Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I also suggest that all notices of motion for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all notices of motion stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

LABRADOR AND NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Labrador.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, today I seek leave of the House to move its adjournment for the purpose of discussing an urgent matter requiring immediate consideration, that is the urgent and pressing need of fishermen and their families in Labrador and Newfoundland for food and heat because of their complete inability to purchase these necessities as a result of the complete lack of income due to the worst ice conditions in living memory and a total collapse of the inshore fishery.

This is an unusual situation. It is not something that happens every year. These are the worst ice conditions in history. It is a complete failure. There are fishermen in my riding, and on the island of Newfoundland now, who have basic human rights denied. Food and heat are basic human rights according to the United Nations.

I submit that this is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, an emergency upon which this House should focus its attention and the government should focus its attention with a view to providing an aid package immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I listened very attentively to the hon. member for Labrador. I would like to assure him, the House, and anyone who is listening to us at this time that we are all aware that there are extraordinary conditions in Newfoundland and Labrador at this time. Unfortunately there are also very difficult problems in other parts of the country.

Although I am quite aware of those problems and quite sympathetic to the problems to which the hon. member was referring, I do not think it would be appropriate today to adjourn the House and have such a debate.

I hope it will come to this House shortly. I know that an opposition day, for example, has been declared for tomorrow and I too hope that we will be discussing this problem and ways to help these people in a very short while. I thank the hon. member.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, September 26, consideration of the motions that Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking; Bill C-28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When these bills were last debated, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River had the floor. In his absence, we will now resume debate.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I rise to discuss the second reading of Bill C-19, the new Bank Act and Bill C-28, the new insurance act.

We on this side of the House support this legislation in principle. However we have to examine the banking and insurance industries which have been waiting for a long time for these pieces of legislation.

The government has been dragging its feet for six solid years. For six years this government had held the banking and insurance institutions at bay. Let us examine this government action on these particular items.

Reform started in 1985 with the green paper, followed in 1986 by a blue paper. In September 1990, this government released a white paper on financial reform. It is only now after six solid long years that this government finally dragged itself into this House and is looking to finally start debating some of the actual legislation.

For too long this government has been holding the bank and federally regulated Canadian institutions at bay. They are outraged. This is gross negligence. This has to come to an end.

Our financial institutions are thirsting and must be given new powers they need to compete in new global business environments. We must also strive to ensure that Canadian consumers are well served and that the strength of the Canadian financial sector is not only protected but enhanced.

This government's slowness also has been damaging and is not helping our financial institutions compete and bring forward necessary reform to protect depositors.

Until Bill C-28 the new insurance legislation becomes law, insurance companies will continue to have to make complex legal arrangements to accomplish things which the old act allows but makes very difficult.

One can spend a great length of time discussing both Bill C-19 and Bill C-28 in detail. Together these two acts are over 800 pages and each is over an inch thick.

I want to briefly explore the various arguments received from various groups and individuals that banks should be able to retail insurance through their branches. On one side, it could be cheaper and more convenient for the consumers.

On the other side, people are saying that there are 170 companies, and 20,000 agents who could lose their jobs. There is something that we have to balance here. We have to look at it very carefully. We have to weigh the 20,000 jobs against the jobs that could be created. Will these jobs be sincerely lost or will these jobs be shifted from the insurance to the banks?

I have talked with many bankers and I have talked with many insurance agents. They give me different views. I, as a normal Canadian, would think that if I am given any opportunity to compete I might save some money. People are saying that they might save to the tune of thousands of dollars per year.

Let us explore these possibilities. An average Canadian family has two or three cars in a home. The insurance on these vehicles and the house could be to the tune of about $1,500 to $2,000. If I, as an ordinary Canadian, can have the opportunity to save $200 or $300 by going to an institution such as a bank, why should I not be given that opportunity.

This proposal is one that needs extensive examination.

Another issue given in this definition that we on this side of the House are quite surprised with is when the American Express was granted its foreign bank licence. AMEX clearly is not a bank in the United States. However this government said that AMEX met its legal definition of a bank.

It is also very important to examine when AMEX was given its bank regulations or the right to become a bank. Why was it given that particular right? We saw the ads in 1988. AMEX was in support of free trade and the government held the carrot and said: "You support free trade and we are going to give you your Bank Act." And the government did. On November 21, 1988, election day, AMEX was given the right to become a bank.

The government misled the Canadian public. It led us down a garden path. Free trade will be good for you. I am not going to go into discussing the details because we see the result daily. We are losing jobs to south of the border and now we are about to engage in something altogether different.

Now this government wants us to engage in a new free trade agreement. It wants to broaden, to create a bigger speck. It wants us to get into a free trade deal with the U.S. and Mexico. There are those people who say: "If you do not get on board you will be left behind". There are other people who say: "We need to deal with Mexico".

Well let us examine those possibilities. Do we need a free trade deal with Mexico? Can we compete? Do we need to compete with 86 cents per hour? Do we need to compete with a country which has environmental protection at the bottom of the pits? Americans as recently as yesterday were screaming and yelling that they do not want to get into this free trade deal with Mexico.

Why should we be hoodwinked by this government? Why should we even look at the possibility of free trade with Mexico? They are saying: "Look at the European experience. Look at what the European common market has brought to the countries of Europe".

There are differences here. The European experience is something altogether different from the North American experience. In Europe, if you are a citizen of one country and you have a red passport, you can travel and work in another country. However in North America, if you are a citizen of Canada you cannot travel and work in the United States or vice versa.

Yet the President of Mexico said yesterday that if you do not get into this free trade deal, you are going to have millions of young men migrating to Canada and the United States looking for work. Do we have to accept those millions of young men coming up to our shores for work? No, Madam Speaker, we do not have to. However, daily we are losing jobs to south of the border.

While the government has not yet revealed its strategies for these negotiations, it seems clear that foreign countries will demand similar treatment to that received by the Americans under free trade. They will demand similar treatment to the AMEX bank.

We on this side of the House want to state once again that the government might not use the straight negotiations to weaken the competitive position of the Canadian financial institution. Should we participate in these talks? There are some members of this House who say that we should be at the negotiating table.

I talked to over 14,000 of my constituents over last summer. Ninety-two per cent of my constituents said we do not need free trade with Mexico. We do not need to participate in these talks. If we participate we are going to weaken the financial position of our country and our financial commitment to our people. We will be looking very closely at the two bills as they go to the finance committee.

• (1550)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask my colleague a couple of questions. I appreciate his participation in this debate about changing the Bank Act. His riding, like mine is going through a lot of economic pain right now. Many of the small and medium sized businesses in his constituency are finding it very difficult.

He spoke a little bit about American Express. We have all talked about American Express when debating this bill at second reading.

I said in this House last Friday that maybe we should give American Express the opportunity to see whether or not it does fulfil the requirement of being a normal chartered bank. Maybe we should invite American Express to come to the committee between second and third reading. It might be interesting to put these questions before them. That is one point I would like to raise with my colleague.

There is a perception in the community right now that the major financial institutions, banks like the Bank of Nova Scotia, TD and the Bank of Montreal are almost like a cartel. We know they are not a cartel, but there is a perceived sense that the banking institutions are a cartel.

I am supporting the amendment to this bill to include insurance companies. It is my belief that this is going to foster more competition. The NDP does not share my view on this but I have yet to be convinced that their view is correct.

Does the member not think it would be a good thing to include the insurance companies in the financial institutions format, where they can lend money to small and medium sized businesses. This would expand the options of opportunity for the smaller guys who tend to be closed down completely if they are turned down at one of the major banks.

I would like to have his thoughts on that.

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for sharing his concerns with us. We all have small businesses in our ridings, from the mom and pop operations in the rural ridings to the corner store or Mac's Milk. They are all going through a crunch. They are going to the banks and saying: "Mr. Banker, can you lend me some money so I can go through this six months of recession". The government tells us we are through the recession—

An hon. member: Three years of recession.

Mr. Karygiannis: Well, the government says six more months and we are going to be out of it, hopefully, but I totally disbelieve that. The banks are seeing the numbers and they are saying: "Hold on. So much you owe, so much are liabilities, so much are assets. Forget it". If we were to give this opportunity to other institutions, to the insurance companies, maybe they will have a more flexible approach to lending money.

It is a good opportunity for us to examine it and I think it has certain merits.

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, I too would like to compliment my colleague on the remarks he made a few moments ago. He alluded to the fact, and my friend from Broadview—Greenwood mentioned it as well, of the pain and the hurt felt by the small business network across the country. We always hear the rhetoric from all sides at various points of government tenure, that the small business is the engine of economic growth, that the small business is the engine of technology, and if we take care of the small business sector, then the entrepreneurship and the development of ideas will flourish. If you are a small business person in this country, there is very little left in the budget, very little said in the budget that is aimed at that sector.

The hon. member talked about the business sector and the economy. While we are talking about banks and lending institutions, what does he think about the fact that while interest rates have been falling and perhaps are lower than they were during the 1981–82 crunch, is it not a fact that Canadians are not in a position to ask for loans because they are not working. People do not have jobs and when people do not have jobs it is pretty tough approaching any bank or any trust company or any firm.

I am just wondering what he is hearing from some of the constituents and business people in his part of Scarborough with respect to the lack of jobs inhibiting people going to their lending institutions.

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, we all receive phone calls constantly. I know the members of the government also receive calls. If they do not wish to answer them, that is a different story.

Mr. Lewis: Name one.

Mr. Karygiannis: I know for a fact that I even get calls from Barrie and as far away as Penetang about businesses that are in trouble, in pain.

These small businesses have to carry an inventory. They have to go to their bankers and say: "My sales last year were not as healthy as I anticipated. I have to pay the factory that supplied me. Will you please lend me money?" The banker looks at the figures and says: "Just a minute". He puts down the numbers and says: "I don't think you are viable. Sorry, I am not going to lend you money". This small businessman turns around and says to the factory: "I'm sorry, I used to pay in 30 days but not any more. Now we are going to go to 120 days or maybe 180 or 360. I will pay you next year". The manufacturer is going to say: "I don't have enough money to make more. Therefore I am going to lay people off".

It is a vicious circle. The small engine that gets this country moving is the 80 per cent of the businesses that are small businesses, businesses less than $2 million, which means a family business and maybe one or two of the kids or a business and one or two employees. What stability do these businesses have? What future can these businesses look at? They cannot go to the bank to finance and bring in new inventory. They cannot order from the manufacturer.

This circle breaks down. It brings the small business to its knees. It brings whole industries to its knees. What do we hear? Closure, after closure, after closure. Where are they going? Down south.

Yet this reckless government wants to take us upon another expedition on free trade with Mexico. We are going to be the great saviours of North America. At the cost of our children, the future of our kids' jobs, the Prime Minister wants to provide jobs at 85 cents an hour to the Mexicans.

I want no part of this because I think charity begins at home. I think the future of my kids and the future of Canadian kids comes first.

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, in talking about lending institutions, the government says: "Go to the chartered banks and if you cannot go to the chartered banks, we have the Federal Business Development Bank". I would be very interested to hear the experiences of business people in the east end of Toronto or Toronto in general as to what they say about the Federal Business Development Bank. Clearly it is not the answer but I would be very interested in hearing the hon. member.

Mr. Karygiannis: Very quickly, Madam Speaker, the bank says: "If you have no collateral, forget it. Go to a bank. If the bank won't touch it, then we won't touch it. If the bank won't touch you, we will look at you", and when they look at you, they say: "No. Clearly, no". It is a failure.

• (1600)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, as my colleague stated a little earlier, we are very much interested in the fact that the government has finally come through with the proposed reform legislation. In fact, for the benefit of those who might be watching us now, this bill has been called for by the financial institutions for a number of years. In my view it could not have arrived at a better time than now, especially considering the financial situation of our country. One of the ways to begin on the road to recovery is to clean house and put things in order.

The Liberals will be supporting this legislation, so it will go to second reading because we are very much interested in what is in the bill. Also, at the same time we truly believe that going to committee will be the best forum for both industry and consumers to make their cases known.

Canadians know that billions and billions of dollars every day change hands in the banking industry, both at the Canadian level and the international level. When one looks at the objectives of the proposed legislation we see a lot of good things, at least in the reform end of things. First, we see a benefit to the consumer by increasing competition in the variety of services offered by the financial institutions, whether we are talking about the banking industry or whether we are talking about the insurance companies. We would like to see in the bill, as we believe it is part of the proposal, enhanced protection for depositors as well as policy holders. As a result of that we would not see the kind of situation we have seen with the collapse of a variety of financial institutions over the past few years.

It is interesting to note that in comparing our industry to other industries around the world we do not necessarily do too badly. In fact, we have a very clean-cut industry compared to that of other countries in the western hemisphere.

Having said that, obviously we are interested in seeing improvement and resolving many of the outstanding issues, in particular the question of jurisdiction.

We see, as part of this legislation, a way to strengthen the ability of Canadian financial institutions to compete at home and abroad. At a time when the whole area of competition is entering a new phase as a result of globalization it is extremely important for us to prepare our industry so it will be equipped to compete internationally as well as regionally. More than anything, this proposal is a way to lay the groundwork for discussion with the provinces so we can deal with the whole question of harmonization. You know, Madam Speaker, probably more than anyone else, about the difficulties we face with the mobility of goods and services, not only within the provinces themselves but from one province to the next and therefore from within the country to other countries abroad.

To deal with all of those objectives the government, as well as the House in general, has to consult. That process of consultation has begun. Obviously by going to committee we will have a chance for even more consultation.

There are quite a few interesting items in the bill. One point is particularly interesting, and that is the question of regulating the industry.

In an ideal situation living in a democracy anybody, providing he or she is making a lawful profit, should be entitled to deal in the kind of business he or she wants, providing the law allows them to do so.

When it comes to a question of jurisdiction the banks want to get involved in the sale of insurance. They want to get involved in the rental of cars and the insurance companies want to get involved in the question of deposit and opening accounts for consumers and vice versa.

I am sure legislators would love to see the industry resolve this question itself and come to us with an agreement, that they all agree on what needs to be done. That would have made our life a lot easier.

Unfortunately this question has not been resolved by the industry. That is why we are in the situation we are in.

Many of the points in this particular act are well thought out. I would like to mention some of those amendments to the proposed act or the points that are in the act. Point number one is a requirement to disclose services charged by banks. That is a very good and interesting point.

The second point concerns the power to make regulations relating to the disclosure of the networking situation. That is a very interesting point also.

The phasing out of the current reserve requirement and the draft regulations on insurance, which are similar to those relating to trust and loan companies, limit a bank's ability to offer insurance advice and restrict the promotion and solicitation of insurance business and branches.

Banks will continue to be able to market credit, related insurance and travel insurance. That is a very interesting amendment to the legislation.

One cannot help but stray a little bit from the question before us. As I indicated earlier we are supporting it in principle so that it can go to committee.

While I was doing a little research I was quite alarmed by what I found out concerning the question of the state of both our consumers and our businesses. They are, in the final analysis, the depositors in the banks.

Banks do well when they have consumers depositing money and when they have businesses depositing money. Examining statistics since 1985 one would not be able to be anything but somewhat shocked that in 1985 there were in excess of 19,000 consumers, potential depositors, who went bankrupt. There were 8,663 businesses that went under. A whopping total of 28,415 groups of individuals and businesses went bankrupt in 1985.

In 1986—again as a result in many cases of government policy, whether monetary policy or general policy relating to full employment—there were in excess of 21,000 consumers and in excess of 8,500 businesses, a total of 30,267 businesses and individuals, which went bankrupt. Those people could have been depositors in our banking system. Those people could have been full fledged producers in our society.

In 1987 there were in excess of 24,000 consumers and 7,600 businesses, a total of 33,848 businesses and consumers, who went bankrupt. In 1988 we had a total of 33,848 consumers and businesses that went bankrupt. In 1989 we had in excess of 37,866 both consumers and businesses that went bankrupt. In 1990 we had in excess of 54,424 both businesses and individuals who went bankrupt.

Those are the kinds of statistics that are cause for alarm to our financial institutions, the private sector and society. They should also be cause for alarm to the government.

There is no question that this increase in bankruptcies has affected the banking industry and the insurance industry. I would suggest that maybe it is time for the government to sit down and have a look at the way we do things. Have a look at the blueprint for the future and see what needs to be done in order to get the economy back on track.

The way the government has been approaching this question is not necessarily the best way. It is one way but we are going to pay the price. There are other ways so that Canadians can benefit.

Obviously attacking the public servant is not the way to revitalize the economy, regain consumer and business confidence, and get the banking and insurance industries back on track. The only way we will have a blueprint for the future of Canada is by developing some sort of policy that would commit the government to full employment.

By doing that, I would suggest, we would be able to get the economy back on track and help industry and consumers. There is no question that what is needed is a proper industrial strategy, in consultation with industry, the business sector, the investment sector and the banking sector.

It is time that we set up the strategy for the future. Over the last five, six or eight years there have been reactionary solutions, not action in the sense of a proper strategic plan.

This particular act is a step in the right direction. There is no question that it is going to solve many long outstanding issues in the industrial sector. But we have to do more than introduce legislation. We have to move forward with a strategy that will increase, as I indicated earlier, the confidence of the consumers and businesses. Then we will see more investment in the Canadian economy and more businesses coming from abroad to invest in our society. Then we can ensure that there is something for everyone, without robbing Peter to pay

Paul, without cutting services we provide to the community, and without increasing taxes.

I will go on to indicate that without proper long-term strategy this whole question of economic renewal is going to be ill conceived by both industry and the consumer at large.

On that note I would like to say that we are very fortunate to have the kinds of institutions we have in our society. I was quite impressed by a statement made in The Ottawa Citizen today by Helen Sinclair, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, when she alluded to the fact that our banking industry is in good hands. Surely our banking industry is in good hands.

There is one item which I think the government should look at very closely, and that is the licensing of banks that are not licensed at home. This particular issue, I think, is cause for grief both within our caucus and the industry itself.

On that note, I would like to entertain some questions from both sides of the House.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate my friend from Ottawa Centre for articulating not only his concerns in relation to the banking industry and the economic directions into which this country seems to be heading, but clearly articulating them on behalf of constituents from his riding to whom he is indeed very close.

The hon. member mentioned that what we need is an industrial strategy in this country, a strategy that certainly does not look backward but looks forward with a sense of strength and a sense of vision. I am just wondering if he can perhaps take a moment and share some of the concerns from an economic viewpoint that he has been getting and experiencing not only in his riding but in his travels across the country.

Why does he believe that the government has not moved on an economic industrial strategy, considering that back in 1984 the Prime Minister boasted that one of the reasons that he was elected, one of the reasons that he was standing and one of the reasons that his government was successful was that it was going to bring economic prosperity across the country? Yet, as he knows and my colleagues know on this side of the House, we have never been through as bad and as demoralizing a recession as the one we are presently engaged in.

I look forward to hearing from my friend on these matters.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for a very well put question. There is no question about it, my colleague is very well informed. That is why he is alluding to the fact that there is somehow—I really should not say a lack of vision because we all see, we all know—a lack of ability. I do not think there is the ability there. Maybe the will is there but there is a lack of ability.

What needs to be done in fact is to set up a policy. That policy should be a long-term one. There is a need to set up a strategy and that strategy has to be a long-term one.

I think more than anything that if one looks at the economic situation we are faced with, one would have to admit it does hinder the ability of anyone to move with any kind of a program. If we go back four or five years as it has been indicated in many of the Prime Minister's speeches, the question of research and development, the question of education, and the question of working in partnership with the private sector, are all good statements. But unfortunately, the actions of the government have not matched the statements of the government.

One cannot help but look at the areas, for instance, of employment and training. In his February speech the Prime Minister spoke about the fact that there is a need for a global approach to this whole question of training and retraining our work force so we can be competitive on the international scene.

I could not help but almost jump up when I looked at the constitutional proposals. I was somewhat puzzled to see that particular item was going to be handed over to the provinces. One would suggest that one of the most valuable resources in our society is manpower, our work force. The training and retraining of our work force are being passed to the provinces so they can deal with them.

How do you expect the have not provinces of Atlantic Canada or western Canada or certain other parts of our country that do not have the money or the resources to invest in the retraining of their work forces to do so? What will happen as a result of that? Not only will it increase the regional disparity between the provinces, but we will not be able to compete internationally. The disadvantaged in our society will be even more disadvantaged, because there will be no standards whereby all of the provinces have to supply the minimum standard. Let us assume for a moment that there is going to be a standard to go along with employment training. The money in the fund would have to come from somewhere and that somewhere would have to be, in the circumstances we are in ourselves, the federal government.

There is no doubt in my mind, it does not matter how we slice it, that if we are really committed to increased productivity in the future, if we are really committed to getting this country out of the economic misfortune it is in, we have to employ a strategy which looks first at our work force, our most valuable resource which is the human resource.

We are now seeing in the actions of the government the abandonment of the statement made by the Prime Minister over and over again during the past four or five years. It is my hope that as this whole debate on the constitutional question evolves the government, as well as the provinces, will come to terms with the question of human resources. Not only the mobility of the work force between provinces is important. The retraining of the work force is far more important than its mobility.

That is one important point the government should look at very closely.

To answer the question asked by my hon. colleague there is a need for a policy. That policy must be matched with funds. Those funds have to go toward research and development and toward education. That is the only way we can get ourselves into the 21st century in good shape.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend. I know that he and his colleagues in the Liberal Party have worked very hard on their industrial strategy. They have been successful in keeping it under wraps for some seven years now. I wonder if my hon. friend would take this opportunity—it is a good time, a slow news day as a result of Question Period—to enlighten not only the government but probably the entire country on the Liberal strategy which has taken seven years to develop and has not yet been leaked out of the Liberal caucus, as so many other things have.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I am thrilled that the hon. minister has given me this opportunity to talk about the Liberal platform.

I want to talk about the past because my colleague has brought up what the Liberals have done. In the majority of the years we had a Liberal government, we had good times. Canadians did not go hungry. We have only to compare the record and look at the number of unfortunate events which have happened to Canadians over the past eight years and compare them to the previous eight years. Canadians could come to the conclusion fairly quickly that Tory times are bad times and Liberal times are good times.

If anything our government of the past had, and our government in the future will have, a full commitment to employment. One of the points articulated by Mr. Chrétien, the leader of our Party, over and over again is that at least with a Liberal government we will not be robbing Peter to pay Paul.

We will be introducing a policy taking into consideration the future of Canadians. We will be introducing policies to look after the interests of the people. We will be introducing policies to put this country into the 21st century in good shape. We will be addressing the questions of retraining, education, and full employment. We will certainly never allow a deterioration in the state of our social programs such as we are seeing now. We will never attack the underprivileged. We will never rob a single mother of her savings which help to carry her into the next month. We will never go after those who cannot defend themselves, and certainly we will not deal with the public servants the way this government has dealt. We will not attack the public servants. We will not attack over 55,000 public servants who make under $27,000 without giving them a penny increase, with the exception of the $500 the government proposed. Five hundred dollars was taken away from those people because if they had not been off the job many of them would have earned in excess of $1,500. The government has not given them anything.

Certainly it is not vision to attack your public servants, your own employees.

I would like to remind the minister of something he said yesterday. He said: "The federal government is the biggest and largest employer in the country". It is. When you are the biggest and the largest employer in the country you have to set a good example in dealing with your own employees, in dealing with the people who work for you. Certainly you do not rob them. You do not rob Peter in order to give to Paul.

The only way to deal with this whole question of economic renewal is by increasing productivity, not by going after the public servants. The hon. minister knows that once we have a Liberal government in place we will deal with the question and in a lot more effective way than the present government is dealing with it. I am sure all my colleagues agree with me and they are clapping.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the three bills before us today. There are three or four bills that this government has introduced after a long period of consultation which effectively restructure and try to modernize our financial institutions.

I will speak briefly to each of the three bills before us today. The Liberal Party supports the introduction of these three bills. We are waiting for them to go to committee quickly, as soon as the speeches are finished today, so that the committee can have plenty of time to look at the technical application of the legislation and hopefully, after listening to witnesses, it will be able to recommend some positive changes to this legislation.

As consumer and corporate affairs critic I am pleased to see, first of all, that this package of legislation, these three bills, opens up the financial institutions to more competition. I for one believe that the consumers' interests are always better served when there is viable competition in the marketplace. These three bills certainly do that. To a certain extent it opens it up a bit. It allows insurance companies to now make loans. It changes the way banks do some of their business. It does not allow them to get into automobile leasing. It does not allow the banks to get directly into insurance. However, it opens it up and allows the banks, if they so choose, to purchase insurance companies.

It also affects the Co-operative Credit Association Act. There are amendments to that act which I think are very progressive.

We live in a country that affords an unusual amount of protection to banks. We live in a country where many times we have seen successive governments come forward and listen to the banks' interests and perhaps not always listen to the interests of consumers. I can say that with some certainty because there is currently a pre-study on the government's bankruptcy legislation. The Canadian banking institution, as highly regulated as it is, is probably one of the most effective lobbies in this country. Any change or potential change to legislation that may affect their profitability is going to be challenged by the banks.

When the banks saw these changes being introduced in these four acts— actually the Trust Act has already been dealt with—they had some concerns because the closed shop they basically were allowed to operate out of, highly regulated by legislation, was being opened up.

I want to commend the government for taking this step because I know it must have been difficult. It has taken a long time to get these reforms put before the House. It has taken a long time and it has taken a lot of lobbying efforts and a bit of spine as well to come forward with the changes we see in these three acts today.

In the Co-operative Credit Association Act, I am extremely pleased to see that they are now going to have the ability to act almost as if they were a bank, but a bank with a heart. The co-operative movement in Canada is a movement we should all be proud of. Personally, I am very proud of the co-operative movement because it had its birthplace in my home province of Nova Scotia. The co-operative movement is very strong in Nova Scotia in the co-operative credit union movement and it is active in agriculture.

The Coady Institute at St. Francis Xavier University is a great example of Canadian brilliance and genius. It takes individuals from Third World Countries and trains them to help themselves, not just to take handouts. It teaches them the co-operative movement and how each one helping another is the way that communities develop.

This act affects one of those components of the co-operative movement and that is the credit unions. Up until now the credit unions basically served the interests of their members. Because it is a membership-based institution, it had some difficulty because by law they were not permitted to go forward and raise capital through equity. They were only permitted to raise money through debt and through memberships.

The regulations that existed prior to this bill literally hamstrung the potential effectiveness of the co-operative movement through the credit unions or through the caisse populaires. This bill goes in the right direction in trying to correct that and allow the credit unions, if they so choose, to have another avenue to raise money so they can be competitive in some of the smaller and even in some of the larger areas. They can be competitive with those large banks that have had way too much protection for much, much too long.

Those movements are positive ones that I certainly support. There are some problems though. I am disturbed about an article that appeared today in The Ottawa Citizen. Everybody here wants to ensure that when we put through legislation, particularly legislation that is as long overdue as these three pieces of legislation, we do it right. Time and time again we have seen that there are special interests involved in such areas as the banking communities or the insurance industry or consumers or labour. When you change a complex piece of infrastructure in our economy, it is going to have a negative effect on somebody. Not everyone will like the changes that go forward.

When we do have the stamina to go through this gruelling process of trying to put better legislation through the House, we had better make sure we do it right.

As I said previously the article appearing in the The Ottawa Citizen today concerns me greatly. Helen Sinclair, President of the Canadian Banker's Association, is quoted as expressing some concerns that this new Bank Act that we are debating today may already be outdated. She says that we should seriously look at firming up some of the regulatory requirement such as the reporting and accounting practices of banks so that we do not get into a situation such as we have had with the Bank of Credit and Commerce.

It is good that we have a spirit of co-operation here. Normally when bills come forward, governments do not want to change one comma or change a sentence. But the co-operative approach on this bill, which is the right approach—

An hon. member: We should do it more often.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): We should do it a lot more often. This place would be a lot more relevant to Canadians if we did that.

I hope the approach on this bill will continue into committee stage and the government and all members will look at some of these things that are coming forward, most recently the one by Helen Sinclair, and put amendments forward to close those particular loopholes.

There are some other problems and I do not know that they are fully addressed. I am certainly not an expert when it comes to the banking institutions in this country. All I know is that I owe them a heck of a lot of money and I pay too high an interest rate on it. That is about it.

I am not a high financier but I will tell you something, Madam Speaker. I get a little concerned. Look back and see what happened with American Express. When governments, political parties or whatever start interfering in our financial institutions and start to manipulate and interpret regulations that are meant to be there to provide some stability and certainty in our financial institutions and to perhaps benefit some of their friends, I think that that is very, very dangerous.

We have the situation, Madam Speaker,—you are very well aware of it—of American Express. American Express in the United States does not qualify in its own country as a bank. It should not qualify in Canada. Canadian banking institutions and any other institutions that may wish to become a bank have to live by certain criteria. Their criteria are very rigorous. They are meant to be there to protect the depositors. They are there to be sure that the stability that we seek to put into our financial institutions is maintained.

American Express made a call in the dead of night and on election day in 1988, knowing full well that to grant American Express the distinction of being a Canadian bank was completely contrary, 100 per cent contrary, to the intent of all of the regulations and contrary to the Bank Act, nevertheless this government perhaps because it owed a favour back to American Express, passed it. The minister signed it and said: "Yes, you are okay. You can be a bank." That very type of thing has to be made absolutely impossible in the Bank Act.

We have to make sure that when we give regulatory and discretionary authority to a minister, that discretionary authority will not be abused by that minister for whatever special interest he seeks to keep happy.

I am not so sure that the bill goes far enough quite honestly in ensuring that that does not happen. The last thing that we need in this country are pieces of legislation regulating the infrastructure in our financial institutions in our marketplace that can be easily manipulated by those who do not quite understand the complexity of those pieces of legislation and will use some vague sections for their own political gain. That is something that we have to ensure does not happen again.

There are a couple of other things I want to speak to on these acts and it deals generally with financial institutions. We have just gone through a period of record bankruptcies across Canada. They are record bankruptcies.

The last figures that came out told us that so far this year there are over 50,000 bankruptcies. With every single bankruptcy we have to be very, very careful that we do not just see it as another statistic. Each one of those statistics has a face. Many of those faces have families and those families have dreams.

Each and every time that a small business goes out of business or an individual has to declare personal bankruptcy, it is not just a paper death. In many cases you are seeing the life, the aspirations and the future of individuals crushed. You are seeing the mom and pop shop, a corner store operation that has just had its credit line pulled by the bank because sales were down because of the government induced recession. The bank was getting a little worried and pulled the credit line.

It is not just a little bit of money. An individual might be 55 or 58 years of age. Perhaps they have invested their entire life in that small venture and they are proud of it. They do not just work in the store. They probably also work with the Kiwanis or the Kinsmen, or maybe they work with the Boy Scouts or the Girl Guides. They contribute to their community.

When that happens you have destroyed their capacity to participate fully in their community. You have destroyed them and they cannot pick it up at 50 or 55. Many cannot pick it up at 20 or 25.

When we see these pieces of financial reform coming in, we have to say: Does that address that? Are the banks sometimes a little too quick to pull the rug out? Do they forget sometimes that, yes, you might have had six months of hard luck but you had 22 years of good management?

So, any amendments or any bills that come in here that compel those financial institutions to be more competitive, and more sensitive as well, I fully support. Competition is a wonderful thing. Competition is a great thing. I remember a few years ago in Nova Scotia when deregulation allowed for other than Bell Telephone or MT&T to have the sole monopoly on the sale and leasing of telephone equipment. Maritime Tel & Tel is a wonderful company. It is a wonderful company in Nova Scotia and it is a great corporate citizen of that province. But immediately when competition was allowed in, Maritime Tel & Tel had to scramble and it had to become better at what it does, namely to provide service to the public. And that is what competition does.

So, the consumer should be well served by these pieces of legislation that are currently before us.

We have to make sure because whenever you tamper with the financial institutions in this country, you have to be very very sure because one of the minor adjustments that you meant to make may have consequences that are very disastrous once it is in practice and once the lawyers get at it and the accountants get at it and the bankers get at it, and those types of things.

One of the things that our party would like to look at, and I think there is a provision in the Bank Act that it be reviewed in 1997, is moving that up a little sooner. We would like to see some type of ongoing consultation, some ongoing assessment as well, as to whether or not the reforms that we seek to implement through this legislation are actually coming through in the community.

The last thing I wish to say, and again it deals with consumers, is that these three pieces of legislation put in some consumer protection. How many times when dealing with the big banks do people feel that they have been ripped off? I feel it all the time when I go in, although I have got a pretty good banker at home. I don't want him to be watching this and think I am talking about him. I certainly am not.

An hon. member: What was his name again?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): What happens, Madam Speaker, is many times people feel—and it may be proper, it may not—that they have not been done right by a bank or an institution. The worst thing that can happen is for them not to have an avenue in which to explore their complaint. Many, many times there might be, out of 50 complaints, one that is founded or there might be 49. I don't know.

What these pieces of legislation does is allow for a process to be established. It actually legislates that a process be established. That process will handle consumer complaints. If the consumer is still not satisfied with the answers they get through the financial institutions, these acts allow them to complain to the superintendent. The superintendent in turn does not have any legislative rights of remedy. They really cannot do very much. But what they can do is file a report on these complaints, and hopefully the power of having negative press, negative publicity when they file a report or file a report with Parliament, will be enough to ensure that the consumers' interests are looked after by these large financial institutions. I think that is one of the most progressive pieces of this legislation because it actually sets in place a process. In and of itself it may not look like very much, but if we look at what has happened other times that these types of processes have been put up, they have been successful.

In conclusion, I would like to say that our party, the Liberal Party, supports changes to our financial institutions. We support opening up more competition, and we also support any measures that the government would put forward that would ensure that the interests of the consumer are paramount and that processes are put in place to ensure that the consumer has a say as well.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech. He said that his party was supporting the bill at second reading and will look for some changes in the committee.

In his speech, the member did not touch on one of the very grave concerns that depositors and Canadians should have in general and that is the ownership of financial institutions. Banks now are very strictly controlled with respect to the amount of ownership any individual or group of individuals can own. It is 10 per cent.

Recently we have noticed that the financial institutions that have had the greatest difficulty have been the trust companies where close ownership has led to abuses. If you were to sit in on the committee, you would have heard the Superintendent of Financial Institutions explaining and saying that we only have guidelines with respect to all kinds of things, we have been unable to properly keep track of these operations. Yet now in these bills what we are doing is we are opening up the cages of the zoo and we are letting a lot of commingling go on. So I think there is a concern.

In the United States when deregulation came in, in the short run it resulted in many financial institutions, but in the long run there was a melt down. We are going along the same path. Insurance companies can own trust companies, banks can own insurance companies and they can own each other.

I want to tell you, the biggest insurance company in this country is not nearly as big as a bank. All the time they talked, when they came as witnesses before the committee, they were talking about global competition. They are not so interested in what goes on Canada, they now want to become big players international. Their focus is on the globe not at home. If you think small businesses and medium sized businesses have had a rough time in getting loans, wait till these sumo wrestlers get their focus on the world because that is where the focus is, it is global.

The member did not touch on this ownership, the possibility that one morning you will wake up and there will be only one financial institution in the country, and that is when they start setting the price.

I only have to raise with you, Madam Speaker, the lack of any kind of competition that would bring credit card interest rates down.

I want to tell you that when it gets to that stage of the game there is going to be no competition at all. In the short run, maybe, but in the long run it will be a melt down.

I ask the member, since he did not comment on ownership, to comment on ownership.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, let us be fair here. My hon. colleague and I see eye to eye on many, many, many things, but in this particular instance what he is talking about is that the changes that have taken place may end up in one single financial institution one morning at some point in the future and, of course, that would be absolutely disastrous. What we have now are the five majors and they are really the cartel. We are looking at a situation right now which is not terribly positive. I do not think that the Canadian banking institutions, as they currently stand, are near competitive enough. They all offer the same thing. It is a monopoly times five right now.

I firmly believe that the bills that are before us need some work and I said that in my presentation. I said that when it gets to committee, we will have to examine each and everyone of these things, and they are very complex. I do not pretend to understand half of them. I do not pretend to understand one-third of them. But we will hear witnesses at committee and we will have the experts and hopefully we will have a research staff. I am sure that by the time we finish the process all of those issues will be dealt with.

On the matter of ownership, when you are dealing with our financial institutions, because of the tremendous clout that they have in this country, it concerns me greatly. Is the hon. member saying that he believes this legislation does not address the problem of too concentrated an ownership of trust companies? Am I correct that that is what he is talking about?

I think what we should do in this particular case, because it is a valid concern, is to ensure the ownership of our financial institutions because of the influence that they wield in this country. We have to make sure that the ownership is watered down enough so that we are not going to get the intermingling and commingling of two or three of the owners and in effect perhaps affect the marketplace in a very negative way.

I would be satisfied if the government could convince me when we get to the committee stage that those questions should be answered. They should be put. I am sure with the spirit of co-operation that we are seeing on this type of a bill, just like we are seeing on the bankruptcy bill, that if there is good logic to put those changes forward, the government will see the value of that logic and will institute those amendments.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I was wondering if the member from the Liberal Party who is fully informed about this would realize that public hearings in the finance committee last fall dealing with Bill C-83 and dealing with the white paper that forms the basis of this bill were held and we heard a great number of witnesses. All of those witnesses made comment with respect to the bill and alterations were made on these bills. They have been drafted and redrafted in accordance with hearings held over about a 10 year period.

Having had the benefit of seeing all of those reports of these hearings before the finance committee, and having studied the matter thorough, if the member could just quickly in a word or two tell us the exact amendments his party wants to put forward to change and alter these bills.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I think the questioner is being a bit mischievous. Of course, I am aware that there has been tremendous work done over the last number of years to put this bill together. I would never claim to have the expertise on financial matters that the hon. member has. He is a former chair of the finance committee.

An hon. member: He is the only one who warned us about the $10 billion tax grab.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): That is exactly right. He is the only member opposite who warned us of the $10 billion tax grab on the GST. You can see, Madam Speaker, that he got his just rewards for that one from the gang opposite.

The Liberal Party's position on this bill is that when we go back into committee, we are going to review the comments that have been made both in the House and outside of this Chamber in the public, and we will be recommending appropriate amendments. I am not the critic for financial institutions. I am the critic for consumer and corporate affairs.

What I have indicated is from our party's perspective, consumer and corporate affairs, that I believe that this legislation goes a significant distance in reforming our financial institutions so that we have a better regulated financial marketplace out there and also that we are instilling some elements of consumer protection and competition as well.

I can fully understand the member opposite wanting to find out what our amendments will be. Suffice it to say that the amendments will be based on fact and the amendments will be based on a true desire to have better legislation passed through this place.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have a very short statement. The hon. member made reference to AMEX which was a deal that was made by the present government with American Express in the waning hours before the last election.

Like him, I want to go on record that I believe that this was a deal cooked up with the United States so that the American banks could get into Canada, this particular bank could and also start selling insurance. I think that this has put the cat among the pigeons as it were.

I do have a very direct question. The hon. member was speaking very directly to the many bankruptcies here in Canada. One gigantic bankruptcy which I believe cost the government, and therefore the people of Canada, billions of dollars was the bankruptcy of Northland Bank.

The hon. member has not dealt with that one specifically. I wonder if he might enlighten us as to not only his thoughts but the thoughts of our party about the federal government bailing out these huge, if I can call them, conglomerates at the expense of Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his very thoughtful question. In dealing with the area of bankruptcy we have to remember that the it is a very complex situation. Currently the Liberal Party is working diligently to try to ensure that the current pre-study under way on another piece of legislation dealing with those types of reforms will address and try to strike a new balance between all interested parties.

The difficulty we have at this time is that governments fail to take steps when steps should be taken. They fail to modernize legislation. They fail to stand up to some of the big lobbyists and big pressure groups and change legislation to ensure that there is fairness, to ensure that the loopholes are straightened out, to ensure that regulations are put in place to effectively standardize an industry like the financial industry. The government has some responsibility. No matter how much we may dislike it, if the government caused the problem by its negligence and inability to act, it has some responsibility to clean up the mess. That is what happened in that particular case.

I keep saying unfortunately because it may be all right to say that the government failed to act and had been warned about many problems and loopholes that could have been and should have been closed. It is unfortunate that when it has to fess up and clean up the milk it has spilled it has always been paid for by the taxpayers of Canada.

In answer to his question if governments do the right thing taxpayers will not have to do the wrong thing, that is pay for government's mistakes.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, this is a very complex series of bills and I am not going to attempt to define any particular part of the bill. I do want to make a few remarks because banks are not giving Canadians the kind of service which they should be able to expect.

Most Canadians hope that the next time the Bank Act is brought up and reviewed some of the power of the banks will be curtailed. They hope that the small entrepreneur, homeowner, farmer, small businessman, or simply someone who owns a home can be sure they will not be put in as great a disadvantage in dealing with the bank as in the past.

There is no doubt in the eyes of the public in Canada that the banks are seen to be almost in a position where they are unassailable. Consequently the person dealing with them feels very weak and unable to deal with these large corporations.

Does this series of bills allow the small entrepreneur, the small businessman or the farmer to feel more confidence in dealing with financial institutions? The answer is patently no. It does not.

Possibly, as suggested in these bills, there is a need to rearrange or restructure the whole financial system. Maybe it all needs to be reviewed. However, the aim of the review should be the empowerment of the people who use these institutions not to increase the powers of the financial institutions.

We all want and need financial institutions which are secure. These bills do not in my mind, or in the minds of people who have looked at them thoroughly, ensure that there will be no further financial disasters affecting the small depositor or the small entrepreneur.

• (1700)

These bills are part of a corporate agenda, or I could say possibly a Conservative agenda, which puts the economy more into the hands of the financial institutions than it is right now. For instance, if someone wanted to start farming—although that might be a bad example because at the moment only a fool would get himself involved in farming—or start a small business, they would borrow the money. The idea is that they should be able to pay back the money and make some profit on it.

The only institution that is guaranteed a profit from the person's efforts is not them—because they are working hard at it or are a good manager—but the bank or the financial institution which has the security of return. It gets everything if they miss a payment.

As I said, farming is not a good example—and during the present recession even a small business is not a good example—but the same situation can be outlined in almost any entrepreneurial venture. Only the money lender gets anything out of it.

The financial institutions which are supposed to be the pillars of our economy are not helping our economy. In most cases they are leeching off the entrepreneurial efforts and work of the people who are trying to make a living.

This government's solution in these bills has been to undermine the traditional pillars, to reduce the number of players and put in place a few megafinancial supermarkets which will then have more and more power in more and more areas of the financial world.

From experience, this would seem similar to what happened in the grocery business. We used to have lots of grocery stores around, small enterprises which worked well and provided a living for the people who operated them. We now have supermarkets which have eliminated all these small and efficient operations. These have been eliminated.

The same thing is happening in farming. The larger and sometimes less efficient operator is gradually eliminating the smaller operator, which is a living for many people. The government is also doing in this case what it has already done to the airline industry. It has deregulated it so that size becomes the main instrument of success, not service, not how well the company serves people, not what it has done to help the economy. The size of the institution is the basis of its success.

Deregulation means legal requirements and constraints are deleted or substantially loosened on a particular venture. This allows and works toward greater reliance on corporate self-regulation and good will.

Actually, what it does foster is some kind of a corporate tyranny. As the corporation gets bigger, has its fingers in more pies, and covers more of the structure of the financial world, it is able to affect our economy and each of us much more than it has in the past. Turning to a large organization which has a dominance in its particular field, there is a recognition that in many cases the larger the corporation the less efficient it becomes. Because these corporations are large and have a considerable amount of power, the cost of these inefficiencies is then charged to the consumer. They get away with it because there are no corporations in place to compete.

Financial institutions do not have an unblemished record of purity. In fact, from the experience of failure over the past few years of trust companies and banks, we know that conflict of interests and self-dealing have been the common reason for the failure of some of those institutions. It seems very logical that the projected structure will further exacerbate this situation so the possibility of misuse of the financial instruments becomes more likely and less detectable with fewer regulations, larger institutions, blurred areas of responsibility, and unclear ownership requirements. This opens up the possibility of self-interest being covered up when it is much more difficult to examine the operations of the institutions. They are not required by law to present before the public their methods of operation.

I question the global competition which the banks, trust companies and insurance companies say is so important for them to survive. Is it so important to our economy? Is it important to the individual on the street? Is it important to us when we insure our car or house? Is it important to the majority of Canadians?

After all, good government is possible only with the consent of the majority. The majority of people should be served by changes to these institutions. We suggest that this is not entirely what is happening.

These bills are going to committee. I hope the committees will look at them and change them so that they will protect the consumer, the client, and the small entrepreneur from the financial institutions, instead of the other way around. I hope that the committees will look at these bills and ensure that what happens in these bills—the changes made to the institutions, the allowing of the relationship between these institutions—protects the consumer, protects the small entrepreneur, and protects the individuals who use them most and does not allow these institutions to take unfair advantage.

My father used to go to the city and say: "I wonder why it is that all the big buildings in this city are owned by the banks or the insurance companies. It must be because they take more out of our pockets than anybody else does". I think he still thinks that is true. The government has a responsibility to protect the general consumer from that kind of situation.

The effect of the changes in the Bank Act the last few times has been to provide less protection than before. As a farmer I know, for instance, that there was a time when if I bought a combine the only collateral required for that combine was the combine itself. Five years later the Bank Act was changed so that the collateral could be the combine and anything I produced on my farm.

Under the present Bank Act if I fail to pay, the bank or the financial corporation can take my combine, anything I produce and my land. That is the kind of change that has happened in the last few bank acts. It gives less and less protection to the people who need it the most. It gives protection to the people who have the power: the corporations.

The size of the institution is not as important as security. It is not as important as supervision. It is not as important as the government deciding to do what is best. We should not be changing these acts to protect the financial corporations or make it possible for them to make more profits. We should be changing these acts to ensure that the economy and the individuals who drive the economy are protected from large corporations which do not have, in our experience, a great many scruples when it comes to dealing with people.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member with interest. He spoke a great deal about the safety for depositors. Certainly that is one of the main concerns of our party about this financial institution legislation. We do not want to happen in this country what has happened in the United States.

I would like to clarify one thing the hon. member said in his speech. He talked about safety. Is he suggesting that this legislation before us today does not give depositors more protection than they presently have?

Mr. Hovdebo: As I said at the beginning of my remarks, these are complex bills and I have no intention of defining what is in these bills. I am trying to suggest that in the past changes in the legislation made by this House have been brokered by the banks or the financial institutions. Their powers have been increased at the expense of the consumer, not only concerning lending, borrowing and the structure that is in place but also the ability of the institution to use those funds in ways which might endanger the deposit of the individual.

An hon. member: Standard Trust is an example.

Mr. Hovdebo: There are many examples in the last while of this happening. I am not sure if the guarantees in these bills are any better. It is our responsibility as legislators to be sure that they are and ensure the positions taken are not those dictated by the financial institutions but those that are best for the people we represent. They are not those financial institutions.

Maybe that side of the House represents financial institutions but not this side of the House.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order and I believe there is consent. Earlier today in Question Period I was asking a question of the Prime Minister and I said that I would table documents which would corroborate my statement.

The Prime Minister perhaps misinterpreted what I was saying or did not hear correctly because I was talking about the rate of child poverty and Canada's place in relation to the top industrialized nations of the world. I said that Canada stands next to the bottom on the list.

I am tabling in the House today a report from the Canadian Council on Social Development which corroborates my statement, statements from our own Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology report tabled here in the House in January of this year called "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future". There is also an article in the National Institute of Nutrition report.

I am happy and pleased to table these documents to corroborate my statement. If the Prime Minister did misinterpret my question I hope that he will apologize.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have consent to table these documents?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask my colleague a question because he made a very fine speech. I wanted to ask him about the whole matter of financial institutions marketing insurance through their branches. I wonder if from his Saskatchewan experience he can comment on whether the credit unions in Saskatchewan marketing auto insurance, life insurance and other casualty insurance through their branches.

Mr. Hovdebo: There is a certain amount of relationship between credit unions and co-op insurance corporations, but the actual sale of insurance by the credit union is not legal and therefore does not go on.

However, it is my belief that there is no harm in financial institutions such as banks and trust companies selling insurance as long as they are selling insurance as a service and not as a profitable endeavour, that is as long as they are not part of the ownership of the insurance company that is doing it.

I say this because insurance is required by law on automobiles and in a number of situations. It is very easy for a corporation which lends you money to buy a house to insist that it also sells you insurance on that house and by that process take advantage of the fact that it is providing you with the funds to buy the house.

I think as long as that can be protected I have no real concerns about the relationship of the sale of insurance. I do have some concerns about the ownership of the corporation by the bank or the lending institution.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I wish to advise the members that the period of five hours for 20—minutes speeches is now over. We will now hear 10—minutes speeches, without questions and comments. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls has the floor.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put a couple of comments on the record during the closing moments of second reading of these bills that are before the House.

I was thinking that perhaps the most important consideration that the House of Commons should make in dealing with the Bank Act and dealing with financial institutions is the consideration of the effect of the Bank Act on Canadians, and I mean ordinary Canadians.

I was dealing with a problem just the other day where people who were laid off from a mining operation in the community of Buchans in Newfoundland found themselves in the situation where the separation pay that they had received, their pension funds, all of a sudden were being deducted from their federal government cheques, their MYLAP cheques.

What had happened was this: The federal government had passed a law that said those funds could no longer be rolled in RRSPs. Those people out there who had been laid off from the company, they didn't know anything about that. They did not know. Then of course the banks and the insurance companies said that ignorance of the law is no excuse, and neither is it. They were informed after several months that what they had to do was put those funds into a trust fund.

The insurance companies and the banks did not inform them of what had transpired in the House of Commons that affected the moneys being sent out by the insurance companies to the banks. In other words, nobody thought to have a look at those people whom they were supposed to be serving as banks, as financial institutions, to point out to them that a simple change could have saved them an awful lot of money.

Well now, of course, it is too late. Those funds are gone. I know it is a bit complicated. It is difficult to simplify it even in speaking to the people concerned, but believe me there should have been a mechanism which said that the insurance companies and the banks involved had to inform those people that the law had changed and of the way to arrange things financially so that they would not be penalized.

Members stood up in this House not too long ago from the province of British Columbia. They were complaining about the fact that the banks were sending out letters to fishermen in that province about the moneys that were owed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act which came to an end in this Chamber a couple of years ago. In other words, when they get a loan now it is under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

The same letters that were received by those fishermen in the province of British Columbia were received by the fishermen in the province of Quebec on the north shore. The same letters were received in the province of New Brunswick, in the province of Nova Scotia, in the province of Prince Edward Island, and in the province of Newfoundland.

What it was was this: the banks had sent a letter to each person who had defaulted on loans eight and ten years ago that were guaranteed by the federal government and for which all collection proceedings had gone ahead. They had lost perhaps their boats, their nets, or whatever was put up as collateral. The banks were writing a letter on behalf of the federal Department of Finance to collect money on behalf of the federal government.

What a cosy relationship that was. Was there a finder's fee? They were acting as a collection agency. Were they getting paid? No, they were not. They were not getting paid. They were not being given a finder's fee. They paid for the stamp that went to every single person who had defaulted eight and ten years ago on loans telling them that the federal government wanted them to pay up on the money that it had paid to the banks because the federal government had guaranteed the loan in the first place. What a cosy relationship, a relationship that should not be there, that these acts of Parliament should prohibit.

I suppose we are getting into a new age, an age where transactions are not done with cash, not done with cheques, not done with money any more, but done with banking cards. I noticed the other day that the federal government has embarked on an experimental program with the banks in Canada to issue people who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits with a card, a banking card, with a 97K memory, whatever that means. The individual would be able to go to a bank and, instead of going into an unemployment insurance office and filling out forms or mailing forms in, they would be able to utilize a machine in the bank that would give them credit on this card.

Two cities are now being selected to try out this new system of disbursing money to individuals through the unemployment insurance scheme. Of course it requires the co-operation of banks because the banks would operate the machine and a credit would be registered when the individual used that card. They are calling it the smart card. That to my way of thinking was devised by some computer whiz somewhere in a federal government agency for people to use cards where there are no banking machines.

How many banking machines are there in our high unemployment areas of Canada? The Privacy Commissioner has looked at this experiment, given it his okay, and said that as long as the rest of the memory on the card is not being used for other purposes or is not an invasion of privacy into a person's bank account, then it is okay to use it.

I have spent many years in this Chamber. I have spent many of those years dealing with problems associated with people getting money and then having to pay it back after the fact, back to this federal government.

I can tell you now, Mr. Speaker, that the number of problems associated with people filling out that unemployment insurance form is going to multiply, because now somebody will be expected to go with a card into a bank and on that card will be their credit. They can then take that card and use it as a credit card anywhere in our society, based on what? Based on the information that was fed into a computer.

The minister who approved that of course is the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I have one final bit of advice for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Instead of issuing smart cards to unemployed people, we should be issuing a get smart card to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should defer to the hon. member from the city of Toronto on the basis that I could probably learn quite a bit from him and therefore raise the level of erudition of the speech I am about to make.

Anyway, what we have here is the continuation of the whole corporate agenda which we saw exposed in its whole rotten being most vividly on election day, as someone has already indicated, November 21, 1988. Can you think of a more important day or a more significant day for the American non-banks to be able to come into Canada and operate as banks?

What we have here is a corporate agenda in spades, starting on November 21, 1988, election day. Shame on the government for having done it at least in the western part of Canada which is sometimes a problem with us. It established a mandate to do so simply on the basis of an Order in Council from the government of the previous election and continued on as arrogantly from that time into this time. Experience has shown us since that time that what came forth so vividly on election day was the beginning of a series of tragedies for Canada.

We have the experience of the free trade deal, which is the over-all deregulation, the umbrella deregulation scheme for the corporate agenda, having been hived off in the intervening time in Parliament through deregulation of airlines and trucking and, of course, changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, where the government is no longer involved. Of course we need to have a level playing field and that would be so unfair to our poor American cousins south of the border. It would constitute an unfair trading practice vis-à-vis our commercial trading and financial dealings with them.

Let us look at one example of deregulation that has still not been completed. Maybe we should refer to a couple of them, airlines and trucking. Airline deregulation is not complete yet. It would certainly surprise me, hearing the rumblings coming from across the House, if the American airlines are not granted cabotage, which means they could bring passengers into Canada from the United States. There are so few American airlines of course, compared to Canadian ones. I should not even say that. It has come to the point where you cannot make any kind of a joke in this House for fear it is taken the wrong way.

Of course there are many more airlines in the United States and of course they are going to be bringing passengers in here and once cabotage is allowed, they are going to be demanding it. Any sort of limitation on our part is going to be strongly resisted, no longer by the government of the United States. The American airlines will be pleased enough to carry that on for Carla Hills and Company on their own.

Unfortunately when we hear rumours with regard to what has happened in Canada with deregulation, they usually come true. The rumours are that in all probability, one and perhaps even both of Canada's airlines may simply disappear from commerce in Canada.

The rumblings of Air Canada making some kind of an arrangement with one of the American airlines, U.S. Air, I think, is certainly disconcerting.

Without belabouring the point and referring to the trucking industry, we all are very well aware of the demonstrations late last spring and early summer of the Canadian truckers. They came to Ottawa to try to make representations to Parliament and to the opposition. They got a good reception from us but received a very negative reception from the government. Of course they had to repeat their actions within the last week or two in order to try to get the government's attention insofar as their plight is concerned.

I heard a reference in the House but I am not sure if it was in Question Period or not, just in the last couple of days, that 60 per cent of cross-border trucking was still carried on by Canadian truckers. Those are certainly old figures because it has almost turned entirely around —60 per cent of the cross-border trucking used to be done by Canadian trucks, now it is the other way around. The number of Canadian trucks involved in cross-border trucking is diminishing very, very rapidly. The last figure I heard was 60–40 in favour of the Americans.

The point is this. We have this experience as far as deregulation is concerned in other industries and there is no reason why we should have any confidence in this government or in anything they do as far as helping Canadian business, industry or financial services are concerned. Speaking of those institutions themselves, I realize they were talking here about banking and financial institutions. The Canadian financial institutions are ostensibly heavily regulated even now and look at the changes to the Bank Act as being something which deregulates them and provides for less regulation. The experience of the Canadian financial institution is bad enough. It does not matter whether you think of the banks and their extremely high and atrocious rates of interest they charge on their credit cards. The rates they charge on bank credit cards are usurious. For what it is worth, I guess we ought to give the finance ministers a bit of credit for having brought the interest rate down as much as they have. But we also ought to really get on the case of the finance ministers as we were, and on this finance minister, for not doing everything he can to bring the interest rates which those financial institutions charge the Canadian consumer down.

We have the atrocious example out west, and I know there are examples in the east, of Principal Trust that is provincially and federally regulated. Those people who put their trust in Principal Trust have suffered enormous financial loss.

We are going to deregulate. This will not only eventually affect Canadian institutions, but if American Express is any example, American institutions which find their way into Canada as well. I am sure there are other financial institutions in the states which would take great exception, umbrage even, at not being able to come into Canada as American Express has done.

We could go on and on. There is a tremendous amount of danger in the banks getting into the insurance business. We do not have any problems with banks selling insurance for other companies if they, in their branches, want to sell for the Co-operator's, the Sask Mutual Insurance, or whatever and why not Saskatchewan government insurance as well. That is fine. But for banks to own the insurance company is something which would be absolutely intolerable.

Those kinds of examples can go on and on. We have the example of Eaton's and The Bay having joint financial services, which seems to be a bit of a conflict of interest in itself. We would certainly be at a great disadvantage as Canadians if, in addition to that, they were also able to form a trust company and then form a bank. It seems to me that what we would eventually have is a coming together of almost all the financial institutions in the country, whatever their shape or form, into one. That is the main danger and something we have to guard against.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor. Debate, a 10-minute speech only, without questions or comments.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Saskatoon has talked about the problems which our legislation at this stage presents with respect to regulating foreign banks. I want to talk very briefly about the case of one of the most serious gaps which has been demonstrated by the case of the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada.

The Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada, or BCCI Canada as I am going to refer to it, is of course the Canadian branch of the large international bank which became noted, to quote a CIA memorandum from 1986, as the "Bank of Crooks and Criminals". It was a bank which operated throughout the world in a way which is now quite clear in retrospect, was fraudulent virtually from the bottom up.

It was a bank which has now been charged in the United States in a number of different jurisdictions with fraudulently controlling American banks in states where it had been refused a bank licence itself. It has been identified as the bank of choice for money laundering by those engaged in drug dealing and other criminal activities throughout the world.

BCCI, in short, is an example of the worst excesses of the capitalist system world-wide. BCCI operated here in Canada through a series of eight bank branches across this country. It did so despite the fact that the Canadian Bankers' Association wrote formally to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and spoke informally on a number of occasions before that to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, suggesting that this was a bank which because of its associations and its reputations throughout the world, did not have any right to be able to operate as a bank here in this country.

You might think, Mr. Speaker, that this was an unusual event for the CBA to take such a position. We asked the Canadian Bankers' Association in fact on Monday night if it had ever taken such a position before with respect to a member institution of its association. The answer: "No, we have never taken such a position."

They took that position in 1984 having communicated the position verbally before 1984 and despite that, the regulators in this country did nothing to stop that bank's operations in Canada. We also heard testimony on Monday night which indicated that RCMP investigations had taken place with reference to this bank in 1988 and 1989.

These RCMP investigations had led the officers involved to communicate with the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, OSFI, and had led those officers to tell OSFI of certain activities which they had discovered with respect to BCCI. Nothing happened. Nothing happened to stop this bank from continuing to receive deposits.

This bank was finally closed down on July 5 of this year, not because of something that emerged in Canada but because of international action co-ordinated by the Bank of England. The $107 million in deposits was immediately frozen for those depositors in this country who had relied on the regulation which was being undertaken of this bank.

Of that $107 million in deposits, only $20 million was covered by deposit insurance. That money has gone back to depositors, the $20 million.

That leaves something in the order of $87 million which depositors in good faith put into this bank and have very little chance of obtaining.

You might ask what this has to do with the bills in front of us. When the Canadian Bankers' Association testified before us on Monday night at the Standing Committee on Finance, it made a direct connection to Bill C-19, the revisions to the Bank Act. It indicates that there is no reference, and I am quoting here directly from the Canadian Bankers' Association, in the current act to the required regulatory standards of a foreign bank applicant.

The association goes on to say that under Bill C-19, applicants will not even have to be regulated financial institutions in their home jurisdiction. Government policy will be that any institutions which are, "primarily engaged in the business of providing financial services" will qualify it to apply for a Schedule II bank licence. Also from the CBA, "There is no reference to indicate to bank regulation or indeed a requirement that the applicant be a regulated financial institution of any kind."

They go on, Mr. Speaker, and this is perhaps the most damaging comment from the CBA with respect to this bill, to say: "Last March, well before the demise of BCCI, we advised the finance committee that in our view the entry rules for Schedule II banks proposed in Bill C-19 do not represent sound public policy."

The president of the CBA went on to say: "In my view these recommendations for change take on new urgency in light of the BCCI failure."

What we have here, Mr. Speaker, is something extraordinary. We have an international conspiracy involved in BCCI which even the Canadian Bankers' Association, of which BCCI was a member, concludes leads to without doubt the recognition that the regulatory authority that we have established for foreign banks in this country is not sound public policy. Even the bankers say it is not sound public policy. How the government of this country can expect people in Canada to accept a piece of legislation like this, given the very sad experience of the depositors in the BCCI in Canada, and given the very harsh judgment of the Canadian bankers themselves with respect to this regulation of foreign banks, frankly, is beyond me.

BCCI is an international scandal. Ultimately the case of BCCI in Canada will be seen as a regulatory scandal. I think that this bill coming before us like this, not closing the loopholes on banks like BCCI in the future, is as much of a scandal to this House.

I therefore hope very much that responsible members of this House will recognize the gaps in this legislation, recognize that foreign banks are being given far too much of a free hand, recognize the dangers which the BCCI case so clearly demonstrates. Therefore, we will reject this legislation that is in front of us. I hope very much that not just those of us in the New Democratic Party, but those throughout the entire House will see that we do not need more examples of BCCI and the loss of depositors' money in the future. We will reject these pieces of legislation.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to stand in the House today to address these various pieces of legislation that deal with banks, co-operatives, credit associations, trust and insurance companies.

After having done considerable research and talked to people who are quite knowledgeable about this type of initiative, it seems to me that this package of legislation is a reasonable effort. It is a small step into the future, to make us more competitive, to bring about some greater degree of rationality to banks, trust companies, insurance companies and others. Hopefully it will permit additional flexibility in terms of the services offered to Canadians by banks, trust companies and insurance companies.

The major intent of this legislation is to ascertain that there is a similar range of services available to customers from those various institutions so that it is more competitive and hopefully the consumer will profit from that.

Insurance companies will now be able to own banks and trust companies and banks own insurance and trust companies. Banks will now be able to get into financial leasing and information processing companies. Hopefully that will bring about greater competition that will profit all Canadians.

I note, as well, that insurance companies will be able to lend money. Knowing the price that we have to pay today with high interest rates, it will permit those rates to drop and all Canadian consumers will profit.

When one looks at this legislation which covers hundreds of pages, actually hundreds of sections, one wonders what it is that one must do as a member of Parliament to attempt to ensure that Canadians are protected.

One of the questions that I want to raise is the following. What will government do with banks, trust and insurance companies to inform the Canadian public regarding what is happening? To ensure that when this bill becomes law that they understand the advantages, the disadvantages and the difficulties?

You no doubt know that it is extremely complicated. Even after speaking to many people and reading and considering this information, I admit that there are technicalities which are very hard to understand.

So I earnestly hope that the government will make a serious effort with these institutions to inform the general public.

[English]

My party supports this legislation in principle. However, we have a number of concerns, which will be raised in committee. I have heard a number of issues raised today by both opposition parties. The place to correct those is in committee. I would hope, as well, that the committee will be such that it will permit us to raise those issues and permit members to come to grips with them and bring about solutions so that in the end, when we have finished the process, we do have as fine a package as we can have.

A number of colleagues have noted that it is really high time that we come to grips with those kinds of issues, because it has been some 50 years or so since this legislation has been updated, but they have not said it in a negative kind of way.

It makes it increasingly difficult for us to compete in Canada. It makes it that much more difficult as well to compete on the international level. It is high time that we came to grips with this, because it will improve our competitiveness. It will I hope protect the depositors.

I cannot help but note that if this legislation had been in place there are a number of Canadians who would not have suffered the financial losses they have. I am referring, of course, to the failure of certain banks and trust companies. They would be better off today.

[Translation]

Because they would have been better protected, I hope. And frankly, if we could have proceeded sooner, hundreds, maybe thousands, of Canadians would have benefited from it.

[English]

Also there would have been fewer games played, and I do not use that in a pejorative sense. There was at least one insurance company which wanted to buy a trust company but because of the current legislation on the books, it had to buy it through a holding company. It was trying to get around the rules, and I understand its desire to do that. But now it can be up front; now insurance companies can in fact go forward and do so.

Hopefully when this package is finally restructured, refined, polished in committee, we can have a strengthening of the soundness of these institutions upon which Canadians depend.

I note one change which I am pleased with; one-third of the board of directors must not be affiliated with the company. I think that is a positive move.

I notice as well procedures for conflicts of interest. For example, an audit committee will be established which will deal with the auditor's report and any particular difficulties that emanate from that report. There will be a conduct review committee which will prevent self-dealing, where a director may have influence which could benefit him or her. It will prevent that kind of unacceptable practice.

Most important, however, is the consumer's complaint section. This section, I might add, is as a result of the Liberal amendment, and I am very pleased with that, will permit consumers to raise questions concerning service charges on accounts. A farmer, if he or she faces foreclosure, can go to the consumer complaints office and in fact to the superintendent if necessary.

There will also be an annual report where there will be a section on complaints, where those complaints will be described briefly and where it will be noted the kinds of successes that have been had in resolving those kinds of complaints.

[Translation]

I think that is progress. Mind you, some problems remain. It is not perfect, but I think it is progress, especially if it can be further improved in committee.

[English]

The whole question of ownership, the percentage of a company that one can own according to the current legislation and what will happen with the new legislation is something that we have to look at very very carefully. Are the percentages correct? Are they too limited? Are they too generous? What are the implications of those changes? What about the current percentages? If my memory serves me correctly, you have to own at least 51 per cent or no more than 10 per cent of another institution. Will that prevent joint ventures, which is a very common way of acquiring another institution?

As well, you will note that the banks cannot go further into the insurance market. While there are some positives there, we have to ask ourselves is that best for Canadians? Is this good for Canadians? Is it better for Canadians?

We have to realize that banks are powerful institutions and if they were to proceed in that area, I understand that they could in fact destabilize the insurance industry. There could be tied selling, that is you do not get a mortgage unless, or you get a mortgage if, and that could be a dangerous practice. They could, in fact, implement very low prices for certain services and they could then have a monopoly and then control that. That would be bad for Canadians. So there are pluses and minuses on both sides of those particular issues.

When we talk about the life annuity market, we have to be very careful because while it is a life insurance company only now, as Canadians grow older, as they convert various plans into life annuities, as they must under certain circumstances, would it be wise to have banks involved so that we as aging Canadians can get better deals?

The whole notion of being involved or not involved in leasing is another question that needs to be looked at very, very carefully.

I want to address the question of foreign banks in Canada. The bank must be a bank in its home country before it can qualify according to the current legislation, the legislation before us. Why was American Express admitted?

AMEX is not a bank. Why was it let in? Some people suggest that because it supported the government significantly with respect to the Canada–U.S. trade agreement that it might have got preferential treatment. Whether it did or not is not the major issue. The issue is: What will happen to other companies that are of a very similar nature? Will they be asking to get in? If so, will they be denied? Do we want non–banks?

There are large financial institutions in the United States and in other places that could in fact be trying to get into the Canadian financial market. The fundamental question is do we want that?

Another issue is: Should the Minister of Finance be able to decide who qualifies as a foreign bank in order to get into Canada's financial market? I cannot help but note that because of the GATT negotiations, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with other countries, that they may see a precedent that they may want to take advantage of and that may open up a whole new avenue to other financial institutions wanting to get into Canada.

Perhaps a final point before I sum up very quickly. There is still a duplication of federal and provincial rules, regulations, legislation and what have you between the trust companies and banks. I think this needs to be looked at because this kind of duplication obviously does not lead to greater efficiency.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I will close by saying again that in principle we support the bill before us today. Nevertheless, we wish to improve it when it is considered in committee. I think it is a step forward.

[English]

I would hope that out of this, we would get the following: First, more protection for the consumer; better deals for the consumer in terms of those services that are required and I would hope, as well, that we can in fact become more competitive in the positive sense. That is, we as Canadians can get better protection, more services and still be competitive at the international level.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to join in with some of my colleagues, especially those on this side of the House in this party who have spoken so eloquently on some of the pitfalls in the legislation even though as a party in principle we are supporting it at second reading so that we can get it before a committee.

You have seen some of the pitfalls of this legislation. It is legislation that is designed, as my colleague from Dartmouth indicated earlier, specifically to set new financial infrastructure for a new economic order in this country.

In establishing that new financial infrastructure, we have got to maintain first and foremost very well in perspective the people for whom it is designed. It is designed not only for depositors as members of the NDP have said, but also for the borrowers, the consumers, the small businessman, the individual who is under attack today as a result of government policies and mismanagement of the highest order never before seen in this country.

I guess what I am saying is what we should be addressing is not only the over–all financial infrastructure but the scope of its dimensions. Where should it be going? What should it be addressing? If nothing else, it should be addressing the crux of many problems.

Many small businesses throughout Canada, in particular in my home province of Ontario and more specifically in the city of Toronto, are prone to say that banks and other lenders in times that are good, in times of prosperity, are the first ones to offer moneys and to say: "Let's be partners. Invest. Expand."

The moment that things fall apart, banks are the first ones to pull back and to leave the small businessman, the investor, the entrepreneur who is short on cash flow with a bank that demands its note, and demands it yesterday.

What has happened is that we have seen throughout all of Canada an increase in bankruptcies of an obscene order. They are of obscene order. We have never seen such bankruptcies at that rate ever in Canada.

I noticed today that the Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister for Privatization all stood before us in this House and said:

"Oh yes, but there is a steadying trend, in fact, we do not have as many bankruptcies this last month as we have had in the past several months".

There are not that many more businesses available to go bankrupt. What is happening as well is that all of us as Canadian taxpayers are being turned into financiers in short order. What happens is that the moment there is a bankruptcy declared, Revenue Canada needs to get its share. There are some moneys that have not been paid that are owing to Revenue Canada, to the Minister of Revenue, and what happens is that the taxpayer ends up on the short end of a deal as well. We end up paying twice: first, for having lost our businesses and jobs available through it, and second, because our taxes have not been paid.

We have to take a look at what these acts are going to do by way of establishing incentives for our entrepreneurs. Small businessmen, entrepreneurs of all sizes need access to capital. They need to establish working capital as they anticipate growing cash flow.

I do not know whether this series of legislation is going to address that, but one of the things the government must address is the fact that these acts cannot operate in a vacuum. They have to establish appropriate economic policies that allow the Canadian entrepreneur to have access to capital on an equal basis, no matter in what province he or she chooses to operate.

For example, I have a company, the Hercules Food Equipment, Limited, in Toronto, Ontario, in my own city which bemoans the fact that just over the course of the year, it has lost over 50 per cent of all fabricators of food equipment in the stainless steel industry. Over 50 per cent, Mr. Speaker. It points out the fact that unfortunately, thanks to government policies, not only in encouraging the transmigration of some of these industries over into the southern part of our borders in the northeastern United States, but that government policies seem to misdirected and pitting one province against another, and unfairly pitting one Canadian against another. They faxed me a list of 28 public projects that the stainless steel producing industry for food processing has been unable to secure in the southern Ontario area, but have gone to another area, to companies that locate in Quebec.

There is nothing wrong with that because Canadians are Canadians no matter where they go, but the fact of the matter is that what we have is an economic policy that encourages movement southward. Why do I say it encourages movement southward. When we signed that free trade agreement, we did not get the security we needed to ensure that the playing field would be level. We have New York state, Ohio and other Great Lakes states that are providing our manufacturers with kinds of tax incentives on capital equipment, on property, on subsidies to employees, and as well on the general operations that we cannot afford here in Canada.

Our federal government has not addressed that at all. In fact, not only has it not addressed that, but we see Canadian companies going south in droves. Just last year, 83 Canadian companies set up shop in the Buffalo area alone. Buffalo used to be a joke in southern Ontario. It is now a nemesis for all of us.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood said there is a waiting list of Canadian companies that number in the thousands to locate in Buffalo. Last year my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood will know that Canadian companies invested $263 million in Buffalo alone, $263 million at a time when all of our Canadian manufacturers, Canadian employees or prospective employees are looking for that kind of cash flow.

To what is that due? Nothing else other than a Canadian federal government that is unwilling to seize the responsibility that lies on its shoulders. It is a responsibility that says that what we have to do is have an overall global strategy that involves reforming all of our financial institutions, an industrial strategy that ensures that government incentives are at least equal to those that are provided south of our border, or at least are equitable from province to province so that we do not have competing interests from Quebec or from Ontario, but rather that we be co-operative and complementary.

An hon. member: It is called a retreat from government.

Mr. Volpe: Of course it is a retreat from government.

It is shocking in fact that over the course of this last year this retreat from government—

Mr. Mills: They no longer want to govern.

Mr. Volpe: My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood says this government no longer wants to govern. The reason we can say that and say it with such assurance, although it is unfortunately a rather bitter sort of assurance, is that we have over the course we of this last year just in the Toronto area alone an increase of over 63 per cent unemployment.

In Toronto, which used to be wealthy, there are 226,000 unemployed. In my own riding of 600 manufacturers that were in operation in 1988, there are barely 100 operating today, barely 100, and they are not even operating a full 40-hour week.

Statistics Canada and other independent sources point to the nature of the destruction of our economy perpetrated by government policy. They point in fact to the kinds of layoffs in the province of Ontario, a rich manufacturing base once that provided needed tax revenues to fund all kinds of social programs throughout this country.

Well, what has happened? Over the course of last year alone, just last year, the number of permanent jobs lost as a result of the transfer of manufacturing south and elsewhere increased at such proportions that compared to 1982, when we last had a recession, the number and percentage of permanent jobs that were lost is 66. Two out of every three jobs lost is a permanent job, one that will not come back, one that paid well, and one that can no longer be replaced.

By comparison, in 1982 when things were bad only one out of every five was a permanent type of job.

In the legislation that we are going to be considering when we go to committee, we will be looking for those kinds of guarantees and this deregulation of the financial system, the financial infrastructure of our country to ensure that those changes that the government is proposing are going to work to the advantage of the borrower. They are going to work to the advantage of the small business person, the individual who is going to be the backbone of the regrowth in this economy if, in fact, we can be optimistic.

The other thing we will be looking for is an assurance that government policies will be widespread and will not take sector by sector, but will have a global view.

I thank you for that, Mr. Speaker, and so do all of those businesses which are looking for new directions in government today and especially a direction that abandons all of this mismanagement of the past.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin this afternoon by thanking the member for Nickel Belt. He is our critic and he keeps our caucus informed on the many changes that are proposed in these four bills. The reason I want to thank him this afternoon is that this morning I was cursing him because as I walked into my office, yet again there was another thick file from our critic on these four bills. I was trying to read through it and pick up what had been done in committee and what was proposed in each particular piece of legislation, the comments, the critiques that have been put forward, and it struck me as I went through the material that I have at least access to this information. Most of us, as Canadians, do not.

In a technical sense I suppose you could say these are not secret documents. They are public documents. They are matters which are available to the public, but then again is it a reasonable assumption that the public can go through all these little differences that are being proposed in these four bills, understand, for example, all the fine nuances between a bank not being able to sell insurance but being able to set up an insurance company. What is the difference?

That, I think, is one of the hallmarks of the Canadian financial institutions. Canadians have always assumed that if it looks like a bank, smells like a bank, and when they go in there they are made line up, then it must be a bank. When you read the fine print you find out it is not a bank. It is something else.

Canadians have had a summer where there has been a healthy amount of newspaper copy written about something that was called a bank but really was not a bank. It did not have proper credentials in its own country but was set up and operating here as a bank. Even embassies were using this bank, but that bank somehow had some wrong connections. There was enough juiciness around that one that I suppose Canadians aware that maybe not all banks are the same, maybe not all lending institutions are the same. Most of us, I am sure, when we started our working lives were ever so grateful when the manager at the local bank said: "Yes, we are going to give you that loan for a new car". We were just so grateful that we were such good credit risks that a bank would lend us money that we forgot to read the fine print.

Later on in life we found out why it is that lending institutions are just overjoyed to give you a really long-term mortgage on a house. Some time in your life you probably sat down and figured out just exactly how much of this money that you pay each month to a lending institution pays off the principal of the debt and how much of it goes into juice to the lending institution. The first time you do that most Canadians are absolutely shocked that this nice, warm, friendly, trusting person who arranged all of these financial transactions for you that made you feel so good, so much a part of the Canadian economy, had just ripped you for about 20 years of your life.

After a while you kind of begin to understand: Let us all read the fine print here, let us just try to figure out who is doing whom a favour.

I must say that in dealing with lending institutions these days I find, just as a general simplification, there seems to be a little more aura of laying out the facts before you. I recall when somebody sold me my first insurance policy. As a matter of fact this one was supposed to get my kids through university. That is a noble thing. I thought that was a great idea: "Why do we not invest in our children's future? This is wonderful. Are these companies not great to be putting out this kind of a policy that will help me when my child is 18 years of age? I do not have to worry about a college education. The money is in the bank".

It is a good thing I did not quite follow all of that line because I subsequently found out that if I had taken that money to a piggy bank I would have been just about as well off as buying that life insurance policy. Nobody bothered to explain that to me at the time, and the person who sold me the policy was not an evil person. They did not catch me in the backyard with a billy club. They came in and sat down at my kitchen table and explained: "Isn't this a wonderful thing to do?" Well of course it is. Investing in your children's future is what all of us want to do. That is part of my concern about these bills.

Most Canadians have an assumption in terms of the great Canadian tradition that the government is going to be around, that there will be an agency to regulate and it will be an outside agency. It will not be self-regulation. Most Canadians understand that a financial institution is in business to make money. That is what they are going to do as best they can, following the laws of the land to the letter and sometimes a little past the letter and sometimes a little to the left of the letter and sometimes a little right of the letter. The purpose of the exercise is clearly stated: to make money as legally as they can with the help of a whole lot of really good lawyers, a lot of accountants, a lot of smart tax people, and some friends on the government side.

That is my concern in a nutshell about what is happening here. It is not that on the surface of it, it looks like a lot of evil deeds. But when one gets into the detail of what is being proposed here, that age old assumption that Canadians have had that their financial institutions are well and thoroughly regulated by an independent party is out the window. There were those of us who got a little pious over things like the savings and loans scandals in the United States. We were concerned that here were lending institutions that started out in the United States of America a long time ago with a very simply idea of offering a little diversity for the financing of houses. They offered a little opportunity for ordinary people to get mortgage money in a way that had not been done previously. That really good idea, that gem of a thought somehow wound up in the hands of people who were so greedy that it did not bother them that they were mortgaging properties to values that were astronomical. Commercial investment opportunities that were worth $50 million wound up being mortgaged to the tune of a $200 million.

How did that happen? That happened very simply because there was not in place a regulatory agency independent of those handling the money. That is part of my concern with what is being proposed here. I think all of us rightfully made the assumption that Canadian financial institutions were somehow distinctively Canadian, regulated by an independent agency, would do us no wrong, were safe things and all that stuff about our deposits being insured to a certain extent. People do not read those last few words in that line: to a certain extent, to a maximum, in some circumstances. People had better learn to read that.

Most of us who have been in public life for a while have had someone come into our offices—and this is the irony, especially for a New Democrat—who was certainly not a political ally but told us about a friend of theirs who got them into an investment with a particular kind of company. Since this was the great free enterprise system at work and since their friend had initiated all of the proceeding—had got them into it, took all their life savings and put them into this institution—they somehow assumed that in Canada this could not go wrong.

The tragedy of course is that it has gone wrong. Many times many of us have sat in our constituency offices with someone who was not a political ally crying because the system that they purported to be very much theirs had ruined their lives. People are beginning now to understand that this is a pretty complicated business.

The federal government regulates, writes legislation in this regard. The provincial governments write legislation in similar matters. We are now going into a constitutional proposal that is going to mix that rather nicely and maybe have an economic council that has an influence and an impact on all that.

Here is the problem. When governments at all levels say "what shall we do", they do not drag in the consumers by the thousands. That is perhaps impractical. What they do is they turn to people working in the industry and they say: "What changes shall we make that would make the industry more competitive"—read that to mean makes more money—"or more efficient?" Read that to mean pays out less money.

We must understand what is going on here. This is pretty basic stuff. These are all legitimate questions to be asking, but one does not always ask those who are in the business to be one's sole advisors on what a government should be, on what things a government should do, on what kind of regulations a government should put in place, on what kind of laws a government should write. That is the flaw that I find in the legislation that is before this evening.

I know that most Canadians probably are not listening to this debate. Most of them will probably never read these bills. Most of them may not be followers of Business Week and all of the financial critiques that have been put together on these four bills. Canadians had better become aware that there is a major change under way in those things that are loosely called financial institutions and most of us would call banks. I pray that they do not become aware of those changes in my constituency office when something awful has happened to them, no matter who they might be.

That is precisely the danger in what is being proposed here this afternoon. It requires an immense amount of study, an immense amount of research, and the players are dictating the rules. That is never a good way to proceed.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words on this bill before we get on to the next one.

We are in a new age and certainly there are new requirements in the banking business in this country if we are going to be competitive. If we do not give the small business community of this nation a better banking policy, it is not going to continue to be the biggest employer in Canada and the economy of this nation is going to suffer still more.

What small businesses need today more than anything else is working capital. Without that they cannot progress. Without that they cannot keep their employees. Without that they cannot continue to build and maintain their present facilities so that they are ready to meet the new economy when the recession is over.

I had a meeting during the course of the last year with several business people from the resource based industries. The local bank was after them the moment that the 15 per cent export tax went on softwood lumber. The bank sent a man into a certain branch and he continued to phone those business people who had loans there and demanded the money. It was totally an unfair situation.

What was going on south of the border at that time? The American banks and trust companies saw that 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber as a great ploy for them to move in, and they started loaning money and offering money to their resource based industries. They improved their sawmilling capacity, their planing mills and their lumber industry in general. They had better equipment, did a better job. As a result they took the Canadian market away from Canadian business people in Canada.

They even sold lumber back into Canada, cheaper than we could sell it to the United States. Those northern industries in the U.S. took over markets in the United States as far south as Tennessee from business people in Canada. That is not fairness.

Yet a Canadian bank moved in on those very people, the sawmill industry. It had worked with them for decades and never had a problem. That is how loyal the banking system of this nation is to small business in this country.

It is time that this Parliament of Canada starts passing banking bills. I have been in this House for some time and I cannot remember a banking bill ever being passed in this House in favour of the consumer or the business people of the country. We have a sound banking system, but it is sound because the people out there are being crucified as soon as the economy begins a downturn.

When the economy is good everybody wants to lend money to the business community, to consumers; banks have all kinds of money to give out. As soon as the economy turns bad they turn on those customers.

Banks sometimes even encourage them to borrow. Banks encouraged farmers to borrow several years ago and got many of them into trouble. Today we have a farm crisis in this country and the banks do not even want to look at it.

Someone mentioned bankruptcies in this country. It is no wonder that we have bankruptcies with the challenges that small business people and others are facing out there. This Parliament of Canada owes it to those people, who are the biggest employers in this country, to bring in some banking legislation to give them some protection in difficult times such as now.

A lot has been said in this House in the last number of months about the downturn of the economy and the slow economy in places like Montreal and Toronto. People find that astounding because these two urban centres of Canada are usually very much on the upswing. There is a big reason why those two major cities in Canada are having trouble and it has never really been talked about. The economy of the regions of this country is in difficult straits. Because those two major urban centres do not have the healthy economies of the regions of the country to draw on ,they are suffering a downturn in their own economies.

As long as we have banking legislation in this country which allows banks to impose their authority, their demands on the business community of this country, all we are doing is promoting a greater and greater recession the moment there is a downturn in the economy.

I was appalled at the treatment a group of forest industries in my riding received from their local bank. The banker they dealt with had no mercy.

It is rather amusing. I phoned the head office of the bank and it was turned over to its regional officer working out of Ottawa. He came in as a trouble-shooter. That is exactly what he was. Two days before we had that meeting with the rep from that bank and with the sawmilling people in the area, the local banker disappeared from the scene. He was hauled out because he had created bad relations and bad spirit in the surrounding community for the bank.

I am simply going to leave this thought with the House, and it certainly should be discussed when this bill is in committee.

We should be coming up with some legislation in this House that is going to protect the business community of this country, the small businessman and those people who employ the largest number of people coast to coast to coast in Canada.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I guess I would like to add my voice from the far west coast in this debate on the Canadian banking system and the proposals that we have before us to change the financial institutions in Canada, to open them up and to take over each other's business.

I guess I am a little concerned about this legislation as well. I do hope that these bills form the basis of a discussion that can take place when it is referred to committee across Canada. I think the parliamentarians, especially on the government side, will find out that in drafting this legislation they have been listening to a very narrow range of opinion in this country. If they open the debate within the committee that handles this legislation, they are going to get a very different message from people across the country as to how they would like their financial institutions to act and how they would like financial institutions to serve the people of this country.

Canadian banks have traditionally been among the most powerful financial institutions on the globe. It is strange that in a country with a population of 20 million to 30 million we have banks that rank among the most powerful banks on earth in terms of the assets they control and the power they exert in business around the world.

