Student Loans Act. I thought it would be helpful to members of the house if I tabled a copy of the approved revised report of the federal-provincial standing committee on the concept of students' needs. This was agreed to by representatives of all the participating provinces at a meeting convened by the Department of Finance on April 29 of this year. I therefore ask leave of the house to table two copies of this report in the original English version and in a French translation.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: It will be recalled that the statute passed in 1964 authorizes loans to be made to students who are certified by the appropriate authority in each participating province to be in need of a loan of a specified amount. The provincial governments have co-operated by designating such authorities in their provinces, thereby enabling our legislation to be effective. They have also integrated it in varying degrees with their own student aid programs which include many bursaries awarded after a careful appraisal of the needs of the various applicants.

The provincial authorities have felt, and we have agreed, that we should strive for as much consistency as possible among participating provinces in the practices and standards they apply in administering this program, recognizing, of course, the need for some flexibility to allow for special circumstances and conditions. With this in mind we have encouraged and assisted provincial representatives to meet together periodically, and representatives of the Department of Finance have met with them. We have recognized that under our legislation the provincial authorities have the authority and responsibility for determining the relative need of the various applicants for student loans and thereby ensuring a fair apportionment among students of the amount of guaranteed loans which parliament has authorized.

In view of the terms of our legislation all of us, the provinces and the federal government, have proceeded on the general basis that need must be taken into account, and we have endeavoured to co-ordinate and work out with the provinces sensible principles to be observed in doing this. The agreed principles are expressed in the report I have tabled.

It is of course necessary for the provincial authorities to translate these agreed principles into particular practices and forms. Although we are usually aware of the practices they follow, we do not have the authority or desire to tell them just what they should do.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, would there be agreement on the part of the minister and the house to have this report printed as an appendix to Hansard, because of the wide interest in dissemination of this information?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that the report in question be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of report referred to above, see Appendix "A".]

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS FOLLOWING MEETING WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the conference between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries which came to an end on Friday last, I should like to table the final communiqué of that conference together with the report of its economic committee and the text of the protocol modifying the Canada-West Indian trade agreement of 1925. Perhaps it would meet the wishes of the house if these documents were printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of communiqué and other documents referred to above see Appendix "B".]

AIR TRANSPORT

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS ESTABLISHING DIRECT SERVICE, MONTREAL-MOSCOW

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the text of an agreement signed today between Canada and the Soviet union providing for direct air service between Montreal and Moscow, along with an exchange of letters on matters arising out of that agreement between the Minister of Transport of the Canadian government and the Minister of Civil Aviation of the government of the Soviet union.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps hon. members would like to have this document also printed as an appendix to today's Hansard. If the house is agreeable, I so move.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether we should be cluttering Hansard in this regard. It is my thought that all these documents should be printed in Votes and Proceedings, although a decision has been made in the other two cases.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the house prefers to do that, it is agreeable.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the original decision of the house appropriately meets the situation. If there is wide interest in these agreements should they not be printed in the document which receives the wider circulation? We think this should be appended to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it my understanding that an order has been passed for the printing of these documents as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be no agreement as to the second document. The suggestion has been made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that the document referred to by the Prime Minister in his second statement be printed in Votes and Proceedings. There must be general agreement and as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated, he would prefer to have the document printed as an appendix to Hansard rather than in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister originally suggested that the document be appended to Hansard and that the Leader of the Opposition suggested an alternative. I think the Prime Minister's original suggestion is the better one.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, it is my understanding that the Leader of the Opposition suggested that the document be printed in Votes and Proceedings, to which the Prime Minister agreed. I think that was the agreement eventually arrived at.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I understand an order of the house was made in regard to the first appendix, and that the right hon. gentleman then expressed some concern that we would be "cluttering Hansard" by printing in Hansard this type of agreement. He suggested that perhaps the second agreement could be printed in Votes and Proceedings and I indicated that I was quite agreeable to that suggestion if it met the general desire of the house. I have no particular preference.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should come to some agreement in this regard. It appears to me that the greater number of members prefer having this document printed in Votes and Proceedings.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In that there is no agreement and there can be no printing as suggested unless a motion is put and a vote taken, no action will be taken.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORTS, BUDGET, ETC.

On the order:

July 8—The Minister of Transport—the following proposed motion:—that the annual reports for 1965 of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, both tabled on April 20, 1966, the auditor's report to parliament for 1965 in respect of the Canadian National Railways, tabled on May 12, 1966, the budget for 1966 of the Canadian National Railways, tabled on April 20, 1966, the annual report of Air Canada for 1965, the auditor's report to parliament for 1965 in respect of Air Canada, both tabled on March 29, 1966, and the budget for 1966 of Air Canada, tabled January 18, 1966, be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day or at the next sitting of the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if there is unanimous agreement and no one wants to debate this purely formal motion perhaps it can be adopted now. I do not think we want to embark on a debate at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill moved:

That the annual reports for 1965 of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, both tabled on April 20, 1966, the auditors' report to parliament for 1965 in respect of the Canadian National Railways, tabled on May 12, 1966, the budget for 1966 of the Canadian National Railways, tabled on April 20, 1966, the annual report of Air Canada for 1965, the auditor's report to parliament for 1965 in respect of Air Canada, both tabled on March 29, 1966, and the budget for 1966 of Air Canada, tabled on January 18, 1966, be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ASSISTANCE FOR EXHIBITION BUILDING, ANTIGONISH, N.S.

Question No. 894—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has approval been given to government assistance in the construction of a multi-purpose exhibition building for Antigonish, Nova Scotia?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No.

C.B.C. BROADCASTING ON HIGHWAY SAFETY

Question No. 1,156—Mr. Noble:

How much broadcast time containing Canadian material has been allocated by C.B.C. Radio and C.B.C. TV during the past two years to matters of highway safety?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that approximately 100 hours were broadcast on C.B.C. radio networks and stations and approximately 75 hours on C.B.C. television networks and stations, predominantly in the form of brief public service announcements.

HALIFAX—OVERDUE PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Question No. 1,162—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Are there any payments overdue to the city of Halifax on behalf of the National Harbours Board, the Canadian National Railways, and other government agencies, in lieu of taxes for each of the past 3 years and the present year?

2. If any such payments are overdue (a) how long have they been overdue (b) in what amounts (c) on behalf of which agency of government?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Transport as follows:

Questions

1. Payments in lieu of taxes are ex gratia in nature and cannot be described as overdue inasmuch as no legal liability has been incurred in respect of them. The various federal agencies operating in Halifax do pay annual grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities. Efforts are made to have the payments effected during the financial year of the municipality to which they relate. However, it is not always possible to settle grants before the end of the municipality's financial year. In the city of Halifax, the amounts of the grants in respect of 1965 and 1966 have not yet been finally determined or paid by one agency, i.e., the National Harbours Board. Payments in respect of 1964 and 1963 have been settled in all instances.

2. The payment of grants in lieu of taxes in so far as the National Harbours Board is concerned for the calendar years 1965 and 1966 have been delayed due to the time required to determine the amounts payable under a new formula which increases the grants. However, an interim payment for the year 1965 has been made in the amount of $148,350 to the city of Halifax and the remainder will be paid as soon as the necessary assessment values and calculations have been determined to fix the exact amount of the grant. All grants have been made up to and including 1964 and an interim payment for the year 1965.

INQUIRY AS TO DETENTION OF ERIC SCHMIDT

Question No. 1,416—Mr. Lambert:

1. Had the Government of Canada been advised of the detention of a Canadian citizen, Eric Schmidt, of Edmonton, Alberta, by the authorities of the German Democratic Republic prior to his release in 1965 after 75 days of incarceration?

2. If so, what representations did the government make, if any, to ascertain the reasons for this detention and to assure the earliest possible release of Mr. Schmidt?

3. Does the government now propose to file protest with the German Democratic Republic or some other appropriate authority if it deems the detention to have been illegal?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No. The first information we had regarding this matter was that contained in an article which appeared in the Telegram, Toronto, May 4, 1966 following Mr. Schmidt's return to Canada.

2. See 1 above.

3. The Canadian Government does not recognize the East German regime and maintains no diplomatic relations with it. If it were decided to pursue a matter of this kind it would be necessary to take it up through the Soviet occupation authorities. The Department of External Affairs is writing to Mr. Schmidt to invite him to provide a report on his arrest in East Germany, following which the department will consider whether further action may be warranted in the circumstances.

[English]

PROTEST TO RUSSIA RESPECTING TREATMENT OF JEWS

Question No. 1,610—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the government of Canada make an official protest to the U.S.S.R. regarding the investigations imposed upon or suffered by Jewish citizens in the U.S.S.R., which by discriminatory measures deny Jews the full right to practise their religion in freedom?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government of Canada has many times expressed its concern about violations of human rights wherever and whenever they occur in any part of the world.

In seeking the best means of helping to bring these violations to an end, it is obviously necessary to take account of all the relevant circumstances. The carefully considered judgment of the government at the present time is that representations on this subject beyond those already made would be considered if it is established that such action would be in the best interests of those most directly concerned.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY STAFF

Question No. 1,631—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What is the total staff of the Department of Industry?

2. How many of these are professionally trained in the fields of economics, law, business administration, engineering, accounting and planning?

3. How many of these have post graduate training?

4. What are the salaries in each of these fields in the department?

5. What vacancies exist in each of these fields in the department?

6. Is it the intention of the department to enlarge its staff?

7. How many of the staff are engaged in economic research and planning?

8. What research projects are in progress by the department?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry):

1. 435.

2. 144.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

3. 65.

4. $8,135 to $27,000.

5. The present officer vacancy in the department is 104. The particular types of training mentioned in question 2 form the basic qualifications for the general class of industrial development analysts which form the basic officer strength in the department.

6. The department is carrying out a continuing recruiting program in an attempt to fill the approved establishment.

7. The number of staff engaged in economic research and planning is 23. In addition to those directly engaged as economists, a considerable portion of the time of other officers is used in the collection and assembly of data necessary for the economic studies of the various industries.

8. Research studies in progress consist of studies of regional growth, studies of productivity, studies of the various industries from the standpoint of structure, competitiveness in domestic and export markets, costs, productivity, profitability and the effect of government policies including tariffs and taxation, and import analysis.

GRANT TO CRIMINOLOGY CENTRE, TORONTO UNIVERSITY

Question No. 1,692—Mr. Starr:

1. Has the federal government either directly or indirectly provided for a grant for the centre of criminology at the University of Toronto?

2. If so, how much has been disbursed to date and what further amount of grant is to be made?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice):

1. Yes.

2. A grant of $40,000 was provided in the Department of Justice estimates for 1964-65. It was paid in full on April 12, 1965.

DRUG PURCHASES BY FEDERAL MEDICAL CENTRES

Question No. 1,696—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Do hospitals and medical centres under federal jurisdiction buy drugs under their generic names or under their brand names?

2. What is the percentage of each?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned:

1. Yes. The Department of Defence Production purchases drugs under their generic names and brand names for the Department of National Defence.

2. Generic names, 95 per cent; brand names, 5 per cent.

In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

1. The bulk of the drugs used in the hospitals and treatment centres of the Department of National Health and Welfare are purchased under generic name. Some purchases are made by brand name to accommodate the requirements of certain fee for service physicians, who refuse to prescribe or use pharmaceuticals produced by what are to them unknown manufacturers.

2. It is estimated that 85 per cent of the drugs used are purchased by generic name and 15 per cent by brand name.

In so far as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned:

1. Drugs are purchased by the Department of Veterans Affairs under both generic names and brand names. Under departmental policy drugs are to be requested by generic names wherever possible, although trade names may also be used for purposes of identification or where one brand of drug may be available from only one source of supply.

2. It is estimated that 65 per cent of the drug purchases by the Department of Veterans Affairs are made under brand names and 35 per cent under generic names.

CONSTRUCTION OF CORRIDOR ROAD THROUGH U.S.

Question No. 1,702—Mr. Coates:

1. Have any negotiations or discussions taken place between the government of Canada and the government of the United States with regard to the construction of a corridor road between the province of New Brunswick and the province of Quebec and, if so, what has been the result of these discussions?

2. Has a proposal been made by the government of the United States to the government of Canada indicating a willingness by the government of the United States to construct a corridor road from New Brunswick to Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont to the New York state throughway in exchange for Canada paving the Alaska highway and, if so, what has been the reaction to this proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No such negotiations or discussions have taken place.

2. No such proposal has been received.

HIGHWAY SAFETY PROMOTION

Question No. 1,708—Mr. Noble:

Has the government taken any action in regard to the promotion of highway safety and, if so, what action?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes.

In so far as the Departments of Defence Production and Industry are concerned:

1. The Canadian government specifications board has prepared a draft automotive vehicle safety code in collaboration with the Canadian Good Roads Association and the traffic injury research foundation. The draft has been submitted for critical review to a committee consisting of representatives of the provinces, the motor vehicle manufacturers, safety groups, the medical profession and others. A revised draft is now being prepared.

2. The government has undertaken to include all available safety features in the specifications governing the procurement of conventional type vehicles for both civilian departments and the military.

3. Two consultants have been engaged; one to assist on the automotive safety code and the other to conduct research studies.

4. Consideration is being given to what other steps the federal government can usefully take in the light of the constitutional position and the relative responsibilities of the provinces and the government in this area.

APPLICATIONS FOR EXEMPTION UNDER LABOUR CODE

Question No. 1,733—Mr. Dionne:

Have any Canadian employers submitted requests for deferment of the operation of the labour code in their undertakings and, if so (a) who are they (b) what reasons were given by such employers for requesting deferment of the operation of the labour code and of the regulations made thereunder (c) were all requests submitted by the different employers granted (d) if not, what are the names of the employers whose requests were refused?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Yes. Deferment can only be granted with respect to the operation of part I and section 11 of part II of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

(b) The introduction of the standard hours of work or the maximum hours of work under part I

(i) would be or is unduly prejudicial to the interests of the employees therein or to any class of employees therein, or

(ii) Would be or is seriously detrimental to the operation of the federal work, undertaking or business.

The immediate introduction of the minimum wages under part II

(i) Would unduly prejudice the interests of the employees therein or any class of employees therein, or

(ii) Would be seriously detrimental to the operation of the federal work, undertaking or business.

(c) No.

(d) Under section 52 of the following submissions have been rejected before June 20, 1966:

EUROPEAN STUDENTS WOULD COME TO WORK IN CANADA

Question No. 1,734—Mr. Dionne:

Did any European students come during 1965 and 1966 to work on fruit or tobacco farms in Ontario or in other provinces under an agreement with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and, if so (a) how many (b) on what conditions?

[Translation]

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No such students came forward in 1965 or thus far in 1966. However, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has approved the temporary entry of the following student groups for 1966.

(i) 340 Belgian university students for work on Southwestern Ontario tobacco farms owned by Belgian Canadians. The movement is sponsored by the Belgian in The World Association which will be fully responsible for transportation, employment, welfare and all other matters involving the students during their stay in Canada from August 1st to mid-September, 1966. The Delhi Belgian Club and the Sacred Heart Church, Langton, Ontario will assist with the placement on farms.

(ii) 66 Austrian university students for work on Ontario tobacco farms. The movement is sponsored by the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board of Tillsonburg. The Board has guaranteed employment from August 1st to September 15th, 1966 at a rate of $16 a day plus room and board. The Board has also guaranteed accommodation for the students. The students will make their own arrangements for hospital and medical coverage while they are in Canada and will be responsible for their own transportation.

(iii) 150 French university students for work on Ontario tobacco farms. The movement is sponsored by the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board of Tillsonburg under exactly the same terms and conditions which apply for the Austrian students.

MAPLE LEAF SERVICES

Question No. 1,738—Mr. Madill:

1. Who receives the one dollar ($1.00) per car being charged by the Department of National Defence for stickers for employees bringing on base their cars which are supposed to have been inspected by Maple Leaf Services?

2. Who receives the fifty (50) cents per sticker that is put on each vehicle by Maple Leaf Services?

3. Are the men performing this vehicle safety check licensed mechanics or qualified, as required by the Department of Transport?

4. Is an annual statement made public of the business transactions and disbursements of Maple Leaf Services operating on Department of National Defence bases?

5. Why are the businesses leasing from Maple Leaf Services not forced to pay commercial and business taxes to the townships in which they are located when the department gives a grant in lieu of taxes to those municipalities?

6. Do the rates of pay to employees of Maple Leaf Services meet that of the National Labour Code?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. The Department of National Defence does not charge or receive $1 per car for stickers. However, this sum is charged by Maple Leaf Services at Canadian forces base Borden for the service performed in carrying out a safety check of a vehicle and is actually at or below cost. A vehicle owner is not obliged to have the service carried out by Maple Leaf Services but may have his vehicle safety check done at any of the free check points maintained by the Ontario Department of Transport throughout the province.

2. The charge of 50 cents per sticker is not levied by Maple Leaf Services. Upon proof of having passed the vehicle safety check and of having insurance coverage on a vehicle, military and civilian vehicle owners employed at Canadian forces base Borden are issued with a permanent vehicle base pass in the form of a sticker which is placed on the windshield. This money is administered by the base military authorities and is used to cover the cost of the stickers and administrative costs related thereto. The issue of a permanent pass is general practice at most military bases, although the type of sticker and the charge may vary.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. The position of a business operating under a lease from Maple Leaf Services is no different from any other business. As such the lessee is liable to comply with all federal, provincial and municipal laws, regulations and ordnances relating to taxation and assumes complete and sole liability to do so under the terms of the lease agreement. The application of grants to the municipality is not relevant.

6. Maple Leaf Services pays their employees according to provincial requirements; however, the question as to whether M.L.S. comes under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code is one which is now receiving consideration by M.L.S. and the appropriate federal government departments concerned.

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING BREATHALIZER TESTS AND EXHAUST CONTROL DEVICES

Question No. 1,764—Mr. Noble:

Does the government plan on taking early action on the recommendations made June 21, 1966, by the special fifty-member committee of government officials and safety experts, especially in making the breathalizer test mandatory and the requiring of pollution control devices for motor vehicle exhaust systems?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): The government is giving consideration to the recommendations made by the Canadian government specifications board committee on the automotive vehicle safety code held on 20-21 June 1966.

1. In so far as making the breathalizer test mandatory is concerned, the recommendation regarding the principle of implied consent respecting breathalizer testing is being referred to provincial authorities by the committee.

2. The recommendation to amend the Criminal Code making it a criminal offence to operate a vehicle while the alcohol content of the operator's breath exceeds a specified limit, as determined by the breathalizer test, is being referred to the Department of Justice and to the chairman of the standing committee on justice and legal affairs that is now studying Bill C-87.

In so far as requiring of pollution control devices for motor vehicle exhaust systems is concerned, the committee recommended that the standard for the pollutants omission control be deleted from the proposed standards because: (a) It is not yet agreed that this is indeed a safety device. (b) The Department of National Health and Welfare is making a detailed study of the problem of air contamination in close consultation with their counterparts in the United States.

*AMOUNTS PAID JOINT CHAIRMEN OF B AND B COMMISSION

Question No. 1,768—Mr. Madill:

What was the total amount paid for (a) honoraria (b) travelling expenses, living expenses, and other expenses, to Mr. Dunton and Mr. Laurendeau, the joint chairmen of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, in each year since the inception of the commission?

Questions

Mr. P.-E. Trudeau (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the royal commission as follows:

(a) Honoraria: Mr. Laurendeau, co-chairman and chief executive officer of the commission working full time since the beginning of 1964-65 on commission business received $10,200 in 1963-64, $21,800 in 1964-65, $20,400 in 1965-66, and $3,500 to the end of May 1966. Mr. Dunton, co-chairman, received $7,750 in 1963-64, $13,450 in 1964-65, $11,150 in 1965-66, and $1,950 to the end of May 1966. (b) Travel expenses: Mr. Laurendeau, who is resident in Montreal and receives travel expenses for time spent on commission business away from that city, received $1,887.50 in 1963-64, $4,354.42 in 1964-65, $3,730.93 in 1965-66, and $305.55 to the end of May 1966. Mr. Dunton, resident in Ottawa and receiving travel expenses while on commission business away from that city, received $439.95 in 1963-64, $2,133.60 in 1964-65, and $1,467.75 in 1965-66.

IMMIGRATION APPLICATIONS FROM COMMUNIST AND NON-COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

Question No. 1,772—Mr. Allmand:

1. What percentage of applicants for admission to Canada from communist countries were actually admitted during 1963, 1964 and 1965?

2. How does this percentage compare with the equivalent average of applicants from non-communist countries?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1 and 2. Information not available.

CLOSING OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICES, PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Question No. 1,777—Mr. Olson:

Does the Unemployment Insurance Commission intend to close any of its present offices in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba and, if so (a) how many (b) what are the names of cities or towns where offices will be closed (c) what arrangements are to be made for U.I.C. service in the cities or towns where the offices will be closed (d) in the case of each office that will be closed, which remaining office will serve the area?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I am informed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission that it has decided to close some offices in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

(a) Three. (b) Portage la Prairie, Manitoba; Swift Current, Saskatchewan; North Battleford, Saskatchewan.

(c) Service will be provided by mail through the offices referred to in (d).

(d) Winnipeg will service the Portage la Prairie area; Regina will service the Swift Current area and Saskatoon will service the North Battleford area.

APPLICATIONS UNDER SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Question No. 1,779—Mr. Coates:

1. How many applications have been approved under the Small Businesses Loans Act in the years 1963, 1964 and 1965, and what was the total amount loaned under the act in each of those years?

2. What was the breakdown by provinces and the total amounts loaned in each of them for each of the years in question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance):

1.

	1963	1964	1965

*EXCHANGE OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS TO PROMOTE BILINGUALISM

Question No. 1,799—Mr. McCleave:

Has the Prime Minister or anybody on his behalf written to any assistant deputy ministers or others at top levels in the civil service to inquire whether they would move to Quebec temporarily to perfect their bilingualism?

Mr. P.-E. Trudeau (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): As recently announced, the Prime Minister has written to all ministers asking them to send nominations of senior officials from the department and agencies under their control, from which could be met the initial requirements for the 1966-67 term of the program to promote bilingualism in the public service. Under this program, as the Prime Minister announced in the house on April 6, 1966, a number of senior officials plus their families will spend a 12-month period in Quebec city in the case of English speaking public servants, and in Toronto in the case of French speaking public servants. In this way they may devote their full time to becoming proficient in the second official language of the country and to obtaining a better understanding of the cultural values of the community they will be visiting.

*EXCHANGE OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS TO PROMOTE BILINGUALISM

Question No. 1,816—Mr. McCleave:

Has the prime minister or anybody on his behalf written to any assistant deputy ministers or others at top levels in the civil service to inquire whether they would move to Toronto temporarily to perfect their bilingualism?

Mr. P.-E. Trudeau (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): As recently announced, the Prime Minister has written to all ministers asking them to send nominations of senior officials from the departments and agencies under their control, from which could be met the initial requirements for the 1966-67 term of the program to promote bilingualism in the public service. In this way they may devote their full time to becoming proficient in the second official language of the country and to obtaining a better understanding of the cultural values of the community they will be visiting.

SUPERINTENDENT OF WOMEN'S PRISON, KINGSTON

Question No. 1,821—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

1. On what date will an appointment be made of a permanent superintendent for the women's prison at Kingston?

2. How many applications have been received to date?

3. Will the superintendent chosen be a woman?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. An appointment will be made as soon as a suitable candidate is found.

2. 12.

3. Yes, if at all possible.

FEMALE PRISONERS, MATSQUI INSTITUTION

Question No. 1,822—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

1. How many women prisoners are expected to arrive at the Matsqui institution for drug addicts in July, 1966?

2. How many of these are being transferred from the women's prison at Kingston?

3. How many of these have signified their desire to be transferred?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1, 2 and 3. 10.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT OWNED AIRCRAFT AND VESSELS

Question No. 1,390—Mr. Godin:

1. What is the number of Canadian-owned (a) aircraft (b) vessels?

2. For each department of the Government of Canada (a) how many aircraft and vessels are attached to their services (b) what is the annual maintenance cost for these aircraft and vessels?

Return tabled.

JUDGES PARTICIPATING IN BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Question No. 1,632—Mr. Fairweather:

1. During each of the years 1963, 1964 and 1965, how many judges appointed by Canada were engaged in extra duties, e.g., presiding over boards and commissions either part time or full time?

2. What are the names of these judges and in what province or judicial district have they jurisdiction?

3. Is consideration being given to recruiting people from outside the judiciary for this responsibility?

Return tabled.

Questions

REVIEW PROCEDURE, EMPLOYMENT SERVICE OFFICER

Question No. 1,644—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Has a review procedure been established for the employment service officer series in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and, if so (a) have any reviews been carried out to date (b) will those who have not qualified be given the reasons why they did not qualify (c) have such reviews resulted in any departmental recommendation to the Civil Service Commission for consideration (d) will those who failed be appraised for lower grade employment service officer positions (e) when will this be done (f) will those who failed be transferred or will they fill positions of a higher grade at a lower level etc. (g) what are the standards against which those being examined were assessed at the various levels (h) to what extent was past performance a factor in making selections?

2. Has a plan been implemented of employment service officer results with respect to salary levels in order to distinguish between persons going from E.O. 1 and E.O. 2 to the E.S.O. 2 level, and persons going from the minimum and maximum of their present levels to the new levels and, if so, have veterans' preferences been taken into consideration?

3. Is it the policy of the department to ask managers not to join staff associations?

Return tabled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with the delays in the answers to questions. It is not defence on the part of the government to contend that it has answered a great many questions; the number of questions answered does not begin to compare with those in the parliament at Westminster. There has been dilatoriness and worse in connection with some of these questions.

Now we are approaching, as we hope, the time of recess, I want to point out to you, sir, some of these questions to which, for reasons known to the government, answers are not being given. I am not going to read them except in the case of two or three. Question No. 587 has been on the order paper since February 10. There is no difficulty about that question whatsoever. It concerns the C.B.C. The next question is No. 1,156. This question has been on the order paper since March 24. Again it concerns the C.B.C.

Then we come to starred questions. What is the purpose of a starred question? It is simply to get an answer immediately. Yet question No. 1283 has been on the order paper since April 6. Surely this is an unnecessary delay. I am passing over many with regard to which the government might have reasons for delay, but question No. 1,457 is a simple one:

Has a request been received by the federal government, or the Atlantic Development Board, from the government of the province of Newfoundland for additional assistance in the doubling of the size of the Baie d'Espoir power development—

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Surely there is no excuse for this house waiting for two months for an answer to that question. Then there is starred question No. 1,500. This is another of the questions connected with the C.B.C., regarding which for some reason there is difficulty in the Secretary of State bringing forward even reasonably delayed answers. The question is:

Has any member of the present cabinet, during the past three years, received an honorarium or fee from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for appearances on television or radio?

That is not a difficult question. Certainly it would not take long to ascertain which of the ministers, if any, have even approached a contravention of the House of Commons Act. Then there is starred question No. 1,668. Almost a month ago I asked:

Will the government set aside a day during the centennial year, 1967, to be known as "National Indian Day"—

I have received no answer to that question. Then there is question 1,760, which was placed on the order paper on June 21. It is a starred question asked by myself:

Is the government giving consideration to enactment in the Criminal Code of guide lines respecting police interrogation of suspected wrongdoers—

And so I might go on. There have been unnecessary delays in answering these questions. I raise this point at the moment in a desire to co-operate. When oral questions are asked Your Honour often says they should be placed on the order paper and we always defer to that ruling. But the delay involved in answering some of these questions indicates that they have become mummified.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—HOUSE CONSIDERATION OF TOLL INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Minister of Transport. A week ago the minister declined to make public the recommendation made to him by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority in respect of tolls on operations of the St. Lawrence seaway. Will the minister assure the house that no increase in tolls will be authorized during the vacation period by order in council and before this house has further opportunity to discuss the matter fully?

I ask that question in view of the fact that those of us sitting on this side of the house have, I think without exception, taken a strong stand against any increase, which will have a serious and detrimental effect on Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I also read Mr. Fraser Robertson's article—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did he say?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I take some exception to the allegation that I was in contempt of this house in suggesting that although a statutory date is set for the report to the government by the seaway authority, it would not be advisable to make that report public while there was still an opportunity of negotiations continuing which would lead to a joint understanding with the United States. I think this is a wholly responsible attitude on our part, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman would have taken it had he been on this side of the house.

Any change in tolls will not come into effect before the opening of navigation in 1967, and I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that no action will be taken by the government until an announcement is made in this house.

I think it is very important that an announcement be made, that the government should take whatever responsibility it is required to take, and that the house should hold the government responsible for doing so. At the same time let me point out that the right hon. gentleman was in this house, although I was not, when the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act was passed, so he knows perfectly well—and I am sure he was one of those who supported it—that that act requires the government and the seaway authority to impose a level of tolls which will amortize that investment. That is the law of Canada, and the government would be in real contempt of parliament if it defied the law. That is my interpretation at least of my responsibilities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister answer just this one question. Will he give the House of Commons an opportunity to discuss this matter before the government makes its order, as it will be too late to discuss it afterwards?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not sure Mr. Speaker, that the government makes an order. Of course I am not a lawyer like the right hon. gentleman; however, I will assure the right hon. gentleman that the government will assume its responsibility in this matter before the house in a conscientious manner. We are answerable to the house and if what we do is not the wish of the house, a remedy is open to all hon. members under our system of responsible government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That means the rates will go up.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, has the minister been advised by his officials that the United States government is strongly opposed to raising the tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Pickersgill: Unlike the hon. gentleman who, when he was over here, dealt with one country in the western hemisphere that way, I prefer not to say what will be the attitude of any other country during the course of negotiations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member for Northumberland asked the question which I had in mind, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

CANADIAN AID TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES—CHANGES IN TRADE ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any additional comments to make regarding the communiqué he has just tabled respecting the meeting which was held in Ottawa with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries. I wish to ask the Prime Minister in particular whether the $65 million spread over five years represents a marked increase over what was originally planned and, if so, how much? I also wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the latter part of paragraph 8 means that this is still an open-ended figure and that Canada would be prepared to give greater assistance to the Caribbean countries if the situation seemed to warrant it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The amount that is mentioned in the communiqué, and emphasized as such, is a minimum amount. It is also stated in the communiqué that if our external aid appropriations are generally increased by parliament, as we hope will be the case because it is the responsibility of this house, then the aid to the Commonwealth Caribbean countries will go above the minimum amount which is stated in the communiqué as being $65 million. We expect that the Commonwealth Caribbean countries will all share in any increase over that minimum.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, regarding another statement in which the Canadian government had indicated its willingness to work toward an effective international sugar agreement. I wish to ask either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether the idea of an international sugar agreement will now be extended not only to the Caribbean countries but to a number of other countries. The Minister of Finance will remember that two years ago I asked the government whether they would be prepared to follow the example of the United States and the United Kingdom and enter into a long term sugar agreement. At that time the price was high; now it is the lowest in a hundred years.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Douglas: My question is whether this is the first step toward a general international sugar agreement and, if so, when does the minister expect to bring it down?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Canada has been supporting very vigorously the conclusion of an international sugar agreement, but the step that was taken at the conference with the Caribbean countries of the Commonwealth is not directly related thereto. It is a special convention to establish free trade in sugar between Canada and these Caribbean countries. This will remain regardless of any other agreements which might be negotiated subsequently.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): This is a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister of Finance how these trade arrangements will be implemented by parliament. Will it be done by ratification of the protocol or by the introduction of new tariff items?