It is hard to explain when you consider the size of our population and the actual deposit base that they have to work from. One of the reasons for that and one of the reasons for the power of the banking system in this country is that they have been able to exert a great deal of power and control over this very institution in which we stand.

They donate to the two main political parties in this country, and they influence how those political parties deal with banking legislation. They have close contacts and interlocking contacts with the corporate sector in this country. They influence the business of this country to a great extent through those interlocking contacts.

They have the power to influence banking policy and it is clear that that influence has been exerted in this legislation. It is clear to see that the bankers, the insurance companies, the trust company executives, and the financial institutions have had a great deal to say about the legislation that is before us now.

The American Express example that our friend from the Liberal Party mentioned was probably an exception that proved the rule. This is one that the Canadian Banking Association was opposed to, but it is one of the very few times when it attempted to influence the government. It has not been successful in influencing it in exactly the way it wanted.

In fact, what the member suggested is precisely what happened. When the Prime Minister was concerned that his party was going to lose the last election, that his Conservatives would end up out of government and the free trade policy on which they had hung their hat was going to be defeated by Canadians, he called upon one of his cronies in the American Express system from the United States and that person recruited a great deal of funding and a great deal of support both in Canada and in the United States.

They advertised in the major media across the country and began to turn the tide in the last election in favour of the Conservatives, and the Prime Minister's cronies in the United States got their reward: they got the Conservative government re-elected and they got their free trade policy.

American Express also got its reward. On the eve of the election it got a charter to set up a bank in Canada, even though it is not a banking corporation in the country in which it originates, the United States.

That is a way in which banking policy can be influenced in this country, by applying political influence on behalf of the government in power. There is no question that the banks do that.

The banks' influence on government has also come in other ways and in other fields. For example, I have been in banks all across this country and talked to trade unionists about their success in organizing chartered banks. Across this country the number of banks which are organized and have unionized staff can probably be counted on the fingers of both hands.

That is because banks have been able to impose their influence on provincial and federal governments to ensure that it is extremely difficult to organize the workers in chartered banks so that they cannot form unions, cannot organize and bargain collectively, and cannot set up grievance procedures in order to protect themselves and secure their jobs.

Banks are the most patriarchal employers in this country. They are the most medieval in terms of the standards they impose on their employees. In general, bank managers are male, upper middle class, elderly, with a particular point of view about the country and its economy. They tend to appoint as their staff members people who have the same characteristics and the same beliefs.

For example, we have federal employment equity legislation in this country governing companies that operate within the federal jurisdiction, among which are the chartered banks. Yet for some reason the current government refuses to put teeth in that employment equity legislation. That would require the corporations operating within their jurisdiction to actually bring about employment equity within their organizations.

The banks have been among the worst in terms of hiring women and promoting women to management positions. They have been among the worst in terms of hiring aboriginal people. In appointing aboriginal people to management positions, banks have been among the worst. In incorporating the handicapped and the disabled, banks have been among the worst. That is because they have been able to influence and persuade government because of their power over government to leave the teeth out of the employment equity legislation.

The same thing applies to pay equity legislation. Women who are employed in the chartered banks tend to be employed in jobs that are extremely low paying relative to the jobs occupied by men in the chartered bank system. Again this is an area that is within the federal jurisdiction. Yet there is absolutely no legislation to protect those women or to incorporate pay equity in the chartered banks and financial institutions that come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

All of these things have been a result of the banks' ability to exert power over the federal government. Things have been absolutely the opposite of the way they should be. Instead of being the regulated, banks are actually the regulators which are regulating the federal government. It is not the other way around.

I do not think, as my colleague suggested, that customers of chartered banks are going to be secure until they feel secure that the federal government is actually regulating the chartered banks and imposing tough regulations with teeth.

I would like to close by talking about income tax legislation. In the average year the bank tellers working on the floors of those chartered banks pay more income tax to this Parliament than the banks do themselves, despite the horrendous profits those banks are making. The burden of taxation in this country has been totally distorted and totally turned on its head.

It is to be expected that in a country like this there would be no representation without taxation. Yet the banks have more representation in this country, despite the fact they pay no tax, than the tellers who work in those banks without the protection of labour laws, without the protection of trade unions, without the protection of employment equity legislation, without the protection of pay equity legislation. Even though they pay more tax to support the government of this country, they appear to have no representation in the drafting of legislation with respect to financial institutions.

I support my colleague who is voting against this legislation. I hope that when it goes into committee that the discussion will be wide ranging and that we will not listen to that narrow range of people who appear to have had influence in drafting this legislation. I hope that we will listen to all of the Canadian people in terms of the concerns that they have about their banks and institutions, and I hope that having heard those concerns the government will be prepared to pull and redraft this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted Wednesday, September 25, 1991, the question is on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and referral to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C–19, an Act respecting banks and banking.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted Wednesdy, September 25, 1991, the next question is on the motion of the Minister of State (Finance) for second reading and referral to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C–28, an Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursant to order adopted Wednesday, September 25, 1991, the next question is on the motion of the Minister of State (Finance) for second reading and referral to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C–34, an Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consider of the motion of Mr. Blaikie that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (ending development and exportation of prescribed items and substances) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a plethora of information here and I am going to have to put it in a brief form.

When I spoke last I was saying that in Canada we go to great lengths to be positive when we are building something. We have some tremendous achievements in this country, but once we achieve them we seem to want to tear them apart. This bill that is before us, Bill C-204, is designed to phase out the generation of electricity by nuclear power in Canada.

I am unreservedly and totally opposed to this bill, because I think it is terrible. In the 1950s Canada produced an Arrow aircraft which was considered to be the best in the world. We had a change of government and by 1960 the plane had been cancelled. It would still have been a good plane today and Canada lost that technology.

It is unfair in this debate for people to talk about nuclear weapons in the same tone that they use when they talk about nuclear energy. That is not fair. It is dishonest debating.

Sometimes we have to go outside our own country in order to find people who are proud of our achievements. For example, when the Challenger space shuttle needed repairs, where did they go? They went to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, which had been known for good production and technology over the years. They were known for their Candu reactor, which has never had an accident and was equipped with many safety features, even for human error. That has never come out.

The United States came to Canada, to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Atomic Energy of Canada made the O-ring for the Challenger space shuttle and it has been successful ever since. Again we had to go outside our country to be recognized.

Other people compare Chernobyl and the Russian reactor to the Candu reactor. That is absolutely dishonest politics. There is no comparison between the two. The Russians built their systems without any safety features built into them and they got the problem they deserved. Here in Canada the reason why our Candu reactors are so expensive is that we have built safety devices into them and we have never had an accident.

We sometimes think that the only thing you get radiation from around here is the nuclear industry. I am reminded of the story—and it is not just a story; it is a fact of life—where daughter number one, for example, wanted to work in Toronto at the top of the CN tower for the summer or go to the Darlington nuclear plant. Experts will tell you that she would get a greater radiation dose at the top of the CN tower in Toronto than she would have had at the Darlington nuclear plant because of the safety features built into Darlington. Of course in nature, the higher you go in space the more radiation you get. That is why stewardesses who are pregnant are not allowed to go on long flights at certain times during their pregnancy. It is a safety measure. That is nature.

There are many countries in this world that have taken Canada's lead. They do not have the same kind of reactor we have. Here is an example. In France, 74.5 per cent of France's electrical power is generated by nuclear power. In Belgium, 60.1 per cent; the Republic of Korea, 49.1 per cent; in Sweden, 45.9 per cent. Sweden is a country that decided it might phase out the nuclear option too and it is already reconsidering that option.

If Canada is going to get its debt under control then it needs to have a buoyant economy creating wealth. It is not a given right that Canada's traditional wealth creating industries, that is our resources, will continue to perform as they have in the past. Nor is it true that our manufacturing and agricultural industries can compete internationally. The assets we have which can give us a competitive edge are the abundant energy resources of oil, natural gas, coal, hydro, nuclear and biomass, to name a few.

I want to say here that as an educator I am absolutely astounded at the uninformed opinion that is being projected by those who speak negatively about nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. Scare tactics are being used and it is totally unfair to the integrity of this debate in Canada. Christopher Columbus was warned by a similar mentality that if he travelled too far out to sea he would fall off the end of the world. If such were the case, the Ontario voters would probably be sending the NDP Government of Ontario on a long voyage tomorrow morning.

In summing up, I want to say that wise decisions will promote success; poor ones will guarantee failure. If this bill ever sees the light of day in legislation, then we have failed and the nation has failed.

In Ontario alone, which is the heartland of industry in all of Canada, 53 per cent of hydroelectric power will be produced by nuclear power when Darlington comes on stream. We are seeing an attack on our capacity to produce jobs and on industrial growth down the road in Canadian history. The greatest asset we have in this nation is cheap energy. With all the other things we have to compete with in this world tomorrow and the next day after, we are going to need a long-term solid base for industry in this country. That solid base is going to be cheap energy.

In closing, I want to say that the nuclear generation of power is safe in that it does not spew gasses out into the environment. It is one of the safest things going.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to carry on with the second reading debate of Bill C-204, a bill introduced by my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona.

I invite our viewers tonight to read his speech of June 11 of this year given with the introduction of this bill. It does give a comprehensive overview of the entire issue.

As I am limited in time I will focus only on two aspects of the nuclear phase out: the economic aspect and the environmental. We are often told that the two should be linked. It is those two aspects I have chosen to focus my comments on.

I am going to start with the economic argument because increasingly this government seems to be instituting a philosophy of economic determinism, that is economics determines its policy. I invite people to understand that the economics of the nuclear industry is bad economics.

Federal tax dollars have funded the development of nuclear technology. It has been estimated in a study published by the Economic Council of Canada that $19 billion—that is billion with a b in 1990 dollars—was given in federal subsidies, including grants for research and development, loan guarantees and bailouts for prototype reactors and heavy water plants. "It is doubtful", the Economic Council of Canada states in this study, "that these costs will never be recovered".

If we are talking about economic determinism this is bad economics. We are never going to get our money back for the investment we make.

The Canadian nuclear industry does rely on government subsidies to stay alive. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited continues to receive over $200 million each year from Canadian taxpayers. Mr. Speaker, you and I and all those other people out there are funding the nuclear industry whether we like it or not.

This is in contravention of what I think most Canadians want. The previous government in 1979, under the then Prime Minister, the current Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, promised a public inquiry into the nuclear industry. Just prior to the 1984 election there was a promise of a public inquiry into the nuclear industry. Again, in 1989 the then Minister of the Environment, who is now currently the head of the Bloc Quebecois, and the current Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources promised a public review of nuclear power. We have not yet had it.

This bill, Bill C–204, is our chance to have a public debate at long last on the nuclear industry. We also have to know what the economic costs are. In terms of capital costs nuclear plants are extremely expensive to build. The cost of the Darlington nuclear station is estimated at about $2.5 billion. Hydro's newest estimate for Darlington is about $12.8 billion. It is not just the cost in dollars that we have to talk about, it is the environmental cost. That is what I want to talk about now, and particularly the issue of high level nuclear waste.

Inside every nuclear reactor, hundreds of radioactive substances are created, substances that did not exist before nuclear technology was developed. They are among the most toxic materials known to science. No one knows how to dispose of them.

Spent nuclear fuel is so radioactive that it can never be handled by human hands. It must be handled by robotic equipment. Spent nuclear fuel will remain unapproachable for several centuries and extremely toxic for hundreds of thousands of years.

Nuclear wastes are also deadly in another way. They contain the raw material for nuclear weapons. Plutonium is the key ingredient in nuclear bombs. Through a process of reprocessing plutonium can be separated from spent fuel. The nuclear industry supports reprocessing because plutonium can also be used to fuel reactors.

Although the Canadian government has not approved commercial scale reprocessing AECL, funded by our tax dollars, has promoted it and practised it on a small scale.

Over 17,000 tonnes of used nuclear fuel bundles are now being stored at reactor sites in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. Canada is being put forward as a nuclear waste disposal site for the world. Both Japan and the United States have helped finance AECL's disposal research.

A former energy minister wrote in 1984 that disposing of nuclear wastes from other countries could offer considerable commercial benefits. I want a public debate on this issue because the Canadian taxpayers do not know what their tax dollars are being used for. If they knew there would be an outcry of monumental proportions.

AECL has spent over 10 years attempting to prove that deep disposal in a geologic repository is the answer to high level nuclear waste. AECL has spent hundreds of millions of dollars attempting to confirm a single solution, a deep geological repository for nuclear waste.

There is a more fundamental problem with Canada's nuclear waste disposal program. It has been conceived and implemented by individuals and institutions committed to the preservation of the nuclear industry. We only hear one side of the issue. AECL's mandate is to promote the use of nuclear power in Canada and abroad. Its interests would not be served by demonstrating the weakness of the concept of deep geological disposal or by admitting that not enough is known to reach a scientific verdict.

This issue has been before this House many times. A 1988 report of the federal Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry entitled The Eleventh Hour, a very aptly named report, recommended unanimously that a moratorium on the construction of nuclear power plants in Canada should be imposed until the people of Canada have agreed on an acceptable solution to the problem of the disposal of high level radioactive waste. That has not yet occurred.

This is what we have before us now. If this bill passes second reading it will then go to committee, which will have the ability to call witnesses, both experts and representatives of organizations. The nuclear industry will be there. We are not afraid to debate them. We encourage the debate. We encourage the forum so that Canadian taxpayers can know what their tax dollars are being used for.

I challenge the government and the Liberal members opposite because the New Democratic Party is the only party with a nuclear phase–out policy.

As a member of the Commons committee of the environment that participated in an 18 month study of global climate change and made a report in March of this year entitled "Out of Balance: The Risk of Irreversible Climate Change", it has been demonstrated in that report that this nuclear power is uneconomic, immoral and a waste of the taxpayers' dollars. Alternative energy is the way to go.

I encourage the viewers tonight to read the comments of my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona and I challenge the government and the Liberals to pass this bill at second reading so we can call the government to account for the way they spend taxpayers' money.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I hope we have Point Lepreau II before we are done and that is one of the reasons that I am pleased to speak about this.

I would, first of all, like to say how pleased I am to follow the previous speaker who was my colleague on the environment committee when we did the study on global warming which made reference to the use of nuclear power. I do not have the exact words at the end of that report, but they were words to the effect that nuclear power does have a place and does deserve further examination and did not draw any uneconomic conclusions at all.

Some of the NDP-introduced witnesses would have you believe that, but I am going to quote a witness here in a few minutes that makes the different point.

The proposed Bill C-204, as I understand it, will prevent the Atomic Energy Control Board from issuing any new licences related to almost all aspects of the nuclear industry in Canada for the next 50 years. It will, if passed, have serious effects on Canada's economy, its environment, the general health of its population and its standing in the international community.

The economic impact is expressed in terms of the fact that the nuclear industry in Canada presently provides well in excess of 30,000 jobs for Canadians. Their efforts serve through corporations and utilities to contribute $3.6 billion or more in economic activity to the Canadian economy each year and this contribution will obviously decline dramatically if the resolution contained in Bill C-204 is passed.

In terms of environmental impact, I would like to speak briefly, as I have in the environment committee in the past. Global warming in particular is a phenomenon that I think we all agree is caused by the emissions of carbon dioxide generally resulting from the burning of fossil fuels. The greatest threat in terms of the burning of fossil fuels in the foreseeable half century in the world will come from the development of huge coal resources in places like China and India.

The Canadian nuclear technology has the potential to supplant that coal production with a benign source of energy that will in fact make a very dramatic intrusion on the potential for global warming in the years ahead.

It seems to me that we have got to address the environmental issue, not from the fear of a nuclear accident. That is a fear that we all would have. I would like to elaborate for a few minutes about the fact that those fears perhaps are not as justified as they may seem. The real fear, in my view, in the world is global warming, in environmental terms and in terms of this debate. When it comes right down to confronting the probability of global warming, if we do not get the emissions of carbon dioxide under control, confronting that reality with the perceived risk even of a nuclear accident, I believe that the prospects for nuclear development and the Canadian record for safety and technological excellence far outweigh any of the risks that are involved.

I want to quote, almost verbatim, from an address from Dr. Robin Armstrong, the present president of the University of New Brunswick, previously the Dean of Science at the University of Toronto and one of Canada's top physicists. He says that the discussion of nuclear power reactors often generates more heat than light. The issues that are most often raised concerning nuclear power are three in number, the possibility of a catastrophic accident, the effect of radiation leakage on the population living in the vicinity and the ultimate disposal of the spent fuel.

In the more than 30 years, he says, that nuclear power reactors have been operating in North America, there has not been a single catastrophic accident. The most serious accident was at Three Mile Island. The containment design of the building there prevented any significant release of radiation.

In the case of Chernobyl in Ukraine as one of the hon. members has already mentioned, that accident, that design and the lack of precautions in its design and management were so profound as to not be comparable to the Canadian safety record and not represent really an example at all. The Russian example is really a red herring.

Over the past two decades, a vast quantity of research has been done to evaluate reactor safety. The risk to the public is defined as being very small, not zero but very, very small.

He quantifies these in the form of a risk assessment analysis. For an individual in this Chamber tonight, the probability of developing a fatal cancer as a result of a serious accident at the Lepreau 1 station which the hon. member has mentioned in New Brunswick is 2,000 times less than the probability of developing one as a result of exposure to the radiation from the radio elements naturally present in the environment.

That is what he means as "not significant". Therefore, if you accept the validity of that kind of risk assessment analysis, you can conclude that there really is no risk of a catastrophic accident from western style nuclear power reactor.

With respect to the issue of the disposal of high level wastes from nuclear reactors, these must be considered in relation to the relatively small amounts of waste material created by a nuclear power station. The methods for disposal are well known, and the principles of the technology have been the study of very intensive research.

The waste is placed in sealed corrosion resistant containers very deep within stable rock formations. Studies have shown that radioactive material moves extremely slowly through rock and in fact hundreds, indeed thousands of times slower than the groundwater through the same material.

Therefore, even if the containers were eventually breached, no significant amount of radiation would reach the surface. The fact is that after a time of only 500 years, the health hazard posed by the fission products created for one kilogram of the uranium waste is the same as the health hazard of radioactivity of the same amount of uranium occurring naturally in the earth's crust. The conclusion is that the waste disposal problem has been solved.

In the few minutes remaining, I want to draw another analogy and that is a policy analogy related to Sweden. It is interesting to observe that in 1980, a referendum in Sweden determined that a policy for the phasing out of nuclear power by the year 2010 should be declared, endorsed and implemented.

It was decided that starting in 1995, the first of the operating nuclear power plants should be taken out of service and decommissioned. It was only when they tried to establish what alternatives should be used to replace the 41 per cent of the country's electricity generation being produced by nuclear plants that the difficulties really became apparent to the decision makers.

The problem replacing the nuclear capacity was compounded by two other decisions taken by the Swedish government. One was not to increase the carbon dioxide produced by fossil fuels and the other was not to use any of Sweden's untapped rivers to produce hydropower.

Sweden also, of course, wanted to remain competitive in terms of its export industries to the world. Today, the government has abandoned that plan to phase out the first nuclear plant in 1995, and the industrial unions are reputed to have played a strong role in that decision.

It just goes to show that the resolution such as has been introduced here in Bill C–204 and the resolutions such as have been proposed by my colleagues in the NDP are not sustainable. The facts are that nuclear power does have a place. I hope eventually that it has a place in New Brunswick.

I must say that as a New Brunswicker, I am very distressed to see that our government has delayed its commitment to the AECL proposal. It looks as though the nuclear plant, the Candu III reactor that represented such a regional opportunity for the modular manufacturing of nuclear equipment for years and years to come may very well have gone to Saskatchewan, and I would be very interested in the position taken by the Saskatchewan NDP with respect to nuclear power now that it is in the midst of a major election campaign which the polls indicate it is intended to win.

I would not want to wish the people of Saskatchewan any bad luck. It would be enough bad luck if they got an NDP government, but it would be intensified bad luck if that NDP government made the decision to ultimately discontinue the initiative the present Government of Saskatchewan has introduced.

Perhaps in the fullness of time the province of New Brunswick will yet be the beneficiary of NDP policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will now recognize the hon. member for Algoma and, the next time it is the Liberals' turn, the hon. member for Davenport.

The hon. member for Algoma.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-204. It is a private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona in which he proposes to phase out nuclear energy in this country.

The hon. member of course does not live in the province of Ontario, which is something like 50 per cent to 60 per cent dependent on nuclear energy for our primary source of base power generation. It is interesting that parties talk about phasing out nuclear energy when they are in opposition. Certainly Mr. Peterson in Ontario talked vaguely about that when he was in the opposition; he was not going to complete the Darlington generating station. When he came to power and looked at today's realities, not only the economic realities but the environmental realities, suddenly he decided that he would complete the Darlington electrical generating stations.

It is interesting, after hearing from the NDP member from British Columbia, that Mr. Rae, the current premier of Ontario, had the same policy when he was in opposition. Now that he is premier of the province he is spending $2 billion or $3 billion to complete the two final phases of the Darlington electrical generating station, which involves some 900 megawatts for each one of those four stations. It is interesting that he is completing those stations.

The question is whether you have responsibility or not. This bill does not examine the responsible management of our resources, the realities facing the Ontario government or the ability of the Ontario hydroelectrical generating agency to provide electrical energy for the province of Ontario. It has placed before the people of Ontario a plan for the next 25 years which proposes a number of alternatives.

The number one alternative is conservation. I do not think there is anybody in this House, in Canada, or any political party who believes that conservation is the best means of saving electrical energy, whether it is the retrofitting of our industry, a new design of light bulbs or whatever techniques are used.

That is the number one alternative put forward in the Ontario Hydro plan. It goes on to say that we must determine how much acid rain we want to create by using coal fired generating stations as our base station, how much we want to contribute to the greenhouse effect. It continues to say that if we reach a limit in that direction then the balance must be nuclear.

There are alternatives, such as small hydro sites, but hydro sites have an environmental cost as well. There is a whole generation generally classed in with conservation. For the Government of Canada to say "okay, Ontario, you may be 60 per cent dependent on nuclear energy, but we are stopping the licensing of any nuclear generating stations", surely that would be presumptuous and certainly not in keeping with a responsible way to develop the resource.

The argument is put forward by those who sponsored this bill that maybe we do not really want to do away with nuclear energy or phase it out; maybe we just want to have a public debate. I believe that the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources of the House of Commons did a major study back in 1987 and 1988. Its report was entitled Nuclear Energy: Unmasking the Mystery. It heard from dozens and dozens of witnesses.

The people from the NDP who sponsor this resolution tonight should read this report. It is a broad based report. It is not a fire and brimstone report. It talks about the advantages and disadvantages on all sides, but generally it comes down supporting the use of nuclear power as a source of electrical energy, as some of the most successful economies in the world are using. I speak especially of Japan and West Germany. Their main source of base power supply is nuclear energy.

We do not only have this document, which was a broad based study by a committee of this House. It is not as if the House of Commons is going to sit in Committee of the Whole if this bill were to be passed. It will be returned to a committee, probably this committee. Someone can ask if parliamentary committees really do have the capacity to pay interveners and all that and how much time do members have to do a really thorough study?

That argument can be made. A study is taking place in the province of Ontario by a royal commission, a commission under the Environmental Assessment Act, dealing with both the needs and demand. It is an environmental study. It is not talking about abstracts. It is talking about the province of Ontario, which during the next 25 years has to replace 25 per cent of its electrical generating capacity. There are literally hundreds of interveners. There are some from my constituency and some from other areas on both sides of the issue of nuclear energy. It is sponsored by the Ontario government to put its best arguments forward on how we provide electrical energy for the province of Ontario.

Shall it be coal? Shall it be nuclear energy? Will it be small hydro sites? Will it be natural gas turbine fired engines? I mean all those things will be sorted out.

It will take about two years to do the demand study. How much of this demand over the next 25 years is real? How much of it can be done by conservation? How much can be done by co-generation? How much can be done in every way?

It goes on from there to how it can be done in an environmentally proper way. I do not think any study that could be done by this House of Commons will ever be as thorough as that study. It is going to take the next four years, but it is not dealing with the abstract. It is dealing with the power needs of the heartland of this nation, of the heartland of Ontario which is dependent on nuclear energy. If there is a better way to do it, I am sure that that royal commission will come up with it.

For this House of Commons to adopt this bill when we have a massive study, unprecedented in the history of this country, taking place in Ontario, would be pre-emptive. I would not say it would be irresponsible, but I think it would be only supernumerary to the very kind of study which is going to be done by that group which has a responsibility not just to look at the matter in abstract but to keep the power supply and the lights on and the industry in the province of Ontario operating.

I think that to pass this resolution and pre-empt something that is being done on a much larger scale and in a much more thorough way would not be in the best interests of the House or the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto, without amendment.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

October 2, 1991

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Frank Iaccabucci, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 2nd day of October, 1991, at 7.50 p.m. for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to a bill.

Yours sincerely,
Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1950)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto—Chap. 29.

Bill S-4, an Act to amend the Act of incorporation of the University of Emmanuel College.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could get consent from the House to extend private members' hour for the time that is left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the motion of the hon. member for Timiskaming that the House continue sitting until 8.12 p.m. to make up for the time taken up by the royal assent.

Does the House give unanimous consent to the motion that the House extend the hour until 8.12 p.m.?

Mr. Blaikie: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would have been glad to have been able to agree to this before if someone had suggested it, but the fact of the matter is that there were people intending to speak who, because they had no idea that this was going to come, have now left. I think it would be unfair to them to extend the hour.

As I understand it, if there is no unanimous agreement the House will adjourn at 8 p.m. and the time that was taken up by going to the Senate for Royal assent will be carried over and added to the third hour. It may actually require a portion of a fourth hour in order to deal with the time that we lost here tonight.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent. The debate will therefore be resumed until 8 p.m. The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (ending development and exportation of prescribed items and substances) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to underline my total support and commitment to Canada's nuclear program.

The benefits are substantial and indeed are needed for security and diversity of energy supply. They are also needed in environmental protection and industrial development. Nuclear energy will clearly have an important role in Canada and will into the future.

Maintaining the nuclear power option is vital to our interests and vital for the society in general. What is interesting is to take a look at the western sedimentary basin which produces most of our light and medium gravity crude. Those reserves, as we are well aware, are depleting right now. We also know that oil is priced between $20 and $22 a barrel U.S. and at that price it is not economical to develop frontier and synthetic crude.

As we see our oil reserves being depleted we know that the energy supply for future development for electrical generation is very much in doubt and nuclear can play a main role.

I must add with regard to the environment that the impact of burning larger amounts of fossil fuels and the emissions that will be spewn into the air are an extreme public hazard. It also is a huge economic cost to add scrubbers to some of the large stacks that we have.

The implications are that carbon dioxide accumulation within the earth's atmosphere is extremely damaging and has the potential to change the climate.

Another thing that we all have to consider is that Canada is an industrial based country and the nuclear industry has over 30,000 people employed as a direct consequence of this industry. It is most important that—and I realize that most of these jobs are in the province of Ontario—this country maintain its industrial base and maintain the variety of sources that we have to generate electricity in this country. The Atomic Energy Control Board is the federal regulatory agency and it oversees all application development throughout this country with regard to nuclear energy.

Atomic Energy Canada Limited is the Crown owned corporation that promotes the use of nuclear energy and it is known around the world for its superb Candu reactors. They are considered the safest reactors in the world, mainly because of the containment system. It is unfair and it is misleading to compare our Candu reactor with the reactor that was in place at Chernobyl. That was a graphite based reactor and it was a man-made disaster. It is unfair and misleading to scare the people of Canada in that regard.

We know perfectly well that Canada has nuclear reactors generating electricity in Ontario and 53 per cent of Ontario's electricity is derived from nuclear energy. We also have reactors in Quebec as well as New Brunswick.

It is very, very important to look around the world. I was very fortunate to chair the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources in 1988 when we did an extremely intensive study on nuclear energy. Indeed we not only studied it in Canada and the United States but we studied it in Sweden, France and West Germany. There is no doubt about it, nuclear energy is the energy of the future and we must maintain and support Atomic Energy Canada Limited.

We cannot use tunnel vision. There is absolutely no way. We have to examine all the issues at stake. Yes, we will study it very carefully. But nuclear energy for the generation of electricity is absolutely necessary and it will go forth in Canada.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-306, an Act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Arseneault: Madam Speaker, I have the honour to introduce this bill whose purpose is to change the name of the department in the English version of the Act by replacing "Department of Forestry" with "Department of Forests".

[English]

As you may know, Madam Speaker, besides the name Department of Forestry being an inaccurate translation of the French, Ministére des Forêts is misleading in fact. It may be taken to mean ministry of exploitation of our forests.

BUDGET CUTS IN EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House, I have the honour to table a petition today on behalf of students from the province of Quebec, la belle province. They condemn the budget cuts affecting education, deplore the administrative tax on student loans and point out that in many cases, this tax applies to people who have to repay their loans in any case.

They also mentioned in their petition that this might be illegal, and they wonder how the government can talk about being competitive and at the same time slash education budgets. The petition also mentions the GST and other tax increases students must cope with.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of Canadians. These particular ones are from southern Ontario.

They note that grain and oilseed producers in Canada are experiencing the most severe shortage of cash flow in their history and that the new safety net programs do not bridge the gap between the old ad hoc programs in the crop year just completed last August.

They humbly call upon the Parliament of Canada to provide cash assistance as proposed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture on August 29, which would have brought assistance up to the levels provided by the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account program.

Question No. 17—Mr. Milliken:

To date, with respect to the constituency of Lac St.-Jean, Que., did the government propose expenditures of (a) $117,000 for a 3 year program for blueberry farms (b) $120,000,000 for regional development (c) $40,000,000 for new roads (d) $1,500,000 to upgrade a non-profit job creation centre (e) $40,000 for a study investigating the need to expand the Alma Airport (f) $56,000 for a feasibility study to examine ways to improve the Petite-Décharge River for tourism (g) $440,000 for wharf repair on the Saguenay, and, if so, for each project (i) has any money been spent and, if so, how much (ii) how much more money is projected to be spent (iii) have any projects been cancelled and, if so, which ones (iv) was any money spent before the project was cancelled and, if so, how much?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture, Public Works, Transport and the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec (FORDQ) as follows:

Insofar as the Department of Agriculture is concerned:

(a) Yes, a federal/provincial contribution of $117,000 under the Canada/Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on Agri-Food Development, of which the federal share was $58,000

(i) $52,650

(iii) No

(iv) No

(b) Yes, a federal contribution of $571,690 under the Canada/Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on the Economic Development of the Regions of Quebec and the Canada/Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on Agri-Food Development

(i) $167,427

(iv) No

Insofar as the Federal Office of Regional Development-Quebec (FORDQ) is concerned:

(b) In june 1988, when the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on the Economic Development of the Regions of Quebec was signed, the two governments set aside a regional development budget envelope of $120 million for the North-Centre region of Quebec, not just the riding of Lac Saint-Jean. In addition to Lac Saint-Jean, the region comprises the ridings of Roberval, Jonquière and Chicoutimi, as well as a portion of the riding of Charlevoix. Funds in the $120 million envelope are provided on a 50-50 basis by the federal and Quebec governments.

As of May 1, 1991, the federal government had approved various programs totalling $55 million in the North-Centre region of Quebec, while the Quebec government had approved only $22.6 million in programs.

Federal commitments in the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean, to May 1, 1991, were as follows:

Enterprise Development Program (EDP):

—Industrial Component $1,852,663

—Tourism component $430,985

A portion of these commitments has already been paid to applicants under these program components, and the balance will be paid over the next few years.

More funds will be committed and expended in the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean under these program components, but it is impossible to predict the exact total because these program components are intended to meet the requirements of the entire North-Centre region and this is reflected in their budgets, which are not broken down by riding.

(f) Under the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on the Economic Development of the Regions of Quebec, the Federal Office of Regional Development (Quebec) has joined with the government of Quebec to fund the execution, by a qualified firm, of the study of the feasibility of cleaning up of pollution in the Petite Décharge River.

The objectives of the study are to assess the impact of log rafting on river water quality and to develop a pollution abatement and clean-up program with a view to preparing an overall development plan, including tourism development, for the Petite Décharge River.

i) No payments have yet been made for this project.

ii) A total amount of $47,440 instead of $56,000 should be disbursed for this project.

iii) This project has not been cancelled.

iv) Not applicable.

Insofar as Transport Canada is concerned:

(e) (i to iv)

The first study, entitled "Proposition d'agrandissement de l'aérogare d'Alma" was undertaken by Anicet Tremblay, Architect, Alma, Québec in June 1988, at a cost of $15,000.

On March 1, 1990, the Town presented the final report to Transport Canada Regional Officials. The study recommends the expansion of the air terminal building at a total estimated cost of $287,762.

When the study was received, Transport Canada Regional Officials supported the expansion project, in view of the presence of two air carriers (Air Alma and Intair); however, it was suggested that the project costs be re-examined. In October 1990, Intair ceased operations at Alma Airport; justification for the expansion of the air terminal building was no longer valid. It is also essential that the Town negotiates the least clause giving Air Alma exclusive rights to utilization of the air terminal building.

Should the Town wish to proceed with the air terminal building expansion project, they will have to take these facts into account and re-examine the cost estimates and the findings of the feasibility study.

The second study entitled "Évaluation technico-économique du projet d'allongement de la piste de l'aéroport d'Alma".

The objective of the study was to evaluate a proposal to lengthen the runway at Alma from 4,300 feet (1,310m) to 5,900 feet (1,800m). The study was completed in February 1989 by STRATEM INC. of Montreal at a cost of $19,500.

The study concluded that from an economic and technical viewpoint, lengthening the runway would be premature and the existing runway at the Alma Airport met both the existing and forecasted traffic.

Transport Canada completed a project to rehabilitate the existing runway (4,300 feet in length and 100 feet in width) at Alma Airport in October 1989 at a cost of $1,232,200.

Insofar as the Department of Public Works is concerned:

(g) The Department undertook a wharf repair project in the 1988/89 fiscal year in the electoral district of Lac-Saint-Jean, at Ste-Rose-du-Nord. The estimated cost of the repairs was $440,000. The final cost of the repairs was $470,910.

Question No. 45—Mr. Fisher:

How many cases emanating from the Public Service are before the Canadian Human Rights Commission or Tribunal?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): There are presently 1,547 open cases before the CHRC or Tribunal emanating from the Public Service.

Question No. 46—Mr. Fisher:

How many cases have fallen under each of the ten grounds of discrimination under Sections 5 to 14 of the Canadian Human Rights Act?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): The Commission has accepted since 1986, 4,862 cases (according to the CHRC Data Base and including 815 cases that were accepted prior to 1986 that were still active).

National or Ethinic origin	378
Disability (mental or physical)	1496
Marital status	343
Family status	216
Pardoned conviction	11
Total	4862

Question No. 47—Mr. Fisher

What is the record of convictions under Section 59 (formerly Section 45) of the Canadian Human Rights Act?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Of the 2 cases in which prosecutions were undertaken pursuant to section 59, one resulted in conviction (R. v. Villemaire and Applegate, April 29, 1988, Ontario Provincial Court).

Question No. 48—Mr. Fisher:

How many cases under Section 59 (as amended) of the Canadian Human Rights Act have been referred to the Solicitor General?

M. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): 121 cases under section 59 (as amended) of the Canadian Human Rights Act have been referred to the Solicitor General.

Question No. 58—Mr. Caccia:

1. Does the Sustainable Development Research Division still exist under the Department of Environment and, if so, (a) under which services (b) for the (i) fiscal year 1991–92 (ii) each fiscal year since its creation, what are the dollar and person–years resources?

2. If the Division no longer exists (a) why was it disbanded (b) what happened to the professionals within the Division?

Hon. Pauline A. Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): 1 & 2. In December 1990, the federal government released its Green Plan. The Green Plan is an operational framework for the government's commitment to sustainable development.

During that same period, Environment Canada announced the appointment of an Assistant Deputy Minister—State for the Environment Reporting. This appointment underscores the importance the federal government places on environmental information. Concurrent with this announcement was the realignment of sustainable development policy functions from the former State of the Environment/Sustainable Development Branch (SOE/SD) to the department's Corporate Policy Group. This realignment is intended to ensure that all of DOE's activities are coordinated within an overall policy framework which embraces the notion of sustainable development.

The SOE/SD Division professional staff remain with the State of the Environment Reporting Service.

SOCIÉTÉ RADIO–NORD

Question No. 59—Mr. Saint–Julien:

For each of the last ten fiscal years, has Radio–Canada entered into agreements with the Société Radio–Nord Inc. du Québec respecting the use of its antenna and retransmission and technical services and, if so, how much is Radio–Canada paying for these services (a) for each year (b) for each location?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): On occasion, it can be in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's interest to share facilities belonging to a private company rather than establishing its own facilities. When this is the case, the Corporation negotiates agreements to this end. This is in fact common practice in the broadcasting industry. Broadcasters often enter into agreements to use existing facilities, even those of competitors. In this respect, CBC has the following agreements with Radio–Nord Inc.

In Abitibi, where Radio–Nord has transmission equipment, CBC French radio and television services are available as a result of affiliation agreements with Radio–Nord Inc.

In 1985, the Corporation concluded an agreement with Radio-Nord Inc. to use that company's transmission facilities in Rouyn to establish CBC English radio and television network services in Abitibi.

Also in 1985, in order to improve the quality of French television service in the Temiscaming region, the Corporation reached an agreement with Radio-Nord Inc. to improve its Fabre-Béarn transmitter. This transmitter feeds the CBC transmitter in Temiscaming.

In 1990, an agreement was concluded concerning the sharing of existing equipment in order to implement new FM radio services in Rouyn and Val d'Or. This agreement replaced a previous one dating from 1976.

With respect to the costs incurred (a) and (b), Parliament has not, as a matter of custom since the Corporation's creation in 1936, required CBC to supply, in answering Parliamentary questions, such details about its internal management and administration. Parliament has had two reasons for following this customs: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown Corporation, established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national program service; and, secondly, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities. The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various Parliamentary Committees and the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record, its views have been accepted. Names of staff members and their functions in relation to specific programs and the costs related to such assignments, as requested in Question No. 2295 answered May 20, 1975, are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to Parliament to discuss the policies it and when the CBC have followed in this regard and it would be appropriate to review them when the CBC's estimates are before the House of Commons Committee on Communications and Culture.

The government makes available all information requested by members except where publication would be inconsistent with the mandate given to the Corporation by Parliament. This principle is well established and accepted with respect to information about government agencies and Crown Corporations which are in competition with the private sector.

BUFFET RECEPTION AT THE CANADIAN EMBASSY IN TOKYO ENTITLED "THE ART OF CANADA"

Question No. 60—Mr. Riis:

In May 1991 did the government host a buffet reception at the Canadian Embassy in Tokyo titled "The Art of Canada" and, if so, (a) how many attended the reception (b) what food items were served and at what cost (c) what alcoholic beverages were served and at what cost?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, the Government hosted a buffet reception on May 27, 1991 at the Canadian Embassy in Tokyo titled "The Art of Canada".

a) 600 guests attended the reception.

b) In addition to the hors d'oeuvre served at the beginning of the function, a buffet dinner consisting of beef, pork, fish, seafood, mushrooms, cheese, fruits and dessert was served. Most of the products were of Canadian origin but purchased on the local market.

c) All the alcoholic beverages (wine, rye, whiskey and beer) served to the guests were provided for free from the Canadian companies. With regard to the cost, the caterer's bill for food and beverages totalled $61,989.77.

Question No. 69—Mr. MacWilliam:

How many complaints of sexual harassment have been lodged pursuant to the Canadian Human Rights Act by public service employees?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): From 1986 to 1990, there were 63 sexual harassment complaints filed with the CHRC against federal departments and agencies. It is likely that the overwhelming majority of these complaints were filed by public servants. However, exact figures cannot be provided since case information is not coded according to whether the complainant is a public service employee.

Pre 1986, sexual harassment case information is not available as the Commission information data base cannot provide this specific information for that period.

Question No. 70—Mr. MacWilliam:

How many cases of employer harassment, within the CRTC, emanating from charges laid under the Canadian Human Rights Act are before the Canadian Human Rights Commission or Tribunal?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): There are presently 3 cases of employer harassment filed against the CRTC before the Commission, of which 1 concerns sexual harassment and 2 are concerned with employer harassment on the ground of disability.

Question No. 81—Mr. MacAulay:

With respect to the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Package (AFAP) announced on May 7, 1991, has any of the $584 million been allocated to deal with problems in Prince Edward Island and, if so, (a) how much in total (b) how much has been spent (c) what projects or initiatives have received funding?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency as follows:

Insofar as the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is concerned:

(a) Funding for the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program (AFAP) is not allocated on a province by province basis. However, every effort is made to fund proposals in all provinces based on priorities for AFAP. Allocations were made to Canso, North Sydney, Lockeport, Grand Bank, Gaultois, St. John's and Trepassey because these locations were affected by processing plant shutdowns. AFAP has $140 million over five years for economic diversification both inside and outside fisheries and residents of PEI can submit proposals for funding along with the other Atlantic provinces plus Quebec.

(b) Approximately $114,000.00 were spent directly on fisheries diversification projects in PEI in 1990–91 mainly on aquaculture research.

(c) Nutrition study on Arctic char; dockside monitoring; and a shellfish parasite study. There are over four million ($4 M) dollars in proposals for PEI now under consideration by ACOA and DFO.

Insofar as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is concerned:

Within the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program (AFAP), ACOA is responsible for the Fisheries Alternatives Program (FAP). FAP is a Program directed at economic diversification outside the fishery sector. In relation to FAP, ACOA does not allocate funds provincially; however, the majority of funding will be directed towards Newfoundland which has been affected the most by fish plant closures.

In Prince Edward Island, ACOA has approved one project involving the Greater Summerside Chamber of Commerce. The $30,000 grant is being used to study the potential business opportunities as a result of the establishment of the Revenue Canada—GST Processing Centre on Prince Edward Island.

Question No. 82—Mr. MacAulay:

In Prince Edward Island, with respect to the Plant Workers Adjustment Program under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Package (AFAP), (a) how many people will benefit from this program (b) what will be their benefit level (c) what are the names and addresses of the persons who have received money from this program?

Hon. John Carnell Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): In Prince Edward Island, with respect to the Plant Workers Adjustment Program (PWAP) under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Package (AFAP), (a) preliminary estimates indicate that 25 people could potentially benefit from this program (b) benefit levels would be set at 70 percent of their UI benefits with a minimum of $500 and a maximum of $1,238 per month (c) no individuals have reveived money from this program to date. Final agreement on program funding and delivery, between federal and provincial governments, is required before implementation can proceed.

Question No. 84—Mr. Butland:

What is the rate of conviction for cases emanating from section 59 of the Canadian Human Rights Act being referred to the Solicitor General?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): For 121 cases referred to the Solicitor General, there were 2 prosecutions undertaken pursuant to section 59, one resulted in a conviction.

Question No. 85—Mr. Butland:

How many investigations under section 59 of the Canadian Human Rights Act have occurred?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): 121 investigations.

STATISTICS ON PERMANENT RESIDENTS ADMITTED UNDER THE SRI LANKA SPECIAL MEASURES

Question No. 101—Mr. Axworty (Saskatoon–Clark's Crossing):

Since 1985, with respect to emigration from Sri Lanka (a) how many persons have been admitted under the program which allows persons with qualified relatives and others adversely affected by the situation in Sri Lanka to enter Canada (b) how many persons have been accepted under the current overseas procedures?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The following table outlines the number of permanent residents admitted under the Sri Lanka special measures program, by year and processing area.

	Processed in Canada	Processed Abroad	Total

ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, if question No. 12 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 12 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 12—Mr. Caccia:

Have any Cabinet policies been subjected to environmental impact assessments and, if so (a) who conducted each assessment (b) have any public statements been released and, if so, how and when were they released?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Canadian dairy and poultry industries operate under marketing systems that assure Canadians adequate supplies of safe and nutritious food at fair prices while providing efficient producers with fair incomes and, therefore, the government must immediately provide Canadian producers, operating within these supply management sectors, firm assurances that it is seeking and will continue to seek the strengthening and clarification of Article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) in the ongoing multilateral trade negotiations and that it will not be party to any agreement that fails to achieve these objectives.

He said: Madam Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I would like to point out that we in the Official Opposition will be sharing our time slots today with the exception of my own introductory remarks which will lay out the basis of this debate. My colleagues will be sharing their time slots and each will be speaking for 10 minutes.

I would also like to ask your assistance, Madam Speaker, in view of the crisis that has developed in the agricultural industry, in finding a way for us to table some petitions put together in good faith by over 5,000 members of various farm organizations at a meeting in Lucknow, Ontario, that are unfortunately in the wrong form. These petitions outline the seriousness of the economic situation in agriculture and were put together in good faith. They do not meet the requirements here. I just received them this morning. I was wondering if there was any way they could be tabled along with the remarks that I am about to make here today.

It is a critical situation out there, Madam Speaker. In my own riding, there have been four suicides within the last month. These people need to be heard, they want the government to realize their problems and to take action accordingly.

I cannot help but think at the onset of this debate that there are strange priorities in this country at the present time. They are strange priorities when it costs $150 a tonne to dispose of Toronto's garbage, yet we only pay the farmers $115 a tonne to produce the food that we eat. I am speaking here of wheat.

This government, as evidenced by its vote on Monday, September 23, does not agree there is a financial crisis in the grain sector in this country. If supply management is destroyed by the government negotiators at GATT, similar devastating prices will occur in the dairy and poultry sectors.

In contrast to the grain sector, the poultry and dairy industries are healthy industries. It would be sheer economic nonsense and madness to see those industries destroyed by the government failing to maintain and strengthen Article XI of the GATT. Let us be clear from the onset, the process of tariffication will utterly destroy these industries. A system of tariffication is not acceptable to the producers of Canada.

For the last 60 years, beginning prior to the Great Depression of the 1930s, there have been actions by various levels of government to bring a level of stability to Canadian agriculture as the Conservative government itself brought in the Canadian Wheat Board legislation in 1935.

In 1949 the Agricultural Products Marketing Act was implemented, and in 1972 the Liberal government of the day proclaimed the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. Of course the Canadian Dairy Commission was proclaimed during that same timeframe.

The National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act allows for the establishment of marketing agencies with the power to set prices based on the cost of production, to plan production to meet market needs and other measures that would lead to a more efficient industry.

These systems, as they matured, became the most sophisticated of any in the world. In the case of poultry and dairy, the producers achieved a level of stability which allowed them a small profit and a return on labour and investment.

Some critics would lead us to believe that marketing boards lead to inefficiencies. When we examine the records of the dairy industries, we find that the productivity per cow in Canada increased by 73.5 per cent since 1971, compared to only 46 per cent in the U.S. and 3.5 per cent in western Europe.

Better feed conversion, better disease control and more eggs per bird have occurred in the poultry industry during the last 15 years under this marketing agency. This is in sharp contrast to the chicken operations in the U.S. where often low levels of antibiotics are fed to combat diseases. Indeed, the chief of the United States Department of Food Safety, Mr. Crawford, recently stated that "the American people are tired of seeing one story after another about dirty chickens" on their markets. Mr. Crawford was commenting on a USDA report that found 35 per cent of the chickens raised in the United States were infected with salmonella bacteria, and other reports according to Reuters News Agency have put the number much higher.

Starting the early 1950s and up to the present time, there has been a growing concentration of control in food after it leaves the processors, a concentration that forced narrower margins for the processors and diminishing returns to the poultry sector.

Since January 1, 1989 to June 1991, 70 food processing plants in Canada were forced out of business, 36 of these were in Ontario.

I recently completed a study which I called "Compare the Share". It shows a huge increase in the price of food over the last 10 years. These increases have occurred after the food has been sold by the farmer and has already left the processor.

In fact, processors are being forced to close their doors not because of high producer prices but because of the untenable situation vis-à-vis distribution, wholesale and retail operations. Anybody who wants a copy of this report can have one by simply writing to my office. I should point out that there will be a brochure available at the Royal Winter Fair giving this outline so that the consumers of Canada know who is ripping them off in their food basket purchases. It is certainly not the Canadian farmers, who are among the most efficient in the world.

This graphic comparison of the cost of various food items clearly indicates that during a 10-year period, from 1980 to 1990, farm gate prices increased very little, in fact in some cases they declined, while retail prices have increased dramatically. For example, a box of corn flakes increased by 94.5 per cent from 1980 to 1989; a box of soda biscuits increased by 235 per cent during the same period; and sweet cookies increased by 135 per cent. And get this; a box of whole wheat cereal increased by 194.2 per cent during this period when the price of wheat to the producer was declining.

By contrast, a product under marketing board control, namely eggs, developed much more acceptable price increases to consumers. Egg prices to the producer increased by 14.1 per cent during this period and by 18.3 per cent to the consumer. Likewise, the farm price of eviscerated weight turkeys to the producer increased by 12.8 per cent and the consumer price by 25.8 per cent. Since 1980 the retail price of chicken has increased by $2.20 per kilogram, while the farm price only increased by 28 cents per kilogram. This retail price increase from 1980 to 1990 was 785 per cent higher than the farm price increase over the same period.

Madam Speaker, that is not acceptable. These price comparisons clearly show the cost of production formula used by the poultry sector has provided a steady level of prices to the producer and a correspondingly fair price to the processor.

It is interesting to note that the total farm value of all chickens, turkey, eggs and milk produced in Canada in 1990 was $4.8 billion, 32 per cent less than the total sales of $7.1 billion of one large grocery chain. The price of a litre of milk in Ontario at the farm gate increased by 19 cents since 1980, on the store shelf the price of that litre of milk has increased by 73 cents, or 97 per cent.

I would like to stress this. The Consumers' Association of Canada in the September-October issue of their magazine blames the fact that milk in Canada costs more than in the United States solely on supply management. However, the Consumers' Association of Canada has not provided us with any research, as far as I can see from the article, on the price of these products. Madam Speaker, this is pure hogwash. The Consumers' Association of Canada says that it found milk 30 per cent cheaper in the U.S. than in Canada, yet it makes no comment on the fact that the difference in the price of a litre of milk in 1990 between the farm gate and the store shelf is 91 cents, the store shelf price being 160 per cent higher than the farm gate price.

It should be noted that the increase in the retail price of a litre of milk between 1990 and 1989 outstripped the food marketing cost index by 1.5 per cent. It is also interesting to note that neither the Consumers' Association of Canada nor the government consider the increase in input costs versus that of the United States. Input costs for our Canadian producers are approximately 25 per cent higher than those in the United States starting with interest rates, diesel fuel costs and labour. I will say more about that in a few minutes.

I suggest that the Consumers' Association of Canada could do the consumers a better service by investigating the entire food pricing structure, including distribution and wholesale sectors as well as the retailers, rather than singling out supply management for unwarranted abuse.

Why don't they complain about the cost of soft drinks? A small bottle of soft drink costs more than a glass of milk. I respectfully suggest that $793,000 in funding given to the Canadian Consumers' Association last year would be much better spent if it were used to provide food for our food banks in some of our larger cities.

It amazes me that one food chain in western Canada sent $538,700,000 in dividends back to its parent company in the United States last year. Where was the Canadian Consumers' Association when this took place? We didn't hear a word. Obviously we have a double standard in society today. The same is true of cheese. Since 1980 the farm price of cheese increased by $1.53 per kilogram, while the retail price increased by $5.34 a kilogram to $11.52 a kilogram. In 1980 there was a $3.13 spread in price between the farmer and the processor and by 1988 that spread was $6.94.

The power exercised by these few buying groups requires a countervailing force in the marketplace. Canada's producer marketing systems provide that counterbalance.

When one examines the chaos existing in the U.S. dairy industry at the present time, the concentration of the U.S. poultry industry and red meat industry, and the impact that concentration will have on Canada as the borders are opened, we on this side of the House realize that it will destroy our marketing systems and our industry. Climatic differences alone give the U.S. a tremendous advantage.

Canadian consumers spend 11.5 per cent of their disposable income on food, the second lowest portion of income spent on food of any nation in the world. The producer desperately needs a fair share of that consumer food dollar.

I should also point out that due to this government's free trade agreement with the United States that marketing boards have again found themselves under attack.

The Conservative government at the time stated that it "defended the right to establish" marketing boards "in the past and will continue to do so in the future" that ice cream and yoghurt is "a GATT issue" and "not a free trade issue". This was a statement by the former Minister of Agriculture in this House on September 13, 1989.

However, a former Canadian trade negotiator at the Tokyo round of the GATT, and in the FTA states: "I have reviewed Mr. Mazankowski's statement and concluded that it is simply not true. The facts are the FTA will result in the elimination of marketing boards whose viability depends on sales to food processors; the FTA caused the ice cream and yoghurt problem; and the government had an opportunity in the FTA negotiations to protect marketing boards and did not".

As these food processors close down, where are our Canadian farmers going to sell their products?

This House passed legislation giving the producers of the nation the right to plan their production and set their own prices under government supervision. This resulted in bringing order out of chaos. Now this government is demolishing these institutions in secret negotiations behind closed doors.

The farmers of Canada do not know what the government negotiators are trading away at the GATT. Canadian farmers at the end of the negotiations will be told what kind of deal was made. They have no final say in it. They will not even have the right to reject it. This is not acceptable.

In answering a question in the House on October 15, 1990, regarding the GATT negotiations, the Minister for International Trade stated:

> Mr. Speaker, on October 1 we had to file at Geneva, together with other countries involved in these negotiations, an estimate of the cost of the various programs in effect in Canada to assist agriculture. The total was $8.8 billion. The Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed of the amount of assistance he is giving Canadian farmers. It is a huge amount of assistance.

However, the Minister for International Trade failed to convince the opposition members and the Canadian public of the legitimacy of these false and misleading figures as opposition members, including myself, made statements in the House outlining the true and correct figures.

I stated in this House on October 18, 1990: "That $8.8 billion is a fictitious figure. It is about 53 per cent higher than the actual figure". For example, papers filed in Geneva on October 1 showed that Canadian dairy farmers received $2.2 billion in subsidies, when in fact, as shown by our own estimates in the House on expenditures, Canadian dairy farmers received only a cash subsidy of $261 million last year, and this goes only to industrial milk producers.

The $2.2 billion is a concocted figure, most of it being the difference between what the U.S. farmers receive for milk versus Canadian farmers and then calling it a subsidy. Again this game of smoke and mirrors ignores the fact that Canadian farm inputs are much higher than those in the United States.

I have to ask, did our negotiators consider U.S. school lunches and food stamps as subsidies. Nearly 50 per cent of the USDA's expenditures go indirectly for social assistance, such as these programs I just mentioned. Were these items included in their costs or subsidies? I doubt it.

Where was the Minister of Agriculture when the Minister for International Trade made that statement last year in this House? Did he inform the Minister for International Trade of the facts? Did the Minister of Agriculture point out that $1 billion of that $4.2 billion was drought assistance? No, he did not.

He did not do it in this House. The Minister of Agriculture was strangely silent. A newspaper editorialist and writers unwittingly used these fictitious figures to attach supply management marketing boards.

Did the Minister of Agriculture write to the editors to point out the true level of support for agriculture in Canada? No. Again he was strangely silent.

I, as a member of this House and as a farmer, had to refute these misleading figures in those various newspapers that carry them. These are strange actions for a man who claims to support Article XI and supply management at the GATT.

If the Government of Canada supports marketing boards, why did the Department of Agriculture give the Canadian Consumers Association a $45,000 grant last year to bring in a study that attacks marketing boards, a study that is partly responsible for these concerted attacks in editorials and other media coverage that occurred, the attack to which the Minister of Agriculture failed to offer a single statement of defence of our marketing board system in Canada?

The study is based on the Minister for International Trade's figure of $8.8 billion of October 15, 1991. I respectfully suggest the Minister of Agriculture took money from the Farm Women for the Survival of Agriculture budget to fund this attack of the Canadian Consumers' Association, which is already getting $793,000 from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Minister of Agriculture said on September 18: "What we have asked for and what the policy of this government is is that article XI should be further clarified and strengthened. This has not been changed and will not change until the government says it will change".

Does that give you a feeling of security? It certainly does not give it to me because he said that it will not change until the government says it will change.

Last week, my colleague from Gatineau—La Lievre was asking the government if it would assure that the cost of production formula, which is essential to the operation of these marketing agencies commissions, would be maintained. In reply, the Prime Minister appeared to identify the question as relating to GATT and assured the Canadian dairy industry—these are his own words: "The Canadian government will try to find new markets for them".

I ask you, Madam Speaker, if the government supports article XI which allows countries to limit imports when they have a system of production designed to meet only domestic needs, why are they now concerned about finding new markets for our dairy farmers? The answer is simple.

I do not believe it intends to support article XI of GATT. Why else would the dairy farmers need the government to find them new markets? Did it in fact agree to trade article XI in exchange for the U.S. giving up article XXII which gives the U.S. the waiver it used for years on dairy products, peanuts and sugar?

These people should wake up to reality, because if you look at the cost-input differences and if it gives up that waiver in exchange for Article XI, that puts us in an untenable situation, a no-win situation. The reality is we only have to look at the difference in input costs between Canada and the United States.

In Canada, the interest rates are 25 per cent higher for operating costs in terms of interest rates and 39 per cent for maintenance accounts in interest rates.

Machinery repairs, plough points, are 123.9 per cent higher in Canada; penicillin for animal use, 201.5 per cent higher in Canada; gasoline, 129.6 per cent higher; diesel fuels, 71.4 per cent higher in Canada and farm wages are 48 per cent higher.

How do you compete against those costs. It is impossible. We are going to see this industry, the only sectors of the Canadian agricultural economy that are on stable footing, demolished if we trade away article XI at GATT.

Last Tuesday, the government tabled its new constitutional package and tabled shortly after a document entitled Canadian Federalism and the Economic Union. It is tabled by the Minister of Finance. I have a copy here: Partnership for Prosperity. I quote from page 19 of this document: "For example the range of impediments created by the government includes agriculture supply market boards that regulate production and prices of the various food products, including milk, poultry and eggs."

That tells us what is in store for Canadian agriculture in the dairy and poultry industry. The former Minister of Agriculture described marketing boards as trade impediments. Is this how he instructed Canada's GATT negotiators, that marketing boards are trade impediments?

What constitutional change is the government advocating in relation to this and other examples of what it calls internal trade barriers? What is the government doing, creating a constitutional fail-safe way of removing marketing boards from Canada, a way in which the government can have big business do its dirty work by challenging marketing boards on constitutional grounds? Did the government include this provision to appease the rank and file of the Progressive Conservative Party who at a policy meeting in Toronto this past summer defeated a resolution supporting supply management? Has the government examined the U.S. dairy industry that is in total chaos, an industry in which 40 per cent of the producers cannot pay their bills?

Has the government examined the concentration of the poultry industry in the United States where one company controls 14 million laying hens, twice the number that we have in all of Ontario, and where one of their largest chicken producing companies, totally integrated, controls one-third of the chicken production in all of the United States? How do we expect our Canadian farmers to compete against that sort of thing when input costs are so much lower?

The government should strengthen Article XI at GATT and ensure that it includes a provision to block imports from countries which are not practising sustainable agriculture. To block food imports from countries which are creating unfair competition with Canadian farmers by using chemicals and pesticides which are illegal for use in Canada is clearly needed desperately in this country.

In conclusion, I call on the government to support the poultry and dairy sector in this country; to stop using misleading figures relating to Canada's dairy and poultry producers; to support and strengthen Article XI, as it promised; to reply to those editorial attacks; to stop using blatantly false and misleading figures that cast a cloud over our dairy industry; to insist that the United States stop its export enhancement subsidies which are in clear violation of the free trade agreement; and above all, stop trying to drive a wedge between the Canadian consumer and the dairy and poultry farmers of this country.

I am appalled that one year ago this month the Minister for International Trade not only tried to mislead this House, but obviously mislead some of the news media of this country and the people of Canada. I call on the minister here today to speak up and clear this record; to admit the $2.2 billion support for Canadian dairy farmers, as stated by the former Minister for International Trade about one year ago, is a concocted figure. I call upon him to apologize to the dairy farmers of this nation because the actual figure of those subsidies was $267 million.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have just a short comment. The hon. member speaks with great platitudes about what his administration would do. On the farm there is a saying that is common among the farmers when they go to hire a man. They say: "Don't tell me what you're going to do, tell me what you've done".

I think that it would do well for the Canadian people to observe very carefully what the administration has done. We remember when the Trudeau Liberal government said: "Sell the wheat". We remember when the Liberal administration dealing with farmers, whether it was the chicken industry, the feather industry or the dairy industry could not get one seat west of Winnipeg to represent them. They had to send senators out there to represent them. That is how serious it was.

We saw a very good example of that in this House just yesterday in terms of the votes that took place in this House. Where did the Liberals and the NDP stand? They stood with the labour unions. Forty boats in the ports, 10 more boats coming in to load grain and they voted against with the labour unions.

On the positive side, what the Conservative government has done is we have stood at the GATT. We have stood there for the dairy producers and we will stand there. We have stood there for the feather industry and we will stand there.

The Prime Minister was the first Prime Minister of Canada to ever address the Federation of Agriculture, which he has done three times. Check the record. I was at the meeting in Vancouver when he called 50 farm groups together.

An hon. member: What is he going to do?

Mr. Gustafson: Watch us. What I am saying is look at our record. Look at our record and judge us on our record. If there is a government that has stood with the farmers and will stand with them, it will be this government. We have had a history of doing this.

In Saskatchewan today they are going into an election. It is either going to be the labour unions under Roy Romanow or a man like Grant Devine who stood with the farmers, not always right on all issues, but always standing with the people they represent. We are the group of farmers. We are the members who represent the farmers and we will stand with them.

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks whether we know where the government stood. I want to point out to him that under article 701.4 of the free trade agreement, the United States must take into account the effects of its export subsidies on other nations, how they affect Canada, and must ensure that they do not prejudice our exports.

Under article 1804, provisions are there for the government to call for consultations if such incidents take place and to ask for compensation. They did not do that.

I raised this in the House on March 18, and I would ask everyone to look at the response I got to that request by the prairie pools and by the farmers in western Canada. In terms of a former Prime Minister saying "why should I sell your wheat", I should point out to my colleague across the way and to everyone what the total statement was. He said: "Why should I sell your wheat? I could not sell it if I wanted to. You already have two government organizations doing it for you". Please use the full statement in total context the next time.

An hon. member: That was a bit rough.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was very impressed by the attempt to defend the government record by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. It was only three or four weeks ago when grain and oilseed producers from across this land met and they are still waiting for government support.

Last year the government slashed support programs by $1.3 billion at a time when the price of grains and oilseeds in the world market was dropping by 30 per cent, from $135 a tonne to $95 a tonne. This member and his Tory colleagues voted unanimously with our caucus in an agriculture committee meeting to call on the government to provide emergency transitional assistance, as was asked for by the farm organizations right across the country. That is why we are having meetings all across the country today. There were 3,000 to 4,000 people meeting in Rosetown this week, 1,500 in Brandon and over 1,000 in Lucknow, Ontario, because the government welshed on that commitment. It made a commitment last winter to provide that assistance and it did not live up to it. It supported a unanimous resolution in the agriculture committee and two weeks later, here in the House when the motion was put, it voted against the same motion.

That is why we are concerned about what is going on at GATT today because we know that you have double-crossed us in the free trade deal with the United States and we are scared that you are going to destroy this entire industry in those negotiations this fall. If you do, you are not just destroying 30,000 or 40,000 farms; you are destroying rural Canada and that is unacceptable to Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before I give the floor back to the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, let me say that it is very early in the day and it would be appreciated if hon. members who have the floor would address their remarks through the Chair. It might make things a lot easier later in the day.

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, I totally concur with what my colleague has said. There are very few farmers in this House of Commons who worked their lives to put together a family farm operation. It distresses me to see the despair and hardship out there across this country. I see my own son experiencing it.

I have to wonder, when I look at the graphic illustration of this book, why this government has not been going after the concentration of power in the food distribution sector, the wholesaling and retail sectors. Where was the Competition Bureau when all this was going on? It is unacceptable that the farmers of this nation should not have an income and the level of security that is available to the rest of society. We need an income that is commensurate with the rest of society. I for one am not going to stand here in this House and say nothing while the GATT article XI may well be neutered or done away with.

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a point of order. I admire the hon. member and the presentation he gave but he did make several comments relating to the Minister of Agriculture misleading Parliament. Maybe he would like to have an opportunity to rethink those statements.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I listened carefully to what the hon. member was saying and I do not think he said that the minister deliberately mislead either the House or anyone, which is why I did not stop the hon. member on that.

I think it would be wise for all of us to be a little more careful with our words. As I said a minute ago, it is going to be a long day. It is a very strong debate. I think we can debate without using words that could be construed as insults to one another or to any other people.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I have a short question for the hon. member.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is one minute left. It has to be a very short question.

Mr. Belsher: How does the hon. member opposite reply to the statement when our negotiators in Brussels say "we are continuing to operate under the instructions we took into the earlier talks in Brussels and those instructions reflected a negotiating principle, a position that was worked out with all of the segments of the industry"?

Those are their instructions. Those are what they are working under. Yet the member opposite and his cohorts continually say that we are dealing away article XI. The member knows full well the negotiating position of Canada and that position has not changed.

What does he tell his farmer friends about that?

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture said that that was their position, as you laid out, and it will not change until the government says it will change. Why did he not say that the government never intended to change it and will not change it? He did not say that.

I would also like to point out the words of the Prime Minister a few days later when he said that the government would try to help Quebec producers find alternative markets. That again throws a whole question mark over these whole proceedings.

Certainly I am worried about it. I am sure that farmers here today in the gallery are equally worried. These are facts that are contained in the Hansard of this House.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to rise today and speak on this very important motion.

Before I start into my remarks pertaining to that motion, I would like to make a comment or two. The Lucknow meeting has been referred to many times by my colleague from Middlesex and my other colleague from the northern part of Ontario. Lucknow, Ontario is in my riding. I have to say that at that meeting the farmers were there out of sheer concern. It crossed all political boundaries. I do not believe it was a partisan meeting in any way. They conducted themselves with great, earnest sincerity and I compliment them. I am very proud of the people who were at that meeting that night.

Since that time there have been many meetings held across the country. That was one of the first meetings held. We do recognize the seriousness of the problem. It was well recognized before those meetings, but when we see people gather in a non-partisan way to bring their concerns to all levels of government and all politicians we know how sincere they are.

As you have indicated before, Madam Speaker, it is early in the day. I guess I am the second speaker. I would hope that we are hon. members, ladies and gentlemen in this House of Commons, and that we can conduct ourselves with that same sincerity and feeling that was at that meeting in Lucknow that night. We must drop some of our partisanship feelings and try to reassure the farmers of Canada that we as politicians are working with them. We will do everything we can to support their positions at the GATT talks or in any sector of agriculture, internal, external, international trade, the Uruguay round or whatever it might be.

I ask members of the House of Commons to give this the serious consideration that is necessary for the debate that will take place today. It is early in the day and I think that we can be helpful to one another and give the reassurances that are necessary. I do not think it is the time for political muck raking of any political party, no matter which side of the House it might be on.

I would ask my colleagues on this side of the House to do their part as well in keeping the debate on the high road, for those very reasons.

An hon. member: We always do that.

Mr. Cardiff: I would hope that continues for the day.

As I said before, the motion before the House today asks that the government provide assurances to Canadian producers operating under supply management systems that will seek to strengthen and clarify article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in the current round of multilateral trade negotiations.

Let me assure hon. members that this government stands solidly behind the supply and management industries and is fighting hard to protect the interests of all Canadian agricultural producers. We could expand on that slightly or as much as we wish and have a debate as well on those two particular industries and what we have initiated in the past few years. In about the last three years the two task forces have brought the poultry industries together, the dairy industries together, all sectors, all the stakeholders in both of those two very important industries to Canada.

I believe by bringing all those stakeholders together we will have a much more solid position, a greater understanding by all the stakeholders, including the consumer who is one of the major stakeholders. I believe they have to have input and we have to understand what their concerns and needs are as well.

Our commitment to the supply management sector is strong, as I said before. We stated our position clearly last year at the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva. Canada's offer for agricultural trade reform has not changed. It has not changed.

Canada's offer calls for greater security for supply management through a strengthened and clarified article XI at GATT.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Agriculture, met with Canada's poultry and egg marketing agencies just last week. He reaffirmed the government's position in the GATT negotiations on agriculture. I will just quote what he said: "We are firmly committed to negotiate an agreement which protects our supply management programs and as such we will do everything in our power to obtain a clarified and strengthened GATT article XI".

As recently as yesterday our caucus met with a number of the supply management groups from various parts, mostly Ontario. I hope our colleagues had an opportunity to meet with those people as well and discuss this very important subject.

There can be no doubt of the government's position regarding international trade reform. We have identified the problem and are moving aggressively to secure a successful resolution. In fact, my two colleagues in the agriculture portfolio, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Agriculture, have both been in New York this week representing our farmers' interests.

The Minister of Agriculture met Wednesday with the European community's Commissioner for Agriculture and Rural Development and impressed upon Mr. McSharry Canada's resolve to have the talks ended and brought to a successful conclusion this year.

I was in Madrid last week at international meetings of ministers of agriculture and there were times last week when we had as many as 35 ministers of agriculture at the table taking part in the agriculture issues of the world. All have a desire to see a successful conclusion to this Uruguay round of talks.

In a statement following the meeting, my colleague was quite direct in voicing our position, and I quote: "Canada wants to see an end to the international subsidy war in fruit market access and the development of clear and fair GATT rules that apply to all countries, including the strenghthening and clarification of article XI".

This week the Minister of State for Agriculture is participating in several meetings concerning the GATT negotiations in Europe. His itinerary includes meetings in Geneva with the Director General of GATT. In all meetings my colleagues will stress the importance to Canada of international trade reform. He will stress the need to protect Canada's supply management sector and will detail the devastating effects these subsidy wars have had on Canadian agriculture. I do not think anyone will disagree with what the subsidy wars have done to our economy.

My colleagues who will speak today will talk in more detail about our position on supply management. I also want to take the opportunity to talk about the world trading environment and how it is affecting our farmers.

The international grain export subsidy war has devastated grain prices. Canadian Wheat Board initial payments, which are set in relation to current world markets, are at their lowest level in 15 years. The subsidy wars attacked without mercy an industry which is essential to our Canadian economy.

Canadian farmers are recognized as among the most efficient producers in the world. I do not think it matters what commodity they are producing. They are efficient. They have concern for high quality and I believe the consumers of Canada rest assured when they buy Canadian products that they have the highest quality product, nutritious and wholesome. That is what they expect and that is what they get.

We have done it without using massive subsidies or massive amounts of agricultural chemicals. In a fair trading environment Canada's grains and oilseeds industry would be healthy and competitive. There is nothing fair about what is going on.

This year the Europeans are expected to spend about $4.7 billion Canadian on export subsidies, about twice as much as five years ago. European export subsidies are the highest of any country on wheat and growing fast. Its export subsidies per tonne on wheat have more than quadrupled from $44 a tonne Canadian in July 1989 to $190 Canadian a tonne in February 1991. Already this crop year the European's feed export subsidies are higher than $120 a tonne.

The U.S. is expected to spend about $1.4 billion Canadian on its export enhancement program this year, and that is $1.4 billion more than it was seven years ago. In 1991 total EEC agriculture expenditures were about $42.5 billion Canadian. That is more than Canada's entire $30 billion deficit.

Recently the EEC sold wheat to China at about $85 Canadian a tonne, using subsidies approaching $200 Canadian. A recent wheat sale carried an export enhancement program subsidy of $70 Canadian a tonne. Selling prices have been as low as $75 Canadian a tonne.

A recent United States barley sale to Saudi Arabia carried subsidies of $47 a tonne, with a selling price of $88 a tonne.

These kinds of subsidy levels have pushed grain prices to Canadian farmers to drastically low levels. The agriculture policies of the European Community and the United States have been a brutal assault on Canadian grains and oilseeds producers. Their policies have attacked individual farmers in countries like Canada, Australia and Argentina which depend on the export market.

The export subsidy is also harming the environment. In order to increase yields, a producer in the United Kingdom uses on average three times more nitrogen fertilizer than a farmer on the Canadian prairies. In the Netherlands the rate of nitrogen fertilizer application is 30 times the rate in Canada.

It is time to put pressure on. European environmentalists have succeeded in demonstrating a way of life for our natives, the fur industry and our seal industry. Why are they not concerned about the environment in their own backyard?

The subsidy war is a crime against the developing world. Developing countries trying to compete with similar products are also hurt by low grain prices, and because agriculture is such a large part of a developing country's economy this hurts their entire population.

I was in Madrid last week at international conferences of IICA and IABA. Latin American and Caribbean countries were represented, and we certainly know that they have problems we do not have. We have very severe problems in our agricultural industry but they certainly have more problems. I am very concerned that if we do not get some resolve from the Uruguay round of talks we will see countries go into isolation to protect themselves and try to protect their own market, while they know that they have to have export for the development of their country. Many times in those poorer countries in Latin America and the Caribbean it is the women and the children who are suffering the most in those circumstances. I believe that the various nations of the world have to work together to bring a resolve to this devastating grain war.

One of the best ways to generate wealth internationally is through trade. We know that. The EEC's policies shut borders, restrict competition and deny opportunity. It is hypocritical for the EEC to encourage the new democracies of eastern Europe to develop a market oriented agricultural industry, while at the same time restricting access to the EEC markets.

There has to be an end to the export subsidy war and the solution lies in the GATT. The next few months are critical. There is no question about that. That is why we have to work together and take a solid position.

The options paper put on the table by European Agriculture Commissioner, Mr. McSharry, shows a willingness to start the reform process but it must move further. At least what he is proposing is a start.

This government has a major commitment of resources supporting Canada's negotiating strategy in the Uruguay round. The EEC and the United States have to know what we want, an end to this madness.

My two colleagues are in Europe this week delivering the message, and we will continue to bring our message to the capitals in Europe. We are prepared to take retaliatory action against the EEC as the Minister of Agriculture pointed out to Mr. McSharry just yesterday. He is the agricultural commissioner for the European community. I quote what was said yesterday: "I did not put it forward as a threat. I put it forward as a fact". We will make sure the farmers of these countries hear our concerns too.

I can assure members of this House that this government remains 100 per cent behind its negotiating position at the GATT on behalf of the farmers of Canada. Once again, I ask all colleagues of the House of Commons to work together. Let us keep our position solid. We believe that the position we have taken is fair and balanced and we have not changed that position.

I believe there is support in other parts of the world for the position we are taking. I know that our farmers, producers and consumers are all depending on us getting a resolve to this Uruguay round. I hope that we do have that resolve early in the next year.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was glad to hear the parliamentary secretary's comments today.

The parliamentary secretary has told some of our colleagues here in the House that at the inter-American meeting of ministers of agriculture on September 25, the matter of article XI was not even raised. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could explain why he did not raise the matter, why he did not try to get the support of those several dozen ministers of agriculture to support our position on article XI.

After all, we do not dump massive amounts of dairy or poultry products on the international market. We control our production so that we are not massively interfering in the international trade. I wonder why the parliamentary secretary, who speaks for the government, did not raise the matter at those meetings.

I also would like to ask him if he agrees with the resolution before the House today, that this House supports the strengthening and clarification of article XI in the multilateral trade negotiations which are going on in Geneva and that it will not be party to any agreement that fails to achieve those objectives.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, to my colleague from Algoma, article XI was raised in many bilateral meetings last week with ministers of agriculture in a different format. At all levels of meetings the Uruguay round of GATT talks was very much up front.

When you talk about reform to agricultural policies, we thought that reform meant all aspects of agriculture and that does include article XI of GATT. That is our position.

Our position is well known among all of those countries of the world and not all Latin American-Caribbean countries are at the table at the GATT talks. Last week's meetings were a great opportunity for them to put their positions forward and the problems that they are suffering because of this international war.

Also in respect to the motion, as I said before, our position has not changed. We are solidly behind article XI. We have asked for it to be strengthened and clarified, and that is what we intend to have happen in respect to article XI.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, in his remarks the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture spent some time discussing the world wheat, grains and oilseed trade.

He said something like this, at least this is how I got it as a quote: "In a subsidy-free world Canadian grain and oilseed producers would be healthy and competitive".

Agriculture Canada, through a study by Whorley from the University of Guelph and I think McClatchy from the department looking at what a subsidy-free world would do to international grain prices, did not come up with a terribly optimistic view of what we could expect. I think it was something in the order of 5 per cent or 6 per cent of an increase from current prices.

A couple of economists from the United Kingdom have just completed a study concluding that the most we could expect would be a rise of up to 12 per cent.

Given that the world price is around $2 a bushel Canadian, does he honestly think that Canadian producers will be healthy and competitive at $2.24 or $2.25 a bushel for wheat? This makes no sense and it does not compute with any economic reality. Where does the minister get his dreams?

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I think we all dream at times but this is not a dream. I am a farmer as well and I certainly know—and I think everyone in this House knows it whether they are farmers or not—that a bushel of wheat weighs 60 pounds and at $2.24 I have never seen such a bargain in my lifetime. It is not fair. A farmer cannot survive at $2.24 or $3.00 bushel. We have to be very honest and frank about that.

What we all love to see is the export subsidies discontinued in particular by the two major countries, the United States and the EEC. We believe that if the treasuries were withdrawn from those countries—

Mr. Althouse: The Economist assumed that.

Mr. Cardiff: I am not talking about The Economist. I am talking about my position. I do not believe there is a huge supply of world grains in the world.

I have not interrupted anyone in this comment at all. I believe and it makes common sense that there is no use of trying to find new markets and lowering the price every day you find a new market. Why grow more wheat to sell it for less?

Let us try to work together. Let us get paid for the crops we are growing, whether it be wheat, corn, barley, soyabeans or whatever. We know that there is a market in the world, but let us get some common sense brought back to it.

We can do all the studies we wish and predictions we make, but it takes some reality before anything will happen. I believe the first step is to get some common trade rules that grain producing nations in the world agree to and abide by.

It is not going to be a quick fix. Any of us who have farmed any length of time have lost crops. We have lost major crops and have not been able to produce much more than our domestic requirements. We know that in Canada we do produce for an export market. We have all forgotten the fact that we might lose a crop some year. We could lose a crop in all of Canada. It might not just be eastern Canada or western Canada, but those things have happened before.

I am a positive person. I do not believe in gloom and doom, but we have to face reality and we have all witnessed crop failures throughout the world. None of that has been taken into account by any economist study that I am aware of. There are other elements that often take place that will change those things.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to ask a question through you of the member for Huron—Bruce.

There are many of us from urban ridings who are not as up to speed as those members from rural ridings. I have a great respect for the member for Huron—Bruce who has worked hard for his constituency. I have been with him travelling the world where he has represented all of Canada.

During his speech today he talked about the unfair environmental practices that are going on in the European countries. It would seem to me that it would be a useful exercise if the European community at large understood that its farming communities were doing this unfair environmental farming practice that the member talked about during his speech.

My question to him is quite specific. Has his government, he, his colleagues or the Minister of Agriculture ever considered communicating to European countries at large, whether through newspaper, radio or television, in order to attract more popular European support as to what is happening to the Canadian farmer here, this unfair trading practice advantage? In other words, let us take a page out of the book of Greenpeace when it tried to upset our seal practice in the Arctic. I would like to know what the member's view is on this particular approach.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I have not been privy to any discussion about advertising ads, but maybe that is a good way of making sure our colleagues in other countries are fully aware of what our position is and the devastating effect it is having on our agriculture.

It is a good point and one worth taking note of. I thank the member for that. I am sure that the producers in that part of the world are as concerned and as aware of their future environmentally as we are in this country or in any other part of the world.

It is my understanding that laws are being passed by the European communities that by the year 2000 considerable reduction by almost 50 per cent in the use of pesticides and chemicals has to take place. That normal reduction of pesticides and chemicals will ultimately result in lower production.

We have concentrated livestock operations in some of those smaller countries, extremely concentrated. Before you can spread the waste from those huge animal locations, pigs or dairy or whatever, you have to have a permit. You have to test the soil and you have to have a permit before you can spread that waste on that soil.

A friend of mine visited Holland earlier this year. He got permission one day to spread that liquid waste. They went away to visit and go on a tour. Another farmer knew it was okay to spread in that field, so he spread his liquid waste on the field while my friend was gone. That is the situation some European farmers are facing.

I do not want to leave the impression that European farmers are having it easy. They have their difficulties as well and are going to have to respond to environmental concerns as much as we are or maybe more.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate today which gravitates around the Canadian position in the GATT with regard to the supply managed industries and the question of whether article XI 2(c)(1) becomes strengthened in the new GATT negotiations.

I think the question of marketing boards and supply management is not fully understood even in Canada. We have a reality that exists in the production and distribution of agricultural products that has to a certain extent been recognized by producers in their decisions to establish marketing boards and the type of marketing board that will be put into place.

As a general rule, you will recognize that there are perishable products in agriculture which generally can be stored for a few days or a few weeks, certainly not more than a year, and there are other agricultural products that are almost non-perishable, like most of the grains and oilseeds that can be dried and stored almost indefinitely. Some kinds of wheat have been found in Egyptian tombs that were 5,000 and 6,000 years old and still would germinate.

The strategy that has been pursued by farmers and governments over the years has been somewhat different for each type of product. Marketing boards were established during the 1930s, based upon practices that were utilized and developed in New Zealand and Australia. The first marketing board was established to permit producers to co-operate and sell all of their products through a single seller, single desk selling as it is now referred to. This method is used by the Canadian Wheat Board. A whole host of products utilize the single desk selling technique at the provincial and national level.

An additional wrinkle occurred when marketing boards began to see that there were some problems in some of the more perishable products if there was no power to control supply. The first supply management board was established under the Canadian Dairy Commission by a special act of Parliament which gave the Canadian Dairy Commission the power to restrict the amount of production of dairy products to the amount that would be consumed in a year in Canada.

They have not been strictly hide bound about this. They have always permitted a little bit of product to come in from outside. This is to keep the wheels of world trade going, and the system has worked.

Using that as a basis, some of the so-called featherboards were established on a national basis. They got the power from this Parliament to establish national agencies which could control supply. The Canadian Egg Marketing Agency was established as well as the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency and the Canadian Hatching Egg Agency.

This Parliament also granted power to tobacco people to form such an agency, but that has not come about. I would prefer that Parliament make the establishment of these kind of agencies an automatic thing at the behest of the producers so that the law itself was wide open because awaiting approval from this House often kills an initiative. That is what happened with the tobacco initiative a few years ago.

At any rate, we have established this system that works in this country. We permit imports under licence. Imports are controlled by the Government of Canada in all cases. For a while the Canadian Wheat Board could control imports but that is slipping away now that we have had the Canada-U.S. trade agreement.

Under the board system we are much more liberal in our trading policies than our neighbour to the south, the United States. It does not permit any imports of dairy products. It does not permit any imports of sugar products. It does not permit any imports of peanuts.

It has a GATT waiver which it negotiated a long time ago in the early stages of GATT, and it will not give up those rights except under certain conditions. I think there were a few tiny little cracks opened up for some baked goods as a result of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement.

It controls those products very thoroughly. As an example to show how ridiculous it has become, the U.S. moved under GATT to get access to the Canadian market for U.S. ice creams and yoghurts. We resisted that as is our right under the GATT, but had we acceded we would have been in the ridiculous situation of permitting U.S. yoghurts and ice creams to come into the country.

If I or one of my neighbours wanted to take a trip into the United States for a tour of one of its parks and perhaps wanted to take a trailer or a motor home with us and happened to have in the refrigerator U.S. made yoghurt or ice cream and were inspected at the border, we would not be permitted to take those into the United States even though they were made there. That is the way the rules are at the moment.

The question of article XI 2(c)(i) has become a cause célèbre among those producers of products that are produced in Canada under supply management. It is a very large proportion of the production in some of the provinces, particularly in Atlantic Canada, Quebec and in parts of Ontario.

Also, it is very important in British Columbia and the prairies. A big chunk of our industry is being bargained with at the GATT table. These producers are feeling very uncertain about what the negotiators are doing to them in Brussels or Geneva.

They are getting conflicting signals from this government and from some of the people who are supposed to be engaged in the negotiations. We are being told, as we were by the parliamentary secretary today, that the government stands four square behind a strengthened article XI 2(c)(i).

On the other hand, we listen to the hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds who has been on a violent anti-European rage for the last six months. He has been addressing farm meetings telling them "Don't buy European. If you are unhappy with the way agricultural policy is going, dump your wheat on the parking lot of a European auto dealer or a dealer of farm implements that has European content. Don't come to me. Blame it on the Europeans. Boycott the Europeans. Don't buy any of their goods".

The reality is that prior to this rant by the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds we were depending upon the European community and the Nordic group to be our allies in pushing the strengthened article XI at the GATT. We did not have very many other allies strong enough actually to make certain that we would get a strengthened article XI. They read the newspapers. They have embassies in our country. They know what the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds is telling people across the country. They begin to think that maybe this is the policy of the Canadian government.

We get rumours back from the GATT negotiators that Canada is beginning to be pushed into a situation where the only real ally it has for article XI is Japan. We should realize that the Japanese are very passive negotiators in these sorts of things. They do not stand up and take strong positions. They simply stand there knowing that they have a very strong fortress, Japan. They have a very strong economy. They are very strong traders, and they do not think they are going to have to give up anything. If article XI is not strengthened, they are big enough players on the world stage that they can go on internally getting the same results for their producers as a stronger article XI would have produced, and the rest of the world can just go by or lump it.

It is not a very strong position that we are left in, thanks to the duality that we have seen portrayed by members on the government side.