Mr. Sharp: The method of implementing the special arrangements with regard to sugar has not been decided upon, partly because it will be necessary to go before the GATT and ask for a waiver and follow some other procedure before they can become effective. However, I expect the changes will be incorporated into the tariff.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, with respect to these trade changes. Desirable as these changes may be for the improvement of trade relations, will the minister give us an assurance that parliament will be given an opportunity to express itself? I ask this because the eastern Canadian ports are worried that the removal of restrictions may have an adverse effect on their competitive position. Can the minister tell us whether this matter will be discussed in parliament and whether these agreements will be implemented by a ratification of the protocol or by the introduction of new tariff items?

Mr. Sharp: The changes that have been made in the trade arrangements between the Caribbean countries of the Commonwealth and Canada have been incorporated into the protocol. So far as they require changes in the law—for example the change in the tariff on sugar—they would certainly come before parliament for approval. So far as the transshipment clause of the Commonwealth preference is concerned, I cannot speak with full authority. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue believes it is subject to regulation and it will therefore be necessary to take special measures to bring this matter before parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. members that this is now becoming a debate, and I would like to give other hon. members an opportunity to speak.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As a result of various agreements signed with the West Indies and according to the information we have had, the Canadian government has agreed to give financial assistance toward broadcasting facilities to the amount of approximately $5 million.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if his government will spend similar amounts to give French radio and television to our compatriots in western Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is too general to be accepted at this time, I believe.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is more general in Jamaica than in Canada at the present time.

[English]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Finance. Could he tell the house with which countries other than those in the Caribbean Canada has been attempting to negotiate a long term sugar policy?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the efforts we are making to promote an international sugar agreement apply to all countries of the world which produce sugar although, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, we are not engaged in any negotiations to enter into long term contracts to buy sugar.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. Does the government now propose to change the conditions as to the places of entry into Canada of goods from the Caribbean?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the qualification of shipment for Commonwealth preference, the answer was given in the protocol that was agreed between the government of Canada and the governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries, namely that the requirement of direct shipment is being waived and trans-shipment may be permitted.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister inform the house of any announcement by the United States government this morning to cancel defence contracts in this country?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question, if I may. According to a press release from Washington the U.S. secretary of defence has stated that the United States government will cancel contracts with Canada for the production of aerial bombs because of the impact on the balance of payments of the war—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I was asking the minister whether he is aware of this press release from Washington.

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen it. I have inquired of my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production and if it exists it has not been brought to his attention either.

Mr. Winkler: May I bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Industry? Is the minister aware of any such announcement from Washington?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of National Defence has pointed out, the answer is no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Everybody knows about it but the government.

[Later:]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether the Canadian government has been negotiating with the United States for the sale of aerial bombs?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this would come under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Winkler: Then may I direct the question to the Minister of Industry and Defence Production?

Mr. Drury: I did not hear the question. I am sorry.

Mr. Winkler: I will repeat it. Is the government of Canada in fact negotiating with the United States for the sale of aerial bombs?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was obliged to repeat his question twice and this gave me an opportunity to reflect on it. I would think it is not acceptable at this time. If he believes it is urgent he can debate it later.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Minister of Industry whether it is expected there will be a very large reduction in orders for war material and the like required by the United States in consequence of the difficulties which the United States is experiencing with its balance of payments. Has the minister received any such word from Washington?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this question is exactly the same as one which was asked some time ago. I forget what the answer was, but it seems to me this question was asked earlier today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are approaching the end of the session. I would point out that it is no use our putting questions on the order paper and expecting them to be answered. If hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to answer this question, that is fine. What we want to confirm is that the government knows nothing about a situation which is spoken of in Washington as being imminent and decided on.

Mr. Pearson: Newspaper gossip.

Mr. Winkler: My question is certainly one of national importance. Moreover, it is urgent. I want to know from the minister whether the government of Canada has been negotiating with the United States defence department for the sale of aerial bombs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asked that question a few moments ago and, rightly or wrongly, I said he could not raise it at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will make one more attempt to keep within the rules and at the same time have some regard to the economic position which would be created by a cancellation of orders. Is it a fact that Canadian contracts with the United States for bomb production will be cancelled and that some defence contracts will be cancelled too because of the drain on U.S. foreign exchange? Has the minister no information on this?

Mr. Drury: I thought the right hon. gentleman was aware of the agreement we have with the United States providing for production sharing. This agreement contemplates that a rough balance in trade between the two countries will be maintained regardless of difficulties that may be experienced by either side with respect to foreign exchange. This being so, we have no reason to believe the United States intends to abrogate this agreement in any way. On the contrary, at the present time the balance is flowing or tending slightly in Canada's favour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now ask whether the United States Secretary of Defence, Mr. McNamara, informed the Canadian government that the Canadian contract for bomb production would be cancelled and that other defence contracts would have to be cancelled because of the drain on foreign exchange. Did the minister receive such a message, or do we have to depend on the C.B.C. in Washington?

Mr. Drury: As I said earlier, I have no knowledge of any such message. However, I will be glad to check it and I will be glad to prove that the C.B.C. and the right hon. gentleman are wrong again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): As a supplementary question, does the minister consider that our present adverse balance of trade with the United States of over $1 billion a year is a satisfactory situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is argumentative.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that during the past three months the cost of living has risen by a full percentage point—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question and not make a statement.

Mr. Hees: I was just getting to my question, Mr. Speaker—does the minister consider that his program for combating inflation which he announced in his budget speech is working out satisfactorily?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not acceptable. It is of a very general nature and cannot be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether the government intends to introduce a measure before the summer recess to combat the sharp rise in the cost of living?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No special additional measure before the summer recess, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the minister intend to make this afternoon the statement promised toward the end of last week concerning the increase in old age pensions?

[English]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: One further question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister tell the house whether he intends to make this statement this very week, if not today?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before the beginning of the summer adjournment a statement will be made.

INDUSTRY

KINCARDINE, ONT.—INCLUSION AS DESIGNATED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and concerns a letter written to the Prime Minister on May 19 by the provincial member for Bruce. Would the Prime Minister say whether he has received this letter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received this letter and I have answered it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think it is in order for an hon. member to ask whether a letter has been received. That in itself is not a question which can be asked at this time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for answering it.

[Later:]

Mr. Loney: I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister consulted the Minister of Industry in an endeavour to honour a commitment of his party to the people of the Kincardine area, as set out in a letter from the provincial member for Bruce?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Loney: It is a very obvious question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is obviously an interesting question to the hon. member, but from the manner in which it has been asked it is impossible for the Chair to determine how urgent it is. If the hon. member feels there is urgency in the matter, perhaps it is a question that might be discussed at the time of the adjournment debate.

Mr. Loney: May I rephrase my question. May I ask the Minister of Industry what action is to be taken in reply to the text of the letter concerned?

Mr. Speaker: I must make the same suggestion to the hon. member. This does not appear to be an urgent matter. If the hon. member thinks it is, he will have an opportunity to ask his question and debate the subject to some extent on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): To emphasise the urgency of the question, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it concerns an important economic area within the Georgian Bay region. I believe it is a very proper question. It is certainly an important one so far as the minister is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Again I would point out that the hon. member has an opportunity to discuss this matter on the adjournment. The hon. member says no answer has been given. He will have an opportunity then to ask for and perhaps receive an answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has any additional information as to when the committee on election expenses will submit its report? I understand that the Prime Minister said on April 29 that it would be available for tabling in the first week of June.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I did say that. That was the information I had at the time, and I have been asking every week since. I understand that the difficulties of translation and other things which the commission have encountered are now almost overcome and that the report will be ready for presentation to the house very shortly.

BROADCASTING

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my questions are directed to the Minister of Transport and arise out of section 8 of the white paper on broadcasting, wherein it is stated that the B.B.G. may be required to investigate public complaints regarding foreign or monopolistic ownership of broadcast media.

Is the minister prepared to assure the house on the eve of the adjournment that in so far as local or national domination of our media of communications is concerned, or the foreign control thereof, no licences for radio and television will be granted until parliament has had an opportunity to deal with the white paper and the recommendations made therein?

Another question, which has come to me from several sources, is whether the minister will endeavour to assist those bona fide applicants for cable T.V. in the areas which today are denied access thereto?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, under the Broadcasting Act, which was introduced into this house by the government of the right hon. gentleman, there is a provision to the effect that a licence may not be given for any broadcasting station in this country if the ownership thereof is more than 25 per cent non-Canadian. That law is being carried out, and it seems to me that until there is a change in the law it would be quite improper for the government, and certainly for a minister, arbitrarily to interfere with the carrying out of th law.

With regard to CATV, in response to a question from the hon. member for Wellington South the other day I indicated that until the law was changed the present policy with respect to applications for CATV licences will be carried out.

The present policy is that when one of these applications is received it is sent informally to the Board of Broadcast Governors, who have one question to answer: Would the granting of this licence be apt to inhibit the development of alternate television in the area? Up to now if they have said no to that question and the application was otherwise in order, a licence has issued. If they have said yes to the question the applicants have been told that a licence will not be issued; but, if the law is changed to provide for formal hearings before the Board of Broadcast Governors, their right to reapply would in no way be prejudiced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his very careful and complete answer, and I would now ask him this. In view of the suggestions that are made in the white paper, does he not think that until they are dealt with by the house and opportunity has been given for full discussion it would not be appropriate to issue licences in which foreign capital has a considerable interest or, indeed, newspaper chains or existing television and radio stations?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me as one minister and not the minister primarily answerable to the house for broadcasting, to attempt to make any answer to that question. I think it would be presumtuous on my part to do so. It is obviously something which would have to be considered by the government as a whole.

I think we would have to consider very carefully whether we would set aside the law recommended to and passed by this house in the days when the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister in favour of some other policy that parliament had not approved. But I am sure my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has heard the question, and also the hon. lady the Secretary of State, and I have no doubt that we will give it all the consideration that the eminence of the right hon. gentleman's position warrants.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to cause the hon. gentleman to be presumptuous in any way, or to deal in a cavalier manner with the law as it is, or to do anything that would constitute a travesty of parliament. But I would ask him whether or not he does not think, the white paper having been introduced with such a parade and so much panoply, that it would not be evading the law in any way, should applications come before the government, if the government were to postpone a decision thereon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Transport that although this exchange is very interesting it is now developing into something of the nature of a debate between the two hon. gentlemen.

NATIONAL PARKS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, but in his absence possibly the parliamentary secretary or the minister in charge could take it as notice. Perhaps I might be permitted to put the question directly and qualify it later, if necessary, as to its urgency in the national interest.

Will the minister inform the house if surveys are under way at the present time with a view to opening a prairie federal park between Fir Mountain and Valmarie in the constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek, which will eliminate many acres of much needed grazing land required if Canada is to maintain cattle production to meet demands?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that it would take a considerable amount of qualifying to convince me that the question should be answered or asked now. I suggest that it be placed on the order paper or perhaps discussed this evening.

Mr. McIntosh: I can qualify it if you will allow me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have the opportunity to do so this evening.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, on two occasions I have asked the Minister of Labour whether he would discuss with the right hon. the Prime Minister the tabling of the text of a statement which, according to a telegram tabled last Friday, the Prime Minister had made to the parties concerned in the final stages of negotiations leading to the settlement of the longshoremen's strike. May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he will not discuss with the Prime Minister the tabling of the statement?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that, having been engaged for several hours since before nine o'clock this morning at a cabinet committee meeting, I have not had the opportunity to do so. I will do so as soon as the house rises and I shall let my hon. friend know promptly thereafter.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the Minister of Public Works said on Friday that the bill which relates to this matter may be debated today. Could the minister not undertake, if I might put it to him respectfully, to see to it that the statement, if it is to be tabled, is tabled before that debate?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, in my previous answer through inadvertence I said "as soon as the house rises". I meant that I would do what I indicated immediately after the question hour. The answer might then be available.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CONTINUATION OF PROMOTIONAL EFFORTS IN NEW YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Jean Wadds (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Owing to the success of centennial promotion publicity so far undertaken in New York city, will the government not give sympathetic consideration to further centennial promotion ideas that may be proposed to encourage visitors to come to Canada from that city?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have been very pleased at the success of the promotion in New York city on behalf of both the centennial and Expo. The promotion campaign probably will be moved round the country and cause more visitors to come here. We are viewing with sympathy any projects which would lead people in and around the New York area to come to both Expo and the centennial. I should like to say to the hon. member that almost anything she suggests will be favourably received by this member of the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that it appears we shall be starting discussion of the government's medicare program tomorrow, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he will not ensure that an answer is given to starred question No. 1710, which appears on the order paper as of June 15, before that debate begins? Could the question not be answered during the question period tomorrow?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at this question and I have a proposed answer, but I question its regularity because it is hypothetical in its nature.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister would clear up the hypothesis in his answer. I want a positive answer. The question is not hypothetical at all.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Has the hon. lady been asked to authorize that reproductions of the Rex Woods painting of the fathers of confederation, which is being hung in this building, shall be displayed in government buildings across Canada? If so, what decision has she reached on the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this is a question which is so urgent that it should be asked at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FAILURE TO PROVIDE PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND WITH TELEVISION STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Transport if he has anything further to add to his reply to the question I asked him on Friday, as he said he might.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance, though my office has communicated with the hon. lady's office, to discuss the matter with her. I shall endeavour to do so immediately after orders of the day and I hope an answer will be forthcoming quite soon.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have a related or supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Since this meeting with her colleague is taking place this afternoon, may I ask the hon. lady whether full consideration has been given to making sure that the privately owned television station in Prince Edward Island which has been affiliated with the C.B.C. for ten years, providing C.B.C. programs, will have its interest properly safeguarded in whatever plans the government may have in future for the provision of C.B.C. service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is in the nature of representations, and I take it that they have been noted by the minister.

[Translation]

INCOME TAX

REDUCTION OF CLAIMS FOR CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of National Revenue.

In view of the numerous complaints we receive, and he receives as well, about officials of the income tax department reducing the amounts on charitable receipts attached to income tax returns, is the Minister taking steps to adopt the same rate for everyone in order to put an end to those complaints and do justice to the whole population?

Mr. Speaker: There again we have a general question; the hon. member may not put it at this time.