I confess to Europeans and to Americans that our position perhaps seems a little schizophrenic. When it comes to grain trade on non-perishable products we are right in there saying that we want open borders, we want access, and we do not want international subsidies used and export subsidies used. When we are looking at perishable products, Canadians have always taken the position that we should produce enough to provide for our own market.

Some of the Americans are telling us that this is a two-tongued or a forked-tongue approach and it is a schizophrenic approach. Perhaps it is but it is also extremely rational when you think about what food production is all about. It is absolutely necessary to be able to produce those perishable goods that you need when you live in a country like Canada. We are not in the middle of all of the world's trading routes. We are a huge peninsula, I suppose, on the northern end of the Americas. We only have one country that we can trade with easily, and that is the United States. We are a northern community, isolated by long distances by three oceans, one of which is barely passable most of the time. We are isolated.

Our companions at the bargaining table at the GATT do not have that problem. The big powers have other choices.

The United States of America can trade to the south. It can trade to the north. It has a choice. It has a multitude of choices. We have only one choice.

The Europeans are sitting in a position where they can trade with the Nordic group, they can trade with the east bloc and the Soviet Union. They can trade with the African countries. They have lots of choices. They are all right on their doorstep and are all consumers who are well-educated consumers and they know the products that they have. They do not have to introduce the products and sell them, because they have a commonality of interests and the commonality of demands.

The Europeans are not terribly interested in getting a GATT result because their economy will go on very well, thank you very much, whether there is a GATT solution or there is not a GATT solution.

The Japanese are in a very similar position in their niche in southeast Asia, a huge market which they know how to penetrate and they have been penetrating for most of this century, actually.

Canada has been trading a little bit with everybody. We are a very large trader. We are dependent on world trade, so our seat at the table is extremely important in the GATT talks. But when we come to resolving the agricultural issues, we are not making it terribly clear or accepting the reality of why countries have agriculture in the first place.

I think we should be going to those talks, recognizing the reality that countries' first imperative is to try to feed themselves and to accept that that is a legitimate kind of trading and economic proposal. It is an economic proposition that has to be accepted. That would permit the production of perishable products within your own country, close to the demand that exists within your own country. That is what Canada had traditionally been saying. Even the United States has been acting on that, though it is not saying that in this round. The Europeans have definitely been acting upon that, as have the Japanese, who have become self-sufficient in the production of rice, even though they have a very small acreage. That is their key food input and they are self-sufficient in rice. They could, if they had to, live on rice and the results of their harvesting of the seed.

It is a natural thing for human beings in nation states to want to be able to feed themselves. The proposals that the United States has put on the table, and which has now become the dominant theme at the GATT, does not pay any attention to that reality.

Canada has, as often as not, taken the position of the United States, with the exception of Article X1 and because the article X1 argument has been shifted, or is in dire consequence of being shifted aside due to the reasons I outlined before, namely, that we have made ourselves less popular with the Europeans who should have been our allies and the Nordic group, we are now being isolated along with the Japanese and in consequence are probably going to lose it unless we very strongly start changing our public position.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister pointed out that he thought that people made their decisions about whom to hire and in whom to put their trust by asking the question: "Don't tell us what you can do, tell us what you have done." I think that is what is beginning to be reflected in the rallies that we are seeing in Miami, Manitoba, Brandon, Manitoba, Lucknow, Ontario and most recently in Rosetown, Saskatchewan.

They are starting to say: "We have had these guys for seven years. They have not listened to what we have been asking; they have not done what we have asked; we are rallying to point out that the government has not reacted to the actual situation". The reality for people on the land is that world prices and their incomes have never been lower in purchasing power. In the history of this country since statistics were kept, the price of a bushel of wheat has never been lower in terms of real buying power.

Those commodities that are traded because they are considered non-perishable on a world market have never traded lower. The solutions that this government is offering is do away with all of the subsidies, do away with the export subsidies, do away with the internal subsidies and to rely solely on a world price.

Those were the assumptions that the two economic studies, that I referred to in my question earlier, used when they analysed what would be the result of going to that kind of a world. They looked at the kind of world supply-demand structure that most of the world experts foresee. They concluded that there would be very little increase in price at the farm level, that that increase could be expected to be up to 12 per cent.

Farmers who are selling their grain this year, with wheat at $2, are not encouraged to know that they can look forward to the great day when we get to the dream of this government when they can get $2.25. Their costs are more than double that. They do not see this as the great saviour and they no longer see this government and its party as the great saviour. They no longer see the Conservative Party as the party that shares their dream for the future of agriculture and the future of their rural communities. They no longer support the government's policies and they are beginning to tell it so. They are giving it a chance to correct its ways and mend its ways, but there is not very much time.

The GATT positions will be laid down clearly. We will find out within two months whether Canada is going to join the United States and bring the Europeans along into tariffication of all of the border measures that are now in effect under article XI or whether they will in fact stand up and try to find some allies and correct the mistakes of the past six months and get us a stronger article XI(2)(c)(1) as has been proposed by the people who are producing in Canada under the supply management system.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I listened intently to the hon. member and was inspired to rise to my feet in particular reference to a statement that he made dealing with some of the statements that are being made by farmers at some of these major farm gatherings, sometimes referred to as protests.

As one who had the pleasure of being in the company of all Conservative members of Parliament from Saskatchewan at the Rosetown so-called protest, what I sensed that I heard was a protest against the price of grain. While yes admittedly there was the odd comment cast toward government, the majority of the comments were from a completely rational, fair and honest crowd who recognized that the problem was not this government inspired, but it was perhaps inspired by other governments, not the least of which was the European Economic Community and the United States.

I think you have heard over the past many members of the House of Commons in staunch criticism of the export enhancement procedures employed by both the European Economic Community and as well the United States.

I wanted to rise just to point out that there is another side to what one is capable of hearing at these events and to place on the record the fact that farmers, while despondent almost to the point of desperation realize where the problem is. They realize there will have to be some changes in agriculture in the future as well.

These changes include, as it has included everything in our lives, everything in the way in which we currently farm. Gone is the day when a producer can simply reply on a product that that particular farm has grown for 50 to 60 years. We find diversification becoming more and more the method of operation for farmers. However, we realize there are limitations in that regard as well. In reading about some of the problems that the European Economic Community is going through, 150,000 French farmers demonstrated, protested, saying: "Leave well enough alone. We rely on these export enchancements". That is the problem of the European Economic Community. Our problem, as we see it now, is one that we recognize, where the cash flow going to farmers, which in turn goes to support the small business sector, is one that we have to rely on.

I simply want to ask the hon. member, is my recall of events that occurred in Rosetown any different than what he heard?

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, yes, perhaps we do have selected hearing. I did not hear anyone in that crowd at Rosetown say that they were awaiting changes in agriculture, that they were unable to make changes or refusing to make changes. Farmers are very quick to adapt new techniques and to make changes in products.

I will go back to my notes to make certain this is right. I heard one person who stood up, and it was reiterated by several others, say: "The purpose of this meeting is not to damn the Europeans. What we would like is a similar commitment from our government".

Another person stood up and said: "We have been hearing a lot of talk about the problems that the Europeans are creating for us in world grain and oilseed trade. But let us not forget"—and they were reasonable people, I remind the hon. member—"the Europeans, after all, only sell into about 20 per cent of the world market. Between Canada and the U.S., we control almost two thirds of the market". If we wanted to do something about a price, all it would take is the political will to get together with them and offer products at a higher price, or stay off the market for the first month and a half until the Europeans have run out and then run the price up.

We have not had this kind of initiative. What we have had instead is a deliberate policy from south of the border, agreed to here, that the U.S. loan rate will continually go down and effectively becomes the world market price, because any grain trader can go to the U.S. Department of Agriculture and get his supplies, knowing it will be available at that loan rate.

That has overhung the market for the last six years since the new program went into effect. It was an intent expressed quite clearly by a former Secretary of Agriculture on the part of the United States to dominate the world grain trade and to engage in international warfare and use, in his words, food as a weapon. They have been very effective at that. We have not stood up to them. We have not done anything on a government to government basis.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, just one brief comment. I too was at Rosetown. I think the one comment I heard rattling through the 4,000 people who were there was that when some of the politicians got up and tried to take advantage and turn it into a political thing, the murmurings came: "Keep politics out of it".

Truly, the farmers were there to try and show government, everybody involved, to Canada—you do not get 4,000 people together that often—that they have some very, very serious problems.

We as a government are listening. We have stood with them and we will continue to stand with them. The time has come when it is important that we make food a priority, that food becomes the number one right.

It is interesting that on the one hand there are surpluses and on the other hand there is a starving world. In defence of the government I am a part of, especially in the west or for Canada, I see two options. There is the NDP option which brings in a land bank and takes over the farm, which eastern Europe threw out. They threw that system out. It did not work. There were food lines. Seventy-five years of communist socialism proved to eastern Europe what they can do. Today they are coming to Canada and asking for food, and we are going to deliver it.

Number two on the other side is that I think we are in a critical situation. What does the Reform Party say? The Reformers say that all farmers should be cut 15 per cent right across the board. We could not live with that. My goodness, I am a farmer myself. I have three sons farming and I will tell you that it is difficult. This Conservative government put $22 billion into agriculture and even with all that assistance I say it is not enough. It is difficult, but we have been the government that has stood with the farmers.

I guess farmers have to ask themselves if they want radical approaches or one that recognizes the problems that exist. We are listening as a government. We understand. It is well time that international leaders at all levels make food a priority. Certainly it is a human right. If there is one right, one human right that people have, it is the right to eat. We as farmers do not apologize to anybody for being productive, for being hard working and for having produced food. Canadians buy food cheaper than any other people.

I stand with these farmers here today and the farmers across this country and say that we will produce food but we need a fair price.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister should be reminded that in addition to the items that were said at Rosetown to which I responded to my friend from Regina, we heard a persistent cry for a need for $30 per acre to bring farm revenue up to where the GRIP would have taken them in the 1991 crop year that was completed last August.

The parliamentary secretary makes a plea for not going to radical solutions. I think he has not studied history very well. His government is proposing to go along with the United States and to do away with any support by governments to food production and agriculture. That is a radical solution. It has never been used in the history of the world. It is a new and radical solution. When you look at it clearly and calmly as even right wing economists do, they conclude that the results will not be particularly useful to farmers.

We have had in the last eight years in Saskatchewan more than two farmers per day leaving the province under this so-called benevolent program we have been living under. What they are proposing is to move to a program that would do away with all government interference which, I repeat, has never been the policy of any national state or community in the history of civilization.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we are resuming debate I understand that the hon. member for Algoma will be sharing time with one of his colleagues. The hon. member for Algoma has the floor.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I simply want to be closely associated with the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex who has proposed the motion as our associate trade critic today concerning the support of the Government of Canada, Canadians and this House of Commons for the retention, strengthening and the maintenance of article XI in the GATT negotiations which are taking place in Geneva this fall.

It goes on to say in this motion that the government will not be party to any agreement that fails to achieve these objectives. I believe this is one of the most important debates that we will have this fall. It is unfortunate there are not more members in the House today for this debate because of the magnitude of it. It is so terribly important. One of the basic underpinnings of a successful, rewarding and viable sector of our agriculture is the supply management sector. Those poultry and dairy sectors of our economy are the most stable and the most self-reliant in our industry. The fate of them will be decided over the next few weeks in the GATT negotiations.

I want to call attention to the spectators in the gallery this morning from the Dairy Farmers of Canada, the Canadian Marketing Agency, CMA, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency and the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency including a group, I understand, from Quebec. It is these producers in the gallery today whose very livelihood, whose job, whose income, whose very ability to make a living is at question in these GATT negotiations. We welcome them to the gallery today for this historic debate.

It is an historic debate because at this very moment the whole grains and oilseeds sector is also completely undermined because the government has reduced its support programs by $1.3 billion last year. It has failed to provide transitional assistance to the new stabilization program last spring. I do not think there has ever been a time in our history when there has been so much uncertainty in the supply and management sector. Historically it has been the most stable and well underpinned. At the same time that uncertainty is combined with just a desperate uncertainty and cash flow crisis for the grains and oilseeds.

I was especially struck by the response of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture today. When he attended the meeting in Madrid of agriculture ministers from across the western hemisphere, he commented to our colleagues here in the House that the matter of the GATT was never even raised. It is unbelievable to me, knowing the incredible uncertainty in the farming sector this year, that he did not raise it. I mean, where else would he have the opportunity to twist the arms of so many influential people, the ministers of agriculture from the western hemisphere, to try to say to them: "Look, article XI is important to us. We are not destroying the world trade with surplus, low quality, low priced stuff. We are restraining our production. We are having a viable industry. Why did he not do it? That is the kind of thing that has our spectators in the gallery very concerned".

It is in the communiqué. The communiqué says: "Oh, yes, we want stable agriculture and good relations in the GATT negotiations and all the rest". But he did not raise it. He did not seek their support. If you look closely at his answer, he did not answer.

On the same topic I asked him if it is the policy of the Government of Canada to say yes to our resolution this morning. The resolution simply says that we want the Government of Canada to strengthen and clarify article XI of the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade in the ongoing multilateral trade negotiations and that it will not be party to any agreement that fails to achieve these objectives. Surely the parliamentary secretary, who speaks on behalf of the government in the House of Commons and on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, should have said: "Yes, we agree with that motion. We will not be party to an agreement which fails to achieve these objectives".

That is the same kind of slippery answer that we have had from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the Deputy Prime Minister. They say: "Our position is to support article XI but if there is any change we will let you know". That simply is not good enough. That is almost exactly what the Minister of Agriculture said in response to a question from the hon. member from Haldimand—Norfolk here last week when he said: "Our position is to support article XI until we change it".

That simply is not good enough. This debate today and the whole question of the GATT negotiations is obviously very important to dairy producers, poultry producers, broiler producers, turkey producers and egg producers. There are about 40,000 of them but they employ another 40,000 or 50,000 people, perhaps another 100,000 people in those operations across the country.

They are the most stable, well organized producers in the country and they are self-reliant. They are not lined up at the door of the Parliament Buildings every fall demanding stabilization payments. They may be this fall, but they have not been in the past. If we let them down, you are going to see an exodus in rural Canada, especially Ontario, Quebec, Atlantic Canada, B.C. and many communities across the west including the prairies although they are not as dependent on the supply management sector. But certainly they are the most stable producers in that sector of the country.

We are going to see a withering of rural Canada. If we go the route of the United States—and often we think on this side of the House that is the ultimate plan of the Prime Minister—we will see these industries concentrated like they are in the United States where most of the eggs are produced in Georgia, Alabama and other southern states. You can go to states like Maine, which has roughly the same land mass as New Brunswick, and you will not see many eggs or dairy products produced there.

If we want to talk about regional development, supply management and these sectors have provided the greatest initiative for supply management that we see in this country.

This is a very important debate today. I am not getting your signals very clearly, Madam Speaker, as to just how much time I have.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do apologize. I wanted to let the hon. member know that there was one minute left. At the same time in answer to his colleague who asked me if there would be questions or comments afterward, I said "Yes, five minutes", which is why my signal was five. I do apologize. I will allow the hon. member to conclude.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I was just getting my throat cleared for the debate. I am sorry to learn there is only one minute left. I simply want to say to the government this morning that it is impossible to describe how important this issue is. We and the producers feel that we were sold out on the processing side of supply management commodities in the free trade deal. We do not want the government to do the same thing in the negotiations with GATT. We want the government to stand up and fight for our Canadian position, article XI, whether it is maintained as a stand alone mechanism beside the tariffication of the United States or whether it is retained as the mechanism for controlling.

It is impossible to overemphasize the importance of this to the stability of these producers and to the stability of rural Canada. It is the government's responsibility, with all its lack of qualities and ability to do this, to go into those negotiations, to persuade the Europeans to support our position, and to ensure that article XI is maintained, supply management is maintained, and rural Canada is maintained.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in a comment directed to the hon. member, I understand that the member was indicating that I had not raised the question concerning article XI. I just want to make it very clear to the member that in all the meetings I held last week in Madrid, Spain that issue was raised.

I want to be very clear in this House that I did raise the importance of our supply management sector and article XI in particular at all the meetings that I attended last week, just so there is no misunderstanding.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, if that is true, I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could also explain the position of the Minister of Agriculture.

He is reported today to be planning to take retaliatory action against the European community for its subsidization of grain, oilseeds and so on on the world market.

I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could explain why no action is being taken against the United States. After all, we do have a free trade agreement with it. There are mechanisms for raising disputes.

Clearly it has used the Export Enhancement Program which has $1.4 billion against our imports of grains and oilseeds not only stealing away or invading our traditional markets but driving down world prices. I am wondering why the strategy is to only take retaliatory action against the European community.

I would also like to ask the parliamentary secretary if it is the position of the government—after all, he speaks for the Minister of Agriculture when he is in the House of Commons—that the final portion of the resolution this morning before the House is that we will not only seek to support, clarify and strengthen article XI but that we will not be party to any agreement that fails to achieve these objectives of the resolution this morning.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I do not know whether it is appropriate. I did not give the last speech, but I would certainly be very happy to reply to the hon. member on retaliatory action against the United States.

The minister has very recently indicated his position in talking about retaliatory action in the European community, but we have also made very clear what our position is concerning the United States in its export enhancement programs.

I do not want him to feel that we have only targeted one country and not another, because that is not the case.

As far as the motion goes, it is a motion I believe would be supportable. I think our position in this House and as a government is very supportive of maintaining article XI and the future of supply management. I do not understand why it is even in question.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, it was in the question. I put the question to the parliamentary secretary after he spoke because that is the key issue.

The negotiator for the Canadian agriculture section has made it clear that the government certainly raised the concerns among dairy and poultry producers that Canada may be in a position where it is going to have to give up article XI.

What we are trying to say in this motion is that the House of Commons is instructing, asking, directing or requesting strongly to the government that article XI be clarified and strengthened and that we not be party to an agreement in which we are going to give it up, because we believe that the tariffication proposal of the United States will simply ravage our supply management system.

I think that is why we want to know whether the government's policy is to not be party to any agreement that weakens or does away with article XI.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have just a short comment. I am pleased that the hon. member is concerned about the fact that there is representation at the table.

I want to defend clearly on behalf of the government that our Prime Minister has been there, the Minister for International Trade has been there and the Minister of Agriculture is there right now.

Especially being a farmer from western Canada, to have spokesman at the table is important. If you put in these splinter parties that do not represent anyone, they never get to the table. The Liberals should take a good look at that situation.

There was no representation in western Canada. What happens if the Reform Party gets in there? Who does it represent? It is not at the table. The NDP is not at the table. We are at the table and we have done a good job of representing these farmers. We will continue to do that.

It was the Prime Minister of Canada—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. The time has expired. I will allow a few seconds to the member for Algoma if he wishes to respond.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I think there is a great paranoia by the hon. member about the Reform Party. We are not arguing about whether the government is at the table or, as he said in his previous speech, if the government is listening.

What we are worried about is what it is going to do. We know what it did in the FTA and we just do not want it to do the same thing in the GATT negotiations. That is our concern. It is not whether it is listening, it is what it does.

In the cash crisis it has not done anything. On the GATT we are concerned that it is going to give it away. That is what we are concerned about.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, Canadian agriculture is in a state of crisis. The price of soy beans and wheat is 35 per cent below last year's level and 45 per cent below the fifteen–year average. In fact, losses in the province of Ontario total about $200 million this year. And now, supply management is threatened.

[English]

For the government to tell us that article XI of the GATT will not change until the government says it will change is hardly reassurance to the dairy farmers of Canada and the other producers of supply managed goods.

Let us remember that this is the same government that said that it was going to protect Canadian dairy farmers in the issue of ice cream and yoghurt in the free trade agreement. Look what happened there.

An hon. member: It sold us out.

Mr. Boudria: That is right. It sold us out.

Madam Speaker, the government has sent some alarming signals during the past few days. I have before me a document published under the title: "Canadian Federalism and Economic Union—Partnership for Prosperity", a document tabled in the House last week by this government. I would like to quote a few passages from page 19. Here, we see a list under the title: "Costs of Barriers". The following items are listed: agricultural supply marketing boards that regulate the production and prices of various food products including milk, poultry and eggs.

In its own document, the government refers to these measures as impediments to trade in Canada. How can the government tell us today that it wants to protect supply management, when in its own document tabled last week, it called the concept a nuisance?

[English]

I am worried. The dairy farmers, the poultry producers, the egg producers and others I represent in this House are worried as well. Dairy farming in Canada is a very important industry.

Let me give you a few facts. The electoral district of Perth—Wellington—Waterloo has 1,299 dairy producers. The one I represent, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, comes second with 1,104 dairy producers. So you see how important this is for my riding! Lotbinière, 1,089 dairy producers; Beauce, 990 and Bellechasse, 969. These are the five electoral districts in this country with the largest number of dairy producers, mine ranking second.

• (1210)

Madam Speaker, Quebec produces 47.4 per cent of Canada's dairy products and Ontario 31.1 per cent. So you see, this is a very important issue for both provinces, since 77.5 per cent of dairy production is carried on in those provinces, and 75 per cent of dairy producers are in the two provinces I just mentioned.

[English]

We are not talking here about a small issue. We are not talking about a major issue. We are talking about something which is fundamental for the survival of that industry, not only in our country, not only in the province I represent, but even more so for my constituents.

Dairy farmers of Canada produced a document for us and made it available to members of Parliament. It is entitled Update on GATT Negotiations, October 1991. They are very concerned about the all too prevalent rumours going on right now in the public domain. They are more than rumours and there is a reason for them. It is that the supply management system we have could be exchanged for other considerations at the GATT and, in turn, we would get a so-called tariffication system.

[Translation]

And if we had that system, Madam Speaker, Canadian farm producers would lose 20 per cent of their income right from the start, assuming that the system would work and would be in place permanently. I say this because it is quite possible that this government—although its chances of being around for much longer are not that good—might subsequently try to reduce the protective tariffs they introduced. Then, of course, any remaining tariffs would gradually disappear, thanks to free trade. Canadian farmers and dairy producers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere, would be left with nothing to protect them, and we would see a repeat of what we saw in the United States: a gradual concentration of dairy production and the production of many other farm products.

[English]

To those who say: "Well, that is free enterprise", I say: "Nonsense". There is nothing free about countries battling each other with subsidies. I have no doubt that the dairy producer in my riding is as efficient as the one in New York State. That is not the issue. Why should a dairy producer in Glengarry, in Prescott or in Russell, compete with the Treasury of the United States of America? That is the issue, the long term issue, were we to lose our supply managed system.

Milk prices to farmers could decrease by some 20 per cent under the tariffication system. That could very well happen if the government lets go of our supply management system. Furthermore, this pro-free trade government could then lower the tariffs, and remove them completely over time. Canadian dairy, poultry and egg farmers need the protection of existing systems, supply management. We need to preserve that supply management.

The issue is not whether the Reform Party would do worse than the Conservatives. We are not competing for who can do worse. We already know what we have across the way is bad enough. Heaven forbid that we could get worse than this.

We want to make things better and at least keep what farmers have now, our supply management system.

Madam Speaker, the voters I represent in this House want to keep their supply management system. What we need is a government committed to maintaining and improving that system. I say to the parliamentary secretary that our experience of the past few years has shown us what the government's commitment or so-called commitment is worth. We saw it in the Canada-U.S. talks, and we saw it in the ice cream and yogurt dispute.

I remember a political debate in Saint-Isidore de Prescott, in my riding, where the Tory candidate sitting next to me, who incidentally received a whopping 19 per cent of the votes, tried to convince my constituents that ice cream and yogurt would be protected under the Free Trade Agreement. The farmers in my riding didn't believe him, and they were right not to, simply because it didn't happen.

In the past, I have seen how we lost out under this agreement, and my constituents and I are afraid of what might happen now at GATT. I have confidence in the farmers in my riding and across Canada, but I certainly do not trust the government opposite to protect their rights. And members opposite will have to prove they mean what they say, because in the past, they have given the impression they want to terminate our supply management system.

Today, we will see whether the government opposite votes in favour of the motion.

[English]

That is what we need. We need to arm our negotiators with a clear resolution of this House, that we want to keep, retain, enhance and improve our supply management system for our country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I want to thank my colleague from Glengarry-Prescott—Russell. Last year I had the privilege of visiting Moscow and Riga, Latvia. When I was there I noticed that every morning on my way to this environmental symposium that I was attending that people would start lining up at the grocery stores at about seven o'clock, sometimes even earlier than seven o'clock, hopefully to get in there and hopefully get a little bit of bread or cheese. Very rarely did I see milk. Sometimes the meat that was there, I must confess I don't think we would have used that quality of beef on our pets here in this country. It was the most shaking experience that I ever had when I was in Moscow for that period.

We have heard a lot today about supply management and we are addressing our remarks primarily to the farming community. As an urban member of Parliament I would like to ask my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell what effect this is going to have on security of food supply and also prices for people in our major urban centres. We need our urban community, the people in downtown Toronto and downtown Montreal, to understand what this debate is all about today. With respect to all rural members, I wish when you address your remarks today that you could put in your speeches what effect this is going to have on the consumers.

With all due respect to the farming community—and I care and I understand from my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex who has done this fabulous document on Compare the Share—we need to communicate, not to the 300,000 farmers in this country who are suffering and who are in deep pain, but with the 25 million other consumers who are out there.

Madam Speaker, through you to my colleague, what effect will this have on my constituents who are not farmers?

Mr. Boudria: First of all, I want to congratulate and thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. It is important for all members, whether they be rural members like myself or urban members, to be interested in agriculture.

Every time we have a debate on agriculture in this House, some urban members are very, very interested, and the member for Broadview—Greenwood among the most interested, if not the most of all urban members, and I congratulate him for that. Of course, the people on the farms produce the food and the people in the city eat the food, and they have to remember that. The member for Broadview—Greenwood knows that.

• (1220)

In terms of the remarks of the hon. member for Souris—Moose Mountain who qualified me as an urban member, the village of Sarsfield where I live has 230 people living in it. That is urban Canada, Madam Speaker.

I was raised on a farm and I now live in that village of 230 people, that vast metropolis of Sarsfield.

What the member for Broadview—Greenwood said is very important. We have in Canada the highest quality of food in the world. We have a very reliable supply. When did we ever hear we had run out of milk in this country? We do not. We do not run out of supply managed commodities. The system is reliable, has worked for decades, is stable, and provides a reliable, though not fantastic, source of income for our producers.

Speaking of what this does for the producer, some people—and I hate to name the Consumers' Association of Canada, but I will anyway—say that supply management is costly.

I beg to differ with those people whom I hate to mention, the Consumers' Association of Canada, but I will do it anyway. They are wrong and they often are.

Let me tell you for instance that in 1980 the income going to farmers for a litre of milk at that time was 38 cents and it has jumped to the huge amount of 57 cents over 10 years.

But do you want to know something, Madam Speaker? The price to the consumer has gone from 75 cents to $1.48. In other words, it is not the farmer whose income is increasing. It is those elsewhere in the chain who distribute and sell the food to consumers. That is why the price is skyrocketing but the farmer is not getting his or her fair share.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of International Trade, has the floor.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Madam Speaker, since it came into power, the government has shown unwavering support of supply management. We believe it has been and should continue to remain a crucial element in Canada's agricultural policy. In this regard, we have been working with the provinces and the industry to ensure that supply management remains an up-to-date viable policy tool.

Thus, in the domestic agricultural policy review, we and the other stake holders in the supply management systems have been working hard to develop "second generation" supply management. We all recognize that supply management is a dynamic concept which has to adjust to changes in the market place if it is to continue to serve producers, processors and consumers into the twenty first century.

Since 1947, the GATT has recognized that if governments effectively control supply, there should be a corresponding discipline on imports. Article XI,2(c)(1) of the GATT thus provides the international authority to apply import quotas in support of effective supply control systems.

Unfortunately, a number of recent GATT panels have recognized that the current GATT rules require clarification. In particular, there is a pressing need to clarify which processed products can be placed under import control. In the case of the dairy sector, milk is under production control, but it is dairy products which are traded internationally.

Madam Speaker, the industry, the provinces and the federal government have thus agreed that a key Canadian negotiating objective in the multilateral trade negotiations is the strengthening and clarification of article XI. We have pursued this objective vigorously throughout the negotiations and will continue to do so.

As you are aware, Madam Speaker, Canada's negotiating position on agriculture has been developed in close cooperation with the provinces and all segments of the industry. It represents a truly national consensus that all segments of Canadian agriculture stand to benefit from an international trading system which is based on effective rules which are equally applicable to all countries and all commodities.

All segments of the industry recognize that trade barriers and trade distorting subsidies must be progressively reduced. Madam Speaker, it is crystal clear that the current distortions and uncertainties in agricultural trade are just as disruptive to a Canadian dairy farmer as to a Canadian grain producer. The status quo is not acceptable to either.

Our export commodities need improved access to markets and a substantial reduction in all forms of trade distorting subsidies. Our supply management sectors need to know with certainty what the international rules are, so they can operate their systems accordingly. All of these interests are reflected in a balanced way in the Canadian agricultural negotiating position in the Uruguay round.

Madam Speaker, as you are aware, the negotiations in Geneva are now entering a critical phase. Since the ministerial meeting in Brussels last December, to which I had the honour to participate, there has been an impasse on agriculture. Among the differences is the question of the future role of article XI. Madam Speaker, Canada has led the fight to strengthen and clarify article XI. However, there are other countries who wish to see article XI eliminated or, if this is not possible, to maintain the status quo.

As the chairman of the agricultural negotiating group has recently noted, there continues to be fundamental differences between participants on article XI, as there are on a number of other agricultural issues. Canada is leaving no stone unturned to maintain and expand support for continuation and clarification of article XI. Most if not all countries which support article XI have indicated they believe the detailed Canadian proposals do provide a reasonable basis for negotiation.

Madam Speaker, as recently as yesterday, my colleague the Minister of Agriculture was in Brussels where he forcefully presented Canada's views and sought support. The Agricultural Minister, Bill McKnight, issued a press release dated October 2nd, that is yesterday, following his meeting with Mr. Ray MacSharry, the European Community commissioner for agriculture. The communiqué says: «During that two hour meeting, Mr. McKnight insisted on the importance of winding up the multilateral trade negotiations as soon as possible, and he emphasized Canada's objectives in the context of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the GATT".

Madam Speaker, the communiqué also says: "Our position is very clear. Canada wants an end to the international subsidy war, the improvement of the market place and the adoption, in the context of the GATT, of rules that are clear and fair, including the strengthening and clarification of article XI." Mr. McKnight insisted on the very serious problems of the grain and oilseed producers. Those problems are direct consequences of harmful subsidies granted by the European Community and the United States. Mr. McKnight drew to Mr. MacSharry's attention the fact that the multilateral trade negotiations should come to an end as early as this year. He was very insistent on that point, saying that: "If this is not the case, the Canadian government will take whatever action is needed to correct the situation".

Madam Speaker, Mr. MacSharry, the European Community commissioner for agriculture, indicated he shares Canada's goals on article XI and that the European Community would continue to argue that article XI should be maintained and clarified.

Madam Speaker, although we are heartened that there is considerable support for the main thrust of our article XI proposal, we are equally aware that there is very strong opposition. There are a number of key issues which must be addressed if the agricultural negotiations are to be brought to a successful conclusion. One key market access issue is whether all non-tariff barriers should be converted to tariff equivalents. Another difficult issue is whether there should be some special agricultural safeguard which would be triggered if countries agree to tariffy. These two issues are obviously related to article XI.

In any negotiation as complicated and difficult as this one, there are a number of ways to achieve any particular objective. It is worth noting, madam Speaker, that some other countries have supply control systems which they protect by means other than article XI, such as the variable import levy system operated by the European Community. Canada's fundamental objective is to create an international trading environment which will enable Canadian supply management systems to continue. To achieve that objective, we have advocated a strengthened and clarified article XI and we will continue to do so. As developments occur in the negotiations, we will continue to consult with the industry and provinces to ensure that our fundamental objectives are achieved.

The resolution of the opposition suggests that we should reject any agreement that does not contain a clarification of article XI. Madam Speaker, does this mean that the Opposition wants to maintain the status quo on article XI? The dairy farmers of Canada and the other supply management sectors have all agreed that an unclarified article XI is the worst possible outcome. What Canadian supply management producers require is greater international predictability. They cannot make rational investment decisions if the current uncertainties regarding international trade rules continue.

This government has forged a national agricultural consensus that the agricultural trade interests of all the regions and all of the commodities should be pursued aggressively in a way which does not prejudice the interests of one at the expense of the other.

Is the Opposition seriously suggesting that before we even know what is really negotiable, we should completely ignore the vital interests of all regions and commodities which will require a successful result? The Opposition may choose to do so, but we in this government will continue to pursue a balanced negotiating position which reflects the nation's agricultural interests. We will continue to consult closely with all segments of the industry and all provinces as we enter the last few months of the negotiations in Geneva.

Madam Speaker, the moment of truth is fast approaching. The Director general of the GATT has said that November will see the making or breaking of the negotiations. In order to set the stage for these crucial weeks, Mr. Dunkel, the GATT Director General, has indicated that he will put forward a comprehensive negotiating proposal on agricultural, as in other sectors, which he hopes will provide the basis for an agreement.

It is this government's intention to consult with the provinces and the industry once we have Mr. Dunkel's proposal.

The Minister of State for Agriculture is in Geneva, at this very moment, meeting with Mr. Dunkel, in order to strongly make known Canada's views on this important question. We will miss no opportunity of ensuring that Mr. Dunkel is aware of Canada's concerns, which he is drafting those proposals.

The Minister of State for Agriculture, the hon. Pierre Blais, issued a press release dated September 30th, in which he said: "We are firmly resolve to negotiate an agreement that will protect our supply management programs and, to this end, we will make every effort necessary to obtain a clarification and strengthening of article XI of the GATT". Mr. Blais reiterated that commitment to representatives of Canadian marketing boards during a meeting in Ottawa this morning.

When the negotiations in Geneva resumed, Mr. Blais met with officials of Canadian marketing boards for chicken, turkey, hatching eggs, chicken raised for meat, as well as the dairy farmers of Canada, in order to look at the evolution of the situation since last July.

Madam Speaker, Mr. Blais, who is going to Geneva, will have meetings regarding the GATT negotiations on agriculture and intellectual property. He will also meet the GATT Director General and the President of the negotiating group on agriculture, Mr. Arthur Dunkel.

The minister will then go to Paris where he will meet the president of l'Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, Mr. Jacques Proulx, to look at the situation regarding the GATT negotiations.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, we intend to examine in detail the negotiating position of each country before deciding whether the emerging agricultural package is a deal which would be in the interest of Canadian agriculture. Madam Speaker, to do otherwise will be irresponsible. Canada's agricultural export interests and our supply management interests coincide in that both of them need a successful Uruguay round and both would be adversally affected by a failure.

Mr. Milliken: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I believe that there is unanimous consent for the House to sit between one and two o'clock today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member. Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Mr. Plourde: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Plourde: Madam Speaker, if my hon. colleague would give me two or three minutes, I will find out whether there is unanimous consent on our side. No one informed me that we were to sit during the lunch hour. So if you allow me, Madam Speaker, I will go check and come back.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will now go to questions and comments. Resuming debate.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, just before I comment in support of the motion before the House today, I must point out to the government that it must guarantee to Canadian supply management sectors that the system as it is at the present time will stay in place.

I would like to point out to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, who has unfortunately had to leave the House for a moment, that he made some comments earlier this morning about the importance of people listening to someone. I want to remind him of a story, because I do not think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister is getting the point of all of the groups of farmers who are coming to see him and his colleagues, the thousands of farmers who are coming out to meetings.

I will remind him of a story about the sheep farmer who was talking to a group of people and telling them that because the wolves were destroying his sheep, they should destroy the wolves. Someone in the crowd stood up and said that maybe what would be a better route would be to neuter the male wolves and therefore that would look after it. The shepherd's response was that that person did not understand the situation. The wolves were not molesting his sheep, they were eating them.

I would remind the hon. parliamentary secretary that the concern the supply managed dairy, egg and poultry producers have at the present time is that this present government is going to throw them to the wolves if they do not protect the system on their behalf for these producers. Further to that, I would like the parliamentary secretary or someone from the government to explain to Canadian producers and to this House and to those who are watching what their definition of supply management is. They do not seem to make that very clear.

In the last few weeks they have continually asked producers why they do not think a system of tariffication would work. If we look at the minutes of the Standing Committee on Agriculture from a week or so ago, when one of the chief negotiators going to GATT on our behalf was there, there was a fair bit of that type of comment made. Madam Speaker, if you listened to what the previous speaker said, he spent a fair bit of time talking about tariffication. Perhaps we are going to have to have a look at that type of thing. I agree that we have to look at different systems, but the point being made is that we cannot throw our system and our producers and what they have done for the Canadian economy and Canadian consumers to the wolves.

Without primary agriculture, which is the production of food and fibre, there is no question that many rural communities would disappear in Canada. Unfortunately, that has already happened to some extent.

The University of Guelph in a study and a report they put out in conjunction with some other groups over a year ago outlined that the agrifood industry, which the supply managed sector plays a role in, is a $42 billion to $43 billion industry in this country. We all know the discouraging situation that is faced by Canadian grains and oilseed producers at the present time when their returns in real terms are worse than they were in the 1930s.

Added to that concern of farmers and producers in this country are the concerns of our supply managed sector, our dairy, egg and poultry producers. They can very easily see the distinct possibility of the erosion of the system that they have for their production and for the production of the benefits that they have and they provide, not only to the consumer but to our society in general.

We must recognize, and I do not think any Canadian can complain, what this sector has been able to provide to everyone including the farmers, consumers and society in general. This system is one that allows a decent return on investment. I do not think anyone can object to that. It does not allow an exorbitant return on an investment. It allows the owners, the operators and the employees a decent living, not an exaggerated living. It provides Canada and Canadians with a steady source of nutritious, wholesome and the safest food in the world.

How better can we provide all of these things to Canadians than to have them produced in our own country under our own eyes, rules and regulations? This does this. It does not guarantee this for every producer in that sector but it provides that for the efficient producer. When we talk about efficiency, let us look at what these sectors have done for Canadian consumers.

The dairy industry for example, since 1971, has increased its efficiency 71 per cent; our American counterparts, 46 per cent. New Zealand dairy producers have only increased their efficiency somewhere in the low thirties and western Europe in the single digits.

The economic viability in these sectors of our agricultural community, because there has been some economic viability and a system in place that allows a decent return on investment and a decent labour, has provided this sector of our agricultural community the opportunity and ways and means to do all of those other things that our society wants today; that is, to carry on sound management practices that will put into place the proper control of the soil, crop rotation, water conservation, soil erosion and the proper care of the environment. Unfortunately, because of the disastrously low returns in some sectors of our agricultural community today, even though farmers know how to farm better, they cannot afford to do so.

In every case, who knows better what is best for the soil, for water, soil and wind erosion, than the producers. In the grains and oilseed production right now a bushel of wheat returns a western farmer $2 a bushel. They know how to farm better, but the returns are just not there in order to allow them to have the equipment and carry out the practices. Therefore, in some cases they do not do as good a job as they should and they do not do as good a job as they would like to.

I would say that this sector has not only provided a decent return to the producer, but it has also provided a proper and decent return to our society and to our consumers in general.

I stress, between the dairy, egg, poultry and meat sectors, there are 40,000 producers in this country, 40,000 businesses. We talk about the plight of the small business. Some of those businesses are relatively small and some are relatively large. But we are talking about the economic viability, the economic future and the social concerns and the social effect that will have and the spin-off to the suppliers they buy from, to the people they sell to, to the processors they provide. We are talking about 40,000 Canadian businesses.

I ask this government what it has done in the recent past to tell Canadian consumers the benefits of the supply managed sector in this country.

I beg to question. I do not think it has done very much. I do not think, with the attitude it has of open free market, give it heck, way of doing business, that it cares that much. If it does, it has not not indicated it.

What has this government done to tell the other 100 countries involved in the GATT negotiations the benefits of the system that we have here in Canada and what it does for the producer, the consumer and the environment, the social fibre and fabric of our country and what it does for our whole society in general.

I stress to everyone that it does more than put food on the plate. The agricultural sector plays a major role. It is one of the four wealth creators in this country, the other three being fishing, mining and forestry. If the primary producer, the initial person in that chain, does get a reasonable return on their investment, labour and their management, how could they, as any business, stay in place?

Referring back to the comment at the beginning, this government does not seem to understand the importance of working and selling this on behalf of Canadian consumers and Canadian producers. It seems to be willing to very systematically consider throwing them to the wolves.

I do not think there is much more I can say. I only have one minute left, so I do not have to say much more. I hope I have made the point. This sector of the economy, agriculture production, is not asking for protection for the sake of being protected. As we have seen from documents prepared by colleagues, they are not getting a very large share of what the consumer pays. When we look at how much their share has increased in the last 10 years compared to what the consumer has paid, they are not getting an exorbitant increase. They are getting a fair share of the increase.

I call upon the government to explain to Canadians better than it has, and I am afraid, better than it cares to, the role this plays and how important this sector is, not only to the agricultural community, but to Canadians in general so that we can do what they have done for all of us in the future.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I have a comment in relation to what the previous member just stated.

The hon. member and I entered this House at the same time in November 1988. Since I have been here, I do not think there is anything that would indicate that we are about to dismantle supply management. I think every time the former Minister of Agriculture, the present Minister of Finance, has been on his feet in this House in the last three years he has indicated our support as a government for supply management.

During recent GATT negotiations and the breakdown of those negotiations, we have continually sought clarification and a strengthening of Article XI. We very strongly support Article XI, we support supply management and we have no intention of abandoning that.

How we can drive that message home any clearer than that I do not know, because the present Minister of Agriculture is in Brussels at this very moment and that is the message he will be carrying: We have no intention of dismantling supply management.

I come from a farming community. I was on the telephone to some of my own farmers yesterday and they are very concerned about that. Believe me, Madam Speaker, I have no intention of moving off of that target myself. The object is to maintain it, clarify it and to strength it because it is very, very important for me as a member of Parliament. That is a major part of my constituency, as with the member who has just spoken. It is a very important part of my constituency and an important part of his.

Agriculture is the backbone of rural Canada and I do not want in any way, shape or form to be a member of a government that is going to abandon that. It is very, very important that we continue, all of us on both sides of this House, to encourage the strengthening of our supply management system through article XI. Our present Minister of Agriculture is doing that at this very moment in Europe.

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, I do not question the fact that the present government has said that it is going to stick up for supply management, but what I will remind the remember of and what I asked someone in my speech for a definition, is what is the present government's definition of supply management. If it is the same as we have at the present time, why does it not say so? If it is going toward the United States suggested proposal of tarrification, let us fess up and let us tell the producers that that may very well likely be the case. But the government is not saying that.

The concern out there in the producer organizations and on the farm, and they keep asking the question, is why would tarrification not do the job that is being done now?

I remind this House that tarrification will not do what the present system does because tarrification opens the door, sticks the toe in and begins the ratcheting down of the system that is there at the present time.

Before I sit down, I want to remind the House that the speaker who just spoke said that he could not and would not be part of a system that did not protect supply management as we know it now. If that does not happen I would expect that the member would have to see fit to step down because he did not want to be part of that government.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, today we are not just participating in another opposition day or discussing another opposition motion. Rather, we are discussing an issue that concerns all Canadians and all members of Parliament. It is a survival of our food production sector.

We have heard a lot about the desperate plight of farmers in the last year, but I believe that any clear-minded individual would agree that our agricultural sector is going through a serious crisis, the worst probably since the Depression. How bad is it? In July the Ontario Federation of Agriculture declared: "A plunge in grain and oilseeds prices, the rush by governments to get out of ad hoc programs, have left Ontario agriculture in a state of emergency". OFA president, Roger George went on to say: "Prices are down dramatically. Ministers McKnight and Buchanan had better start taking the situation of Ontario farmers seriously or there won't be any farmers left to make the transition from ad hoc payment to the new safety net programs".

I believe the agricultural industry is in dire straits. That is why I asked the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture to be called back in August to deal with the crisis facing our farmers.

Representatives from prairie pools presented a submission to the committee which indicated: "Grains and oilseeds producers are in a desperate financial situation. Prices have been bad and they are getting worse. The younger guys are starting to say there is no future in it for us" unless they have other sources of income. The average grain producer will be living well below the poverty line. That is how bad it is.

These people are not crying wolf. I had an opportunity to spend some time in western Canada this summer and talked to many farmers. It was alarming to hear the prediction that unless something is done quickly, and I emphasize the word quickly, 40 per cent of all farmers will be forced off the land this year. If things do not improve, 30 per cent more will be forced off next year.

Farmers continue to provide a high quality food. Yet they receive less than the cost of production for their labour. Does that sound fair to anyone in this House?

Many areas in Ontario have the worst crops in recent memory and have nowhere to turn. But there are none of their members in this House today addressing this issue.

Farmers and agriculture are the cornerstone of our economy. We have heard that time and time again by probably all members of Parliament. In the past they have resolutely accepted the increasing losses of income with an external optimism only found in rural Canada.

However, this hope has all but been extinguished. Farmers are desperate. Farm families are dedicated to providing food for Canada and the world. They have given all they have. They have given their savings, their homes and their futures and they cannot give any more.

There is a feeling of desperation and despair in rural Canada. That stems from a feeling that no one cares, that this government does not care for them.

Rural Canada is suffering. When agriculture suffers, everyone suffers, the country suffers. Low commodity prices, poor crops and international subsidy wars will mean the demise of many more farmers in this nation if we do not act now to save them.

Members opposite are saying: "Why get into this now? We thought we were discussing the GATT situation". We are talking about farmers in desperate need, the grains and oilseeds producers. But who are the farmers who have the most stability in our system who under normal circumstances can pay most of their bills, look their banker straight in the eye? It is the supply managed commodity farmers that can do this.

Is this a coincidence? I do not think so. These producers operate under marketing systems that assure Canadians adequate supplies of safe and nutritious food at fair prices while providing some sort of efficient income for these producers. These are the farmers that this motion is dealing with. These are the farmers that will be in an equally desperate situation as the grains and oilseeds producers, if we do not stand up for them now and defend them at the GATT.

We have heard the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the Minister of Finance and the Minister for International Trade and our negotiators all say that they support supply management and that they are committed to seeing the strengthening of Article XI of the general agreement.

The question is: Can they be believed? They have mouthed support for grains and oilseeds farmers. They said that they are going to protect them. They have admitted that there is a $1 billion shortfall this year for the 1990–91 crop year.

• (1300)

Have we seen anything? Have the farmers got anything in their pockets yet? No. One might legitimately ask: What is its ultimate objective?

I believe this government is hell bent for leather to destroy the department and the industry that we have built together over a long period of years.

Always remember, it takes longer to be a builder than it does to be a wrecker. We have had how many studies in the past three years? I would say about a dozen. What did it tell us? Anything new? It did not tell us a damn thing.

It basically tried to implant in people's minds that farmers were inefficient and must become more market oriented. All the facts and figures I intend to show will prove otherwise.

The agriculture producers of this land have become the most productive people in our society and have reaped the smallest reward for their efforts.

These highly efficient producers have been falsely attacked by both inside and outside this government. The former Minister for International Trade stated that the Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed of himself for his actions in subsidizing farmers to the tune of $8.8 billion.

It is an out and out falsehood. It is a direct lie. Never in previous history have moneys received from the marketplace been called a subsidy in an international GATT meeting.

It is a damn falsehood, and it is a lie. I believe that this is a purposely orchestrated attack to deter people's minds from the really costly culprits in our society.

Millions are spent and lost. Consumers are paying much more than they should per producer, in some instances increases in prices of over 150 per cent, and not a peep out of anyone in those benches. Why? Is this a special vendetta against a minority group of people? I think so, but why?

The highly subsidized professors and civil servants who pay for economists subsidized by the big food chains are dictating to them what they should write. I want to make it clear.

I see nothing wrong with criticism as long as it is accurate and honest, but half truths, supposition and lies I will not accept and neither should anyone in this House.

We have built an agricultural industry that is second to none in the world, one that allows farmers some say in the marketplace, one that is subject to public scrutiny like no other producing sector of our society. These are the farmers we are defending in this motion.

In many cases it took years to build these marketing structures such as the Canadian Wheat Board, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the poultry marketing boards. These are all legal structures, allowed by our democratic provincial parliaments and our federal Parliament. These are not illegal entities. They are subject to more scrutiny than any monopolistic multinational that you can find.

My hon. friend from Lambton—Middlesex was speaking this morning. He suggested that the former minister for trade was directly misleading Canadians and totally misled this House in the facts that he presented to GATT and in this House last October 15. I think he was calling him a liar and I think that if the former Minister for International Trade did not withdraw those comments and did not correct those comments in the paper, he was lying and that the hon. member was right.

I know my time is up, but I want to finish by saying this. I thank the hon. member for his comments. I want to end by saying that the government has proposed that it is protecting our supply managed commodities.

I was at the GATT last summer, and I met with people from the European commission. They told me that they had not once heard from this government on article XI of GATT. That was well after the negotiations began, so who do you believe? Do you believe the members or the ministers of the Crown who get up and suggest that they are protecting supply management?

Do you really believe the European community which is negotiating this, which said directly that the minister did not, nor did anyone from this government, ever bring forward supply management as an issue?

I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I do not mind taking part in a debate and responding to anything in this House but there were many inaccuracies in the previous member's comments, particularly in relation to the GATT. He knows full well that our agricultural minister worked very hard on behalf of all farmers in Canada to ratify strengthening article XI, that which pertains to marketing boards, that which defines marketing boards in this country.

That is absolutely absurd.

He might have been to the GATT negotiations for an hour or two hours as an observer but he certainly was not there to watch what our minister did on our behalf as farmers of Canada.

I suggest that his remarks are totally off base and inaccurate and I suggest that he withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Speller: I was only relaying facts as I met with many members of the European commission over a period of a week that I was there.

Mr. Thompson: Point of order, Mr. Speaker, what he is telling us is third party rhetoric or hearsay and if he is referring to it in that sense he should spell it out clearly because that is not what he said in his original comments. It is third party gossip that he is referring to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est)): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Speller: When I was over there last July I met with them and asked what the position of the Government of Canada had been on supply management. They said "silent". They had not met us, had not yet talked to us about that. I indicated surprise because our government has been saying back home all the time that it was standing up for supply management. They were somewhat shocked by the fact that all this rhetoric was going on but the government had not really put any major proposals to them on this.

I am just telling the member straight what the European community told me. It is not gossip. It is exactly what it told me. If he infers from that that his ministers are lying then that is up to him. I cannot say that directly. I can only tell you the facts on what these people told me.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I think that we are going through an extremely difficult period in almost all sectors, but especially in our country's farming industry.

Today's debate could be worthwhile if together we sought ways to support our farmers instead of trying to insinuate all sorts of things that could lead the people to believe that the government is doing nothing to help farmers, which is absolutely false.

I find the arrogance shown by my colleague extremely unfortunate in that he seeks information in Europe and tells us that the government is doing nothing or doing a bad job when the whole policy and strategy and the proposals were developed in Canada with the farmers—that is the position our negotiators took and maintained from the beginning.

I find it insulting for our Canadian farmers to be told that the government is not defending them properly when we know very well that the government is maintaining and putting forward in Europe proposals that were worked on here in Canada. I think that my colleague should have become much better informed here in this country about the decisions and proposals instead of going to Europe to ask foreigners what our position should be or what position has been taken.

[English]

Mr. Speller: I say to my hon. friend that I am showing no more arrogance than the Minister for International Trade did to farmers when he told the Minister of Agriculture, in response to my question, that farmers were getting too much money. You tell me about arrogance. I would remind the hon. member, who represents an area with a number of dairy farmers, a number of supply managed commodities, that it has been this side of the House that has been running this issue for the last two years.

I ask the hon. member where he has been and where his colleagues have been on this issue.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join this debate today and state the government's position on negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade regarding article XI.

Canada is inescapably a part of the global economy as a country whose prosperity depends on the export of almost 30 per cent of what it produces, about 50 per cent for agriculture. It is essential to Canadians that the world trading system is fair and open. That is why this government has dedicated so much effort to the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations under the GATT. We strongly believe that the best way to ensure long-lasting beneficial trade relations is through an open, stable and free trading world marketplace.

Canada has been actively participating in the Uruguay round negotiations for the past five years and has been pushing for a strengthened and balanced set of rules regarding agriculture. Canada will continue to do so.

A successful resolution of the MTN is one of Canada's highest trade priorities. It is founded on the simple principle that the fewer trade barriers there are between countries, the more prosperous these countries will be.

The current rounds of talks began in Uruguay in September 1986. We had high hopes that we would achieve breakthroughs in many fields, as for the first time agriculture was in the forefront of the discussions. It was this government that insisted that agriculture be at that forefront.

It was a long journey, both literally and figuratively from Punta del Este to Brussels where the round was supposed to conclude last December. Along the way those hopes were tempered, almost dashed, but the work continues and our goals remain the same.

Canada's goals were spelled out in our offer which was tabled in Geneva last October, almost a year ago. I would like to review them.

We as a government, as a country, are seeking substantial reductions in trade distorting subsidies, particularly export subsidies. We want improved, predictable and more secure access to export markets by a reduction in tariff and non-tariff barriers. We would be prepared to offer comparable access to our own markets as well.

We want clearer and fairer GATT rules that apply equally to all countries, including a strengthened and clarified article XI, the elimination of a country's specific exemptions and better disciplines on the use of countervailing duties. Finally, we want to see the development of a framework of rules to prevent the abuse of health and sanitary regulations as disguised barriers to trade.

We have developed a balanced and comprehensive offer which is consistent with our objectives of substantial trade liberalization, fairer and more predictable trade rules, and equal treatment among GATT countries.

Canada's offer and objectives in the MTN remain unchanged.

We continue to pursue those objectives because we are convinced that an agreement which achieves them will be beneficial for all Canadian agriculture.

The clarification and strengthening of article XI remains a key objective for Canada. Our proposal, tabled last year, includes specific proposals for clarifying a country's rights and obligations through rules on product coverage for processed products, the meeting of effective supply control, the establishing of import access and new disciplines on exports. This balanced proposal was developed in close consultation with all sectors of Canadian agriculture and enjoys the support of the entire agrifood industry.

Canada has vigorously pursued the proposal of article XI, working with other countries including the EEC, Japan, Austria, Switzerland, Norway, Finland and Korea, which support the retention and clarification of article XI. In fact most countries supporting the continuation of article XI have indicated that they believe the Canadian proposal should form the basis for negotiation.

If this kind of agreement is reached, governments will still be able to provide support to the agricultural sector. Our objective is to make sure this support is provided in ways that are less trade-distorting. However, a number of countries continue to be of the view that all non-tariff barriers should be converted to tariffs, including import controls under article XI.

An agreement along the lines of our over-all position would also carry other benefits including improved and more secure market access, clear enforceable GATT rules, improved market stability and improved GATT mechanisms for resolving disputes.

It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that we are not alone in this struggle. Canada is one of the original members of the Cairns group of developing and developed countries. This group of medium-sized agricultural exporters is dedicated to promoting agricultural trade reform. The Cairns group played an important role in making agriculture a priority on the agenda at the GATT ministerial meeting in Uruguay in September 1986 and we are continuing to work closely with the other members to achieve our goals at the MTN.

The Uruguay round has tried to deal with some very contentious issues. Not surprisingly, the task has been difficult. The European community especially has not been able to reach internal agreement on how to revise its common agricultural policy. The United States in turn has been unwilling to stop wielding its big stick in the export enhancement program.

As a result, we have witnessed a long and very destructive trade war and Canadian farmers have been caught in the cross-fire. The U.S. and the EEC have been using massive export subsidies that hurt all exporters. Canadian farmers feel the impact of export subsidies directly because the prices they receive are based on world markets. The Canadian Wheat Board sets its initial payments on the basis of international prices. The low world grain prices this year are reflected in the Canadian Wheat Board initial payments for wheat of only $95 per tonne.

Yesterday, the Minister of Agriculture met with EEC agricultural commissioner Ray McSharry to press for an early completion to the current negotiations and to emphasize Canada's objectives with respect to the GATT. During that meeting, Mr. McSharry assured our Minister of Agriculture that the EEC continues to support Canada's position on article XI.

• (1320)

Our Minister of Agriculture underlined to Mr. McSharry that extreme difficulties were being experienced by Canadian grains and oilseed producers as a result of the destructive EC and U.S. export subsidies.

The minister similarly raised concerns about these damaging export subsidies and the need for clear and freer trade rules, including the strengthening and clarification of article XI when he met recently with U.S. Agriculture Secretary Ed Madigan.

Today the Minister of State for Agriculture is in Europe to reaffirm Canada's position at the GATT. Tomorrow he will meet with Arthur Dunkel, Director General of the GATT, to make our concerns clear.

Mr. Dunkel has been holding technical consultations with delegations since February. He has been working hard to facilitate the detailed negotiations that must occur this fall if talks are to conclude successfully.

As I mentioned before, Canada's position at the MTN was developed in consultation with all stakeholders in the agri-food sector. We are continuing to consult with both industry and the provincial governments as talks progress.

As negotiations proceed in the coming months, Canada and other countries supportive of article XI will need to continue pressing the case for strengthening and clarification. This period will obviously be one of uncertainty about the outcome of negotiations. It is therefore important that all those having an interest in supply management, government and industry, work closely together to achieve our common objective.

It is in our interest and the interest of the international trading system that we achieve an international trading system based on rules that treat all players as equals. That is why we have worked as a government and continue to work so hard for a successful conclusion to the MTN.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member who just spoke.

It has to do with the motion of the day. As we know it is an opposition day, but the opposition seems to be very much focused on our abandoning of supply management. The question to the member is simply this: Can he see any evidence where this government might be weakening its position with regard to supply management or any sign that this government may indeed want to abandon its position with regard to supply management?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question.

There have been a lot of discussions in the past two or three weeks about supply management in Canada. I see no evidence that Canada is weakening its position.

As a matter of fact, I believe there was a meeting yesterday of all the supply management groups in Canada and at that meeting, as I understand it, those supply groups supported Canada's position.

They supported the fact that Canada is continuing to fight to protect supply management in Canada. We have done that from the beginning as a government. There has never been a government in Canada that protected supply management more than this government.

What government managed to have agriculture put in the forefront, on the front burner at the discussions at GATT? It was under a former Minister of Agriculture from my riding that those talks were put on the front burner, because of discussions by him and our present Prime Minister.

There is no evidence that this government is weakening its position. We are prepared to continue with our position of supply management for Canadians because we recognize the fact that it has been of tremendous benefit to Canadians, both producers and consumers. We will continue to do that.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if my hon. friend from a neighbouring riding is aware of the fact that Mr. Mel Clark, a former deputy negotiator for free trade and the GATT, spoke about a program where the former Minister of Agriculture talked about the government's position on supply management.

The former minister said: "The Conservative government has defended the right to establish marketing boards in the past and will continue to do so in the future, but ice cream and yoghurt is a GATT issue and not a free trade issue and the GATT waiver for certain U.S. agricultural products is most unfair".

Mr. Clark said he reviewed Mr. Mazankowski's statements. I am just reading from his remarks and he says that: "(a) and (b) are simply not true. (a) being that the Conservative government defended the right to establish marketing boards in the past and will continue to do so. And (c) is a part of an attempt to hide from Canadians the effect of the FTA on marketing boards".

I am wondering if my hon. colleague is aware of these comments and may I have his views on this.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend from the riding of Haldimand—Norfolk.

The hon. member has raised the issue of whether or not a former, very distinguished Minister of Agriculture for this country, supports supply management and free trade for Canada.

I think it has been stated on many, many occasions that this government has indicated that both are necessary for Canadians. We have indicated many times, in many speeches in this House that we wanted the GATT to be clarified. We felt there were many things that needed to be clarified for many countries so that we know exactly where we stand when we are exporting and talking about subsidies, whether it be export enhancement subsidies or domestic subsidies.

That has been our position all along and we will continue to support the farmers of Canada as we have done in the past.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time since a Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Eugene Whelan, used to tell Canadians that we do not have a food subsidy situation in Canada. What we have is a cheap food policy in Canada. I used to tell the people in British Columbia that we were not subsidizing farmers, we were subsidizing consumers.

I do not intend to say very much about our grain growing. That is something with which I have had no personal experience, other than to say this. With respect to grain, it is costing a lot of money to produce the grains we are exporting and, to some extent, using here. I believe 80 per cent of grains and oilseeds are produced for export, not because we want farmers to grow feed or oilseeds or grains as such, but rather because we need something to export. These commodities make up our second largest export class in Canada.

Last year alone, 1990, we paid some $27 billion in interest on the debts of all Canadian governments. It would be nice if we could print dollars with the pulp we grow here and ship those out, but nobody wants them. We have to either borrow from abroad to pay that $27 billion or we have to ship out some concrete goods.

It is very important to us to ship out that grain. If the cost of that in part is helping farmers get a price that will enable them to keep on producing those grains and oilseeds, well then it is in the interest of Canada to do it. It does not help the farmer so much, because they would quit producing if there was no sale. It certainly helps Canada as a whole to have that very important export commodity.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister I think was the one who said: "It's rather peculiar that the two opposition parties together have been supporting the government employees represented by the alliance and yet, at the same time, are now standing up and supporting the farmers".

Over the years it has certainly been in the interest, whether it is the Liberals or Conservatives that are in power, of both of those parties to keep a wedge between these two groups; between organized labour on one hand and farmers on the other and yet they are natural allies.

Farmers certainly want union workers, organized workers, all workers to get a decent income so that they can keep on buying Canadian food if nothing else, and certainly the workers have no objection to farmers getting a decent return for the work they are doing.

I can draw on my own experience to give an example of that. I became Minister of Agriculture in September 1972. Prior to that, ever since the milk board was established, whenever the milk board announced that because of formula calculations or whatever there was going to be a price increase in fluid milk, there was an immediate drop in consumption, utilization if you like. People bought less fluid milk. It would then gradually climb up again. This happened regularly every time there was a price increase.

When I became Minister of Agriculture and the time came for an increase in price to be announced I announced it. I went to the news media and I said: "We need an increase of one cent or two cents a quart on the milk that the consumers are buying here in B.C. because the farmers need that extra money to pay their increase in costs." Not once during the 39 months that I was Minister of Agriculture was there ever a dip in consumption. The consumers, organized labour and everybody else, as long as they were convinced that it was the farmers who were getting it, felt that there was a real need and they were willing to support that and kept on drinking steadily increasing amounts of milk.

We are natural allies, labour and farmers, and yet it is to some people's advantage to try to drive this wedge between, to separate.

I see people smiling. They were not listening to my argument I suppose or were not paying too much attention to it.

Union workers do not have it all that easy. Although they were not able to negotiate any kind of a contract between the alliance and Treasury Board, even if they had a negotiated contract, they would know, in signing that contract, that in all likelihood inflation was going to keep on at the rate of some 6 per cent a year for the next three years. During part of that time they were to get no increase at all, part of that time there would be a 3 per cent increase, something like half the rate of the inflation increase, and in the third year the same thing. They are steadily losing ground.

As it is, they are probably going to be something like 14 per cent behind at the end of this period that was forced through the House by the government majority and there is nothing they can do about it. They know that in bargaining they do not know just how much it is going to cost them to live some one, two or three years down the road. They do not have it all that easy. They have to make their best estimates. They have to bargain for what they hope will be a contract that will enable them to keep their ground, to hold their position, although often they do not make it.

It is the same thing with organized workers in all fields. They are the only ones who say: "Yes, we are prepared to accept such and such a wage this year and next year and sometimes into the third year", without being assured by anyone that the cost of living is going to be controlled in any way at all, although the Governor of the Bank of Canada says he is trying to, as to how much of the increase they have negotiated is going to be eaten up simply by the increase in the cost of living.

There was a time when we did control it, Mr. Speaker, and I think you might remember this as well as some of the members in the House, simply by controlling the bank interest rates. Some of you will remember when it was fixed, when you knew exactly what it was going to cost you this year and 10 years down the road to borrow money from the bank. In those days there was very little, if any, inflation. It worked. We cannot do that now because of the banks and we do not want to do anything to the banks.

The unions do try to negotiate wage increases to hold their own. Once they have negotiated the unorganized people in all of those industries for all of those employers are given an increase which is always more than the organized workers get. They are getting a higher salary to start with and their percentage increases are usually higher again.

Professionals seem to manage too. We hear of farmers going bankrupt. We hear of individuals having troubles.

We do not very often hear of professionals who are doing their job properly having that kind of trouble whether it is engineers, accountants or medical practitioners. They form organizations. They do not always set their rate of return, their pay for what they are doing, but certainly in the medical profession they do because in Canada we do have a Canadian medical plan, and they negotiate with governments to get a certain return for their labour. They know what it is going to be. They have trouble some time in the same way that organized labour does. They all get together and try to achieve some sort of unified approach, some way of trying to get a reasonable return for their labour, what they consider to be reasonable. Sometimes we are inclined to think that an increase that somebody else gets is unreasonably high, whereas the increase we ourselves get is always unreasonably low.

Nevertheless, they manage. They form their associations. They form their organizations, whatever you call them. In the case of trade union workers, they form trade unions. They all work in the same way.

The one major group in society that does not seem to have been able to make as much headway in that way is the farmers. In some areas it is particularly difficult for the farmers to try to do it. How can they negotiate in the same way that an employee working for the government among 100,000, 200,000, or 300,000 members of the alliance could? One employee would be in no position to go to his employer and try to negotiate some change in working conditions or some increase in pay or whatever.

I believe I am still on the 20-minute time allowance.

Farmers, when they try to plan their return from their work, their investment, everything they get, have not to be concerned only about the price they are going to get above the market return. They have to worry about whether they are going to have anything to sell at all. They have to worry about the weather. They have to worry about pests. With animals they have to worry about diseases. They have to worry about whether they are going to be able to sell their products and, if so, if the price brings back a reasonable return.

It is much more complicated for farmers to run their business than it is for most other groups in society or even most businesses. There are many more problems to be considered and many more things that are just totally unknown from one day to the next. They do not know when there will be an influx of grasshoppers to wipe out their crop. They would know a day ahead but not much more than that. Disease might strike as has happened when I was in the poultry business.

I keep layers for a period of some 20 years. For a short time during that 20 years they kept me, but most of the time I was keeping them. That was before marketing boards.

I can recall in 1951 getting a wholesale price of 87 cents a dozen for eggs. The price today is about 20 per cent more than that. I bought feed grain at $34 a ton 40 years ago. The price today has increased almost eight-fold. The difference has been that the farmer has learned to become more productive: Technology.

When I went to university in 1949 I was told that the average egg producer in British Columbia, trying to make a living with a flock of less than 1,000 hens, was obviously not going to make it. He had to have 1,000 layers. That is 40 years ago. Today the figure would be at least 20 times that, probably more by now since I am out of touch.

It is just that difficult. The egg producers have learned to use technology, have learned to take advantage of the improvements in breeding as well, and they are able to do it. Although they are paying eight times as much for all of their input costs they are still able to get a reasonable return. The marketing board has made that possible. I said that 40 years ago the price I got for eggs was 87 cents a dozen. Six months later it was down to half of that. There was no marketing board. How could you plan under those circumstances? You could not. The marketing board has made it possible, and the resolution talks about supply management.

Someone asked what supply management means? It is very simple. It is knowing how much you want to produce in advance, whether you are going to produce it for your own people only in your own province, your own country or even in your own municipality, knowing how much is required in reasonable limits. Are you going to have any to export? Should there be any exports? Should there be some that would be manufactured into other products?

It is adding all those quantities together and determining how much is going to be produced of eggs, for example, and then dividing that in some rational system among the egg producers. It works.

Society does not pay the cost of that. Consumers are paying but they are paying less than they would be without that kind of a system in effect, and the farmers are getting a decent break. That is supply management.

We cannot use it for grain but even with grain, as I said earlier, we are producing it for export because we need those export dollars. Canada as a whole needs them, not the farmer. The farmer does not get export dollars. He or she gets Canadian dollars, but Canada as a whole needs those export dollars, so we have to produce everything we can for export.

It pays, in part, the $27 interest charge annually. It is important that we do win this fight at Geneva. It is extremely important to our system of supply management. It works at the resolution stage for the dairy producers. It works for the feathered groups, the birds, and it could work for other products. There is no reason at all that we could not extend it.

I am sure if it is protected and saved it will be extended to other animal crops as well. I was talking about the hog producers who have an association in B.C. There is not a full marketing board set up, but at least they work together to try to improve the lot of everyone in the industry.

The cattle producers in B.C. have tried to arrive at some kind of a system. So far they have just fallen short of being able to come up with anything that is reasonable.

In not being able to accomplish this, as I said earlier, the farmers are behind every other group in society. Every other group organizes and no one criticizes them for organizing. Some people such as those at the Fraser Institute will say that marketing boards are costing consumers a lot of money.

That is not the case. They are paying a fair price for the product. The prices of eggs to consumers and fluid milk to consumers are not being subsidized at all. They are reasonable prices. Farmers are getting their return. The consumers are paying a fair price, although some want to take advantage of cross-border shopping. I appreciate that. Some want to earn their high incomes in Canada and then go across the border and buy cheaper products that are being produced at the cost of the people who are producing them. They are not getting a fair return.

In Canada we have been able to achieve a fair return without cost to society as a whole, without cost to the government. The cost is only to the people who are consuming the products. It is the one instance where we are not running a cheap food policy.

As Mr. Whelan and I used to say, we are running a reasonable policy. We are planning our production to suit the needs of the people in our community, and it is being paid for within the community.

We have to salvage this at GATT, and I wish I could feel confident that we will do so.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is more of a comment than a question.

I think it is only fair to point out to this House that 19 years ago, in early December, in an historic display of federal-provincial co-operation, 10 provincial ministers of agriculture across Canada and the federal minister, the hon. Eugene Whelan, signed the first national marketing agency into being.

I was one of the first charter members of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, the supervisory body over this legislation. The National Marketing Agency came from this, and those 10 ministers and the federal minister, with their foresight, unwavering support and dedication of purpose brought order out of chaos in the poultry industry in this country.

I point out that of those ministers, and of Mr. Whelan we all know his sincerity, purpose and dedication, there are two who stood out above all others. The two others were provincial ministers of agriculture. One was the late William Stewart of Ontario and the other was the hon. member from Nanaimo—Cowichan who just spoke in this House. I think members of this House should be aware of this.

Mr. Stupich: Very briefly may I say that I believe it was Mr. Olson rather than Mr. Whelan who signed that very first agreement. I still have the pen in my possession. It is engraved on that date. It was before he left office as Minister of Agriculture, although he had been defeated in the general election preceding that.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan has remarked that he has been in the political game and the agricultural policy field for a long time, having been the minister of agriculture in the province of British Columbia and now sitting in this House. I notice that he has spent some time worrying, along with the rest of us, about the fate of article XI.

I am wondering given his experience why it is that he continues to be concerned, as I have to admit I am, but perhaps he can put it in words better than I can, about this government's commitment to a strengthened article XI given the fine words that we have heard from the government side this morning and this afternoon.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, we have had that assurance from the Prime Minister. I would remind you that Prime Minister is the same person who said, when he was running for the leadership of the Tory party, that getting into a free trade deal with the United States would be the worst thing that Canada could do or words to that effect.

I can recall that the Minister for International Trade was another person who, when running I believe for leader or at least some time around that date, gave us exactly the same reassurance that Canada could not afford to get into a free trade deal with the Americans. The Prime Minister and the current international trade minister were right then. When it suited their purposes, they very soon changed their minds totally and got us into this free trade deal with the Americans which has been so costly to us.

With that kind of a reputation and that kind of a record, can we believe those ministers when they say that they are going to do the best they can to salvage article XI?

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, today we look very seriously at the GATT agreement, particularly the area that is affecting supply management, article XI of that agreement.

Many people are showing a great deal of concern for livelihood as Canadian producers if that clause is not strengthened. We know that supply management in this country affects very strongly the dairy, poultry, egg and feather industry. I have to stop and think and ask myself the question: Why is the business of agriculture not treated and looked upon in the same light as every other business?

It seems that we have heard supply management as a word to avoid. Many consumer groups have suggested supply management is not the best way to go. I have read editorials in major newspapers across this country which condemn somewhat supply management.

An hon. member: They don't understand it.

Mr. Pickard: My colleague is very correct. I think they do not understand it clearly.

When I start to ask myself what supply management is, I relate back to the manufacturing industry. I relate to the auto industry or the clothing industry and I think to myself, these industries operate under very controlled supply management systems.

They market a product. They do research on sales. They produce products to match that market and match those sales.

When we start to look at it, what does that really achieve for an auto company? It knows how many cars it is going to produce in any one year. It knows how many workers it employs. It knows the cost of the raw materials going into the product. It knows what its energy costs are going to be to produce that product. It then hopes that it will anticipate proper sales. If those sales are not achieved we are in what we call a recession. That basically is the situation for almost every manufactured product in this country.

Let us take that scenario from the manufacturing industry and bring it into what we would call the agro-industry. When we stop and think about it farmers who are in supply management systems have done exactly what people in manufacturing areas have done. They have tried to define a market, done research on quantity of sales, set up production quotas to match that sale projection, and set up quotas so that they can be extremely efficient. Efficiency is the goal. Reasonable supply is the goal. When we stop and think about it, they really are doing what should be done in any business or any industry. They are looking at optimum values out of inputs, optimum value out of what is being put into that industry.

How is the consumer then affected by what they are doing? First of all I have to say that any consumer who realizes part of an industry is being developed to the point where it can control what goes in and what comes out, is sure to say we are going to have a very safe supply of food. We are not going to be in situations like my colleague referred to a while back this morning in which many countries of this world do not know where the next amount of food to the family is going.

We have to somewhat control our own destiny in agriculture in this country and supply management may be one of the better ways to do it, reliable supply of food.

Second, we have rules and regulations about safety in our country. By making sure that we have a very safe, adequate food supply, we do another service for that Canadian consumer. We make certain that safety and health are maintained at the highest level possible.

I hear stories about chicken barns in southern United States that are not cleaned for six months. Every chicken barn in the supply management system in Ontario, every time it goes through a series of production, is cleaned and changed. Antibiotics are not given to the chickens to prevent disease as much as they have to be in other climates and in other sections of the United States where safety is not the same concern.

I believe that quality control has come about because we have a reasonable marketing system in this country.

We heard the government side suggest this morning that there are a great deal of environmental concerns. It stated several countries of the world that overfertilize, that create all kinds of problems on the land by overfertilizing, overusing pesticides and herbicides which in the long run are going to destroy much of the agricultural land they are using.

With supply management systems we have found that Canadians are becoming most effective. They are becoming very environmentally sound and in our country today we use far less fertilizers than many regions of the world. We have become efficient to the optimum level. We have been able to look at those problems, do the proper research, and ensure efficiencies in the industry.

Because the farm community is operating in marketable systems and management systems that are producing a very solid agro-industry in Canada, probably the most stable part of Canadian agricultural industry, as consumers we should be quite ready to support it, realizing that it is to our benefit.

The previous speaker from the NDP suggested that Mr. Whelan, a colleague, a very good friend of mine who comes from southwestern Ontario and who was a former agriculture minister, stated that the strength of agriculture is really the strength of our country. We must realize that when we support the agro-industry, when we support the food industry, we are supporting the consumer in this country. We are supporting safety and all the good things we can think of within self-production.

We must remember that second to the manufacturing area, in particular the auto industry, agriculture is one of the largest industries in this country.

If I go on and start looking at who is operating management boards, I would see Canadians who are serving Canadians, Canadians who are buying products from other Canadians who produce food, Canadians who are buying pesticides, herbicides, using Canadian energy, paying Canadian taxes, paying financial institutions in this country, buying at every commercial enterprise in this country. They are Canadians who support Canadians. They are Canadians who pay taxes. They are Canadians who do what this country needs to survive, and that is generate and produce a tremendous amount of business in Canada.

I look on it from the government's point of view, this House's point of view, that if we do not protect the farm industry this country loses a tremendous amount of business which cannot be reclaimed.

When I look at article XI, at the protections we need, I realize that we must make certain that our programs are maintained very strongly.

I ask myself: Why is the United States not interested in defending our supply management system? I know that Canada is not going to have a major impact on people in the United States. Our supply management systems have been designed to serve the Canadian public. They have been designed to make certain that we as Canadians receive the benefits.

Many statements have been made today, but the most important part is that we must make certain agriculture survives.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the overview the member has just given us on the supply management system.

I want to bring to his attention a comment made by Ralph Barrie, who is the National Farm Products Marketing Council chairman and someone who would hardly be considered an enemy of marketing boards.

One of the things that Mr. Barrie has brought to our attention is that he sees too much rigidity, too little flexibility, too much warring and too little partnership among producers, processors and consumers.

I believe many of us can see that, although we want to protect marketing boards, my question to the member is simply: in that context can he see any changes within the present structure of marketing boards to make them more responsive to present day needs of Canada?

• (1400)

Mr. Pickard: Madam Speaker, I believe that marketing boards are probably one of the most responsive groups in this country as far as the Canadian consumer goes. They look at their markets and their production, consider what production will best serve the Canadian public and make certain there is a stable, safe food supply for all Canadians.

Certainly forces are tearing at the marketing boards, but it is comments like those made in this House in the past by the former minister of external affairs, Mr. Crosbie, which hurt the boards. I need not restate those comments but they were anything but supportive of the agriculture community. I also make reference to the Canadian federalism and economic union, the report that was given by our Minister of Supply and Services which put very much on the line that there are impediments to the agricultural—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Point of order, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Thompson: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I referred to comments made by Mr. Ralph Barrie, chairman of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, and he is not addressing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is not a point of order; it is a dispute as to facts, and it is a question of debate, a dispute of the facts. The hon. member may want to continue after Question Period. It being 2 o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, on one hand, the Minister of National Defence tells us that we have to cut back on excess infrastructure; but on the other hand he says the construction of a new $36 million naval reserve base will go ahead.

It is nonsense to consider new facilities at a time when existing bases are on the chopping block. CFB Cornwallis already has excellent facilities, is close to the sea, and is in a bilingual area. In fact, it started out as a naval training base in 1943 and has maintained a naval tradition since that time. It is large enough to handle the planned increase in our naval reserves in addition to the present English recruit training it already does.

Madam Speaker, there is no economic justification for a new base that will cost $36 million. Making CFB Cornwallis a naval reserve centre would not add one cent to the department's budget.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, since the government first proposed to restore the right to own property to Canadians there has been a great deal of debate as to exactly what this might mean.

Much of that debate has been misinformed. The detractors of property rights have somehow assumed that this right would supersede the rights of society.

Today's myth about property rights is that bestowing them on a corporation or a person would give that entity the right to pollute land. Absolutely not, Madam Speaker.

The individual's right to own property would not wipe out society's right, or Parliament's right to ensure that stiff environmental standards were met. Restoring the right to own property, a right Canadians always enjoyed before 1982, simply gives all of us a guarantee that if our land is taken from us, due process of law will ensure us just compensation. In a democracy the state can do nothing greater than ensuring its citizens have as many rights as possible, and restoring this right is a major contribution to democratic freedom in Canada.

BASEBALL

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Love those Toronto Blue Jays! Last night the Jays captured the American East Division and the hearts of all Canadians and this is just the beginning on the road to winning the World Series of baseball.

What a great way of liberating Canadians from the depression they feel over this Conservative government, of taking pride in the accomplishments of the team and of its fans, of providing a sense of unity and collective enthusiasm for Canadians at a time when these feelings are so desperately needed.

I know all members and Canadians will want to join me in wishing them every success as they prepare to battle baseball's best.

Madam Speaker, it would be a dream come true—think of it, after the Prime Minister and his government have hit so many fouls, committed so many errors and struck out at bat so many times with the Americans—for the Toronto Blue Jays to walk away with the national American pastime, the national championship of world baseball.

All together now:

Some hon. members: Okay, Blue Jays, let's play ball!

AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I would like to offer my full support to the Peterborough AIDS Resource Network known as PARN. During Peterborough's AIDS Awareness Week, October 7 to 13, I am pleased that all levels of government are throwing their full support behind this event, as are hundreds of other community based organizations.

It has been brought to my attention that there are nine known cases of AIDS and 33 instances of HIV positive people in the Peterborough area. Three of these cases have been reported since May of this year.

Jonathan Mann of the Harvard International AIDS Center stated recently that the World Health Organization expects the number of people infected with HIV to triple to 30 million this decade and the number of AIDS cases stemming from infection by HIV is expected to grow from 1.5 million cases this year to 15 million cases by the year 2000.

As Peterborough's member of Parliament, I am proud to have in my riding an organization such as PARN.

EDUCATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, last week I was in Lac Brochet, an Indian reserve for which the federal government has responsibility. School children in Lac Brochet have been waiting since the early 1970s to have a permanent school built. They do not even have trailers, only makeshift classrooms with rotting roofs in a part of the country where winter temperatures often drop to 40 degrees or 50 degrees below.

Young children walk outside to go from one class to the next. Despite a letter I received from the former minister of Indian affairs stating that construction of a new school for Lac Brochet would start in 1991 or 1992, Lac Brochet has been told it must wait six more years, a total of almost 26 years, before a school will be built.

Madam Speaker, it is disgraceful that in this day and age the children of those educated in makeshift classrooms will themselves be forced to not only start school, but finish their education in these intolerable learning conditions.

I call on the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to commit the necessary funds immediately for the construction of a new school in Lac Brochet.

BASEBALL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, last night in a heart-stopping game at the SkyDome, the Toronto Blue Jays clinched the American League East title with a comeback 6-5 win over the California Angels in the bottom of the ninth inning.

The sellout crowd also clinched a major league season attendance record, with 4,001,526 fans. Fantastic. Love those Blue Jays! Okay, Blue Jays, let's play ball!

COUP IN HAITI

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, the President of Haiti, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, went to the Organization of American States to plead with the international community to intervene as directly and quickly as possible in his country to restore democracy. It is obvious that the military officers who usurped power cannot continue to pretend that they democratically represent the Haitian people. All Canadians, especially Canadians and Quebecers of Haitian origin, are absolutely appalled by the events that have just taken place in that country.

I can only quote the words of a Canadian representative who said, "We do not need talk; we need positive, concrete action to bring the military back in line."

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Terrebonne has the floor.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, since last weekend, we have been celebrating the first anniversary of the World Summit for Children throughout Canada and the world. Events are now going on in 47 countries on the theme "keeping the promise' '. Religious, educational and community activities are held to remind the people and elected officials of the commitments made at the World Summit for Children and to ask leaders to carry out their promises.

Madam Speaker, Canada, which played a very active role in this historic event, co-chaired by our Prime Minister, intends to fulfil the commitments it made at the Summit by pursuing various initiatives. These commitments were reiterated in the government's most recent Speech from the Throne.

• (1410)

Madam Speaker, I therefore ask all members of this House to support today all participants in the campaign to have all countries keep the promises made last year.

CORPORATIONS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to announce the beginning of a new weekly award. It is called the corporate carpetbagger award. This award recognizes corporations which in the context of the free trade agreement and Tory economic policies packed their bags and fled south from Canada.

Our nominees for this week are: Varity Corporation, which shuffled off from its headquarters in Brantford, Ontario to a $13.5 million mansion in Buffalo, New York. The cost to Canada is at least 3,000 jobs and $200 million worth of broken promises to the taxpayers.

Nominee number two is Black & Decker, which left 264 jobs when it moved its production in January 1991 from Trenton, Ontario to the United States.

Nominee number three is Colgate-Palmolive, which washed its hands of Canada and its 240 workers and moved its production to the United States in September 1991.

The envelope please. The winner is Varity Corporation. This week's corporate carpetbagger is Varity Corporation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the men and women who are working at the Canada Employment Centre located in Portage la Prairie in the heart of Manitoba.

The 26 workers at the Portage CEC know the needs of the citizens of Portage. Not one of them went on strike. The needs of the citizens of Portage are their priority. How did the PSAC union view their commitment? The PSAC union has already placed the Portage local in trusteeship and is proceeding with decertification. Union bosses of PSAC care not for legitimate causes, they care only for themselves.

Have courage, Portage Canada Employment Centre workers. The union bosses might oppose you, but Canadians are on your side. Thank you for serving Portage la Prairie and for serving Canada.

The Order of Canada award goes to persons who have made a significant commitment to our nation. I believe that the Portage la Prairie CEC deserves the Order of Canada for their moral stand against the recent PSAC strike.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have risen many times in this House to point out the deplorable state of the economy in the Montreal area.

For two years, the Conservative government has told the people of Montreal and the whole province that it was doing all it could to revive a declining economy.

Today, we learn that Quebec is not receiving its fair share of federal contracts. Quebec has 25 per cent of the Canadian population but receives only 18 percent of federal contracts. This injustice costs Quebec $350 million. It will not help regions like eastern Montreal, with 37 per cent jobless, and the Gaspé, with 27 per cent unemployed.

Madam Speaker, at a time when we are trying to keep this country together, it is important for the federal government to distribute its contracts fairly to all regions of the country.

COUP IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, after 30 years of dictatorship under the Duvaliers, we hailed the arrival of democratic government under Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

The recent coup in Haiti dismays the international community and we must ensure that democracy triumphs by making it possible for President Aristide to return to power as soon as possible.

Canada, which has long done much for Haiti, can play a leading role in giving back to the Haitian people the right to freedom and social justice. I trust that sending a delegation from the Organization of American States to convince the military to withdraw from power, the suspension of diplomatic relations and the reduction or even cessation of economic relations with that country will end the coup.

Madam Speaker, Canada must help restore democracy to Haiti.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the House of a resolution proposed by Gertrude Lacoste and adopted by the seniors' council of Montreal—Lac Saint-Louis, which I strongly endorse.