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

COMMENCEMENT OF DIRECT SERVICE, MONTREAL-MOSCOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of documents tabled in the house today respecting the air transport agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. Can the minister give us any indication when the flights between Moscow and Montreal either by Canadian or Soviet air lines, will begin?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): While no absolutely definite date has yet been set, it is the expectation that they could begin in October or November.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do the documents indicate which Canadian air carrier will be our representative, or can the minister confirm that it will be Air Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: The agreement was signed between Air Canada and Aeroflot at the same time as the general agreement.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD ADMISSION OF MAINLAND CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his temporary absence I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government made a decision with respect to Canada's position at the next general assembly of the United Nations as to the seating of the Peoples Republic of China?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Has there been any change in the movement of grain so that the Canadian Wheat Board might consider extending the quota beyond the present ten bushel limit on wheat at most points before July 31?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the latest conversations I have had with the chairman of the board indicate that ten bushels remains the target. However, if movement has in fact been larger than was expected I am sure the board would be prepared to consider a higher quota. I will make inquiries.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): If the Wheat Board is unable to open all points to a ten bushel quota are there any plans at the start of the next crop year—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementary question is hypothetical.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the minister who reports to the house for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of his previous remarks in the house today respecting those points which would not be on a ten bushel quota, what plan does the wheat board have for equalizing the quota system?

Mr. Sharp: To do as much as possible to equalize quotas before July 31.

RESEARCH

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON USE OF ANIMALS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Can the minister inform the house when the report of the National Research Council committee on adequate protection for animals used in scientific research is expected to be tabled?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I did not know it was proposed to table any such report.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. I should like to ask the minister whether he expects to be in a position before the house recesses to make his long-awaited announcement about the conclusion of negotiations to establish straight base lines for our fishing zones.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I can only repeat what he said in this house not too long ago, namely, that negotiations are still under way. I can also advise the hon. member that a very important meeting regarding this matter took place last week.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF CUT-OFF DATE AND ENLARGEMENT OF SPONSORED CATEGORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct an urgent question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister give sympathetic consideration to extending the early cut-off date of July 25 and also extending the present category of sponsorable relatives of Canadian citizens when those relatives wish to remain in Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice. I have no objection to considering the proposal, but I think it will involve more than a simple question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the Minister made his statement during the holiday season, does he not think that postponing the cut-off date to some time after the holiday might make things easier for several people?

Mr. Speaker: The question is much the same as the one put by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, picking up the threads of the debate of last Friday afternoon, we come back to the question of Canada's role and policy in the Viet Nam war. As a premise to my remarks on the situation in Viet Nam I should first like to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his diplomatic efforts to date, particularly in the light of some of the unwarranted criticism directed at him last Friday afternoon by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

The hon. member attacked the minister for not entering with full speed into what the hon. member termed the new age of diplomacy. He was even contemptuous of the minister's efforts to work behind the scenes and use whatever influence Canada may have as constructively as possible. I am surprised that one with the experience of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam could possibly entertain the belief that world diplomacy has suddenly become some sort of mass participation sport, the players' moves being determined by the effective rhetoric of other participants.

The hon. member seems to envisage international relations as entering an era when the assembling of world opinion will serve as the principal generative force. The hon. member is suggesting that everything be made public. Mobilize world opinion and pressure the major powers into a settlement which the hon. member and world opinion consider satisfactory. It seems to me that the hon. member is forgetting that so-called world opinion is little more than those who, by sheer audacity, seek to establish themselves as the spokesmen for the world community. The hon. member went to great pains to mention the Prime Minister of India, the junior senator from New York, and the senior senators from Montana and Arkansas. Presumably he feels that they, along with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam himself, constitute world opinion.

Moreover, the hon. member is entertaining a fancy, which it may be noted is fine as long as one is not vested with responsibility, an illusion that even if he, the junior senator from New York and the rest of "world opinion" did have valid claims, they would in any way be able to orient the foreign policy of any belligerent in this conflict, let alone the major powers concerned. Were these heralds of world opinion able to change the policy of the Soviet Union at the time of the Hungarian crisis? As I think back I wonder if they even tried. Admittedly no nation enjoys a poor press review, but nations cannot afford to compromise their own interest for the sake of those who, from a different vantage point, may not agree with them. No better example of this point can be had than the present policy and the attitude of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

It must also be noted that over-publication of diplomacy serves only to polarize positions and to make compromise that much more difficult. This the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam seemed to forget when he deprecated the efforts of the minister to work behind the scenes through the Ronning missions and other endeavours as well. If my memory serves me accurately, Mr. Chairman, the most valuable achievements in international relations occur behind closed doors where all the factors are considered and where rigid positions can be modified with proper and less embarassing bargaining.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, like other hon. members, does not have possession of all the facts in relation to the Viet Nam war. We are not in a position to weigh all the variables and to consider all the factors as only the responsible, who are intimately involved, are able to do. No member of this house has access to all the information which comes to the minister, and such must be the case.

Another thing which must be understood is that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam does not have responsibility for the difficult decisions that have to be made regarding Viet Nam. For him to assume the posture of castigating so vehemently the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the President of the United States and, by implication, the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand, when he is in possession of only a fraction of the information, seems to me to be highly presumptuous.

Moreover, we must recognize that Canada as a middle power is quite limited in what she may be able to achieve. It has been demanded that Canada insist that the Geneva conference be reconvened and that the United States halt the bombing of North Vietnamese military targets. But recognizing the hon. member's oratorical gifts it would not have been surprising had he demanded that Canada should flood the world for 40 days and 40 nights if the Canadian demands were not met. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, we cannot afford to minimize the honourable influence which we can have in the world community, but we cannot expect the Secretary of State for External Affairs or anyone else, including the Secretary General of the United Nations, to perform miracles in the present difficult international situation.

No, Mr. Chairman, I think we must understand that international politics are not some sort of world parlour game. We recognize the fact that weighty decisions can only be made by a few, and that the potential for successful diplomacy is best behind the closed door. Therefore, while we in this party do not always agree with the government and its emphasis in the Viet Nam conflict, we would not have the Secretary of State for External Affairs preaching from the rooftops or conducting his efforts in any other manner than he has already done during these last few months with respect to the realities of the Viet Nam problem.

In the light of the platitudes and hyperboles inflicted upon this chamber last Friday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I wish to take note of some of the considerations which to this point have been ignored. What has always disturbed me about the position assumed by some hon. members is the naïve view that in international relations we are to consider first and foremost certain moral standards and that considerations of power and self-interest are to have no place. I wish that that were true. According to these hon. members policy has to be determined by a just formula; all that is required is a gentleman's agreement and good faith on the part of all and everything will work out quite satisfactorily.

Unfortunately, however, man is not to be so easily trusted, and a nation's policy, regardless of the moral explanations given to the contrary, is based on the safeguarding of the nation's interest and the defence of its strategic position in the world power structure. We have not yet entered the era when the brotherhood of man makes any just solution viable in itself. I wish we had.

The hon. member seems to refuse to recognize the facts of geopolitics and to confront the implications of the alarming changes in the power structure of Asia. I can understand that he may say, "Is peace not worth attempting at all?" Of course it is. But the only peace we can realistically hope for is that condition wherein the aggressive power considers further expansion as more of a loss than the sacrifice of old dreams and ambitions. It is well that we remember that in Southeast Asia the expanding power is China and the containing power is the United States with its allies.

It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to view the events in Viet Nam apart from the situation in Asia as a whole and particularly the rejuvenation of China as a major world power. Surely this is the ultimate consideration here. Can the revival of a Chinese empire extending to the South China seas and perhaps farther be contained? There is no doubt that the revolutionaries under Chairman Mao differ little in aim and intent from the Ming dynasty. There are those who suggest that the west should retreat from the mainland of Asia altogether and set the line of containment at Australasia, Japan and the Philippines. In the view of this school, mainland Asia would be recognized as the Chinese sphere of influence.

Ignoring for just a moment the injustice of abandoning so many peoples whose history has been characterized by their hostility to Chinese domination, let us consider such a solution purely as it relates to strategy. Could the west successfully defend the above-mentioned areas against a China economically inoculated with the acquisition of rich new fields to the south? Such a Chinese empire with a sophisticated nuclear delivery system, a burgeoning population demanding new food areas, would look covetously to the vast plains of Australia. The potential for economic warfare alone against Australia is frightening inasmuch as China would have control over most of the major trade routes in the area.

Another suggestion has been the possibility of a Titoist formula for Viet Nam. It is argued that considering the historical hatred of the Vietnamese people for the Chinese, it is quite probable that we would witness the evolution of a national Communist state in Viet Nam which would be able to resist the grander designs of China. Such a solution, however, does not take into account the fact that the anti-Chinese element in the North Vietnamese government is restricted to President Ho Chi-Minh and the old veterans of the party. The young Turk movement represented by such energetic figures as General Vo Nguyen Giap is quite pro-Chinese and see their country's future as linked to that of China. Moreover, the success of the Chinese policy as formulated by Mao-Tse-Tung and Marshal Lin Piao, that is, the use of the war of national liberation, as opposed to the Soviet view, could only strengthen the position of China in the Communist movement in Viet Nam and indeed throughout Asia.

It is highly unlikely then, with the eventual emergence of the pro-Chinese movement in the North Vietnamese Communist party and with the obvious success of the Chinese formula, that a Titoist Viet Nam could exist without the limits of sovereignty being set by the Chinese. Moreover, with the removal of the United States and the absence of an Asian counter-force to Chinese power, a nationalist regime would have much difficulty in pursuing an independent line which was liable on occasion to be to the detriment of the Chinese. For the Soviet union to counter Chinese power in Southern Asia is even more impractical than the United States, for the latter is at least a Pacific power. Her borders extend deep into the Pacific and her ultimate interest in Australia makes her very deeply involved in the Asian situation. The Soviet Union on the other hand is a European power and is becoming increasingly oriented to Europe. Granted, the Soviet union is the logical power to meet Chinese expansion in the north but she does not have the geopolitical resources to counter Chinese expansion in the south.

This is not to mention the problems which would be posed for the neighbouring states should Viet Nam come under Chinese domination, subtle and indirect though it may appear. For the moment the combined forces of the neutralists under Prince Souvanna Phouma and the pro-western elements in Laos have been able to contain the advances of the Pathet Lao which has been largely ignored by their patrons in North Vietnam, who have been almost totally preoccupied with the war in the south. With a united Viet Nam under Ho Chi-Minh to what extent could the Laotian government further resist the incursions of the Pathet Lao? What about the situation in Thailand and Cambodia? Would not those countries be forced to seek accommodation with China, an accommodation which would be politically and economically advantageous to the Chinese. In fact it is not unreasonable to suggest that Prince Sihanouk has already opted for the Chinese, expecting them to have eventual control over Indochina. One must also ask whether the integrity of Malaysia and Singapore could be guaranteed and whether Indonesian General Suharto and his supporters could continue to steer that country toward truly national development.

All of this is ignoring one of the basic facts of this struggle and that is the question of United States prestige. Even were the difficulties posed by withdrawal to be overcome, it is not to be expected that the United States will follow the suggestions made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, suggestions which, it may be noted, are tantamount to complete capitulation. Already some Europeans see the struggle of conscience in the United States as evidence that that country's guarantees are not to be trusted in the long run. Free nations everywhere could no longer count on American assistance against aggression from a more powerful nation. To expect the United States to unconditionally stop the bombing and to withdraw without a like action from the North Vietnamese is highly unrealistic and quite impossible.

Chinese imperialism is no less imperialistic for being in the guise of insurgency. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is quick to accept the claims of that minority which always claims to speak for the majority. Therefore I would ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam if he would suggest that the attempted coup last October in Indonesia, in which the Chinese were deeply involved, was a true expression of Indonesian feeling?

Yes, we have been warned of an impending nuclear holocaust, of greater participation from the Communist world. We have been told so often that the United States is forcing the Russians and the Chinese together, and yet Sino-Soviet relations are at a worse point now than they have ever been. The dangers of east European volunteers pose no major threat as the mobility and supply of such volunteers would be almost impossible under the circumstances.

There has been a great deal spoken of American atrocities, about women and children being bombed and maimed. Nothing has been said about the atrocities on the Viet Nam side. The same people who criticize in this regard and who do not recognize the truth in the statement might read some of the reports which contain the views of Canadian members of the international control commission team. All we need do is read the minority report to understand that.

It has been the Vietcong which has systematically attacked the civilian population, bombed city restaurants, murdered village leaders and tortured those who refused to co-operate. The hon. member talks about reform. Every time an attempt is made to provide a village with trained officials they are assassinated by the Vietcong. True economic reforms would be realized sooner if the Vietcong did not consistently sabotage Vietnamese villages and did not execute such a systematic terrorism over the civilian population. The hon. member would find that refugees from Vietcong areas, not to mention the more than one million refugees from North Vietnam who fled from Communism into South Vietnam when the Geneva agreement was established, could certainly give him a graphic picture of Vietcong atrocities.

Over the weekend I noticed an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of July 1. I believe it is worth taking note of and worth putting on the record in part at least. It reads:

> Britain, Canada, the U.S.S.R., the secretary general of the UN and others, have made many efforts to bring Hanoi to the conference table. The Americans have made it clear beyond any reasonable doubt that they are willing to talk. The Chinese have released the terms of approaches the Americans have made, including token withdrawals of troops, to save face for the North Vietnamese government. All these approaches have been rejected. All would-be mediators have insisted that a necessary pre-condition of negotiation is the cessation of bombing. U Thant continues to offer this argument. The Americans discontinued bombing for six weeks and a major peace effort was made during that period. Hanoi rejected every overture. The cessation of bombing had no effect. The proposition that the Americans should withdraw, so that negotiations can begin, is too unrelated to reality to deserve discussion.

The outcry against the bombing of the oil depots must therefore be understood against some set of facts or circumstances other than those put forward by President Johnson's many foreign and domestic detractors. It is a not surprising extension of the running attack that from the begining has been mounted against American involvement in Viet Nam. Since the French revolution the assumption of the so-called "liberal" mind has been that "revolutions" of the left even, in the presence of their worst excesses, have some inherent virtue that places the obligation of support or neutrality upon men of good will. It made tolerable the diabolism of the Bolshevik revolution under Lenin and Stalin and has made it easier to forget the massive horrors of those years. It made the cry for armed intervention in the Spanish civil war easy because the insurrectionary in that case was from the ancien regime. It made Hitler's rise to power and his opening moves against Europe excusable because of the alleged iniquities of Versailles and a comfortable "liberal" devotion to men's right to "peace."

When the Americans exploded nuclear devices, there were storms of "liberal" protest. When the Chinese do so there is a great "liberal" silence. What was morally abominable in the Americans is not subject to moral judgment in the Chinese. There is a strange suspension of "liberal" moral judgment while the Chinese catch up. The Chinese can openly declare war on the west—including Russia —through "wars of liberation" and this is not reprehensible. They can reject conference, negotiation, even conversation and their hurt feelings are an adequate defence. Everything is understandable. But the Americans pursue negotiation, make incessant and open and secret intersession for conversation or conference, exercise iron restraint at the expense of their sons, and there is no grace in them that a "liberal" can recognize.

Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker, those are the words of a newspaper whose interests so far as world peace is concerned are well recognized.

There has been much said in this house about escalation and how dreadful the United States is to ignore consistently the indignation of world opinion. However, they forget that it is not the United States which is escalating. To quote a recent report:

In 1964-65 the Viet Cong recruited, trained and put in the field no less than 18 "main force" regiments, bringing their own force of regulars up to the equivalent of eight divisions. Two northern divisions also came south. By the spring of 1965, therefore, the Viet Cong infrastructure was carrying the heavy burden of a regular army of 10 divisions, additional to the local guerrilla forces.