I would like to quote this resolution: "That the government and people of Canada send a resounding message in favour of national unity to the seniors of this country.

Older Canadians built our nation and we maintain a firm personal commitment to the principles and values on which our society is based, as well as to the mutual respect, understanding and reconciliation needed to help us overcome our present constitutional differences."

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, it will be hoped by all fair-minded Canadians that the government will be tolerant in its use of the back to work legislation provisions determining precisely when Public Service employees must be back on the job today.

Due to the rather unique circumstances surrounding the bill's passage at 7.51 last night, notification of employees was not possible in many circumstances and there was great confusion over when the 12-hour limit in the bill would expire.

On behalf of all fair-minded Canadians, we would urge the government to be lenient in its enforcement of this provision.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, this morning we heard that Ottawa awards 50 per cent of its contracts to Ontario and 18 per cent to Quebec. For instance, we have the case of the 25 top research contracts at the Department of Supply and Services. Dalhousie University: 16 contracts worth $2 million; Ottawa: 34 contracts worth $2 million; Toronto: 317 contracts worth $35; York, 86 contracts worth $34 million; and none for universities in Quebec.

Tory members from Quebec who say they stand a better chance of making gains for Quebec by staying within the Conservative party are insulting the intelligence of Quebecers. They are there only for their own personal gain. The statistics are clear, Madam Speaker. It has become increasingly obvious that Quebec has no future within Canada. It has also become increasingly obvious that the Tory members from Quebec are not doing their job.

THE CONSTITUTION

M. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Madam Speaker, since our Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, tabled in this House a document on the renewal of this country: Shaping Canada's future together, I have made it my business to ensure that every one of my constituents is informed of these proposals which are a starting point for the debate.

Once again, the Prime Minister has opened given Canadians new hope for the future, and at last this country will be at peace with its Constitution. I am not afraid of how Canadians will react. I am confident the response will be constructive and that at the end of this national debate, we will have a better knowledge and a better understanding of this country.

I want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation for the excellent work done by one of the artisans of this attempt to save our country, a man I admire because he respects Quebec, the Right Hon. Joe Clark. I am happy to announce that on October 10, I will have the honour and the privilege of receiving the Right Hon. Joe Clark in Laval at a dinner organized in co-operation with the Laval Chamber of Commerce. At this dinner, Mr. Clark will speak on the Canadian Constitution and have an opportunity to dissipate any fears—

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

The government keeps saying that we are out of the recession, but on every front the economy is reeling: grain farmers, fishermen, Imperial Oil, Consumers Glass, small business and now 4,900 jobs at risk at de Havilland.

By tomorrow night American threats to our forest industry which employs almost one million Canadians could be felt throughout the nation.

Does the Prime Minister have a promise from the President that the United States will not take action again Canadian softwood lumber producers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the MOU expires at midnight tonight.

We have served notice in the appropriate fashion as is our right under the provisions of the MOU. Obviously the U.S. will be contemplating whatever action it may or may not wish to take.

I would suspect that we will have an indication as to whether or not it will take any action with regard to this later on this afternoon, at which time we can respond in an appropriate fashion.

• (1420)

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. This government's economic policies have already crushed Montreal's economy. Now the Canadian forest industry is being crushed by high interest rates. Softwood exporters are being crushed and the workers have the right to know whether or not the Prime Minister has obtained a formal guarantee from the President of the United States that there will be no punitive tariff on softwood exports. Did the Prime Minister obtain a commitment from the President of the United States on that or not?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. member the process which is contemplated and is followed under the provisions of the MOU. Whatever action is taken or contemplated would obviously have to be consistent with international trade law and we will have to wait and see if in fact there is any action contemplated by the United States administration. If action is taken, the Government of Canada will respond as necessary and appropriate.

In regard to her allegation on interest rates, Mr. Speaker, interest rates have declined by 560 basis points, that is 5.6 per cent since the high of May last year. I am sure the hon. member would find it pleasing to note that the bank rate dropped another 13 basis points today.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that is obviously too little, too late, for more than a million Canadians who are trying to find work.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Six years ago the Prime Minister said this in the House about the great deal on de Havilland:

> We want to make the best deal for the Canadian taxpayer, secure those jobs and that technology in Toronto and that is what we have done.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister what he has to say today to those 4,900 workers who have been sold out by the policies and the trade actions of this government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is really unfortunate that the hon. member cannot stand good news. We have had four consecutive months of growth in the economy after a recession that was more severe than we expected. I remind the hon. member that Canada is not the only country that has experienced a setback in economic growth.

Canada is emerging from a recession, recovery is on the way, we have had a growth rate of 4.9 per cent in the second quarter, we expect growth to continue in a moderate way, we want that growth to be sustainable, and we want it to be achieved with price stability.

That is our goal, Mr. Speaker, and we are on the right track.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade told this House, about the lift of the surtax on softwood lumber, and I quote:

> It is our judgement that there will not be a 301.

We heard that the Americans are threatening to retaliate today or tomorrow. Here is my question: what contingency plan does the government have in place to prevent yet another disaster from crippling the Canadian lumber industry?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has evidence that the United States is going to take action under 301 perhaps he would like to produce that evidence for the House.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I was asking the Deputy Prime Minister if the government had a contingency plan in order to counter what the Americans may to do tomorrow afternoon.

During the free trade debate this government told Canadians time and time again that we would get secure access to the U.S. market. The memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber violates the spirit of the free trade agreement.

Again my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister get a guarantee from President Bush that his administration would respect the spirit of the free trade agreement and would not take punitive action so as to not totally destroy the Canadian lumber industry.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks a hypothetical question. His first question asked what the government would do now that the United States imposed an action under 301. I asked him if the United States was imposing an action under 301 to give us the evidence. Hon. members on that side of the House want the United States to engage in imposing a countervail or a 301. We chose not to.

I should also remind the hon. member that under the free trade agreement we do have secure access, and furthermore we have a binational dispute solving mechanism that puts Canada on a fair and equal footing with its largest trading partner.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment who yesterday fudged the issue of cabinet approval for U.S. nuclear submarine activity in Dixon Entrance which is the richest fishing grounds in Canada.

Another cabinet document stamped secret says: "A Governor in Council decision is soon going to be announced regarding the transit of nuclear submarines through Dixon Entrance." In this same document the minister is warned by the director general of operations that what the cabinet is doing is illegal.

Would the minister explain why he appears to be participating in an activity which his own director general has found could be illegal?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this is the second day in a row that the hon. member has risen in his place and alleged things out of documents that we have not seen.

In fairness, if he expects us to answer questions on the basis of what these documents are alleged to contain or not contain, he should at least have the courtesy of showing them to us.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. These are his documents produced by his department and I assume he reads his mail.

This same secret cabinet document says: "The issuance of another Order in Council could draw undue attention to the use of this technique to avoid the application of the EARP."

Now that Canadians are aware that cabinet is teetering on the brink of breaking the law on behalf of the United States military, will the minister trigger a public review of this project or is he under orders not to do so?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what the member is alluding to is under discussion presently between the two levels of government and, as far as I know, no announcement has been made. These are ongoing discussions between both levels of government.

As far as the environmental part is concerned, I would like to remind the hon. member that the ships and the type of activity he is referring to has been going on in our waters for well over 20 years as far as I know. There is a track record in terms of that type of activity.

When the final decision is made we will assume our environmental responsibilities as required by the different laws or policies that we have.

I think in fairness, if the hon. member is going to allege the contents of documents—and I do not want to play games with this and neither should he—he should at least show us the documents before he rises in his place in the House of Commons to ask us questions about it.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary. I am perfectly prepared to table these documents today. What this government does not seem—

Mr. Dick: You know you're not allowed to do that.

An hon. member: We don't want it now.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, you do not want it now, eh?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This government does not seem to have learned anything from Kemano, anything from the Oldman, anything from Rafferty–Alameda. What the people of British Columbia want is a public environmental assessment of nuclear submarine activity in Dixon Entrance. That is only fair and just.

My final supplementary is for the Minister of National Defence who met with Miles Richardson, the president of the Council of the Haida Nation, Chief Michael Nicoll from Old Masset and myself this summer on the Queen Charlotte Islands.

I would like to have the minister explain to this House why, according to this same document, his department is demanding that there be no public review of nuclear submarine activity in B.C. waters on the grounds of national security?

I believe this is a cover–up simply for the accident record of these subs which since 1983, have had 12 groundings, 50 collisions, 113 fires, 14 onboard explosions and 31 crew suicides. Is that not what you are covering up?

• (1430)

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, obviously, this is a current issue for public opinion. The Canadian government will decide on the basis of its legislation and in keeping with Canadian traditions, Mr. Speaker.

SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today the Canadian Federation of Independent Business released a survey which showed that more than one–third of small businesses in Ontario will be considering moving their operations to the United States, putting at risk more than 500,000 jobs.

The federation blamed the Ontario NDP budget, but it also said that small business in Ontario, and I quote: "was already under siege from a high dollar, high interest rates, the GST and the recession".

Will the minister remove this siege he has placed on small business in Ontario? Will he reverse these harmful Conservative policies right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can help the hon. member in correcting his interpretation of the news release I have in my hand which says that: "Startling results from a current survey reveal that more than one–third of the small business sector in Ontario, 36 per cent, report that they are considering moving all or part of their operations out of the province, thereby putting at risk, 500,000 jobs". It does not say a thing about the federal policy. It is a reference to the policies of the NDP government in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I invite the Minister of Finance to look at page 2 of the release that says: "The CFIB's Vice President and Chief Economist, Catherine Swift, said that 88 per cent of those small business owners who were considering moving all or some of their operations from the province, cite the United States as a preferred place to relocate". That is an exact quote.

I repeat to the Minister of Finance. Catherine Swift has said that small business people are planning to move because they are already under siege, and I quote, "from a high dollar, high interest rates, the GST and a recession".

I ask again, why does the Minister of Finance want to carry out policies which will precipitate this potential horror story for jobs and business in Ontario and, therefore, all of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might ask the hon. member a similar question. Why is this same phenomenon not taking place in the provinces of British Columbia or Alberta? The reason is right in here, and I quote: "It is very clear that the Ontario government's policies and its over–all disdain for economic logic and business reality have become the major concern of small business", said Catherine Swift.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the minister for industry washed his hands of responsibility for de Havilland, metro Toronto's largest industrial employer.

Like it or not, this government is responsible for the fate of de Havilland. This was the government that gave de Havilland away to Boeing along with $60 million and did not even get any job or production guarantees.

De Havilland's 4,900 workers have a right to know from this government if their jobs are secure. Will this government change its mind? Will it commit itself to the future of de Havilland?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the hon. member would not recall the exact state of de Havilland when the sale to Boeing took place. There are a lot more people working at Boeing now than there was working at de Havilland then.

As far as recent events are concerned, of course we are not happy with what has happened to the deal. It would have been better if the deal had gone through. Everybody in this House agrees with that. This is a problem that Boeing itself is going to have to resolve. We stand ready, as we always have done throughout all the negotiations, to help Boeing in any way we can in whatever deal it would like to bring off with other people.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister is telling the House that the government is not going to take a lead in ensuring the future of Canada's leading aircraft producer.

Surely the decision of the European Community did not take this government by surprise. The European action was launched four months ago. The government has had four months to contemplate alternative action.

What de Havilland and its 4,900 workers need today is certainty. It needs an answer today. I ask the minister again. Will the government commit today to ensuring the future of de Havilland as a leading aircraft producer?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that other companies have had an interest in Boeing.

Those other companies were not able to move as long as this particular deal was on the table. If this deal is off the table, those other companies may now come back into the picture to resolve the situation. We have always stood ready to try to help in those negotiations.

TRADE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

When the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding was brought in by this government in December 1986 the Social Credit government and the Prime Minister said the deal was great for Canada and B.C.

Their enthusiasm for this sell-out of our forest industry cost thousands of jobs, particularly in B.C., Quebec and northern Ontario. Given reports of possible retaliation by the United States, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure this House that unlike the last time, the government will not cave in and sell out to the U.S. again?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that the MOU was not considered to be a permanent fixture. It was put in place to ensure that appropriate offsetting measures could be instituted and most important, so that any countervail or duty would remain in Canada.

I think it was a logical move and a logical step in the right direction. We now sense that conditions are normal, that trading patterns should be resumed on a normal trading process and we think the time for the MOU to expire has come.

We believe we are on solid ground, and whatever action the United States may or may not take, we can respond in an appropriate fashion based upon international trade laws.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, when this government sold out the Canadian forest industry workers, it codified the softwood lumber tariff and the Softwood Lumber Products Act. This legislation gave the government the authority to impose the tariff.

My question is for the minister. Will he repeal this legislation so that Canadians can be assured that this government will not reimpose a tariff? Will he table in this House the list of questions that the U.S. posed to this government and tell us what the answers were?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I grasp the hon. member's rationale.

If we had not agreed to an MOU, we would have seen $400 million flowing out of the country. As it turned out, under the auspices of the MOU, the $400 million remained in Canada in the hands of the provinces.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, he might want to check with his friend, Jack Munroe, who not only believes that we did the right thing at the time we put the MOU in place, but he also believes that we have done the right thing in terminating the MOU. He may want to check with him after Question Period.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

He will know that there is approximately $60 billion invested in Canada's oil and gas industry. In calendar 1991 the entire industry expects to net about $200 million which would be about a .003 per cent return on invested capital.

He will know that the number of Canadians working in the industry has dropped from 140,000 in 1985 to about 80,000 today. What basis of substantive hope can he offer a vital Canadian industry?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises points that I discussed with representatives of the Canadian Petroleum Association as recently as two days ago. I have had similar discussions with other members in the oil and gas industry.

One or two points become very clear when I speak to them. They understand the cyclical nature of the industry. They also know very well they do not want the intervention that once marked the federal government's oil and gas policy. They definitely do not want to see artificial incentives brought back into the industry which, while it might give us some activity in the short term, does not help us in the market in the long term.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will know—he has been told day in and day out here—of the economic grief sweeping Canada because of the high dollar.

The western oil and gas industry, the coal and forestry sectors have indicated recently that our 88 cent and 89 cent dollar is wreaking havoc on them. He also knows that the Bank of Canada has intervened to keep the dollar up recently.

Will the minister tell us why his government is not prepared to persuade the bank to bring the dollar down.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is advocating another Liberal national energy program, I would like to see what he has to propose because it is obvious that is where he is coming from.

An hon. member: That is still their policy over there.

Mr. Mazankowski: With respect to his comments regarding the intervention of the Bank of Canada, I think what he is referring to is what was reported in the press today. The action of the Bank of Canada is not unusual. This is quite normal practice. The Bank of Canada intervenes when it is necessary to ensure that there is a stable market and not erratic fluctuations.

It should also be noted that the Bank of Canada did not intervene to stop the decline in interest rates, it merely tried to moderate the decline so that we can maintain a steady decline of interest rates on a sustainable basis. I think that is what the hon. member is in favour of and that is certainly what we are in favour of on this side of the House.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The Mayor of Black Tickle in Labrador has confirmed that fishermen in that community are without food—without food—in Canada in 1991 because they cannot qualify for welfare. They cannot qualify for unemployment insurance.

Through no fault of their own, they are in dire straits. Why is this government refusing to take the window of opportunity? Why is it not responding to the extreme urgency of the need of fishermen along the Labrador coast? Why is it not announcing an aid program today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this matter has been worked on now for some weeks. An announcement is imminent.

I agree with him that the situation in Labrador is simply deplorable, that the fishery there was a complete failure. Of course the hon. member knows and understands that the fishermen in Labrador as well as along much of the rest of the northeast coast received ice compensation until well into August. There will be an announcement shortly on what other efforts are going to be announced in order to assist them now and during the winter. I hope it will not be very much longer.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I know the minister understands the situation, and I know there has been compensation and I give him credit for that. So let me tell his cabinet colleagues that the reality in Labrador is that you cannot do anything in November. Winter is coming on. If you do not have a work program in Labrador now, you cannot help those people. Time is of the essence and aid delayed is aid denied. You have to announce a program for Labrador this week. Will you do it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and myself understand the situation perfectly. I hope it will become clearer to many others.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): My question is for the Minister of Communications. The minister is no doubt aware of reports that further drastic cutbacks to the CBC may be coming. English and French FM stereo networks, regional suppertime hour news programs and the virtual shutdown of CBOT Ottawa and CBWT Winnipeg could be the next victims. In the case of Winnipeg, CBWT is the only CBC station for all of Manitoba.

Will the minister guarantee that these services will not be cut and specifically that there will continue to be full regional services in Winnipeg and Ottawa?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and all members of the House will know, the CBC has an arm's length relationship with the government. It is the board of directors of the CBC which has the responsibility for planning the activities of the CBC.

Hon. members opposite would be the first ones to complain if the government were to do away with that arm's length relationship.

What is important however is to recognize the fact that the CBC has taken no decisions at this point with regard to how it should be doing its planning for the future. With regard to the budget, the government continues to look at the situation, to see what sort of a situation it is facing. We are working together with it.

The important thing, Mr. Speaker, in responding to the hon. gentleman, is to stress the fact that there is an arm's length relationship. It is the responsibility of the CBC, and not of the government, to take decisions with regard to precisely where operations will exist.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not reassure us very much. First of all, he says that it is an arm's length relationship and then he says that we are working close together with the CBC. In addition to that he says that the CBC has not made a decision yet.

I remind the minister that in the case of Windsor and Calgary the decisions were made effective that day. Will the minister at least guarantee the people of Winnipeg and Ottawa that there will be prior consultation with the employees and their communities before there are any cutbacks?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises apocalyptic scenarios. He is asking first of all that I reach into the CBC and give instructions to it as to what it should be doing in such and such in a particular location.

If I were to do that the very first member of this House who would be on his feet to object would be the hon. gentleman opposite. He would be saying I would be involving myself politically in the internal affairs of an arm's length corporation of Canada.

What I did indicate to the hon. gentleman is that we are working with the board and with the management of the CBC to address its financial concerns. I want to continue to give that assurance to the House and to the Canadian people, but we will be doing so on the basis of the arm's length relationship.

AIRLINES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport and it concerns Worldways Canada Ltd., now known as Worldstar. The airline ceased operations a year ago. An application to restart the company was filed with the National Transportation Agency in May of this year. More than 1,000 jobs are at stake. Many of these Worldways employees are my constituents.

I ask the minister on their behalf, what is the status of the application of Worldways to the NTA and when can these people find out what the future holds for them?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we are concerned about the future of Worldways and its employees.

As required by the regulation, the restructuring plan was submitted to the NTA which ruled that it did not meet the contents of the Canadian requirements for ownership. Worldstar was instructed to reapply if it had new facts. A reapplication was made and again it did not meet the requirements of NTA.

If there are new facts that can be brought before the NTA to meet the Canadian requirement, the NTA will revise the matter.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. CN has decided that it is going to privatize the rail line between Sydney and Truro, Nova Scotia, because it is just too far away from its comfortable offices. It is making money so it cannot be abandoned. It found that if it refused to market the line and actually discourage business it still made money. So now it is to be privatized.

I want to ask the minister to stop this injustice. When is he going to tell CN not to sell this railroad?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned many times in this House, CN was given a mandate to be as commercially profitable as possible. In the discharge of its obligations it is at the present time examining the possibility of selling that railroad. No decision has been made. CN is examining the possibility. If a proper bidder is found it will require that the line be maintained to properly service the customers on that line.

• (1450)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, when a Crown corporation is making money Canadians have the right to receive service from that Crown corporation. It is their Crown corporation and it is making money.

Why is the minister not listening to legitimate concerns of eastern Nova Scotians and why will he not tell CN not to sell that railroad?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, simply because I think that the most important thing is that the people and the clients of the railroad in that area are served to the best level possible. The question is not who will do it, but how will it be done in the best interests of the customers.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board to explain to the House, as he has explained to me, why procedures are being followed this year, as they were followed last year, to give bonuses to Order in Council appointments. Last year they came about in the month of December.

Why are these procedures being followed this year, the same as last year, in view of the hon. minister's statement in the House last week? And for what period of time do these bonuses apply?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Now the facts. Of course bonuses are a complex issue and I am not surprised—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: I will have to threaten the hon. member with removing him from my Christmas card list if he keeps asking this question.

I will be very clear. It is very simple. At the end of a particular year unionized employees get a salary. Managers and some Crown corporation officers get a salary and they get a bonus. At budget time we decided that one year would be a zero year; unionized employees will get zero salary increases; managers will get zero salary increases, and managers will get zero bonus increases.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): In other words, Mr. Speaker, over 1,000 Order in Council appointments that make an average of over $100,000 a year in salary will again qualify for Christmas bonuses this year, some up to 25 per cent of their annual salaries.

I want to ask the government how it, in all good conscience, can sit in a cabinet meeting just before Christmas, after telling Canadians to tighten their belts, and approve these massive bonuses to highly paid people? Yes, fat cats, there really is a Santa Claus.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I would like to remind the hon. member that the performance pay was put in place by the Liberal government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: What was done was for the managers. Fifteen per cent of the wage budget was taken off and instead of going gradually in an increasing scale, we topped it off and we said we would evaluate them. Some will get zero, some may get 10. To my knowledge, nobody ever got 25. It is an outside committee which passes these judgments and usually the cabinet sits down and cuts it anyway.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and it pertains to the matter of cross-border shopping.

In the past when the minister has been asked in this House about the effect of the GST on cross-border shopping, he has stuck to the increase in the number of trips that Canadians have been making across the border, which have increased in and of themselves, but has never gone to the heart of the matter which is how much more Canadians are spending when they make those trips.

Statistics Canada collects that kind of information. The information we have is that those figures show there has been a dramatic increase in the actual spending by Canadians, something in the neighbourhood of 57 per cent.

I want to ask the minister if he has seen those figures and, if so, why does he continue to talk only about trips and not tell Canadians the whole story about how the GST has affected cross-border shopping.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at that question coming from an hon. member who knows better. Statistics Canada hands out all the facts, all the statistics and we on this side of the House, as opposed to some members on the opposite side, support those statistics 100 per cent and talk about them.

The last time this issue came up in the House, Statistics Canada made it very clear that the introduction of the GST played a minor role, a very minor role, in the increase of cross-border shopping, both in terms of trips as well as in terms of dollars.

We consider cross-border shopping as a very serious problem. That is why we are working with the provinces, with the private sector, with labour, with the Retail Council of Canada, to move in the right direction that would make Canadians more competitive and allow Canadians to shop in Canada rather than south of the border.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is so confident in the Statistics Canada data, would he undertake to instruct Statistics Canada, or to have the appropriate minister do so, to publish all the figures so that we can compare oranges and oranges, and apples and apples, first quarter with first quarter, last quarter with last quarter, spending with spending, trips with trips, and all the things we need to know in order to make a true measure of what the GST is doing to cross-border shopping instead of having the minister get up and selectively cite statistics with respect to trips and not with respect to over-all spending.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that question is an insult to Statistics Canada which is internationally recognized as one of the top statistical organizations in the world.

You should stand up on your feet and apologize to Statistics Canada—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. The government has proposed that the federal government get out of all its existing and future housing programs and turn the matter over exclusively to the provinces.

Is it the government's intention also to provide the provinces with additional taxing powers or alternatively additional federal funding in order to allow them to continue on the national housing programs within their own jurisdictions?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the proposals for constitutional reform have as one of their main themes the rationalization of the operations of different levels of government to ensure that services are provided by those levels of government closest to those being served and at the present time most of the housing services themselves are being provided by provincial and local governments.

If the proposal that is put forward is part of this large package of rebalancing is accepted by the committee, that would be followed by negotiations with the provinces to determine the appropriate modalities of devolution.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. In the past, the minister vehemently denounced federal propaganda practices in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Yet today he is in power, and we are witnessing the CBC recycling old directives from 1978 with respect to the constitutional debate. They are now asking journalists and media people to apply a double standard, that is, on one hand, to emphasize the benefits of the status quo, and on the other, to denounce the costs and consequences of constitutional reform.

• (1500)

For the sake of freedom of information and so, the real Canada can show through, is the minister prepared to immediately withdraw that directive reminiscent of the witch hunts of the past?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CBC has one responsibility and it is to ensure that its reports are completely accurate and that its comments made are fair and impartial. That is their mandate and that is what they do.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. If the minister has bothered to read the Corporation's directives, he will know that they are applying a double standard: on the one hand, the reports must emphasize the advantages of federalism and, on the other, they talk about the costs and drawbacks of constitutional reform. Can the minister, who should have a sense of fairness, not see that there is a double standard, that it is not right, and that it is not in accordance with the criteria that he just defined himself? Should he ask the CBC to do away with this procedure that is totally unacceptable in the 1990s?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of the CBC, whether the French language arm or the English language arm, is to ensure fair and accurate coverage of the news and of public affairs. That is its duty. It is one it discharges with distinction. Throughout the whole of the constitutional debate that is the direction in which it will be going. It is obligated under the Broadcasting Act to do precisely that.

Point of Order

The difference between the hon. member and those of us on this side is that we want to see improvements made to Canada. He would like to see Canada destroyed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board, the minister responsible for the zero per cent increase for Public Service Alliance members.

I want to ask him very clearly: Will the presidents of the CNR, VIA Rail, Canada Post and other big-wigs get a Christmas bonus this Christmas?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, these chairmen will be treated as everybody else. They will get no salary increase for 1991-92 and no bonus at all for 1991-92.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question.

Will the chairmen of Crown corporations receive a bonus in December? I am not saying: "Are they going to get one for this year?" Will they get extra money or not? That is what we want to know!

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be very clear on this. The chairmen of corporations, like the union members, will get exactly the same treatment, even more so in that they will have no salary increase and not one penny in bonuses for the 1991-92.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I again ask the regular House business question. Could the minister indicate what the business will be for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday, and the remaining part of next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, today is an opposition day. On Friday, October 4, it is our intention to call Bill C-30 regarding mental disorder for completion at second reading and Bill C-27 having to do with foreign missions for completion at all stages.

On Monday, October 7, it is our intention to call Bill C-3 regarding the Real Property Act for completion at second reading and Bill C-18, income tax technical amendments, also for completion at second reading.

Discussions will continue along usual channels to arrange business for Tuesday.

It seems at this point that we might call Bill C-33, the Coastal Trade Act, for second reading on Tuesday, Bill C-23, the Wheat Board Act, for completion at second reading and, Bill C-16, the Agriculture Marketing Board Act, for completion at second reading. We will be in the usual discussions for the business for the rest of next week.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, will the government House leader share with members of the House if there is any movement with regard to the subject matter of conflict of interest in terms of what the government intends to do in terms of an all-party committee which may be struck in order to further examine ways in which this particular institution, as well as the Upper House, may be monitored pursuant to the conflict of interest guidelines?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have put proposals to the opposition parties as well as to the other place for the establishment of a joint committee of this House that would take the subject matter of a conflict of interest bill that was before the House in the previous session, as well as taking it upon itself to examine how this issue was handled in other jurisdictions such as the United Kingdom and other nations with political systems similar to ours.

It would be my hope that this committee could look at that and come back with recommendations that would be tantamount to a bill that we could put before the House and deal with this matter, hopefully with some degree of finality.

The government does not come to it with a fixed position in mind other than recognition that we are all members of Parliament and members of the other place in a situation in which we must satisfy our publics that we recognize the requirement that conflict of interest be dealt with and in a formal, legal fashion. Beyond that we would await the advice of that committee and except for keeping the natural obligation of having the Department of Justice examine and write the bill so that it stands up to the legal requirements of our system, it would be my hope that in essence the House of Commons and the other place in committee would provide the fundamentals of a conflict of interest position that we could all agree to.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, would the government House leader just perhaps elaborate. I am not asking for a fixed commitment, but in the discussions of this particular subject matter, assuming that a bill would be tabled by the committee itself on the subject matter, would he explore the real prospects of perhaps having on that particular piece of legislation an opportunity for members to exercise their rights and remove the party lines in terms of our whips and have a free vote on the subject matter on the floor of the House?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, clearly the question of party lines only comes to play when you are talking about an initiative from the government and very specifically this initiative would be from Parliament. This question of how it is handled is something I certainly will look at in discussion and I do not come to it from a perspective of assuming that it is going to be a government bill, quite the opposite.

This issue affects all of us equally on both sides of the House as members of Parliament and we have to, somewhere between the two extremes, assure that there is absolutely never a conflict of interest nor apparent conflict of interest, and somebody has even suggested nowadays the standard is a possible apparent conflict of interest or, on the other hand, a situation in which it is recognized that conflicts of interest are a part of life, but that they should be open and obvious so that people can make their judgments as to whether that conflict of interest has caused the member to act in an inappropriate fashion.

Between those two extremes perhaps we can find some accommodation that will meet the standards of Canadian citizens and enable this House both to operate and to ensure that we can attract in future quality men and women who are needed to ensure a successful Parliament.

Mr. Dingwall: I have one final question for the government House leader. I wish to thank him for his intervention. I wish to offer to him that we would be favourably disposed in terms of the way in which he has outlined a process in terms of the conflict of interest. My colleagues from Ottawa—Vanier, Kingston and the Islands and our critic from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would certainly want to be very involved in that particular process.

I am wondering, since I have got the government House leader's attention, if he has given any thought to the prospects of the committee which will review the subject matter including members who are Independent members. I know that he cannot include them all. We would have members from the three main parties, but there are also Independent members in this House.

I think to be fair to Independent members, wherever they come from, whatever region of the country they come from, we might want to try to involve them in the process as well so that there will be a complete legitimacy of Parliament working on a subject matter which has profound consequential effects on each and every member in this House, and likewise in the other House.

Would the government House leader entertain that possibility?

Mr. Andre: I have no difficulty with that suggestion whatsoever. If this is going to be successful, it will provide for input from everyone who has an interest in the subject in this House.

My only qualifier is as one balances off representation and so on one gets to a size of committee which becomes unworkable. As Parkinson said, once a committee passes 20 it effectively goes into the control of the executive of the committee. To make sure it is a group that can work I would like to have the committee small enough so that it can be effective and that everyone who has an interest in it has an opportunity to participate. I am sure we can work out the modalities of that.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the questions from the House leader of the Official Opposition are welcome on this topic. I enter the debate only to say that I seemed to hear the House leader saying that in order for something to be considered as the object of a free vote, it would have to be seen as not being part of the government's agenda but coming from Parliament.

If I recall correctly, the conflict of interest legislation and the proposal to do something about the lingering problem of conflict of interest was in the throne speech and was therefore part of the government's agenda and part of the platform on which the government seeks to curry support among the Canadian people.

I ask the government House leader to consider, because I know he has commissioned a paper in this regard with respect to free votes, that it is not only those things which are seen as coming from Parliament, somehow independent of the government, but also maybe some things which come from the government that may be subject to a free vote of the government's own members. That, it seems to me, is the direction in which the debate about free votes is going.

It is not just a question of private members or things that do not originate with the government but about giving government backbenchers some freedom with respect to a wider range of government proposals, which up until now at least conflict of interest legislation has been.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, this is an interesting subject and perhaps we should set aside a day some time to explore it further.

My interest in this regard in the comments I made to the House leader of the Liberal Party was to reflect merely the fact that for conflict of interest legislation to be effective, if that is what results on the recommendations of the committee, it should reflect the views of the House and not the views of the cabinet.

The problem we have dealing with the notion that the hon. member talks about is our adversarial system. Any time a government proposes something, the opposition feels obliged constitutionally to oppose. May I humbly suggest I welcome the day when the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party participate and take responsibility for some of the positive actions that occur and not simply be in the position of opposing everything.

For example, the hon. member's party and others have been suggesting we should be providing help to farmers, fishermen, and those in need. I agree and I look forward to the day when they stand up in the House and say they agree to raising taxes to fund these activities.

That will be the kind of co-operation from both sides of the House that will make this institution work in a way that the public of Canada would appreciate.

An hon. member: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member in a second. I would just suggest to members that we are getting into a debate which is not on orders of the day.

I am the servant of the House, but I wanted to remind members of the time and that some members have asked for the floor to render a tribute to a departed parliamentarian.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I am sorry that what could have been a useful preliminary discussion about free votes was turned into a sort of partisan opportunity by the House leader.

The fact is, and he knows this well because he has been here longer than I, that there have been occasions in which governments, opposition and third parties have agreed on things. He knows also that this discussion about free votes is one that we want to have precisely so that we can get out of the adversarial system which he laments and yet which he just employed in order to avoid answering the question I put to him.

Mr. Andre: With due respect, I did not avoid answering the question at all. The hon. member talked about why I think it is appropriate to proceed in this manner for conflict of interest and why I think a free vote situation is appropriate.

I am trying to suggest that if the government sat down, wrote up a conflict of interest bill and brought it to the House constitutionally the opposition becomes opposed to it. That is the way we operate. That does not mean at the end of the day that it is not supported.

The role of the opposition is to criticize, point out weaknesses, et cetera. I am saying that on this issue in particular perhaps we could work together since we are all in it together and at the end of the day we could vote in that fashion.

You are right. I have a paper coming on free votes. We are committed to proceeding in that direction as a government and more will be happening in that regard.

I also have to say that free votes is not at the root of excesses in our adversarial system. There are other things and we need to look at those as well.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I have a last comment. I believe my colleague from the New Democratic Party has said it well. I have attempted to say as well as to the government House leader that there is a disposition now, as we viewed from the comments of my colleague from the New Democratic Party, to sit down and discuss the process, the intricacies of this particular matter, in terms of conflict of interest for members of Parliament.

I think it would be a good beginning. I want to thank hon. members to my left, as well as the government House leader, for entertaining some of the suggestions that we have made. We look forward to further discussions later this week, perhaps, and early next week so that we can consummate something on the subject matter before too long.

THE LATE SENATOR HAZEN ROBERT ARGUE

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would like to rise and pay respects to the late Senator Hazen Argue.

Senator Argue served the area that I served as a member of Parliament and I remember with a great deal of appreciation, especially his kindness to me as a new member of Parliament.

Senator Argue served his country for 43 years. That is a long time. He was always a defender of the farmers. If I may add a personal note, I recall being chairman of the task force on drought and shaking in my boots facing 1,500 farmers.

• (1520)

Senator Argue rose and he really broke the ice. I will never forget what he said. He said: "The experts told you farmers to buy more land. The experts told you to buy more machinery. The government told you this and it was my government that did it". The farmers just broke up.

He was always very kind to me as a new member of Parliament. He served the people well. He defended his constituency, and to Jean and the family we send our sympathy and the respect of the government for his long years of service to Canada.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, I rise to join in the tribute to the late Senator Hazen Argue and extend, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, our deepest sympathies to his wife Jean and members of the Argue family.

It is true, as the hon. member just said, that Senator Argue had a remarkable sense of humour and a very warm welcome for anyone he met. He served bravely and courageously the people of his province and Canada and helped promote a better understanding of the legitimate aspirations of Western Canada among people from various regions of the country.

I had the privilege of serving with him in Cabinet under the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau. On several occasions I had the opportunity to hear and appreciate the strong stand Senator Argue took in Cabinet on behalf of Western farmers and the people of Western Canada in general.

Just recently, with Senator Fairbairn I had the pleasure of paying him a last visit in hospital while travelling in Saskatchewan. I will treasure the memory of this visit because, even on his hospital bed, his death bed, he kept showing his love of life, a remarkable joie de vivre. He had remained very clear-headed, in fact I noticed that he was still monitoring what was going on here, on Parliament Hill.

That is why, I am sure that, had Senator Argue been here today when the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex put a motion concerning Canadian farmers, he would have risen with those of us who beg the government to do something to rescue the Canadian agriculture and protect Canadian farmers in the GATT negotiations in Geneva.

I think, Madam Speaker, that we are not about to forget Senator Argue and his contribution to Canadian life and politics.

[English]

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to speak in remembrance of Hazen Robert Argue, a man who was born, raised and educated in Saskatchewan.

He was a graduate of the University of Saskatchewan in agriculture and farmed at Ormiston. He was first elected in 1945 at age 24 to represent the CCF in the riding of Wood Mountain which later became Assiniboia. At the time he was the youngest MP ever elected.

I first met Minister Argue, known as "Blazin Hazen" to his constituents, at a district meeting of the Farmers' Union in southern Saskatchewan in the late 1950s. I was there with Roy Atkinson, a young vice-president of the union who later became president of the NFU.

That part of Saskatchewan was suffering from a drought and infestation of grasshoppers. Those topics dominated the meeting and one of the people who came and spoke very eloquently was Hazen Argue, the local member of Parliament.

Mr. Atkinson and I were joined at lunch by Mr. Argue. Conversation turned to agricultural policy and the future of agriculture, not the dismal immediate future but the long-term hope for farming and farmers and things that could be done.

A long time later, in the summer of 1984, I remembered again my first conversation with Mr. Argue. My last long conversation was in the summer of 1984 when the same three people met by chance in the airport in Toronto. We were all awaiting flights out to the west and we got talking. Mr. Argue had just been let go from cabinet. Our conversation again turned to the short-term dismal future of agriculture. It was a drought year again in southern Saskatchewan. The same long-term hope and unreasonable optimism that pervades Saskatchewan farmers' conversations came out. I remember just before he got on the plane, the last thing he said was: "Well, I hate to be kicked out of cabinet, I hate to lose the job, but it gives me a chance to go home and watch the grandkids grow". It is to those grandkids and their fathers and mothers, the two daughters and the son and their spouses, and especially to Jean that our thoughts go today.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I too would like to add my personal sympathy to Jean Argue and her immediate family and her extended family.

When I first came to Ottawa in 1979, whether it was in caucus or in other meetings, Senator Hazen Argue was one of the first people to come, extend his hand and welcome the new members, and I will never forget that.

I saw the greatness of the man when we were passing the western transportation bill, known as the Crow bill. We spent a lot of time in Saskatchewan. I see my colleague nodding his head across the aisle here. We travelled through the small towns and talked to individual farmers and big agricultural organizations. Everyone knew Hazen Argue and everyone had something positive to say about Hazen Argue.

I know that he will go down in history as making his mark on the growth of this country. My personal contact with him remained even though I was defeated. Senator Hazen Argue still kept in touch. He still had a special interest in members who were newly elected here and he was always there to offer a guiding hand.

Again I extend my sympathy to Jean and her immediate and extended family. He will be missed and he certainly made his mark on this country.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members who took part in this tribute, and I would also like to offer, on my own behalf and on behalf of all members, our sincere condolences to the bereaved family.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—AGRICULTURE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ferguson (p. 3200).

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member, but I had to check whether the member who had the floor at 2 p.m. was still in the House.

Resuming debate, for ten minutes. The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, in the 1970s it was Liberal governments who created marketing boards to protect Canadian farmers and, at the same time, ensure that Canadian consumers would have access to an abundant supply of high quality farm products at competitive prices.

It is important to recall that one of the greatest achievements of the Liberal government was the creation in 1975 of the Canadian Dairy Commission. Some 16,000 Quebec farmers annually receive a guaranteed income under this program.

Over the years, the program was refined and improved, and it became so popular among farmers that the Tories decided to renew the program for five years. Unfortunately, the program's continued existence may be at risk as a result of the current GATT talks. The government has not only failed to defend the interests of Canadian farmers, it is also, as was explained this morning by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, trying to hide the truth.

The Prime Minister and his Minister of Agriculture are looking the other way, while the Minister for International Trade is selling out Canadian and Quebec farmers in Geneva.

Quebec farmers who put their trust in the Prime Minister must realize he could not care less what happens to them. I think this is quite clear if we consider the question put by my colleague, the hon. member for Gatineau—la Lièvre, on September 24. The hon. member asked the Prime Minister, and I quote:

> Given that the survival of agriculture, especially for joint plants in Quebec such as the one for the dairy industry, is based on the principle that production costs will be taken into account and farmers will have a reasonable income, can the minister or the Prime Minister assure farmers that this essential criterion will always be maintained for our farmers?

The Prime Minister's answer was, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend wants to know whether there is anything in the proposals tabled this morning to —

He stopped, and then went on.

> If the question is whether we will maintain our previous programs in spite of the document tabled this morning, the answer is yes.

The Prime Minister was referring to the tabling of the document on constitutional reform. I realize the Prime Minister may be totally absorbed by the constitutional question, but that is hardly a reason for assuming the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre was talking about the constitutional proposals, not the GATT talks, and answering that the constitutional proposals had no connection with the problems of Quebec's dairy farmers.

To help the Prime Minister, I prompted: "It isn't about this morning's document, it's about the GATT talks". Then he made a quick recovery and said, at page 2633 of Hansard and I quote:

> My hon. friend from Papineau, who is also an expert on agriculture—

—those were the Prime Minister's very words—

> —tells me that this issue is mainly up to GATT. That being so, I would be pleased to answer a supplementary.

So my colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre did ask a supplementary question:

> The Quebec farmers' union, the UPA, is very concerned about their future because the Minister of Agriculture is always talking about productivity without considering production costs. That concerns them and they would like to have an answer about it.

Here is the Prime Minister's answer:

> Mr. Speaker, productivity applies to everyone. But mentioning productivity in no way undermines the ability of the UPA or its members to meet the competition that they face now. Nothing was said or done to keep farmers in Quebec or elsewhere from maintaining their production.
> The Canadian government—
> —this is the gem—
> —will try to find new markets for them.

Very clearly, the Prime Minister did not know what he was talking about then. Very clearly, he misled the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, although unintentionally, I think, by telling him about something completely unrelated to the GATT negotiations because, as my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex said this morning:

[English]

"If the government supports Article XI, which allows countries to limit imports when they have a system of production designed to meet only domestic needs, why are they now concerned with finding new markets for dairy farmers? The answer is simple". And I quote my colleague: "I do not believe they intend to support article XI at the GATT. Why else would the dairy farmers need the government to find them new markets?"

Obviously, as my colleague rightly says, the government has absolutely no intention of protecting farmers and supporting Article XI; otherwise, the Prime Minister would not make an issue of finding new markets for milk producers. And come to think of it, where will we sell the wheat, butter and all the dairy products that are already in such oversupply? One of my colleagues said, "Eastern Europe". They already produce those things over there; they do not need our Canadian production. Europe has a massive surplus of these products. I will remind the hon. member that we already imported dairy products from Poland. So we cannot send them over there; they can send us some here. We must product the markets that we have in this country.

What is serious—and I conclude with this—is not just that dairy farmers are threatened by the GATT negotiations in Geneva, but also everyone at the egg, chicken and turkey marketing boards. If the government does not fulfil its responsibilities and does not properly defend the interests of its farmers in Canada and Quebec, the whole future of agriculture is in danger. That is why I am pleased to speak in this debate and to support the motion of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I missed the beginning of the speech of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who, on top of being an expert on agriculture, as the Prime Minister mentioned, is the Liberal critic for External Affairs.

Could the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel tell me how he perceives the European countries which, as regards the GATT, are more inclined to support an American proposal on tariffication? Tariffication, is a new buzz word in the GATT negotiations.

Also, is the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel aware that Canada, as a member of the GATT, finds himself in a rather lonely position in his fight with the farmers, with the agriculture ministers, and with the president of the UPA, who is presently in Europe? We reassured him. We want to keep the supply management system for milk, eggs, poultry and other products. However, as a central state and a member of the GATT, we must obviously also think of the grain producers and other goods that are not subject to quotas.

Is the hon. member aware of that? What would he do, today, if he was taking the place of the Minister of Agriculture in Geneva, at the GATT, as regards this concept of tariffication? Would he be rather in agreement or in total disagreement with the European countries who want to support the American position concerning tariffication rather than article XI of the GATT?

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, obviously once again the US government is dictating its will to the government of Canada. This time, they would want us to believe that, while the European countries might be prepared to make some concessions, they will do so at the expense of their own national farming industry. I can assure the hon. member that the French, German and Italian farmers will have their governments stand up for them.

The question right now is who is defending who? The government of Canada, instead of always obeying the orders of the US government and be its puppet, should stand up at the GATT negotiations in Geneva and protect the interests of Quebec farmers and all Canadian farmers.

In response to the question of the hon. member, this tariff approach could work in Europe, but not at all for the Quebec dairy producers. Once the Quebec farming industry will have gone belly up, it will be too late. The hon. member and her Prime Minister will have failed to fulfil their responsibilities.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, is a smart politician indeed and very good at dodging the question. I will ask him again. The Canadian government is facing problems with the GATT, we must live up to our commitments regarding contingency but, at the same time, it is our duty, as a government, to protect non-contingency production. In that context, when we seek to strengthen Article XI of the GATT agreement, we come up against new difficulties relating to the export of non-contingency products.

We have made it clear, Mr. Speaker —and I might add that our jobs are at stake, as someone mentioned earlier—that we will protect the Canadian farming industry. There is no doubt about that! But would the hon. member tell me how he can reconcile the two when the European countries would prefer instituting a tariff policy rather than strengthening Article XI of the GATT, which is our choice as a country?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that at the current GATT talks the Canadian delegation is now on the sidelines.

The talks took the turn they did because today, interests other than the interests of Canadian farmers have prevailed. I want to repeat to the hon. member that even if she proceeded to name all the reasons the Europeans have given, this would do nothing to advance the cause or the interests of Canadian farmers.

I would prefer to see her over there, explaining what has to be done to protect Canadian and Quebec farmers, than listen to her here in the House, trying to convince us that the Europeans are right about their new tarification. Go tell them Quebec farmers won't buy it!

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe my ears!

Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate today on the opposition motion that the government "must immediately provide Canadian producers, operating within these supply management sectors, firm assurances that it is seeking and will continue to seek the strengthening and clarification of article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade".

First of all, I feel I must comment on what was said by the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. I was not impressed when he told us that the interests of Quebecers were not safe with the Prime Minister, especially when we consider how safe they were when the hon. member's party was in power.

We won't get into that today, but just the same, the record was not impressive.

Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friend opposite fails to understand and may not realize, is that the whole strategy and the proposals tabled at the GATT talks were developed by the agricultural sector and the government. The proposals were approved and the offer made to GATT, on that basis. I think it is wrong to say that the interests of our farmers and producers are not being defended as they should be, since our producers were involved in preparing these proposals.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be useful to comment on what the government has done in the past few years to cope with current and future challenges.

I agree, Canadian agriculture is facing unprecedented demands, but it is also being offered a wealth of new opportunities. Never before has there been such tremendous pressure for change and adjustment. In response to these pressures, in 1989 the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces and the private sector, launched the most exhaustive study of agro-food policies and programs ever undertaken in the history of Canadian agriculture. We have worked very hard on clarifying and revising the rules of international trade under GATT.

Canadian agriculture must maintain its position at the forefront of this sector, both nationally and internationally. The changing tastes of consumers, advancing technology, the globalization of markets and environmental concerns made this review necessary.

We did all we could to avoid a dialogue of the deaf and set up a vast nationwide consultation process to include governments, farmers, everyone involved in the food chain, and of course consumers and other interest groups in setting the framework for a national agricultural policy. We therefore asked all participants to put their ideas on the table, to put their differences on hold, to say what they thought and to listen to what the others had to say. They were then asked to see the process through with us. And I wish to assure you that we have no intention of going back on our commitments.

Thus the federal and provincial agriculture ministers agreed in July on a series of decisive measures for the future of the agri-food sector at their annual meeting in Kananaskis, Alberta. These changes, from second-generation supply management systems to increased industry participation in agriculture policy development, will begin the next stage of the Canadian agri-food policy review.

The systems now in place are viable and can be effective, but they will have to change to improve. They must be more market-sensitive, more independent and more responsive to regional diversity. Supply-managed sectors should design and operate their system while respecting the environment. Supply management policies must help and not hinder the development over time of a more competitive sector.

Canada's international trade policies must continue to allow us to operate our supply management systems effectively. With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government took concrete action by tabling a proposal in Geneva in March 1990 to strengthen and clarify article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, GATT.

We wanted, among other things, to define precisely what effective government control of supplies meant, to determine the products eligible for import quotas on the basis of their manufacture, in whole or in part, from a fresh product whose domestic supply is controlled, to clarify the administration of import quotas and to impose export limits on products subject to supply management when import quotas apply to the same products.

Last October, after consultation and receiving support from the industry and provincial governments, the Canadian negotiators tabled legal wording to be included in our GATT proposal.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of State for Agriculture, Mr. Blais, told the press a few days ago, Canada has not changed its position on article XI of GATT one iota. The government has promised to defend vigorously the Canadian supply management systems and we remain just as determined to do so.

In fact, Mr. Blais is presently in Geneva. Earlier, our colleague was blaming us for discussing this motion in the House instead of being in Geneva to negotiate. Well, we have our negotiators and our Minister of State, Mr. Blais, is presently in Geneva where he will meet, among others, the GATT Director General and Chairman responsible for negotiations on agriculture, Mr. Dunkel, to discuss those negotiations.

The minister will then go to Paris where he will meet Mr. Jacques Proulx, the president of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, to discuss the state of the GATT negotiations.

Also, the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. McKnight, met yesterday with the European Community commissioner for agriculture and rural development, Mr. Ray MacSharry. They discussed the multilateral trade negotiations, including the desastrous effects of the subsidy war on the Canadian agri-food industry. The minister also stated Canada's firm intention to seek re-enforcement and clarification of article XI of the GATT, as well as ensuring a fair implementation of the GATT rules on agricultural exchanges.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this government does not intend to leave anything to chance, nor does it sit on its laurels or rely on others to protect the interests of Canadians abroad.

In the document on Canadian federalism and economic union that was made public last week, the Government of Canada proposes that article 121 be updated in order to facilitate the mobility of people, of capital money, of services and of goods within Canada, by prohibiting the federal government and the provinces from passing legislation or implementing programs or practices that would create obstacles or restrict such a mobility.

Some think that the marketing boards are threatened by such proposals, since those boards would be a barrier restricting the circulation of goods and services. I want to emphasize here that the marketing boards serve other purposes regarding the foreign markets. Any amendment to the clause dealing with the common market must not be detrimental to the equalization programs or regional development, nor to any program classified as an exception by Parliament in the national interest. In short, we are saying that the national interest will prevail and that we are intent on using that clause in the case of marketing boards. It is also in that perspective that the Castonguay-Dobbie Committee was set up by the government. This committee will study every aspect of the Canadian economy so as to ensure that, after adequate consultations, the decisions made will be based on the national interest.

To demonstrate its support for marketing boards, the government intends to give second reading to Bill C-16, which seeks to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. These amendments would give provincial marketing boards and other agencies additional powers to enable them to have a more concerted approach and thus improve the marketing of their products on interprovincial and international markets.

We know how important the supply management system is to the dairy co-ops in Canada. Its implementation enabled us to stabilize the economy of that sector and to ensure an adequate supply of high quality dairy products to Canadian consumers, at affordable and stable prices.

I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker. As regards the Canadian dairy policy, this government took, in 1985, the necessary measures and will keep working in the same fashion.

I am convinced that, through consultations, we will find ways of making more competitive those sectors where the supply is regulated. There is a vast consensus on the need to change the system. Working groups on the dairy and poultry policies, as well as independent studies made by consultants, have all come to that conclusion.

So, Mr. Speaker, allow me, in the few minutes that I have left, to simply reassure the Canadian producers and in particular the producers in my riding of Joliette, about the firm intention of my government to continue in the direction that it has been following for at least two years, to cooperate with the agricultural industry and all the stake holders in order to set policies and strengthen our external policies—the proposal is being examined today at the GATT—, and to ensure that our producers will be adequately protected within our contry, while at the same time having access to external markets.

It is very important to protect them—we know that, we see it and we know what the Western producers are presently going through because of the war between the United States and the Europeans, in particular the French—and it is precisely in order to improve their fate that we are working, at the GATT, to create a much more lucrative and appealing market.We must put an end to this impossible and very harmful price war throughout the world, while at the same time protect our marketing boards and our producers.

Even though we hear all kinds of comments to the contrary here, I believe that our producers—in fact we had the opportunity this week to meet several of them—are aware of the initiatives taken by Canada and they support these initiatives. There is no doubt that we will continue to work towards that goal, and we hope to get our position accepted in this country and at the GATT. Our position is very well balanced and would guarantee brighter days to our agricultural producers.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague. Since his time ran out or so he thought, I would like this House, the Canadian people watching us and above all the farm producers in our ridings to hear him again.

• (1600)

The member for Joliette comes from a most prosperous farm area where tobacco growers have experienced certain problems in recent years. However, I am sure that the vitality of the growers will see them through these hard times. Could the hon. member tell us how producers, at the local farm board level, are reacting to this new threat regarding GATT tariffs? What Canada wants instead, what we want as a nation, Mr. Speaker, is the strengthening and clarification of article XI of the GATT agreement to prevent dumping of foodstuffs in Canada. We want to put and end to the unstable economy of our producers who have worked so hard to build a system for themselves these last few years. They work very hard, but at least they are guaranteed an income at the end of the year.

I would like the hon. member to tell us what we have been done these last two years to try and convince the European producers, the Americans, in fact all GATT members, that Canada has interesting policies which they should take as models and establish marketing boards in their countries and strengthen article XI of the GATT agreement.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for her very interesting question. I think that we are going through a period of major changes, and our farmers' concern is quite legitimate. We have long felt the threat to our marketing boards. We recall the last election campaign when our farmers told us that they were very worried. Free trade with the Americans was the issue, but in fact the real threat was related to article XI of GATT.

Since then, we have worked and they know our position very well. We intend to spare no effort to protect a system that has served us well and should continue to do so. As I said not so long ago, we developed our whole strategy together, to make them more confident and especially to inform them of everything we intended to do. Together we developed the strategy to work out a proposal which, as I said, is very well balanced and should reassure them to some extent.

Of course, we are negotiating as one country among hundreds; we cannot expect our whole policy to be accepted and we are very well aware of the war now going on between the Europeans and the United States. We know that it is not easy. We spared no effort, we worked together. It was just mentioned that Mr. Blais was to meet Mr. Proulx in France tomorrow, I believe. We are working together. I think that in this way our farmers should be reassured and that we will see it through together. And I find it somewhat regrettable today that it has become a partisan debate in which it is suggested that the government is not doing everything required to protect farmers properly.

I think that instead of getting into a partisan debate, we should—I think that this is not the time for division. This would be the time for all parties to join with farmers and everyone concerned in agriculture to defend our interests. It is not a war between farmers and the government; it is an extremely important process for the future of our agriculture with foreign countries. I think that if all parliamentarians and the farming community join together, we will be in an even stronger position to have our position adopted. It is very well balanced and could ensure prosperity for Canadian agriculture.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely timely and important debate. This motion is necessary because agricultural producers are losing confidence in this government.

What does the motion seek? What it seeks is very important. It seeks assurances from this government that it will do everything possible to support article XI of the GATT, that it will seek clarification of that article, and that it will seek strengthening of that article.

The motion seeks those things from the government because the very livelihood and the very future of supply management, the very future of dairy and poultry producers in this country, depend on the outcome of the GATT negotiations.

Let the record make it absolutely clear that if Canada caves in on article XI we will lose our dairy producers. We will lose our poultry producers. We will lose our egg producers. It is as simple as that. It will be the beginning of the end of an absolutely thriving and very successful industry in this country, an industry that will measure up against any other industry anywhere else in the entire world.

But the people who are in these industries are worried. They are sick of the possible prospect of the government caving in. That is why they are so worried and they have every reason in the world to be worried. Because, after all, we have to remember who we have over there in government. We have a Tory ideology that really does not believe in supply and management, a Tory ideology at the very base of all this that does not believe in orderly marketing.

I remind you, Mr. Speaker, and you will know this very well, that there was a resolution before the Progressive Conservative convention in the city of Toronto just this past summer. It was a resolution seeking support from supply and management and it went down to defeat. It went down to defeat. Little wonder the poultry producers and the dairy producers in this country are worried sick.

I do not have to remind you of how this government sold out Canada in the trade negotiations with the United States, the famous free trade negotiations. It sold us out. It sold us out. There is a lot of reason to believe that it will cave in again.

Oh, I know government members have given us assurances. They have given us assurances they are going to do their best. They are going to work hard and do everything to defend and strengthen article XI. But can we believe them? The Americans want to get their hands on article XI and want to destroy article XI. They want our market. Unfortunately, ever since we had this Prime Minister going back to 1984, every time the White House says "jump", the Prime Minister asks: "How high?" Whatever George wants, George gets.

How did we get the GST? How did the GST get its name, the GST? George said to, George said to. That is how the goods and services tax got its name.

We have a supply management system that is working extremely well. But if we were to cut out article XI and go for this tariffication system proposed by the Americans, the fact of the matter is our producers could not compete. There is no way they could compete.

Our producers have input costs that are much higher than those of their counterparts across the line in the United States. I just have to mention things like fuel, labour and things like that. The input costs are much higher on this side of the border.

Let there be no mistake about it. We have to preserve the industry. We have to preserve it. It is rather ironic that we are expressing concern for the industry at this particular time, because dairy and poultry are the most successful segments of our entire agricultural industry. They are. They are the most productive. They are the most stable.

Here we have on the other side of agriculture, grains and oilseeds in a lot of trouble, in a lot of trouble. We are trying to get help for them. Yet on this side we have dairy and poultry doing very well, thank you, and it is possible that the government may cave in and give the industry away. Does that make sense? I do not think it does.

This industry is extremely productive. My colleague from Lambton—Middlesex, who probably has as much expertise on this subject as anyone in the country, was pointing out this morning—and I want to point out again—that since 1971 the productivity in the dairy industry per cow has gone up 73 per cent compared to only 46 per cent in the United States and 3.5 per cent in the European community.

You can say the same thing for poultry. There is better egg production and they certainly have a better handle on disease control than their counterparts in the United States, a lot better. This is a productive and efficient industry. It is an industry that gives consumers quality, quality.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood was asking this morning in some of his remarks, and rightly so, what is in this for the consumer. He has a riding in Toronto full of consumers. I have a riding in Winnipeg full of consumers and I can understand a consumer's point of view when they say: "Well, what about this industry? Are we not already paying a lot in the way of food?"

Let me point out that when it comes to our disposable income, we spend about 11.5 per cent on food. We are probably about the second best country in the entire world when it comes to spending a portion of our disposable income, 11.5 per cent, on quality food.

Let me go on, because I know there are consumers who wonder about certain prices. Let me point out some prices to you. During the 1980s the cost of a box of corn flakes went up almost 100 per cent, about 94.5 per cent. The cost of a box of soda biscuits went up by 235 per cent, sweet cookies went up 135 per cent and cereals went up 194 per cent. As my hon. colleague points out, when those prices were going up, skyrocketing like that and the consumers were feeling it, what was happening to grain prices? They were going down. Farmers today are living with grain prices that their grandparents lived with back in the 1930s.

When the consumer looks at prices on the store shelf and expresses concern, and understandably so, do not blame the farmer. Do not blame supply and management. Those prices skyrocket after leaving the food processor. Those prices skyrocket after leaving the farm gate.

I just want to mention a couple of other points. The price of a litre of milk, for example, in the province of Ontario at the farm gate since 1980 has gone up 19 cents per litre. On the store shelf the price of a litre of milk has increased by 73 cents a litre or 97 per cent. I could go on and on and on comparing the prices that farmers and producers get with the prices that consumers have to pay, and over and over again the proof is there, that you cannot blame those consumer prices on the farmer. If there are unreasonable price increases, look at the people in the middle. That is where you should point your finger of blame.

I think I am running out of time. I just want to say over again that it is absolutely paramount for the future of supply management and the producers who work under supply management that we hold on to article XI. We remind the government that it must go to the wall on this article XI. It cannot be a party to any agreement that will cut out article XI.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are saying—and I know the member is fully aware of it—that they are tired of highly partisan debates on subjects like this very important one.

Maybe if this House was made up of 50 per cent women those highly partisan debates would not take place. We would discuss strictly what is going on.

The member is suggesting that the majority of the members on this side of House who represent rural ridings in Canada are not supporting farmers.

This is a nonsense debate. I have to say this, Mr. Speaker. The Government of Canada is trying to strengthen article XI against the world. We have certain countries, but the Uruguay round now has its mind directed to new ideas of tariffication. We are opposed to this. We want to strengthen this and we need the Liberal Party behind us to support our farmers, not to say out of the blue that we are not supporting farmers of this country. The facts are there and I want the member to recognize that.

We are not perfect people, but we are there. We are trying to help. We need the members of the Liberal Party and the NDP to say to the world that article XI is needed. We deserve it and we want it to protect the farmers of this country.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for the question.

I find it passing strange that at the very time when this government's agricultural policies are failing and agricultural producers in the country are losing confidence in the government, the parliamentary secretary pleads for understanding. She pleads for a non-partisan debate. Give me a break.

Here is a government that has been asked for months to provide emergency aid. Here is a government that promised farmers that it would tide them over when they moved from the old ad hoc system of payments to GRIP and NISA. Government members made a pledge and made a promise to farmers that they would fill the gap. They have not honoured that pledge and they have not honoured that promise. Why should we have any confidence in this government? The other thing is that the government reached an agreement with the United States in the FTA. There is an article in there which in effect says that each country would not raid each other's grain markets. The Americans have done it with their Export Enhancement Program. They have done it over and over again. What does this government do? Absolutely zero, zilch, nothing. It pretends the Americans do not exist or it pretends that the Americans are not doing anything. So why should we have any confidence in this government? The polls tell us that the Canadian people do not.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood for letting me go ahead of him. The reason is that I have a wife and four children I promised to meet in 15 minutes. He has been very kind to let me go ahead.

We are debating my party's opposition day motion to the effect that article XI of the GATT in regard to supply marketing systems should be strengthened and clarified during the current Uruguay round of GATT negotiations.

Let me, perhaps foolishly, attempt to state briefly the essence of this issue to the supply managed sectors of Canadian agriculture: industrial milk, eggs, chickens and turkeys. It is true, speaking as a westerner, that many of our producers in the supply managed sectors live in central Canada. But in 1989, the year for which I could obtain the figures, western Canadians had the following national market shares of our supply managed sectors: chicken, 24 per cent; turkey, approximately 28 per cent; eggs, approximately 34 per cent; and milk, 20 per cent.

There are, for example, about 5.6 million broilers in Alberta and 5.2 million broilers in B.C. Manitoba, the home of the member who just spoke, has about 2.5 million laying hens and B.C. has 2.8 million of the same.

In short, the supply managed sectors of our four western provinces provide a decent and stable living and reasonable consumer prices to thousands upon thousands of western Canadians.

In essence, article XI 2 allows for the existence of farm marketing boards in a country without violating the provisions of the GATT.

My understanding from the most knowledgeable Canadian expert on trade matters, a former GATT negotiator on the Tokyo and Kennedy round negotiations, is that the current Uruguay round of GATT negotiations will in all probability soon result in the removal of article XI from the GATT. If so, in consequence our provincial and national supply management boards will soon fold for violating the current GATT.

The trade expert friend to whom I referred a moment ago assures me that in reality, the long-term viability of most of these various boards, provincial and federal, has already been dealt a fatal blow by the particular wording of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Canadian food processors are increasingly relocating to the U.S. where most food products can, for a variety of reasons which were mentioned by the member who just spoke, be bought more cheaply than here and then exported back to consumers in Canada through retail food outlets.

If however GATT removes the article XI exemption, the present cabinet in Canada can attempt to blame the GATT member nations for the demise of our marketing boards, which will be a very misleading conclusion to draw.

Why, one might ask, are the GATT member governments, approximately 100 of them, now likely to approve the removal of article XI? In essence, it appears that both the current U.S. administration and the European community member nations have no further interest in keeping it on the books, so to speak.

The U.S. government dislikes supply management on ideological principle grounds. My trade friend believes that the European community member governments have simply and finally—one might say it sure took a long time—had enough of seeing 75 per cent of the European community budget go each year to the Common Agricultural Policy, CAP.

A constellation of other interest groups in Europe, environmentalists, workers needing retraining and poorer European community members like Portugal and Greece have recently carried the day. Wealthy farmers on the Paris plains and others have simply lost the campaign to maintain the European community's mega-subsidies on agricultural production.

The good news for the world, really, is that a very large GATT agricultural deal is in the works. It will be the biggest agricultural deal since 1957. It is likely to be announced shortly, thereby saving the current Uruguay round which, as everyone knows, has become beached on the agricultural rock.

My trade expert friend believes that a 35 per cent cut in the European community support prices for cereals which will bind the GATT and an over-all drop of about 35 per cent on export subsidies for agricultural exports are coming very soon, within a matter of weeks.

A new and better arrangement on GATT dispute settlements is also likely to emerge. There might also be a framework agreement on services. I remind you, Sir, that about 64 per cent of Canadians work in the service sector, so that would be a very good thing.

In short, it will be a minor or a major GATT miracle with good results for all but our supply managed and much abused farm communities.

I would answer with this. Today in Canada each farm family across the nation feeds approximately 65 non-farm families. That is in the parliamentary secretary's riding. It is in virtually every riding in the country which has farmers.

For virtually all of our farm families across Canada outside the supply managed sector, one or more of the spouses are required to work off their farm to feed their own families. Is that not disgraceful?

Somebody put it very well recently. "Our farm fields of dreams", she said, "have become acres of despair". Those opposite, if they run true to form with respect to article XI will see our remaining healthy sectors under supply management reduced to the squalor that affects so many other sectors.

Shame on those opposite who represent in this place the views of a few thousand wealthy residents primarily of Toronto and Montreal.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the now Liberal member who used to be a PC member in this caucus knows very well that the Progressive Conservative government of Canada supports farmers, is there to help farmers, and that the actual third level of revenue systems is on its way to being dealt with.

It takes a certain amount of time I know, and I am fully behind the farmers in western Canada. I remember when I sat on the agriculture standing committee that one day farmers from around Regina said to me that because of the despair and the low revenue of the farmers, family violence was emerging from among the agricultural sector which was not there before.

I was very concerned about this, given the fact that the farmers of this country are family oriented people. The emergence of family violence is a damaging factor.

I want to ask the member this. He is speaking about non-contingency agriculture that absolutely needs to export. On the other hand, Canada is faced with the reality of a supply management market which deserves to be kept in place because it helps. We know the difference.

He pointed out very well that if you are in agriculture in a contingency situation, you work as hard as the others but you are in a better situation than if you are not. This is one of the realities and I want to ask the member what should we be doing now to have both realities of farming in this country.

• (1630)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the hon. member opposite, I think that she seriously misunderstood what I said.

I said that there is presently a crisis in the non-contingency sector across the country. I wish she had come along, just a few days, when I campaigned for the Liberals in Saskatchewan. She would have seen the poverty, the hardship and the distrust of the farmers of this province which is so important to us.

Since the hon. member is from Quebec, I would like to quote some figures regarding her province, if I may, Mr. Speaker. Of the 300,000 farmers across Canada, there are 41,000 in Quebec. They represent 26.4 per cent of our farm population, but own 40 per cent of the Canadian dairy industry, with their 500,000 plus dairy cows.

In Quebec, as she certainly knows, there are 3.8 million chickens and 15 million broilers. So, how can she be telling her constituents, from the riding of Oka I believe, that if my friend and myself are right, she will give these farmers another chance at a decent income and having a decent standard of living?

I know that she just loves the Canada-United States trade deal. I used to be a member of her caucus. Is she under the impression that farm products regulatory boards are better than FPAs? That life is getting easier for these farmers and her constituents? I think that, in all honesty, she will have to say no, Mr. Speaker. She must tell her constituents and that this trade deal has been a disaster for thousands and thousands of farmers in Quebec.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, listening to opposition members makes me think that they must surely pray to the Lord every night to sit on the opposition benches when the time comes to make difficult decisions. They must surely be glad to be on the other side and always contradicting what the government does.

I asked the hon. member what he would do if he were sitting at GATT in place of the ministers who have to protect two agricultural sectors, one subject to quotas and the other not, in a world that exports, that buys and sells. Could he give me in writing his vision of what the minister could defend at GATT?

Mr. Kilgour: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would tell her to read the motion we are debating today.

I think the reality, Mr. Speaker, is that those groups, as I said, who represent the opinions of the wealthy in Montreal and Toronto, must understand one thing: they are eliminating the protection as such for farmers in Quebec and the rest of Canada, first, because of the trade agreement with the United States, and second, with its position on GATT now—which is not stated publicly, of course—but because of its position in GATT now in the Uruguay Round.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of participating in this debate. In my riding of Broadview—Greenwood there are very few people who really understand what supply management is all about. I will take the words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services when she said earlier in this House today that she felt uncomfortable that we seemed to be taking a partisan approach in this debate.

I have been listening to the debate since my colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex started earlier today and quite frankly I did not detect that tone of partisanship that she referred to. I have not detected anything in this House today that would suggest that we on this side of the House do not share the commitment that I hear from the government side today that it wants to keep the current supply management system in place.

In fact, earlier in the day I rose and addressed the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, the member for Huron—Bruce. I complimented him on the hard work he has done not only in his riding but throughout the world. I have been with this man when he has travelled and worked on behalf of Canada and I think he has done a terrific job.

What we have here in this country today is a genuine crisis of confidence. Also, there is a feeling out there that politicians in general are not trusted, not just politicians on the government side, politicians on this side.

As my hon. colleague mentioned this morning, this round of GATT we are heading into is an historic round. It is going to be a very complex round. We are in the middle of one of the most vicious trade wars that has ever happened in the history of the world.

When we have farm rallies coast to coast, the likes of which we have not seen in many years, it would be absolutely irresponsible for us on this side of the House not to put forward the views of all of those constituents who are concerned about the resolve of the government, concerned about whether or not it is going to take a firm stand. They are concerned about that because there have been incidents in the past where the trust that the government has been given has been shaken.

I am not saying that trust given to Liberals in the past has also been shaken, but we are not talking about the past right now, we are talking about the present, and we are talking about a very important up and coming meeting.

Our responsibility on this side of the House is to make sure that the French, Germans, Italians, and everyone who is present at that round understand that it is not only the position of the Government of Canada but it is also the position of the opposition that we want the current supply management system to be in place and we are in fact united on that point.

The other point that we have to raise in this House is the fact that this is not just an issue for those people who actually live and work on the farms. In my riding there are over 300 restaurants. The restaurants in my riding are the primary employer. They employ not only on a full-time basis, they employ on a part-time basis, and we depend on quality food, security of supply, and on stable prices. Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Della Noce: I'm hungry.

Mr. Mills: The hon. member for Laval-Est just mentioned that he is hungry. Whenever you are in Toronto, you are welcome in the riding of Broadview—Greenwood, Queen Street, the Danforth Drive. Please come. You are welcome.

• (1640)

Whenever I get a chance to speak here today on national television, I am not too shy about promoting my riding and the great restaurants that we have. You are all welcome.

The bottom line, Mr. Speaker, is this is not just a rural issue. This is an issue for those people who live in urban areas. As I mentioned earlier, last January when I had the opportunity to speak at the Soviet-U.S. citizen summit on the environment, and I was there for a few days, I had some spare time to walk around Moscow and visit some of the grocery stores. We in this country cannot imagine the desperate state that the people are in in terms of food supply in a place like Moscow. They start lining up for their food supplies at seven o'clock in the morning.

It was embarrassing for me to see senior citizens with their brown sacks lining up for food. What was more embarrassing was to go into these stores and see the quality. Never mind the fact that the supply was virtually limited, it was the quality.

We in this country are blessed with not only quality food, we are blessed with security of supply. We are also blessed with the second best food prices in the world. That is something that we take for granted.

We take for granted the life of someone who lives on a farm. How many people have ever thought about what it is really like to live on a farm? In Toronto the only real reminder that you have about what a farmer's life is all about is if you get up early in the morning, and some mornings I get up early, and turn on radio station CFRB, which is one of our larger stations. At five o'clock in the morning you hear the news for the first five minutes and after that, for the next 10 minutes, you hear the farm report.

That is the last you hear of it. Why? Because a farmer gets up at five o'clock in the morning. He works until six o'clock at night. He works seven days a week. Very rarely do they get a day off. Then they have problems like lack of rain and, therefore, the crops are in trouble. Too much rain and they have got a problem. Try and find people today who want to work on a farm.

We in this country have, I believe, one of the finest farm systems that exists anywhere in the world. One of the reasons why we have that farm system is because our farmers have had a system that has allowed them to produce quality food with stable prices. We as Canadians have benefited from that from all walks of life, from all regions of the country from coast to coast, to coast.

I cannot believe that anyone in this House or anyone in this country does not believe that we as a country must have an image, must have a strength to show that we are a nation that measures our strength by the mouths we feed, not only here but all over the world, a nation that measures our strength at the same time by the environment we protect.

I want, and I have less than a minute left, to try and give one constructive piece of advice to the Government of Canada. It said earlier today that it is going to the GATT round committed to keep the supply management system in place. I mentioned this last week to the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds.

It is no good to communicate our problem just to those officials and just to those politicians who attend that meeting. Go over the heads of those officials and go over the heads of those ministers of agriculture and go right to the people of Europe. Take some of that money out of the envelope that is promoting Canada's 125th birthday and put it into communicating some of the concerns that we in this country have and some of the necessary things that we have to do in terms of protecting our environment with farmers, not only in Europe but here, so that we can get through this crisis together.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his excellent remarks. As an urban member, he has taken a very deep interest in agriculture. We really appreciate that because this debate has taken on a new tone of interest in both urban and rural Canada, and that is precisely the way the issue should be.

My hon. colleague talked about his restaurants and the quality of their food and of course the production of food within Canada generally. He realizes that in order to keep up this quality and quantity of product, we are going to require great negotiating skills as well as negotiating tools in the present GATT rounds. Therefore, some things become very important.

In terms of skills, I have not heard too many compliments in the House today about the way this issue is being handled. Second, with regard to negotiating tools, the Minister for International Trade, as was so aptly put forward this morning by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, stated that each nation participating in the GATT round had to submit the amount of money that was being spent on programs to support agriculture in the various countries, and $8.8 billion was submitted as the figure going into agriculture and government programs here in Canada, a totally inflated figure, and then $2.2 billion going into the dairy industry of Canada. That is another totally inflated figure.

I want to ask the hon. member who has just spoken: if we are going to win this debate, why are we giving away tools such as that? Why are we inflating those figures? Surely we are providing an argument for the other countries to use against us. Has the government not shot itself in its own foot on behalf of the agricultural community of Canada?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I wish I had an absolutely sure reason why the government seems to from time to time play gymnastics with its figures. I really do not have the answer to that.

It seems to me that part of the reason why we have this tension in the country today is that if we play gymnastics with figures too often, the trust factor breaks down. That is probably the greatest reason why we have a crisis today, not in terms of just the agricultural community, but in every other sector. There is not a sector of our economy today that does not feel the lack of trust. Trust is the central issue now in public life. Nothing else really matters.

I believe that because of the intensity of this debate today, we are saying to the government that we trust you so that when you go to these GATT rounds in the next short period of time, you will live up to the commitment you made in this House today, and you better not come back with an empty basket.

I repeat, I believe that if we can send a signal to people that we want to be a nation that measures our strength by the mouths we feed not only here and abroad, but also that we are a nation that is concerned about our environment, I believe that if we put that message into the GATT negotiations, we can maybe put pressure on some of those European countries which are ignoring some of those environmental regulations.

Maybe we can get them on focus, and that will put a more balanced approach to this agricultural problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Monteith): I have received written notice from the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina that he is unable to move his motion during private members' hour on Friday, October 4, 1991.

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a). Accordingly, I am directing the table officer to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), private members' hour will thus be suspended, and the House will continue with the business before it prior to private members' hour.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House today and speak in full and complete support of the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

The member and I go back many years in both politics and agriculture, more years than I would like to admit to, and I am proud to support the motion of the member whose riding borders on mine in southwestern Ontario.

This morning the hon. member from Elgin—Norfolk in debate and in answering questions—I did not have the opportunity to question him—stated that he had replaced the Hon. John Wise who was then Minister of Agriculture. He referred to the hon. minister as the finest agriculture minister the Progressive Conservative Party ever had. He was a gentleman, and I support those views 100 per cent. In the riding of Kent we always held the Hon. John Wise in the highest esteem. I remember the hon. minister making a statement that if the marketing boards were ever to weaken he would resign. In September 1988 the Hon. John Wise resigned.

Later today I hope to get the opportunity to ask the hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk that question. This time, I am speaking on article XI of the GATT.

As everyone involved in agriculture is aware, the current GATT talks will in large measure determine the future of farming and marketing boards and supply management as we have known it in Canada. The director general, Arthur Dunkel, has fixed a wheat deadline to produce a final framework. A complete GATT package should be reached in early November.

The vast number of subsidies for agriculture by the European Economic Community is the main stumbling block. The EEC proposes to cut internal support by 30 per cent over a 10-year period while considering to increase markets by only 3 per cent.

The EEC countries will not accept a complete elimination of support or even a 70 per cent or 90 per cent reduction for which the United States is calling. Canada wants 100 per cent elimination of all existing export subsidies over a 10-year period.

The real issue on all these complex negotiations is our government support of supply management. Is it firm? As my colleague for Lambton—Middlesex has outlined, he believes that a deal has been reached that would include the tariffication of article XI of the GATT.

This would have serious negative effects on supply management in Canada. We have the best marketing systems in the world and nothing should jeopardize Canadian agriculture.

Supply management is based on three fundamental pillars: import restrictions, adequate price and production control. Our supply management system must be maintained and improved by the GATT talks.

Our system has brought stability for both producers and consumers. Canada's egg, poultry and dairy producers firmly believe that any final agreement not meeting that bottom line should be rejected.

Given that the government says it is committed to its supply management system in Canada, does the government recognize that to be viable and effective border protection is needed to ensure that imported products do not undermine our own production or returns?

As well, we must have firm border protection while allowing us to export. The inspection side of Port Huron, Michigan is staffed 100 per cent by full-time inspectors. What is the situation on the Canadian side in Sarnia?

A neighbour of mine and of the hon. Speaker was turned back at the border by Dr. Brown from the department of agriculture who was a vet for the U.S. government. This returned load cost the farmer $3,000 in losses. It was strictly a sham, in my view. I was talking to the doctor and I asked him if Carla was giving him a little trouble over the free trade agreement and GATT. He said: "No. The law has been there since 1907 and I am just upholding it". It is things like this that we are running into at the border.

I am meeting with some farmers in my riding this weekend to discuss the GATT. They want a chance to compete fairly with the support of the federal government. One is the chairman of the Kent Dairy Association and his group.

The issue of tariffication is one of the major stumbling blocks to a settlement. The proposed tariff equivalents would not offset the price advantage of American products. Tariffication would not limit the import of supply managed products. With no specific limit on the level of imports, it is impossible to run a supply management system at either the federal or provincial level. Tariffication for supply managed commodities would damage the entire Canadian economy.

As the agricultural industry goes, so goes the whole Canadian economy. Production would decline in most, if not all, regions in Canada as family farms are forced out of business. Our industry must be protected since the cost of an operation in Ontario is much more than a similar operation in Michigan.

I know that in my operation, in corn alone, it has a net of $90 to work with that that I do not have. I am not competing on a level field. Another example is the difference in interest rates on a 10-year mortgage, $14,690, a difference in favour of the U.S. farmer of 22.4 per cent.

U.S. gasoline is $1.35 plus a 10 per cent annual rebate for using gas that is 10 per cent ethanol as an environmental measure. Farm delivered gasoline in Canada was 54.9 cents a litre. The difference is 61 per cent higher in Ontario.

Fertilizers are 20 per cent a tonne higher in Canada. Dairy feed supplements with 40 per cent protein cost 73 per cent more in Ontario.

What about machinery parts? A package of six Case International French bottom plough points cost $115 in Emmett, Michigan. In Exeter, Ontario, the same points cost $143.70, a difference of 24 per cent. I am the same distance from Emmett, Michigan as I am from Exeter.

Our agricultural industry is vitally important to our nation. Too often people go to the grocery store or eat in a restaurant and think the food is magically produced. Our farmers are the bedrock of Canada and they are not getting a fair return for their efforts. A box of corn flakes is nearly 100 per cent corn, and yet the farmer gets only 14 per cent. That price last evening in an Ottawa store was $4.89.

A box of wheat crackers has increased in price at the retail level by 235 per cent between 1980 and 1989, but the value of the wheat in those same crackers is down 43 per cent.

If supply management is damaged by the GATT negotiations, Canada's dairy farmers could face a direct loss of $143 million in internal support plus $75 million in import protection for a total of about $218 million.

Farmers right now are being faced with Mother Nature and historic low prices. A Chrysler bought in 1949 when wheat was $2.85 a bushel was $2,800 and change. Today with the price of wheat 1,000 bushels will not put the tires and wheels on that car.

The farmers in my riding certainly know of the government's lack of support. On the Kent—Essex drought situation, the feds should join with the provincial government in transition funding until the next crop year.

Our poultry, egg and dairy industries must not be pawns in the GATT talks. The government has talked a good line and has said it supports the strengthening and clarification of article XI. We hope that it will not back down. Canadian farmers are worried about their future with GATT and with the free trade deal as double whammies hitting the agricultural industry.

All of us in this House support an end to the subsidy war. I am sure members from all parties hope for a successful resolution to the article XI question. The farmers of this nation deserve a fair share of the Canadian food dollar, an income that will allow them to survive and continue producing the highest quality food, not only for the people of Canada but for the opening markets of the world.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I was pleased by the tone of the speech of the previous speaker, the member for Broadview—Greenwood. I hope he will listen to my comments.

I want to urge the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, whom I know is a very successful businessman, to join the Standing Committee on Agriculture because it is important for other sectors of the economy to participate in the debates relating to agriculture. He noted, in a good manner, that the business people in this country need to keep alive the supply management concept that this country is part of.

I want to say to the member who just spoke that this is a reality for the caucus members as well. I know, Madam Speaker, that you are a member of a very successful agricultural community. You will be inclined with me to say that never will any member of this caucus, the government that I represent, support any suggestion or attempt to withdraw, dismantle or do anything that will hurt or affect the supply management system in this country which protects the revenues and the lives of thousands and thousands of Canadians. We simply will not support that, Madam Speaker, and I am sure you will agree with me.

I want to ask the member if he is aware of this new tariffication system that the rest of the world is trying to put in place during those GATT negotiations and, if so, does he agree with it?

Mr. Crawford: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

I am as aware of the tariffication in other parts of the country as I am aware of free trade in other parts of the country and as I am aware of the GST in other parts of the country, which have all been the downfall of those areas. We as Canadians look to other countries for guidance. I do not know why we always pick the worst part of every country's programs. Here we are with tariffication and we are going to let other commodities come into Canada and completely decimate our crops.

I have been impressed by the questions of the hon. member this afternoon and of the different members here in the House. I was hoping that in future she would join us over here. She seems to be a real fighter. I certainly would appreciate having her on our side.

I am aware of the question. The answer is that it would be the start and ruination of article XI. It would eat away at it within five or ten years. It would completely wipe out our marketing boards.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I just could not let this pass by, and I don't know how I am going to finesse this question through you back to my colleague. I could not let that compliment go by from the member for Argenteuil—Papineau. Through you to that hon. member I would just like to let her know that she was so generous there today that she has an outstanding invitation from me to come to my riding and I would be happy to take her to dinner on the Danforth.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before we resume debate I would like the House to allow me to thank the hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk who was kind enough in his position as a member of the panel of committee chairman to preside over the debate this afternoon for an hour while I was attending other duties. I know everyone has been quite kind to him and I thank you all very much and I thank the hon. member very much.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Thank you, Madam Speaker and colleagues of the House of Commons. It is indeed a pleasure for me to engage in debate and discussion on what is no doubt a very, very important situation facing Canadians. Let us be honest, when it comes to agriculture, other traders in agricultural commodities, even our neighbours to the south of us I think find the subsidy war a problem. A war is really what it has become with regard to agricultural products.

Let me make some comment on the proposal put forward as an opposition day for discussion. In my view, it is healthy that it was brought forward in such a manner because it does allow all sides of the House to discuss this matter and put our positions on it. If I read what I have heard so far correctly, there are not a lot of differences of opinion on this matter before us today. The argument, I suppose, is should one of these other parties be in power today they would do a far better job, or the fringe parties that would like to govern this country, whether they are in Quebec or in the west, would be able to do a far better job of dealing with this serious situation we are confronted with.

Can you imagine Preston Manning, for example, going out and solving a problem on a policy which he adopted directly from the Conservative platform? Read what was said in this House just last week by the member for Beaver River, who chooses not often in the country to debate the agricultural policy. As I read it, when examining the policy of GATT and the problems with agricultural subsidies, that group states: "The Reform Party recognizes that there is a need for transitional support to protect agricultural producers". With the dilemma we face right now with $2 wheat, you would think that the Reform Party would be at every one of those western rallies of farmers who are demanding some action by the government. In reality, the Reform Party does not go as far as this party does in terms of finding solutions to those problems, which we have demonstrated in the past.

I find it quite amazing that the Reform Party seems to have a solution but in fact it has none. They use these funny little platitudes such as "well, when the price of these commodities come down in this country and that country, we will get out of our problem". That is not solving a problem, that is sitting back waiting for something to happen.

I am going to jump around a little bit and I am going to go back to May 1986. In 1986 our Prime Minister was in Tokyo. While some splinter parties were dreaming up ways of electing members to the House of Commons, our Prime Minister was dealing with one thing and it is probably the first time in a long time that under the G-7 our Prime Minister of Canada convinced others that agriculture and its concerns of trade are very important and should be dealt with. In an interview he said: "In an interview we decided, as you know, how important it was to raise agriculture and for the first time as a group,"—this is the G-7—" the heads of government focused on the paradox of preaching freer trade while pumping billions of dollars into subsidies for agriculture.

This topic dominated our discussions yesterday afternoon and today on the economic side.