We could go on and enlarge on this but time does not permit. There are some who recognize that to meet this constant increase in the number of enemy troops the allies have had to impede troop movement and the movement of supplies. In the past few months lorries and boats were increasingly more important in the movement of troops and supplies. There are men like Prime Minister Holt of Australia who understand this. Oil depots are legitimate military targets just the same as roads, bridges or rail lines. Every effort must be made to protect as many lives in the south as possible and this means frustrating at every turn the movement of troops and supplies into the south. There are signs which indicate that the war in Viet Nam is changing. The huge increase in the number of troops has made it increasingly difficult for the Viet Cong to live off the land.

[Mr. Thompson.]

There are other authorities who say that the destruction of oil depots must be judged as to their military value, even as the Economist of July 2 so wisely observed. I mention this article because it expresses a viewpoint of the situation in Viet Nam which is both rational and responsible. The article in part says:

Most people in Britain will regret that the United States has found it necessary to bomb the oil tanks on the fringes of Hanoi and Haiphong. It is a geographical extension of the war, though not in any real sense an escalation of the level of it; and it is bound to have killed a number of civilians.

Each new act of war, by either side, is something most people would prefer not to have happened. But for all that it was premature of Mr. Wilson to dissociate himself from the American action before he was in a position to judge its effects.

The editorial then states:

If events show that the operation has cut the flow of supplies to the south, and if photographs show that the bombing was reasonably accurate, there will be no cause for dissociation except on the part of those who would not mind a Communist victory in Viet Nam.

The fact that such a statement is to be found in a publication such as The Economist I think lends weight to it. There are other aspects of this situation that have not been brought out in this debate. At the moment the Saigon government controls about 55 per cent of the country's population compared with only 45 per cent a year ago. The defection rates from the Viet Cong are continuing to climb. In the Cantho area alone there are now 500 Viet Cong defections a month compared with only 100 a month a year ago. At the same time government defections are decreasing. The Ky government has stayed in power, even though it cannot be classified as a full democratic institution, in spite of the problems created in a war-torn kaleidoscopic nation which has only known oppression for decades—yes, even centuries. Premier Ky has managed to achieve an unprecedented and unexpected stability in co-operation with the central committee, and also to embark on a workable reform program in the rural areas. This is something we are told very little about.

There have been increasing provisions by the administration for medical care, agricultural assistance, educational facilities in a country ravaged by war. The Viet Cong are relying less on their division size operations and have returned to hit and run attacks. One thing is becoming clear. The Communists cannot win the war militarily. There is only one hope for them of victory and that is for weariness to set in upon the allies in response to those who insist they should withdraw as they cannot win. Unfortunately for many of these their efforts have not been too successful. These voices which call for withdrawal are the same voices which said of Greece after the war that the Communists spoke for the majority and that their victory in Greece was inevitable.

I would say that while we do not like the developments and we do not like to talk about war the fact is that the situation in Viet Nam is beginning to change and that China is being contained. Prime Minister Sato of Japan said only last week:

> It is my earnest hope that the United States will continue to persevere in its efforts toward stability and peace in Viet Nam.

He was paying tribute to the U.S. military role in Asia. The views of Prime Minister Holt of Australia, Prime Minister Tungku Abdul Rhahman of Malaysia and Prime Minister Keith Holyoake of New Zealand are all well known.

We come to this point as we consider the war in Viet Nam. This is not just a United States war as we would be led to believe by some. This is an allied effort involving the troops of South Korea, Australia, New Zealand and the Philippines, and the non-combat assistance of many other countries. The nations on China's periphery are understandably concerned and are determined that Chinese expansion be contained. As Coral Belle, the well known Australian strategist, put it:

> They tell us China is a long way from Australia but Japan was a long way from Australia too.

As Mr. Patrick Gordon-Walker noted when he was in Toronto at the international teach-in, and as Mr. Enoch Powell has noted since, the United States is a Pacific power which must now lead this alliance. When an Asian power structure does emerge to balance that of China, the United States can consider withdrawal from southeast Asia. That time is not now.

I should like to conclude with a word about Canada's role in this struggle. There are some who feel that Canada's position on the International Control Commission gives her a certain neutrality in the situation. There is some justice in the argument that Canada's role in the I.C.C. may be such that active military participation would be unwise and would tend to cripple any influence we might have in that body. I would agree with that. However, as a commonwealth nation historically linked to Australia, New Zealand, Malaysia, and as an ally of the United States, we cannot be completely neutral. The International Control Commission role does not demand this. Poland, for instance is also a member of the I.C.C. and yet that country last week offered volunteers for the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese. It is in this area that I feel the government deserves some criticism. There is no reason why Canada cannot substantially increase her aid to South Viet Nam. We are contributing only about $1 million, which in this case is a trifling amount.

As the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said, United States citizens in Viet Nam are dying for you and me. Even if we cannot send troops there is no reason why we cannot increase our economic assistance. There is a tremendous need so that the reform programs in the rural areas can work and so that South Viet Nam will eventually become a peaceful, stable and prosperous nation. Surely there is no member in this house who would oppose such a development. It has been long argued that the war cannot be won by military means alone. I refer again to the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, but I would be the first to agree with those remarks and I hope that the hon. member and everyone else in this house would support an effort to increase our economic assistance to that war-torn country. We hope the government will make a real attempt to correct this situation. We appreciate the diplomatic conduct of the minister, although I cannot agree that the government cannot do more than what is presently being done.

While it is necessary that we must continue to explore that diplomatic role which is uniquely ours, and while we feel that Canada should continue the liaison role she has been playing, facilitating in many ways the exchange of positions, we cannot help but feel nevertheless that Canada must remain sympathetic to the allied struggle in Viet Nam, supporting our friends and allies as they attempt to preserve the national integrity and independence of Asian nations from the indirect but very aggressive force to the north which says its foreign policy is to take part in all revolutionary wars such as those which have been recently so prevalent in many parts of the world. There is no better current example of this than Indonesia.

• (4:20 p.m.)

It would seem to me that in addition to this position which I think Canada can take through a greater and expanding role in a humanitarian contribution to the world picture, we have to face up to the fact that the only hope we have today for peace in Asia is a containment of the warlike, aggressive policies of China, even as Russia 15 years ago was contained through the effect of NATO.

This being so, and with the passing of time, I am sure that many of the critical situations which today seem to have no solution will ease up and provide an opportunity for the integrity and autonomy of nations in the eastern part of the world. This can play a very decided role in the over-all developing pattern toward the goal which we all share, which is the peaceful development of the world's resources.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I find myself at considerable variance with much of what was said by the hon. member for Red Deer. I find it somewhat peculiar that in this country where we believe in democracy, where we consider ourselves a Christian nation, where we have subscribed to the ideals and the charter of the United Nations, we should hear the leader of a political party as much as say that we should have no part in idealism, that when we consider the world of today we should consider it in the light of cold, ruthless, power politics and that is the only thing that counts. The hon. member used such arguments as: What do they think about Hungary when they talk about atrocities or taking over countries by subversion, force of arms, etc? It is no argument, I submit, when ever a question of the legality of anyone's actions is concerned, to say that the action taken in Hungary was not legal. Where does that leave us? I presume from the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer that once the Communists have done it this brings such action to an acceptable level.

The hon. member used the same argument about atrocities. I gathered from his remarks that he is perfectly happy about atrocities. Because one side is guilty of atrocities, he seems to think this makes atrocities the sort of thing we should favour. I am sure that the conscience and the mind of every citizen in this country who pays more than lip service to those ideals by which we profess to live, and which we hope will even guide relations between states, are more than a little perturbed at the thought of the number of innocent men, women and children who are today dying or suffering because of the conflict in Viet Nam.

I believe that those who are Christians and those who say that people in other countries should be able to enjoy the same rights and privileges that we do are a little aghast at the argument of the hon. member for Red Deer that the people in that country do not count because their country is just a pawn and its people mere ciphers in a power struggle between China and the mighty United States which cannot be stopped.

Surely there is more to our world than that. Surely these people are more than ciphers who can be swatted like flies by contending giants. I for one do not subscribe to the idea that the ends justify the means, as was so vehemently exhorted by the hon. member. It does seem to me that there is a right way and a wrong way to do things. It does seem to me that today, when the contending ideologies of our version of democracy and communism are in a struggle, we do nothing to help the cause of democracy by abandoning the very ideals that make our way of life so worth while for us.

I am not at all convinced that the United States, by saying that the ends justify the means, is achieving those ends which alone could justify the means, if they are not indeed acting illegally. I would like to see the argument in this house conducted along the line of those who contend that the United States is right in standing up and proving what right the United States has to be there. I have heard no one pretend that the United States has any right other than might.

I am a little concerned when we so far abandon even any pretence at legality, when we ignore the question of the means of achieving an objective and then are not even sure of the objective. This is no way for democracy to win any struggle, short or long term. It is my contention that by abondoning our ideals every new, emerging or underdeveloped country in this world that we might hope to convert to our system of democracy is going to find that we in the western world are a bunch of hypocrites when we talk of democracy, that we in the western world do not believe in the United Nations charter which we signed and which gives each country equal rights.

There is nothing in our present attitude toward Viet Nam which can do anything but convince small nations around the world that they are meaningless as nations, that the lives of their citizens mean nothing to us, and that we do not subscribe to any of our ideals that we so proudly proclaim as being the hallmark of democracy. I do not know how we in this house can say that our objectives are to contain communism and in the same breath go along with the very type of action for which we say we hate and fear communism.

Certainly people are afraid of the communist nations because they go into a country, we say, and assist revolutionary forces to take over governments by force. But what legal means has the United States taken to get into South Viet Nam? What is the legality of its position? We have subscribed to the United Nations which we hoped would undertake peacekeeping and would be available when one country's independence was threatened by another. We know that the United Nations has been particularly successful in some ways. But instead of concentrating its efforts on building up the United Nations we find that the United States has abandoned any pretence of using the United Nations and says: We will do this because in our sole judgment it is what we must do.

One only has to review the propaganda put out by the United States to consider what they are doing to the picture of democracy as represented by the United States around the world, what they are doing to convince everyone that democracy is hypocrisy. I submit that once they have sold the world on this they have aided communism to a great extent. It is not two years ago that the United States was saying that it only had observers in South Viet Nam who were travelling with the neutralists to observe what was going on. This was the way the United States talked. There was then no mention of a South Vietnamese government and there was no pretence at that time that they had any right to send in fighting troops on one side or the other.

Gradually, as the build-up of the armed forces took place, it became impossible to refer to the vast numbers of troops as observers. Instead of gaining the support of the neutralists so as to bring about a peaceful solution in South Viet Nam and the right of the South Vietnamese to self-determination, the United States started to talk about the government of South Viet Nam and about United States troops helping that government fight North Viet Nam. Surely anyone who has read the news reports of speeches in the United States and the justification they give for their actions must wonder at what has taken place over the last two years. There has certainly been no change in international law, no new agreement in the United Nations and no recognition of a change in status. I submit there has simply been a change in the description by the United States of its position because they feel that they can sell their policy to their own people and perhaps to the rest of the world by saying they are now coming to the aid of a recognized government in resisting armed aggression.

I thought it was going pretty far and that Premier Ky put the lid on it when he said that if an election were held now and either the Viet Cong or the neutralists won neither would be acceptable to him. The Ky regime is a puppet government which is supported by the United States, and this is the position at which it has arrived. Only two years ago the United States said they were going into Viet Nam to assist the neutralists, to pacify the country and to give the people the right to self-determination. They are now supporting a puppet government which, despite the armed forces which the United States have put at their disposal and which they themselves have, is barely able to keep order in that part of their country now occupied by United States troops. This Vietnamese government is now saying that they will not grant their people the right to self-determination and the right to choose their own government because it would not be acceptable to Premier Ky.

Whatever the people of Canada may have thought about the aims and objectives of the United States in entering the war in South Viet Nam, I hope they will have the honesty to concede that the United States has the right to choose whatever method it likes because the end justifies the means. I hope they will accept the obvious evidence that the United States can impose in Viet Nam a government of its own choice and prevent the right to self-determination in that country as part of the objective of containing Communism in southeast Asia. I suppose you have the right to kill another man if he is about to kill you but you cannot kill to increase your own chance of living if you are not threatened. However, here we are saying that it is perfectly all right to kill people in great numbers because we are afraid of a strategic shift which will entail greater peril unless we continue the present policy. Anyone subscribing to that theory will not convince me he is speaking in support of democracy or of the UN charter by which we are bound.

The hon. member for Red Deer quoted many sources in his statement although he started out by saying he did not know enough about the subject to speak on it at length and that we should be guided by people with greater knowledge. I presume he quoted all these sources in support of his argument. However, I am of the opinion that the debates which have taken place among the United States senators have been of a much higher calibre than the discussions on this subject in Canada. They have been much more honest and have contained more common sense.

In the United States they speak honestly about their objectives and their right to go into Viet Nam. President Johnson is asked whether his objective is a complete and final military victory. When a voice is raised in this country questioning the position of the United States that person is immediately suspected of Communism because United States policy is conceived as one which is designed to contain communism. I for one have never been convinced that communism is the only evil in the world. I am not convinced that a South Vietnamese villager can see the difference between being bombed by a United States plane or shot down by a communist soldier. The United States is saying to these people: We are trying to save you from these nasty fellows who wish to enslave you. This will not give back to them the people who have been killed.

A ray of light came through when, about a month ago, Henry Cabot Lodge speaking on television about the military victories in Viet Nam said: "We cannot win by military victory alone." I wish that a lot of people had listened to that. He said that the difficulty is that only the communists have been helping these people since 1954, and now we have to give them something to fight for and something to vote for.

At last we are hearing a note of sanity, I thought. I am tired of the sanctimonious attitude we are taking toward a backward country which is trying to throw off its shackles and where inevitably we find that the communists are the best equipped to lead. Whenever there is a suggestion of communism, we say the communists are trying to take over the country by force. It seems that in our enlightened view of democracy and the duty of other nations we consider that a country must put up with any government that is anti-communist because that is all in which we are interested. Do we deny those people the right to revolt against a government which has done nothing for them in 30 years? I am not speaking of democratic governments but of dictatorships which are still rampant in the world. I do not think we are advancing the cause of democracy by saying we are for any government, no matter how regressive it is, provided it is against communism. Is it not time we were in support of a government chosen by its own people? Is it not time we did away with hypocrisy and recognized that people have the right to choose the government they want? Is it not time we recognized the right of the people to revolt against a system which they dislike and to choose another?

It is a terrible thought that many of these people may turn to communism, but I think we are driving them to it because owing to our actions they are prevented from reforming their own country and throwing off the shackles of a regressive government which is kept in power by our own interests. The only requirement we have is that it be anti-communist.

I think the minister's statement regarding Canada's position in Viet Nam was the weakest I have ever heard him make. We are friends and allies of the United States and as such we have a duty to speak frankly. I should like to think that although we are a small partner we are not under their thumb. It is our duty to speak frankly and to stand up for the UN charter and for our concept of what is right and what is wrong. It is our duty to tell the United States that the unlimited use of their air power and their escalation of this war presents a danger not only to them but to us and to the entire world. Does the United States feel it can use its power to enforce its ideas in protecting the rest of the world from other dangers?

• (4:40 p.m.)

I think that Canada should lead the way and should speak very frankly to the United States. We should ask them what is going to be done about amending the United Nations charter to make it more effective so that countries will rely on it and so that we may really have some possibility of avoiding power contests throughout the remainder of our history. However, our history is likely to be very short unless we start to pay more than lip service to that international organization. I thought that U Thant was highly respected around the world but it is obvious, when his words of caution designed to keep the war from escalating further go unheeded, that he is not very much respected.