Protectionism is damaging to everyone and especially to the poor countries which depend on agriculture almost entirely for their livelihood. Canada has been obliged to take some actions but to try and even match others, as I indicated to our colleagues at the summit, for Canada to even attempt to match the magnitude of subsidies elsewhere would savage the government's deficit reduction efforts".

I think we could even probably go further and I think we could say that in this House of Commons on those in the House elected, and not those who would like to be from some of these fringe parties, there is no way that the government could match the subsidies on agricultural products that have been put forth by Europeans mostly and subsequently by the Americans trying to beat them out on some of the trade they once had.

I think there is probably a consensus in this House that that is the fact. From time to time opposition members have stood up in this House criticizing this government for too little too late. I can recall in 1986 and 1987, $1.2 billion, $800 million, those kinds of figures of money were put at the agricultural problem, we were saying too little too late.

Whether it is $1 billion this year, or another billion next year, it seems like we have not addressed the problem and the argument put forward is that we would be stronger at GATT.

Mr. Mills: We want you to stiffen up your back.

Mr. Holtmann: Okay, I heard from the hon. member that we want to stiffen up our back. Listen to what was said here yesterday. Canada threatens retaliation over EC's farm subsidies. Is that not stiffening up your back?

Let me just quote this: "London. Agricultural minister, William McKnight, warmed his European counterpart yesterday that Canada will retaliate if there is still no resolution in sight to the trans-Atlantic grain subsidy war by the end of the year". It goes on to say: "I didn't put it forward as a threat. I put it forward as a fact".

I would think all members in this House would applaud the strength that this government has put into changing the GATT. This is it. This is the kind of thing that they thought this government never had the guts to do but it is doing it. Let us just go back, not because of this resolution, just a few days ago to September 30. Here is another news release. "The federal government", and you have all talked about it, you have all admitted it is there, you could not reaffirm it from your side any more than we could on our side, "is firmly committed to negotiate an agreement which protects our supply management programs".

Nobody has denied that, except a fringe party that would like to rule this country, the Reform Party. It does not even want supply management programs.

The issue is trust. I suspect there is an element of people that think this government is going to sell it away. There has never been any evidence given to date that we intended—

Mr. Mills: Not sell it, give it away.

Mr. Holtmann: Give it away. There has never been any evidence, Madam Speaker, that this government intends to give that very fundamental part of the agricultural scene away to anyone. In fact, minister after minister and, year after year, our Prime Minister said that very thing in this House.

Let us go back to another news release. This is not so long ago, the hon. Minister of Agriculture: "I want to underline to Mr. McSharry the disastrous effects the subsidy war is having on the Canadian agrifood industry". He points as straight a point as anybody else could make it. One would argue that if you looked at the New Democratic Party.

Would for example the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca have been able to make a stronger case than our Bill McKnight did? I doubt it.

How about the Leader of the New Democratic Party? Is she not, that wonderful charming lady, a forceful individual? I rather doubt that it would have happened any better than under this government with the importance this government places on this very issue.

Here we have a government that defends the right of marketing boards supply management and at the same time attempts to find some sanity in the trade war. It is a trade war.

An hon. member: It was that party resolution that caused the problems.

Mr. Holtmann: Somebody mentioned it was a party resolution that caused this event. Do we realize how many times we would need to have days in the House to discuss party resolutions if we looked at the resolutions of the New Democratic Party? Would they fly in the face of this House? The same is true of resolutions of the last Liberal convention. Would it even think of introducing them as a party in this House? Likely not. Those are realities that from time to time a party does put before its general membership and asks for an opinion.

An hon. member: They don't mean anything.

Mr. Holtmann: They do mean something. I know the member is baiting me. Do they mean anything? I suppose they mean as much to the Conservatives as they do to the New Democrats or as they do to the Liberal Party. It does not get a real airing. They do not not get a debate, some of these resolutions that we have. They do not get the same debate as they clearly do in the House of Commons. You have given it a whole day.

The point is, the debate is healthy because it draws attention internationally to the concerns we collectively have as a people in our farming community of the total damage this does to our agricultural sector. The European common market, which we all sometimes admire as a collective organization, is not without its problems internally with respect to this very subject. I suspect lately if any members have had the opportunity in this House or you, Madam Speaker, as I know from time to time you meet international bodies and delegations, to talk to the Europeans and ask them about the French farmers within the EEC and whether they are prepared to play on the same playing field as they are with their member countries, you would find that there might be a little war brewing over in Europe on this very subject hoping that they can still maintain their trade balanced within each other's respective communities.

There are no simple solutions. There is a desire to get the international community to really look seriously upon us as by far the fairest traders in agricultural commodities. I can also say to my colleagues in the House that we demand fair trade among European countries with our products, yet we do not even have free trade within our provincial boundaries.

That has got to be part of our whole constitutional change as was proposed by this government. Maybe it needs to be altered, but I am saying if we want to say to the Europeans that we are totally free traders, then we should eliminate the trade barriers that exist between the provinces. They distort natural market productions and market forces which would make our products even that much more competitive on the international scene.

I would wonder if the New Democratic Party has a position on the interprovincial trade barriers. I would be interested to know its comments on it. As a way of unifying our country I think that is a major step we have to make.

While this debate is important, I think it is pretty fair to say that the policies taken by this administration in this particular area need very little criticism. It may be up to some criticism. I think if we look at the amount of moneys that the government over the years, as long as I have been elected to this House, has applied to agriculture, it has not been insignificant.

At the same time, it has not solved that international problem. The Reform Party quite flippantly says: "Oh, we will just have to get them to all reduce little by little and we will all be wonderful children at this big, international family. We will be a very happy group of farmers and agricultural exporters, and our economy will boom and grow."

Where is Preston Manning when we are having a dilemma with farm demonstrations? Where is he? He is in Atlantic Canada on a little fishing boat floating around. He never dared show his face at an agricultural meeting. That group wants to quickly reduce any funding going directly to farmers because they have this funny, secret little formula.

The member for Beaver River does not show up at a farm rally to find out how she can help the grassroots. The new Reform Party for those of you who do not know wants to represent grassroots.

My friend from Winnipeg knows very well that you have to be within the ridings to understand what people are saying, especially if you have little agricultural background. You cannot go around looking at wheat fields and saying: "Isn't this terrible?"

When there is a demand to do something, you have to come up with a policy. I admire the member for Winnipeg St. James for attending farm rallies. He may not have always said the right thing, but you have to listen to what farmers are saying. You have got to be there to form an opinion and his opinion may not be the same as mine in terms of finding a solution, but for goodness sakes, he goes to the meetings.

We have a new party in Quebec that is going to solve all the problems of Quebec. I have never heard one of them talk about concerns they had for the farmers in the province. There is no imagination, there are no ideas. By listening too much to the splinter groups deciding what the future of the country will be will fracture any concrete decisions that the government has to take.

While this is a very important consideration that is put forward as a proposal, it is not so much a proposal but a reassurance that those supply management boards will stay. I believe we made our case to the Europeans; that it is not on the table. I as a former farmer—

An hon. member: As a former alderman.

Mr. Holtmann: My principal business now is politics.

As a former farmer, I am very well satisfied that in fact those situations as have evolved in Canada and were set up by Canada—earlier I heard a speech of a member who said that they were there when they initiated the Egg Marketing Agency which was in a mess at one time—served Canada well, and I believe they reflect not at all on our ability to trade as a free trader.

I think I can conclude—I do not know how much time there is—by saying that the debate is important. Agriculture is important. I think there have been enough illustrations and demonstrations that our combined Ministers of Agriculture and our Prime Minister have constantly put agriculture at the head of their agenda items every year since I have been elected.

It has been a long time since a Prime Minister has given the consideration to agriculture as our Prime Minister has. You may criticize him, but you cannot say he has avoided such an important issue. Nobody can say that in this place, because there is just too much evidence the other way.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that, as always, the member for Portage—Interlake has been interesting to listen to, if not always informative in the sense that I do not agree with everything he has to say.

I do agree with him though that the Reform Party is not levelling with a lot of the people it is courting for support. It is not levelling with those people with respect to its agricultural policies, it is not levelling with those people with respect to policies on medicare, it is not levelling with those people with respect to its policies about the GST and a host of other policies.

It is hoping that somehow its position with respect to Quebec will cause people not to take seriously all their other policies and vote for them in that respect alone. I think it would be a tragedy if people in the west or Ontario or anywhere else were simply to support the Reform Party on the basis of their perceived position in the constitutional debate. It is a position that is largely irresponsible, in the sense that it does not have to take what happens to the country into account in its constitutional posturing.

I did not get up to talk about the Reform Party. I got up to talk about this motion. I think I will respond to a few of the things that the member from Portage—Interlake said first and then, if I have any time left, I will try and speak directly to the motion.

The member mentioned the European community. What he did not mention and what was significant by its absence is the fact that the European community and its economic integration, its single market that is coming into effect in 1992, is a single market that is accompanied by a social charter. One of the conditions for the single market in 1992 in Europe is the social charter. Yet the proposition brought forward by the New Democrats, the leader of the NDP, the premier of Ontario and others that there be a social charter as part of the constitutional package is not taken seriously by the government. At the same time the member, on behalf of that same government, wants us to take seriously the European Economic Community and the way in which it is arranged for the free flow of goods and capital services, et cetera, within the 12 European countries.

You cannot have it both ways. If you want to cite the European community experience then you also have to take seriously the fact that it has brought forward a social charter. I would invite the member to think about that inconsistency and not cite the European community unless he is willing at least to admit the objective fact of the matter, that a social charter in Europe has accompanied the things which he wants us somehow to imitate or take seriously here in the Canadian context.

The member for Argenteuil—Papineau and others spoke about the government's commitment to the preservation of supply management. I am glad to hear those words, but I think they are grounds for anxiety. These motions do not just originate out of nothing. They originate out of a legitimate anxiety on the part of many people in the agricultural community and in the political community, but this government is not as committed to supply management as it may seem.

Let me cite a number of reasons why I think that anxiety is legitimate beginning with the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement in the North American context, never mind the global context, has created economic conditions for the kind of pressure that could eventually erode marketing boards here in Canada, with or without an agreement at GATT to do so.

I do not want to re-live the entire FTA debate, but the fact of the matter is that regardless of whether or not the text of the FTA agreement itself said that supply management systems would be disposed of, the fact is that the FTA created an economic context in which the pressure on supply management will eventually be irresistible because of the increased degree of free trade in food processing. Our food processors, having to compete with imports or whatever you want to call them that come from the United States in a non-supply managed context, are eventually going to be in a situation where something has to give. Either the food processors will give and go to the United States, or our supply managed system will have to go. These are the kinds of pressures which have been set up by the free trade agreement supported, promoted and passed by this government. People who know that, know that the commitment of this government to supply management is certainly not 100 per cent.

People also know that this is a government which has tried to make light of the whole phenomenon of cross-border shopping. It is another phenomenon which is not unrelated to this whole question of supply management. What are a lot of people doing when they cross-border shop, particularly in places where they can go every day? In many cases they are going across to buy milk, cheese and other dairy products, things which some people would argue are cheaper in the United States because they have a completely market oriented way of dealing with these particular products.

The government does not want to admit that. It wants to play down the cross-border shopping phenomenon. We saw that even today, when I asked a question of the Minister of National Revenue and he refused once again to acknowledge the full extent of the problem that figures show, when you take into account just how much Canadians are spending in the United States and not just how many trips they are making.

With respect to the whole question of supply management, people with any sort of political memory know other things about this government. They know that some people on the other side made their political careers out of and cut their political teeth on struggles against marketing boards. I could name some of them on that side who made their political careers initially by opposing marketing boards within the agricultural community in their respective provinces. Some of them have become ministers.

One fellow in particular, whom I otherwise quite respect, except that we disagree on this fundamental economic point, was the one responsible for taking oats out of the mandate of the Canadian Wheat Board when he was minister. This is another form of orderly marketing.

It is quite unreasonable for the government to say to members of the opposition and members of the public at large that we should relax, that we should trust this government when it comes to supply management. We know that as individuals many of them have a history of being against supply management. We know that as a government it has a history of supporting agreements, in this case the free trade agreement that has created a context which has put pressure on our supply management system. The lack of trust that exists there is not something that has just been created by opposition politicians for political purposes. It is a well grounded anxiety.

The situation that so many of our farmers find themselves in, particularly our grain farmers, has also been a subject of much debate today. I hope I will be forgiven if I use a bit of humour to describe the situation that so many of our farmers find themselves in.

I am reminded of the story about a fellow who comes into the hardware store and buys a hammer for $10. He goes out and sells it on the street. He buys it for $10 and just in front of the store he sells it for $5.

The next day he comes in and buys two hammers for $10 each. He goes out on to the street and sells them to the people on the street for $5. The next day he comes in and buys three hammers for $10 each and goes out on to the street and sells them for $5. This continues: four hammers, five hammers, ten hammers.

Finally the guy in the hardware store is having a hard time keeping up with all of this so he asked: "What on earth are you doing? You are buying these hammers for $10 and selling them on the street for $5. How on earth can you make a living?" The guy said: "It is not great, but it beats farming".

This is the situation that so many of our farmers find themselves in. What it costs them to produce the product is far and away more than what they are able to get in this tremendous international marketplace that has created this incredible tragedy. People on one side of the world are crying, literally, because land that belonged to their family for generation after generation is being lost to the banks as a result of wheat at prices that would have been acceptable in the 1930s. On the other side of the world people are crying, weeping, suffering and dying because they cannot lay their hands on that product. Is this not a wonderful achievement of human civilization? What a wonderful global order we live in that sees these two sets of teary-eyed faces; one because they are losing their livelihood and their family way of life and the land they have lived on for generations, and the other where people are starving because we cannot somehow get these two things together.

We do not have a system that depends on supply and need. We have a system that depends on supply and demand. Demand is defined by the ability to pay and demand is defined by the ability of certain companies and countries, in this case in the United States, to manipulate that international marketplace so that they can have the upper hand.

This government has been afraid, as have so many other governments over the years, to say what is really going on here. What is really going on here is evil. It is evil that we should have this kind of system where people are starving to death and, on the other hand, the grain is piling up on the ground for lack of the ability to sell it at a reasonable price.

The problem with the government, it seems to me, with respect to the so-called trade war between the Europeans and the United States is that given its sort of economic ideology it cannot really understand what the Europeans are doing. Because the government wants to understand the world completely in market terms, it thinks that the Europeans are just sort of being bad guys, that they are just cheating. In a world in which obviously we all accept, according to the Conservatives, that the market is the thing that rules, then people who distort the market by having the common agricultural policy or various things like this, these are bad people; these are people who do not understand reality.

What the government does not understand is that the Europeans have not made just an economic policy or an economic decision. They have made a social decision. They have made a social policy decision that they want to preserve their farmers and their farms and the way of life associated with farmers. This is completely above and beyond the capacity of this government and the Americans to understand.

Instead of making that same decision and saying "do we want to make a similar decision", do we want to say: "We will support our farmers and our farms and that particular way of life because that is a social decision, not an economic decision"? Instead, they are trying to do it on the cheek, so to speak. They are trying year by year, protest by protest, program by program, to make this problem go away by just giving them a little more. They are never willing to go the whole way, to make the full commitment, to say—and I think this would help with respect to the Americans and the Europeans to give a clear signal—"You are not going to win this war with us. You are not going to let your particular economic strategy wipe out the Canadian agricultural community". We have not given that kind of signal. We have also looked like we are saying: "Oh, gee, do we have to put another dollar on the table? Okay, well if there is enough pressure, and maybe there is an election in Saskatchewan or some other contingent factor, we will come up with some more money".

Instead, we should be making it absolutely clear to the people what we are up against in this and that we value our farm community as much as they value theirs. So far that is not the signal that this government has put out, in spite of the fact that it has spent, and I acknowledge this, incredible amounts of money. But all of the money that has been spent is for naught if in the next little while you allow all those farmers that you have been supporting over the last little while to go under.

They will not be there. Farming is not something that comes back in the same way as other economic activities. People leave and they lose their farms to the bank. It is not easy to just pick up and start over again. It is not like walking back into the factory, or whatever the case may be, although even that is getting to be more difficult. If it is not farmers losing their land, it is plants and factories shutting down and moving to the United States, which is an entirely different problem.

I think we need to make that kind of commitment to our farmers. I am sure that there are individuals on the other side who would like to see that kind of commitment made. I am sure that even individuals who are not willing to make that commitment understand and feel the dilemma that so many Canadian farmers find themselves in.

I do not know how so many of them do it, how they can tolerate this drop in their income, this incredible drop in their income, and carry on. It is only because farmers are the last vestige of what we call vocation. They are the last vestige of the people who have vocation.

We have taught people in our society for decades now that life is chasing after the buck. It really does not matter what you do, as long as you get paid well to do it. Farmers are some of the few people around still who say: "It matters what I do. If I get paid less and less and less to do this, I am so attached to this way of life and this way of earning a living that I am going to hang on till the very last moment".

I think people who have that sense of vocation, whether it comes out of an attachment to the land or an attachment to the idea of providing food for the world, should be supported. I think we should find ways to support them, ways that give support in particular to smaller farmers, but I think we should find ways to make sure that we do not end up with a return to what I would call an agrifeudalism, in which the land is owned by a very small handful of people, the way the rest of the economy is owned by a handful of people.

The one thing that you could at least take some comfort in as the rest of the economy comes to be owned by 20 prominent families in the country is that at least the land is owned by thousands and tens of thousands of families. Even that is disappearing.

We went through centuries of economic and social development to get to a point where one person, one institution, one power or one authority did not own everything and did not own the land. That was the promise of the new world of Canada. It was not exactly much of a promise to the aboriginal people, but let us leave that aside for a minute.

We are returning now to a situation in which fewer and fewer people own more and more of the land. Corporate farming, agri-business is the wrong way to go. The fact of the matter is that this government is not committed to fighting that over-all trend. Its friendships, its connections, its networks are all with the wrong people in this respect, with the multinational grain companies and the vertically integrated Royal Dutch Shells and others who want to control everything from the ground up, the patented seed, the fertilizer, the herbicides, elevators and the transportation system. You name it.

They have not got everything into place yet, but just about everything. What they need really now is to find a way to own the railroads, which they have in a surrogate form through the CPR for years anyway, and then find a way to own the land.

That will not bother anyone over there. There will still be the hon. member for Assiniboia talking about the NDP land bank and how we want to have massive collectivization of farms. He is worrying about something that was never in the cards here. Nobody ever wanted it. It does not concern him a bit that all the land may someday be owned by a few multinational corporations or by the banks. It does not bother him.

I say this is wrong and I say this is the blind spot in the approach which this government takes to agricultural policy.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, finally, finally, the very influential NDP member said he praised the government for 650 per cent augmentation of intervention in farming. The farmers are very proud people. They do not want subsidies. They want fair trade. They do not like to receive their income from the government. They need it but they do not like it. Nobody likes to have subsidies or a welfare cheque. When you need it, it is necessary, but farmers are proud people. I know that because they have told me that, at least my constituents, and I know the member's constituents feel the same thing.

I posed a couple of difficult question to Liberal members and maybe they were not in a position to respond, but I will ask the NDP member if he agrees with the position of the federal government which is now working on this, that what we ask for at the Uruguay round negotiations is substantial reductions in trade distorting subsidies, particularly export subsidies; increased access to export markets; clearer and fairer GATT rules including the clarification and strengthening of article XI; and a framework of rules to prevent the abuse of health and sanitary regulations as barriers to trade.

Does the member agree with the position of the government under the auspices of the GATT? Just a simple response, thank you.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the member tries to simplify the matter in this respect: over a hundred countries agree with that particular statement. The problem is trying to figure out what that means.

What is a trade distorting subsidy? That is the debate, is it not? Everybody can say: "We are against trade distorting subsidies", but what does that mean? Some people believe that any involvement of government in the economy is a trade distorting subsidy. Other people may not believe that. That is what is at issue.

What is at issue here is whether this government, the government of which you are a part, actually believes that things like supply and management are not trade distorting subsidies or whether it believes in the dark recesses of its mind, and sometimes in the not so dark recesses of it mind given the things that it has said and done in the past, that actually supply and management is trade distorting. It cannot possibly admit that just like it couldn't possibly admit that in the free trade agreement, so it had to go through the whole agreement saying: "We believe in supply and management, we believe in supply and management, we believe in supply and management".

Show us in the agreement where it says supply and management is not being threatened. Everyone who knew anything, anyone who had two brain cells to rub together, knew that the free trade agreement threatened supply and management.

Mrs. Bourgault: I want to ask the opposition member about the particularity of Canada as an exporting country. Maybe all farmers, maybe all producers in this country should be under a marketing agency. For instance, look at the pork producers, potato producers, oilseeds, you name it, that not actually under a supply management organization.

Maybe at the end of this, because we are now discussing it on a world basis, because GATT is all countries together, the member will ask whether it is fair. Let us look at a pessimistic situation. At the end of the day when it is all over the world will say: "No. Article XI, we do not want to strengthen it. We do not want to do anything to it, but we want to go to tariffication by the Americans", I suppose.

Given the facts and taking into consideration that production in this country is not all under supply management, what will the member do if we have the obligation to do something as a government? If you were the government what would you do?

Mr. Blaikie: I am not sure I entirely understand the question. I think the member is hypothesising everything breaking down or the United States getting its way. Is that what you are saying? Supply management was seen to be a trade distorting practice. Is that what the hon. member is saying? That is a situation that any government of the day would have to deal with.

I think that an NDP government, for instance, would regard that as much more regrettable than I think a lot of your own people would regard it. Without questioning the integrity of the hon. member who just spoke, there are a lot of people on your side who are critics of orderly marketing and of supply management.

If the GATT breaks down it would be a dilemma. You want to have an international trading system that works and one for which there are generally accepted rules. On the other hand, you do not want to have a system which prevents countries from defending their legitimate interests and which simply imposes upon the global marketplace the kind of "survival of the fittest" that we have had in other contexts.

I think a lot of people in the Third World, for instance, are particularly concerned about that. At the same time as they want liberalized trade, they want trade that is fair and that respects their ability to look after their own interests.

If the worst case scenario that the hon. member points out were to happen, that would happen in a particular context. I think it would be very difficult for me or anyone else, including the hon. member, to speculate on just what the response of the Canadian government might be at that time.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, this debate that we are having in this House today is one of the most important debates that could take place in this country. It is also a very historical debate because the industry that we are discussing today, agriculture, is as old as the first pioneer in this country. The first pioneer normally had a cow and a few chickens. This debate is on supply management. He certainly knew what his demands were in that day. He had to raise enough food to live, to start off.

Those early pioneers who came to this country and built up the agricultural industry, those pioneers who built all those stone fences and stone piles and cleared the land and built the farms, had really built the very basis of this nation. Today those farmers who are carrying on in that tradition deserve the help and every inch of effort that we can give them to win their case for them on supply management, because that is the lifeline of the farm community in those areas today.

To give the extent of the industry we are talking about today, Canada has 300,000 farmers. Quebec has 41,000, the fourth largest farm population of all the provinces. Ontario has 72,000 farmers, which is the largest farm population in Canada. In the dairy business, Canada has 35,600 dairy farmers, 16,000 located in the province of Quebec and 11,000 in the province of Ontario.

Ontario has 475,000 dairy cows, a farm average of 34 cows. In Quebec the average is 33 cows per farm, with a total cow population in the province of Quebec of 578,000. Dairy farming in Canada produces cash receipts of $3 billion a year. Basically, that is the industry we are talking about here in this House of Commons today.

The way this ends up at the GATT is going to tell us how successful that industry is going to be in continuing in this country.

I heard the hon. member for Joliette say that it was too bad that we are having a partisan debate on this issue in the House today. I am sure that every Canadian watching this debate today will fully understand our feeling about that when they see the kinds of answers we get on agriculture from this government in the House of Commons. Is it a love-in when it gives its answers? It gives answers that are so wishy-washy, it does not come to the point. When it does, it is certainly not gentle about it in the terms the hon. member for Joliette would like to see.

He said it was too bad for people the government was not doing anything. Normally, when governments are doing something, people recognize it, but they have to see the evidence of it. That is another thing this debate is about today. We want to see the evidence.

Would it ever occur to the hon. member for Joliette, for example, that the last thing we would ever want to happen to us in this House is to be identified with the image and policies of this government?

The Liberal Party of Canada brought in the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, and we want to see it rescued. We want to see it continued and working effectively for Canadian farmers. The agencies that came in under this act have served Canada extremely well.

I did not speak about Hazen Argue today in a eulogy to him because I know that Hazen Argue is out there tonight, delighted that there is a debate on agriculture in this House of Commons. He lived for agriculture and he was a very dedicated figure in that field.

The National Farm Products Market Agencies Act was proclaimed in January 1972. I remember, I was here when that was proclaimed and I was here in this House with a number of other members between Christmas and New Years of 1971 because we had come back purposely to pass the farm marketing bill. It was proclaimed the following January.

No other Canadian knew we were here because they were celebrating the festive season and they would have thought we were a little off our rockers if they knew we were sitting here in session in the House of Commons between Christmas and New Years.

As I stand here today to speak on the GATT negotiations and the possible destruction of our supply management system because of the lack of muscle that is being displayed by the Federal Government of Canada at the GATT negotiations, I find this whole international process very depressing indeed.

The most dangerous development I see at these GATT negotiations is the common ground thinking and the common ground linking that is going on between the United States and the European Economic Community. Over the years of our history, whenever the United States teamed up with any nation in Europe, such as Britain or with the European Community against Canada, Canada has lost, historically. We lost the Alaskan boundary dispute in 1903 because the United States and Great Britain lined up against us. We lost the State of Maine in the province of New Brunswick boundary decision because they lined up against us.

We Canadians have to stand solidly on rational arguments and never give up trying to win this case on supply management.

We can never cave in, and the government has to develop a strong muscle. The view is out there that the government is a bit spineless when it comes to defending Canada's agricultural trade. The feeling is out there that the government is rather spineless when it comes to defending Canada's interests even in the free trade agreement, and now we are into the GATT discussions.

We see the United States which is supposed to be our trading friend lining up with the European Economic Community against Canada. Where is the international justice in a system like that? The government cannot afford to sit back and be anything but absolutely aggressive toward this united action on its part.

A lot has been said in comments today about the Consumers' Association of Canada. I simply want to say that it is not fair to make statements about food costs and food production in Canada unless you know the plight of the Canadian farmer first hand and unless you really know what is going on out there.

I grew up on a farm, and I have some knowledge of this subject. When you drive past a farm today, very few people realize the tremendous investment that exists on that farm. They look upon it as a family home.

It is only fair that the farmers get a fair return on their investment because if they do not, they will not be in business and Canada will have lost that productivity. The farming pioneers of this country must be looking down on us in this House today and wondering what has happened.

I think that in negotiating tools, I cannot forgive the government for submitting $8.8 billion as a figure that the Government of Canada is giving to farm organizations in Canada by way of subsidies and help. That has destroyed a lot of its argument to begin with. It has taken away a punch, and even by saying $2.2 billion for the dairy industry, it is helping those who are against us in this argument. That is wrong.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being 6 p.m, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INCOME TAX ACT

INCOME AVERAGING

The House resumed from Friday, September 20, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate on Motion 81 presented by the hon. member for MacKenzie which recommends the introduction of income averaging measures to the Income Tax Act. This, it is argued, would reduce the tax paid by individuals whose incomes fluctuate considerably from one year to the next.

Although the motion talks of the introduction of such provisions, it would be more appropriate to speak of reintroducing them, as they were part of the Income Tax Act provisions until 1987. Indeed, two methods of income averaging were eliminated with the tax reform of 1988. These were general forward averaging and block averaging which was designed to assist farmers and fishermen. To ensure a smooth transition, taxpayers who deducted averaging amounts prior to 1988 have until 1997 to bring such amounts back into their income. This allows taxpayers to obtain a federal tax credit at the highest marginal rate during the year in question. The system of block averaging for farmers and fishermen comtinues to apply to the five-year periods that began prior to 1988.

Madam Speaker, in considering the possibility of reintroducing income averaging provisions to the personal tax system, it is important to review the reasons why these provisions were eliminated in 1988.

The methods of income averaging were eliminated with the tax reform of 1988. The reform was based on five broad principles.

The tax system should be fair and should respect Canadian views of social justice. It should be consistently progressive, imposing little or no burden on those least able to pay. There should be less variation in the tax position of individuals in similar economic circumstances.

The tax system should have a broader base and lower rates. It should minimize preferences that allow high-income individuals and profitable corporations to pay little or no tax. Rates should be lowered to encourage initiative and risk-taking. The tax system should recognize Canadian realities and priorities. It should support Canada's capital requirements for growth and development and contribute to Canada's ability to compete in world markets. It should support regional development.

The tax system should be more understandable and less complex.

The tax system should provide a stable revenue base, to assure reliable and predictable revenues to finance public programs.

Madam Speaker, the application of these principles centred around three major areas of change: First, the reduction of the ten income tax brackets, ranging from a tax rate of 6 per cent to 34 per cent, to three tax brackets with rates of 17 per cent, 26 per cent and 29 per cent; secondly, the conversion of personal exemptions and certain deductions into tax credits. Unlike deductions and exemptions which reduce the tax to be paid by an amount that reflects the level of income, tax credits reduce the tax to paid by a set amount, regardless of the level of income. Thirdly, the reduction or elimination of several tax concessions which primarly benefitted high-income taxpayers.

The elimination of income averaging provisions was part of the latter category of measures which, in broadening the tax base, made it possible to reduce tax rates. The reduction of the number of tax brackets and the lower tax rates meant there was less need for income averaging. In short, smaller differences between the minimum and maximum marginal rates, that is 28 per cent prior to tax reform and 13 per cent after, reduced the tax consequences associated with fluctuations in income from year to year. Moreover, with the broader tax brackets, there is a much lower probability that fluctuations in income from one year to another will give rise to an increase in an individual's tax burden.

Therefore, income averaging provisions were eliminated because of a reduced need for such provisions and in part to finance the lower tax rates.

Tax reform involved a series of interrelated changes and so it is not appropriate to assess the fairness and relevance of specific measures without considering the whole package. The financial statistics for the 1988 taxation year, which were released last year, provided the first opportunity to determine the impact of the reform as a whole.

These statistics clearly show that tax reform achieved its intended objectives: overall, personal income taxes were reduced by more than $2,5 billion; some 905,000 Canadians with incomes under $15,000 no longer had to pay income taxes; the number of taxpayers aged 65 years or older paying tax fell by approximately 300,000.

One of the surest ways to threaten these gains would be to gradually reintroduce the provisions in place before the reform. The reintroduction of measures such as income averaging would narrow the tax base and would require an increase in tax rates in order to preserve the government's tax revenue.

• (1810)

Madam Speaker, the elimination of income averaging in 1988 was part of a broader initiative designed to make the tax system simpler and fairer. Given the positive impact of that reform, it would be counter-productive to take a step back and amend some of the elements that have contributed to its success.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to speak on this bill put forward by hon. colleague, the member for Mackenzie.

The government opposite has been stating, as one of its objectives, a more fair and simpler tax system. I think that an average Canadian today would agree that this objective has not been realized.

There are a number of examples of the fact that taxation in this country is simply not fair. We can look at, for example, the fact that 58 per cent of married people pay more tax living as a married couple than they would if they lived as a common law couple according to Stats Canada. We have the example of corporations in this country with incomes in the neighbourhood of $30 billion on which no tax is paid, not even a penny. Compare this to the United States where Ronald Reagan introduced a minimum corporate tax. At least U.S corporations pay some income tax.

We have, along with that, the absurdity of people in this country, living below the poverty line, paying income tax. We have corporations, on the one hand, which can afford to hire expensive tax consultants, accountants and tax lawyers to look for loopholes in the tax law, many of which they lobbied to have put in place themselves, and on the other hand we have many families in this country which are barely able to make ends meet, can barely afford go to H&R Block to have their income tax done, are paying income tax and are below the poverty line.

Only one government in this country has said that it will do away with income tax below the poverty line and that is the Ontario government of Bob Rae. The New Democratic government in that province has said that although it cannot affect federal income tax, the people in Ontario living below the poverty line will not be paying any provincial income tax. That is a move towards tax fairness.

The government has also indicated that it had planned to make a simpler tax system. Again I think an average Canadian looking at his or her tax forms when they do their taxes would simply say that the income tax system in this country is neither simple nor is it fair.

This bill the member for Mackenzie has brought forward is an attempt, in a small way, to make the tax system in this country somewhat fairer. This bill would allow for five-year block averaging. It is not something new, in fact it is something that was initially brought into effect in the late 1940s. It is fairer for professions where income comes about in an unequal manner; people such as artists, sales people, real estate agents, ranchers, farmers, fishermen, writers, small business people, people who may have a number of years of low or mediocre income then suddenly have a year where things go very well for them and they have a very high income. Unfortunately, these people are now forced to pay tax on a very good year when in actual fact their over-all income over a longer period of time is much lower. That, I would suggest, is not fair, and I do not think the people who are into those situations would find it fair.

In the past, people had been able to average their income over a five-year period to allow them to pay a more equitable tax on their income. To me, that sounds fair. I think many Canadians find it fair. Certainly many accountants have found it fair. With respect to farm groups in western Canada, most farm organizations including the Western Canadian Wheat Growers, which tends to be a group that supports many of the government's measures, have said that this is a measure that is fair and equitable and should be maintained.

I believe it was removed by Order in Council in 1987 by this government. I have been following the debate on this quite closely. I have been reading the debates that I have not heard, and the government puts forward three arguments as to why this five-year block averaging should be removed and should not be reinstated in the tax system.

I am paraphrasing from the parliamentary secretary, the lead speaker for the government who spoke on this bill, and he said that the fundamental principle is that ability to pay is measured on the basis of income earned and received in a single year. In other words, he is saying that a fundamental principle is that we pay income tax based on each year, regardless of over-all income.

I do not think that is a fundamental principle. That is why the five-year block averaging was put in in the first place, to take out the peaks and valleys. I think a much more accurate statement of the fundamental principle would be that people should be paying taxes on income earned, not being restricted to one single year. By the parliamentary secretary restricting it to one year, I do not think is a fundamental principle that most Canadians would agree with.

He and other members on the government side have indicated that the tax brackets have now been narrowed, that you have a minimum of 17 per cent to 29 per cent tax payable, and that is true. But what they have forgotten is that there is still a large gap, particularly when you take into account provincial income tax, which can mean an 18 per cent difference in tax payable.

If a farmer or a small business person has been having three or four or five bad years and suddenly has a good year and is faced with paying that extra 18 per cent, you tell them that that is not very much money and they are going to tell you something else. If a business or a farmer has been suffering for a number of years and suddenly has a good year, they need that money to help them keep their operation going, pay off bills and so on. So the idea of 18 per cent, I would suggest and many Canadians would suggest, is in fact significant.

The other fact is that the government likes to say that retirement is the most frequent and significant cause for income fluctuation. I think that perhaps that is true, in the sense that at some time in our lives all Canadians will suffer a radical drop in income, and often that occurs at the time of retirement. But this bill is not meant to deal with that. The fact is, we have a small percentage of Canadians which suffer from fluctuating incomes from year, to year, to year, to year. Although the government can say that it has put in tax reforms to help retirement, that really is not the issue. That is not the purpose of this bill. That was not the purpose of a five-year block averaging. The fact that when people retire they can take advantage of RRSPs does not help a farmer or a businessman or a fisherman or anyone with a fluctuating income. It does not help them in that particular year.

I think the bill that the hon. member has put forward is a bill that will help those entrepreneurs, those Canadians who are into more open market situations. These are people who often run the risks of the marketplace, small business people, artists, people on commission sales, farmers, people who are subject to the disciplines of the open market. This is a government that likes to pretend it represents small business and farmers but in fact this is something it is doing that will hurt small business and farmers.

The argument that we cannot afford to bring in block averaging because it is going to cost the government too much money is again, I would suggest, not accurate in that the actual amount of money lost by the government would be very small and certainly could be made up quite easily. If the government would bring in a minimum tax for corporations, for example, it would more than offset any income loss that Revenue Canada suffered as a result of five-year block averaging.

I believe my time is almost up. In conclusion, I would like to say that if the government wants to have a prosperous nation it is essential that it provide opportunities for Canadians to make an income, and provide for themselves. This in a small way would help a particular group of Canadians to maintain themselves at a time when the Canadian economy is suffering very badly. I would simply conclude by saying that I do wish the government would reconsider its position on this bill and vote for it when the time comes.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today to Motion No. 81 which has been put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie. It is designed to consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act to allow some form of income averaging for the benefit of individuals whose incomes fluctuate significantly from year to year.

I am sure that members of the House would agree that the hon. member for Mackenzie is committed, and has been for many years, to the welfare of farmers in Canada. We have to agree also that before the Income Tax Act was reformed in 1988 it contained two provisions for averaging income over a number of years; block averaging and forward averaging, which colleagues have already alluded to this afternoon. These procedures allow taxpayers with large fluctuations in their incomes to spread the burden of tax over a number of years. Both forms of averaging involved complex calculations.

Consider first the block averaging. This was available to individuals whose chief source of income was farming or fishing and it allowed them to average their income from all sources over a five-year period. This provision involved a calculation whereby the taxpayer recalculated the tax liability as if one-fifth of his or her total income over the period had been earned in each of the five years.

An election to block average was made in the last year of the five-year period and resulted in a reduction in tax in that year or in the refund of taxes paid in the earlier years of the period.

The other income averaging technique was known as forward averaging. Unlike block averaging, forward averaging was not restricted to those involved in farming and fishing. It allowed all individuals whose income in a year exceeded 110 per cent of their average adjusted income in the preceding three years to spread out the excess over future years in order to reduce its impact on tax payable.

The excess income which was averaged in this fashion was deductible in computing taxable income for the year in question but gave rise to a special tax in that year at the highest marginal rate.

In future years the average amounts could be brought back and taxed as regular income with a refundable credit provided at the top marginal tax rate.

This was how the system operated before 1988 but as hon. members know the government reformed the corporate and personal income tax systems in 1988 and among the objectives of this reform was the creation of a tax system that contributed to fairness, competitiveness, growth, and job creation. To achieve these objectives, tax reform was guided by two major principles, lower tax rates and a broader tax base. It is readily apparent that lower rates provide an incentive to work and invest, thereby contributing to the goals of competitiveness, growth and job creation. The pre-1988 system had 10 rates ranging from 6 per cent to 34 per cent. This structure was replaced with one comprised of only three rates: 17 per cent, 26 per cent and 29 per cent.

A related element was a conversion of personal exemptions into tax credits. Exemptions provide the greatest benefit to higher income earners, whereas credits are fairer because they provide the same degree of tax relief to all taxpayers.

The rate reduction combined with the conversion of exemptions into tax credits resulted in a fairer and more progressive tax system. I shall return to how these changes reduce the need for income averaging procedures in the tax system in a moment.

The other guiding principle of tax reform, namely broadening the tax base by removing special tax preferences, was equally important. A broader base makes the tax system simpler and fairer. It reduces the opportunities for tax planning, opportunities that were most often used by high income Canadians. Many tax preferences were eliminated or restricted. For example, the deductibility of business expenses for meals and entertainment was significantly reduced.

The hon. member for Mackenzie has proposed a reintroduction of income averaging procedures into our tax system. In order to assess this proposal properly, it is helpful to review the goals and methods of tax reform as we have just done. The lower and fewer tax rates which came with tax reform reduced the need for averaging provisions, a point on which I shall elaborate in a moment.

Since the need for averaging provisions was reduced, such measures were eliminated as part of tax reform. Forward averaging was eliminated for 1988 and subsequent years and the block averaging provisions for farmers and fishermen ceased to apply for any five year block commencing after 1987.

These changes were introduced gradually in such a way as to ease the transition. Forward averaging amounts deducted in prior years can still be brought back into income until 1997 and will entitle a taxpayer to a federal tax credit at the top marginal rate in that year. Block averaging arrangements that were already under way were allowed to run their normal course.

Let me now explain why the new tax rates and the reduction in the number of tax brackets brought about by tax reform reduced the need for averaging. Prior to the reform the spread between the lowest marginal tax rates, namely 6 per cent, and the highest, 34 per cent, was 28 percentage points. Such a wide spread of course had severe tax consequences for those whose income fluctuated substantially from year to year.

After tax reform the spread between the lowest, namely 17 per cent and the highest at 29 per cent with marginal tax rates was reduced to 12 percentage points. Furthermore, tax brackets became much broader and the lowest tax bracket now accounts for two-thirds of tax filers.

Therefore, year to year fluctuations in income are now less likely to move a taxpayer from one bracket to another. Even if such a shift does occur, it will not cause a significant fluctuation in tax burdens.

The reforms to the tax system made possible the elimination of averaging provisions and the elimination of the averaging provisions in turn contributed to making the tax system simpler and helped finance the reduction in marginal tax rates.

The most significant income averaging activity that typical Canadians undertake is that of putting away money during their working years to finance their retirement. This type of income averaging now receives more favourable tax treatment. Recent pension reforms provide substantial opportunity to defer income and tax. This tax assistance is based on the principle that money set aside for retirement should be taxed when it is received, not when it is saved.

Accordingly, amounts contributed to registered retirement savings plans, namely RRSPs, registered pension plans and deferred profit sharing plans are deductible in the year contributions are made and the investment income in these plans is not taxed when it is earned. Instead the savings are subject to tax only when benefits are paid out of the registered plans.

For the vast majority of taxpayers who have lower incomes and higher tax credits in retirement years and who therefore face lower marginal tax rates, the tax assistance provided for retirement saving includes an important income averaging advantage in addition to its tax deferral benefits.

As I noted, the system of tax assistance through retirement saving was recently improved. The new contribution limits which come into effect this year eliminate many shortcomings of the previous system and ensure that Canadians have fair access to tax assistance for retirement savings.

For example, taxpayers without an employer sponsored pension plan did not previously enjoy the same opportunities to build adequate pensions on a tax assisted basis. Those with relatively poor pension plans face the same RRSP limits as those with very generous pension plans.

The limits were also vulnerable to a growing number of tax planning arrangements. In short, some taxpayers did not have access to adequate levels of tax assistance, while others were able to obtain excessive tax assistance.

The new single comprehensive limit on contributions, namely 18 per cent of earnings, will apply to all tax assisted savings in all plans. The new system will better integrate RRSP and registered pension plan contributions. It will be more flexible and will enable taxpayers to tailor the pattern of their retirement savings more closely to their financial needs.

In conclusion, we should indeed address the needs of Canadians with incomes which fluctuate from one year to another, but tax reforms combined with the substantial income deferral possibilities provided by the new system of tax assistance for retirement saving does indeed address these very needs.

It does so indeed more fully and more fairly than would the reintroduction of complex averaging measures.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would just like to say a few words on this motion on behalf of my party.

Really, they are more in the nature of personal reflection on the concept of income averaging and the taxation of income averaging. I must confess to not having had a great deal of time to think about this matter today, although it is an interesting subject and an interesting motion which the hon. member for Mackenzie has put before the House.

It is one on which I would have preferred to have a little more time to give some careful reflection to. However, I would just like to say a few things from the perspective of two of the income groups that are prominent in my riding and for whom this system of income averaging would be relevant, that is to say, the fishermen and the farmers.

Certainly, in the case of fishermen, their income fluctuates every year with the catch and the success of their catch. In the case of the farmers, it is the same story with their incomes dependent on the weather conditions, on the price of their product and on all sorts of factors over which they have no control. Certainly a form of averaging of income which would allow them to plan further ahead would be advantageous to both those income groups.

It is really a form of social insurance in the sense of allowing them to be compensated in the bad years by the income that they earned in the good years.

The questions that this system raises are many, particularly when they are thought about in relation to our system of progressive income taxation. In our system of retirement income, Canadians are given tax advantages for putting money away into RRSP and other forms of deferred income plans. In that sense, they are able to lower their taxable income in current years and only have to pay taxes on that income when they have lower income. In that sense, they are subject to a lower marginal tax rate.

This subject of income averaging has to be considered in the context of measures in the income tax system, particularly in terms of deferred income plans and the RRSP plans which allow people to defer their income to a future date. The five-year block averaging mentioned in the member's motion and his remarks in support of his motion lead me to ask the question: What is so special about five years? I could see, if we were to conduct some genuine tax reform, a system in which all income would be equally considered and one might be able to defer one's income indefinitely. Our tax rate might be something approaching what one of my colleagues has called a single tax, that is to say, a flat tax rate on income. The individual taxpayer would simply be able to choose how much income he would reserve for a particular year or put the extra income in a plan of some sort for future years for future purposes. He would only pay taxes on it when that income was withdrawn in the form of annuity like an RRSP.

I could see a system extended beyond that to allow, for example, individual taxpayers to plan for future education and retraining possibilities down the road. They would be allowed to take income from a good year and put it aside into an education plan or some form of savings account that would not be subject to tax in that year. Later on perhaps, if there is a change of career or need for retraining, that income would be there to be drawn upon. They would not pay high tax rates on it in the year they earned the income.

The idea of averaging income over a longer period than a year certainly has merit, provided it is part of a more comprehensive set of tax reform proposals. I would include in that a movement toward something I would call a single tax. For people in many income categories it also has to be related to some minimum level of income and perhaps, some form of guaranteed annual income, minimum tax or some level of minimum income which people could have without having to pay taxes. We have something similar in the current system, which is often subject to many inequities because of the complicated nature of our income tax system.

I would have preferred to have more time to give this matter some structured thought. I believe the principle of the motion has merit. It is the kind of thing one wants to examine in the context of many other facets of the income tax system which is very, very complex. I would submit that it is far too complex and a source of great frustration for many Canadians.

The government's tax reform proposals which involve the closure of some of the brackets in our progressive income tax system go part way to simplifying the tax system. There are still many loopholes, tax expenditures and kinks in the tax system which favour the well-to-do and which favour those Canadians who have a persistently high income. They can employ the services of accountants to take advantage of these loopholes and thereby escape taxation and impose a higher burden of taxes on the rest of the population including those very individuals the member for Mackenzie would like to help with his block averaging proposal.

I would submit that the way to true tax reform would involve a form of averaging over a longer period of time than a year, but it would also involve many other components including a movement toward a far simpler system of tax rates and a more comprehensive base. It would be an income tax system which would eliminate many of the loopholes that still exist in our income tax system. It makes that system far too complicated and ends up creating many inequities for Canadians. It creates distortions and disincentives for all sorts of things and that in the end weakens our economy. It also creates all sorts of problems of fiscal management for the government.

It is an interesting idea. It certainly benefits income groups like the farmers and the fishermen, but it would need to be studied more carefully and would need to be incorporated with other sorts of tax measures such as those that I have described.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity for a few moments this evening to comment on the hon. member for Mackenzie's proposition before the House:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

I have been most interested in the comments that various members have made this evening with respect to our tax system and with respect to this specific proposition. I think two comments stand out especially in my mind: first, that the tax system should be a fair one and, second, that the tax system should be a simple one, as simple as it possibly can be.

You and I are well aware, Madam Speaker, that the tax system we have in place today, in spite of all of the efforts to simplify, improve and reform it, is anything but simple. You and I just have to pick up our income tax return form as we are required to do each year, take a look at it, see what if anything we can make of it and how long it is going to take to fill out, to know that it is a very complex system indeed.

Many of my constituents come to me regularly and tell me that when they started paying income tax the return was one simple page. Not only have I seen those forms, but I am just old enough to have filled in a few of those myself years and years and years ago when the income tax return was one simple page.

We have made it more complex every year and every year in this House, sometimes several times a year, we debate further income tax measures, we pass further income tax legislation, and each year it becomes more and more complex.

I recall many people over the years advocating a simpler system, the single tax system.

We recall the campaign of one Mr. Peter Pocklington across this country in 1982–83 leading up to the leadership convention that took place in this city which chose the now Prime Minister of our country to be leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. One of the candidates in that campaign was Mr. Peter Pocklington, who campaigned virtually on a single issue, the issue of a simple income tax form, a one-page tax form, a flat tax form. It was a very popular issue and Mr. Pocklington, at least for a while, became a very popular figure in the country, at least until he decided to trade away Wayne Gretzky to the United States. He became a very popular figure in this country on the theory that we should make the system more simple than it is now.

One of the members of this House says I think he has written a book on it now. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, one of my neighbouring ridings in the city of Toronto, has another proposal out on simplifying the system, on a flat tax, getting back to the basics.

All of those proposals, it seems to me, make a good deal of sense but they do conflict with concepts like the one that has been put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie and so many other concepts in our Income Tax Act. What the hon. member is proposing is not really something that will make the system more simple and straightforward but will bring back a complexity to the system that we had previously.

I am not sure if I am correct, and my mind may be a little foggy on this, but it seems to me that income averaging in the income tax system probably came about back in the 1970s following something called the Carter commission on taxation. My hon. friends say it was 1948. In any event, I remember that in 1970 there were further attempts to reform the income tax system as a result of the Carter commission and the so-called Benson budget, if you will recall, that of then Minister of Finance Edgar Benson. He did a lot of things at that time to try to make the system a fairer one. He brought in things like capital gains tax. He eliminated things like the estate tax. Now we hear that maybe the estate tax would be a fairer way to tax and maybe we should bring it back, rather than leave it in the junkyard con the scrap heap.

There have been other attempts, as I have indicated, at tax reform in the past. The latest attempt back in 1987–88 did away with income averaging in the income tax system. Now we have another suggestion for bringing it back. I do not think it meets the criterion of simplicity, even though it may be helpful with respect to the criterion for fairness. It certainly does not help to make our tax system any more simple than it is now. In my view, by bringing it back it would only make it more complex. In the days when we had income averaging in the Income Tax Act we either had to rely on a chartered accountant to figure that out for us or maybe even the tax department itself. We were often at its mercy in making out what was quite a complex calculation and one that if we did try it ourselves usually was wrong.

We are left then, it seems to me, with the other criterion when examining this proposition, and that is the criterion of fairness. Certainly it would seem anything but fair to people who have income that goes in peaks and valleys to have a tax which impacts on them at different tax rates, one sometimes at a higher tax rate when their income is a way up, sometimes at a lower tax rate or perhaps even nil when their income is a way down.

The possibility that their income may be so low that there is no tax payable at all was another issue of concern raised in this House for some period of time by our colleagues in the NDP, and to some extent I suppose with respect to corporations they are still raising that concern. They did raise the concern that at the low end of the scale, at least, all people should pay tax and there should be no way of getting out of it.

As a result of the concerns they brought forth and as a result of reflection and study on the part of the government, the minimum tax was put in place and is in place today to eliminate that concern and to make it fair.

I am sure the hon. members who are murmuring and nodding their heads in approval on the other side of the House will agree that the present government has made very substantial strides to try to make the tax system a fairer one by eliminating an awful lot of those tax loopholes that have been referred to and by trying to make it fair.

Just one complex loophole that I can recall, having had a good deal to do with it, was the scientific tax credit which opened up a gigantic sieve in the system and fortunately that has been eliminated.

An hon. member: Who introduced that?

Mr. Redway: My colleague asks who introduced that. He knows and I know that it was the former Liberal government that introduced that. Virtually every one of the tax loopholes that are in the Income Tax Act and other tax loopholes were introduced by previous Liberal governments over many, many years.

They did it to try to provide some incentives for people to get into scientific investment and research and all of the rest. They did it in good faith and I certainly do not quarrel with the motives. It did not help to create a fair system. Certainly what we should be doing is trying to create a fair system, but at the same time balancing it off with the basic need of the tax system which is to try to make sure that we have enough money to pay the bills that all of us want to pay.

I have listened to our colleagues on the other side this afternoon talking about helping our farmers in this country, a very noble proposition and something that I wholly agree with. They know and I know that somehow or other, if we are going to do that, we need to raise the money to do that and that is raised through the tax system.

While the tax system has to be fair, it also has to make sure that we raise the money not only to look after people like our farmers and our fishermen and all of the other people we need to look after in this country, but to look after something called our deficit and our national debt which they keep reminding us are enormous.

Certainly we are all searching for a system that is simple. We are all searching for a system that is fair. I think the debate this afternoon on this proposition has helped that process. I applaud the hon. member for bringing forward the bill for our consideration.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member who just made a reference to the scientific research tax credit. Something like $2 billion went down the drain in that program. Imagine if we had that kind of money today to help our farmers! I remember one project in particular, the Dream Street Holstein. An enormous amount of money was spent on research on black and white Holsteins and brown and white Holsteins. It cost a fortune. If we had that money today to help farmers in Western Canada, it would be fantastic.

Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to motion M-81 introduced by the hon. member for Mackenzie. The hon. member asks the government to consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate considerably from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

The payment procedure proposed in this motion is almost identical to the provision for averaging the income of farmers and fishermen over a period of five years, a provision that became part of the Income Tax Act in 1946 and was dropped in 1988 as part of our tax reform.

This provision, Madam Speaker, allowed individuals whose chief source of income was farming or fishing to average their income over a five year period. When their income fluctuated substantially from year to year, this procedure made it possible to reduce the total income tax payable over the five year period in question. Averaging was intended to lessen the fiscal impact of substantial fluctuations in the income of farmers and fishermen, more likely to be affected by such fluctuations as a result of drought, disease or price swings.

Today, this is a very common concept, and I think the hon. member for Mackenzie realized that when he introduced his motion, which is entirely appropriate, considering what is happening toda—at GATT they are discussing article XI, and the subject is very much in the news.

However, Madam Speaker, this particular provision of the 1946 Income Tax Act was used by a mere 4 per cent of farmers and fishermen. Only 4 per cent took advantage of this provision. It was a difficult mechanism to comply with and administratively very complex.

With fewer tax brackets and lower tax rates, income-averaging measures became less necessary and were abolished in 1988. This also helped simplify the tax system, which was obviously one of the main objectives of that reform, Madam Speaker.

Averaging was supposed to give some protection to farmers and fishermen whose income is particularly prone to large variations from year to year. Even though this measure was intended to lessen the impact of such fluctuations, it had mixed success, witness the low participation rate I mentioned earlier.

The government still continues to take account of farmers' vulnerability to fluctuating income. That is why, in early 1991, it announced new measures to help them: the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account.

GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, is meant to protect farmers' income. It is based on the existing crop insurance plan and adds income protection to it. Farmers can thus count on an assured gross revenue that will not be affected by natural risks or market forces beyond their control. GRIP also enables farmers to calculate the guaranteed return of each crop in the early spring and obtain operating funds as required.

Under the Net Income Stabilization Account, commonly called NISA, farmers and the federal and provincial governments make equivalent payments into individual accounts. Farmers draw on these accounts when their income is low. The interest earned is only taxed when it is withdrawn from the account.

The close cooperation, Madam Speaker, between farmers, the provinces and the federal government that led to these mechanisms is a very important feature of them. When he revealed the terms and conditions of these plans, the Minister of Agriculture declared that this program was designed from scratch by the farmers themselves, the provinces and the federal government as part of a policy review. This is a unique case in public policy development. Together the interested parties set up a whole new program to reduce the need for special assistance every time. The new support measures provide assistance to farmers in all regions of the country equitably and encourage the adoption of sound management practices based on long-term market trends.

I think it is imperative that we collectively recognize this is the type of partnership we must look for, not only in the agricultural sector but in other sectors as well. Governments cannot go it alone any more; they need the input of the various stakeholders.

Members of this House know that Quebec maple syrup producers have come to us asking for $22 million in special assistance. Based on the number of maple syrup producers in Eastern Ontario and in Quebec, for the 0zmost part, I figure this would represent around $17,000 or $18,000 for each of them. That is a lot of money in times of economic restraint, and I think these new programs will help them pull through.

Madam Speaker, we can see better the level of cooperation between the various stakeholders if we take a look at what went before the implementation of these measures because extensive consultations have been necessary to formulate such policies.

I can see that my time has run out. Thank you for having recognized me again.

Private Members' Business

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being seven o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

[English]

She said: Madam Speaker, on May 2, 1991, the Supreme Court of Canada, in Swain v. The Queen, held that a central provision of the Criminal Code dealing with persons found not guilty on account of insanity was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it lacked adequate procedural protections being arbitrary and potentially indeterminate in nature.

The court gave Parliament six months to enact the necessary remedial legislation. There are approximately 1,100 Canadians being held indefinitely under Lieutenant-Governor's warrants. None of them has been convicted of the crime of which they were accused. Many have never had a trial to determine if they committed the offence alleged. They have been found to have been insane at the time of the offence and therefore not guilty by reason of insanity, or insane at the time of trial and therefore unfit to stand trial.

The situation in which these people find themselves is worse in a number of ways than if they had been convicted of the offence charged. They are held indeterminately and their release depends completely on the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province in which they reside.

The present Criminal Code provisions permit provinces to create boards to "review" whether these people should be released, but the provisions do not require that a board be created or that the board hold hearings. Even in provinces with a review board which holds hearings, the recommendations made by the board are not binding. No reasons need be given for the board's recommendations nor for the decision of the Lieutenant-Governor. There is no right of appeal from the decision. While the Lieutenant-Governors undoubtedly exercise their discretion wisely in a great majority of cases, the possibility that a person may be deprived of his liberty without a fair hearing is a state of law that should not be allowed to prevail in a free and democratic country like Canada.

The bill which I have introduced is the culmination of years of study and consultation, starting with the 1976 report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada entitled Mental Disorder in Criminal Processes which noted numerous problems and inequities and recommended extensive procedural changes and further studies of existing practices employed by officials directly involved with mentally disordered accused.

These studies were undertaken by the Department of Justice which in 1983 and 1984 carried out Canada-wide consultations first on a detailed options paper and then on a report with draft recommendations.

Subsequently, the 1986 draft bill served as a starting point for consultations with representatives of the provincial and territorial governments and with Health departments, Attorney General departments and correctional, social and community services.

Departmental officials also had meetings with judges at three different levels, with Crown prosecutors, defence counsel, health officials and members of review boards established by the lieutenant-governors. Many non-governmental bodies were consulted, including the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Hospital Association, the Canadian Association for Community Living, the Schizophrenia Society of Canada and the Advocacy Resource Centre for the Handicapped.

Consultations with the Department of National Defence led to proposals for consequential amendments to the National Defence Act, to ensure that offenders suffering from mental disorders, whether they are subject to this Act or the Criminal Code, receive the same treatment, to all intents and purposes.

Under the Criminal Code, courts may order a psychiatric assessment of the offender at various stages in the court procedures, but only for the purpose of determining whether the accused is unfit to stand trial or whether the balance of the mind of the accused was disturbed where the accused was charged with an offence arising out of the death of her newly born child.

[English]

The bill expands the range of purposes for which an assessment may be ordered and spells these out. The bill provides that assessments are to be made out of custody unless circumstances require that the accused be held in custody.

We are proposing that the length of time allowed for an assessment vary with its purpose. Assessments for fitness can generally be done more quickly than assessments of the mental state of the accused at the time of the offence, or for the determination of the appropriate disposition. The bill therefore permits up to five days, excluding travel time, for a fitness assessment and a 30 day maximum for the other initial assessments.

In exceptional circumstances, a longer period of time may be permitted or an extension may be granted, but under no circumstance can the total length of an assessment exceed 60 days.

At present there is a risk that incriminating statements made to a doctor during a court-ordered psychiatric assessment may be used as evidence against the accused. As a result, many defence counsels advise their clients to refuse to answer questions during such assessment. This deprives the doctor of a very important source of information about the accused and undermines the effectiveness of the court order.

At the same time, concern has been expressed by prosecutors that completely prohibiting the use of this evidence would deprive the court of important information needed to learn the truth about the accused and the offence.

Our insanity defence is based largely on the M'Naghten rules which were formulated in Britain during the 19th century. For the purposes of liability under the criminal law, section 16 of the Criminal Code states that a person is insane if he has a "disease of the mind to an extent that renders him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of an act or omission of knowing that an act or omission is wrong".

The majority of those with whom departmental officials consulted agreed that the defence worked reasonably well and the only change needed is to modernize the language in the section. For example, we have replaced the term "insanity" by the phrase "mental disorder" in order to bring it in line with current psychiatric views.

One important change made in this bill is to alter the nature of the verdict from the current "not guilty by reason of insanity" to "the accused committed the act or made the omission but is not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder".

The new verdict is superior to the present one. First, a number of psychiatrists have indicated that persons found not guilty by reason of insanity delude themselves into thinking that they have done nothing wrong, and this presents an obstacle to therapy.

Second, it explains more accurately what the verdict represents. Under the present wording, the public finds it difficult to understand how the accused could be found not guilty despite proof that he committed the offence.

Prior to the Swain decision, the Criminal Code required judges to order the accused into custody after a verdict was rendered that he is unfit to stand trial or was insane at the time of the offence.

The deprivation of the accused's liberty was automatic, even in cases where the accused received treatment while on bail pending trial and no longer represented a danger to the community.

This provision was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada in Swain as being inconsistent with the Charter, subject to a six-month period of temporary validity.

The bill does away with this rigid rule and allows the court to make a non-custodial order where that seems appropriate in the circumstances, pending consideration of the case by the review board. That consideration must take place not later than 45 days after the court hearing unless the court is satisfied that there are exceptional circumstances.

Moreover, the bill gives the court the power to make a disposition itself if the court can readily do so and if it is clear that a disposition should be made at once. This gives judges a range of options including detaining the accused or granting some measure of liberty depending on the facts of each case.

As I mentioned earlier, the Criminal Code does not oblige the lieutenant-governor to establish a review board. However, in provinces where such boards exist, the lack of uniform rules of procedure across the country and the arbitrary nature of some of the boards' practices have aroused considerable criticism.

Another complaint has been that lieutenant-governors exercise powers that are obsolete, including the obligation to look after the mentally handicapped, children and the elderly, which historically has been that of the monarch.

The purpose of this bill is to make considerable changes in the powers of review boards. It abolishes the lieutenant-governor's duties in this respect, makes review boards compulsory and gives them the power to make decisions.

These changes reflect the current situation, because it is the boards that hear the evidence, observe the accused and have the qualifications for making the appropriate decisions.

A review board must have at least one psychiatrist, and if there is only one other member, that member must be either a psychologist or a medical practitioner. The bill thus recognizes that matters submitted to the boards are often multidisciplinary in nature and that the contribution of other medical professionals to the assessment may be useful.

[English]

The bill sets out minimum procedures which courts and review boards must follow during hearings to determine what disposition should be made. The procedural requirements in the bill strike a balance between protecting the right of the accused to a fair hearing and the need to provide flexibility in the details of how a particular hearing will be conducted.

The bill provides that the accused and his or her counsel will have access to all reports and information before the hearing takes place and will be present at the entire hearing unless this could result in serious interference with the accused's rehabilitation or recovery, or in serious physical harm to another person.

In such cases, the information and reports will be withheld and the accused excluded from that part of the hearing unless the interests of justice require that the information be disclosed notwithstanding the anticipated harm.

The bill creates a framework of principles which are to be applied when deciding what disposition should be made. They are the protection of the public from dangerous persons, the reintegration of the accused into society and other needs of the accused.

Another guiding principle is that the disposition imposed initially and subsequently is to be the least intrusive or onerous option having regard to the other principles already noted.

The public and the accused are further protected because the system allows quick action if there is significant deterioration in the accused's condition. Another proposed procedural protection is the right to appeal a disposition based on the facts of the case, the law or both. The legislation provides that such appeals are to be heard by the provincial court of appeal as soon as possible.

At present, there is no power to order a person detained pursuant to a Lieutenant-Governor's warrant to submit to treatment involuntarily. Apart from emergency, there is no power to treat an accused without obtaining consent. We have concluded that the general rule preventing the involuntary treatment of mentally disordered accused ought to be preserved. However, subject to stringent safeguards, the bill permits a court to order involuntary treatment to make the accused fit to

The present system permits persons detained pursuant to Lieutenant-Governor's warrants to be detained indefinitely, potentially for life. Although in practice most warrant detainees are released after a few years, there is considerable variation between provinces as to the average length of a warrant. In recent years there has been strong opposition to the indeterminate nature of the warrant. It has been argued that warrant detainees are discriminated against as a result of their mental disorder because they are subject to indefinite detention, whereas those convicted of the same offences receive definite sentences.

The bill imposes three outer limits on the length of time an accused can be held as either unfit to stand trial or not criminally responsible.

First of all, for first and second degree murder and for high treason and some military offences in time of war, the maximum is life. Second, for offences involving danger to the person or to the security of the state, the maximum is 10 years or the maximum penalty which could be imposed, whichever is less. Third, for all other offences the outer limit of detention under the authority of the criminal law is two years or the maximum penalty which could be imposed for the offence, whichever is less.

These provisions which we refer to as the capping provisions will apply retroactively to those now detained on Lieutenant-Governor's warrants. Young offenders will also be included in the proposed changes to the law. The maximum for youthful offenders will be the maximum which could have been imposed upon conviction, namely two years for less serious offences and three years for more serious offences and under the proposed new amendments to the Young Offenders Act, five years for murder.

This does not mean that dangerous persons will automatically be released into the community upon reaching the maximum or upper limit. The Attorney General may apply to the court at the time of the verdict to have the accused declared a dangerous mentally disordered accused. If the court is satisfied on the basis of criteria similar to those used in dangerous offender applications under the existing Criminal Code provisions, it may substitute an indeterminate detention for the normal 10-year limit. The transitional provisions of the bill allow similar applications to a commissioner in relation to mentally disordered accused who are on Lieutenant-Governor's warrants at the time this bill comes into force. The accused would of course still be evaluated by the review board at least once a year.

Moreover, persons released on reaching their maximum may be detained under provincial mental health legislation if they constitute a danger to themselves or to others. Some provinces may wish to amend their mental health legislation to ensure that it adequately provides for commitment of those who are viewed as being potentially dangerous if not detained. I have indicated that these provisions will not be proclaimed until the provinces have been allowed a reasonable time to amend their laws if necessary.

The unfit accused faces an additional potential source of unfairness. By definition, such persons have not yet been tried and may be innocent. As well, if the unfit accused is detained for a long time, the Crown may no longer be able to prove its case against the accused. If the case could not be proven, it is unfair for the criminal justice system to continue to detain the person. The bill provides new protection for unfit accused by requiring the Crown to present proof to the court every two years that it could prove its case if the accused were then brought back for trial. In cases involving unfit youthful offenders, such proof must be provided on an annual basis.

Some accused, though they are not unfit to stand trial, are nevertheless acutely mentally ill at the time of trial. There is no authority in the Criminal Code to order that part of a sentence of imprisonment be served in a treatment facility or a hospital. Judges often make recommendations that the accused receive treatment but they are not binding on correctional officials. Some mentally ill offenders are transferred to provincial mental hospitals under agreements between the government departments involved and others are sent to federally run regional psychiatric centres. However, these centres often have lengthy waiting lists for admission.

Madam Speaker, the bill also contains provisions with respect to hospital orders that will allow persons suffering a mental disorder in an acute phase and who have been found guilty, to receive, with their consent and that of the hospital, treatment for a maximum period of 60 days, for the purpose of stabilizing their condition. At the end of the 60-day period, which is considered to be the initial part of the sentence, the hospital and prison authorities may decide whether such persons can go to prison and serve the rest of their sentence or should continue to receive treatment.

Some provinces are concerned about the financial repercussions these provisions may have, even if they only apply in cases where treatment is urgently required.

We believe that the hospital order provisions in the bill will not have a serious impact on the financial resources of the provinces. However, considering their concerns, I have agreed to postpone the coming into force of these provisions for two or three years, so that pilot projects can be conducted in one or two provinces.

[English]

This concludes my summary of the most significant points in this bill. There are a number of other subjects dealt with in the proposed revisions to the Criminal Code, such as provisions to facilitate interprovincial transfer of mentally disordered accused and for the arrest without warrant of those who breach dispositions or are unlawfully out of custody.

The bill also provides for the revision of two other acts, the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act, to bring them into line with the revisions to the Criminal Code.

I would urge members on both sides of the House to expedite the passage of this humanitarian legislation. The proposed changes will create a more equitable balance between the rights of the mentally disordered offenders and the need to protect the state. It deserves their support.

I would like to move:

That Bill C-30, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders in consequence thereof, not be referred to a legislative committee but be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and The Solicitor General.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the Minister of Justice. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular bill and to assure the minister that we on this side will co-operate as much as possible for the quick review of this particular legislation. We will certainly co-operate to the fullest in light of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision and the fact that we are facing a major deadline of November 2 for new legislation to be in place.

We on this side of the House as well are supportive of the general intent of the legislation. We are looking forward to hearing from different groups and organizations that we are sure will bring new thought and light with respect to the bill and hopefully point out where there may be errors or weaknesses in the legislation.

We concur with the minister's comments that this legislation may require some fine tuning and some adjustments. We look forward to hearing from the different groups and organizations that will come before the Standing Committee on Justice and The Solicitor General.

The present situation really is an unjust situation. I think the Law Reform Commission categorized it very well when it said that a person who is labelled mad and bad is doubly damned. That is what we have seen in this country over the last little while, that people could really lose their rights to have even a trial, to be found guilty or not guilty, and at the same time end up in an institution for an indeterminate period of time and even, although highly unlikely, for life. That really was an unacceptable situation that should have been corrected quite some time ago.

All we have to do is take a look at some of the case histories of people who have been caught in this particular situation. There was recent publicity in some of the media talking about some of the people who have been caught up in the web. One was a Daryl Jones who was classified as a psychopath and found not guilty by reason of insanity of rape, robbery and attempted murder of a young woman in 1974. He has been trying to get into a less confining circumstance. The pros and cons of whether that is right or wrong need not be dealt with at this particular stage. I might agree with the fact that maybe he should be staying in a maximum security facility.

The problem is that every year his case comes up for review. He has been before the review board every year for approximately 15 years. The latest time was in January and he heard through the grapevine, as these people always do, that he was going to be transferred to the Kingston psychiatric hospital, but the waiting list was long. What is going to happen to this gentleman is that by the time the waiting list gets up to his name, he will probably be back to be reviewed again and will start the process all over again. That is the inequity in this situation.

Another interesting inequity is the fact that about 60 per cent of psychopaths are in prisons serving a definite period of time rather than in hospitals. Therefore that 60 per cent will back out on the street once their time is over and others who are in under a Lieutenant–Governor's warrant may be there for an indeterminate period of time. The unfairness of that is obvious.

Another problem is that we do not really have the facilities, the technology or the wherewithal to study the individuals involved, to give them the necessary treatment or to determine the likelihood of repeat offences of the types of things they have done. Therefore we do see where there are some very serious problems.

Our information is that probably right now there are about 1,100 people across Canada who are held under Lieutenant–Governor's warrants. The detention is supposedly for a cure. The whole idea is that they are in under these warrants because they are going to get help and assistance to correct the medical problem they face and therefore be released into society and be serving and contributing members of society. In actual fact there is no treatment and this is just another form of cruel and unusual punishment with respect to some individuals.

The review boards looking at these types of situations are really overworked and there is a great deal of delay. As a result, most people are finding that they are not released and they are not getting the treatment they deserve.

In this sense we laud what the government is attempting to do in trying to correct this situation. Our main question now is to determine whether in fact it has.

I must be critical of the government for two reasons: first, because that is what we always are on this side of the House and, second, because this time they deserve it.

The Law Reform Commission studied this particular problem in 1976, and the government knew after the Charter of Rights and Freedoms came down that the situation was contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms but again it chose to do nothing.

My information is that draft legislation was ready in 1986. Here we are in 1991 under the gun because the Supreme Court of Canada has done what everybody knew it was going to do, and that is strike down the provisions. Now we have to scramble to try to put together a law that will meet the tests and serve the public. In that sense, I must criticize the government for taking as long as it has. It is about time that we get on with the task.

The legislation itself appears to strike the proper balance. Again we are going to require the input of a number of different organizations before we know for sure. It does create the new category of dangerous mentally disordered persons. It strikes that balance of protecting society, but at the same time trying to get people out of institutions and back as contributing members of society. We will have that category of dangerously mentally disordered persons. At the same time we will have a system which puts a cap on how long these people have to stay in institutions. Hopefully the proper support systems will be put in place so that these people can be rehabilitated and integrated into society.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms must be for everyone and this legislation will ensure that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is in fact for everyone.

Under the old system a person could be found not guilty by reason of insanity even before he was tried. As the minister said, he could have been found not guilty in the initial stages and the that trial would not even proceed. However, because he or she is insane, he or she is in an institution. That was an unacceptable situation. It not only offended the charter but was an offence to fundamental justice because there was a great injustice created by this situation.

At the same time, with the new category of dangerous mentally disordered persons, we will hopefully be able to protect society. Law and order and the proper protection of society has to be one of our overriding concerns.

I happened to be on the committee that examined the parole provisions in the new legislation which the Solicitor General has announced. It provides better controls of parole, early release and the non-early release of dangerous criminals. We are moving in the same area with this designation so that society will be protected, while at the same time those who can be helped will be helped.

The Liberal Party is supportive of the bill going to committee. We have concerns in three or four areas and I would like to highlight them.

Testimony given before the justice and solicitor general's committees on Bill C-67, dealing with detention and parole, indicated there was a lack of facilities and a lack of treatment for inmates. This was in the sexual or psychiatric problem areas. We are going to be following that up. The intent of this bill is to make a fair degree of treatment and facilities available. However, we are concerned that while the bill may be laudable, the gap between intent and reality is fairly large. It is going to require a major commitment by this government to put in place those facilities and those capabilities, with the participation of the provinces, so that what is intended is achievable.

In a lot of cases people will be released into the system and utilize community-based services and a lot of the provincial health care and mental health care systems. We already know that those systems are taxed to the limit. The question is whether the government has a commitment to provide necessary funds to the task and assist provinces in this particular area.

We are going to see a situation in which more people will be released into the system. If we allow these people to fall into the cracks then we are going to be facing a serious problem in the near future. The overall intent of protecting society will be lost because we did not provide the right treatment, the right facilities or staff. There is a heavy onus on the government to move in this area.

Another area which we feel should be looked at concerns the victims and their involvement. We can all appreciate the situation of the victim realizing that maybe this person is going to be back out on the street tomorrow or the next week or whatever.

The victims also have a stake in this legislation and they have a role to play. We should do what we can to ensure that victims have a say in the process and make the process responsive as well to the victims. Then they hopefully will be supportive of what is taking place, or at least have the feeling that they had a say in what is taking place.

It is a pleasure to support the general intent of this legislation. It is a pleasure to be co-operative with the government, as we always are on this side. It has been my experience that we are probably the most co-operative opposition this House has seen. This is another clear indication of such co-operation.

We look forward to seeing this bill before the committee. Despite the government's claims to the contrary, we have been a positive opposition. We look forward to this bill coming before committee and we look forward to hearing from as many people as possible.

It is my understanding, and I hope the minister can confirm it, that the government is requesting an extension from the Supreme Court of Canada so that we do not face a November 2 deadline and have to hurry this legislation through.

We on this side will support at second reading this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, justice critic for the New Democratic Party, is unable to be here today. It is unfortunate the government was not able to arrange for this debate to occur when he was here.

In his absence I would like to say that we support the bill. We are anxious to send it to committee where there is work to be done on amendments. There have been many amendments suggested by the Canadian Mental Health Association, for instance, which I think should be considered seriously by the government. I am sure there may be other suggestions which could be considered in committee.

We are debating this bill today because in May the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the previous law dealing with the criminally insane and ordered that new legislation be put into effect by November 2. As a result we are in the difficult—but I suppose not insurmountable—situation of having to introduce new legislation by November 2.

There may be the extension which the hon. member referred to. Perhaps we will hear from the minister at some point about whether that extension is being sought and whether she expects to receive it.

We need not have been in this position. There was an intention on the part of a previous Minister of Justice—now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—in 1986 to deal with this issue. Those amendments died on the Order Paper and were not resurrected until this very late hour. It is too bad the government did not see fit earlier to address what everyone knew was a problem, what everyone knew the Supreme Court would eventually rule. However, that is so much water under the bridge. We have the bill before us and we are anxious to send it to committee where it can be worked on and hopefully improved.

Under the old system, which this bill seeks to change, people accused of crimes who were deemed mentally unfit were automatically held for indefinite periods on Lieutenant-Governor's warrants. Though the cases were reviewed annually, in theory offenders could have been kept in a mental hospital forever, even for minor offences.

The Supreme Court ruled that this system violated the rights of mentally ill people. It is estimated that about 1,100 people are currently being held on Lieutenant-Governor's warrants across the country. Bill C-30 proposes to match the period of incarceration to the crime. That would mean that someone acquitted of murder by reason of insanity could still be confined for life while someone who committed a minor crime and was willing to undergo psychiatric treatment might be released on supervision. Those judged to be still dangerous after their terms in hospital could be detained for an additional period under provincial mental health legislation.

Madam Speaker, as I said before, there have been many amendments suggested, and some problems raised, with the actual contents of the bill, by the Canadian Mental Health Association. It is a rather lengthy and constructive criticism that it has put together, and I do not propose to go through all of it.

I would hope that in all the deliberations of the committee, and of the government, we would always be seeking to find that right balance between the protection of individual rights and the public safety, and when a dilemma is involved in this case, that the error would be on the side of public safety while, at the same time, trying to address what are obviously problems in the existing system with respect to the protection of individual rights.

We look forward to having this bill debated and improved in committee, and we hope that the minister might, perhaps on a point of order, answer the question about an extension.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some brief submissions on the bill before Parliament today.

I must, however, take the minister and her government to task for putting this Parliament, and the Canadian public, in the position they are in today. We were told by the Supreme Court of Canada in May of this year that we had six months to put a law on the books. Otherwise, there could be some very dire consequences as a result of this government's inaction over the last seven years to deal with this specific problem and, in particular, those who are found not guilty by reason of insanity.

While this minister seems to be more concerned about the words to O Canada, the criminal justice system in Canada is in desperate need of repair and reform.

It took the Supreme Court of Canada to get this minister, and this government, off their collective duffs to get some action in this particular area. In 1976, the Law Reform Commission of Canada made recommendations in this area. That was 15 years ago.

In 1986 this government promised legislation. That was four years ago. This government promised legislation in this area to deal with these significant problems with regard to our criminal justice system. Where has the government been over the last four or five years?

Finally, the Supreme Court of Canada had a case to decide, and it decided in a six to one decision in May of this year that the law was unconstitutional. Where has the government been for the last number of months?

Now the minister has the audacity to come and tell this House, and the people of Canada, that we have to pass a bill that is dozens of pages long in the next few weeks. If we do not, the Supreme Court of Canada has said that the law is off the books, and the Canadian public will have to suffer the consequences.

The minister comes before this House today suggesting that she is blazing the way to criminal law reform with regard to those who have been found not guilty by reason of insanity. The minister has to take some responsibility for the predicament she is putting this House in.

We on this side of the House agree that this bill should go to committee, but we resent the fact that the opposition will have very limited time to hear from expert witnesses right across the country in order to have this law in place before the imposed deadline by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The defence counsel, Clayton Ruby, who acted for the individual who had this case decided in the Supreme Court, put it right when he said that the justice minister should be ashamed that the draft law has not yet been introduced. That was back in May of this year.

The minister should have been on her feet apologizing to the people of Canada for inaction. She seems to be overly concerned about unimportant matters rather than dealing with an issue that is important to people throughout this country. I am not only speaking of this particular aspect of the criminal justice system.

There are a number of different areas in the criminal law system in Canada that need reform. We have been waiting patiently on this side of the House for some of those reforms. People in my constituency in metropolitan Toronto walk around in fear of what is happening to our city and to our communities. This minister is concerned about the words to O Canada, yet she does not appear to be concerned about the fact that in Toronto the murder rate a number of weeks ago had already broken all records. She seems to be unconcerned about the drug problem in our community, and every major urban centre, including her own community in Vancouver.

Rather than dealing with the root problems of our criminal justice system, this minister is content simply to sit there and do nothing. She is a do nothing Minister of Justice. She ought to be introducing legislation every day in this House to deal with all kinds of different matters that the Law Reform Commission has recommended to this government, that the sentencing commission recommended a number of years ago. This government spent millions of dollars on that particular commission to make recommendations with regard to reforming the sentencing system in Canada. She ought to be working with the Solicitor General to ensure that parole reform is brought into place in Canada.

A Solicitor General a number of years ago, just prior to an election as a matter of fact, a Conservative Solicitor General, said that this government is concerned about the parole system in Canada and the mandatory supervision in Canada. We are going to bring in all these wonderful reforms to make sure that the public is adequately protected.

Now we realize that that was only an election ploy in order to garner some cheap political votes rather than taking effective action immediately.

I call on the minister to get her act together with the Solicitor General, with her justice department, to bring in those reforms. People are fed up. She knows about the De Villiers family whose daughter was murdered in Burlington just a few months ago. She knows that just a few days ago the De Villiers family, with the help of my colleague from Hamilton, launched a nation-wide petition, in effect telling the government to start some action, start reforming the criminal justice system. The aggrieved parents of a murdered child have had to become political activists in order to get this government moving.

That is the travesty of this whole situation. The De Villiers family is not the only family out there waiting for some justice because of this government's inaction. We have the Pollington family whose daughter and two grandchildren were brutally murdered 14 years ago. That person now is released on day passes into the community in order to celebrate his birthday, or celebrate Christmas, when that person brutally murdered three people 14 years ago. Next year this person has the right under the criminal law to seek a review of the parole eligibility date in his case.

Is it not any wonder that people are fast losing respect for the criminal justice system when we hear about these cases. We heard about the Gingras case in Alberta where a convicted murderer was given a day pass to celebrate his birthday at the West Edmonton Mall. Could you imagine that? A convicted murderer was given a day pass to go to the West Edmonton Mall to ride the roller coaster after having committed a gruesome murder.

What did that individual do? He escaped custody and murdered three other people. He murdered other people as a result of that day pass he was given. Talk about negligence. The family of one of the victims that was murdered after this person escaped is now before the civil courts. Not only did they have to suffer through the brutal death of their daughter, now they have to go through the civil courts in order to get some justice because this government fell asleep at the switch. We had a number of other cases over the last number of years. There was the Melvin Stanton case in Toronto where a young woman was murdered because this person was prematurely released after having committed a murder. The Sweeney case here in Ottawa involved a half-way house worker who was killed by someone released from prison after having committed a murder.

Enough is enough. I may appear to be a little exercised and passionate this morning, but I have just cause because this government is not taking the action necessary in order to ensure that the public is safe out there.

Even the police in metropolitan Toronto are critical of this government for its lack of action with regard to Bill C-67 and the drug problem in metropolitan Toronto. The metropolitan Toronto police, the best police force in my view anywhere in the world, busts its butt to bust drug dealers in metropolitan Toronto and to freeze and seize the assets of drug pushers in metropolitan Toronto.

One would think that the federal government would share the proceeds of that seizure of assets of criminals. This government refuses to transfer back to municipalities assets that are frozen and seized by local police forces across the country. It is a new way of taxation for this government. This government is living off the avails of drug pushing in Canada.

In 1989, $39 million was seized by law enforcement officials right across the country. In 1990 it was estimated that that figure was over $60 million. Instead of transferring that money back to the police forces across the country in order to combat crime and fight the drug problem in major urban centres across the country, this government is taking the money and putting it into its general revenues.

It is a new form of taxation. The government is living off the avails of drug pushers in this country, and it ought to be sending that money back.

Whereas my colleague was rather generous in his comments with regard to this particular bill, and I agree we will support it in principle and do everything we can to expedite the passage of the bill, it will not be without some very direct criticism of this government for its lack of action in the criminal law area in Canada.

We call on the government to immediately bring in legislation to deal with the parole system in Canada. We call on the government to immediately deal with the problems associated with mandatory supervision in Canada where convicted criminals are automatically released after having served two-thirds of their sentence.

Yes, we have Bill C-60, a bill that will allow detention orders, but under the law in Canada today, one can serve two-thirds of a sentence, then is automatically released, unless the government can show reason why one ought to be further detained.

We call on the government to bring in some reforms in that area in order to ensure that the public is protected. We call on the government to tighten up the immigration laws in this country so that when a landed immigrant is convicted of serious criminal offence, immediate action is taken for that person to be deported.

We call on the minister to amend the legislation in order to ensure that people who are convicted of serious criminal offences are stripped of their citizenship and deported. It is time that this government started getting tough when dealing with people who have as a preoccupation the breach of serious law in Canada.

I make my submissions because of the dozens and dozens of calls that I receive in my constituency office and because of what I am told by my colleagues about the numbers of calls they are receiving from their constituents about the concern they have with the crime problem in Canada.

It is not an issue that is discussed or debated often in this House. This minister's government seems to be very preoccupied with the constitutional question. Yes, it is an important question. Yes, the economy is an important issue that ought to be addressed by the House of Commons, but so is the criminal justice system in Canada.

People are fed up. The De Villiers family is fed up. The Pollington family is fed up. The Woodward family is fed up. Victims of crime right across Canada are fed up with this government's attitude toward the criminal justice system. They are calling on this government to take immediate action in order to make sure that people at least have the sense that the government cares about law abiding citizens, innocent victims of crime in Canada, so that people will at least be satisfied that the government is addressing the issue.

We should not be placed in a position where unelected Supreme Court judges are telling this Parliament what to do because this government has negligently failed in its responsibility to legislate in the area of criminal law reform.

Getting back to this particular piece of legislation, the minister is only introducing the bill because a six to one Supreme Court of Canada decision told her to introduce this bill. If it was not for the Supreme Court of Canada and the majority decision, not only telling her to introduce this bill but also telling her how to introduce it and what type of bill ought to be introduced, this minister would still be sitting there concerned about the words to O Canada and whether or not The Star Spangled Banner is a better national anthem than the Canadian national anthem.

The minister laughs, but not only is Clayton Ruby ashamed of this particular Minister of Justice, Canadians across the country are ashamed. I call on Canadians to call the Minister of Justice and their Conservative members of Parliament to tell her and her colleagues to get off their butts and start getting serious about reforming the criminal justice system in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 31

PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval–Centre): Madam Speaker, in early September, the Prime Minister announced in Winnipeg a national strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities. The hon. Robert de Cotret, the Minister responsible for the Status of the Disabled, stated that, on its own, no institution or organization can break down the barriers that prevent the full participation of persons with disabilities in the life of the community, that the co-operation of the provincial and municipal governments, volunteer organizations and many others is required.

Today, Madam Speaker, I want to stress the leadership the City of Laval has shown in 1987 when, recognizing the needs of the disabled, it embarked upon a vast program to provide them access to public facilities and services.

The mayor of Laval, Gilles Vaillancourt, said at the time that "to ensure that persons with disabilities enjoy a quality of life equivalent to that of other citizens is to restore a basic right."

Under the leadership of Monique Gauthier, a member of the town council, an access committee was established which developed an ambitious action plan and already has several achievements to its credit.

For 1991, the city has allocated $200,000 to the "Accessibilité Plus" program.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, this country is in the midst of a deepening economic crisis, a crisis into which we were led by this government and its masochistic economic policies.

Just yesterday, a multinational corporation in my riding of Scarborough—Rouge River, Philips Electronics, announced that it was phasing out the manufacturing of its high resolution monochrome monitors by mid-1992, leaving 253 workers unemployed.

Why are they doing that? The corporation claims that poor economic conditions in North America have had a negative impact on the personal computer industry.

Canadians these days do expect and accept adjustments in product manufacturing, but this government has pursued economics and taxation policies which have left our Canadian entrepreneurs in a barren desert. A free trade agreement that encourages manufacturers to leave Canada, extraordinarily high interest rates and interest rate spreads, a high dollar that is killing our exports and that is going higher every day and taxation policies and procedures that discourage even the best of our entrepreneurs—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the time has expired.

RESPIRATORY THERAPY WEEK

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, this is Respiratory Therapy Week, a time for all Canadians to focus on the need for eliminating toxic effects of tobacco smoke and other air pollutants.

Respiratory disease prevention through education means keeping the public aware of serious health problems arising from smoking and other contaminants released into our environment.

Now that Canada and the United States have a joint commitment to improve air quality, Canadians of all ages must make personal decisions about smoking and other factors affecting respiratory health which are within their personal control.

I want to thank the Canadian Society of Respiratory Therapists for their commitment to promoting health of Canadians.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, for the past two days in Cornwall 1,200 grade four students from throughout Stormont—Dundas attended the first farm fair of its kind in eastern Ontario.

The students were able to gain first-hand knowledge about the dairy, fruit and vegetable crop industries. These students have shown a keen interest in agriculture. Some of them may wish to go into farming as a career.

However, as Canadian farmers know, the future of agriculture is in serious doubt. Producers are concerned about the continuation of supply management. The government has repeatedly stated its commitment to strengthening article XI at the GATT and now sit by and see it abandoned.

Farmers are questioning the government's commitment to the preservation of supply management under article XI. Supply management enables our farmers to put the best food products in the world on the tables of Canadians for a reasonable price. It is the cornerstone of Canadian agriculture and producers want to see some hope for the future.

I call upon the government not to give in at GATT and sell out Canada's farmers, including the farmers of tomorrow.

REFERENDA

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, many Canadians are now advocating the holding of referenda on major issues. Both Saskatchewan and British Columbia will have a referendum question on the ballot in the upcoming provincial elections.

Thirty of the United States presently have a provision for referenda. Americans refer to it as direct democracy. The critics of direct democracy say that the ballot questions are usually numerous, lengthy and confusing, that voters are often uninformed or subjected to manipulation by expensive media campaigns which oversimplify or mislead and that professional petition gathering firms charge millions of dollars to get just one question on the ballot.

Is that what Canadians really want?

JUSTICE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, what Canadians really want is a federal election right now.

Yesterday the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Mervyn Lavigne, despite his protests, must pay some of the costs others incurred as a result of his unsuccessful court case.

The National Citizens Coalition has been funding the Lavigne case and they have been running a series of fund raising ads for their own organization based on the Lavigne case.

In other words, the National Citizens Coalition wants to raise funds from secret donors on this issue. They want to be able to spend these funds without reporting to the public how and where this money is spent and they want to force others into expensive court cases, but when the courts rule against their case, they do not want to have to pay the costs.

The National Citizens Coalition, as usual, wants a free ride. What they demand of others they do not demand of themselves. I say to the NCC: list your corporate backers, list your donors, list your expenditures and pay up when you lose.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the needs of Cape Breton fishermen are immediate. The Maritime Fishermen's Union has written and made representations to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans requesting assistance in the form of special programs that will address the catch failure of Cape Breton's inshore longline fishermen. The loss our fishermen have endured has been devastating and the need for assistance is critical. These fishermen have faced a catch failure in waters off the coast of Louisbourg and Glace Bay to a degree unprecedented since Canada's declaration of the 200 mile limit.

It is only a matter of weeks before winter will be upon us and it is going to be a long, cold winter for fishermen, especially for those with absolutely no income whatsoever. I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to do the right thing and address the needs of these fishermen and their families so that they can survive the failure of the 1991 fishery.

Their needs are real. I urge the minister to act and to act forthwith.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, the proposals on federalism and the economic union, combined with the main proposals for a renewed Canada, make a balanced package. They meet the need for federal leadership to strengthen the economic union we all benefit from as well as the need for all levels of government to work together.

These proposals are not final. They were presented as a discussion paper for the public to discuss and debate. We have the unique chance of building a country to our liking.

Together, we must make fundamental changes to enable Canada to continue to thrive in an ever-changing world, while ensuring that the true aspirations of all Canadians find an outlet and are fulfilled within a united country.

• (1110)

The future of our country is at stake here, Madam Speaker. It has worked for 125 years and we must give ourselves every chance to see that a strong and united Canada can continue to exist.

DISCRIMINATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Over the past months I have received a number of complaints regarding the treatment of people of colour at border crossings. For example, an Asian woman said she regularly has her car checked and she feels harassed when she hears comments like "How can she afford such a nice car?" A black man was ordered into the Customs office although he said he had nothing to declare. He noted two other black persons in the office.

My assistant and two friends of Chinese heritage submitted a well documented complaint regarding unfair treatment at the border. Their complaint of January 1990 still has not been dealt with.

Why are these kinds of incidents occurring and what can be done to prevent discrimination? First, few if any Customs officers are people of colour. I understand this was not remedied in recent hirings.

I call on the Minister of National Revenue to immediately implement employment equity within his department by targeting racial minorities for future job openings. The minister and his officials must ensure that all people are treated fairly. People of colour—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I'm sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada is proposing to restore to Canadians the right to own property, but the importance of this move has been muddied by what has become at times an hysterical debate. Misinformed critics are telling Canadians that the right would somehow supersede the rights of society. Today's myth is that bestowing property rights on individual Canadians would give them the right to acquire any property, including restricted firearms.

Absolutely not, Madam Speaker. The individual's right to own property would not wipe out society's right, or Parliament's right to ensure that we have effective gun control. All individual rights that the Charter gives Canadians do not supersede society's rights.

The Charter guarantees us the right to security of the person, for example. But that does not give us the right to carry weapons to protect that security. The Charter guarantees us the right to liberty, but that does not give us the liberty to do something restricted by the Criminal Code.

In a democracy the state can do nothing better than ensuring its citizens have as many rights as possible, and restoring this right is a major contribution to democratic freedom in Canada.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I wish to express the deepest discontent concerning the statement made yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board on the bonuses that senior civil servants and Crown corporation executives will receive.

[English]

During debate on Bill C-29, the infamous back to work legislation, I called on this government to treat its employees fairly and to set an example by limiting the salaries of members of Parliament by the same zero percentage from the same date. By accepting a salary increase which we as members received, we have signalled to our employees that the playing field is indeed unequal.

I reiterate today that the government is treating its Public Service employees unfairly by forcing them into zero per cent salary increase legislation while at the same time paying its senior managers exorbitant bonuses on top of their already substantial salaries.

[Translation]

If we are to believe this government when it says that everyone will be treated equally, I say, "Do it." On behalf of average public servants, I demand that the government—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but your time has expired. The hon. member for Wild Rose.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, 97 per cent of all Albertans want a safer world with more gun controls in place. A large number of my constituents are in favour of stricter gun control, especially in the areas of storage, safety and education, also greater restrictions on the accessibility of paramilitary weapons.

However, most feel that adequate laws are in place now if they were adhered to. They are asking the government to put greater pressure on all provinces to ensure that all gun offenders are prosecuted and that gun offences are not used as a bargaining tool.

They have also requested that any future proposed changes to our gun laws be dealt with in an open process, allowing for public input. That the Governor in Council could make gun law orders without public knowledge is a major concern to all.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to a background paper released yesterday by the government called The European Community, a Political Model for Canada.

I had an opportunity to read through this last night. Unless I missed it, one of the things that struck me as profoundly inadequate in this analysis of the European model, is that there is absolutely no mention anywhere in this paper of the social charter that has been adopted in Europe as integral to the single market which is to be adopted in Europe in 1992.

I say to the government: If you want to have an intellectually honest discussion about the European community as a model, and this paper is otherwise a good paper, raising some serious questions about that model, to have published as a background paper something that does not even acknowledge the social charter—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. The hon. member's time has expired.

EID-MILAD-EL-NABI

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, last Sunday I had the pleasure of attending Eid-Milad-El-Nabi, an annual event hosted by the local Ismaili Muslim community to commemorate the birthday of the prophet Mohammed.

Messrs. Diamond Lalani and Abdul Khanani were instrumental in the organization of the celebration, which is of particular significance to the Muslim community at large.

The Ismaili Muslim community is well established throughout the nation's capital, as it is throughout Canada. A principle of this community is to be concerned with the quality of life of all those among whom they live and who are in need.

The community of Nepean has benefited enormously from their hard work over the years. The Ismaili community has launched several fund raising drives for charities, including the Kidney Foundation, Heart and Stroke Foundation, Children's Aid Foundation, the Canadian Cancer Society, to just name just a few.

It gives me great pleasure to rise today to pay tribute to the Ismaili Muslim community.

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION FOR COMMUNITY LIVING

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, last evening, members of Parliament from all sides of this House met with the Canadian Association for Community Living. That organization is holding its annual meeting in Ottawa this weekend. Many members of Parliament went last evening to say hello and to informally pass information and express our thanks to those people for the fine work they do from one end of this country to the other. The Minister of Finance was there as well.

I want to thank these people for the fine work they do. We appreciate it very much. They go about their work very quietly but very effectively, doing the types of things that all Canadians are pleased to see happening in their own ridings. They do it very quietly, very effectively, and I am very pleased that many of these people in my own riding are here with us today. I thank them for coming to Ottawa and I thank them for the very, very fine job they do in all parts of this country.

ORAL QUESTIONS

TREASURY BOARD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last week, the President of the Treasury Board told the House this about the famous bonuses: "Since the bonus comes at the end of the year, when it will be given, it will be in the amount of 0 dollars and 0 cents." Why did the minister make such a statement to the House when he knew that it was not true?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, when the budget was presented, it was announced that for the pay period starting after the budget, everybody would get zero per cent increase. There was zero amount available for increases in salary. There was no mention of retroactivity. There was no intention to be retroactive with anybody.

The system in place put in by the Liberal government in 1981 is that senior salaries have a bonus which is averaged between zero and 10 per cent in the last few years, which is decided upon after recommendations by a board of directors. These senior civil servants have not received the bonus for the pay period that preceded the budget.

Is the hon. member suggesting we go retroactive in deductions for everybody else who receives federal funds?

• (1120)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

One thing that Canadians do value is fairness. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he believes that it is fair that hot on the heels of the largest back to work order in the history of the country we find out that while government secretaries and clerks will not receive one penny of increase this year, top level appointees of the Prime Minister are eligible to receive Christmas bonuses this year of tens of thousands of dollars.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that these Christmas bonuses for the big cheeses are fair?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, it is false and misleading to describe these as Christmas bonuses. They are not Christmas bonuses in any way, shape or form.

The government of the party she supports introduced this system a number of years ago. An independent outside committee evaluates the salaries and has recommended this procedure.

If the hon. member is suggesting another procedure should be used, we would welcome her suggestions and consider them. I think it is patently unfair and dishonest to try to confuse the people of Canada by suggesting there are Christmas bonuses and that we should act in that way.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, what is patently unfair and dishonest was the statement made in the House last week, and I quote: "It will be zero for salary increases and it will be zero dollar bonuses for all these people".

That was a statement made by the President of the Treasury Board to justify the largest back to work order in the history of the country.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, on behalf of the government, if he thinks it is fair. Does he believe that the Canadian people think Christmas bonuses for the fat cats and nothing for the secretaries is fair?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, let me repeat again slowly.

For the pay period after the budget, 1991-92, the increases and the bonuses are zero, zero. That is simple enough to understand.

For the pay period prior to the budget, the same pay period for which she and I received our 3.78 per cent and for which PSAC received 4.7 per cent, the total remuneration package has not yet been decided and will be evaluated.

To call that a Christmas bonus is misleading and is not helping the quality of public discourse in this country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, they are not Christmas bonuses. They are bonuses paid at Christmas.

I want to ask the question as well of the Deputy Prime Minister about this fairness. This year the janitor who cleans the building where the Deputy Prime Minister works will have received zero per cent increase and a zero bonus and will not have any money to buy presents to put under the Christmas tree for his children.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister think it is fair that the president of CN Rail will get an $87,000 bonus under his Christmas tree, courtesy of the Government of Canada? Is that Tory fairness?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must have a particularly skilful teacup reader to tell him what decision the government might take when it receives recommendations which it has not yet received. That figure is totally false.

Let me repeat again. The hypothetical janitor last year received a 4.7 per cent increase. The hon. member received a 3.7 per cent increase. The final remuneration package for senior managers for last year has not been decided upon because the recommendations have not yet been made.

For the period 1991–92 there will be a zero per cent increase for senior management and a zero bonus. I think that is simple enough for even the hon. member to understand.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, let me quote from Hansard at page 2929. It reads:

> —when comes the time for the bonus at the end of the year they will receive a cheque for the amount of zero cent, zero dollar.

That was said on September 30.

Madam Speaker, Canadians want to know why this injustice from the government? Why nothing for workers who earn $15,000 a year and an $87,000 Christmas bonus for the President of CN Rail?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's repetition of that figure for the CNR chairman is just as wrong in French as it was in English. I wish he would stop misinforming the public.

Let me repeat again, as the President of the Treasury Board said for the fiscal period 1991–92 which followed the budget it is completely consistent with what was said in the budget and said by the President of the Treasury Board in the House. The increase is zero. The bonus is zero.

Why cannot that simple fact be accepted? How does the opposition find it of value to the quality of public debate in this country to continue to try to misrepresent our position?

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the fact remains that a number of senior people, a number of political appointees, received a pay increase in March. These same people will receive another pay increase in December. In other words, the government is both the Easter Bunny and Santa Claus for those people.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. He is always concerned about the deficit. The Public Service strike is over. If this government is so concerned about the deficit, why can it still afford to put expensive ads in a national paper against the Public Service strike? Why is this ad still in the paper after the workers are already back at work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is just simply to convey to the public the information in a correct and factual manner.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a serious question for the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister.

How can the government afford expensive ads? How can it afford Christmas and Easter bonuses? How can it afford not to do what the Auditor General said with regard to the $5 billion a year in contracting out? How can the government afford to do that without the independent evaluation that our Auditor General has called for? Why not do that?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there is an independent evaluation of the remuneration for senior managers. It is a system put in place in 1981. If the hon. member has a better system to recommend to the House, we would be pleased to hear it.

As for his suggestion of Christmas bonuses and Easter bonuses, it is just as inaccurate when coming from that party as coming from the Liberals.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

Will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women please explain to the women of Canada why the government can afford hefty bonuses for government appointees but cannot afford to pay its women public servants a decent working wage? Will she explain, please?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the women in the Public Service are paid equitably and fairly.

In fact it is interesting to note the wage gap in the Public Service is much less than in the private sector and that we have made significant advances in terms of promotion of women. We have doubled the number of women in our management categories. We have increased significantly the number of women in professional and scientific categories.

We are the only government that has implemented pay equity, which involves increasing salaries for many of the lower paid women in significant amounts as well as the $500 signing bonus they will receive for those earning less than $27,000.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us at what level the Canadian dollar should trade in relation to the American dollar and the Mexican peso for the Canada—United States—Mexico Free Trade Treaty to be beneficial for Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated in the House before, the value of the dollar is set in the international marketplace. What is encouraging is the fact that interest rates in Canada have dropped to a four-year low.

As further evidence that the economy is improving today it has been reported that the composite indicator, which involves some 10 leading components in the industrialized sector of Canada, has shown a further increase of 1.2 per cent. That is an increase of 1.2 per cent over the previous month of .9 per cent. Further, what is more encouraging is the fact that this is the first time in six years that all 10 components have risen together. I think it clearly demonstrates that we are on the right track toward sustainable growth and sustainable recovery with price stability. I think all Canadians should be encouraged that that has occurred.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, the House leader for the government makes a big point about the quality of debate in this House. It is not helped by this minister constantly reading a set piece answer from a child's primer on economics.

The high dollar, following upon the American agreement, decimated our industrial base; but going into the Mexican agreement it is crucial that this government remove the shackles.

Is this government going to throw Canadian workers to the wall or is the government—

Mr. McDermid: Wolves.

Mr. Martin: Wolves, you've got it, baby. It was yours. Or, is the government going to give us a strategy to lower the Canadian dollar so that we can compete in a very different economy? Don't read me something that you have already had prepared.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member gets so disturbed with good news. This is information that was just released this morning. It wasn't contained in the primer. Maybe, if the hon. member had received the information, he would have prepared his question a little differently.

I will give the member a little more good news. Automobile sales are up by 10 per cent. Truck sales are up by 17 per cent. That is another solid indicator. Interest rates, the key to growth in the economy, the key to job creation, the key to economic activity, are at a four-year low and the hon. member should be applauding that rather than criticizing it. Why does he not get on board and be a little more optimistic?

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It relates to the fate of de Havilland.

Yesterday not only did the government not commit itself to securing the future of Canada's leading aircraft manufacturer, but the federal minister of industry suggested that the only initiative should come from the province.

How can the federal government possibly divest itself from this country's aerospace industry and be so indifferent to the number one aircraft producer which directly employs 4,900 Canadians in Toronto and thousands of other Canadians in the province and across the country? Why give Canadians another Avro Arrow disaster?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member forgets the tremendous involvement of the federal government in helping de Havilland over the years through DIP grants.

As a matter of fact when this particular company was sold it had 3,600 employees. It now has 4,900 employees. Even more important than that we are disappointed, as I am sure the hon. member is, the arrangement that was being worked on did not work out. I gather Boeing has other options. We stand ready to help in any way we can.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is again for the Acting Prime Minister.

This morning Boeing announced that starting next year 1,100 jobs will be cut at de Havilland, one-quarter of its work force.

Given that Metropolitan Toronto is reeling from double digit unemployment, that its manufacturing base is eroding at an alarming rate, and that thousands of permanent jobs have left the city, how can Canadians have any confidence in this government that it is serious about curing these serious economic ailments when it is prepared to wash its hands of de Havilland which only happens to be the leading industrial employer in all of Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member clearly did not listen to a word I said.

We have expressed our interest to help and we of course will be there as we have been in the past. Metropolitan Toronto certainly is going through an economic crisis, and we had the Canadian Federation of Independent Business yesterday tell us why: that 94 per cent of small business people in Ontario feel as a result of the NDP budget that the climate for starting a business and growing a business in Ontario was not as strong as it was before.

We as a federal government are very proud that we have put in place the lowest corporate rate for small business in the OECD. We are very proud that we got rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. We are there to help the business community, not to attack it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the Ontario government in fact is the only government which has said that it will support and back up de Havilland in these tough times. It has said that it will keep de Havilland operating in so far as it is possible for it.

We now have 1,000 jobs cut today. What is this government going to do to get this important part of our industrial structure back on its feet? What are you going to do for those jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should be reminded of how many jobs have been created in de Havilland since the federal government took its action to sell it a few years ago. We had been there with a number of grants in the past.

I am also reminded that the French group, Aerospatiale, said yesterday, I think it was, that it might appeal against an EEC veto on its takeover with Italian partner, Alenia, of Canadian aircraft manufacturer de Havilland. "There must be a change in Brussel's policy and, if an appeal would help achieve that change, we will do it", its president said.

We have that appeal going on and we have the record of the federal government standing behind this company, and we will continue to stand behind it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I may just shift to another area of "good news", such as the Minister of Finance talks about, like this 1,100 job loss that is taking place today.

I want to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister. Farm leaders have asked to meet directly with the Prime Minister in Winnipeg today because, as this letter from corn producers shows, they reject the government's claim that help is being provided that is even close to what the government promised in March.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he will make a commitment today that the help he promised when he was Minister of Agriculture will actually be provided.

That means a billion dollars for the 1990–91 crop year. Yes or no.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will be meeting with representatives of the farm community in Winnipeg today and he will be advising them that commitments made while I was agriculture minister will in fact be delivered. The cheques are now being processed and are being sent in the mail. He will be telling them they will be receiving up to $1.5 billion before the end of this year and a further $1 billion plus in the period January to June 1992.

If $2.5 billion is nothing then his description of $1 billion and mine are quite different. I know that the farmers of Canada will recognize $2 billion when they see it.

IMPORTED CARPETING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. On August 6, an anti-dumping investigation was launched on carpeting produced by tufting machines made in or exported from the United States of America.

The complaint maintains that the share of the Canadian market held by imports from the United States rose from 8 per cent in 1988 to 28 per cent in 1990. The industrialists who approached me said that dumping accounts for up to 91 per cent of the distribution market.

Can the minister tell us whether he intends to speed up the investigation of this issue, given that serious harm is being done, 1,000 jobs were lost in 1989 and 1990 and plants are threatened with closure?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member has a question. It would be time to ask it.

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I understand very much the hon. member's concern on this very important matter. I can confirm that an investigation into the matter did begin on August 6 of this year. It is proceeding in its normal expedient and efficient way. These investigations do reach conclusions that are satisfactory to the industry as they have done most recently in British Columbia in the beer war with the Americans in the anti-dumping areas.

The investigation is proceeding in its expedient fashion, and we would hope that a decision will be reached at the earliest opportunity which of course will be made public for the benefit of the industry.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Finance addressed the OECD in Paris in June he said, and I quote:

> Those who lose jobs during periods of economic slowdown such as we are now experiencing may well find their new positions in different industries, occupations or regions.

Would the minister explain to the House what industries, occupations or regions of Canada he thinks Canadians are likely to be leaving?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, unfortunately we have had some pretty clear evidence coming from the province of Ontario, largely as a result of the economic policies of the provincial government of Ontario. What is interesting is that 36 per cent of small business owners are contemplating relocation. That figure is from a survey of 3,539 small and medium-sized businesses and is a rise from about 20 per cent in March.

What is interesting is that this is directed toward the budget and the economic policies of the government of Ontario. Eighty-six per cent of the small business sector in Ontario said that they consider the business climate in the province as being unfavourable. Only 3 per cent view conditions as being favourable for business. Ninety-four per cent of the survey respondents saw the Ontario budget as being irresponsible; 2 per cent believed that it was responsible.

I think that what you have is a shift and a restructuring and an adjustment process going on. The hon. member knows that the high tech information based economy is one that is upon us and there will be shifts in the economy based upon that reality.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am sorry I did not ask the minister the question for which he had a briefing note.

Given that perhaps Ontario is one region he expects people to leave, what other industries and occupations and what policies or programs does he propose to help the people who are going to go through this period of adjustment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member is quite familiar with the realities of the marketplace and the economy and knows very well that there has been a shift into the high tech information based sectors of the economy, and a bit of a downplaying in the manufacturing sector. That is not to say that the manufacturing sector is going to disappear, but it does mean that there will be greater emphasis on the service sector, the high tech sector and the information based sector. The fact of the matter is that we are in a globalized economy and have to find our respective market niches within that globalized economy and be competitive and productive if we are going to survive.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration knows northeastern New Brunswick very well. I know that he is aware of the very difficult economic situation resulting from the recession and the disastrous herring fishing season. Could the minister tell us and the workers of that region today whether his government will set up job creation programs this fall to help those affected by this economic crisis?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the government has already indicated, and I have mentioned in this House, that we, along with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, were trying to get a clear picture of the situation. We know that there has been a considerable decline in the volume of fish caught. In fact, we are in the process of determining what programs to implement to help those people. I suggest that the hon. member subjunctive stay tuned, as we say. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is scheduled to make a statement this afternoon on this subject.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. He knows the urgency of the situation. If the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is going to make a statement this afternoon, I hope that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will also adopt a progressive approach to this issue, because fall is a very short season in New Brunswick and winter is fast approaching. Can we expect an answer from his department, perhaps in cooperation with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that Employment and Immigration already has programs to help people in such situations, for instance in the Acadian peninsula in New Brunswick. Those programs are in place and if additional resources are needed to deal with the particular situation in the peninsula, the hon. member can be assured that the Department of Employment and Immigration will be there to help the people.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for shipbuilding policy. One of the 1984 promises of this government was to adopt a national shipbuilding policy as a top priority. Instead this government has presided over the decimation of yards from coast to coast.

This week's decision on the coastal patrol vessels, while good news for shipyard workers in Halifax, left the two remaining yards on the Great Lakes with an uncertain future.

I want to ask this government what action it is prepared to take to ensure that both Port Weller and Portship can survive.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the answer of course is yes. This particular industry is in a period of rationalization. It is also in a period of revitalization. The Government of Canada has worked very hard in the last three or four years to rationalize shipyards to make sure that we can have a proper regional distribution of the activity and we will continue to do that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am not sure if the minister was actually answering my question. I want to know what specific action this government is going to take to assist the yards at Port Weller, at St. Catharines, the yard at Portship in Thunder Bay, as well as the yards on the west coast. It is one thing to say rationalization. The workers in these communities want to know if they have a future in the shipbuilding industry and, specifically, I am wondering if the government is prepared to re-establish a subsidy program so that we can get back to the business of building commercial ships in Canada to be purchased by Canadian ship companies.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago it was announced that Port Weller would be receiving some additional work and the government may be in a position to help retool to do this work.

However, this government does not believe in massive subsidies any more than it believes in massive tax increases.

LABOUR

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, Canada's unions are continuing to punish Canada's farmers. We have just seen the end of the disruptive PSAC strike which had the devastating effect on farmers of withholding grain shipments. Yesterday 700 grain handlers in Thunder Bay walked off the job.

Canadians are completely fed up with this level of labour strife and farmers cannot take it any more. My question is for the Minister of Labour.

Can the minister please give us an update on this mean-spirited and ill-timed strike?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, this is an outrageous situation. Quite frankly the government hopes that the six grain companies and the union involved will get together, get back to the negotiating table and work out a satisfactory arrangement.

It is absolutely unforgiving to allow this kind of situation to hold the farmers to ransom. They are having enough difficulties as it is because of depressed prices, and to see this deliberate disruption occurring not only on this occasion but on other occasions as well is totally unacceptable and intolerable.

I would hope, Madam Speaker, that all parties will get together, sit down at the negotiating table and get this situation resolved. Of course the Department of Labour will be in a position to provide mediation services to ensure that that process is facilitated.

FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport. The government recently called for tenders for a new ferry for Wood Islands, P.E.I. and is calling for specific proposals for a fixed link.

In a letter the minister told me: "I am unable to make a permanent commitment for the continuation of the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry service".

Will the minister explain why she will not make a permanent commitment to a separate transportation service to eastern Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I know that transportation in the Atlantic provinces is very key and ferries certainly are—yes, I have been there. I spent several weeks this summer in the eastern part of this country looking at the problems they have and working toward finding answers.

• (1150)

I know Wood Islands ferry is very important. We will continue to look at it. If there is a possibility to answer the member's concerns on this, we certainly will do so.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, the new ferry for Wood Islands crossing is already two years behind schedule and will not be ready until probably 1994.

The people of eastern Prince Edward Island want to know that this government is committed to their ferry service. Will the minister and her government give the House and the people of eastern Prince Edward Island the assurance of a permanent ferry service from Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, this government and myself as a minister will look into the situation. I will not make a permanent promise of this. I promise I will look into it. If at all possible, it will be done.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The sleeping pill Halcion was banned in Britain earlier this week because it produces serious adverse effects. Two days ago, the minister said his department "is equipped to move very quickly within hours," if just cause were found to ban it in Canada. Can the minister tell the House today what decision he has made?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for the question.

I think it is important to determine exactly where we are with the drug Halcion. On October 2, we requested from Upjohn, the manufacturer of Halcion in the United Kingdom and in Canada, what was the basis for the decision made in the U.K. to withdraw the drug from the market.

We have somebody from Great Britain working with the officers of my department today, giving them the information about why that drug was withdrawn. The United States is doing exactly the same thing. We expect that all countries where you can find the drug will do exactly the same operation.

I can say to my colleague that we have to obtain the necessary information on the drug. If the information provided is sufficient to believe that it should be done, as I said yesterday, the day before and I repeat today, it will be done immediately.

I believe that we have to be very conscious of the fact that we cannot withdraw a drug from the market if we do not have the scientific evidence that it should be done.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, since Halcion is known to cause acute withdrawal symptoms when taken away from the patient, and since patients on their own following the news media may stop the medication, I ask the minister to immediately send a health directive to pharmacists and physicians across the country to advise them on this issue.

Does the minister agree?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, of course we will be in touch with the doctors' associations and we are asking patients using the drug to be in touch with their doctors and pharmacists.

Once again, I repeat what I said. At this time our scientific experts do not have any evidence that the drug should be withdrawn from the market. That is why we are in touch with U.K., to determine the reasons why it was done in Great Britain.

We are in touch with the United States and will be with other countries to see, but once again, the gap is very tiny between the fact that we can cripple a company over something when there may not be a problem.

That is why I can assure the member—I know the question is very relevant—that we are in touch with everybody: the press, the doctors and the pharmacists, to be sure that if there is any problem, action will be taken immediately in the direction that it should be taken.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It has to do with a question raised yesterday about the future of the CBC in Winnipeg.

Winnipegers were not reassured yesterday by the answer of the Minister of Communications to the hon. member for Churchill, or by statements made by Mr. Watson yesterday that no decision had been taken.

What we want to know, Madam Speaker, is not that no decision has been taken, what we want to know is that no decision will be taken with respect to the maintenance of full regional service in Winnipeg.

I know the government likes to talk about its arm's length relationship, but the mandate of the CBC is the business of the Canadian government. Will this mandate be respected because in our judgment, having full regional service in a place like Winnipeg is part and parcel of what it means to have a national broadcasting corporation.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Communications said yesterday, and it happens to be the truth, these decisions are taken by the CBC. We cannot anticipate what its decision might be until it makes it.

The CBC, like every other arm of government, everybody included, has to operate within the fiscal restraints. If in order to meet all the expectations of the CBC, of the people of Winnipeg, the people of Calgary and so on, we have to increase taxes to do so, then I am sure the support of the hon. member for that increase of taxes would be something we would bear in mind.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the Government House Leader would like us to believe that these kinds of decisions are not political. They are political in the same way that the VIA Rail cuts were budget decisions, political decisions taken by this government. We are asking the government not to hide behind the arm's length relationship it claims to have and which, indeed, it should have, except when it concerns the regional and national mandate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I ask again for assurances that the full regional service which now exists at Winnipeg will not be removed.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentions VIA Rail. It would require about $1 billion a year subsidy to maintain it at the former level.

Will the hon. member say that he is in favour of increasing taxes by $1 billion a year to pay for VIA Rail? That is what needs to be said to put the issue in its proper perspective. It is increasing taxes or live within our means. The CBC has to live within its means.

I do not know what the decision is. The Minister of Communications does not know what the decision is. The CBC does not know what the decision is because it has not taken it yet.

LABOUR

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As the Minister is well aware, the Thunder Bay grain elevator workers took to the picket lines yesterday. The workers have stated that the company is refusing to return to the bargaining table and bargain in good faith.

I would like to know from the Deputy Prime Minister what his government is going to do to ensure that the companies involved will get back to the bargaining table as quickly as possible.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As I indicated in response to an earlier question, the government is pleading with the parties to get back to the bargaining table to negotiate a satisfactory settlement.

Maybe the hon. member may have some influence, because on many occasions we hear in the House very legitimate representations from members on this side and the other side of the House to the effect that there is not enough business going through Thunder Bay. We have lots of business there that is available now and into the future, but to have this kind of a labour disruption certainly is not good for the farmers who are in desperate straits. It certainly is not good for the future of Thunder Bay and it certainly is not good for the St. Lawrence Seaway. So I ask the hon. member to help us in this regard.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. When the Vancouver grain handlers were locked out in June, it took this government only five days to introduce back to work legislation. Union leaders fear that companies will now refuse to negotiate in good faith because they believe the government will come to their rescue.

Will the minister assure all workers in Canada that collective bargaining is still the preferred option, and will he guarantee that the rights of workers are protected in this way.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think in the case of the Vancouver situation, the positions were so firmly entrenched it appeared obvious that there could be no settlement. The situation is somewhat different here.

I would ask the hon. member once again to plead with his union constituents to come to the bargaining table and we will certainly be doing the same thing with the six grain elevator companies which are the operators there, because therein lies the solution. It is high time that farmers no longer be held to ransom by this kind of activity. It is time to get the grain moving because commodity prices are low. We have made sales and there are more sales that can be made. Let us get on with it. I ask the co-operation of the hon. member.

QUEBEC'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is also responsible for economic development in Quebec.

I would like to know whether the minister has read the proposals made at Rendez-vous économique 91 two weeks ago in Quebec, and whether he is prepared to support proposal No. 8, which received the full support of all economists and all economic partners in Quebec and recommended a monetary policy that would maintain the dollar at around 80 cents?

Will he talk to the Minister of Finance so that we can have a monetary policy that will help our exports, not only in Quebec but across Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, obviously, I talk to the Minister of Finance every day because he is an excellent minister and supports excellent policies.

However, Madam Speaker, I would like to say just this. On many occasions, the Minister of Finance has explained here in the House the facts of the government's monetary policy. All I know is that in one year—the hon. member cannot deny this is true—interest rates in Canada have gone down 500 points. In other words, nearly 5 per cent.

The Minister of Finance said a few minutes ago that the recovery—

Mrs. Maheu: What about Montreal!

Points of Order

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Yes, Montreal. Today, it was announced in Montreal that the unemployment rate had gone down 1.2 per cent because the number of jobs had increased.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member took the words out of my mouth.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Léonard, for a very short supplementary, please.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, as I was telling the minister, I think that the Rendez-vous économique was the first time we saw all partners together.

Will the minister responsible for economic development in Quebec ask the Minister of Finance to do something? He must consider the present situation, because it is really very bad. Something has to be done. We must change our monetary policy. Will he defend the interests of Quebec?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I will repeat what I said earlier.

The policy supported by this government is one based on permanent solutions. In 1980, 1981 and 1982, you tried temporary measures, and we know exactly what that did to this country. I realize the hon. member shares my concerns about economic development in Quebec, and especially in Montreal.

In any case, various types of action are being taken constantly, a number of measures have been announced, and more will be announced in the future. Once again, I fully support the policy of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, because I believe it will provide lasting solutions, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of a point of order. The hon. member for Churchill.

GRAIN HANDLERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my point of order relates to the questions concerning the grain handlers' strike raised during Question Period.

The Minister of Labour is now in the House. Representatives of our caucus met with him prior to the House convening this morning. Will the minister assure us and the House that he will be taking action this weekend to ensure that the negotiations resume?

Also, will he assure the opposition parties that they will be kept informed of the progress throughout the weekend?

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The minister may reply, but this is an extension of question period. If he wishes to reply, I will of course recognize him.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I will respond if the House will allow this Question Period to extend for one more question. During Question Period I was on the phone in the lobby with both parties in the dispute. I made known to them the concerns of the government and asked them to return as quickly as possible to the bargaining table. At the same time I offered to both parties the help of a mediator.

Of course I will let members know of developments in this strike. I impressed on both sides that such work stoppages were not acceptable to the farmers. I made my point known to them in a quite clear manner and we had a full and frank discussion. They are aware of the government's position. We hope there will be movement by both sides.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond):: Madam Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention the provisions of Standing Order 18 regarding disrespectful or offensive language. I am sure it was inadvertent but during Question Period the Minister of Supply and Services, as well as the government House leader who has been a model of respect and dignity for everyone in the country to view, slipped up and returned to the ways of an earlier time of debate in the House of Commons, primarily 1980 to 1984.

Would Madam Speaker take it under advisement to review the "blues" from Question Period and bring to the attention of all hon. members, particularly those who are advocating reform of Question Period, how they might be able to improve their behaviour in this House?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in the jargon of the street that would be referred to as a cheap shot. I did hear the remark of the member for LaSalle—Émard who said something like: "Oh, keep it under control, baby", or words to that effect. I interpreted those words in the way they ought to be interpreted and that is with no malice or forethought.

What we are talking about in that provision is the use of words which have been used too often in this House. This arose out of a period when the rat pack was in full form. I congratulate the hon. member for having brought the rat pack under some semblance of control. From time to time it does get out of control. The general admonition that this kind of language should not be used is one I accept entirely. I look forward to the day when the rat pack has completely disappeared from the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the government House leader for his apology. It is well received.

Perhaps while the government House leader is reflecting upon his remarks he might wish to speak to the Minister of Supply and Services, whose surname is appropriate in the circumstances, so that perhaps in the future he will refuse—

Mr. Andre: Point of privilege, Madam Speaker. That is a classic example which he must withdraw.

Madam Speaker, the House leader of the Liberal Party in making derogatory malicious and sexual, if not sexist, remarks about the last name of the Minister of Supply and Services is committing the sin which has brought disrespect on this House. That is the kind of rat pack behaviour I was talking about.

I would ask him to show that he is sincere about his earlier comments and withdraw and apologize to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to assure the House and hon. members that my knowledge of English colloquialisms is good enough to understand that kind of reference. I am sure that the hon. member will want to withdraw that reference which does not do anything good for this House at a time when we are all trying to do a better job for the people of Canada.

The hon. member.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, in accordance with your wishes and your directive, I would gladly withdraw the remark.

I raised the provisions of Standing Order 18. I brought to your attention the remarks by the government House leader and the Minister of Supply and Services who during Question Period continually made cat calls about the quality and substance of the questions, inferring each and every time that members were being dishonest.

That is impugning the motives of members on this side. I know that Madam Speaker will want to take the time to review the transcripts and perhaps watch the tapes to determine whether the provisions of Standing Order 18 have been breached by the government House leader and the Minister of Supply and Services.

• (1210)

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I understand the reference which the Liberal House leader made to my name. It is something I have been used to since I was about seven years of age. It shows that he has a mentality of about a seven year old. I appreciate that. It is the truth and he shows it.

He complains about cat calls directed to the hon. member for Hamilton East. She believes she has a separate licence from anybody else in this place and makes more cat calls than the rest of the place put together.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the hon. House leader for the Official Opposition first rose on a point of order and asked the Chair to review the "blues" and, if necessary, the tapes I certainly agreed to it. I have listened to everyone else who wished to participate in different points of orders. Obviously the hon. Minister of Supply and Services wishes me to review the "blues" and watch the tapes, which I will do, as he has not seen fit to withdraw any of the comments.

At this end of the House it is very difficult to hear everything that is being said when everyone is talking at the same time. I left it to the minister. He made his statement. I will review the "blues" and come back to the House, if necessary.

Routine Proceedings

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-35, an Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-308, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

She said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for the establishment of a system allowing persons who do not wish to receive direct mail advertising, or mailing of printed matter, without further address than "householder", "boxholder" , "occupant" or "resident" to notify the Canada Post Corporation accordingly.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which I wish to present to the House and to the government with respect to adoptive parents.

Adoptive parents across Canada feel that Bill C-21, the government's unemployment insurance legislation, was discriminatory toward their situation. The adoptive parents' leave was reduced from 15 weeks, while at the same time the time for biological parents was increased to 25 weeks leave at the time of birth.

Bill C-21 is a discriminatory step backward from previous legislation in 1983, when the House of Commons explicitly amended the UIC Act to end discrimination of adoptive parents and recognize the needs of adoptive parents.

Their key position here in this petition is that the new unemployment insurance legislation disadvantages and discriminates against adoptive children by reducing the amount of time their new parent can be home with them at a time when they most need time together for the bonding process.

NATIONAL EDUCATION STANDARDS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, whereas Canada wants to remain competitive at the international level and maintain its status as first-ranking nation; whereas Canada wants competent and well-trained workers to maintain this country's competitiveness; whereas Canada wants to reduce the rate of functional illiteracy in the country, which is presently around 38 per cent, in order to be able to better train its labour force; therefore, Madam Speaker, the undersigned, call upon Parliament to urge the government to promote and encourage national education standards, in conjunction with provincial governments, education professionals, management and labours, parents, youths, voluntary organizations and ordinary citizens.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the same section, it is my honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of eastern Ontario with respect to the self-exile program. They point out that eastern Europeans entered Canada legally, in good faith, for example. They were informed by the Government of Canada that their applications would be processed expeditiously. They call on the government to speed up the processing of any outstanding self-exile applications, remove the quotas which appear to have been implemented, and other things which they feel would make it easier for self-exiles from eastern Europe and the Soviet Union to be admitted as landed immigrants in our country.

CHANGE OF STAFF AT CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSION, PORT OF SPAIN, TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Question No. 53—Mr. Wappel:

Within the past 4 months, has there been a change of staff at the Canadian consulate in Port of Spain, Trinidad and, if so, (a) what was the extent of the change (b) when did this change occur (c) what were the reasons given (d) was any staff (i) laid off (ii) transferred (iii) terminated?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Staff changes between February and May 1991 in Port of Spain were as follows:

—one locally-engaged staff rejected on probation, for unsatisfactory attitude and quality of work;

—two locally-engaged staff hired to fill two new positions;

—one locally-engaged staff hired temporarily to fill behind locally engaged acting in higher level position:

—one Canadian based staff departure (routine end of assignment).

Question No. 62—Ms. Hunter:

1. What is the mandate of the Canadian Unity Task Force?

2. (a) Which persons have been assigned duties under this mandate (b) what are their duties (c) what are their salary designations (d) who is the chair of the task force (e) when is the task force expected to report?

3. (a) What is the grants and contributions budget for the task force (b) which individuals or organizations have received contracts (c) what is the reporting date of these individuals or organizations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): 1. The "Canadian Unity Task Force" does not exist in the sense of a task force and has no mandate. It represents resources that the government has approved to be devoted to Canadian Unity.

These resources are at present deployed within FPRO but, for administrative reasons, appear in the main estimates of the Secretary of State department.

2. a) & c) See Appendix I for the list of personnel whose salaries are being charged to the task force.

b) In general, the public servants are working on FPRO's activities related to Constitutional Development, and in support of the Cabinet Committee on Canadian Unity and Constitutional Development.

Generally, of these resources, one third is destined for salaries, and two thirds for operational costs such as travel, professional service contracts, research and consultations. The resources are not a permanent increase. They will sunset at the end of the fiscal year 1992-93. The funds consist of some $17M over three years. ($2.75M in 1990-91, $7.09 in each 1991-92 and 1992-93.)

d) & e) There is no Canadian Unity Task Force. There is therefore no chairperson nor will there be a report.

3. a) As part of the resources allocated by the government, $1M in each of 1991-92 and 1992-93 has been allocated for grants and contributions. To date no individual or group has received resources as the program terms and conditions are in the process of being developed for Treasury Board decision.

b) & c) See Appendix II for the list of individuals and organizations who have received contracts and the termination dates.

Question No. 76—Mr. Gardiner

With regard to 1992 Celebrations planned by the government a) how many contracts have been issued to plan or help organize these events b) for what amounts are these contracts c) has a budget been set yet, and if so, how much for celebrations in 1992 d) how many staff by department have been assigned duties for 1992 Celebrations e) has the government prepared a list of themes and/or possible events to celebrate in 1992 f) what are the events g) has the government prepared a study on funding that was provided to projects in the 1967 Centennial year and, if so, what were the results?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): As stipulated by the 400 participants in the 1989 national conference entitled "Vers 1992 (toward 1992)", the government has set up the Canada 125 Committee, whose two co-chairs have decided to create a non-political and independent non-profit corporation to take responsability for the general management and co-ordination of the activities of the 125th anniversary of Confederation.

Thus far, the government has contributed $2.3 million to the corporation to prepare the 1992 programming in the coming months. The corporation will now make every possible effort to obtain the greatest financial and organizational participation it can from the private and volunteer sectors. Additional financial participation by the government in these activities remains to be determined.

Moreover, each department has identified a co-ordinator responsible for federal projects under the 1992 activities program. These co-ordinators will, in addition to their regular duties, maintain liaison between the Department or Crown corporation that they represent and the CANADA 125 corporation to ensure the convergence of everyone's efforts for 1992.

The CANADA 125 corporation has already announced the composition of its board of directors and formulated its objectives. It has assured the government that it will soon announce the theme, certain national projects and the direction of its local programming.

For any information regarding the contracts awarded before March 3, 1991, please contact the Department of the Secretary of State, which is responsible for any matters relating to this subject.

STABILIZING CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSION LEVELS BY THE YEAR 2000

Question No. 90—Mr. Harvey:

Has the government made a committed to stabilizing carbon dioxide emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000 and, if so, (a) have targets and timetables been developed (b) have regulations been developed (c) have resources been allocated to implement this goal and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Pauline A. Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): (a) The government is committed to stabilizing emissions of carbon dioxide at 1990 levels by the year 2000. The proposed National Action Strategy on Global Warming which was released for public consideration by the Canadian Council of Ministers of Environment in November 1990 provides the strategic guidance for all orders of government, business, industry and individual Canadians to take the actions necessary.

(b) No new federal regulations have been developed as yet; Canada's Green Plan indicates the actions the federal government is planning to take to limit net emissions of greenhouse gases.

(c) Under the Green Plan, an additional $575 million over six years has been allocated to achieving global environmental security which includes dealing with the problem of global warming; announcements on resourcing levels for specific Green Plan global warming initiatives are anticipated over the next several months.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-30, an act to amend the Criminal Code (Mental disorder) be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address this important piece of reform legislation.

A little bit of background. This is not the first time in this House that we have taken note of the fact that our Criminal Code in many areas is vastly out of date and, in some cases, our Criminal Code has become crippled by reason of outdated concepts and procedures that have sat on the books over time and not been updated to take account of changes in the modern world and changes in conditions.

An example of that was an amendment last year to the arson provisions. Prior to that amendment, police and people in the private sector, investigators, and the insurance industry were having increasing difficulty convicting and laying charges successfully against arsonists.

One of the reasons for that is that when the current arson provisions were developed many years ago, almost as long ago as Canada itself, I suppose it is fair to say that perhaps the world did not even know exactly what fire was. There were elements of combustion not known to us then, facets of that physical and chemical reaction, consequently, we had in the Criminal Code really what was a layman's reference to setting of fires, and it referred to things like setting fire to standing crops and things like that.

Today we have crops that are in barns, in process, and we have many new ways to start fires, and we have many different types of fires. Consequently, a lot of the bad guys were playing a lot of games. Crown attorneys and police had a lot of difficulty.

Finally, after many years, and I know the initiative began long before I came to this House, that was put to bed and amended. That raises an issue about general criminal law reform and I would like to address that later in my remarks.

In any event, now we have an alteration to the wording governing procedures and definitions of the insanity plea, insanity procedures in criminal trials. I want to point something out here.

We have an alteration to the wording but not so much an alteration to the concept. There were certainly people in Canada who reacted when this bill was first introduced in the House. They reacted out of a fear that the provisions, as being proposed, were less strict and less secure from a public safety point of view than the provisions that existed before.

In my view, in terms of the definitions that is not the case. The proposals to restate what is insanity simply is a restatement in more modern language, more precise language, of what we all meant by insanity many decades ago.

To go back to what I referred to earlier, the concept of insanity in the 1800s was very ill defined. There was a judicial definition proposed, adopted and used over the years, but back in the 1800s we really did not even know all the diseases of the mind that existed. We are still learning but we know infinitely more now than we did then. We are much better able to define, to analyse and to know precisely what disease of the mind is in discussion when insanity pleas are raised.

I want to point out that this issue is not new, this issue of the insanity plea. I want to give credit to the Law Reform Commission of Canada for raising it clearly, crisply and forthrightly as far back as 1976.

It has been a long time since the matter was raised. We have coasted along for 15 years knowing that change had to be made. It has taken us this long, I do not know why, actually to address it and implement it. I am pleased that it is now before Parliament.

What gave rise to this now was not what happened 15 years ago but a Supreme Court of Canada case. It was in fact a Supreme Court of Canada charter case that triggered the justice ministry's initiative now to implement changes.

Let us therefore give some credit to the charter for pulling the trigger. The charter has been a great asset. It has been a bit of a burden but our rights should be regarded as assets to all of us. If it takes a bit of work to uphold them and make them real, viable and effective then that is a price well worth paying in our democracy.

The difficulty with the old insanity provisions and procedures revolved principally around the fact that when someone was found to be insane, the disposition and incarceration that followed a finding of "not guilty by reason of insanity" was indefinite. It was discretionary later on and in fact arbitrary.

If an individual was found "not guilty by reason of insanity", the person was regarded as ill, insane, and was confined to an institution at the pleasure of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province.

That sounds relatively safe for the public but for the individual who is confined once you go in, whether you are sick for a day or mentally sick for a year, you are there forever. It was indefinite confinement. It was based on the discretion, usually well-advised but who knows what advice was given, of Lieutenant-Governors from time to time in all of our provinces, and it was arbitrary.

Somebody, not specifically delegated by a statute of this House with specific criteria and procedures for making a judgment, but an ad hoc body that developed under this whole procedure, would decide whether the individual, male or female, young or old, would be released from these institutions. That was a problem recognized some years ago, as I mentioned and it took a charter case. The charter case might have had some public funding behind it. After looking at the facts of the case I will make that guess. There was a lot of interest in it and it was pursued up to the Supreme Court level. That was the trigger that finally caused the Minister of Justice to do something after 15 years. I will give credit for the doing but not for the delay.

What are the issues of concern to the public here? I think there are two. I have referred to the issue of indefinite confinement. It is simply not right to confine indefinitely a person who steals a candy bar while indefinitely confining a person who has killed. That is wrong. We recognize that.

This bill proposes confinement periods that match as best we can the confinement periods if the person had been convicted of the offence. For example, the theft of a candy bar is what would be called "a theft under". "A theft under" receives the low threshold of punishment. I do not think we confine people any more for a first offence theft of a candy bar.

Under the old law of insanity if a person was insane at the time they stole the candy bar, they could be institutionalized in theory forever or until someone made a decision that they should not be there.

There are three categories of confinement. There is the life sentence for murder category, the danger to public safety category with a maximum confinement period of 10 years,and for all other offences there is a maximum confinement period of two years. Therefore the candy bar thief who is insane—I am using the old term here because we have now proposed a new term—cannot be confined to an institution for more than two years.

The second issue of concern is public safety itself. I do not want to underestimate that. Perhaps I should have mentioned it first. It is not a conceptual issue. It is a real issue. There is real fear on the part of citizens in Canada. It has been communicated to me and it has been communicated to my colleagues in the House. We are very aware of the fear on the streets of Canada that the judicial, correction or criminal justice systems are not serving the needs of public safety. The people at risk are innocent Canadians across the country who may fall victim to an individual who really should not be on the street at the time.

There are a lot of examples. Unfortunately there are too many. One is too many. There are instances of people who were part of the judicial process, the corrections process, or the judicial interim release process who killed innocent Canadians while they were supposed to be a part of that process.

There is the case of Daniel Gingras in Edmonton about four years ago, the Conter case in Toronto, and recently the de Villiers case in Burlington. The last one did not involve a corrections matter, a person who had been convicted of a serious crime, but it did involve a person who was apparently relatively free, doing whatever he wanted, while he was on bail after having been charged with another less serious offence.

The real question related to this bill is public safety. We accept the charter rights of these individuals who have been found to be sick. However, the public spends the money to put in place a criminal justice system, not to play games with the charter, not to have lawyers debate in courtrooms. It is not a make-work program. The justice system is there to protect society. That has to be the first priority.

I am sure most reasonable Canadians would accept the balance involved. When a person is not convicted there is a right to freedom before conviction, but there is also the question of public safety.

There is a grey area. There has to be a balance. I am sure most Canadians will accept that until a person is convicted they are presumed not guilty. In all of that decision making in courts in Canada every day we have to consider public safety.

However, after a conviction the rights of the person who has been convicted have to take second seat to public safety. That is why the system is there. That is why we have a Criminal Code. That is why we have punishment. That is why we have institutions.

Canadians are insisting on that and I want Canadians to know that we on this side of the House are very concerned and sensitive to that. I know there are members on the other side of the House who feel likewise. They want a system in place they regard as fail-safe. They cannot afford mistakes. We cannot afford mistakes. When we create electrical power in a nuclear generating station, we have many systems in place to protect the public and ensure physical safety. That is how we ought to regard dangerous offenders in our criminal justice system. They are more dangerous than a small piece of nuclear fuel and they can do a lot more damage.

We want systems in place that treat Canadians with as much respect and with as much concern for safety and concern as we do radioactive rods in a nuclear reactor. Canadians ask for that and we can give them no less.

In this bill we have created a new label for people we used to call insane. It was proposed that out of concern for this public safety issue we create a category called dangerous mentally disordered persons. That is a label required by the public safety issue we have been addressing. We must find a way to label and categorize some of these ill people as dangerous mentally disordered persons. That is what the new bill will do.

At present in Canada there are approximately 1,100 persons being held under the warrants issued by courts when they were found not guilty by reason of insanity. That is a fairly large number. One issue that concerns me is what protections are there in place for the public in dealing with these 1,100 cases as we move from the old system to the new. It is an issue I am not able to discuss in depth here in the House because it has not been dealt with at committee.

We on this side of the House will support this bill at second reading so that it can go to committee and these matters can be addressed. We need a detailed discussion, commitment, and procedures to ensure that as we go through a transition period the people held on warrants are treated with respect, are accorded the rights due to each of them under the charter, and that there are no undue risks associated with their release. I might say that in theory each of those individuals might have the right now to go to a court and demand that they be released, that is on the assumption that they could find someone who would advocate for them. I do not know whether it is possible for someone who is ill and declared to be ill, in that state, actually to go individually to a court. Certainly they have next friends and legal representatives who could do that for them. We have to make sure this transition is properly handled.

I want to point out that the public safety risk issue is very much before the House now. It is certainly before the justice committee. I take note that it is the intention of the government to refer this bill, after second reading, not to a legislative committee but to the justice committee.

Although I have sat on the justice committee and continue to, there is an awful lot of work there that I think is an appropriate disposition. The justice committee for approximately five or six years has been following this issue very closely. It is probably true that most of the individuals on the justice committee now are well equipped. They have been brought up to speed to deal with this issue.

It is not just this Parliament. I take note that there was a report of the justice committee tabled in this House in 1987 or the early part of 1988 called "Taking Responsibility". It was a very comprehensive, detailed investigation and report on the matters involving Corrections Canada and criminal convictions.

The government was unable to reply to that report because we went into a general election in that year. After the election the new justice committee on which I sat cared so much about that report that we re-adopted it, and that is a very rare occurrence. Those who discuss the details and fine tuning aspects of parliamentary law might question whether or not that was appropriate, but the current committee felt so strongly about the need of the government to respond that it was re-submitted and tabled in this Parliament. We are still waiting for a reply.

However, I am told and I understand that the government is, albeit very late in the day, coming through with responses to those things. Just yesterday the government replied to the justice committee's hearings on the three-year review of the gating provisions of the Criminal Code and Corrections. This also involves the Parole Act. These are the provisions that enable the corrections system to prevent the parole of an individual who would otherwise be entitled under the existing law to that mandatory supervision portion of his or her sentence. I am pleased to note that the government had accepted virtually all the material provisions of that justice committee report.

Let me wrap up by chastising the government for foot dragging. We have 15-year delays, 10-year delays, 5-year delays. We hope to revisit as well the bail provisions of the Criminal Code at an appropriate point in time. I intend, in my area of activity, to make very sure that the public safety and risk issues are dealt with properly in this bill and in other legislation hopefully to come before the House.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on this debate this afternoon because I feel, as I am sure everybody in this House does, that this is one of the most fundamental problems of our present day society. A society that cannot live without a state of fear is not a free society.

It has been discussed here before today that this bill is the response by the government through the Minister of Justice to the striking down by the Supreme Court of Canada of Criminal Code sections that dealt with mental disorder.

It is certainly unusual for the Supreme Court to have made the decision or to have given the Government of Canada six months to bring in a new law or risk judges releasing all those persons found not guilty by reason of insanity. As one person noted, this could include those who may well be a danger to the public. That is the crucial point of this entire bill.

The part of the Criminal Code that was struck down should be put on the record here so that the purpose of it is fully understood. That is section 614(2) of the Criminal Code which reads: "Where the accused is found to have been insane at the time the offence was committed, the court shall order that he be kept in strict custody until the pleasure of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province is known". In particular, with this section the Supreme Court of Canada decided that Lieutenant-Governor's warrants were unconstitutional.

There are a number of other reasons dealing with this, but I will go to the final one: "The decision indicates that the old law failed to distinguish between those who are still dangerous to society and require hospital treatment and those who could be safely released to the community".

In other words, they are all being put in the same category. The challenge that this legislation brings in is to separate those who are in fact very dangerous and require hospital treatment from those who could safely be allowed to be in the public domain.

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that mentally disordered persons are not deprived of their charter rights by being confined for a mental disorder without a fair hearing and a regular review of their case. In other words, once persons are sentenced they cannot be expected to be there for life if indeed their health improves.

The second point was to create a wholly new category of dangerously mentally disordered persons and to protect the public from those who come in conflict with the law.

With regard to the new charter of rights amendments, the first point was to give the provincial review boards some teeth. The boards will make case-by-case decisions on care and detention provisions. Another very important one would be to replace indeterminate custody with maximum detention periods that are applicable: for example, murder, for life; danger to public security or the security of the state, 10 years; and all other offences, 2 years.

There are some concerns here. Whenever we pass a new law, we are all fully aware that if we do not have the facilities in place so that that new law can be practised effectively then the legislation is in danger of not succeeding with the intent that it brought in, in the first place.

For example, there was testimony before the justice committee on Bill C–67 respecting the detention and parole provisions. Review consistently indicated the lack of facilities and treatment for inmates with sexual or psychiatric problems. There is a lack of facilities and there is a lack of staff. The intent of the bill may be laudable but there is a gap between intent and reality with relation to this particular bill that we are studying today.

The government has consistently attacked our social programs and has been throwing the burden to already overstressed provincial systems. Will this bill add to the burden? That is the question.

Then there is the area of public security. The general intent of the bill is to release as many persons as possible to community based programs and services. However, if the preventive and security measures in the bill fail, the ramifications of failure can be death. Then we must have the facilities in place to handle these people effectively and fairly so that the justice system itself will not fail. The Young Offenders Act will be amended to reflect the special needs of youth in placement and disposition.

This is a very important piece of legislation that we are dealing with here today with regard to public safety. I just want to say in general terms about this bill and the circumstances surrounding it, that we are very familiar with the fact that drugs in Canada have been one of the root causes of many people's mental disorders. We must support the law enforcement agencies of this country, whether it is within our own community, or whether it is in the nation as a whole. Our law enforcement agencies have got to receive public support in this country if we are going to expect them to do a job.

In today's society where we have so many criminal activities going on, where we have major operators in the drug business, where we have them utilizing students in high schools and yes, elementary schools as peddlers, and where we have people roaming the streets who pretend to be the epitome of honesty and integrity and some of them end up to be drug peddlers, there is nothing more important to a free society than to have a legal administration in place to support a law enforcement agency and agencies, to bring about law and order within our country.

Indeed, this bill, if we want to carry the ramifications further, goes right through to the international drug trade because that is where it all begins, the smuggling of drugs and getting them into the system.

The public of Canada should be outraged at some of the things that are going on and should come forward to support the law enforcement agencies in their communities. They should find out what they can do to help.

We have block parent communities where we support people when they are in trouble or in danger. We have got to extend that to a more effective way of helping police authorities in this country with any information that we find out about who is peddling drugs or working with drug peddlers in the community. That is very important.

When we are doing that, we are not tattling. We could be saving several people's minds from the effects of drugs which will give them a mental disorder for the rest of their lives. As far as I am concerned, no punishment is great enough for those people who want to perpetrate that on any citizens in a free society.

We can only have freedom, as I said before, and it can only be enjoyed by everyone if everyone respects the other person's right to live in a free society with the absence of fear. The same thing pertains to this very finite decision, very precise decision that this bill requires of medical knowledge and that is, which criminals get off because of insanity or which people are charged and get off because of insanity belong in a hospital and which ones are free to go out on the streets. It places a big load on medical judgment and it is one that is going to have to be handled very precisely.

So, Madam Speaker, while we congratulate the government for bringing in this bill, the subject matter requires that this Parliament deal with it quickly and effectively and that the concerns in it be discussed in committee stage. However, it is important to get this bill in place. Indeed, we should not end there, but it will undoubtedly be looked upon as an experimental bill and there may well have to be amendments to it in the not too distant future. If that is the case, that is what Parliament is here for but it is urgent we move forward at this time.

Madam Speaker, I want to thank you and the House for giving me the time to express some views because I think there are far more ramifications out there than just this bill itself. We have got to look at the causes that create these things in our society.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a brief comment on what the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke said. He said, and very accurately, that many of our mental disorders are caused by substance abuse. That reminded me of a recent call I received from a constituent, a father in his 60s. He is looking after his son who is in his 40s. His son was caught for drug peddling 10 years ago. He got a very lengthy sentence, served his sentence and the father admits his son did wrong, his son paid for it, but the tragedy of the incident is that the son is now at home. In the almost 10 years that he was in prison they did not teach him or assist him with any skill. So here is a person with very severe brain damage who cannot go and work. His father is very worried because he is in his 60s. He says: "I am not going to be here too long, who is going to look after my son who is in his 40s and is not trained for any kind of employment?"

So in all of our debates, I hope we will remember the importance of rehabilitation. We cannot stress that strongly enough.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, very briefly, I simply want to say that I am pleased the government has finally moved on this matter.

The government issued a white paper for discussion purposes on this subject some years ago. Because nothing was being done and the subject was clearly one that was important, I introduced a bill in this House, Bill C–295, on April 11, 1990 in the second session of this Parliament. Unfortunately the bill, being a private member's bill, never proceeded because I never won a draw until last week and that was on a motion, not on a bill.

I reintroduced the bill on June 10 of this year in an effort to spur the government to action, the same bill, Bill C–228, which is standing on the Order Paper. I just want to indicate that when this bill is adopted by the House, as I assume it will be, amendment or otherwise, I will withdraw the bill that I have on the Order Paper.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I just rise to make a few comments. I understand that the minister is quite anxious to get this bill through the House.

As my colleague indicated on behalf of our caucus, we are supporting this bill in order to get it into a committee, but I have a few comments to make on it.

I think the minister as well as the government should look at the aspect of prevention as a very important component of any legislation that is introduced at the federal level, especially in light of the fact that we have a constitutional discussion where the provinces are finding themselves more and more taking on responsibilities that the federal government in the past was responsible for.

There is the whole question of the mentally disabled or the otherwise able person who gets into trouble. Madam Speaker, if you would just give me a second to tell you something about a gentleman in my area of Ottawa Centre who made a comment about the homeless last year, the people he received as clients. When he was asked, he said he gets a whole range of people caught in the cycle of poverty. They have addictions, drug or alcohol, they are unemployed, they have learning disabilities, they have been victims of spousal abuse. Many have psychotic illnesses.

These are some of the people who go to shelters in my area of Ottawa Centre. These are people who go to shelters all across Canada. In fact, there are in excess of 200,000 people in our country who are considered to be homeless. Many of those people fit within the definition of this gentleman who defined the people as his clients.

Many of those people go to the shelter for one or two nights and then eventually they move on to another shelter. In any event, one finds them sleeping on the streets, in shopping centres, in garages, abandoned cars. In many cases the weather could be as cold as minus 40 degrees.

Some of those people get so desperate that they get in trouble. Many of those people, especially the mentally disabled, who end up in those shelters are coming from an institution that probably had looked after them for a given period of time and eventually they found themselves on the street.

I want to give one example. In the Ottawa area, we have the Royal Ottawa Hospital where patients are admitted to the hospital for a short period of time so a physician might assess them, and they would have options. Either they would be sent to a regular hospital and/or they would be sent to a hospital nearby, in this particular case in our area to the Brockville Psychiatric Hospital.

Those patients might stay in the Brockville hospital for a month or two, serve their term, and eventually they are sent back home. Between the Royal Ottawa Hospital and the Brockville Psychiatric Hospital there is absolutely no mechanism to support those people. Therefore, when they are out on the street, there is no mobile system that works with the shelters in my area in order to provide them with the kind of assistance they might need, the kind of counselling they might need.

Many of those people get in trouble. Many of those people, I might add, if there had been a support service in place, would have felt better off. I think it is extremely important for the federal government to work with the provincial governments in order to set up some sort of support system that works with hospitals that provide care on a short-term basis or on a long-term basis, such as the Brockville Psychiatric Hospital. Also, the government should work with agencies such as shelters in order to deal with this incredible problem.

There is no doubt in my mind that in the long run, prevention is what is needed, providing shelter for those people and providing them with the kind of support services they might need.

I think the minister of health should get a copy of the transcript and try to approach the provincial governments to find out what can be done in this area of prevention. I am sure she will find that it is a major problem. In fact, it is one of the biggest problems we are faced with in urban centres. While there are no specific statistics on the number of homeless who might have those mental or other problems, I think this is an urgent matter for the minister to consider in her consultation. I would suggest that in the long run the whole of society will benefit from that.

In closing, I want to congratulate both my colleague, the member for Moncton, and the Minister of Justice on working collectively in order to make sure this bill is law.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

FOREIGN MISSIONS AND INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS ACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-27, an act respecting the privileges and immunities of foreign missions and international organizations be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill combines and abates two existing acts dealing with privileges and immunities, the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act and the Privileges and Immunities International Organizations Act. It will also assist the Canadian Government in its efforts to obtain favourable treatment for the overseas offices of Canada's provinces by permitting, for the first time, the granting of limited privileges and immunities to offices of sub-units of foreign states which, on a reciprocal basis, grant the same treatment to offices of Canadian provinces.

International law requires Canada to grant privileges and immunities—certain exemptions from Canadian law—to embassies and consulates of foreign countries and to their diplomatic and consular officials. That is the purpose of the first part of the bill. The inviolability of diplomatic representatives is an important foundation of international law and one of its oldest principles.

The special legal status that we must grant to diplomats under international law is not there for their personal convenience. It was developed over the centuries to ensure that a country's representatives abroad can discharge their duties effectively and independently from the tremendous influence that a modern state can exert on an individual.

Whether they are participating in sensitive international negotiations or are busy urgently evacuating Canadians in a war-ravaged region, Canada's representatives abroad need the protection given them by their special status to be able to continue to serve Canada's interests abroad. Public international law demands that the same special status be granted to representatives of other states in Canada. The special legal status of diplomatic and consular missions is set forth in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. Like most nations, Canada is a party to these conventions.

At present, the articles of these international conventions that relate directly to the legal status of foreign missions and their personnel are given the force of law in Canada by the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act. The new act would continue to give force of law to these articles. It would also provide for more flexibility in the treatment of foreign embassies and consulates.

Within the framework provided by the two Vienna conventions, the treatment of foreign diplomatic and consular missions is governed by the principle of reciprocity. This is perhaps a rather un-Christian principle: "Do as you are done by." But it is the mechanism that ensures that the obligations undertaken in the Vienna conventions are fulfilled.

If a country treats Canada's representatives unfavourably, Canada will treat that country's representatives here in a similar manner. If Canada's representatives are treated favourably, we will then reply in kind. The new act would increase Canada's flexibility in ensuring that reciprocity of treatment is applied to foreign diplomats in Canada.

International law also grants a special status to international organizations. Membership in the UN, the OECD, and other organizations of states, carries with it the obligation to grant those organizations and their officers certain privileges and immunities. Without legislation permitting the grant of such privileges and immunities, Canada could not be a member of those organizations. Nor could we act as host for such organizations as the International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal or the Commonwealth of Learning in Vancouver.

At present, such organizations are granted privileges and immunities by Order in Council under the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act. The level of treatment which Canada can grant international organizations has not changed since the predecessor to that act, the Privileges and Immunities (United Nations) Act, was passed in 1947. But international standards of treatment for such organizations have changed significantly, and the restrictions of the existing legislation have created difficulties for Canada's relations with international organizations, including the largest international organization with headquarters in Canada.

[Translation]

The International Civil Aviation Organization has its headquarters in Montreal. It is one of the great specialized institutions created by the members of the United Nations at the end of the Second World War. ICAO seeks to ensure the development and smooth operation of the world's civil aviation system. Its technical mission may explain why it is not as well known to Canadians as other specialized UN agencies like UNESCO or the World Health Organization. That Canadians consider ICAO a simple fact of life, although an extraordinarily complex enterprise like international air transportation demands the coordination of thousands of technical standards, training requirements and security measures, is perhaps a measure of its great success. We should never forget the unique importance of civil aviation in such a vast country as Canada. ICAO's being located in Canada is perhaps a reflection of this importance.

For years, ICAO and its member states have maintained that the headquarters agreement concluded with Canada was outdated and unsuited to the new requirements of the Organization. In 1951, for example, when Lester Pearson signed the existing headquarters agreement with ICAO, it was expected that the representatives of the Organization's member states would be in Canada only for short periods every year. The Organization's practices have evolved over the years and today, there are 33 permanent missions to ICAO based in Montreal.

In response to these concerns, Canada negotiated a new headquarters agreement with ICAO last year, but it cannot come into force yet. I am pleased to say that this new bill will make it possible to implement the new headquarters agreement with ICAO, thus eliminating the problems that have complicated our very special relations with that organization.

[English]

However, the area of our interest is broader than just ICAO. Canada is committed to a multilateral approach in dealing with international issues and we pursue this objective through such international organizations as the UN, CSCE, the OAS and others.

One way in which we can enhance our role in such organizations is by encouraging them to establish offices, or preferably headquarters, in Canada. With modernized legislation Canada can pursue more vigorously its policy of working to attract the offices of international organizations in Canada.

Apart from the foreign policy reasons for such efforts there are significant economic benefits from such offices. The hundreds of jobs and tens of millions of dollars that ICAO brings to Montreal is the most obvious example.

On a much smaller scale the Commonwealth of Learning in Vancouver and the North Atlantic Fisheries Commission in Halifax also provide a welcome contribution to the local economy. Other countries have interests in such organizations similar to those of Canada and compete vigorously to attract them.

This new legislation will ensure that Canada can compete on an equal basis with other states in these efforts. While the first two parts of the act update existing legislation Part III is completely new.

This part would allow Canada to grant limited privileges and immunities equivalent to those granted to consulates to the offices of a sub-unit of a foreign state, such as a German land or an American state.

A number of Canadian provinces maintain offices abroad. This is a practice that is almost as old as Confederation. As a rule there is a close and co-operative working relationship between Canada's diplomatic missions and these provincial offices. Canada makes every effort to assist them in furthering provincial interests.

When local conditions so require, provincial representatives have even been given the status of Canadian diplomats to ensure they can fulfil the provincial function effectively.

It has also been an established practice for many years that when requested to do so by the provinces, Canada requests foreign states to grant privileges and immunities to provincial officers in those states.

A number of countries have agreed to grant such status to Canadian provincial offices. We have always been conscious when seeking such treatment on behalf of the provinces that we had no legal basis to reciprocate.

With this act the government will be able to grant in Canada the status it seeks for Canadian provincial offices abroad. I should note that the bill limits the privileges and immunities that can be granted to such offices to that which is granted to a consular mission.

It is important to understand that this is a limited level of privilege and immunity compared to that of a diplomat. The representative of a sub-unit, such as a consul, would have immunities from Canadian law only in respect to acts performed in the exercise of official functions. It would be up to Canadian courts to decide what is or is not an exercise of official functions.

I am pleased that this legislation will permit the grant of limited privileges and immunities to an office which the government of Hong Kong intends to establish in Canada.

Hong Kong, a British dependency, already grants a similar status to the provincial offices established in Hong Kong.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it may seem that this bill deals with an esoteric subject, but its passage will make Canada better able to pursue an active foreign policy, to play a role in international organizations and to help provinces pursue legitimate interests abroad.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, if I have the agreement of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party, I would move:

> That, instead of the bill being referred to the Legislative Committee E, the bill be referred to committee of the whole and considered at all stages this afternoon.

• (1320)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hopkins): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware you were looking for a new role in this Chamber but the chair suits you.

I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-27, an act dealing with privileges and immunities of foreign missions and international organizations. The bill repeals two existing statutes, namely the Diplomatic and Councillor Privileges and Immunities Act and the Privileges and Immunities International Organizations Act.

I agree with the Minister of Labour that Bill C-27 permits for the first time certain privileges, immunities and benefits to be granted to political subdivisions of foreign states.

Article 2(1) defines a political subdivision as a province, state, territory, dependency, or any other similar subdivision of a state. It will also provide for extended privileges and immunities to international organizations.

The minister will be happy to learn that my party urges quick passage of this bill for it brings about, at long last, a series of legislative changes that will make Canada a better place for foreign missions and international organizations.

If Canada's diplomatic missions and those of its provinces have generally been well received abroad, it is in large part due to the extensive privileges and immunities the missions of other countries have been granted in Canada, and we take pride in that. However, Canada's remarkable reputation can only be enhanced by the provisions included in this bill, long sought by various foreign parties such as the International Civil Aviation Organization and the Government of Hong Kong.

Allow me to dwell on a few of them in the next few minutes and suggest ways in which they can be implemented. First, on behalf of my party I applaud the additions of new measures that deal with the duty of the receiving state to ensure maximum protection of the councillor posts. Canada has had its share of tragic incidents in this respect, such as the attack on the Turkish Embassy a few years ago. This time of revolutionary change abroad no doubt can and has been accompanied by massive, sometimes violent manifestations at home.

There is a need to offer all necessary protection to foreign missions established in Canada. As an example, the consular offices of Poland are situated in Etobicoke—Lakeshore next to my riding. During the early 1980s, when martial law was imposed on Poland, there were enormous demonstrations and attacks on the Polish consular offices in Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I must compliment the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force on their protection of the property of that consular office and their protection of the people working in that consular office. What a pleasure it is now to see people going in and out of that consular office with no demonstrations. The same people who were demonstrating are now using the services of that consular general office.

That being said I want to stress that the legislative authority extended to the Canadian government and its police officers in this bill to protect the premises of foreign missions should be exercised with caution and according to the terms of our charter of rights.

I also welcome the entrenchment of statutory authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as a result of increased powers to promote reciprocal treatment and to implement mutually beneficial arrangements.

While our missions have generally been treated well abroad this provision, if used appropriately, may provide the necessary negotiating tool to increase the privileges and immunities now accorded to Canada's diplomatic missions.

Third, I support the provision that provides for additional privileges and immunities to international organizations such as ICAO located in Montreal and the ones we have already mentioned. It is only fitting that their senior representatives and members of their families be treated like diplomats, a practice that has long been established in most countries over the world.

Perhaps, had this bill been introduced at an early time, an international organization such as the International Maritime Satellite Organization, IMARSAT of Great Britain, an important international organization with 500 employees, might have moved to Canada. The Minister of Labour already mentioned other organizations which could benefit from this bill, organizations such as the Commonwealth of Learning in Vancouver and the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization.

I hope the government will want to use the new measures in a pro-active way by enticing large international organizations to locate their headquarters in Canada.

Fourth, and most important, I welcome the new provision that will permit certain privileges, immunities and benefits to be granted to political subdivisions of foreign states, such as provinces, states, territories and republics, a word I am throwing in purposely.

Part III of the bill introduces legislation that is new to Canada. Presently our government cannot offer reciprocal treatment to offices of a state's political subdivision in Canada because the Secretary of State for External Affairs has no statutory authority to do so.

Political subdivisions in which offices of Canadian provinces could be granted a consular type of status have little incentive to establish consular offices in our country without the possibility of being offered reciprocal status here. I am informed that Hong Kong, a British dependency, has granted special status to provincial offices in its territory. It has been authorized to open a commercial office in Toronto but refused to do so until Bill C-27 is in force, since a Hong Kong office could only then be accorded reciprocal privileges, immunities and benefits.

The word "benefits" is used throughout this bill. The government could improve or fine tune the bill by defining "benefits". Reciprocal benefits could be anything under the sun. We are creating unnecessary future difficulties by omitting the definition of benefits. Perhaps we could discuss this when we move to Committee of the Whole.

The granting of reciprocal privileges, immunities and benefits to political subdivisions of foreign states is a change which the Liberal Party fully supports and which meets Canadian interests. It is not enough simply to declare that Canada will give better treatment to the foreign missions of substates. These changes will only bring the increased co-operation and open the necessary opportunities if it is used for that purpose by the Canadian government.

To a large extent the relevance of these changes will depend on the Canadian government's recognition that it has failed to seize many opportunities and that it requires an urgent and comprehensive review of its foreign policy. It makes little sense, for instance, to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the minister of industry touring the Soviet Union if these contacts are not based on development of a solid framework on which to develop our relationships.

I want to ask the minister: Is he going to implement this provision with respect to Ukraine? As we all know the representatives of Ukraine, with whom our critic, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and I have met on numerous occasions, have developed long grievances over the inaction of this government on its request for the opening of a new office in Ottawa. This is not to mention the abysmal delay in the opening of our own consulate in Ukraine. Now that it is open, let us not delay in opening a reciprocal office in Canada.

Article IV of the Vienna convention on consular relations outlines how a consular post gets officially recognized. Bill C-27 is silent on the procedure of how an office of a political subdivision would become recognized. Can the minister explain why the bill is silent on this since it is a severe offence under the bill to misrepresent any premises as an office of a political subdivision of a foreign state? The process for having such offices recognized must be clarified in the bill.

• (1330)

While I am on the subject of clarification, can the Minister of Labour, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, clear up the ambiguity of the use of the word "state" in Part III of the bill? In the interpretation section of the bill first use of "state", for an example, that could be a state of New York in the U.S.A., and the second use it would mean a federal type state.

Let me just enlarge upon that and read the exact definition because I feel this is very important when we get to the committee of the whole.

Article II reads, under the interpretation clause:

"political subdivision" means any province, state, territory, dependency or any other similar subdivision of a state.

The first use of the "state" is a different meaning than the second use of "state." The second use of "state" could be a county of New York. The first "state" could be, yes, New York state, and then the second part could be part of New York state. So I think we need that clarified and fine tuned.

The French does not appear to have that problem because—

"subdivision politique" Province, État ou dépendance d'un État ou toute autre entité similaire de celui-ci.

[English]

In the French translation they use the word celui-ci, and in the English they use "state." I think that is where the confusion lies.

My colleague from Quebec compliments me on my French. I am learning. I am getting there.

The world is changing very quickly. New independent nations are springing up around us. Many dependent republics of today will be independent nations tomorrow, yet Canada lacks resources in our embassy in Moscow, has paid foreign mission tokenism in the Baltics, lacks presence in Latin America, and is dragging its feet in eastern Europe.

Our critic, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, was in Moscow recently for the CSCE conference where he met with representatives from around the world. He tells me that other countries are not responding to recent changes in an ad hoc reactive fashion, but are seeing incredible opportunities in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe, and are seizing them. We are not.

While their interest in various parts of the world remains strong, the means by which we pursue those interests are too limited, and too fragmented. For this bill to bear fruit, it must be utilized to reflect the changing realities emerging in Europe and the Soviet Union, to reflect the importance of developing special relationships with new, yet to be born, nations of the world and to enhance the particular advantages of Canada.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I noted that this is your first occasion in the chair since I have been here, and this is my first occasion to carry a bill, so between the two of us things might go wrong this afternoon.

I must start by admitting that this bill is not exactly a hot topic of conversation in Oshawa. We are a little involved with the Eric Lindros controversy, and we know a lot about the NHL draft, but we are not really as hep about various Geneva conventions as we might be.

I was interested, as I went through the research on the bill, to find some touch points. Sometimes in this world it is strange that things which appear on the surface not to have any impact on you or your life really do affect you.

As I went through the briefing notes on the bill and the research that has been prepared for us on it, it become quite clear why everybody should be in support of this legislation. As one goes through the different parts of the bill one can see some concerns that I would think would be legitimate about the status of people who work in offices such as this and the privileges that are accorded to them. As one gets deeper into it, one is reminded that this is kind of the way that the world has worked out its agreements on this matter. This is not a matter that Canada can change unilaterally on its own. There are ways and means to do that. This bill proposes to put in place some means of regulating what happens when someone else representing an agency comes to Canadian soil and wants to set up and do whatever it is it does.

To that extent, I think all of us in the Chamber should understand that this is becoming increasingly important in our daily lives. Many of us, I am sure, would think that this is part of the diplomatic corps and does not have much to do with the life and times of people in our ridings. However, more and more people are concerned about what happens in different parts of the world. More and more of our industrial sectors are now starting to contemplate what they could do in a country that is trying to rebuild, that is trying to put in place a different kind of an economy.

It occurred to me that several local business people have come to me and talked about doing business in nations in which two years ago it would have been unthinkable for them to do so. But now there are opportunities there. Although there are the regular diplomatic channels which they could pursue, these are people who do not normally move in those circles. Therefore, it would be of assistance to them to have a labour organization there, a commercial organization there, someone that they know from the province of Ontario, for example, to be able to go and work on an exchange program.

There are interesting concepts that are being discussed currently, ways in which investors can go to several European countries where a year ago it was forbidden. They were communist bloc nations and it was not really possible to do much in the way of business transactions there. Now they are very open to such transactions and they need some offices such as the ones that would be covered under this bill to facilitate that exchange. This might involve the province of Ontario establishing an office that could assist in the Ukraine, for example. It might involve someone from one of those states or provinces establishing an office in Canada where they could readily get information.

All members, if they reflect on it for a while, will understand that this is becoming increasingly important as the world becomes more of a mobile place where ordinary citizens can and do move around a great deal and where there is a need for information on what is happening somewhere else in the world or in your own community and that information is needed in a hurry. Anything that facilitates or regulates that or essentially makes it something that is recognized and dealt with by Canadian law—there is an established pro forma way to go about it so that it can happen—is a good thing. That is essentially what this bill does.

I noticed as I went through some of the briefing notes enclosed with the bill that there are some interesting technical aspects of what role is expected of a police officer in providing security, for example, at one of these offices. It is something, I think, many members would have been involved with at different levels of government. Often the reason one cannot do what is so apparently necessary is that there is no legal provision to do so. If that sounds kind of stupid, that is because sometimes that is the way the law works. If there is not a specific law which outlines how an office is set up and recognized in Canadian law what everybody's legal obligations are, then it is questioned from time to time as to whether one can provide what would be seen as very normal and natural security provisions to an office of this kind.

On the surface the bill looks like something which would not affect anybody who might live in the riding of Oshawa, but as the member I think I could give a pretty good case that it will. On the surface it looks as if this is something that has to do with conventions struck in Vienna some time ago. I am aware that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and several other of our provinces have agonized for many years now over just how they go about setting up an office in Washington, London, or in several other parts of the world; how to get trade and consular offices put in place; and how the various organizational groups that are playing a supportive role get established, identified and recognized under law.

Essentially what this bill does and what I find eminently supportable about the bill is that it provides a piece of framework legislation for Canada, and that makes sense. It acknowledges that such organizations exist, and that makes sense. It limits and restricts somewhat, for some of them, the kinds of provisions that would provide them with immunity. That has to do with whether they pay taxes or not, whether or not they can carry back and forth confidential information. All of these I know to be areas where there has been some confusion before, where there have been occasions where it is the absence of a law which prevents something very sensible from happening.

On those grounds, we find the proposal in Bill C-27 to be eminently supportable. We may have a question or two as we go through the committee stage, and I hope the minister will indulge us if we simply do not understand the language which has been used. He will have the advantage of staff and briefing notes, which we do not have to provide us with clarification.

So, with those small provisos, Mr. Speaker, you and I have made it through our first occasion this afternoon.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee, Mr. Hopkins in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-27, an Act respecting the privileges and immunities of foreign missions and international organizations.

Shall Clause 2 carry?

On Clause 2—Definitions

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I need your advice that this is the order to make recommendations, suggestions, et cetera. As I mentioned in my debate, I think we could improve upon the bill.

First, we said something about benefits. I wonder if the minister could explain why benefits are not included. Under the conventions and in the schedules attached to the bill, there is talk about privileges, et cetera, but benefits is a new introduction. It is probably a good introduction, but I think we need some clarification on that.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, my colleague from Parkdale—High Park wishes to improve the bill and therefore wants to know what is meant by the word "benefit".

What we mean by benefits is giving access to certain rights which we have as Canadian citizens under our legislation to the people who would come here. For instance, the right of access to property if it were denied by someone or if, for instance, our access to property in a foreign country was made exorbitant or impractical by that one, that would give us the authority. In a sense I cannot call them negative benefits, but they are benefits which they should get and the federal government would be in a position to grant the benefits that you and I have to people coming over here.

It is there as a protective measure for the federal government, not that at this time we have no plans to use that section, for example access to universities or access to schools by these people. is a general clause that would allow the government to do things in case they are needed.