I did not mean to go on at such length, Mr. Chairman, but I am sure that the minds and hearts of those in every section of the country must be exercised at the thought of what is going on. I am sure we are all very much concerned about exactly what are the objectives of the United States. What do they want in South Viet Nam? I am afraid that the evidence points to their wanting a government of their own choosing which will be a bulwark against communism, and that is all they are going to settle for. I object to the actions taken by people in that country who are nothing more than a swarm of flies, a nuisance, on the body politic and who now and again are a disturbance to the peace of mind of countries such as the United States and Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I think it is very fitting that we in this house have been given an opportunity before we recess to discuss what is the most urgent and dangerous question facing mankind, namely, the escalation of the tragic and barbarous war in Viet Nam. We in this party invite the government of Canada to make a radical change in its course and in its policies. The time has come, in our view, when we cannot avoid a clearcut choice. We must decide whether we stand with the Secretary General of the United Nations or with the administration of the United States. I suggest that it is just not possible, to go along with both.

I stress the word "administration" of the United States, because it is quite obvious that the best informed and wisest citizens of the United States and an increasing number of ordinary Americans support the Secretary General of the United Nations in this matter and not the actions of the administration of that country.

What are these two alternative views, Mr. Chairman? I suggest they are pretty clearcut and quite different. Everyone agrees that the conflict should be ended as soon as possible. But the Secretary General has said very recently, very emphatically and very clearly, that peace can only be achieved—and I stress the word "only", Mr. Chairman—by de-escalation, by an end to the bombing of the north, by readiness to enter into discussions with, to quote U Thant's words, "those who are actually fighting"; in other words, with the national liberation front.

The President of the United States, on the other hand, if we judge him by his actions and not by his words, has set his face against these things proposed by the Secretary General of the United Nations. He has quite evidently accepted the advice of those who believe that a military victory can be won by escalating the military involvement of the United States, by pouring in more troops and stepping up and extending the scope of bombing. These advisers to the president profess to believe in victory achieved by these methods, or in the hope that these methods will force the North Vietnamese into negotiations.

It is our view, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come for Canada to say clearly, unequivocally and officially to the government of the United States that in our view escalation should stop and the bombing should stop. Canada's policy in the past has consisted of a cautious endorsation of United States involvement in Viet Nam, with emphasis on Canada's position as a potential negotiator through her membership in the International Control Commission.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated in this house on Friday that he was going to stick to this policy. He has declined either to accept the position so forcefully stated by the Prime Minister of Australia of wholehearted support for United States actions in Viet Nam, though I think he was invited to do so by a question put by a member of the official opposition. On the other hand, he has repeated his intention not to take a strong public position on any or all of the issues involved in the present conflict, and not to take a position that would be clearly and unequivocally critical of the United States administration in its escalation of the war in Viet Nam.

It is our view, Mr. Chairman, that this policy of the government has failed. Those who doubted the wisdom of United States policies in Viet Nam have unhappily been vindicated, but they have been amply vindicated. The tragic war has dragged on with thousands upon thousands of casualties and no hope of an end in sight. Rather we have the prospect of growing involvement in tragic, useless and open-ended war.

All constructive developments in international affairs have been halted and obstructed. The United States itself has been drifting more and more into the icy isolation against which one of her greatest commentators, Walter Lippmann, has warned. The military regime in Viet Nam, the preservation of which has been one of the alleged purposes of the war, has demonstrated again and again that its tenuous hold in South Viet Nam depends only upon military suppression and the growing military involvement of the forces of the United States.

The war, alas, has occasioned a growing hatred of the white race. One of the major casualties of the war has been the disregard of and contempt for the judgment of the United Nations as expressed by Secretary General U Thant.

It is not without significance that the most recent escalation by the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong took place within a few days after the Secretary General of the United Nations had emphatically called on the nations involved to seek peace by de-escalation and by ending the bombing of the north. He said that was the sole means to achieve peace.

The United States government has from time to time expressed its desire to end the war by negotiation. But, how does it believe that it is possible to escalate the intensity of attack on an opponent with one hand while holding out the olive branch with the other? I suppose it may be possible to bomb an opponent into surrender or into non-existence, but how can he be bombed into genuine negotiation? This question was asked by Professor Charles Osgoode when he appeared before the United States Senate foreign relations committee on May 25 of this year, and of course there can be no answer to the question.

Escalation, Mr. Chairman, is not a one-way street. As the United States has become more and more involved, so has North Viet Nam. There are many more North Vietnamese troops engaged in hostilities right now, as well as more United States troops.

This morning, Mr. Chairman, I read in the Toronto Globe and Mail the statement that the United States is expecting the numbers of its troops in Viet Nam to rise by next spring to 425,000. One high-ranking officer—I presume he is a United States officer—estimates that it will take 750,000 to 1 million men before the war is won. According to this informant it will take five years before the United States can move a single military unit back from Viet Nam. I wonder whether this military informant believes that China and the U.S.S.R. will sit still during those five years when the United States will escalate its efforts, seeking to end the war by military means.

The effectiveness of the bombing is out of all proportion to its cost, both financially and psychologically. As the United States escalates the war in the hope of victory, so others are in danger of being drawn into the war in response thereto. The end, as we all know, could be a world war and an infinite human tragedy.

When I was in Washington with other Canadian parliamentary representatives a few months ago we were, as usual, entertained and treated with great generosity and friendliness by our U.S. counterparts. The question was asked at the time whether the administration's willingness to negotiate, of which we were assured, included, as Senator Robert Kennedy had suggested, willingness to indicate that the National Liberation Front would not only be included in the negotiations but might expect to have some part in an interim government that might have to be set up. The answer was given that any such proposal would amount to surrender. I would think it fairly obvious that any negotiation which did not recognize that the National Liberation Front controlled part of South Viet Nam would be asking the other side to surrender.

I have stated, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian government has consistently refused to take an unequivocal stand in respect of the war in Viet Nam and has offered as an excuse, both to those who urge direct involvement on the side of the United States and to those who have urged that Canada should take a firm stand against the further escalation and bombing in the north, the fact that we have been for many years a member of the International Control Commission and that our usefulness as a potential negotiator is recognized by both sides to the conflict.

I confess that these arguments have from time to time had considerable weight in my mind. There is, in my view, much that can be said for the contrary argument that Canada should long ago have indicated that as both parties refused to accept or to be bound by the terms of the 1954 Geneva settlement its creature, the International Control Commission, served no useful purpose. However that may be, Mr. Chairman, it has now been made clear by no lesser person than the President of the United States, by his actions, indeed, rather than by his words, that he puts little value on the possibilities of negotiation by Canadian representatives or by the International Control Commission.

As we all know, Canada sent one of its most distinguished negotiators, Mr. Chester Ronning, to Hanoi, shortly before the bombing of oil storage installations near Hanoi and Haiphong. A very few days before that escalation of bombing the Prime Minister, we understand, made clear the view of the Canadian government during a recent visit of Mr. Bundy who came, as I understand it, for the very purposes of checking on the results of Mr. Ronning's soundings in Hanoi. According to the Ottawa Citizen of June 30, in an article by Mr. Walker of the Southam News, a statement, I presume by the Department of External Affairs, was prepared for the Prime Minister to make in the house on the extension of the bombing. The statement contained these words:

I made clear—

And that is the Prime Minister speaking:

—the view of the Canadian government that any change in the scale or pattern of hostilities could have serious implications for the efforts in which we are engaged to establish common ground on which an approach to a possible solution of the Viet Nam conflict could be built.

Oddly enough, Mr. Chairman, this paragraph prepared for delivery by the Prime Minister, presumably by the Department of External Affairs, was omitted from the Prime Minister's statement to this house.

When I put these words in a question to the Prime Minister on Tuesday, June 30, the Prime Minister replied:

I cannot confirm the precise words that have been quoted by my hon. friend as reflecting the talk I had with Mr. Bundy.

Whether these were the precise words or not the Prime Minister made it clear that he would regard any escalation, any further increase in the scale of hostilities on the part of the United States, as harmful to Canada's efforts to bring about negotiations. His words, as quoted, were: "Any escalation would have serious implications for the effort we are making."

Whether or not these precise words were used, I think it is abundantly clear that the administration of the United States totally disregarded his words and has preferred to put its faith in continued military escalation.

One of the most significant things in the remarks made on Friday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was, I take it, taken from the message that Mr. Ronning brought back from Hanoi. As I understand it, he said that the North Vietnamese are insisting, as a condition before negotiations, on one thing and one thing only. They are insisting not that the United States get out of Viet Nam, not that they stop hostilities in South Viet Nam, but that they cease the aerial bombardment of North Viet Nam, a country with which, incidentally, they are not even at war. Is this an unreasonable condition to ask, that this bombing should cease? It happens to be the condition that the Secretary General of the United Nations has asked for, as well as others to whom I shall refer in a moment.

I believe that no one in this house will want to decry the sincerity or the good faith of the efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to seek a Canadian initiative in ending the hostilities. However, I suggest that the time has come for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to recognize the facts. The facts are that these initiatives have failed because they have been rejected forthrightly and outrightly by the actions of the United States administration.

A very distinguished United States senator, William Fulbright, who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, aroused considerable and natural irritation in his own country when he censured the administration's policy on Viet Nam. In a lecture at Johns Hopkins University he spoke of the danger that the United States gradually but unmistakably was giving in to the arrogance of power, which he said could lead to its downfall.

I suggest that if this is the fact it is imperative that men and women of good will throughout the world, friends of the United States, should make it clear without equivocation that they regard the course now being pursued by the United States of America in escalating the Viet Nam war as morally unjustified and as a danger to humanity.

Sometimes, Mr. Chairman, in this modern world—

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Brewin: I am afraid I have not too much time.

Mr. Churchill: We shall give you lots of time. Sometimes a breathing space is helpful. Would the hon. member care to comment on a statement reported in this morning's press attributed to Senator Robert F. Kennedy who indirectly criticized Canada for playing a neutral role in the world crisis involving the United States? Senator Kennedy said:

I'd like to . . . quote Dante. "The hottest place in hell is reserved for those who in time of crisis preserve their neutrality."

What comment would the hon. member make with regard to that invitation to Canada to participate in escalating the war in Viet Nam?

Mr. Brewin: The hon. member has rather anticipated something I was going to say. I had intended to call attention to what Senator Kennedy stated in Alberta recently, and I shall come to that later. But, if the hon. member will excuse me, I shall say this: I do think that the hon. member has perhaps misunderstood the position, because I think what Senator Kennedy was saying was that you are either for or against. I think he meant to say: Do not be neutral; the hottest place in hell is reserved for those who do not make up their minds. I do not think Senator Kennedy was saying we should be on this side or on that side; I think he was referring to the fact that we are neutral.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where does that leave the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: We shall leave the Secretary of State for External Affairs to worry about his own conscience in the light of Mr. Kennedy's remarks.

But there are times when although we call ourselves realists we would be well advised to listen to those who speak for the conscience of humanity. I know that the Pope, speaking for millions of Roman Catholics around the world, has urged an end of the war by de-escalation and the acceptance of negotiations. The World Council of Churches, at a meeting of its central committee in Geneva a few weeks ago, spoke for other bodies of Christians throughout the world when it issued a statement urging certain things which I suggest are the very things we have been urging in this house:

1. That the United States and South Viet Nam stop bombing of the north, and North Viet Nam stop military infiltration of the south;

2. That the United States now announce its commitment to a withdrawal of its troops phased in accordance with provisions for peacekeeping machinery under international auspices and deemed adequate in the judgment of an international authority;

3. That all parties recognize the necessity of according a place in negotiations both to the government of South Viet Nam and to the National Liberation Front.

I will leave out some of the recommendations and proceed to recommendation No. 6.

6. That all parties recognize the extent to which what is happening in Viet Nam is part of a social revolution and that, freed from foreign intervention, Viet Nam, both north and south, ought to be in a position to determine its own future;

7. That all parties recognize the futility of military action for the solution of underlying political, social and economic problems of Viet Nam and the necessity of massive and generous development programs;

8. That in order to relieve present international tension the United States review and modify its policy of "containment of communism"—

I commend this to the hon. member for Red Deer. I think it would be well for him to study this statement. The recommendation continues:

—and communist countries supporting "wars of liberation" should review and modify their policy.

Throughout the world today people and governments are beginning to unite in their efforts to make it clear that the war in Viet Nam should be ended. The uncommitted countries have made their views clear. The countries of Europe are united in deploring the recent extension of the war. The time has surely come when Canada should join with the governments of India, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and France to urge an end to the bombing to create conditions in which negotiation will be possible.

A universal appeal should be made to the people and to the government of the United States to heed the warnings of the Secretary General of the United Nations and of the religious spokesmen of mankind. Nobody can possibly doubt the friendliness and good will of the people of Canada and of the present government of Canada toward the United States.

At this point it would be appropriate to refer to what Senator Kennedy said the other day when he urged that Canada should speak up more clearly. It was then he made the statement to which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred about the hottest place in hell being reserved for those who in time of crisis preserve their neutrality. I suggest in all seriousness to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the time has come for the government of Canada to pronounce publicly and clearly to our United States friends words which paraphrase other famous words in history, and to say to them: "For God's sake, stop."

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief, I share, of course, with the hon. member for Greenwood and with the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona concern over the implications of the extension of the bombing to the military targets adjacent to Hanoi and Haiphong. I do not think members on one side of the house are more concerned about the implications of this move than are members on the other side.

It is a concern which extends far beyond this house and it has been expressed by other governments in other countries. The consequences of the escalation, if it can be called that and not simply an extension of a military policy which has been in operation for some time, cannot be accurately predicted. However, it seems to me that in this debate an inordinate amount of emphasis has been placed upon United States foreign policy and only a passing reference, and that not very complimentary, to the distinguished efforts of the present government in the area of negotiations.

It seems to me useless as well as wrong to condemn one side in this dispute, namely, the United States, as being the sole villain in this whole sordid and tragic drama. I cannot accept the premise that the onus of responsibility for the war in Viet Nam and particularly for the continuation of the war has to be laid at the doorstep of the United States alone. I think this is wrong both historically and in terms of the contemporary situation.

The government of the United States has made more open and continuing efforts to bring about discussion or negotiations than the other side has ever done. These efforts have been supplemented by those of Great Britain including the visits by Patrick Gordon Walker and others, and the abortive effort of the Commonwealth committee on Viet Nam, and so on. These were all sincere efforts to bring the two sides together. They failed. They did not fail because the United States was unwilling to come to the conference table. They failed because representatives of the government of North Viet Nam refused to be there.

It does not seem to me to be very intelligent or fair for members in that corner of the house to place so much emphasis on the shortcomings of United States policy while glibly passing over the much greater shortcomings of the government of North Viet Nam. The United States is not the sole villain of the piece, though it may be there are shortcomings so far as its policy is concerned.

But it seems to me that if there is one place where we can expect a balanced judgment on what is going on in this war it is here in this chamber, and we are not getting it. We did not get it from the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and we did not get it from the hon. member for Greenwood. Both those hon. members are urging the government to speak frankly. Both are urging on the government a course which it seems to me involves much more of a sort of public posturing than we want. What is described as dynamic leadership is really nothing more or less than rhetoric.

The basis for dynamic leadership today seems to be public statements, public positions, regardless of what those public statements or positions might do to the efforts which are taking place, in meetings both in this country and in other countries, to try to bring together the principals in this dispute.

Never in the study of foreign policy will you find that a position which is simply rhetorical, which is simply taken for the sake of absolving one's conscience, saying that in this dispute we are clean, has advanced the cause of peace. It may serve to satisfy one's conscience. We in this chamber have a compelling, immediate responsibility to confine our attention to what in practice, what in fact, we can contribute to a solution of this war. Our primary concern at this time must be not with our personal consciences and what we feel about the war but with what we can do here that might contribute in some small measure to resolve this tragic affair in Viet Nam.

I do not think we have had that yet. We have had high-sounding appeals for dynamic leadership which, when reduced to their essence, are simply high-sounding statements that we are on the side of the angels and the participants and principals are engaged in something of which we do not approve.

It is this dimension of the debate which I find so unpalatable, so unnecessary and, in some measure, so surprising because I have a great deal of respect for the hon. member for Greenwood and his judgment in this area. If you examine the pattern of international politics over a period of years one thing certainly becomes evident, that what is best, what is humane and rational in mankind does not seem to be exemplified and practised at the international level. Foreign policy is too often myopic, selfish and tendentious. There is little of what we can call altruism, the grand gesture, at the international level, and it is within this framework that we have to operate.

It is useless to involve one's self in appeals to negotiate, in appeals to principals to do something about a war of which one disapproves. Particularly is this useless if, on the other hand, you are not in a position to try to contribute to a slow attrition of the divergence in viewpoints between the two principals.

It seems that the recent escalation, if we can call it that, has set in train implications which no doubt are very serious. It has been said both by United States senators and commentators that it is going to contribute to a hardening of the attitude in North Viet Nam. That may be so and, if so, it is regrettable. It may further provoke a hardening of the attitude of Communist China and may further estrange that country from the international community. This is profoundly regrettable. An effort has been made by our Prime Minister to point out the implications of this continued estrangement.

All this may be true, and all of this is regrettable, but what is Canada's specific position in this given situation? Is it simply to stand up before the councils of the world and lament it? Is the most sensible and the most practical position we can take to stand up and lecture, particularly when over a period of years, through selfless efforts on the part of the Secretary of State for external Affairs and previous holders of that office, we have established ourselves as a country which in the past has served as an intermediary, as a country which can offer its good offices, as a country which retains the respect of both sides?

In the course of this debate the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and, in not quite the same language, the hon. member for Greenwood have accused us of committing the crime of silence, of trying to avoid our responsibilities, of trying to avoid a public statement simply because we might offend the United States. What they prefer is an unequivocal stand. That in itself is a wrong assessment, but the hon. member for Greenwood went much further. He said that the negotiations have failed.

No one would be more concerned or more aggrieved than myself and other members on this side of the chamber if this were true, but there is absolutely no evidence that the negotiations as such have failed. They may not have been successful up to this point, but at what point does one judge negotiations as being successful or a failure? Is it not possible that it is just a shade premature to tell the government and members of the house that negotiations have failed: Is it not particularly premature for the hon. member for Greenwood to say that negotiations have failed when probably tonight the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be meeting with Mr. Polyanski? What sort of framework does that provide for these negotiations that are going on when members of this house stand up and publicly declare the negotiations have failed and lecture the United States?

Yet that is the approach taken today by one whom I have always highly regarded as an astute commentator on international politics. That is the sort of bland pronouncement he is making on an issue which concerns all of us so deeply.

The Ronning missions and the statement made by the minister the other day that he will be visiting the Soviet union are tangible, concrete evidence of a positive approach to the problem. It may not be the approach that hon. members opposite would like, but I have yet to hear a suggestion from the other side which holds out more concrete promise, not headlines but concrete promise of bringing the principals together, than the approach presently being adopted by the government and particularly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On this issue we are not concerned about headlines. We are not concerned about political points. We are concerned about only one fundamental job, to bring the principals together as quickly as possible, and if anyone in this chamber thinks peace will arrive in Viet Nam before that particular objective has been reached he is flying in the face of the facts.

These are preliminary steps. They may not be dramatic and may not satisfy the demands of hon. members opposite, but in my view they are the only practical and concrete steps which a country in our position can take at this particular juncture, and I do not see that the sort of contribution we have had from the other side of the chamber contributes one jot to the solution of the problem. I contend that a foreign policy which is constituted of public statements of a high-sounding character, appealing to the principals to meet and settle their differences, may read well at home but does nothing to find a long-term solution to the problem.

I would suggest that if there is going to be more opposition on the other side they might come to grips with the fundamental question. With a middle power such as Canada which enjoys membership on the International Control Commission and has had an unparalleled measure of success in contributing to solutions of international disputes, and with a Secretary of State for External Affairs—I do not say this because I am a Liberal member—who has a record of acceptability, if you like, putting it in its most undramatic terms, is it not in this area that this country can serve its most useful purpose? If it is not, then I should like to hear suggestions to the contrary from the other side. I do not think it is useful to tell us we should be making certain statements while we are attempting to negotiate. Negotiations never have been aided and abetted by such pronouncements by the third party. The third party role is an undramatic role by definition; it is a role which demands a tremendous amount of patience, perseverance, tact and imagination. It is not a role that can be built up as a role which will excite the fancies of those who read the newspapers around the country and across the world. It is an undramatic but important role.

I think what should be coming out of this debate is an assessment of the particular role which has been created by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would be very interested to hear from hon. members on the other side how this particular role may be improved and refined. I think if we had that we might have a meaningful debate in this house rather than the sort of thing we have been having up until now. My position in this matter is simply that I prefer our present role for a middle power such as ours with our record. It seems to me it is the only hopeful approach which we, this government, and in fact this country can take in trying to serve some purpose in bringing to an end what we all regard as a very tragic war.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Peterborough I was very interested in his constant reiterations about negotiations. He did not tell us with whom the negotiations are taking place. One can only assume he meant that our government was in the process of negotiating with the United States. If that is the case, then I am unable to understand why he still has some hope for the success of those negotiations. I would have hoped that each member of this Canadian parliament would have reacted very adversely to the treatment of the Prime Minister of Canada received at the hands of the President of the United States when he sought to place before the American people and the American government Canada's great concern about the escalation of the war. The reaction was a prompt and almost immediate escalation by the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong. How many more times do we have to be kicked in the teeth before we realize that this kind of diplomacy just is not working?

I remember some months ago speaking to a member of the United States Congress. I asked him whether he thought it would have any effect upon the policies of the United States government if the spokesmen of the Canadian government were, plainly and bluntly from their seats in the House of Commons, to express their real dismay at and opposition to the present United States policy in South Viet Nam. This congressman told me that he could not answer that question but that he could tell me something else. He said it in these words: I can tell you that the present attitude of your government in Canada is being used today by our President to beat down the opposition to his policies in the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives. This in effect, of course, was a suggestion that there is some effect.

I was very doubtful, Mr. Chairman, whether I would enter this debate until I heard the truly shocking speech of the hon. member for Red Deer. I found it particularly shocking, coming from someone who, shall we say, makes a very open profession of Christian principles, to find that he has become enamoured of the German pre-war theory of realpolitik which subordinates all other considerations to the advancement of the state in various parts of the world. I suppose it is hardly necessary to recite the horrors of the war in southeast Asia. The Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, already has described it in his view as the most horrible war in history. I think the words of this man should be listened to not only because he is the head of the United Nations, the Secretary General, but also because he is a native of one of the countries which we are told lies in the path of Chinese imperialism and which will fall tomorrow if the Americans stop their escalation of the war in Viet Nam. U Thant, as we know, is a Burmese.

I think one might be able to make out a case for acquiescing in the perpetration of these atrocities and horrors if we were able to do it in the interest of an overriding moral purpose. This always has been the apologia advanced by those promoting war. It is one I was immunized against half a century ago. I never have been able to detect any solid and enduring gains made by the world from the death and maiming of so many of my generation. It is true enough, of course, that due to the folly and dishonesty of politicians and the greed of those who have a vested interest in a certain form of economic organization, matters are sometimes allowed to reach the stage where military violence is the only course which may be open, when the dragon's teeth sown by folly, dishonesty and greed finally germinate into menacing monsters who must be destroyed if the rest of us are to survive. This in effect is what the United States is telling the world today. They are telling us that the menace of Communism is such that we must not only tolerate but support them in their indiscriminate bombing and burning of the hapless people of Viet Nam. But I suggest it is an abdication of responsibility to take anyone's word for it when we are asked to condone and support actions which fill every decent person with dismay and horror.

Just how good is the claim of the administration in Washington that it is containing Communism? How valid is the claim that Communism would otherwise expand and flow across the face of the earth? In the first place we must realize that when we speak of Communism we are dealing with an abstraction, a very vague and poorly defined abstraction, which conveys very little to us of reality and tells us next to nothing about the men and women who label themselves Communists. This is the crux of our problem with our American neighbours. They see the situation not in political, social or economic terms but in religious terms, and have convinced themselves, and seek to convince us, that what they are fighting is incarnate evil, not flesh and blood men and women. Unfortunately there are those in our own country who have become victims of this type of religious mania.

It is suggested by my hon. friend for Red Deer that the dictates of real politic compel the United States to protect their interests. Again I wonder what interest they have in south-east Asia. They may well have made out a case for their interest in the western hemisphere, but I find it difficult to believe they can make out a case for legitimate American interest on the other side of the Pacific. In fact, sir, I have reached the conclusion it is not too exaggerated to suggest that United States policies and actions in southeast Asia can be described in clinical terms, if you like, as paranoid. We are dealing with a powerful neighbour who has gone around the bend with religious mania.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

There is a frightening similarity between the tissue of lies, misrepresentations and suppression of facts which have been exposed again and again by reputable United States observers—a stream of misinformation and equivocation which has come from the State Department and from the White House—and the tissue of lies and misrepresentations produced in a shameless rewriting of history which played such a sad part in the history of the Soviet Union. There is a shocking similarity to the more simple and dynamic advocacy of the great lie which was, of course, the policy of the Nazi régime.

A slowly increasing number of United States citizens are becoming aware of this situation and of the symptoms of paranoia with growing alarm. It does seem to me that we in Canada really have a responsibility which goes beyond giving the qualified support our government gives to United States actions in South Viet Nam and which carries us to the point where we should speak bluntly and plainly to our friends and to support the growing numbers of those who feel that this policy can lead only to disaster for the world.

We have heard a lot today and for many months now about Chinese expansion. Curiously enough, we are never presented with any evidence to support that suggestion.

An hon. Member: What about Tibet?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will speak about Tibet. Do you know anything about the McMahon border that was imposed there by the British when they took over Tibet? This was regarded as only a temporary line. China did not storm into India but moved to make a correction there. This was the position taken by the Chiang Kai-shek government before the Communist revolution. This was purely a Chinese nationalist position. Rightly or wrongly, they regarded this section of Tibet as a legitimate part of the Chinese nation.

I had the pleasure not long ago, thanks to the courtesy of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of having a long interview with one of the senior officials of his department who had recently returned from Viet Nam. I was able to ask him some questions and he gave me some very frank answers. I told him that I did not know whether he could answer one question, or that anybody could answer it, but I asked him if he would give me the benefit of his opinion. I said that we are told repeatedly that the bulk of the people of South Viet Nam support the Saigon government. I asked him what his estimate would be in this regard. He told me that I was right, that he could not give a definitive answer and that nobody else could. He said that his impression was that perhaps 10 per cent of the population supports the Viet Nam Saigon government, that 10 per cent support the Viet Cong and that the other 80 per cent wished to God that we would get to hell out of there and leave them alone. I suspected that was the position of the people of Viet Nam. I cannot imagine that they are very worked up by ideological preferences. People who have suffered 25 years of war are not likely to be worried too much about ideological niceties.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough because he displayed what to me is a shocking ignorance of the history of southeast Asia. Apparently he has forgotten the 25 years of history since the French tried to reimpose rule on what was then known as Indochina. No one at that time ever questioned for a moment that the French were faced with anything but a domestic insurgence. True enough, it was led by the Communists, perhaps because no one else would lead them or no one else was capable of doing so. The French were finally forced into defeat at Dien Bien Phu.

Then we come to some more interesting rewriting of history which leads people to speak today in this chamber as though there were either legitimately or factually two Vietnamese nations. A reading of the history of the past 25 years shows quite clearly that there was a temporary demarcation drawn along the 17th parallel which was not to be deemed as a permanent international boundary. A part of the Geneva agreement refers to elections to be held in both sections of Viet Nam.

Then we have another piece of rewriting of history. We say: Oh, well, the South Vietnamese are not bound by any agreement because they did not sign it. Of course they did not; neither they nor the North Vietnamese had any authority to sign that agreement because at that time France was the recognized power. France signed the agreement on behalf of those people and they are bound by it just as much as the French were when they signed it.

As I say, I have not yet been able to read or hear of any single incident of Chinese expansion. It may be coming, I do not know, but there has been no example given of it as yet and there has been no example presented to the International Control Commission of the United Nations of any infiltration of Chinese troops. In fact, I think it was just this morning that a report on the radio stated that the Chinese had decided they were not going to involve themselves in the Vietnamese struggle by sending troops there. I think we have to clear our minds of these things and really deal with some facts.

To me the most dreadful feature of this whole situation is that we are now embittering relations between the Asiatic people and those of Caucasian origin probably beyond repair for a generation. I cannot think that the people of Asia are going to feel able to trust the members of our race for a very long time to come. We are told of the aims and aspirations of the United States and how it seeks to develop the country under its control or under its—I think one can only use these words—puppet government in Saigon. How very curious are the things which happen in that country. Some of you may have read the story the other day of wounded Vietnamese children who require plastic surgery. You may have perhaps read that the British were prepared to take them and treat them free in the McIndoe institution at East Grinstead in Sussex. Other similar offers came from Switzerland and other parts of Europe. The only problem involved was the problem of transportation. The United States had transports travelling to Europe and were asked whether they would provide the transportation. President Johnson flatly refused to do so.

When I was in Europe about three or four weeks ago I came upon another incident of the carelessness and callousness of most of the world to the victims of this war. An organization has been set up to look after Vietnamese children who are orphans and whose parents have disappeared, including some who are wounded and ill. It may be interesting to those of you who shudder at the word "Communism" to know that only one country agreed to take sick Vietnamese children, those who are tubercular and have other diseases. That country is Yugoslavia. Other countries were prepared to accept surgical cases but they were not prepared to run the risk of taking children who may have Asiatic diseases. Yugoslavia was prepared to take them and has now taken some.

Our main question is, of course, as the hon. member for Peterborough suggested: What should Canada's policy be? I think there can be no question whatever, after the evidence of the results of our Prime Minister's plea, that our quiet diplomacy has failed and if we are to affect affairs in southeast Asia we must seek some other method. I think sometimes we underestimate the influence and prestige of Canada in the world. I think we underestimate our prestige in the eyes even of our neighbours in the United States. I can think of nothing that would more quickly cause the American president to at least look again at his policies than if the government of Canada were to align itself with now the majority of the other nations of the world in demanding that the United States take another look at its policies and seek some way out of this appalling impasse in which they find themselves.

To return to my hon. friend for Red Deer, I would suggest that anyone who is prepared in the interest of realpolitik to ignore the sufferings of the Vietnamese, both South and North, who have been suffering this sort of thing for 25 years and now have it intensified, surely has a very strange scale of Christian values. I may be considered perhaps as impractical, but I still think that any nation that is prepared to condone this sort of thing will eventually suffer for it, and I suggest we are suffering for it today in the eyes of the world and in the eyes of ourselves, because most of us know that our self-respect has been seriously impaired by the attitude of our government in pursuing this now fruitless policy of quiet diplomacy that affects no one, does not affect events and has merely resulted in getting a kick in the teeth which every Canadian should resent.