Mr. Flis: I thank the minister for that explanation. Under the Vienna convention they use the wording of facilities, privileges and immunities. I thought those kinds of benefits might be covered here. If they are not, I can appreciate maybe why the wording has been changed. I like creative thinking. I like our country being the first to bring in some changes.

The second item I would like to bring to the minister's attention is again what I mentioned in the debate, the use of the word "state". Article 2(1) reads:

> Political subdivision means any province, state, territory, dependency or any other similar subdivision of a state.

If we look at the United States of America, we can say that political subdivision means any state such as Florida, and then a similar subdivision of that state would be a smaller unit of Florida, whether it is a regional government or a county. It could be very dangerous if we do not amend this.

Mr. Danis: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park is quite right, I believe, to raise the issue.

The word that we use in this legislation is the word "state". What we mean is the same meaning that is in the state immunity act. It is the word that is used internationally.

I know it creates a technical problem, but the French version is a lot clearer. Obviously, for instance, if we are talking about the Americans we are referring to New York State and not Clinton County, which would then ask us for a reciprocal arrangement under this legislation.

• (1350)

The member was quite correct. When we talk about states it would be a state but the French word, just because of the word itself not because of the legislation, is clearer. But the hon. member did not raise that in his speech at second reading.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I can accept the minister's explanation that political subdivision means any state, to use the example of New York State. However the same phrase goes on: "or any other similar subdivision of a state". Now we are looking at a subdivision of New York State. Could you tell me what that subdivision would be?

Mr. Danis: We do not mean to refer to a subdivision of New York State. When we refer to states, if we are talking about Americans we refer to states. If we are talking about Germany, we refer to landers. If we are talking about Switzerland, we refer to cantons. It is not our intent whatsoever to include parts of states when we refer to states.

Mr. Flis: I almost feel that this bill should go to a legislative committee just to iron out things like this. I can substitute the word lander in Germany, which is what Germans use, and it would read that the political subdivision means any lander or any other similar subdivision of a lander. Does this mean that we would have reciprocal immunities, privileges and benefits for smaller units of a state such as a subdivision of a lander?

Mr. Danis: I realize that the language of the State Immunity Act might not seem clear. However, I read 2(1) in English and 2(1) in French, and in French it is quite clear. It is quite clear subdivision politique, province, État ou dépendance d'un État ou toute autre entité similaire de celui-ci.

It is not our intention under this legislation to provide for reciprocity with, as an example, part of an American state. When we read both sections it is quite clear. I think the confusion may be a result of the use of the word "state". There is the same problem when using the word "nation" in French, which creates problems for people who talk about the Constitution.

Mr. Flis: We are anxious that this bill be passed as quickly as possible. However, I leave it to the government to look at it again and make it clear through its notes of explanation or whatever. This would not stand up in a court of law, and I leave that to my lawyer friends in the House.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton South East): Madam Speaker, I have two questions that were raised by a member of diplomatic personnel here in Ottawa.

First, about the GST. It seems this government requires the tax to be paid, and there is a refund after several months, I don't know how many. I therefore wish to ask the minister whether this bill will affect that particular issue?

At the same time, perhaps he could answer another question. The same diplomat told me recently that the present government in Canada asks diplomats when they arrive in Canada whether they can specify how long they intend to stay in this country.

Could the minister inform the House whether this bill in any way affects the two issues I have just raised?

[English]

Mr. Danis: This bill does not affect the GST whatsoever. Our policy is that it is done in a reciprocal way.

When countries do not charge a similar tax in their country, we do not charge the people who are here. It is done in a reciprocal way. It does not apply to every one of them.

As for his second question, which was do we ask them how long they will be here when they come here, generally when diplomats or consular officials come here we are told the period for which they are coming. It is done in a flexible way and very often the governments will renew their length of stay in the country.

However, we do have a policy which would prevent people from coming here and staying for the rest of their lives, for very long periods of time. Generally people are here for approximately three years. Obviously we have to be flexible on the issue but we still have that policy.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Chairman, the diplomat in issue indicated that as far as he knows Canada is the only country that demands to know in advance how long diplomat x or y will be staying in Canada.

He said that it was contrary to both the Vienna convention which deals with that matter and the practices of all other industrial democracies. Maybe the minister has a further comment on that.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, I have just stated the policy. If there is a specific case, such as the case that my hon. friend has mentioned, I would certainly be willing to look into it and discuss it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Chairman, will the minister tell us if the bill deals with the question of the Russian federation, Ukraine or other members of the former Soviet Union. If for example we receive an application tomorrow from the Russian federation or Ukraine, as we might well, to send an ambassador or a representative to Canada, would this bill affect that in some way?

• (1400)

Mr. Danis: In answer to the question from my colleague, there would be two options that would be available to the Government of Canada. One, if Ukraine was recognized—I prefer not to use the word "state", I prefer the word "country"—as a separate country, then of course it would ask for diplomatic recognition here and diplomatic relations would be set up by the government. This act here would not affect that at all.

What this act would affect would be that if Ukraine became, if I could use the word under the legislation, a sub-unit of the Soviet Union, and then Ukraine would allow provincial representatives from Ontario, for example, or Alberta to Ukraine, then that act would allow us to recognize Ukraine under this act and then we would establish diplomatic relations with it.

Mr. Kilgour: Yes, but looking at the interpretation section, Madam Chairman, of political subdivision, would the minister tell the House if by political subdivision, as written, it means that Ukraine or the Russian Federation or the Baltics are for purposes of this act considered now, if passed today, to be political subdivisions of the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, the Baltic States are not a subdivision. They are not recognized as a subdivision. With regard to Ukraine, the decision then would be, depending on the referendum and a decision of the people, a decision by the government with regard to diplomatic recognition then, depending on the referendum. The answer is not with regard to the Baltic States. They have been recognized by the government already.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Chairman, I have three questions to ask. I think I will put them on this clause because they will fit.

One question is the matter of attaching the various conventions that you have put in this part of the bill. I would like to hear the minister's comments on whether at some point in time there are going to be disputes between those things which are printed as part of the bill, that is to say drafted as the normal law that we would see, and those things that are interpreted out of the various conventions that are attached to the bill. Could we have some kind of clarification as to which will win the day? Does the convention, which is kind of an international agreement on how to do things, supersede any opinion that you might have in terms of drafting the rest of the legislation which you have printed here?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, the legislation is both in C-27 and the potential of conflict with the Vienna conventions.

I am advised that many sections of the Vienna conventions are force of law in Canada. We do not anticipate problems between this bill and what is in the Vienna conventions, and those sections which are part of Canadian law. Obviously, if there was one, then the courts would decide.

By virtue of section 12, by virtue of the regulation section, that allows the government to have the regulations. As my hon. friend would hope and as I would hope, surely the government would draft the regulations under the law, that the regulations which would be drafted under this section certainly would have to fall under the general laws that are either in this or in the two Vienna conventions that apply. I hope they are.

Mr. Breaugh: Madam Chairman, that might clarify some of the definition problems that we have been discussing about what is a state and what is not.

The second area that I wanted to explore just a touch is there is a great deal of the use of the word reciprocity here. My understanding is that that is just a general principle that is used. It also would lead one to believe that at some point in time, if one could get an agreement with another jurisdiction that went well beyond what might be contained in either of these conventions or this law, that nation or that jurisdiction might in fact have privileges that would extend well past what is enclosed or contemplated in any of these conventions or this act.

Could we hear the minister's comments on that?

• (1410)

Mr. Danis: I thank my hon. friend for his question.

When we talk about reciprocity, of course we are bound by the legislation that we have. We do agree with two sections, one in the Vienna Diplomatic Convention, section 47, which talks about reciprocity and non-discrimination, and section 72, page 52 of our bill, which talks about consuls.

People who are considered diplomats get just about every immunity or privilege they could possibly get. There may be difficulties—I do not know if you could call them difficulties—but certainly the issue can be raised and has been raised by some that in certain cases consulates should have a type of immunity which would be similar to that of a diplomat. I am told that that is the case between the United States, the U.K., the Soviet Union, and China.

I am advised we have had one request from one government to modify the normal consulate privilege and immunities that they get and External Affairs is looking at it. It is done, I gather, in the normal course of business by External Affairs.

On the whole we are satisfied that the system we have in place is good, but does not prevent other immunities from being granted if done always in a reciprocal way.

Mr. Breaugh: Madam Chairman, I appreciate that this is pretty complicated stuff for us to be trying to deal with here on the floor without a lot of staff around, but I would like to hear comments on the power of the various ministers. I will put it in this context. The Secretary of State is mentioned and earlier the Minister of Finance is mentioned. There is clearly some ministerial powers that will be interpreted subsequently by one or more ministers of the Crown.

Is it the government's contention that where a conflict should arise, one or more of the ministers may extend the powers or may go the other way and curtail such powers. I would like to hear a little bit of an explanation as to how the government envisages that would work. I would be reluctant to be quite so enthusiastic about the bill if I thought that one person subsequently could rewrite this. I am not concerned at all that someone has to interpret particular circumstances, but I am concerned at how broad the powers given to the ministers are under this bill.

Mr. Danis: Two ministers are concerned with this legislation; first, the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, under this legislation, keeps the same powers that a minister has under other legislation. The legislation does not increase the powers of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The powers of the secretary of state are not increased with the proviso which I told my hon. friend a few minutes ago when I was talking about consulates. That is the same.

What is new in the legislation, with regard to my hon. friend's question about powers, to use that word, of ministers, is that the Minister of Finance would have the authority to make decisions with regard to certain tax rolls in the diplomatic community. For example, if it will be to the mutual advantage of both countries to have certain diplomats exempt from certain taxes that would be done by the Minister of Finance. I believe that would be a reasonable thing for the Minister of Finance to do.

Mr. Flis: Madam Chairman, the other issue I raised in the debate was of course that the bill is silent on the question of how an office of a political subdivision would become recognized as such. Again, in the Vienna Convention, Article 4 reads:

> 1. The sending State must make certain that the agrément of the receiving State has been given for the person it proposes to accredit as head of the mission to that State.
> 2. The receiving State is not obliged to give reasons to the sending State for a refusal of agrément.

Let us take the example of a diplomat from Ukraine who will come, let us say, to a consular office in Toronto, Ontario. The Secretary State for External Affairs has accepted this person's accreditation, but the subdivision state, in this case Ontario, does not accept this person to work in the Toronto consular office because it felt that this person had Communist ties in the past or whatever.

So at the federal level we are saying: "Yes, this person is acceptable to serve in the consular office in Toronto", but the Ontario government is saying: "No, sorry, we cannot accept this person". I do not think the bill addresses this issue, the process of actually setting up a consular office in a subdivision of Canada.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, my hon. friend from Parkdale—High Park is correct. The bill is silent on the issue because it was not the intention of the federal government to give a role in the recognition of a person from the Ukraine to the provincial government. If New York State wants to have someone in the City of Toronto, the federal government would recognize whoever went there. But we would not recognize someone from New York to Toronto unless we had been told by Queen's Park ahead of time that it would receive reciprocity in New York City. The decision of recognition is a federal one but we are not going to do it unless Queen's Park asks us and says that it wants reciprocity or have obtained reciprocity.

We do not believe there will be a problem with that.

Mr. Flis: In crossing the country and asking for input into our Constitution, one of the big concerns expressed is the division of powers—which powers will go to the federal government, which powers will go to the provincial governments and which powers will be shared. Does the minister not think that since we are passing a new bill this should be spelled out? If it is a shared decision the bill should say so. If it is federal jurisdiction the bill should say so.

When we pass legislation today we are passing legislation for the next 20, 50 years. Let us get it right the first time.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, I see my friend's point but we feel that the bill is clear on that issue with the interpretation of section 6.(1). The bill says that the Secretary of State for External Affairs may, for the purpose of according to that office, make sure that reciprocity is offered in the other jurisdictions. As a result of the wording of section 6 that can be the only interpretation.

The government always likes to take a co-operative approach to these issues. I am sure discussions would be held with the respective provinces if there was a request for that.

Mr. Flis: Madam Chairman, I thank the minister for his explanation. My concern is on record. I hope that it will be explored further, even after the passage of this bill.

Bill reported.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to thank all members of the House for their co-operation, allowing us to pass this bill at all stages. Specifically I would like to thank the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and the hon. member for Oshawa. I am sure it will allow the government to better pursue its national foreign policy objectives.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I believe that if you ask the House you will find there is unanimous consent to call it four o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All being in agreement we will call it four o'clock.

It being four o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock a.m.

INCOME TAX

QUARTERLY INSTALMENTS

The House resumed from Thursday, September 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harvard (p. 2805)

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the motion put forth by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg—St. James, a motion that would allow seniors to pay their income tax in one annual instalment if they wished to do so.

Many senior citizens no longer hold salaried jobs and are on pensions. These people are now required by law to estimate their annual income and determine from that estimate how much to pay Revenue Canada every three months. This has created some very serious problems for Canada's retired people. These citizens have always paid their income tax on or before April 30, a deadline given all Canadians, but once this part of our society reaches 65 years of age they are required by Revenue Canada to estimate and pay their taxes every three months.

It seems to me that under the current system the government is saying to most of our esteemed citizens: "We do not trust you to fulfil your obligations as taxpayers. Therefore we will make sure you will fulfil your obligations by requiring you to submit to a more rigid system of tax collection than we impose on other Canadians".

The government might claim that estimating income should not be a difficult task for seniors. After all, they are usually on an fixed income but this government has failed to realize that there are plenty of seniors who do not have straightforward incomes. Investments, bonds, stocks, these things change constantly. Even with a part-time job they can have enormous differences in their taxes. To add to this, if seniors make a mistake and pays less than what is expected, they are heavily penalized. There is no statement showing the error or no phone call explaining what went wrong; just a bill with interest added immediately.

At a time when we should be taking care of our retired, our aged, this government is playing credit department and forcing people, some of whom are on varying incomes, to pay up every three months, correct or incorrect. It insults the very people who make Canada what it is today.

In their golden years this government is telling the builders of this country: "You be sure to pay your taxes every month in case you forget or in case you make a few more pennies than you earlier thought while the rest of self-employed Canada enjoys the courtesy of paying once a year and the option of payment instalments".

It makes so much sense for this government to allow seniors to pay an annual expense if they choose to do so. Simply stated, it is a choice they are asking for. The seniors are not asking to pay less taxes, although they could. They are not asking to pay taxes monthly. They are just asking to be able to choose to pay taxes once a year. That is all, an option to pay taxes once a year.

It would make a great deal of sense in my view for the government to support this motion. It would remove from thousands of senior citizens the feeling that they are being treated differently and punitively by the government of this country.

The seniors of whom my colleague speaks and who have written and spoken to every one of us here do not seek to pay less than their fair share of taxes. What they seek and what we seek on their behalf is a system which will remove from them the strain, both financial and emotional, of having to submit taxes every three months to the government.

Let us remove from them the worry that a slight miscalculation or a slight unexpected increase in earnings will lead to confusion and penalties down the road. The removal of this irritation and fear would only be one small way in which we could show these people our gratitude for their contribution to this country.

As I said earlier, we are not advocating that they do not pay their taxes. We are advocating that they pay their share more fairly.

Let us talk about options. The senior citizens of this country have been denied a choice, a choice that we as taxpayers are entitled to. Simply stated, these people unlike salaried persons must pay their income tax in four quarterly payments, payments which for the rest of us are simply taken off our paycheques.

Seniors do not have this choice. They must adhere to the government's strict policies and tax payments, laws that force a person who misses a payment or is late to pay swollen interest along with the error in calculation. These people have worked their whole lifetime and deserve the benefit of the doubt and respect of the government.

Why can this government not avoid the obvious drawbacks of this system and legislate a simpler, more effective and more democratic system? The majority of seniors has been paying income tax for years, so how can this government assume this childlike approach to those parents of our present government, to those people who have paid?

I was most interested to note the comments made by the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest when this matter was discussed earlier. He agreed that the present method could be improved upon. He went on to suggest that in his position as chairman of the finance committee he would look at alternatives, one of which could involve putting a higher limit on the tax so that less people would be involved in having to file quarterly reports.

He mentioned at that time that the taxable income of $10,000 per year might be more reasonable as the cutoff amount for quarterly instalments. I am encouraged to see a member of the government side of the House agreeing with the intent of the motion suggested on this side, even if he did not support the motion in its present form.

What I would like to suggest is that the members on the other side do not postpone action any further by referring this matter to the finance committee, but rather show their goodwill toward the senior citizens of this country by supporting the motion put forth by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Let us join in this House in showing the senior citizens of Canada that we appreciate the efforts that they put forward in building this great country. Let us not penalize them by subjecting them to a more restrictive tax system that we impose on others who are better equipped financially to deal with it.

I urge members on the other side to support those of us who respect the needs of seniors and vote for this motion. I ask this because I know that those across the way would like to support this motion.

I ask them now to give it their wholehearted support.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to motion M–484, tabled by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to allow senior citizens with no income other than that taxed at source to pay income tax once a year instead of paying in four quarterly, provisional instalments, and the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James is to be commended for his interest in the concerns of senior citizens. Mr. Speaker, as you know, I share that interest, as does this government.

One example of what this government has done so far to help senior citizens in fiscal matters is the 1988 tax reform. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that before 1988, when filing an income tax return, every Canadian taxpayer had a personal exemption. Senior citizens had an additional exemption because of their age. In 1988, the age exemption was $2,670, and as I have said repeatedly in the House, this exemption was replaced by a tax credit, thus making the Income Tax Act and our tax system fairer and more equitable.

I don't want to get into any details this morning, but I would like to point out that as a result of this change, in 1991 the same exemption is now $3,235. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, this government made sure that senior citizens would benefit as a result of turning the exemption into a tax credit. The personal exemption, which all senior citizens have, just like you and me, was $4,270. This basic exemption, which was also changed to a credit, would this year be equal to a credit or exemption of $6,000. So we have $2,000 more for the basic exemption and nearly $1,000 more for the senior citizens' exemption, if we consider the difference between 1988 and 1991. Across this country, 290,000 senior citizens no longer have to pay federal income tax as a result of changes in our tax system. Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to emphasize the fact that we have 290,000 people in Canada who no longer pay income tax, and if they no longer pay income tax, they certainly do not have to pay quarterly instalments.

Now, what is the purpose of quarterly instalments? To understand the concept, first we have to know what the Income Tax Act says. The Income Tax Act provides that any taxpayer with income on which tax is not deducted at source and who at the end of the year has to pay at least $1,000 in income tax, must pay his income tax in quarterly instalments. Mr. Speaker, I admit I have discussed this often with senior citizens in the riding of Trois-Rivières—as you know, it is the most beautiful riding— My colleague next door doesn't quite agree, but it is true just the same, Mr. Speaker. So as I was saying, many senior citizens are delighted with this system because on March 15, when they have to send their first quarterly instalment for the year, they know, give or take a few dollars, how much federal income tax they will have to pay the rest of the year. So on March 15 they make out the first cheque, which is one-quarter of the total amount. This means they can easily budget for the next instalments.

Mr. Speaker, assuming that we accept the principle of quarterly instalments, for senior citizens it means they can spread the amounts they have to pay over a certain period. It means they will not have an unpleasant surprise at the end of the year, in the form of a large amount of income tax to pay for which they might not have budgeted.

Payments are based on the previous year's income, although not 100 per cent, and that is very important. If a taxpayer can prove that his income for 1991 will be $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 less than it was in 1990, he doesn't have to pay his instalments on the basis of his 1990 income. He pays on the basis of his projected income for 1991.

If he accidentally forgets to send his cheque on March 15 or on the fifteenth of the following months, he does not have to pay interest if the amount of interest payable on the tax instalment he failed to send is $25 or less.

My point is that there is some flexibility in the system. More importantly, Mr. Speaker, senior citizens have a chance to budget for their tax payments.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the system has worked well so far, and I think it should be left in place. Mr. Speaker, if there is any reason to change the system, we will consider what should be done.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. I think his motion really reflects the desires of many senior citizens and retired persons who have a taxable income and owe over $1,000 in income tax.

I will read the motion into the record again. The motions states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

One of the reasons I support this motion is not only for its good, practical sense, but it also reflects the concerns of quite a number of my older constituents who have come to my office. They are very upset and confused about this particular regulation, and I might say very, very annoyed with the government.

A number of my constituents did not realize they had to pay quarterly, or were confused about it. They felt the tone of accusation in letters they received from the government were in effect an intimidation, implying they were dishonest when really it is a matter of being a very confusing and inconvenient way of paying taxes.

Others found it difficult to predict what their annual income might be. One of my hon. colleagues said earlier that this could vary so it is difficult to calculate one-quarter of what the annual taxable income would be.

They felt the high interest rate was not really a very fair or considerate way of treating older people if they did not pay, when often it was just a mistake, an error on their part and a lack of knowledge or lack of memory, perhaps.

Senior citizens are upset with the government and I think this is only one of many serious issues they are upset about. I certainly think it would make sense to give older people choices as to whether they pay in annual or quarterly instalments. I suspect most would choose the option to pay annual instalments as they did in the past if that were the case. I would like to say that this is the kind of frustration, anger and in some cases the hurt feelings that people expressed to me when they came to my office. It really reflected a very general disillusionment and anger at this government.

It did not take much conversation to get into some of the other things that have happened to seniors which we are not forgetting and they are not forgetting. There was the famous clawback of old age pensions. People who are really just in the middle income group now will have to pay income tax on some of their earnings, including the old age pension.

It is perhaps not so much the amount of tax but the impudence and the arrogance of this government in doing away with the whole tradition, a Canadian institution, part of our Canadian value system of universal old age pensions. That is what they are angry about and what we should certainly continue to challenge. I believe it was a very bad move on the part of this government.

Another thing is the impact of the GST on the incomes of people who have fixed incomes. This is difficult on all people but is particularly difficult on families with children and the expenses they are paying the GST on every day. For older people who have a fixed income and who do not have a 7 per cent increase in their income every year, it is particularly difficult. They are certainly feeling the pinch. I am sure that many people are having to take this extra GST expense out of their food budgets.

The third thing I would like to mention that is very worrisome to seniors across the country is the real threat to medicare and the threat of user fees that may be pending in some provinces. They are getting pretty close to charging user fees for certain services now. This is a threat to the universal nature of our medicare system which seniors, in their younger years, fought hard to establish during difficult times. The one thing, regardless of political partisanship, that binds Canadians together is their support for universal medicare, as well as for universal old age pensions and other social programs.

I do not want to take a long time to debate this, but I certainly want to express the views of our party. We object to the assault that is being made on pensioners and senior citizens. We support the suggestion of this member, which would not cost the government any money incidentally, to revert to an optional arrangement where seniors may pay income tax on an annual basis if they wish. We certainly intend to continue monitoring the other programs that are attacking seniors who have built our country and who deserve much better treatment.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking to the private member's bill brought forward by the member for Winnipeg—St. James. My hon. colleague proposes to change the requirement for senior citizens to pay income tax in quarterly instalments and instead have them make just one annual instalment.

I believe there are probably some potential benefits in this particular move. Likewise there are probably some potential dangers. I would like to touch on both of those aspects.

First I would like to thank my colleague for raising the important issue of taxing Canadian seniors. We all share the hon. member's concern for the senior citizens of Canada. Of course seniors built Canada. Seniors were a paramount concern, I do believe, to this government when we introduced fundamental changes to the personal income tax system which took effect about three years ago.

With the introduction of the goods and services tax and major changes in tax assistance for retirement savings under pension reform, I believe the fair tax treatment of seniors continues to be of concern to this government. I will say more in a minute or two about some of the specifics.

Notwithstanding some of the arguments that I may be making in the next couple of minutes, I would like to say that I do see some merit in what the hon. member is proposing. I am not about to discount or discard the particular suggestion of the hon. member because I think, more importantly, a change such as this that affects so many Canadians really needs more study, more debate around the whole question and more examination to know whether it is going to achieve the kind of fairness that on the surface it purports.

I would like to report to the House that about one month ago I was in Vancouver with the Minister of Finance. We were attending a conference which we had opened up to the public and we invited public debate and questions on all issues before the Minister of Finance. One senior citizen did come to the microphone and raised this exact point. He asked the Minister of Finance why it was necessary for seniors to file income tax returns on a quarterly basis.

I would like to report to the House that the response of the Minister of Finance was quick and decisive. He agreed with this particular senior that this is an area which needs examination and that, in his opinion, the Government of Canada should re-visit the whole question of the frequency of income tax payments. I gathered from him at that particular time, although I did not see any media picking it up in response, that this was an issue of concern to the Minister of Finance.

Therefore, having heard the minister say that himself, I am not going to stand here and say that my colleague's suggestion in this House is without merit because I think it does have some points to it that are worthy of consideration. It is not a matter of if we should make these kinds of changes, but how and when and how most appropriately so that we really facilitate seniors themselves.

I have heard members of the House of Commons finance committee indicate in the House a willingness to consider this particular proposal seriously before the standing committee. I support that. I think it would be a progressive move.

The experience of my own parents who make these quarterly payments shows that it is something that is an added concern financially and that a lot of people do not need that added concern at that particular age.

I would ask and urge my colleague from the other side who has proposed this particular measure to withdraw it and instead to write to the chairman of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance and ask that the issue be brought forward to the committee. I suspect, not having spoken to the chairman directly, that the committee would be quite pre-disposed to deal with this particular motion and I think that is where it should really go for further action.

Those are my own comments and added to those I have a few stock responses that I would like to make in terms of some of what this government has done to try and be as fair as possible to senior citizens, given our economic and fiscal constraints.

Let us review a few of the facts. Under personal income reform, this government introduced a number of changes that were designed to be of particular benefit to seniors. For example, the $2,670 age exemption that would have been in effect in 1988 has been replaced by the age tax credit. It has provided tax assistance equal to an exemption not of $2,670 but of $3,235 for those in the 17 per cent tax bracket. In addition, the $4,270 basic personal exemption has been replaced by a personal tax credit. It has provided tax assistance equal not to $4,270 but equal to $6,000 for those in this 17 per cent tax bracket.

In 1991, the age credit is $575 while the basic personal credit is $1,067. Together these measures will provide tax assistance equal to an exemption of almost $10,000 for 80 per cent of the seniors in the 17 per cent tax bracket.

While I accept some of the arguments made by the speaker who preceded me in terms of a perceived assault from time to time on some of our social structures, our social safety nets, the fact is that the basic exemption for 80 per cent of the seniors in this tax bracket is far higher than it was just a few years ago.

This is probably the most significant point: as a result of the changes made by this government, almost 300,000 more seniors do not pay tax. That is quite a change in three years. Since 1988 to 1991, and let me stress this again, almost 300,000 more senior Canadian citizens do not pay federal income tax.

Then we have the much maligned GST. With the introduction of the GST the government also brought in a GST credit. It was designed to ensure that families, lower income Canadians including seniors, those people in our society who earn less than $30,000 a year, will get some net benefit from this change in the tax system. After they have paid the GST on the purchases which apply and they have received this credit back at the end of the day, the assurance has been there from the government, although we do not have a full year of experience yet, that these people will actually have paid net less sales tax.

In 1991 the GST credit will provide a benefit of $190 per adult and $100 per child. I think the member for Hamilton West will find this particularly interesting because he has been a keen student of the GST credit. I think the member would agree with me that any change we can make in terms of refunding sales tax to those people who make under $30,000 with a limited ability to pay would make them better off.

I would just like to point out that the GST credit provides a benefit of this $190 per adult and $100 per child, and it is reduced by 5 per cent of net income in excess of $24,000.

Besides that, there are other benefits the government has made sure that our seniors enjoy. For example, a substantial portion of the government's resources have been committed to providing income support for the elderly. We have old age security programs and guaranteed income supplements providing seniors with a basic level of income support. In 1991 every Canadian over the age of 65 will be eligible to receive about $4,300 in old age security benefits. Every little bit helps. It may not be as much as it could be but, given Canada's current fiscal and economic position, it is very important that we do everything we can.

My time is just about up so I really do not have time to run over a number of the other benefits that I think this government has given seniors. Let me finish with this point: I think my hon. colleague who has made this suggestion makes it in good faith. I do not think he has done it in order to try and embarrass the government or to challenge our particular policies and practices. I think he has done it in the spirit of fairness and in recognition of the contribution made to our country by seniors.

Having made my points, I would suggest again that the member withdraw the motion and ask the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance to bring this before the committee for an exhaustive study. I think there are merits here and I do not want to see it simply voted down because we happen to split on party lines. I would like to see this issue advance and I would suggest once again to the member that he bring it before the committee for further study.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will state again that I consider it a privilege to rise in debate today in support of the motion in the name of my colleague and my benchmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Having just heard from the hon. member for Halton—Peel, he performs quite a bootleg on the main motion. He talks about how many fewer senior citizens pay income tax and how terrific the GST is now for the senior citizens of this country. The hon. member for bootleg, Ontario, should be reminded that we want to get specific about the motion, the motion being:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

That is the motion. It is very clear, very succinct. I would trust that many members opposite support this motion, even though the member for Halton—Peel has some reservations about it and he is not prepared to vote for it here in the House of Commons. Either you believe in the motion or you do not believe in the motion.

The motion is an important one as it would redress what many on both sides of this Chamber see as an imbalance between the way senior citizens pay income tax and the way the rest of everyday Canadians pay income tax in this country.

Senior citizens who no longer hold salary positions and are on pensions are required to pay income tax on a quarterly basis. Revenue Canada demands these senior citizens pay on a quarterly basis and if payments are not made on time seniors are charged interest.

Imagine that once a senior retires from a regular job and no longer has income tax taken off at the source, the pay cheque, he or she is certainly not eligible to pay income tax in the same way everyone else does. Instead of receiving one income tax form and sending it in showing either that the person owes money or is about to get a rebate from the government, seniors have to go through this entire process every three months.

The irony is that if the government owes a rebate to a senior, the senior may have to wait a long while before receiving a cheque in the mail. On the other hand if a senior owes money to the government and is not immediately able to send in the money to the government, perhaps because the senior no longer holds a regular paying job, the government insists on having the senior pay interest on that amount.

There is also another injustice levelled at seniors. If the government does owe money to seniors and by mistake makes an over-payment to them, it will demand that extra money be returned to it without delay and will charge interest on that sum if they are late paying the amount.

For the seniors who rightly believe that the rebate is correct and that they are owed the money and who subsequently go out and make use of that money for any of a number of purposes, how are they supposed to pay it back if they are on a fixed pension income and the government is knocking at the door, the tax man is at the door, demanding that money back? Most often they cannot.

It is a burden for many seniors. For those of us fortunate enough to be receiving a regular pay cheque, tax is taken off at the source. We may owe money at income tax time but we have only to fill out the form annually and be done with it.

This motion would redress one of those imbalances and would give back to seniors the choice of making their income tax payments once a year, not every three months. The government says that its reason for having seniors pay quarterly instalments is that if they did not, and because seniors do not pay tax on a regular pay cheque, this would constitute a tax loan. The other reason is that it believes that seniors will be able to budget better on a quarterly basis.

What? The senior citizens of this country should rely on budgetary advice from this government? For the record let me read to this House a letter which was sent to my colleague, my benchmate, sponsoring this motion. I will not mention the person's name but it was addressed to Revenue Canada and copied to the Minister of Finance. It said: "Enclosed you will find cheques totalling $1,099.55. The cheque for $162.89 is so-called instalment interest which you will have the unmitigated gall to charge me. The cheque for $936.66 covers two instalments of $468.33 for March 15, 1991, and June 15, 1991.

I am a senior citizen and for the many years I have paid income tax. I have always paid in full on April 30 as required. I see no reason to change this procedure and I take exception to being told that I must pay quarterly or be charged interest. I would like to point out that since April 30 you are assessing me with an additional $1,099.55. This will make a total of $2,972.90 paid since April 30, 1991, and since I am on a fixed income this extra money demanded by you is causing a hardship to scrape this money together.

You can rest assured when the next election rolls around I will not be voting Conservative."

An hon. member: That is a long line.

Mr. Keyes: As my colleague says, that is a pretty long line.

That opinion I trust holds true for the majority of seniors who have had their old age security pensions clawed back, who are at the receiving end of a health care system that this government is cutting back on because of cuts to provinces and transfer payments and the funding of other social programs which we all know they helped build in this country.

This is the same government that tried to de-index pensions for seniors and given its track record will probably try that again. The suggestions we are discussing here this morning are very simple for solving this dilemma.

Another constituent who wrote to my colleague from Winnipeg—St. James said: "The problem can be solved by general averaging over the last three years with no cost to the taxpayers. The federal government issues old age security cheques and CPP cheques every month by computer. So it has the capability to initiate deductions every month from those cheques. Thus, seniors remembering to write cheques quarterly would be eliminated".

All my colleague is asking for, all we are asking for on this side of the House, and I am sure members opposite agree that this all makes common sense, is that we give this country's most esteemed citizens a break. Let us give them the choice. Let us give them the right to whether they want to pay their tax annually or every three months.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Motion M-484, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James. It reminds me of one of my first speeches in the House after I was elected in 1984, on the subject of pensions. My colleague opposite just said that the government had wanted to deindex old age pensions. I remember that I had then made my maiden speech in the House and the funniest thing is that I had asked the research service to do research for speaking notes, of course.

When I made my speech in the House, with notes, I remember that my colleague at the time, Mr. Malépart from Laurier—Sainte-Marie, who has since left us, he died, shouted at me from the other side of the House that what I said was silly and made no sense. He said, "Come on, the hon. member must have been hit on the head. It makes no sense!" I replied: "Listen, I am not that out of it. I am reading exactly what you said on the same subject three years ago when you were in power." Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that we sometimes change our stand when we change sides in the House. What I said was not as dumb as all that—it is what he said back then. He was a friend since then because it was always a good joke between us, because he told me that I had caught him that time with his pants down, as we say.

Mr. Speaker, I admit to you that some good, legitimate arguments were made, except that I am fairly close to my constituents and I do not find it to be a big concern with them. That said, just because it is not a big concern does not mean that it is not worth talking about. But I would remind you that the measure concerning payments every three months, or four times a year, does not apply only to seniors. I pay federal and provincial income tax every month because I am paid on a monthly basis, 12 times a year, on the last day of each month. When I worked at the school board, I was paid 26 times a year so I made 26 payments a year for federal and provincial income tax, health insurance, etc.

The measure in question here applies not only to seniors but to all self-employed workers. A special provision was made for them. All self-employed workers, that is, those whose tax is not deducted at source—of course, seniors are included in that; they do not work or have a regular wage income—must pay four times a year. So it is not a big concern. Some seniors even came to my office and said to me, "Listen, Mr. Hudon, special measures are always being adopted for seniors and I think there is a limit. We do not always want to be treated differently. We are not always looking for special treatment."

Before getting into the main changes in the Pension Plan, I would like to remind the people watching us, the viewers, that there are three complementary levels of pension entitlement in Canada. They are important and benefit all Canadians, including myself. They will benefit my children when they join the workforce and they have benefited and continue to benefit my father and mother back in La Pocatière. So, there are three levels: the first is the basic entitlement for anyone over 65 and, exceptionally for some over 60 as with the case of widows and widowers. But generally, it is 65. This basic level is presently costing the federal government, that is to say all Canadian taxpayers, $12.1 billion a year and an additional $4 billion for the guaranteed income supplement.

We are talking about $16.1 billion then. By that I do not mean that we are giving so much money and are so generous. I must say that, when I look at the financial situation of some seniors, I feel they would deserve much more. Just the same, this is a major financial effort that cannot be brushed aside and considered as more or less important. As I was saying, all Canadians, the Canadians taxpayers, the workers, are presently paying $16.1 billion for them.

You will remember that, in 1966-1967 I think, the Canada Pension Plan was established for all the public, parapublic and private sector employees. Deductions were made on each pay and we would say: "We will pay you pensions when you retire." Quebec has its own pension plan, the Quebec Pension Plan, but it is administered by a second level of government. So, there is the basic old age pension that everyone is entitled to and then there is the Quebec Pension Plan for Quebecers and the Canada Pension Plan in all other provinces.

The third level, which also costs government money, is that of private pension plans. It costs money in the sense that it deprives government of revenues because, in the case of a private pension plan, one can deduct from his or her income tax amounts that would normally be taxable. So, deductions are made.

Mr. Speaker, maybe the viewers should be reminded also that government is thus deprived of $9.1 billion in revenues annually. It is important to point this out. Mind you, it is important, but the problem is just being displaced because, in fact, the money that I put away and that I deduct from my taxes this year, in five years or in ten years, when I will benefit from this tax measure, I am not sure that the taxation tables will be essentially the same. Generally, the federal and the provincial governments will manage to get a lot more money because the tax tables will have changed.

So, the money or the dollar that I put away today, and that could be taxed at, say, 25 per cent now, how can I possibly know that in ten years, it will not be taxed at 33, 40 or 50 per cent? It is easy to say that the federal government is depriving himself of a revenue. It is easy to say that in a political speech, but I think that the federal government is not really depriving himself of these revenues but rather deferring them.

Mr. Speaker, this deduction done four times per year applies to all those that have revenues other than fixed salaries. Therefore, it is not a special measure for seniors. Mr. Speaker, we are trying to improve the Canada Pension Plan. In 1987, we implemented a rather important reform that was primarly aimed at ensuring a greater accessibility to the Canada Pension Plan. We also improved the situation for workers who change jobs, with the anticipated acquisition of rights to contributions and a greater transferability, in order to protect those workers who change jobs. You know what the situation was when we came into power in 1984 and had to deal with this problem.

The third improvement that we made was the compulsory payment of contributions to survivors, thus providing a greater financial security to spouses of participants to retirement plans. Those are the improvements we made to the system and now, as I was saying earlier, we are improving the tax assistance scheme. I am talking about those $9 billion, the collection of which is presently being postponed.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that my time is up. To summarize, I think that this is a very legitimate request. It is a request that was not made in my region, but since I never brought up the matter, maybe it was not brought up to me either. But the seniors appreciate this measure—even though it is not amusing for them to file four returns per year, nor for the lawyers, the notaries and all the independent workers. They feel more secure, they know that by year's end, they will not get a large bill for income tax purposes.

Mr. Speaker, it is a measure that gives a sense of security to Canadians, not only to seniors, but also to all the independent workers.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity this morning to speak to the subject of income tax and senior citizens.

[English]

—and to speak in support of the bill put forward by my colleague.

I want to talk mostly about what is unfair in the current situation that requires seniors to pay their income tax on a quarterly basis, based on a $1,000 threshold that has not been adjusted recently for inflation. It is going to continue to move that threshold lower in terms of real income.

What strikes me as fundamentally unfair about this system is that seniors are required to pay tax on income they have not earned and may not, in fact, earn until much later in the year. If they fail to estimate that income correctly—it does change from year to year and estimating it is difficult—they pay a penalty by way of interest.

This means that they are paying a penalty for not paying tax on money they have not even earned as income yet. That seems to me, very clearly, unfair and not at all consistent with one paying a penalty for something one has done wrong. People in that situation have not done anything wrong.

The reverse does not apply. If a senior overpays substantially in the first and second quarter, as is very easy to do, the government does not then turn around and pay them a benefit, because they have loaned the government money free of charge for three, six, nine or even twelve months. No. They pay a penalty if they do not pay enough, but they do not get a benefit if they paid the government too much.

Expenses are also part of how much one pays in income tax. For seniors, expenses are particularly unpredictable. These are expenses which are legitimate deductions from income, and therefore affect the tax payable. It is really impossible for a senior to predict in March that they are going to have medical expenses for instance which are deductible and will reduce the amount of tax paid.

I really do not see how we can penalize people because they do not have a crystal ball. None of us have crystal balls and none of us can predict the future, but to disadvantage seniors in particular because they do not have the gift of clairvoyance seems to me particularly nasty.

I want to also say that I think the provision of this is particularly discriminatory. A very large proportion of seniors are women. Given the age and the era in which many of these women were born and raised, in which they raised their own families, many of them have never earned income. Many of them, if they happen to live in Quebec for instance in a certain period of history, were prevented from owning property and therefore having an income, property and the financial responsibilities of the banking for a family.

We all know the stories of women who were dependent on a mate for every cent they got to spend. They were never able to manage their own money or ever able to have their own money, or to own anything of their own. We are out of the era, fortunately, when a man's home is his castle, and what he does inside it is nobody's business but his own. Unfortunately, many of the people we are talking about who are paying taxes under this unfair system are products of that era, have never had to take financial responsibility, and find it quite difficult to do the kind of thing the government is now insisting they do. Therefore, they become vulnerable to other people who take advantage of their lack of experience, and lack of information, on how to handle these kinds of financial matters. They can really take advantage of and really can put an elderly person at a disadvantage.

We also need to remember that among the elderly there is a high rate of illiteracy. Income tax forms are not exactly conducive to people who grew up in a generation and, perhaps, did not go to school beyond grades two, three, four or five. Certainly finishing high school and going to university was by far the exception rather than the rule. To require certain skills of a group of elderly people, among whom there are a large number who do not have the reading, writing and number skills that many of us are fortunate to have because of a more advanced educational system when we happened to be growing up, is discriminatory.

Finally, the deterioration in services to the elderly from this government is hitting all members of Parliament in their constituency offices. I know in my office, people may spend days in a row simply trying to get through on the telephone to access even the ability to enquire about their old age pension, or to make an application for it. They may find that they have to go to an office, sit for hours, wait with all the costs and turmoil of doing that, only to be told that they have to come back another day for an appointment and go through it all over again.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada be now read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, recently the President of the Treasury Board introduced a bill in this House, Bill C–3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of federal real property.

I am pleased to be here today to lead off debate on this bill, as we seek to consolidate the policy changes and the new procedures associated with the government's reform of its real property management system.

Five years ago the government was faced with a real property system, some would say lack of a system, under which it was very difficult to know which minister of the Crown had responsibility for which property and for what purpose. Since then, substantial progress has been made. The goal of reform is to improve the effectiveness of the federal land management. When I say land, I refer not only to undeveloped land, but also to land complete with buildings.

To improve management of the federal real property, the cabinet first approved a new regime based on decentralization of authority to the departments that use the property for delivery of services to Canadians. We have cut the red tape to save money, to reduce overhead, and to improve the service to the public. In other words, we moved to modernize the way real property is managed in the government.

We made Treasury Board ministers a focal point for policy and general management decisions. This establishes the decentralization of management work by providing managers in the field with clear lines of accountability.

We have clarified the role of Public Works Canada as manager of federal office buildings and as a source of specialized services to other departments.

We shifted responsibility for the administration of most special buildings, or facilities such as laboratories, to the individual departments actually using those facilities.

The result is a very highly decentralized system with authority and accountability vested in program departments, rather than central agencies, and administered by local property managers, not Ottawa.

The special group known as the Bureau of Real Property Management was set up within the Treasury Board secretariat to manage and co-ordinate the process of decentralization, as well as providing advice to the Treasury Board ministers on their new role in looking after real property.

With these important reforms in place, we turned our attention to the method used for federal real property conveyancing. Bill C-3 is one of the last steps needed to complete the simplification and modernization of the way federal lands and buildings are managed.

The federal real property management act will bring together, in one statute, the general authorities necessary to buy, sell or lease the lands and buildings used by government departments to deliver the programs to the Canadian public. It would enable the government to use the same means to buy or sell property that are used by the private sector, but with appropriate controls in place. This would make it faster and easier for the private sector to deal with the government. It would increase efficiency in property transactions, reduce delays, and eliminate differences in approach that now exist between the government and the private sector. In Alberta, we will be able to do things the Albertan way and in Ontario, the way they do things in Ontario, and so on.

The bill would give the government the flexibility it needs to be an efficient manager of real property. It would improve service to the public in a significant way by allowing the government to use modern methods in dealing with Canadians when it buys, sells, leases or transfers lands or buildings.

I am pleased to submit these proposals to the House today. However useful they may be, these proposals are strictly limited in scope. Let me explain. First, they would not affect the management of lands governed by special legislation such as the Indian Act, the National Parks Act or the Territorial Lands Act. In each case, the specialized legislation would override the federal real property act. Nor would these proposals affect the management of lands held by Crown corporations. These corporations would continue to manage properties in support of their commercial and public policy objectives, under their own legislation, or under the Financial Administration Act.

The federal real property act would, however, apply to the property transactions of about 20 departments of the federal Public Service that hold land for delivery of programs to Canadians. The diversity of these holdings would surprise you, Mr. Speaker, covering everything from cultural centres to defence bases, employment centres, nursing stations, research labs, farms, airports, prisons, police detachments, embassies, consulates and about 25,000 residences in Canada and around the world. About 85 per cent of these facilities are outside of Ottawa.

The vast majority of this property is devoted to providing direct service to the public. It represents the full range of facilities needed to deliver the federal government services to the Canadian public. The federal government is the largest real property holder in Canada. We control a large, diverse and complex portfolio of real estate. Excluding the territories, we manage some 28 million square metres of building space and about 23 million hectares of land. If all this land was put in one place, it would cover about the same area as Great Britain. The sheer number, and diversity, of federal land holdings makes for thousands of property transactions a year. That is why it was absolutely necessary that decision making and managerial accountability be decentralized. That is why legislation to support this improved management structure must keep pace.

The new regime for real property management is in keeping with our overriding goal of improving services to the public. It gives the managers more direct responsibility and holds them accountable for the results.

Under the present law many, if not most, real property decisions concern acquisitions, and purchases must come from Ottawa. The decision making process is highly centralized. The proposed legislation would allow the government to delegate these decisions outside Ottawa where it makes good business sense to do so.

Currently, three separate and often conflicting statutes govern the way real property transactions are handled. These statutes are the Public Lands Grants Act, the Public Works Act (Part II) and the Surplus Crown Assets Act. These acts are complex and out of date.

The Public Lands Grants Act and Part II of the Public Works Act as they apply to real estate transactions are essentially unchanged from the 1890s. That is the 1890s, Mr. Speaker.

We have been operating with a real policy regime designed for the horse and buggy era dealing with assets that are virtually priceless, and that belong to all taxpayers of Canada. It is clearly time that this obsolete legislation be modernized.

The third piece of legislation, the Surplus Crown Assets Act, was designed to deal primarily with surplus office furniture and equipment, not with lands. It is inadequate to deal with real property.

These statutes do not allow the use of modern real property methods or practices similar to those followed in the private sector. They use different terms to describe the same things and they use different mechanisms to carry out the same kind of transactions. Under these old laws, selling even a small piece of property can take from six to nine months after a decision has been made.

Take, for example, the sale of a modest house that used to serve as the residence of an RCMP officer in a remote British Columbia detachment. Today the house has outlived its usefulness and the RCMP has decided that it should be sold. Under the present rules, it would probably take the agreement of two cabinet committees and processing by as many as five government departments, over a period of six to nine months, to complete the sale. Most of the work would be done in Ottawa, far from the local market, with the attendant risk of errors.

You could imagine the headache that this kind of transaction causes Canadians across the country trying to buy property from the federal government.

With the flexibility of the proposed new act the same transaction would take six to eight weeks, that is, 60 or 80 per cent faster, and involve a British Columbia–based RCMP official and a local Department of Justice lawyer.

I trust you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is much better than six to nine months, and a big improvement in service to the public.

Similarly, under the law, it is no easy matter to surrender a lease, even in situations in which a terminating lease is beneficial to the tenant, and to the government. Managers in the field do not have the authority necessary to make the decision.

Let us say that a concessionaire in Halifax International Airport wishes to relocate to larger premises in the same building. The government agrees that the new space rents for more money and a new tenant is already waiting for the old premises. At present, because this move involves the surrender of an existing lease, the decision can only be made with the approval of the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, on a submission by the Minister of Transport. Obviously this process is time consuming and is neither efficient nor service-oriented.

For the most part, the legislation we are proposing today clarifies, codifies and simplifies existing practices in legislation to ensure good management of real property transactions such as the procedures used to make transfers between ministers and between governments.

The proposed legislation clarifies the role of individual government departments with land holdings. The bill emphasizes that federal real property is a long-term asset of the people of Canada. Departments are the temporary stewards of the land they hold to deliver their programs.

The bill also clarifies the role of the Department of Justice in ensuring that the interests of the Government of Canada, and thus the people of Canada, are served in property transactions.

In conclusion, the provision of this bill would clarify and simplify the current arrangements for buying, selling, leasing, licensing and transferring federal real property. These measures are straightforward, as I have said. They are designed to eliminate inconsistencies between laws that treat similar transactions in different ways, and use modern methods in federal land transactions.

The passage of the proposed federal real property act would improve service to the public by reducing delays and frustration on the part of the public that deals with the government on property transactions. It would reduce the cost and increase the efficiency of how the government manages our properties.

For these reasons, I believe the passage of the proposed legislation will enable us to better manage the real property assets that we hold for all Canadians.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-3 clearly reflects the government's desire to simplify procedures in an area of administration that can be very complex, as the government member pointed out. All federal government land put together would cover roughly the same area as England. That is a lot of territory to manage, and in recent years, procedures had become very unwieldy.

When I was in the National Assembly, for instance, we had the same system we have here, and when there were "letters patent", it could take six or eight months to get them, if we were lucky. My point is that transactions of this kind do not reflect current procedures or transactions in the private sector, which is often a source of frustration.

The bill contains a number of elements that are most welcome, of course, but this is something that evolved gradually. There is a story behind those elements, and I would like to explain the reason for a bill of this scope. There may also be a few omissions that perhaps our government colleagues would be able to clarify.

Mr. Speaker, in 1985, the study team on real property management, established by the Ministerial Task Force on Program Review—there were an enormous number of programs, and this was under Mr. Nielsen, the minister at the time—this study team published a report that mentioned a number of shortcomings in management procedures for federal real property.

There were several recommendations for simplifying and updating the procedures then in effect, and these recommendations were subsequently adopted by Cabinet. Following Cabinet's decision, that same year Treasury Board set up the Bureau of Real Property Management responsible for co-ordinating management of the federal government's real property. With the co-operation of the Department of Justice and all responsible departments, the Bureau proceeded with a review of the instruments used to grant federal property.

The Bureau reported its findings, and I will mention some of these later on. The bill itself is fairly technical, and I would rather not get into the technical aspects. The three main bodies of legislation that governed federal real property conveyancing and which are currently in effect—the Public Lands Grants Act, the Public Works Act and the Surplus Crown Assets Act—no longer reflected current real property management methods and techniques. The first two have not changed much since they came into effect, that would be in the 1890s, while the last one is better suited for disposing of personal property than real property.

These acts contain inconsistencies as regards the methods and procedures. They are redundant and thus are confusing for the people handling the transfers.

Finally, Bill C-3 was designed to correct the many deficiencies in the present system. This legislation intended to update and streamline the methods used in the administration and disposition of federal real property will give a clearer definition of management responsibilities regarding public lands. It will also be useful to codify and revise legal provisions concerning many similar real estate transactions, if not all.

Here is the question I want to ask my colleague opposite. From what I understood, this legislation will apply to all public lands. One of the weaknesses of the bill was that it was not clear that all Crown lands would be covered. So, Bill C-3 will repeal the entire Territorial Lands Act and amend the Public Works Act and the Surplus Crown Assets Act so as to exclude from the application of these acts real estate transactions covered by this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned earlier some form of accountability on the part of management. That is what I want to hear about. Will the accountability of managers that is in this bill really be there in fact? In the past, many people had dealings with the federal government and when there was confusion—I admit that the laws governing Crown buildings and land are very confusing. It would be a good idea in the bill, and it is not clear, that is one of its weaknesses—Will accountability really be there in fact? It would be a good idea to clear up the confusion that has existed on many occasions.

I would also point out that with a single piece of legislation to manage all Crown lands and even buildings, no doubt this statutory authority will make it unnecessary to search through all the current legislation to see who has the last word. Indeed, with this bill, the statutory authority will be the departments' responsibility and managers will be responsible for ensuring that in every department, these transactions comply with all the requirements the government put in the bill. No doubt the time transactions take will be greatly reduced, as it should be, because transactions these days must be done quickly—we are no longer in the 19th century, when they could take years. Modern methods today require the government to keep up to date in it real estate transactions.

But one of the weaknesses we were able to note is that the bill does not specify how the procedure will work. For example, there is no specification now of how an individual would go about acquiring Crown land or how a particular department that has extra property in a given place would market it. I would like to know if he intends in committee to elaborate on the procedure to be implemented and what the chances for an individual dissatisfied with the procedure, to lodge an appeal?

I would also like to know something else. Pursuant to section 16, paragraph one, the Governor on Council may appoint an ad hoc review committee to make a decision. We would want assurances that, in case of improprieties, this committee established under the authority of the Governor in Council could be called before this House.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like the government to tell us whether all Crown lands—indeed those the hon. member mentioned—will be covered by this bill, including all government leases on buildings? The hon. member talked about 28 million square meters of building space. The federal government is obviously both the biggest tenant and the biggest land owner. Those are the points we would like the government to clarify before this bill can pass third reading.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise and speak to Bill C-3, the bill dealing with the real property of the federal government. It has taken great pains to indicate to us that this is a very technical bill that we should pass very quickly through the House. Right away that give us some concern, but for the most part we approve of the vast majority of this bill and we do not want to be obstructionist. I will touch on what we think are the key elements of the bill and some of the concerns we have, although few in number we believe major in content, and we hope that the government will see its way clear to approve a couple of amendments that we believe are necessary in this bill.

The size of the bill, as a couple of my colleagues have suggested, is immense. We are talking about office buildings, houses, parks, police detachments, consulates, dry docks, employment offices. We have no doubt the federal government is the largest land and building owner in this country. Am I to believe it is $60 billion and the expenditure per year in this area is $6 billion. We may be speaking of a bill of a highly technical nature, but indeed it is a bill that could impact on everybody in this country.

It has been told to us that some of the language is archaic and the act is arcane and it is a hundred and some years out-dated. One could ask the question that if it was that bad, why did we not get to it beforehand.

It reminds me as bit of the UI bill and that gives me some concern. It is very technical and complex. It has lots of regulations. It is irrelevant and impractical at times. But when you get down to it, the interpretations of the regulations can be indeed very important to ordinary Canadians.

Inconsequential? Certainly not. We have received a tremendous amount of assurances, including from the creator of the bill. When I spoke to the creator of the bill and asked him whether any of our amendments would be acceptable, he seemed quite concerned or upset that I would suggest amending his creation.

I can understand that. Things that I put together I do not wish people to tamper with either, especially since, like a sculptor, he spent two years putting this bill together. Again, we will be proposing some amendments to the bill.

• (1230)

As far as the technicalities of the bill are concerned, they do expedite the system and that is good. Anything that can go from eight months to eight weeks will benefit all of those people, especially those involved in real estate transactions.

I think it is important that we try to put in some case studies. In my own community, a disagreement between Transport Canada and Parks Canada actually delayed a project for over a year in the community. As a result of that delay in the project, they are suggesting there are no more funds for the project, which may or may not be true.

It points out that the civil servants themselves, inter-departmentally, have difficulty getting a transaction through the process. Any expediting of the process indeed will be a bonus.

They point out to us that in the internal process, there will be a great deal of accountability. What the process does not uncover, the Auditor General will uncover. What the Auditor General does not uncover, a minister will uncover.

That is the accountability process within the department. Our concern will be at the end of the transactions. Will there be any final accountability? What we are suggesting among other things: one, a land and building inventory which, much to my surprise and I am sure to millions of Canadians, we have not had in place. As I speak, we do not have an inventory of properties in place.

They again assure us that we are in the process of doing that and it will be ready in 1992. Again, you are begged to ask the question: Why not previously? If we have $60 billion of assets, surely we would want them listed. There is an inventory that we believe is coming into place, and that is good.

We are saying that at the end, there should be an accountability clause in place—call it what you will, a depository—for all of the transactions that are completed on a monthly basis or on a bi-monthly basis or whatever, I will leave that up to the government. There should be a depository so that a citizen who is concerned and a citizen who deals with any aspect of Canadian life, be he integrally involved in real estate or not, has access to the depository to find out what the transaction was about and who are the principals.

I understand there would have to be some confidentiality involved in this depository. The government has suggested to me that I can go through the Access to Information Act. May I say that that is a very onerous exercise even for someone who might understand that system.

If the government is truly concerned with accountability for what it does, it will put together and initiate a depository that is extremely available. If the system is squeaky clean as the government is suggesting it will be because of all of the checks and balances of the system, that is great.

We must not only be absolutely squeaky clean, but we must appear to be completely devoid of any possibility of a scandal, a land scandal or whatever. It is not unknown or foreign to some people, mainly past, who have become involved in some of the land dealings.

There has been some innuendo and even court cases as to whether or not all of the government officials had acted in a proper fashion.

This depository would provide that last line of defence, that last safeguard that would prevent any possibility or potential, we believe, for abuse of the process. My friend from Victoria asked had there been an extensive consultation process. I am not aware of one, so I will not suggest that there was not one, but there was no indication from all of the briefing that I had that a consultation process was in place or pursued. But I would suggest that probably those involved would endorse this. I think, for the most part, the intent and most of the content of the bill is positive in nature. We would prefer not to sully the bill or the creator of the bill with any amendments, but there is no indication of any sound rationale yet as to why they would not accept the amendments; in fact, there is some dialogue back and forth suggesting that, yes, we see your point. They are talking about discretion, and there is little discretion within the system, but when it comes down to the final ministerial discretion, that minister may indeed have a tremendous amount of discretion. There is some suggestion that the government may be able to tailor-make land dealings to the benefit of somebody—to a community, for instance. If you had access to property in a community, and the federal government would like to give this piece of property to a city for a minimal amount, like $1, I think that is good. It could be a policy that could be beneficial to everybody and would give a boost to a community that might need a boost—disregarding the market value.

Once again, if we offered this discretion just carte blanche to a minister or to a group of people, this indeed could lead to the concerns we have already mentioned, that people would suggest that things were not exactly as they were and they were politically motivated to dispense of property and/or building. So, even a very positive aspect of the discretionary aspect of the bill could become negative.

It is unfortunate that bills of this nature have to be so complex and technical, and it certainly was an education for me to get into some of the real estate jargon and legalese. I do not fully comprehend all of those aspects but I do understand full well the content. The perception that I have after having spent many hours with this bill is that the only criticism remaining is the accountability at the end of it, which remains vague at best and probably not in place at all.

We have tried to be as positive as possible in describing what is in the bill and our concerns. I do have in my hand endless numbers of clippings dealing with the negative aspects of this bill. It has caused the government in the past—and not only this government but many governments, and many individuals—a great deal of grief. So, the potential is there for scandal. An ounce of prevention, indeed, is worth a pound of cure.

We are suggesting that the depository is a must, before this bill goes forward with the endorsation of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend from Sault Ste. Marie. The bill in subclause 16(2) outlines a set of regulations that the Governor in Council may make. This is a very comprehensive set of regulations which, as I understand it under the scheme of the legislation, is going to govern how real estate transactions of the federal government are to take place. Yet the previous subclause seems to give the Governor in Council the opportunity to simply opt out of any regulations made under the clause.

My friend referred to that in his comments, but I wonder if he would elaborate on the extent of the discretionary authority and particularly the differences between the provisions in this bill and the provisions of the Financial Administration Act which would seem to be more restrictive and, therefore, give this Parliament, if more restrictive, the assurance that the regulations in fact will be the things that govern. In particular, it is because regulations have a public process that they have to go through and if cabinet can simply walk past the regulations, it would seem to me that it might offer some undue scope for an abuse of the process contrary to the intention of Parliament.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the technical question on this technical bill. I suppose it is important because that is probably an aspect of the bill that I did not perhaps spend enough time on, but that is, of course, another concern we have, probably the two major concerns.

If the government in fact is suggesting that all of these new regulations are necessary to address all the potential transactions of the federal government in real property dealings, it begs the question: Why is the opting out clause notwithstanding any regulations necessary?

I am told that under the previous act this opting out clause is there, but it has never been used. Again the question is: If it has never been used for one hundred and some years and it should not have to be used now and forever after, why is the opting out clause there? It touches on the discretionary aspect of the bill that I did highlight, that there is no discretion internally in the process that is excellent, but the government may opt out just by simply saying we opt out of all of the regulations that we have put in place. That is the way I understand that.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments on this bill. First, I would congratulate my friend from Sault Ste. Marie, who has sat next to me throughout this Parliament, on his very clear and competent speech on this bill setting out our position on it.

I would like to, however, add a few comments of my own partly based on my experience from Victoria where we have substantial federal properties, some of them vacant and some of them used, and a series of problems have emerged in the experience that I have had over the last couple of years that this bill, I hope, in part addresses. I would like to see some assurances from the government that it will address others that do not seem now to be covered by the bill.

In the question I put to my friend from Sault Ste. Marie just before I rose to speak on the bill, he dealt with the issue of clause 16 and the opportunity the government has to opt out. He made the very persuasive point that this clause, giving the government the right to opt out, is justified by the government on the basis that it never used it.

It seems to me that we have here an example of almost a conflict of interest that sometimes emerges between the government as government and the majority in the House of Commons, the government acting as the leader of the majority in the House of Commons.

It seems to me that we as parliamentarians, all of us on all sides of the House, because this is not a partisan bill, should be insisting that safeguards of the public interest be written into legislation. Too often the government gets persuaded by its public servants to approve an internal system which is easier to regulate internally and overlooks the need to protect the public interest by a process of public accountability.

Clause 16(1) for example could do with a simple amendment that at any time the Governor in Council intended to exercise its powers under clause 16(1), it must be required in advance to report to a parliamentary committee or some other form of process of that kind so that the spotlight of public attention would be on the transaction, and the government would be obliged to account in the court of public opinion and in the court of this Parliament for its intention to try to explain why it was going around the normal regulations and procedures.

I would endorse as well in that context the recommendation of the member for Sault Ste. Marie for a complete public inventory of federally owned lands. There are, as has already been noted in this debate, 60,000 buildings in this country owned by the federal government, many of them very substantial buildings, 23 million hectares. The annual expenditures on buildings is over $6 billion.

This is a massive public responsibility which the government has in the administration of its lands and buildings. It is all behind closed doors except for the various cumbersome methods of trying to get the details out. The accountability of the government for its management of public lands is a difficult thing for the public to achieve under the present system. This bill does nothing to address that question.

If there is to be an inventory of the government's lands and buildings by December 31 of this year, as the government has assured us, why should that not be part of the legislation? Why should it not be a simple requirement that the government maintain an inventory of all of its land and buildings and further that it maintain a public inventory and registrar of all the transactions? Those transactions are recorded in public land offices across the country. It would be no trick at all for the government to simply duplicate that process in a federal depository of land transactions so that any land transaction that occurred could quickly come to the attention of any member of the public who sought it as a companion to a public inventory of federal government lands.

The practical result of this has come to us in the Victoria area. The Department of National Defence is a major land owner in the Victoria area. Huge lands, much of which, as far as I can surmise, is completely superfluous to the actual usage by the Department of National Defence.

I have been told that there is an inventory being made of this. Even within the government there are pressures from one department to try to take advantage of those lands for public purposes, for example, social housing. I notice the member for Don Mills is in the House. He was the the Minister of Housing and I know his interest had been to improve the availability of federal lands for housing. I know as well that that is a continuing interest of the government in seeking to have more lands available.

The Department of National Defence, with all its surplus lands simply says, apparently: "We may need this some day in the long run and you can't have it". All of that process operates internally to the government.

The time has come to get that out of the back rooms and into the public so that the public can participate in that discussion and departments such as the Department of National Defence are far more clearly held accountable for their stewardship of the lands they have.

In the chosen area of greater Victoria, there is an area called Rocky Point, a huge area of land, to which is adjacent a national marine park, a small park. It would be an extremely good and valuable use of those lands to turn them into a national park. A very small fraction of those lands are now used to store ammunition for the navy.

I am quite confident that there has been no rigorous look at whether those lands are surplus, no imaginative look. The Department of National Defence has hoarded those lands. It seems to me that if this bill is to afford Canadians the assurances that the government says it does, this should be brought out into the public and an opportunity given to look at the extent of surplus lands to government uses and to have a more public process for reviewing surplus lands, having government departments accountable for their use of lands so we can possibly begin to achieve some of the other purposes for which public land and buildings are needed.

A final aspect I would like to address is another public interest in government lands, and that is heritage. There is, again, a good internal system in the government for determining which federal government properties have heritage value. The Federal Heritage Review Board does that job and from everything I can see, does it very well.

The result is that if any other department seeks to use designated federal heritage buildings, it must in effect have that question referred to the review board, and the board will pass judgment on that. That is a good internal process.

Again, it is a process which should be brought out into the open. There should be a statutory provision establishing the heritage review process. There should be a statutory provision that requires reference to the heritage review board whenever an officially designated building is to be treated in some form or another by a federal department.

Again we have an example of that in Victoria, where there is a long standing property, Gonzales Hill, which was used as the first weather station on the west coast and an observation station during World Wars I and II. That building is now largely surplus as a weather station for the meteorological service but it has great heritage value and has been designated heritage.

Another arm of the government has said the land around that building is surplus and should be sold off for expensive luxury housing. That decision has all been internal. If the wishes of the people of Victoria were taken into account, the whole of that property would be preserved in the public domain.

There are negotiations going on to try to achieve that objective. It is important that, in support of the heritage aspects of the federal government's responsibility, this be given some statutory recognition and this would be a very valuable bill to do this.

I propose to be introducing shortly a Private Member's bill to lead to the establishment of a national heritage policy in this country and I will be including those provisions. It would be far more effective if the government took the leadership on this and included these kinds of provisions in this bill.

Heritage of our building in Canada could be achieved in a whole range of ways, including the government establishing a policy that federal heritage buildings which are excess be used by federal departments far more efficiently than they have been so that our heritage can be preserved and maintained.

Let me conclude with a final point with respect to the way in which the federal government approaches its neighbours in planning the use of federal government properties.

Given the nature of this country and the age of buildings, we are now seeing more and more redevelopment across the country. In our area we have Ogden Point, a large parcel of land, a very critical parcel of land on the entrance to Victoria harbour.

In the early days of the development of Victoria, these federal lands were predominantly used for shipping, for the receiving of goods and essentially for industrial use connected with the passage of goods and services through the port of Victoria.

Much of that usage is now becoming obsolete with the change of transportation systems and the changes in the economy. The Government of Canada now has a large piece of very critical land for the development in Victoria that is surplus. What we see, however, is that in the process of redevelopment, the federal government internally proceeding to reach conclusions about the best use of that land with minimal consultation with the local communities and the local municipalities.

That has been the past record. There are signs of improvement. In this case, Transport Canada is the department responsible for the lands and the office in Vancouver has been very forthcoming in beginning a consultative process with the municipality in Victoria, and beginning slowly and tentatively a process of consultation with the community. It is far too tentative, however, far too much dependent upon the good will of particular public servants in particular regions.

I think it is incumbent upon the government, as a manager of real property, to provide a far better statutory base for what is the general policy of the government, that it will not develop its own lands without consent from the local municipality. That is a general policy, but it is a policy which is also honoured at least as much in the breaches of the observance whenever there is a controversy.

In this Ogden Point land I was speaking about, the federal government agreed to the establishment of a heliport which was wanted by some people in the community, but was definitely not desired by others in the community, including the unanimous vote of the council of the city of Victoria. Despite the unanimous vote of the council of the city of Victoria, despite the feeling of the neighbours, the government went ahead with this use. That is simply wrong. It is not a process which should be followed, and it is a process which should be corrected in this bill.

We on this side have a number of concerns about the bill. We appreciate the great importance of improving the system of land transactions. We congratulate the authors of this bill for bringing it forward on that ground. It is an important bill. Anyone who has ever had to have any real estate dealings with the federal government knows that, and we wish to facilitate its adoption. We also want to hear from the government a response to our concerns on the issues that have been raised by the member for Sault Ste. Marie and myself. They are important concerns, ones that we think are shared by many others across this country who have had dealings in this area.

We would like to hear from the government that it is willing to entertain amendments to just tighten up the bill in this respect.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I must admit I perhaps got caught up in the technicalities of the bill. I think the member for Victoria has made a very very good point for all members of Parliament and probably for all Canadians. He obviously has a good handle on what is going on in his own constituency.

I must admit I perhaps do not have that kind of handle, but it points out the impact that the bill could have. We should pay attention to it.

As he was speaking I was trying to say: Do I have any case points to relate? I remember the post office. There was a controversy over the post office as to who was going to renovate the post office. I believe it belonged to Public Works.

As soon as Public Works found out it was going to have to spend money, it said: "It does not belong to us. It belongs to Canada Post." I called Canada Post and it said: "It belongs to Public Works."

If the inventory is in place, it is still having problems. The member has pointed out that there are ramifications of this bill. Certainly, the process of which he spoke has unlimited potential. For instance, we should take a serious look in each constituency in this country with the municipality, the province and the federal government. We should look at our excess lands and get away from: "This is my turf and don't you dare come on to it" and look at it for the benefit of all Canadians.

There is unlimited financial potential. It still staggers my imagination that we could have $60 billion worth of real property in this country.

It is not a question but I would ask the member if he wants to react to what I said.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly react to his modesty in suggesting that he may not be as aware of the problems of his own constituency.

My experience with the member for Sault Ste. Marie since he has come here is that he is one of the most indefatigable constituency members in the country. "Indefatigable" may not be a word in common usage in every part of Sault Ste. Marie, but it means extremely hard working and very knowledgeable about the problems in his constituency.

Beyond that, I think he simply reinforced the point that I have made. I will leave it at that, and I look forward to hearing from the government in response to some of the points that we have suggested.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I have to agree that nobody seems to have the pulse or grasp of these property holdings of the federal government.

I do believe that in committee one could favourably look at the public inventory over federal lands. I think that is a good proposal.

I am wondering since the last comment made by my friend from Victoria. Based on the definition in the bill, I think it is clause 2, the bill would only apply to properties belonging to the federal Crown or of which the federal Crown had power to dispose depending upon how one defines federal real property.

That remains for us to decide in committee. If the Crown corporations, for example, have ownership rights over their holdings, I do not think this bill would apply to these holdings and these properties would not be covered by this bill.

I wonder if the member could confirm this for me. Crown corporations have large holdings of properties in Canada. I am thinking of the national capital region. The National Capital Commission has large holdings.

CMHC in my riding has large holdings which it is intending to dispose of. Does this bill touch Crown corporations in the member's view?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it does not. I and my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie with whom I have consulted agree it ought not to confuse the issue. There is a very distinct set of problems related to lands held by Crown corporations and the government in that capacity.

That is not to say there is not a need for taking a look at how Crown corporations in this country administer their lands and the governments over all responsibility for the administration of all the lands. I would not be surprised at all to find that there are surplus lands that might be used better, and that the government should be following that through.

I know Treasury Board has some functions in that area and has some people working at it. It probably could be done a lot better. I also agree with an earlier comment my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie made about the problems that sometimes occur in a relationship between the two.

In Victoria we have a post office building that is being changed around and Public Works has been very responsive in that case to the needs of the people of Victoria in trying to improve that building, but it is still like pulling teeth and it should be a public process with Crown corporations as well as with the federal government.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): If I could just clarify a couple of points. This act would not apply to the National Parks Act, the Indian Act, the Territorial Lands Act, the Canadian Petroleum Resources Act, the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act and with several Crown corporations. It would not apply to any of those institutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-18, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada—Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada—Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts, be now read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting, for the consideration of this House on second reading, Bill C-18, An Act to Amend the Income Tax and related Acts.

[English]

This bill is, as I am sure hon. members will appreciate, significant in both its physical size and its scope. It includes income tax measures from the 1990 and 1991 budgets, several items announced through press releases in 1990 and 1991, and a large number of technical amendments.

Since the measures were first announced, extensive consultations have taken place between the Department of Finance and taxpayers and their advisers on the more technical aspects of this bill. These consultations have been of great help in identifying ways in which the details of the income tax system could be improved. Those improvements, together with the other amendments included in Bill C-18, will help to maintain and enhance the tax system's equity and efficiency. This goal, in turn, forms an important part of the government's commitment to a healthy Canadian economy.

I would now like to describe some of the major features of this bill, beginning with those income tax measures which form part of the budget brought down by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade, the former Minister of Finance, on February 20, 1990. These measures relate to the taxation of non-residents and life insurers, donations of Canadian cultural property, pension plans and registered education savings plans.

A basic element of the government's tax policy is the fair taxation of all income earned in Canada. The 1990 budget included initiatives to ensure that non-residents who deal in Canadian real estate or who create mutual funds to invest in Canadian real estate are taxed appropriately. The budget also proposed that the tax on financial institutions, introduced as part of tax reform, will be extended to life insurance companies. All of these measures have been incorporated in Bill C-18.

A second 1990 budget item relates to gifts of cultural property. In order to encourage the developments and dissemination of Canadian culture, the Income Tax Act provides special tax treatment for persons who donate cultural property to certain Canadian institutions or public authorities.

Bill C-18 will enhance the role of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board in assessing the value of such property, and will thus streamline the rules governing cultural donations.

A third 1990 budget measure concerns pension funds. For many Canadians, retirement planning centres on a pension fund which invests their own, and their employers' contributions, to provide future income. Before 1990, such funds were subject to a special tax if more than 10 per cent of their assets consisted of foreign property. Recognizing the advantages of investment diversification, this bill includes the 1990 budget proposal to allow pension funds to invest up to 20 per cent of their assets in foreign property by 1994.

The final 1990 budget measure forming part of Bill C-18 is a refinement of the rules relating to registered education savings plans. Changes will limit the total amount that may be contributed in respect of each beneficiary and will allow the payment of benefits to a beneficiary under a new plan only if he or she is a full-time student. Together with other related changes, these amendments will improve controls over the plans.

Other income tax measures included in Bill C-18 were announced in the budget introduced by the former Minister of Finance on February 26 of this year. These include special provisions for Canadians with disabilities and a modification of the taxation of gains on the shares of small business corporations.

In November 1990 the Minister of State Responsible for the Status of Disabled Persons announced a broad government strategy to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. A number of measures in Bill C-18 bring that strategy to bear on the income tax system. First, the disability tax credit will be increased for 1991 from $575 to $700. This will increase federal assistance to disabled Canadians by $35 million a year. As well, the existing criteria for eligibility for the credit will be codified to ensure fair and uniform application.

The medical expense tax credit will also be enhanced by allowing non-working Canadians with disabilities to receive a credit for part-time attendant care and by expanding the list of medical expenses eligible for credit.

The cost of building renovations made to improve access for those with a disability will be deductible by the building owner immediately, rather than over a number of years. Many small businesses have complained to the government in this area and I think this is a major improvement for small businesses and for others to modify their buildings to assure that there is accessibility for those who have disabilities. This, of course, will help them immensely.

Where an employer provides transportation or related benefits to a blind employee or one whose mobility is impaired, or provides an attendant to help a disabled employee perform his or her work, those benefits will not be included in the employee's income. That is another great advantage that we are placing in this bill.

Last, an individual receiving Canada or Quebec Pension Plan disability benefits in a lump sum will effectively be able to have those benefits taxed in the years in which they relate, rather than have the entire amount taxed in the year that it is received.

[Translation]

As I have said, these measures improve the ways in which the tax system delivers benefits to a group of Canadians most in need—those with physical or mental disabilities.

[English]

Another 1991 budget item included in Bill C-18 relates to the tax treatment of small business shareholding. An individual who realizes a capital gain on the disposition of shares of a qualifying small business corporation is eligible for an enhanced capital gains exemption of $500,000. Where a successful private corporation wants to expand, however, and does so by having its shares listed on a prescribed stock exchange in Canada, it will cease to be a qualifying small business corporation.

The enhanced exemption will then be unavailable to the original shareholders, even in respect of gains which accrued while the corporation did quality. Penalizing successful businesses in this way is counterproductive.

In order to allow a corporation to go public without sacrificing its shareholders' enhanced exemption, Bill C-18 will permit an individual to realize some or all of the latent capital gains on the shares without having actually to dispose of them. This measure is in keeping with the federal government's recognition of the pivotal economic role played by small business.

In addition to the income tax measures announced in the 1990 and 1991 budgets, Bill C-18 includes a number of provisions announced separately. Some of these are essentially technical in nature while others present significant tax initiatives. There are, for example, new rules relating to national labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. These will encourage investment in small and developing businesses.

Other important amendments revise the system of tax benefits for residents of Canada's northern and isolated regions, simplify the computation of the investment income tax paid by life insurance companies, and implement what are known as the available-for-use rules for the timing of certain expenses and credits.

The government's commitment to culture and the arts, which I mentioned in describing the new rules for gifts of cultural property, is also reflected in measures included in this bill specifically to benefit artists. Employed artists will be able to claim a deduction for expenses incurred in the exercise of their artistic employment. A self-employed artist who donates certified works to designated institutions or public authorities will be entitled to claim a charitable tax credit without having the value of those works included in income. This is all part of the package of the federal government recognizing the importance of the artist to Canadian culture.

Bill C-18 also includes the package of provisions recently released by the Minister of National Revenue and designed to enhance administration fairness. These provisions give the minister discretion in a number of key areas. For example, the minister will be able to adjust the amount of tax payable and refund any overpayment should a taxpayer discover after the expiry of the normal reassessment period that he or she inadvertently had failed to claim a deduction.

The minister will also be able to waive penalties and interest where an individual has failed to comply with the law because of extraordinary circumstances such as a natural disaster or serious illness. I have run into these problems in my riding with small businesses. I am sure every member of the House has. These measures add significantly to the flexibility and responsiveness of the income tax system.

The final category of provisions included in Bill C-18 consists of a large number of what I call technical amendments. Many of these provide relief for taxpayers in unanticipated situations where the existing law would operate inappropriately. Other provisions ensure the internal consistency of the tax system or clarify ambiguous provisions. A few correct anomalies that unduly favour certain taxpayers and a few reflect minor policy changes. Almost all of the technical amendments formed part of draft legislation released by the government in July 1990 and again in a revised version in February of this year.

The current legislation is, as I noted at the outset of my remarks, the product of extensive consultations with taxpayers and their advisers over that period.

I will not describe the technical amendments in any detail. Instead I refer hon. members to the explanatory notes prepared by the Department of Finance. These describe the entire bill clause by clause in ordinary, or at least relatively ordinary, language, as ordinary as they can get.

In summary, Bill C-18 both legislates a number of important tax measures already announced by the government and improves the income tax system in many technical respects. As a clear expression of the government's concern for the system's fairness and efficiency, this bill deserves the support of the House.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I move:

That Bill C-18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act, and certain related acts not to be referred to Legislative Committee E but be referred after second reading to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The members have heard the motion tabled by the minister. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And fewer than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Fewer than five members having risen, the motion is deemed adopted pursuant to Standing Order 73(3)(b).

Motion agreed to.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for not explaining in detail, either in French or in English, all the complex clauses of this bill. I believe that this bill shows how complex our system of tax law is and also that our economy and society are becoming more complex all the time.

Later, I will say a few words about the complexity of the tax system, but first of all this afternoon, I want to talk about tax reform in general and to take this opportunity to discuss somewhat the fact that after seven years, this government has created a tax system that is less fair and more complex than the one they found in 1984.

[English]

Tax reform is a very complex and complicated matter. As the current Bill C–18 demonstrates, even a bill that contains relatively few controversial matters requires a great deal of paper and many words to explain. This bill runs over 2,000 pages in total, although it is in both languages and I suppose we can find much that few of us in Canada, let alone in the House of Commons, will understand.

Indeed, it is necessary that tax law be complicated. We do deal with a very complex economic system in Canada. There are many aspects of it that needed to be considered in drafting taxation legislation. There is no way to avoid complexity when life itself is complex.

I would like to remind the House of Commons about the purposes behind tax reform when it was first introduced by the government in its white paper on tax reform in 1987. I think it is worth while to review the record of the government on taxation matters in light of the objectives set out by the former Minister of Finance when he introduced his tax reform measures and consider what has happened between 1984 and 1991 in the over-all tax system.

I would like to say that some of the measures of Bill C–18 will be addressed in particular detail by some of my colleagues who are interested in them. In particular, we will be looking at issues related to changes in the method of crediting individuals with disabilities. We will be looking at some of the changes to the international shipping corporation laws. We will be talking about the over-all issue of tax reform and its complexity and, I hope, to some extent about the northern benefits changes contained in Bill C–18.

In 1987 the former Minister of Finance said that tax reform proposals had been designed to meet five broad objectives. The objectives he talked about were: fairness, competitiveness, simplicity, consistency and reliability.

Recently, at a conference held by the Canadian Economic Association at Queen's University, Patrick Grady of Global Economics Limited presented a paper which took stock of the results of tax reform over the recent years of Conservative government in Canada. Many of his comments are noteworthy when we embark on parliamentary consideration of a bill as long and as complex as Bill C–18.

I would like to take into account some of his comments as I consider the objectives set out for tax reform by the former minister to review how the results of the last seven years compare with those.

First of all, fairness. He said the fairness of the tax system should be increased. The Minister of Finance said: "Higher-income individuals and profitable corporations must carry a larger share of the income tax burden than they currently do." He says: "Individuals in similar economic circumstances should be taxed more equitably than they now are. When they are not, there should be valid reasons for different treatment. The reduction of selective preferences will help to achieve this objective."

I suppose when we talk about fairness, nobody would question the premise that the tax system should be fair. I am reminded of the old line that describes most everyone's ideal tax reform and that is: "Do not tax you, do not tax me, tax the guy behind the tree." Everybody wants to pay less tax, and it is a fairer tax system if they pay less and somebody else pays more. That is one way of looking at, but there are some criteria that we generally consider in deciding whether or not we consider a tax system to be fair. Those are principles of equity and in Canada historically we have accepted that we should first of all strive for a system of what we call vertical equity. In other words, based on a person's ability to pay they should pay more. Where they have less ability to pay they should pay less. This concept has led us to the development of a tax system which contains progressive rates so that as you earn more income, as your ability to pay tax increases, you pay a relatively higher share of your income in taxation.

When we look at the results of the years 1984 to 1991, it is not totally clear that that has been the case. What has happened under the years of Tory tax reform is that at the lowest end of the income scale, individuals and families are paying less in tax. That is good. What we find at the top end of the scale is that individuals and families in the highest income categories are also paying relatively less as a percentage of their income. In fact, while we have experienced a massive tax increase between 1984 and 1991, that increase has been focused on those individuals and families in the middle income categories.

According to a study by Mr. Grady of Global Economics: "The equity of the tax system has deteriorated under the Tories. The progressivity of the personal income tax has been reduced with the reduction in top marginal rates and tax rates have been increased sharply on middle income earners".

That is not my conclusion. It is the conclusion of an independent analysis done by Global Economics Ltd. that equity has decreased.

In the context of that, I think it is important to point out that a large number of taxpayers are actually paying more tax in absolute terms as well as in relative terms in 1991. Eighty-six per cent of Canadian families pay more tax in 1991 than they did in 1984, 86 per cent. That I think is reflected in the kind of messages that we hear on a daily basis from our constituents. I do not think that they distinguish particularly between school boards, municipal taxes, provincial taxes, federal taxes, income taxes, sales taxes, excise taxes, user fees and payroll taxes. They are paying them. They are coming out ultimately of the same pocket and the burden of taxation that has increased so much since 1984 is literally crushing the spirit of Canadians.

I want to talk a little bit about the other aspect of equity, horizontal equity as it is called, in other words, the fact that people in similar economic situations should pay the same amount of tax and that those in different ones should pay different amounts. The minister reflected that in his objectives of fairness. I think what strikes me in this area of fairness is the strange things that have happened to the taxation of families in Canada. I indicated a few moments ago that 86 per cent of families in Canada are paying more tax in 1991 than they were in 1984.

The other thing that has happened though is that as one goes up into the middle income category, one finds that the amount of help that there is for families with children has declined significantly.

Let me explain what I mean. If you have neighbours in similar economic situations in which one family has a child and the other does not, and they have the same family income, let me give the amount of extra income after tax these two families will have. They are side by side, maybe in a duplex. They both have $19,000 a year of annual income. One family has a child and one does not. At the $19,000 of family income, the family with a child will have $4,631 in additional support after tax to help pay the expenses of that child. That is good. You can argue about whether it is enough, but it is significant.

In the major urban areas of Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa, $40,000 is not a huge amount of income. The additional after tax income available to a family with a child at $40,000 is only $846.

At $60,000 of income, the family with a child has an additional $230 to try to defray the costs that are associated with a child. I have three children and $230 does not get you through the month of September. It does not go anywhere near paying the additional cost not just of clothing, not just of essentials, but all of the other costs associated with children.

It is now at the point, and this impacts most heavily on low income families, where not only do you have the cost of food and shelter and clothing, but to be involved in the public school system for a child is an expensive proposition. It is now necessary, despite our public education system, for children to have additional books and materials purchased for them. It is necessary to pay for field trips. It is necessary to pay for involvement in extracurricular activities that used to be just accepted as part of our educational supply.

When you consider the importance of children to the future of Canada, you have to ask yourself whether a system which has so minimized the value of supporting children in a family context is on the right track.

There is a similar problem with the issue of legal marriage. This is a strange one. I consider this to be more of an anomaly than simply bad policy. When you look at what has happened to our tax system over the last number of years, we have reached the point where it actually pays for families for the spouses not to be legally married.

One of the objectives of tax reform which I may get to is the concept of neutrality. The idea is that in the economy we want to the tax system to be neutral. We do not want people to make bad business judgments because they are driven by tax consequences. That is the concept of neutrality. Let them make the right business judgment.

Our tax system is not neutral on the issue of matrimony, of all things. This study comes from Statistics Canada, a study printed in Canadian Social Trends in the summer of 1991. Take the example of two people living side by side, each parent earning $25,000. Let us say there are two single parents living side by side earning $25,000 a year with a preschool child. Various expenses will be incurred by them. Let us say there are all kinds of things happening and they decide to live together. The choice is, do they simply move into one apartment together and live in a common law relationship or do they marry and move in together? Surely, Mr. Speaker, you would agree with me that the tax system ought not to have too much to say about that.