The Prime Minister of this country does not belong to my party, but as a Canadian I bitterly resent the fact that the American President should so ignore his advice as to almost immediately, after the advice was given that the Canadian government viewed with some misgiving any escalation of the war, escalate it. How much more savagely do we want to be kicked in the teeth—because apparently we are kickable people who just come back and ask for more. I suggest that we stop asking for more and join the other peoples of the world in trying to drive some sense into those who devise the policies of the most powerful nation in the world, about which policies so many of their own people have so many doubts today, and among these people some of the really important intellectual and political figures of the United States are to be included.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I rise not to participate in the debate on the subject under discussion but to ask the government house leader if he would clarify the situation. The government is asking for four months interim supply which would give them supply until the end of October. On the other hand, in today's Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day there is a motion in the name of the Minister of Public Works that this house, when it adjourns, shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, September 6. If this is so, it has a bearing on what opposition there will be to granting the supply sought. If this is a firm date to which the house will recess, I think it is unnecessary that the government have four months supply. I think three months supply would be sufficient. Would the government house leader be prepared at this point, because it will have a bearing on the debate from now until we pass interim supply, to tell us what the position is?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I should explain, Mr. Chairman. As hon. members know, the rules of the house provide that a motion for adjournment, other than to adjourn until the next day, requires two days' notice in writing on the order paper, and a notice for extending hours of sitting requires two days' notice. Otherwise there is a right of veto in the house and any individual member who refuses unanimous consent can prevent either of those subjects being dealt with. Consequently, a week ago I placed on the order paper a notice of motion for extended sittings with a view to having it available when the house was ready to bring this part of the session to a conclusion, but we did not proceed with the motion. When it became clear that the days I had mentioned in the notice of motion had gone by I had to draft another and give notice today of another motion for extended hours of sitting.

With regard to the date for our return after the summer recess, it is our wish to do this by agreement. We were unable to reach agreement as to the date of our return, so I put a notice of motion on the order paper reading as follows:

That, when this house adjourns at the end of the sitting of the day on which this motion is adopted, it stands adjourned until Tuesday, September 6—

The reason for the choice of Tuesday, September 6 was that this date had been mentioned at the time we assumed the house was adjourning for the summer recess, on June 30. That was the reason for that date. Agreement was not reached among the representatives of the other parties. It was an arbitrary date put into the notice of motion so that notice would appear on the order paper, and when the subject matter did come up it could be dealt with and whatever date was satisfactory could be put in. We have already gone 11 days past the anticipated date of adjournment and we have no agreement yet as to what the date of adjournment will be.

We have two other difficulties. The reason for asking for four months interim supply was that we had intended to have the house come back on September 6, deal with second reading of the Bank Act only and refer it to committee, with the hope that the committee would meet during the following three weeks and the house could adjourn in order to permit the International Labour Organization and the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, both of which organizations are meeting in September, to have some use of the House of Commons at that time.

I think it would meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen if we chose another date. I still do not know when we may expect to adjourn this part of the session, but I would think that a more realistic date for reconvening is the first Monday in October, namely, October 3, rather than September 6.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: We would be prepared to conduct discussions with the leaders of the other parties on that basis right now. If we do not reach a satisfactory agreement on the point I will be asking to amend the motion when it comes before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I would hope, as the minister is in such a conciliatory mood, that he would agree to a period of three months for supply. Whether we adjourn to September 6 or October 3, three months supply would cover the situation. If we returned on October 3 we would have seven or eight days in which to discuss interim supply. I would hope, therefore, that the four months for interim supply could be reduced to three. Furthermore, although I am not one to whom the government gives information in advance—

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, you do pretty well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —there have been strong rumours from well-authenticated sources that on the basis of the obvious disagreement that has taken place respecting the wage negotiations with the employees of Canadian National Railways, the disagreement being of such an extent that all three members of the commission have different views, it might very well be that the house would be called back in August should it become necessary to do so. That being so, I would ask the minister to reduce the period from four to three months. After all, interim supply for four months is rather unusual. If we come back on October 3 we will still have lots of time within which the government could bring before the house a motion for interim supply for another month. In that way we would come to a consensus now. If, as a result of a failure of negotiations with the Canadian National Railways employees, parliament might be called together by the government in order to assure the continuance of railway operations, there would be no harm done by reducing the period.

Let me say again that the calling together of Parliament on the railway question is not my suggestion but a rumour that has emanated from sources which have an unusual capacity of prophesying the future actions of the government. I am sure that the minister, with the most desirable purpose in mind of bringing about agreement, would not see any difficulty in reducing the four months period to three. Furthermore there is no disagreement on our part as to the alteration by amendment of the date for the recall of this house as suggested by the minister.

Mr. McIlraith: The difficulty with this situation, Mr. Chairman, is that the discussion of the Bank Act will have to get priority in October. I think that is quite obvious to everyone. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition mentioned that the house might have to be called back in August to deal with the labour dispute. I am not prepared to agree with that proposition. I hope that it will not happen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not my proposition; it is just a rumour concerning the government's intention.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not prepared to rely on that rumour. If it does happen, I am quite sure that the purpose of calling back the house in August would be to meet that emergency. The house would wish its time to be available to deal with that emergency situation and not with interim supply.

The situation with regard to supply is much better at this point in the session than it has been for a good number of years. About ten departments have been dealt with in committee of supply and the final appropriation bill was passed. The study of the estimates of some eight other departments has been completed by the standing committees to which the estimates were referred this year for the first time. This is in addition to the estimates of the ten departments which have already been passed by the committee of supply.

Four other departments have been before the committee of supply, two of which have been dealt with by the committee for a short period of time. Five other departments are now before standing committees and in the process of being considered. As a matter of fact the consideration of these departments by the standing committees is almost completed. One department is being held over for a supply motion debate which will take place when necessary in the latter part of the year.

In view of the advanced stage of work on estimates I hope the right hon. gentleman will reconsider the request for four months supply. Bearing in mind also the priority we must give to the banking legislation on our return, I hope he would agree to four months supply. The supply debate could then take place in the middle of October which I think is a realistic way of approaching the business of the house. I must say this is a subject to which I have given a great deal of attention in the last two or three weeks. It seems to me this is the best way of dealing with this matter in view of all the circumstances.

Mr. Starr: I wish to say a few words regarding the proposal made by the house leader a moment ago that this parliament reconvene on September 6.

Mr. McIlraith: You mean October 3.

Mr. Starr: The original proposal was to reconvene for the purpose of considering the Bank Act and then to adjourn so as to vacate the chamber for certain activities that are to take place here. I must say that this proposal would amount to limiting the time of debate on the Bank Act. I do not think that such a very important piece of legislation as the Bank Act should be limited to one week. Its discussion may take two weeks or it may take less, but it certainly should not be limited to a specific period of time. Consequently, in view of the circumstances and the occupation of this chamber by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, parliament should not be recalled to consider the Bank Act in such a limited time but should be allowed the time to debate this legislation when the house is convened in October.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the minister whether the revised version of the amendment is not to call the house back in September

Mr. McIlraith: No, not in the light of the developments in the last few weeks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will withdraw the suggestion I made originally because my understanding at that time was that the house would be recalled on September 6 to make the Bank Act available for study in committee, and then adjourn. If, however, it is not the government's intention to recall the house in September regardless of the position of the Bank Act, then I will certainly not press for the removal of the four months period.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, up to now the discussion on the supply motion has been on Viet Nam. I have no intention of speaking on Viet Nam. I wish to deal with another matter having to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. However, Mr. Chairman, you might wish to discover whether there are other speakers on Viet Nam or whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs might wish to answer some of the comments that have been made on Viet Nam before I proceed with this other subject.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock shall I rise and report progress?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I was explaining to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, I cannot be here tonight. If there is a discussion on Viet Nam my colleague the Minister of Industry, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, will be here.

Mr. Lewis: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend mentioned he wished to speak on the C.B.C.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the house realizes that the minister is not in a position to reply on this occasion because he has an appointment at 6.30 with the Deputy Premier of the U.S.S.R. We should not under any circumstances keep him away from his appointment. I hope that everything will be done to expedite his journey in this regard.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business I do now leave the chair.

Progress reported.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I think there is general agreement among all parties that the private members' hour should be waived today and that we return immediately to the business under discussion before six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, we seem to be in agreement on just about everything today. Since it does seem that the debate on Viet Nam has come to a conclusion and that we are going to switch to another subject and since we are agreeable to postponing private members' hour, could we not agree to take an hour off for supper?

Mr. Starr: No, let us carry on.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, we are in a bit of a predicament. We need the interim supply bill very badly and I would be loath to take an hour from its discussion at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: We might make more progress if we were fed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to defer private members' hour for today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now revert to the business interrupted a few minutes ago.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $1,662,982,791.93, being the aggregate of—

(a) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, not otherwise provided for, except Finance Item 15 for which the proportion is three-twelfths, and Transport Item 103 and Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40 for which no proportion is granted—$1,252,481,028.67;

(b) an additional four-twelfths of the total amounts of Dominion Bureau of Statistics Item 10, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L75 and L80 (Schedule A) of the said Main Estimates—$4,299,333.83;

(c) an additional three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 15 and 70 (Schedule B) of the said Main Estimates—$1,902,250.00;

(d) an additional two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Mines and Technical Surveys Items 55 and 75, Secretary of State Item 40, Loans, Investments and Advances Items L30 and L95 (Schedule C) of the said Main Estimates—$25,681,300.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Items 5 and 55, Finance Item 10, Fisheries Item 10, Justice Item 1, Mines and Technical Surveys Items 20, 25, 35, 45, 60, 80, 85, National Film Board Item 1, Northern Affairs and National Resources Item 15 and Transport Item 5 (Schedule D) of the said Main Estimates—$16,293,229.17;

(f) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of all of the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates A for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$193,924,378.08;

(g) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Item 35a, Defence Production Item 20a, Finance Item 4a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 40a, Transport Items 102a and 103a (Schedule E) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$5,709,522.67;

(h) two-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Finance Item 15a, Mines and Technical Surveys Item 75a, and National Research Council, including the Medical Research Council, Item 10a, (Schedule F) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$8,459,333.34;

(i) one-twelfth of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L40a (Schedule G) of the said Supplementary Estimates —$966,666.67;

(j) seven-twelfths of the total of all the Items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates B for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1967, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament—$103,265,750.00;

(k) four-twelfths of the total of the amount of Loans, Investments and Advances Item L32b (Schedule H) of the said Supplementary Estimates—$50,000,000.00, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1967.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, in view of recent occurrences affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I feel that I should take the time of the committee for, I hope, not too long to express my views on those occurrences since this is the only opportunity I will have before the summer recess. I do so because in my opinion what has happened in the C.B.C. recently is a sorry story, one that does no credit to the corporation. It requires airing before it is too late to correct the situation which is now developing in the most important single corporation, in my opinion, in Canada.

For what we are faced with at the present time, Mr. Chairman, is the resignation of 11 people as a result of this most recent development. They include Reeves Haggan, supervisor of public affairs, Douglas Leiterman, Patrick Watson, Robert Hoyt, Ken Lefolli, James Carney, Gabriel Michaelides, Beryl Fox, Larry Zolf, Stephen Patrick and David Ruskin, many of whom are recognized as being some of the most talented producers and writers with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We have also had the burial of the program "This Hour Has Seven Days", which while by no means a perfect program was without doubt the most important and most popular program produced by the corporation.

Because these events are the immediate result of what has recently happened in the C.B.C. I feel impelled to make some statements with regard to the situation. I am confident that what has happened has shocked the Canadian people. I am also confident that what has happened is an indication of such mismanagement by the corporation in its most delicate area of work that members of parliament must be concerned about the matter.

I entirely agree, Mr. Chairman, with the statement of the Secretary of State and of the broadcasting committee and with many other statements in many other places that the government ought not to interfere with the running of the C.B.C., and that parliament should not interfere with the day to day operation of the corporation. But I suggest to you that if there is a case, as in my view there is now a case, of utter mismanagement of an important situation, which I shall try to document in the few minutes I will take, then it is for parliament to discuss the matter and if necessary to take some steps in connection therewith.

I want to make clear first—I do not think I need to do so but I want to do so for the record—that I, like most members of this house, have, if you like, the most passionate feelings of support for the role of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and for the contribution that that great institution has made to the cultural and artistic development of this country, as well as its contribution to the dissemination of information and to public discussion and debate.

I also want to make clear that despite the various things I had to say in the broadcasting committee about the "Seven Days" programs which I happened to see, and I saw many of them, I did not necessarily subscribe then, nor do I necessarily subscribe now, to every segment of the program every week I saw it. There were some parts of the program which I thought were in poor taste. There were other parts of the program which other hon. ladies and gentlemen might have thought in poor taste. But that is irrelevant to the essential fact that the program "This Hour Has Seven Days" was, first, a most popular program which attracted over three million viewers, twice as many as any other program in the history not only of the corporation but of any other Canadian program.

Second, the program "This Hour Has Seven Days" had a great many aspects of imaginative, adventurous and useful presentation of fact, opinion and controversy in this country.

Third, I do not defend, nor do I feel I have to defend, all of the actions of Mr. Leiterman and his associates since their difficulties first arose. Indeed, I do not hesitate to say that despite my great admiration for Mr. Leiterman and most of his associates it is my opinion that some of the things which they said and some of the steps which they took were ill-considered and might not have been said or taken. That again is irrelevant to the basic issues. Those who, both in the press and in this committee, attempt to get away from the basic issues, which I think are clearly there, by saying that the producers acted wrongly here or acted wrongly there seem to me to be doing a disservice to the C.B.C. and to the major aspect of and the reason for the existence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, about which I shall say a few words, mainly in the language used by the white paper which was tabled by the Secretary of State.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Finally, it is not to be considered, because I am exceedingly critical of many things that management has done and the way in which it has done them, that I am condemning wholesale everybody and everything to do with top management of the C.B.C. In fact, I have always been highly impressed by the intelligence and dedication of the president, Mr. J. Alphonse Ouimet, whom I have had the pleasure of knowing for a good many years. I do not for a moment deny the very important contribution he has made to the development of the C.B.C. in many directions.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, and these are the points of importance and relevance to the present unhappy and sordid situation in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I suggest to this committee that the evidence is absolutely clear that there was in the first instance, when Watson and LaPierre were removed from "Seven Days", admitted mismanagement, and insensitiveness in the way in which they were removed. And in what has happened in the last few days there was on the part of top management of the C.B.C., and I choose my words carefully, nothing less than vindictive, reckless behaviour, with the result that irreparable harm has been done to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, particularly to the important and delicate public affairs department, in the loss of important talent to the corporation and in the resulting widespread loss of morale throughout the creative and production personnel of the corporation. This is why there have been wholesale resignations.

I said that in the first place there was gross mismanagement in the Watson and LaPierre matter. The evidence before the broadcasting committee of parliament clearly and fully justifies my statement. There was gross mismanagement in four directions, every one of which is fully supported by the evidence which any member can read in the proceedings of the broadcasting committee.

As we were told by the president and by vice president Walker when they gave evidence for top management, the problem of "Seven Days" had been with the corporation for two years. Anybody on the broadcasting committee who had had any experience with organization found it impossible, I am sure, to understand how management of the corporation could let things slide for two years, if there were problems, without doing anything decisive about those problems.