There are lots of other considerations and values that ought to go into that question of whether people ought to live together or whether they should marry. The tax system has a lot to say about what they do.

According to the Statistics Canada survey, the benefit in simply living together over marrying for these two people in one year is $3,758 and that does not even take into account the cost of holding a wedding ceremony and a dinner at a local hotel.

I think that is more in a category of anomaly than simply bad policy but it has become, because of its anomalous result, bad policy. It is one that needs a focus of policy makers on that issue. Really, the underlying issue is not so much whether people should marry but the issue is what should be the appropriate unit of taxation. It is a complicated issue, but when we have gone through seven years of tax changes which have included such things as taxing back family allowances, old age security benefits and when we have moved from a system of exemptions to credits, and so on, we have taken what used to be perhaps a minor difference and we have made it into a very large difference. I would argue in favour of neutrality when it comes to that question.

The next thing the minister talked about back in those golden days of 1987 when he was going to reform the tax system was that the tax system should encourage competitiveness, growth and jobs.

I want to remind the House that the tax reform came in two phases. We had phase 1, income tax reform, which essentially consisted of lowering the top marginal rates, broadening the tax base a bit, trying to prepare people for the 1988 election with some lower tax rates.

Phase 2 was sales tax reform, brought in safely after the election, with the imposition of the GST in January of this year. When you look at this objective of competitiveness, growth and jobs and you think about what has happened as a result of the imposition of the GST, you have to give the government really top marks for what it has accomplished. It has stimulated incredible growth in jobs, in building shopping malls in border cities in the United States.

What has happened here is that in talking about competitiveness, growth and jobs, we have actually had a sharp increase in income tax rates over seven years, despite the lowering of the top marginal rate as a result of phase 1 in tax reform.

Second, we have had the introduction of the goods and services tax. Going back to Mr. Grady's study, he quotes the minister: "As the minister has reminded us on many occasions, lower marginal personal tax rates increase the incentive to work, save and invest. They also encourage initiative and risk taking."

What he then concludes, as I read earlier, is that the system has become rather unfair. He also goes on to say that the marginal personal tax rates that are in effect in 1991 are for most people higher than they were in 1984. As he points out: "14.2 million individuals would be facing a higher federal marginal tax rate in 1991 than they did in 1984; only 4 million would have a lower marginal tax rate".

The average marginal tax rate—and that is the rate of tax you pay at the last dollar that you earn—is higher in all brackets except for the two highest where total income exceeds $100,000 per year, higher in all brackets except the two highest.

"The magnitude of the increase in average marginal rates is particularly striking in the $30,000 to $40,000 income range at which the increase is 8.4 per cent and 7.1 per cent, respectively".

This has got to be a very harsh indictment of the results of seven years of controlling taxes, but that is where we came to after those seven years. The very people whom you want to have motivated, busy, active, out creating opportunity and jobs are the people who are facing the highest increase in their tax rates.

On top of that, you have the imposition of the GST. All other criticisms aside, it was brought in at a time when the economy was going through a recession, when the Bank of Canada was pursuing a monetary policy designed to stop inflation in its tracks and when it was known to the government as well as to everyone who took an interest in this that the imposition of the GST would provoke inflation.

The member opposite asks: "How much?" He should know that it is provoking over 1 per cent on an annualized basis, which is a significant addition to the rate. You might argue that if it were not for the recession, the rate of inflation induced by the GST might be higher.

On top of that, still talking about the minister's objective of competitiveness, growth and jobs, we have had a continuing increase, not just at the federal level but including the federal level, in payroll taxes, which is a very heavy burden on small business.

I know there have been those who have written in favour of getting rid of the lower tax rate on small business. I think Professor Brooks, for example, has proposed that the lower rate of tax on small business be done away with.

That lower rate only goes part way in compensating for the relatively heavier burden borne by small business as a result of payroll taxes in general, and recently the increases in the unemployment insurance contributions by employers.

That came at a time in the business cycle, beginning in July of this year, when we may have just been coming into a recovery. That payroll tax was like a wet blanket being dropped on top of that shaky recovery. It adds to the burden every small business owner faces in dealing with expanding employment opportunities within a firm.

The payroll tax, like the unemployment insurance contribution, is not based on profit. It is based on the number of people working for the employer. Whether the firm is profitable or not, the payroll taxes are collected.

Rather than encouraging competitiveness, growth and jobs, I would suggest that the last few years have done quite the opposite in terms of tax reform in Canada.

Next he says: "The tax system should be simpler to understand and comply with"; the old objective of simplicity. Here is this year's contribution to simplicity, Bill C-18, all 2,000 pages of it. That is what we are doing to simplify this, which is my most recent version of the Income Tax Act.

It is now running, including the tax conventions and so on that are attached to it on very thin paper, at about 1,470 pages to which these changes are being made. I would love to take these on an airplane with me, but unfortunately, they will not fit under the seat in front of me.

Simplicity is an illusive goal. Anyone who takes this on has to acknowledge, as I said earlier, that our society is complex. The very fact that the minister drags it out and talks about simplicity as being an objective of tax reform in the context of putting out bills on an annual basis, virtually, that look like this one is laughable beyond belief.

I wish I had brought in with me a booklet I received in my constituency office from the government on plain English for use in government publications. I suspect though, that if we put the Income Tax act into plain English, it might be somewhat more difficult for me to lift up than this version.

His next objective was: "The tax system should be internally consistent and consistent with other government programs". That is a tough one. We have looked at some of the peculiarities of our system. For example, we have this tax-back. Some people call it a clawback on old age security and on family allowances.

There we have programs that operate completely at variance with the tax system. We have a program that says in the case of old age security that we are going to ensure that every person qualifying for old age security has a certain minimum amount which they receive as a right of citizenship. They have paid for it through their taxes over the years and, in some cases, between 1952 and 1971, they paid for it with a special targeted earmarked tax for their old age security.

In the case of family allowances, we have a system that says children are important. We are going to make sure that people with children have some additional support from the state to help them, regardless of their income level. Everybody with children is contributing to the future of Canada and they should get this help. Those are the social policies.

On the tax side, we have a bizarre system in which if you have income in excess of $50,000, you are going to find those benefits taxed back. There is a lack of consistency in approach there, particularly if we look at the strange situations in which the recipients of the old age security are taxed based on their incomes and likewise with the family allowance. There could be two members of the same family adding up to the same total income and not suffering the tax back implication. It is not based on family income, it is based on individual income. It is a lack of consistency.

Those are changes that have come in since this paper by the former minister was produced.

He says: "The tax system should provide a more reliable and balanced source of revenues to finance essential public services". In terms of reliability and sources you would have to give him a pretty good passing grade on that. He has raised taxes in every category of taxation, save one, and that was the corporate income tax. A strange omission, that one seems to have been reduced in rates but the others were increased. Personal income taxes have gone up significantly, as I previously mentioned. Revenue from payroll taxes has gone up. Revenue from sales and commodity taxes has gone up and the rate of tax on corporate income has gone down.

He says: "The tax system should provide a more reliable source of revenues". In terms of reliability, I think what we have to say is that the reliability depends on the willingness of people to accept the system and to pay it on a self-enforcing basis.

It has been the tradition in Canada that we have a system of self-assessment and self-enforcement. The audit provisions that are pursued by Revenue Canada are ones that rely heavily on the presumption that virtually all Canadians accept willingly the obligation to pay their income tax and I believe Canadians continue to feel that way.

What I fear though, is that in the past years the tax burden has become so onerous and the anger that Canadians feel about what they consider to be a lack of fairness is so great that the system of self-assessment is going to break down.

People in my constituency and I know in other constituencies as well are repeatedly saying to me that they are paying too much and they are getting too little value for what they are paying. That to me is a warning that if we do not get this system working right with a perception that it is fair, we are going to begin to pay the price of the breakdown of the self-assessment system.

There are a number of things that I think the government has done that have provoked a sense of unfairness and there are some things that I think are still there for it to consider, if it will look at them, in trying to make the perception of the system more fair.

One of the things that has contributed to the lack of fairness is the sense that somehow people at the top end get a lot of breaks and people in the middle get to pay all the bills. What has contributed to that? Partly the reduction in rates at the top end. The marginal rate has been reduced at the top brackets. Also, the reality is that there are many things that high income taxpayers can do to reduce or avoid paying income tax that are not really available to those people in the middle categories. It is all they can do to pay their bills as they become due and enjoy a reasonable quality of life.

There are some things that this government introduced that have added to that and I am thinking particularly here of the capital gains exemption. It started out to be $500,000. It was reduced finally to $100,000 except for farms and small businesses. On that $100,000 capital gains exemption that enables taxpayers to not pay tax on their first $100,000 of lifetime capital gains, those gains can be realized on property that is not even Canadian.

The object of that tax exemption was to try to encourage investment and to encourage risk taking, but the exemption, as it applies, is equally applied to things like condominiums in Florida or in Spain and to stocks and bonds that are held in foreign countries. The capital gains exemption applies to all of those. I do not understand what is gained by Canada, even on the theory that the government proposed it, by an exemption that is so broadly based. I would suggest to the government that it simply eliminate the $100,000 capital gains exemption.

Canadians also wonder when they hear the annual taxation statistics why there are still people in very high income categories who do not pay any tax. If you look at the statistics and try to analyse them, there are are only a few reasons for that. One is that they have suffered losses in previous years or sometimes they have suffered losses in subsequent years and they have applied back in other businesses. A loss is a loss and nobody prefers avoiding tax to paying tax when it means they had to lose money in order to do it. I can accept that one but in the vast majority of other cases you will find that high income Canadians who are in a position to borrow heavily because of other assets that they have are capable of sheltering all of their income from tax with the carrying charges incurred against the loans made.

It has been the case in the past that we have looked at the possibility of limiting the exemption for carrying charges to income earned from sources for which the money was borrowed. I would suggest to the government that if it wants to increase the perception of fairness, it should look at the issue of carrying charges and some method of limiting that deduction so that everybody is paying their fair share of tax.

At the corporate level, year after year we have examples of very profitable corporations that do not pay any tax. That creates a perception on the part of ordinary Canadians that the system is not right, that something simply is not clicking, it is not fair.

What I would suggest to the government on that is that it re-examine the system of deductibility of dividends when they are paid and make sure that all corporations that have extra cash available to pay out in dividends have paid the underlying tax on the profits that they earn. If they are paying them between companies, they pay them tax free if the receiving company owns more than 10 per cent of the shares of the company paying the dividends. If they are paying them to individuals, we give individuals a tax credit on dividends that are paid. That credit is supposed to recognize the fact that the corporation paying the dividend has paid underlying tax on the corporate profits that were earned.

If that is true then it is fine. In some cases however, either because of the ability to write off certain kinds of assets or because of other special treatment given to corporations, tax may not have been paid.

Consequently, you have to wonder on behalf of the rest of the poor taxpayers that are paying their full share, why is it that a corporation paying money out—obviously it does not still need the money or it would not be paying it out as dividends—should still have their shareholders enjoy the benefit of a dividend tax credit supposedly to compensate for the corporate tax that was already paid when it has not been paid.

These are the things that Canadians are demanding the government look at to ensure that the system is fair. People are willing to accept a heavy burden of taxation. That has been demonstrated by Canadians provided two things happen, first of all that they are satisfied that the system is fair, second that they are satisfied they are getting some value for the money they are paying.

When you think about it, that is not really all that much to ask. I suggest as we work our way through these 1,500 pages of Bill C-18, that we bear in the back of our minds those two questions. Is it fair? Are the folks getting value for their money?

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, when the Public Service strike was in progress, my office received many calls imploring the government to legislate them back to work but insisting that we retain our credibility in the area of fiscal responsibility by adhering to the zero, three, three per cent increase.

Today these same people are expressing displeasure for a system which will allow the public servants in upper management positions to receive a bonus while denying salary increases to a lower income public servant.

This policy was created by the Liberal government in 1981 and does not reflect the stringent fiscal policy and commitment to restraint of our Conservative government. The fact that the criteria in this case was satisfied is not enough. Our government must provide equity and fairness for all. Our upper income public servants now enjoy wages equal to their private sector compatriots. Is it not now time to do away with this outdated system of bonuses?

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, of all the factors in our economy that contribute to cross-border shopping such as taxes and the goods and services tax in particular, the discrepancy in the price of gasoline between Canada and the United States is no doubt the largest single contributor to the problem.

This is best illustrated if we examine the number of gas stations per capita in the U.S. border towns compared to similar sized communities in Canada where dozens of gas stations have been forced to close due to lost sales.

Since the government is losing money on gas purchased in the U.S. anyway, would it not make sense to drop the 8.5 cents a litre excise tax on gasoline for Canadians in order to recapture lost gasoline sales and at the same time remove the main reason that same day shoppers go to the U.S. in the first place.

WORLD HABITAT DAY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has declared today, October 7, World Habitat Day.

This year's theme is shelter and living environment. Shelter is a basic necessity. It is widely acknowledged that the ability of citizens to acquire decent, safe and clean housing is an important goal for all societies. Whether it is local or international, good housing is more than shelter. It is also seen as an important contributor toward better health, better education, better employment and ultimately a more productive society.

As one of the best housed nations in the world, Canada has an important role to play, both at home and abroad. In support of this United Nations effort, World Habitat Day, I encourage all Canadians to acknowledge the significance of proper shelter and a better living environment for all citizens of the world.

DISARMAMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the last week we have seen major developments in the area of disarmament. We have seen President Bush's initiatives on unilateral cutbacks in the United States and on Saturday night President Gorbachev made an equally dramatic announcement about cutbacks in the Soviet Union.

Yet we have seen nothing from the Canadian government except a fawning response to President Bush's initiatives. There are a number of very critical things which Canada can do. For example, Canada can today say there will be no more cruise missile testing in this country. We can say there will be no more visits to Canadian ports of vessels carrying nuclear weapons or which refuse to certify that they are not carrying nuclear weapons.

Since the current Secretary of State for External Affairs took office there has been a virtual silence on the idea of a world summit on arms trade. There have been no initiatives about the Arctic or the Pacific. It is time Canada took initiatives—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I just received the following message from letter carriers and postal workers around Val-d'Or, in Abitibi:

"We agreed, in good faith, to accept a mediator suggested by your government, and we even agreed to go back to work. Since the strike, the employer has used disciplinary measures and other tactics against employees as part of its provocation strategy. The mediation process before Justice Allan B. Gold is a one-way street, since Canada Post refuses to negotiate in good faith, hoping that eventually, your government will intervene in its favour with special legislation. We enjoin you to demand that Canada Post negotiate seriously and do so as soon as possible."

FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of State for Transport said she would not give a permanent commitment to the Wood Islands ferry service. The Wood Islands ferry is a vital link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland that will continue to be needed in the future, whether or not a fixed link is built.

The government says that it will not make any short-term decisions. That is the same thing this government said about VIA Rail in Prince Edward Island and we know where it is today.

The people of eastern Prince Edward Island will not stand for the government's "use it or lose it" policies. We depend on the Wood Islands ferry to transport our goods to market and it is a vital link for tourism. The government must come clean with the people of eastern Prince Edward Island and make a permanent commitment to the Wood Islands ferry service.

FISHERIES

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, the special fisheries support program announced last Friday by the Hon. John Crosbie and the Hon. Bernard Valcourt will bring much needed support to communities on Quebec's Lower North Shore.

[English]

We recall that the fishermen and plant workers of the lower north shore communities could not start the fishing season until the end of July because of severe ice conditions in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the Labrador coast. Decreases in groundfish catches were so drastic that the majority of fishermen and both men and women plant workers could not obtain the minimum number of weeks of work to maintain their unemployment insurance eligibility.

• (1410)

The special support program for the fisheries and processing industry will enable fishermen and plant workers to work and take training courses while participating in the restructuring process that has already started in the industry on the Lower North Shore.

[English]

Both ministers should be commended for this comprehensive program.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, this is National Family Week and I wish to commend all those who have worked diligently to ensure its success. The family unit is a cornerstone of our society. It is a source of encouragement and support for each member. It is a cradle of the values and ideals which helped shape our nation.

[Translation]

In modern society, the State is asked to play a major role in the development of future generations. We need social programs and tax policies that benefit Canadian families with children. Every Canadian child should have an opportunity to attain its full potential.

Tragically, one Canadian child out of six grows up in poverty. Everyone who supports social justice must show more concern for children who are growing up in such adverse conditions.

Family Service Canada is doing remarkable work by making us aware of the changing needs of families today and by putting pressure on governments to take concrete action to respond to those needs.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, last Friday witnessed the largest meeting of farmers in the history of Nova Scotia. Over 600 farmers from all over the province gathered at Canning to discuss and demonstrate their concern that the system of supply management, the basis for Atlantic agriculture, not be bargained away at the GATT negotiating table.

These Nova Scotian farmers unequivocally rejected the concept of tariffication as an acceptable alternative to supply management. As one farmer said, "If tariffication replaces supply management I am out of business, my livelihood lost".

The meeting unanimously passed a resolution reaffirming the support of Nova Scotian farmers for Canada's December, 1990 position at the GATT negotiations and unequivocally indicated that any deviation from that position would be completely unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, I too stood in support of that motion. I call upon the Prime Minister and the government to give Atlantic farmers a clear statement that the government will hold firm on the issue of supply management and on the need for the preservation and clarification of Article XI of GATT.

MINING

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the Tories' economic policy gets an "F" for failure. Canamax Resources Inc. is shutting down its Bell Creek division gold mine in Timmins, putting approximately 100 people out of work.

Why? Is it the high production cost? No. Is it the low-grade ore? No.

A fixation with trying to battle inflation with high interest rates is pushing our dollar to record high levels. The high dollar is adding to the cost of the mining industry and reducing its competitiveness. At the same time it is getting less income because of the lower price of gold.

The government must reverse policies that are destroying the mining industry and putting thousands of people out of work. These policies have put this country into a recession and will slow any recovery.

Come to the rescue of the mining industry now. Lower the dollar.

STATEMENTS MADE BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, what a sorry spectacle Pierre Elliott Trudeau has once again made of himself. His statements on the distinct society are unjustified, untrue and malicious.

Some hon. members: Right on!

Mr. Pronovost: What he said further exacerbates relations between Francophones and Anglophones.

Mr. Trudeau's remarks were a golden opportunity for the Bloc Québécois, Jacques Parizean and Gérald Larose, who can look shocked and offended to their heart's content.

The man who did everything to kill Meech Lake is no more than a petty advocate of revenge. Now he wants to prevent Canada and the government from achieving a new constitutional agreement that would get our country out of its present impasse, as if the country couldn't get along without him.

We all know that Mr. Trudeau is still the real leader of the Liberal Party of Canada and that he manipulates his successor and his successor's entourage, who should have the courage to denounce him publicly.

Some hon. members: They don't have the guts!

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, this government's record on youth policy is becoming a serious national concern.

At a time when our country is preparing to compete globally, this government continues to clearly demonstrate lack of insight and understanding of how a globally competitive society is achieved.

It is not achieved by having a youth unemployment rate of 17 per cent, by reducing our commitment to post-secondary education, research and development, by having a training strategy which is seriously questioned and doubted by our business community, by lack of concrete action on our 30 per cent high school drop-out rate or our 20 per cent illiteracy rate.

As a nation, we are in desperate need of immediate solutions to these fundamental challenges, all important prerequisites for achieving global competitiveness. In this vital process to the future of our nation, our youth must be full partners. It is our responsibility to lead the way.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, over the last few days in this House I have tried to address some of the misinformation being spread by those who oppose the idea of putting property rights back in the Canadian Constitution.

This is an historic and important right first enshrined in the Magna Carta of 1215, reinforced by the 1948 UN Declaration of Human Rights, and contained in the 1960 Canadian Bill of Rights.

Today's myth about property rights is that there is no real need for them. This myth was furthered this weekend by an article in The Toronto Star, and I quote:

> There is no suggestion that land owners are being exposed to arbitrary expropriation without compensation. No legislatures are stomping over property rights. No courts are routinely denying due process to people seeking to protect their property.

This is untrue and unfounded. There are countless examples on record of people losing their land through expropriation or having the value of their land reduced through zoning and other regulations without just compensation.

This is unfair. Why do we need property rights? Let us ask Karl Marx. "The theory of the Communism", he said, "may be summed up in a single sentence"—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Security Intelligence Review Committee made its annual report public.

In light of the Persian Gulf war, the Al-Mashat affair and the Oka crisis, one would think it has been a busy year for CSIS. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service has indeed improved since it was created in 1984. However, in its report, the review committee concludes by giving CSIS an absolute clean bill of health. According to the report, every operation undertaken by CSIS and reviewed by the committee was just fine.

In past years the SIRC did not shy away from criticising the operations of the CSIS and the focus of its investigation. Has the review committee lost its bite? Has it even lost the ability for whistle-blowing?

The committee acknowledged that CSIS uses information passed on by the Communications Security Establishment, the ultra-secret listening apparatus of the Canadian government. CSIS cannot obtain such information on its own, but there are no laws that stop the CSE and the committee has failed to warn Canadians of that danger.

Does this government intend to statutorily mandate the CSE and make it fully accountable to Parliament? Will we need another McDonald Commission into the abuses of yet another spy agency before we admit that the threat to Canadians is real?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Today the Yugoslavian federal military attacked the Croatian capital of Zagreb. At least two missiles were launched. One just missed the Croatian Parliament and another landed near a 13th century cathedral.

The U.S. consulate in Zagreb has urged all remaining American citizens, including journalists, to leave Croatia.

Can the minister inform this House what is the situation of the Canadians in Croatia today and what kind of instructions have they received from the Canadian Embassy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the Leader of the Opposition that the government is very concerned with the development of events in Croatia. We have spoken to our colleagues and people in the European community to ensure that we have full consultation with them. All countries are condemning the breach of the cease-fire. We think it is very important that the parties respect the agreement that was reached last week.

At this point I am not briefed on the specific answer to my colleague's question, but I will get an answer for him as soon as I can.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

As I have already said, the city of Zagreb was bombarded today by the federal army. The European community has already stated that economic sanctions would be imposed, probably as early as this evening.

Therefore, I ask the minister: Does the government intend to impose economic sanctions on Yugoslavia, as the European community intends to do, if a cease-fire is not declared by the end of the day?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly an option that is under consideration in consultation with our colleagues in the European community, but it is a question that we have not decided on. We want to follow very closely the progress of events. As I indicated in my previous response, we are very concerned by the developments since the cease-fire agreement.

If this is a way which can bring people to their senses in that country then certainly that is an option that bears close consideration, but at this point no decision has been taken.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the minister.

It was not long ago that the government seemed very keen on the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the CSCE, a great institution for peace and security in Europe.

Now that we have a chance to use CSCE, the government seems to be a little bit less enthusiastic. In fact the hon. minister a few minutes ago referred to the community alone while the CSCE conference includes more countries and many of these other countries have quite an interest with some partners within Yugoslavia.

I would like to ask the minister: Why has Canada not asked for an emergency meeting of foreign ministers of the CSCE to deal with the tragic situation in Yugoslavia today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the meeting that has just completed in Moscow did not have as part of its mandate the consideration of the matters in Yugoslavia. However, I should advise my hon. friend that later this week, I believe on Thursday, there will be a meeting of officials who will discuss, under the auspices of the CSCE, the situation in Yugoslavia with a view to seeing whether there is some influence that can be brought to bear by that organization on the terrible situation in Yugoslavia.

DAVID MILGAARD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Last September the Prime Minister, in a visit to Winnipeg, met with Mrs. Joyce Milgaard, the mother of David Milgaard, and at the time said that he would make representations to the minister to reopen immediately the David Milgaard case in light of new evidence that had been presented.

It is now going on four weeks since that commitment has been made. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if she is now in a position to announce the reopening of the David Milgaard case for another trial which he so properly deserves.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think, with respect, the hon. member has not accurately conveyed the Prime Minister's comments to Mrs. Milgaard. They were with respect to the fact that he would look into the question of her son's health and his condition at Stony Mountain Penitentiary.

He did that immediately, and I am advised that penitentiary officials have discussed a possible transfer with Mr. Milgaard and those discussions are continuing.

I have indicated in this House before that the application is in my office. I am advised by the department that it will be on my desk soon, and I will deal with it as expeditiously as possible.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, with all indulgence, if the minister would look at the transcript of the Prime Minister's remarks, she would know that the Prime Minister understood that Mr. Milgaard's health is directly related to the long time he has been waiting for this government to reopen his case. I can only urge the Minister of Justice to do it with as quick a dispatch as possible.

I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Solicitor General. At the same time the Prime Minister was again given a request that for the sake of his emotional and physical well-being Mr. Milgaard be granted a transfer to another institution pending the outcome of the justice minister's appraisal and review of his case.

I want to ask the Solicitor General if he is now in a position to announce the acceptance of that request and if Mr. Milgaard will be moved to another institution awaiting the Minister of Justice's decision.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my friend for his interest in this matter. I think at this time it would be appropriate to share with the House a letter from the Prime Minister to Mrs. Milgaard in which he said: "I wish to inform you that the warden of the Stony Mountain institution has spoken to your son about the possibility of a transfer to another institution, but your son was not prepared to discuss it at that time. Please be assured that the prison authorities remain open to consider the possibility of a transfer should your son wish to raise the request again".

I would say to the House that I am not in a position to release any further material in this matter because of Privacy Act considerations, but I want to assure the House that every effort is being made to accommodate Mr. Milgaard.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. In the last 10 days we have seen rallies and demonstrations in a number of Canadian provinces: Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. We know that there are a number of rallies planned for the next couple of weeks.

Since the government has known about this situation for so long, why has the government not announced a program to save the farms and rural communities in Canada? Why has it waited so long?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I do not believe we have waited so long. We have been on to this problem starting back as early as last spring when we established a third line of defence committee to look at this issue, to identify the shortfall in income. That process has continued.

I attended a meeting of that committee in the first week of September. The Prime Minister met with the same committee last Friday. That committee is going to be making recommendations to us.

I would point out that this process is something that farmers are themselves involved in. Once we see the recommendations coming from the committee then we will be in a position to make a decision.

I reject out of hand the fact that it has taken so long. In fact, it is the other way around. We have seen this coming and we have had farmers working with the government to deal with this very serious issue.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the thousands of people who have been showing up at rallies in each of these provinces indicate that they cannot wait for the government to study and study and consult and consult. It has had many months.

The former Minister of Agriculture who is now the Minister of Finance has had time. Is the government going to make up the shortfall of approximately $1 billion in farm income this year? Is there a commitment from this government to make up that shortfall? The farmers want to know.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, at the meeting on Friday with the farm leaders, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and myself, the Prime Minister made a commitment to provide some shortfall money in addition to the programs that are already in place.

I would point out that because of this government there are two safety net programs in place which were not there a year ago that will provide, if everyone makes use of the programs, over $1.5 billion in support between now and Christmas and over $1 billion in the first six months of this year.

On top of the commitment that the Prime Minister made on Friday, there is going to be some substantial money available to farmers this fall. We know that that is not the total solution. That is why we are pushing so hard to get a resolution to this international foolishness at the GATT which sees farmers in Canada damaged by a trade war between the Europeans and the Americans.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that even if they were to resolve the issue according to their request at the GATT, it would only increase farm income about 10 per cent in this country.

My question for the minister is: When will the government make a commitment to resolve the problem that exists right now? We know that farmers are losing their farms. We know that small businesses in rural Canada are going under. The people involved in those demonstrations want a commitment from the government now. When will that be made?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, again at the meeting on Friday, asked myself and the Minister of Agriculture report to him by this Friday on what we propose to do in conjunction with working with the Minister of Finance.

I would like to say to the hon. member that if he wants to help farmers, he should talk to the labour people at Thunder Bay to get them back to work. This would help farmers at a very critical time, because what is going on at Thunder Bay hurts everyone. It hurts the seaway system. It hurts farmers. It hurts everyone.

The hon. member should talk to his labour people and get grain moving at Thunder Bay.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last Friday Boeing announced that starting next year 1,300 high-tech jobs at de Havilland, one-quarter of its work force, would be eliminated.

• (1430)

Rather than watching and allowing de Havilland to bleed, why will this government not immediately restore public and international confidence in de Havilland by declaring its unconditional support and partnership in order to protect the jobs, the research and indeed the future of de Havilland and our aerospace industry, regardless of what the private sector does or does not do.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. member has in mind by the code words he is using, but let me be quite specific with him.

We have been working closely with the Province of Ontario and with the Boeing Company. I have also personally spoken to the officials and representatives of Aerospatiale in order to try to develop a very precise list of what the options might be for de Havilland at this time. Those discussions are continuing.

It is unfortunate but the decision of the European Community has put this acquisition by Aerospatiale and Alenia into a very uncertain position. It might well kill the deal completely, in which case the position of de Havilland is a very serious one indeed.

We are looking at various options and if I have anything to report to the House I will do so.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the European Community launched this action back in June. The government has had four months to work on alternatives. Surely it does not need more studies. Surely it had a contingency plan in its back pocket.

Mr. Speaker, when this government gave away de Havilland plus $60 million without a single job guarantee, the then President of the Treasury Board promised Canadians that this deal would, "strengthen de Havilland and provide for secure jobs".

Now Boeing wants out. It is cutting jobs and has threatened a plant closure. Will this government immediately order a public inquiry into its botched privatization and the future of de Havilland.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member can use those words. The position of de Havilland today is very seriously impacted by the recession and by the serious state of the commuter airline market.

If the hon. member wishes to look around at some of de Havilland's competition, he will find that each one of these companies is suffering from the same problems. In addition, there is the uncertainty as to what would happen with the acquisition proposal by A and A of de Havilland.

My friend says we have known about this since early spring. Yes, we had, but we had been given advice by A and A, who should know best, that it was their best judgment that the commission would approve the deal. In fact, it did not, as we found out last Wednesday.

My hon. friend says we gambled and we are wrong. He is wrong again, because it was the advice we received from Aerospatiale and Alenia which told us that they thought the commission would approve the deal.

TRADE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The U.S. administration has taken unprecedented action against our softwood lumber industry by demanding that our producers post bonds before any countervailing determination has been made. This action is not only harassment but it is contrary to international trade law.

What action is the government prepared to take against this violation of international trade law?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I stated very clearly that in this case I do agree with my colleague from Cochrane—Superior. The action on the part of the U.S. government is contrary to international trade law and, as I said previously, we are looking at various options.

At a minimum, we are taking to the GATT our contention that stumpage rights cannot be considered as a subsidy. That is something we will be launching shortly.

What other options we might have is something I am not in a position to say at this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since 1987, the Canadian softwood lumber industry has been devastated by the export surcharge on lumber and this government's economic policies. Why did the government take so long to take this case to GATT?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have acted to deal with the issue, to terminate the memorandum of understanding.

We had determined to terminate the memorandum of understanding because we believed it had served its purpose. The memorandum of understanding was cancelled as of midnight last Thursday night. The Americans have announced their response and it is something we oppose. We have made it very clear to the Americans that we are in opposition to them. They understand the position very clearly.

We will be working with the industry and with the provinces in support of their position in the countervailing action that the U.S. administration has launched. With the full co-operation of the industry, the provinces and the federal government, I am quite confident we are going to succeed.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this question a little further with the minister.

The minister has suggested this is contrary to GATT. I want to ask the minister if this is not also completely contrary to the specifics of the free trade deal. Is this not something which proves that as far as President Bush is concerned, the free trade deal is meaningless when powerful interests from the United States start to pressure him and make him forget his professions of friendship with this country. Is this not an action which runs directly counter to the free trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat myself.

I said that this action on the part of the U.S. administration is contrary to international trade law. By our termination of the memorandum of understanding, we will succeed in bringing the trade in softwood lumber under the free trade agreement where it will be subject to the normal dispute settlement mechanisms that have worked well in the past.

In 1986 we did not have the free trade agreement in place and we did not have the dispute settlement mechanism as an ultimate source of appeal. Now we have it and we are going to make use of it in the event that the actions under the countervailing duty investigation are unsatisfactory.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, Canadian lumber producers are already being hurt by the actions taken by the United States.

These actions were taken unilaterally under section 301 of the trade regulations. Is this unilateral action on the part of the United States not directly contrary to the free trade agreement? Does it not mean that it is possible, not in six months but right now, for the government to take action under the trade deal to get these bonds which are supposed to be put in place eliminated and rolled back? Can he not take action right this day?.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the trade in softwood lumber was not subject to the free trade agreement prior to last Thursday at midnight. By our actions in terminating the memorandum of understanding, we have brought trade in softwood lumber under the free trade agreement.

The United States has taken some action which we disagree with fundamentally, but it is its right under the free trade agreement to take those actions as we could if we were in the same position it is.

What my hon. friend should be complimenting the government for is that we have a dispute settlement mechanism that we did not have in 1986 that can protect us as we go through the process of the trade remedy legislation which the U.S. has in place. We do have protection today that we did not have in 1986.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the government said in this House last week, performance bonuses to government appointees and the heads of Crown corporations started in this country in 1987 as a result of the report of an advisory committee appointed by this Prime Minister. At that time he publicly said: "I have no quarrel with paying somebody top dollar, but I also believe in disclosure".

I ask the government: Why then has it for the past three years approved these bonuses to heads of Crown corporations and the like while refusing to release the figures to the people who are footing the bill, the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I explained several times last Friday and as was explained by the President of the Treasury Board prior to that, the total remuneration to Crown corporation agency heads is based on recommendations from an independent committee, the establishment of which was made by the previous government, and I think the same chairman is there today as was there under the previous government.

Part of the pay, up to 10 per cent, between zero and 10 per cent, is by way of performance pay. It has been the policy of the Government of Canada for as long as I can remember—perhaps he can ask his leader whether it was in place when he was President of the Treasury Board—that pay levels of senior public servants in this country are given in terms of ranges. This is out of respect for privacy and so on.

That has been the policy of the government and remains the policy of the government, the pay ranges. As I said before and as the President of the Treasury Board said before, the performance pay can be between zero and 10 per cent. For the last fiscal year, that is 1989-90, it represented 4.8 per cent, I believe.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the minister is trying to rewrite history. The employees of the Canada Employment centres across Canada got their performance gifts this year. They got mugs and lapel pins. The mugs were made in Taiwan and the lapel pins were stamped "made in the U.S.A." So much for Canadian employment at Canada Employment.

I want to ask the minister of employment if he is aware that a movement has started now—it started in Newfoundland on Friday; it is spreading across the country today—to send back all of those performance gifts, mail back to the minister thousands of mugs and pins.

Will the minister now call on the heads of these Crown corporations and government appointments to forgo their performance gifts, those huge cheques, and accept a mug and a lapel pin instead?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, entertaining as usual but also no more enlightening.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member refuses to accept what is simply the truth, that remuneration for senior officials who are appointed by the government is established based on advice from outside groups. That is a system that has been in place before this government was elected. It was put in by the previous government.

If the hon. member has a better way of doing it, a fairer way of doing it, fairer to the people involved, fairer to the taxpayers of this country, that will ensure that we get the right people in the right positions and they are remunerated properly, let him make that suggestion. I see he forgot to raise his cup when the camera was on him. Perhaps we could have a flashback over there so he can be seen.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we can't.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

For a number of weeks now we on this side of the House have been asking the government for assistance for fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada who have not qualified for unemployment insurance this year. We therefore applaud the announcement by the minister of fisheries on Friday in St. John's of a $39 million assistance program for those fishermen and plant workers who have not received unemployment insurance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Having said that, the minister of fisheries will know that there were several thousand fishermen and plant workers who, because of their desperate circumstances, qualified for extremely low unemployment insurance. Many of them will have payments this winter less than $400 a month, as low as $70 a week.

I want to ask the minister—and I thank him for the help for those who did not qualify—what assistance will be forthcoming for those fishermen and plant workers whose income this winter will be less than $400 a month.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I do not often hear the hon. gentleman opposite laud anything, so I would like to thank him for his laudatory comments.

With respect to the latter part of his question, this is a real problem. There will be a number of fishermen—we estimated in excess of 3,000 in Newfoundland and Labrador—who will have low UI benefits because they had very low stamps and very low catches of fish although they qualified for UI. The part of the program that will help them to some extent is the gear-up part of the program. Next spring, March or April, there will be a payout to such fishermen in the affected regions who received lower unemployment insurance benefits than usual. They will receive $800 each to help them gear up for the coming fishing season.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the minister that as long as he keeps his auditory nerve functioning we will keep our laudatory comments coming.

I want to ask him to hear what I am saying. We met with fishermen this weekend on the Baie Verte Peninsula who cannot live on $70 for the rest of the winter.

I am asking the minister whether or not he agrees that an income of $350 a month is too low, whether or not he agrees that people who qualified because of their best effort with low stamps should not be penalized. Therefore, can he tell us: Will a supplementary payment be coming for those fishing families who have low incomes this winter? Will he or the minister of employment meet with the Prime Minister and with the President of the Treasury Board to find the supplementary dollars to ensure that these families, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, "pass a decent winter"?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has found, I think it is, $59 million altogether including $18 million in compensation for fishermen who were affected by ice and could not fish earlier in the year. That, I think, is a very considerable contribution.

We are also going to have a look, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I, to see if some better scheme can be found that would deal with these kinds of problems.

In addition to that, there is nothing that stops the government of a province from assisting in any way fishermen or others who need assistance, who participate in the provincial economy.

There is a $2 million contribution from the Government of Newfoundland to help with the employment creation program, but if the province wants to supplement what we are doing further it is certainly welcome to do that.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

He will know that the steel industry is at risk in this country, and it is not only Algoma Steel. Foreign imports have gone up to 25 per cent. The American share of our market is 17 per cent, which has tripled since 1988.

The government has seen fit to aid certain ailing industries and this party lauds that. That is excellent. You say yes to some industry but no to steel workers for a $10 million loan guarantee. You say yes to some and to steel workers: "let them eat cake".

When and how are you going to say yes to Algoma Steel?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to have to keep interrupting every week, but there is a proper way to address ministers. I know hon. members know what it is and I want them to adhere to it.

Far from ignoring the situation, we are spending a good deal of time in trying to find out what the right solution is for that company, its workers, the shareholders, the bankers—all those people who have an interest in the final results of the Algoma situation. We are working very closely with them.

• (1450)

I think we have indicated our support in the past and with the approach we have taken in order to see a positive resolution to this matter which, as my hon. friend knows, is a very difficult matter. He is absolutely right. It is not just a question of the problems with Algoma Steel, but it is a question of problems in the steel industry as a whole.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister.

We are at the eleventh hour. We cannot wait any longer for maybes and rhetoric. The restructuring proposals, no matter what they will be, are coming forward and there will be 1,500, 1,800 or 2,000 people who will not be working at Algoma Steel. That is almost accepted.

I am asking the minister at this time: Will he say yes to assisting the steelworker with older worker adjustment packages? Will he give tax credits to assist in employee buyout which he has endorsed and the Minister of Finance has endorsed? Yet The Globe and Mail indicates that perhaps the federal government has already said no.

Will he assist in retraining? Will he say yes to any of these now before it is too late?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have made it very clear that we believe the best participation we can have in this matter is to deal with the people who are adversely affected by the problems at Algoma Steel. We have made it very clear that employment adjustment measures, whether it is older workers or other workers, whether it is through training, is a very appropriate role for the federal government. We have indicated to all those concerned that this is the position we have taken.

I am sure the hon. member will remember that when we briefed him on this issue that is what he was told at that time.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour.

On June 17, I mentioned that I had been trying to get paid preventive withdrawal of pregnant workers in federally regulated businesses included in the Canada Labour Code.

The Minister of Labour then replied: "I am currently consulting with groups representing these women and with employers, and I expect that this fall I will be able to table the appropriate legislation."

Can the minister tell us today if this said legislation is being drafted?

[English]

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member for Abitibi that there is great concern on the part of the federal government re this matter. That is why the minister has asked to have consultations with the employee and employer groups.

I would also like him to know, since he first raised this subject, that those consultations are now finalized and that the minister will be reviewing the results of the consultations. He will then be bringing proposals forth to his cabinet colleagues this fall on this very important matter.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Published reports today indicate that the federal government is refusing to provide tax incentives for an employee buyout plan at Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie this year. The minister knows that the closure of this plant would involve over 6,000 jobs and would practically be a death-knell for the city.

I wonder how the minister can explain why he is refusing these tax incentives to assist the company and the employees save their jobs and save the community.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I read The Globe and Mail this morning too and was somewhat surprised at the headline.

I think the facts should be known to the House. The federal government is supporting Ontario's plan. It will deliver Ontario's tax credit and the entire plan. It has agreed to provide a matching credit for investment fund components.

We match similar provincial tax credits when we satisfy certain criteria. The funds must be invested in small businesses and must hold a diversified portfolio of investments. The employee ownership segment of the Ontario plan does not conform to the national standard. As in similar situations in the past, no matching credit is being provided. Even here the federal government is providing tax relief by not taking the Ontario incentive.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I think that we will want to look at exactly what all that gobbledegook means, whether in fact there are any tax incentives for an industry which is facing the creditors at the end of this month.

I want to ask the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology a question. He knows that the company and the union have moved very close in a plan which calls for some $46 million of industrial adjustment for the workers who will be laid off. Is the minister willing to make a commitment today to provide those adjustment funds so that the workers who are losing their jobs will have an opportunity to go on and put their lives back together?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add much at this point to the previous question by the member for Sault Ste. Marie.

I have indicated that the Government of Canada has a responsibility and takes that responsibility in assisting those workers who are losing their jobs and are looking for some assistance in the adjustments they have to make, whether it is through training or other means. Once the whole program is put together then we are in a better position to understand exactly what our role should be.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On September 16 the Prime Minister wrote to Mrs. Milgaard and referring to her son David he said: "Rest assured that your request for him to be transferred to another institution and for the review of the second application for a new trial to be completed quickly have been communicated to the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice respectively".

That was written on September 16. It seems that our justice system is failing David Milgaard the way it failed Donald Marshall. This is a tragedy, when people want to believe in their justice system.

I want the minister to stop stalling. When is she going to do justice to David Milgaard? When is she going to reopen this matter so that new evidence can be brought forward?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that applications under section 690 of the Criminal Code are reviewed very carefully by the Minister of Justice. I am advised by my department that the review of the second application, the advice and analysis of the evidence that has been put forward in that second application will be on my desk in the near future.

I will deal with it as expeditiously as possible and as fairly as possible.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this man has spent 21 years in prison. Surely he can expect fairness from his own government. His own lawyer requested through the access to information system the file on David Milgaard, a 2,000-page file. He received 150 pages, most of which were press clippings and information that was already released.

When is the minister going to be fair? When is the minister going to use her authority to do justice to David Milgaard, release the file to his lawyer and reopen the case so this new evidence can be brought forward?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I would say I always have been fair.

The hon. member will know that the remedy sought under section 690 of the Criminal Code is an extraordinary remedy. It is a remedy sought by people who have exhausted the possibilities of the regular criminal appellate system. It provides to the Minister of Justice an opportunity to explore widely to try to determine whether in fact there is a likelihood of a miscarriage of justice.

The first application made by Mr. Milgaard through his counsel was a very complex one and it took some time to complete the investigation. As well it was delayed by the fact that Mr. Milgaard's counsel brought forward on a number of occasions new considerations to be taken into account. That application was reviewed in enormous depth with the help of outside counsel. I am afraid that I was not able to find that the evidence put forward justified the conclusion that there had been a miscarriage of justice.

A new application has been put forward on a smaller range of submissions. Those are being analysed and I will deal with them as expeditiously as possible. The decision will be made on the basis of the evidence that is put before me and the law as it exists now in this country.

I will do that as quickly as I can and consistent with my duty. I have no apologies to make for the speed with which it is being done. I believe I owe it to the Canadian people to do this with great care and thoroughness.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

• (1500)

On pages 37, 45 and 58 of the government's Shaping Canada's Future Together document, the government states it is prepared to recognize the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in six areas, including tourism, forestry, mining and recreation.

The federal government currently exercises all of these responsibilities together in the national parks. Is the federal government proposing to turn over its responsibility for Canada's national parks to the provinces?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear it.

It should be borne in mind that there are only three places where the federal government exercises these jurisdictions. That is on military bases, on Indian reservations and in the national parks.

They specifically exempt the first two, but do not specifically exempt the latter, the national parks.

Logging is already occurring in Wood Buffalo Park. The Alberta government allows logging in its provincial parks. Given the government's proposal to apparently turn over these responsibilities to the provinces, should not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It says in the document that you are going to turn these responsibilities over. Should Canadians not be alarmed that that may open the door for provinces to routinely allow logging in the national parks?

Mr. Speaker: I listened with great interest to the question, and of course, it is a matter of importance. It ended up a hypothetical question.

The minister can, of course, deal with it if he wishes.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): No.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is, if I can make myself heard, to the Minister for International Trade.

At the same time as the United States is claiming that we are unfairly subsidizing our softwood lumber, eight American states have offices in Toronto and are offering subsidies, including interest-free loans and tax breaks, to Canadian manufacturers if they will only shift their operations to the United States. That is hardly a level playing field.

Will the government immediately launch a trade action against the United States for unfairly subsidizing manufacturers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is not illegal.

It is not counter to trade rules to offer this type of incentive, but if the incentive is found to be a subsidy that is countervailable then, yes, we can take action under our trade remedy laws which still remain in place, as do those in the United States.

If my hon. friend has any specific examples which he feels should be countervailed, then I would be happy to look into those and give a more specific response.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations in relation to the pre-study of Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

This was the first ever attempt to do a pre-study of a bill that had received first reading in the House. I want to say that it was the unanimous feeling of the committee that this was a very useful exercise. It has promise. We would have hoped for more time to do the kind of in-depth study that would have been required of this kind of a bill. Also, it was the feeling that the parameters of pre-study should be more clearly defined before the matter is sent to committee.

All in all, members had an opportunity to not have their positions fixed in cement like the stars in Hollywood. It was a very useful exercise in the final result and I have the pleasure of tabling it.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this might be somewhat unusual, but I just wanted to take a moment of the House to indicate the support of my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, and my own for the process that was used for the pre-study of a bill. This is precedent setting, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt has stated.

I think the process was quite a useful one and members on all sides of the House went into that committee with an open mind. I hope that the House will judge that the report we have brought forward is unique, but that it arrives at a consensus from members of Parliament as opposed to bureaucrats or individuals from elsewhere who sometimes are accused, rightly or wrongly, of dictating what it is that we do in this Parliament.

It was a very useful process and I want to indicate, on behalf of my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, and on my behalf, how pleased we were to have the opportunity to participate in that. Let us now hope that the government listens to our advice.

VICTIMS OF CRIME COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-310, an act respecting compensation for Canadian victims of crime travelling or posted abroad.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, this is really a re-introduction of a bill which I introduced in the last session of Parliament. It fills, in my submission to Parliament, a gap in the law as it presently is established.

• (1510)

That is, there are provincial programs of compensation for criminal injuries, but there is no similar program at the federal level, either for people who are injured within Canada, in situations coming directly under the federal jurisdiction, such as airplanes, or more even more important, Canadians overseas who may be injured.

There have been examples of such injuries. My submission to Parliament is going to be that this is a gap which this Parliament should fill and that is what this bill provides.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Brewin moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CUSTOMS ACT

COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this motion addresses some problems with the committee that was struck to look at the Customs Act and is in response to the need for substitutions on those committees.

I move:

That further to the House Order adopted unanimously by the House on September 18, 1991, to establish a special committee to review the provisions and operations of the Customs Act, changes in membership of the committee be effective immediately after a notification signed by the member acting as the chief Whip of any recognized party has been filed with the clerk of the committee; and that the present order be deemed effective retroactively to September 20, 1991.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

BILL C-230

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition from over 400 resident of the province of Manitoba dealing with what they consider to be a serious miscarriage of justice. They refer specifically to the re-opening of the David Milgaard case.

The petition makes special reference to the fact that this is not the first time this kind of serious miscarriage has occurred.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support Bill C-230, which is a bill asking for an independent counsel to be established in cases in which an appeal is made so that there can be an immediate and expeditious dispatch of thee cases, done in an objective and independent manner.

I hope the House and the government will give due consideration to the important petition from these residents of Manitoba.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition from residents of Joutel, Autier-Nord and Guyenne, in Abitibi. These petitioners ask that Parliament seriously considers, when it will review the Canada Labour Code, the flaws contained in that legislation, and that Parliament recognize the need to include in the Code clauses relating to the paid preventive withdrawal of pregnant women.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions I wish to present today.

The first one is from a group of constituents in my own constituency saying that the Mulroney government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the next four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations.

The petitioners urge the government to restore proper funding to the CBC so it can fulfil its mandate and role as the heartbeat of Canada.

BILL C-21

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is also from a number of people across Canada who state that Bill C-21 has reduced adoptive parents leave from 15 weeks to 10 weeks, while at the same time increased biological parental leave to 25 weeks, 15 weeks maternity plus 10 weeks parental leave. These petitioners call upon Parliament to review Bill C-21 with regard to adoptive parental leave, considering the literature that deals with the adoptive process, the bonding process, needs and rights of adoptive families, proper terminology in adoption and discussion with adoptive families. All parents who have signed this, and others, call on the government to do this.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions that have been mailed to my office in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers. They are signed by people from my riding of Hamilton Mountain, and from other parts of Hamilton, Burlington, Stoney Creek, Oakville, Toronto. These people are asking that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society.

They are asking the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 89 will be answered today.

Question No. 89—Mr. Taylor:

> Has the government prepared or commissioned environmental assessments of (a) the 1991 Federal Budget (b) the role of the Canadian Forces in the Gulf War (c) the proposed free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico and, if so, in each case, (i) what were the terms of reference for these assessments (ii) when were they prepared (iii) what were their findings (iv) will they be referred to the Standing Committee on the Environment?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by External Affairs and International Trade Canada and the Departments of Finance and National Defence as follows:

(a) An environmental assessment of the 1991 federal Budget was not performed. However, it should be understood that the development of guidelines to assess something as complex and diverse as the Budget is complicated by the requirements of Budget confidentiality. Environment Canada is working with the Department of Finance and other departments to develop guidelines to improve the assessment of the environmental implications of new government initiatives. As they evolve, appropriate assessment techniques will be applied to relevant budget initiatives. This work will need to be complemented by assessments and reviews within departments of programs and policies which are their principal responsibilities. The Standing Committee on the Environment can request any Minister to appear before it to explain the environmental implications of any government program or policy.

(b) No.

(c) The government has not prepared or formally commissioned an environmental assessment of the proposal free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico.

The government's June 1990 environmental commitment calls for entrenching in legislation the federal government's obligation to integrate environmental considerations into its project planning and implementation procedures, including public participation in the environmental assessment process.

However, a trade agreement is not a project. Rather it is considered to be a policy initiative subject to internal environmental review. It is difficult to evaluate with confidence the environmental impact of a trade agreement (which is primarily a framework of principles), particularly before the start of detailed negotiations, and when the final parameters of the agreement are unknown. However, in light of the government's June 1990 statement on environmental assessments, the NAFTA, as government policy, will undergo an internal environmental evaluation. The conclusions of this process will be made public.

Return tabled.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Starred Question No. 40 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I wish to move a motion to adjourn the House for the specific purpose of dealing with the urgent and pressing matter of the unfair action by the United States last week to impose punitive duties against Canadian softwood lumber.

[Translation]

This affects about 1 million workers in the softwood lumber industry. We want the House to adjourn so that an emergency debate can begin today precisely to force the Americain government to withdraw that tax which is unfair and which goes against the spirit of the Free Trade Agreement.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member brings up a very important issue. However, given the rules of the Standing Orders as regards emergency debates, I cannot, unfortunately, entertain his request.

[English]

On a point of order the hon. opposition House leader.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING ORDER 52

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, at some date in the very near future I would like to raise the matter with the Chair, and with other members of the House, on the procedure as it relates to Standing Order 52 and the granting of emergency debates.

I do not wish to take the time of the House today, Mr. Speaker, but suffice it to say that some of the provisions of Standing Order 52 are, in fact, not really applicable to the proceedings that are taking place today.

I am not commenting on your decision with regard to the request of my colleague, but just to serve notice that the subject matter should have an airing in order to impress upon the Chair that we must move forward in terms of parliamentary reform.

One of the provisions of Standing Order 52 is that you would have to adjourn the proceedings of the House, while, in fact, you do not have to adjourn the proceedings of the House. The time factor would not interfere in any way with the deliberations of the House, with the legislation before the House in any way whatsoever. It would not breach any of the privileges of any member who may have a Private Members' Business motion, or indeed, government legislation which is before the House.

I would like at some future date, through you Mr. Speaker, to come back to the House, and perhaps engage in meaningful debate with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, perhaps the government House leader, and other members of the cabinet, to discuss this issue which we believe has to be aired in a full and open way in order to achieve the objectives of the provisions of Standing Order 52.

• (1520)

Too many emergency debates have been asked for and I think if you were to look at the record, the denial of that request has been fairly persistent and extensive over the last number of years. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary would take my remarks as notice, not being as disputatious I might have been at an earlier time.

Point of Order

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the hon. member raises an important issue that is of concern to members on all sides of the House.

It seems to me the last time this issue was reviewed in great detail, or with any kind of detail actually, was during the McGrath task force. Those of us who were members of that committee spent a lot of time discussing this particular issue.

Certainly I welcome the hon. member's comments. I know that we on this side of the House are prepared to look at that particular question as it relates to reform, as we are also prepared, and are already doing, looking at other reforms like Question Period, the televising of the House, committees, and so on.

I thank the hon. member for raising it, and I assure him of our co-operation in any discussions that he may want to enter into.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, might I also add that perhaps this is something that the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on House Management, which will be looking at Question Period reform, and hopefully a variety of other things, might add to its list, both in terms of the substance of the grievance or issue raised by the opposition House leader, but also having to do with what might also be called the anachronistic language of the Standing Orders in this respect, the sense that when there is an emergency that the House should somehow adjourn.

Quite the contrary. When the House senses an emergency, it wants to meet longer. Perhaps the reality of the motion ought to be reflected in the language of the motion. I think those kinds of things are what the opposition House leader would also like the committee to consider.

I know that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader is a member of that committee. We might actually have an opportunity to look at that.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my colleague to the left has made a very valuable suggestion in terms of pursuing the subject matter, but I was even more daring than he normally is.

I thought that we might engage in that kind of debate in order to involve the active participation, either through listening, or indeed, through pointed questions of you, Sir, the Speaker of this House.

Not only would we want to look at the provisions of Standing Order 52, but also perhaps become a little bit more exhaustive vis-à-vis what we mean by an emergency. There may be a great difference as to what I, or the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, or my colleague to the left may think is an emergency.

Since we are not in any way exhausting the time of the House or the government from the legislative agenda, I think we might want to revisit this standing order, perhaps on the floor of the House of Commons, and thereafter perhaps to follow that in at the standing committee.

Make no mistake, we are quite serious about our attempt to have additional emergency debate because there are a great number of subject matters which, in themselves, may not be the equivalent of a war on another country, but for the different regions of this country they are extremely important.

One issue which comes to mind, we heard of earlier today during Question Period, is the fisheries in Newfoundland and parts of Atlantic Canada where we have individuals who are—

Mr. Cooper: Order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dingwall: I know, I am getting into debate but that is the point that I have been trying to make. In terms of the emergencies, that might not be perceived or accepted by members of the House and the Chair as a national emergency. In that particular province it is an emergency.

I would like to revisit this matter sooner, on the floor of the House, and thereafter follow it up in committee.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I agree certainly with the intent of the hon. member to address this as a matter of reform. I have indicated that we have no problem with that.

I do, however, want to state very clearly that for us to enter into such a debate on the floor of the House of Commons would, I think, be very unusual. I think the representations made by the hon. member from the New Democratic Party make much more sense, and that is that the issue be dealt with in the committee. If I could put on my other hat as chairman of that committee, I can say to him that we are quite happy to look at that in relationship to the issues of reform that all of us are discussing and will be discussing in the next little while.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair is very favourable to the comments made by the spokesperson for each of the three main parties in the House. In fact, to paraphrase the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond East, the Chair takes very seriously the comments that were just made by the hon. members of this House.

That being said, the Chair is but the servant of the House and will of course accept any indication or conclusion that you will provide.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada—Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada—Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-18 is daunting in appearance. It has the appearance of a telephone book in thickness and contains a great many measures which can only be properly considered in committee. A lot of these measures are housekeeping or technical amendments to the tax system as it stands. In that respect, our over-all approach on this side of the House is to oppose the bill because it is part and parcel of a tax system which over all we oppose.

There are some good things in the bill. There are some measures in the bill which we would want to highlight as things that should have been done some time ago and which are now finally being done and there are things in the bill which are particularly odious. I hope I might also have time to highlight them.

I wanted first of all to respond to some of the comments made by the member for Ottawa South who was speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party on Bill C-18.

There were some things the hon. member for Ottawa South had to say that I feel very supportive of, and I hope I get a chance to speak to them as well. But the one thing that struck me about what the member for Ottawa South had to say was the way in which he managed to talk about the unfairness of the tax system as it stands, without fessing up to the fact that much of the unfairness in the existing tax system owes its origins to the tax policies of many previous Liberal governments.

I am speaking, of course, Mr. Speaker, of the way in which many tax expenditures, which is the technical name if you like for what people on the street generally call tax loopholes, have their origins in the Liberal government policies of the 1970s and early 1980s. For instance, the member made mention of the dividend tax credit, and I am glad that he did. In that respect at least there has been a change in policy with the elimination of the manufacturing tax that permits the member for Ottawa South to argue for a change in the dividend tax credit without actually going back on Liberal policy. What the hon. member did not go into, as I have said before, was the way in which many of the tax expenditures have their origins in the tax expenditure policies of previous Liberal governments. These expenditures, we believe in this corner of the House, are at the root of the deficit and, therefore, at the root of the willingness on the part of this government to tax the middle class to death in order to help pay that deficit. It is not just the NDP that is saying that, Mr. Speaker, although that would be enough. The fact of the matter is that Statistics Canada in a recent study showed that some 44 per cent of the deficit, I believe, was attributable to tax expenditure policies, that is to say taxes which are not being collected and which could be and should be collected in many ways. Only 6 per cent is attributable to social spending and the other 50 per cent is attributable to the high interest rate policy of this government and the way in which that impacts on the deficit.

What we have here in this bill insofar as it is part of the over-all tax system is a tax system which reflects the values that were so clearly and exuberantly expressed on the night of the first budget of the Progressive Conservative government. I see the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine there. He will remember that day when the first time that Michael Wilson, the member for Etobicoke Centre, presented a budget, the thing that brought the entire Conservative caucus to its feet in a standing ovation unlike any I have seen here before, was the announcement of the $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. It was at that time that I realized the tremendous gulf that existed between me and my constituents, and the government and its supporters—the gulf I might say, Mr. Speaker, that exists in the biblical story between Dives and Lazarus. The great gulf between the rich man Dives and Lazarus the poor man at the gate, which can never be crossed it seems.

I asked myself, Mr. Speaker, who in my constituency was rising in their livingrooms to celebrate this $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption? The answer, of course, is no one.

This was an exemption that was thought to be the pinnacle of Tory financial policy, which was completely irrelevant to the financial needs of the people in a constituency like Winnipeg—Transcona, with the possible exception maybe of a handful of people who do not make themselves known to me.

The fact of the matter is that we have had financial, fiscal, and taxation policies which have been directed, quite openly and honestly and straightforwardly on the part of the government, to making the rich richer in this country. The Minister of Finance said it himself. He said there are not enough rich people in Canada. Well, he has been true to his own perception of the problem, he has been helping the rich to get richer, as the hon. member for Ottawa South said. He was recounting some very familiar statistics that it is the people in the very top income brackets of the Canadian population who have benefited most from what has been called, in a bastardization of the concept, "tax reform" by this government.

This has not been tax reform in any sense of the word, in any sense of the way in which ordinary Canadians mean it when they call for tax reform. When they call for tax reform what they mean is that the tax system ought to become more fair, that the tax system ought to require more of those who can afford it and less of those who cannot. Instead, we have a tax system which, admittedly, has provided some breaks to lower income people but at the same time has provided enormous relief to people in the very high income brackets. The people who are feeling it the most, who are really taking it in the teeth, so to speak, are the middle income people.

I think that we are approaching a point in the life of Canadian politics where the middle class is saying: "We can't take it any more." The GST was the final straw. The people who cannot take it any more, and who cannot take it any the most, and this is where I agree with the member for Ottawa South, are in many cases, middle class families with children. The member went into a great deal of detail because he had a lot more time than I will have to go into the discrepancies and inequities which exist within the tax system with respect to people who have children, and how people who are middle class are not receiving the kind of support for raising children that they used to receive as a result of the tax system, as a result of the clawback on family allowances, and as a result of the way in which our school system and various other things are becoming almost user fee places.

I am constantly surprised in my own situation at the things that my kids come back from school and say: "We have to buy this, we have to buy that, we have to buy this, and we have to buy that." I remember in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, this was the kind of thing that the school supplied.

I think what is happening in the tax system is that increasingly for middle and upper income people, children are not being regarded as something which all of society has a responsibility to help parents support. Children are being regarded as sort of consumer choices that middle and upper income people are making and it is up to them to support their own consumer choices. If some other couple decides not to have any children and spend their money on winter holidays instead of raising children, well, we live in a free society and we all make choices.

I do not see it that way. I think that there ought to be more support for people who are raising children regardless of the income. That is why we support the family allowance system and it is why we oppose the clawback and the deindexing of family allowances.

The member also made mention of the way in which the tax system discriminates against marriage. Maybe I have a conflict of interest that I should declare because in my other vocation, as a United Church minister, I am in the habit of marrying people from time to time. I think marriage is a good thing, and I do not see why the tax system should discriminate against marriage in this way. I do not ask it to discriminate in favour of marriage. I simply ask, as the hon. member for Ottawa South asked, that it be neutral, at the very least, with respect to this kind of choice which faces many people.

Just those few words about what the hon. member for Ottawa South had to say. As far as Bill C-18 is concerned, there are as I said a great many things in it which concern us. Some of the things we think are worth highlighting on the positive side are that it gives an exception from the tighter rules on travel and work allowances for visually impaired people, or attendants for mentally and physically impaired people. In fact, some of the best elements of this bill have to do with changes with respect to disabled people, increasing the disability tax credit, for instance.

At the same time there are elements in the bill which give an indication that the government wants to tighten up eligibility for some of these benefits. It is a bit of giving with one hand and the taking with the other, and we would like to explore that more.

Nevertheless, these are some of the positive dimensions of the bill that we have before us. For instance, it closes a loophole on the capital cost allowance for cars. It extends a deduction with respect to encouraging firms to make buildings more accessible for the disabled, again a thing which will help to increase justice for the disabled in this country. It enables tuition payments for courses paid for unemployment insurance to be deducted from UI income.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will be pleased to know that as a result of this bill it is now officially against the law to deduct the cost of bribing government officials as a cost of doing business.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blaikie: This is a great ethical advancement in the income tax system.

• (1540)

The departmental officials maintain that this was not a widespread problem or anything, but there are some countries in which greasing the wheel is just the way to get things done. This is being put in so it cannot be claimed that its absence made it legal. This is a great step forward.

I will resist the temptation to respond to the heckling of my own colleagues here.

It extends a deduction to those receiving gallantry awards for war service. It extends medical exemptions and credits to incontinence products, mobility-aiding devices, animals which help humans, et cetera, and dwelling modifications. It also provides that no interest will be charged to the taxpayer if they receive an overpayment of their GST credit.

It allows for going back and more easily fixing mistakes and getting refunds. It raises the large corporation tax from .175 per cent to .2 per cent on capital over $10 million. This is a real hard-hitting measure. It goes a long way toward making the corporations pay their fair share. All we can say is that it is a step in the right direction, but they have got a long way to go before they will be asking the large corporations to actually be paying their way.

In the same way that this government gets tough with the corporations, sarcastically speaking, it introduces a new penalty for the large corporation tax late payments which is all of one-quarter of 1 per cent of the total per complete month, compared to roughly 5 per cent of the total amount plus 12 per cent per annum for individuals, another example of the great gap which exists between how this government treats individual Canadians and how it treats its friends in the corporate sector.

The one other good thing, I am told, in the bill is that in the language of the bill, there is exclusive language in the form of always referring to the taxpayer as he or his has been removed and we now have a language of referring to the taxpayer. I am glad to see that the government has finally caught on to the use of inclusive language and sought, when it has the opportunity, to eliminate the use of exclusive language in that way.

Some of the clauses that we would like to highlight because we find them to be ones that we would like to highlight for opposition have to do with loosening the rules on deduction for self-employed home office expenses which allow indefinite carryover of losses when one's home expenses are more than the income earned from self-employment.

We also single out for opposition the fact that money which people receive through the Older Worker Adjustment Program will be taxable like UI income. It seems to me that workers who find themselves in this position as a result of a plant shutdown or whatever and find themselves eligible for the Older Worker Adjustment Program should get some kind of a tax break especially when we consider that capital gains are only taxed at 75 per cent. Why not some kind of exemption for people who find themselves in this very difficult situation?

I am pointing out the difference between the comprehensive way in which the government seeks to tax ordinary Canadians regardless of their circumstance and the breaks which exist on the corporate side.

There is also the question of northern tax benefit changes which the hon. member for Churchill will be speaking to in more detail on our behalf.

As I said before, the disability tax credit has increased from $575 to $700 per year. It is only indexed to inflation above 3 per cent per year. In other words, it is receiving the same kind of treatment that other social programs have. One wonders how the government came to the conclusion that the needs of the disabled only increase by the amount of inflation above 3 per cent if it is serious about actually helping people to meet those needs.

The bill also provides the minister more latitude in checking on whether people are disabled. He puts strict definitions on medical impairments for instance. Revenue Canada has already been cracking down and reassessing people back over the years for this one.

The definition of disabled is to be strictly drawn, but leaves a very wide open crack for people, especially the mentally handicapped to fall into. Whether one can work or keep up a house has been explicitly excluded, for instance, from determining disability. We think this is a matter of great concern.

The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine has a history of being concerned about the rights of the disabled. He may have something say about this in the course of the debate, but I do not know.

I know my time is running out, but I have just a few more points.

The other thing this does is remove the transfer of education tax credits to relatives if the course is recreational in nature. We have heard a great deal on this from music teachers and particularly people who are in official schools of music. Not only have they been recently hit by the GST, which makes it much more difficult for parents to send their children for these kinds of music lessons, but removing this particular ability of the parents to have the tuition credits transferred to them is another difficulty which these music schools will find themselves in. Perhaps in committee we might be able to persuade the minister to consider something in this respect.

In any event, I see that I have no time left. This will no doubt bring great pleasure to my Liberal colleagues who do not like to hear me go on and on about how the tax system we have, in many respects, owes its unfairness to the Liberal party. I am sorry that I do not have more time to go into that. I know they are not. We will have time in the future.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Are there comments or questions? Resuming debate.

Before I recognize another member, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York West—The Airline Industry; the hon. member for Willowdale—Employment; the hon. member for Drummond—Textile and Garment Industries; the hon. member for Vancouver East—Multiculturalism; and the hon. member for Algoma—Agriculture.

I now give the floor to the hon. member for York West.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, let me tell my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party that Liberals are prepared to talk about taxes and any other issue and it would be nice if the provincial government of my own province would also engage in that fruitful debate from time to time.

I am pleased to rise in my place to speak on Bill C-18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and other acts. This legislation was introduced on May 30 by the Minister of Finance and proposes to change many of the tax provisions imposed on Canadians by this government.

Bill C-18 is an extensive piece of legislation. It will be noted that it encompasses some 400 pages, with over 250 clauses aimed at reforming our tax laws.

As the critic for transportation matters for my caucus and party, I am certainly pleased to leave much of the debate to our financial critics and other colleagues of the House. As the transport critic, I would rather raise and concentrate on one provision, one clause, that relates largely to the shipping industry in this country.

Speaking of shipping, it is no secret that the Canadian shipping industry has been badly hurt by some of the economic policies of the government. That is not to exclude other areas of the transport industry. We have been witness in this Chamber to similar complaints from the trucking industry. When the government deregulated the trucking industry in 1988 and opened up the floodgates for American truckers, we clearly know what the result was, much to the detriment of Canadian truckers and the Canadian trucking industry.

Similarly, we have seen the repeat exercise on the air side in terms of the open skies negotiations, whereby the Americans would want to compete freely and openly in Canada and also abroad and pick up passengers in this country. We will, I think, face the same type of results in the air side that unfortunately our truckers have met with if we allow those negotiations to take place and allow free trade in the sky.

• (1550)

Shipping certainly is not excluded in terms of the transportation infrastructure and the transportation network across the country. Ship owners, Canadian crews, seafarers, shipbuilders and our ports have all reeled from the disinterest of this government to respond to the current economic crisis and to manage the crisis in a much better fashion.

To a great extent the Tory made-in-Canada recession, the elimination of thousands of jobs, the government's disadvantaged tax laws, and excessive user fees, among other matters, have made the Canadian shipping industry uncompetitive through no fault of its own.

As those involved will know, international shipping is largely and exclusively a foreign controlled industry. Canadian shippers have often reflagged their vessels to take advantage of foreign laws, different employment practices and more competitive markets.

The provisions of clause 194 in Bill C-18 which affect our shipping industry aim to put our shippers on a more equal footing with our international competition by allowing shippers with foreign incorporation to not pay taxes on profits generated from exclusively international operations.

Having said that, I think this particular clause is on the right course with respect to righting this wrong. Specifically, the bill would add a new provision to the Income Tax Act to determine that when a corporation's principal operating residence is incorporated outside Canada for the purposes of transporting goods and/or passengers, its profits generated from international shipping opportunities would not be taxable here in Canada and thus would try to correct what has been over a number of years a discouraging variable, if you will, of not having companies register in Canada because the fear was that once you registered in Canada, not only the Canadian routes would be taxed, but all your international shipping business and transactions would become taxable.

What you have happening in Canada is very few foreign firms incorporating in Canada and also driving many of our own shipping companies to reflag in different parts of the world, such as Bermuda. The net effect was that the economic activity and the economic spin-offs were not taking place in Canada, but in other ports across the world.

It should be noted also that under the scope of the legislation departure or destination points on the St. Lawrence or the Great Lakes would not constitute international shipping as a protection to the businesses enjoyed by Canadians currently.

Currently, corporations in Canada pay tax on their world-wide income, as I mentioned moments ago, if they are a principal resident of Canada and if they are incorporated here. Such a fiscal provision has not been conducive to international shipping and many Canadian shipping companies have been hurt by a policy which curtails exclusively international business opportunities.

International shipping is truly an operation which depends on world-wide support. Often the crews, the seamen, the financing, the ship's construction, the ownership, cargo, management, chartering and the operations of one ship are from many separate countries.

An example of such internationalism was brought to my attention from an article in Maclean's magazine last year. In it the writer mentioned an example pertaining to an international vessel which carried British Columbian coal to Japanese steel mills. The ship was built in South Korea, financed by an American bank with Asian dollars, registered in Liberia, owned by Panamanians, with shares insured in London. The ship was subsequently chartered in Bermuda, managed in Hong Kong with staff from India and crewed by British officers and Filipino seamen.

That illustrates the complexities which have become the reality in this particular industry. As a shipping nation Canada must become competitive with the other world giants. Regrettably to date the policies of this government have inhibited the opportunities of our international shipping companies, the Canadian crews and our Canadian shipbuilders. For instance, when we talked about the United States of America, they were very ready to open up the trucking industry and push for it, and we gave in. They were very willing to open up the air market, and we are on the verge of allowing them to do that. When it came to shipping, where our vessels in fact can compete head to head with the Americans, they hide behind the Jones Act and refuse to talk about the shipping industry.

That is an example of the fallacy of the argument that this government has pursued, that where we are strong, and where we can compete, we are very hesitant to open up that market, yet where we go into it no holds barred, such as the trucking and the air side, because economies of scales dictate, we are getting hurt as a result.

In 1988, according to Statistics Canada, Canadian international shipping reach 250 million tonnes. Evidently, we are a trading nation, and a shipping nation, but under this government we have not become a competitive nation in this regard.

Allowing, therefore, Canadian shipping companies to take advantage of the international shipping opportunities I think is a pursuit that we ought to pursue as a House and as a country. Canadian shipping companies have long understood that they are willing to pay their fair share of the tax burden in Canada for their operations domestically. Even the Seafarers' International Union can see that the provisions to exempt exclusive foreign operations is a step in the right direction.

On the one extreme, I think the economic opportunities certainly can be fulfilled. For example, an umbrella organization, an advisory council called the Asia-Pacific Initiative, has recently lobbied the government and other members of Parliament with the belief that such an amendment in this bill would in fact increase the opportunities and the economic spin-offs. For instance, they have quoted that in the Vancouver area alone, if we were to set up and establish an international shipping corporation, it would create as a result 1,600 new jobs over a three year period. As well, it would infuse the local regional economy with $1 billion, and $180 million in purchases of local goods and services.

They feel that there would be a fleet of some 200 ships that would be owned, managed and controlled out of Canada's Pacific coastal waters, rather than the current 12 which are currently in production. I think we in fact can obtain and incur a number of economic spin-offs that are now going to other countries because of the tax regime that we have in place in Canada.

At the same time, however, a number of questions should be answered by the Minister of Finance before the debate concludes. Clearly the opportune moment is not only on second reading, as we are engaging in now, but clearly to seek some clarification and answers at the committee stage by my hon. colleagues who sit on the finance committee.

First, I would like to raise and question the beneficial impact of the proposed legislation as it pertains to the particular shipping clause in Bill C-18 on the employment of Canadian crews. Will, for example, the provisions of clause 194 mean lost jobs for Canadian seafarers? Will this legislation employ thousands of foreign ship workers and displace those Canadians trying to earn a living, and an income, on Canadian ships? What will happen to the opportunities abroad for our Canadian crews and will some of the international shipping lines also engage in more local competition with existing Canadian firms?

Insofar as some of those questions go, Mr. Andrew Boyle, Secretary-Treasurer of the Seafarers' International Union of Canada, wrote a letter on April 3 of this year to the hon. Minister of Finance to try to clarify some of these similar points. I would like to quote a paragraph from his letter which I think touches on the problem at hand. He states: "While it is a step in the right direction to put Canadian marine interests on an equal footing with their foreign competitors, any net benefit that would arise by this amendment would be inconsequential versus the thousands of job losses that have and will result from the government-encouraged reflagging of Canadian ships."

He goes on to say: "With thousands of Canadians depending on the marine industry for their livelihood, and in light of the federal government's continued marine policies that discriminate against Canadians and enhance opportunities of growth for Canadian multinationals and foreign shipping fleets, and the thousands of jobs that go with them, we hereby respectfully request that you review the attached proposal concerning Canadian seafarers working on board ship and trading internationally."

I think the Seafarers' International Union has certainly been a large voice, an important voice, and a realistic voice when it comes to the shipping industry. It would be my hope that the committee at committee stage would take a hard look at some of the concerns that not only he but other members of the shipping industry have raised in response to Bill C-18.

I hope that these concerns as well as others that have been mentioned by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa South, will be listened to. I know that certainly my colleague from Hamilton Mountain will be talking about other concerns as they relate to other constituencies.

I would love to get into the details of the other facets of the shipping industry, but I am going to refrain from doing so. I know that Bill C-33, a shipping bill, will be coming up for debate in the House of Commons in a matter of days, and I will try to save some of the larger general issues for the debate that will ensue on Bill C-33.

What I had wanted to do this afternoon in a short span of time is try to raise this one particular clause of many in Bill C-18 that relates to the shipping industry. I think it provides both an opportunity in terms of amending our laws to bring greater economic activity to our Canadian ports, to our shipping industry, and also to realize some of the other options and multiplier effects that can bring greater economic wealth at a time when this country so desperately needs it.

At the same time we are going to engage in seizing an economic opportunity, I think we have to be fully cognizant and sensitive to some of the concerns that have been raised by the Seafarers' because in our rush and in our pursuit perhaps to change and amend our laws, we also may be watching and incurring a down side in other areas.

Certainly protection of jobs by the Canadian Seafarers' and Canadians engaged right now is obviously very high on the national agenda, as so it should be. I believe if we are sensible and if we are cognizant of those concerns we can realize the economic benefit of amending our tax laws and at the same time protect and encourage our Canadian jobs and Canadian crews to ensure that our shipping industry is put once again on a stronger foundation so that it may compete with the world's best.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, according to the government, its current strategy for the disabled consists of two main elements.

First, the income tax amendments contained in the legislation that we are debating today, Bill C-18. Second, the national strategy for disabled persons announced by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg a few weeks ago.

If those were in fact the principle elements of the government's strategy for persons with disability, I would be prepared to stand in the House of Commons and commend the government for taking some reasonable first steps in assisting Canada's disabled citizens.

The sad fact is, however, that the government's overall strategy for disabled persons is not deserving of praise. It is deserving of manifest condemnation.

Conservative members of Parliament point with pride to amendments in Bill C-18 and say: "We are giving disabled persons $65 million". Those same Conservatives seem to forget that one week ago, they voted for Bill C–32, which will remove more than $2 billion from the Canada Assistance Plan payments.

They voted for a measure which will cut home care for disabled persons, which will cut health care for disabled persons, which will cut rehabilitation programs for disabled persons, which will cut programs for independent living for disabled persons and which will cut employment service for disabled persons.

Conservative members of Parliament also point with pride to the Prime Minister's announcement in Winnipeg of $31 million in programs for disabled persons. These same Conservatives seem to forget that a year ago they voted for Bill C–69 which slashed social service funding by billions of dollars, which slashed establishment programs financing by billions of dollars. These same Conservatives seem to forget that they voted to cut the Canada Jobs Strategy fund by $100 million, that they voted to cut social housing by $411 million, that they voted to reduce cash transfers to the provinces for medicare. The Conservative government has cut social programs by billions upon billions of dollars.

Those programs are the very ones which disabled citizens rely upon to help them get proper medical care, to help them receive training, to help them obtain proper accommodation, to help them get out of poverty, to help them live in with a maximum degree of dignity and a maximum degree of freedom.

The government has undermined all of the major programs which disabled Canadians need in order to succeed. In return the government now offers disabled Canadians the $65 million of tax changes contained in Bill C–18 and the $31 million a year more in benefits promised by the Prime Minister.

When one considers there are 3.3 million disabled Canadians, then one will see that the changes offered in Bill C–18 work out to an average of less than $20 per year for every disabled Canadian. That is less than $1.60 a month, about a nickel a day.

Using the same simple arithmetic, the Prime Minister's promise of new programs works out to 90 cents a month, less than 3 cents a day for every disabled Canadian.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mrs. Phinney: In short, the government has acted to decimate the health, educational, rehabilitation, housing and social assistance services which are critical to disabled Canadians and in exchange for committing that outrage the government is offering every disabled Canadian tax breaks and new services which work out to 8 cents a day for each one of them.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a national disgrace.

In his budget which led to the legislation we are discussing in the House of Commons today, the Minister of Finance had the nerve to say this government has done more than any other to improve opportunities and to enable Canadians with disabilities to participate more fully and more fairly in the work place, in their communities and at home.

Contrast those words of the Minister of Finance with the words used by the Canadian Cerebral Palsy Association when commenting on the government's legislation to cut back Canada Assistance Plan funding: "The extraordinary suffering which it imposes on poor and disabled Canadians cannot be justified."

There are 552,000 visually impaired Canadians. That means that even with glasses those Canadians have difficulty reading normal print. There are 46,625 legally blind Canadians. These Canadians, our fellow citizens, need the programs which this Conservative government has cut back. Forty–four per cent of Canadians with a disability have eight or fewer years of schooling. These disabled Canadians need more help, not less.

As appalling as those numbers are, they are not nearly as appalling, not nearly as distressing as some other numbers I would like to put on the record.

According to the most recent statistics officially known as the Health and Activity Limitations Survey, these are the number of disabled Canadians living in poverty: 195,000 Canadians with hearing impairment live in poverty, 225,000 Canadians with mental disabilities live in poverty, 134,000 Canadians with visual impairment live in poverty, 493,000 Canadians with mobility impairment live in poverty, 407,000 Canadians with agility impairment live in poverty.

Let me point out that agility impairment is a technical way of saying limited ability to dress or undress, get in and out of bed, cut your toenails or use your fingers.

I ask you, in 1991 in Canada what are 407,000 Canadians with agility impairment doing living in poverty? What are one-third of disabled Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24 doing living in poverty? What are 29.5 per cent of disabled women doing living in poverty?

• (1610)

Massive issues are confronting all of us in providing proper and fair legislation for Canadians with disabilities. There are the issues of financial security, employment opportunities and employment equity, independent and community living, promotion of disabled rights and the prevention of disabilities.

I do not expect Bill C-18 to solve all the problems but I do expect the government to be honest. This legislation which the government hails as a major step forward in the tax treatment of disabled Canadians is, in fact, a mere drop in the bucket, and it is a mere drop in the bucket which has just been emptied by this government. Whatever measures are contained in this bill come nowhere close to compensating disabled Canadians for the losses they are suffering from government cutbacks in other legislation.

As my colleague the hon. member for Ottawa South has already indicated, we in the Official Opposition are prepared to see this bill proceed to a legislative committee in fairly short order for detailed study. I appreciate that the legislative committee will have its work cut out for it, and I would not presume to suggest to the committee every possible area of the bill it may wish to examine. There are, however, some thoughts which I hope the legislative committee will keep in mind when studying those aspects of Bill C-18 which affect Canadians with disabilities.

Clause 90 of the bill sets out the government's proposal for disability tax credit. I hope the committee will realize that nearly three million disabled Canadians will receive no benefit from the disability tax credit. This is the largest specific budgetary item offered to disabled Canadians, and yet 90 per cent of them are ineligible to claim it. I hope the committee will keep that in mind when suggesting improvements to the bill.

Clause 91 of the bill will put into the Income Tax Act specific legal definitions for those who are eligible to receive the disability tax credit. At present those definitions are handled by regulation. I would hope that the committee will consider whether it is wise to make this change from regulation to statute. Do we run the risk of excluding certain people from receiving the credit? Is the certainty of a statute better than the flexibility of regulations?

Committee members will also want to allay the concerns of some disability rights advocates as to whether the disability tax credit and the medical expenses tax credit are complementary. Does the legislation guarantee with absolute certainty that disabled Canadians can claim one benefit without risk of losing the other?

I would hope that with respect to the medical expenses tax credit that the legislative committee will revisit the decision to limit tax assistance for part-time attendant care expenses to expenses incurred in respect of an attendant who is not a relative of a disabled person. Is there a sound reason for this limitation? Does this limitation not run the risk of discriminating against disabled Canadians living in rural or isolated areas where the only person who could possibly serve as an attendant might well be a relative?

Clause 15 of the bill deals with deductibility of business expenses incurred in modifying premises to accommodate disabled persons. In a technical vein, we in the opposition are concerned that this provision appears narrowly defined to limit the deduction to businesses providing greater access only for those with mobility impairment. Does this rule out a deduction for such innovations as talking elevators or visual fire alarms? If so, we hope the bill will be amended.

In a broader vein, it is worth while to note that the government has failed to place a price tag on this provision of the bill. Is that because the government realizes that this measure is simply not enough of an incentive to businesses to modify their premises? Is there a smarter way, a more effective way, of encouraging businesses to modify their premises to provide access for disabled persons? I hope the committee will consider that.

There are then a number of technical issues which must be considered with regard to the impact of this bill upon disabled Canadians. But I want to be clear; it is not this bill per se which troubled me, indeed within its own narrow context this bill contains certain proposals which will prove of some value to some disabled Canadians.

What troubles me is that the government believes this bill addresses in a serious manner the range of problems facing disabled Canadians. What troubles me more is that other actions by the government negate many, many times over any of the positive benefits which this bill may provide.

As my party's spokesman for disabled persons, I was pleased to be able to arrange a series of hearings across Canada this summer with disabled individuals and with groups representing disabled persons. I want to thank my many colleagues in the Liberal caucus who took part in these meetings. We gleaned a large number of excellent suggestions. We heard from a host of people who have never previously had an opportunity to present their ideas to members of Parliament. We will use these ideas in the months ahead as we press for a fairer deal for disabled Canadians.

I only wish that every member of Parliament on the government side had the same opportunity because I am certain that they would reverse the unfair and unwise strategy which they have undertaken. They would see the foolishness in cutting back on health care for disabled persons. They would see the foolishness in cutting back on housing for disabled persons. They would see the foolishness in cutting back on rehabilitation services for disabled Canadians. They would see the foolishness in cutting back on training programs for disabled persons. They would see the foolishness in cutting back on job programs for disabled persons.

All that individual Canadians with disabilities are asking for is the same as the rest of us want. All that individual Canadians with disabilities are asking for is the opportunity to reach their maximum potential. Surely, as a society, that is what we want. Surely, in 1991, it is not too much for any Canadian to ask. I urge the government, I plead with the government, to give Canadians with disabilities that chance.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to participate in this debate because this is an important issue for Canadians. I cannot think of anything that is more important to most Canadians than income tax. I think in most kitchens and places where people gather this is the kind of matter they are talking about, perhaps more than the Constitution, perhaps more even than the popularity of the current Prime Minister. Every day now, people are getting concerned about taxes of different kinds.

I cannot think of a matter that requires more attention from my staff and myself as we try to respond to telephone calls and letters. People are becoming attuned to the tax system. People are asking me interesting questions about income tax, the goods and services tax, the provincial sales taxes, when they pay them and when they do not pay them, and they are beginning to understand some of the complexities of it all. They are beginning to understand how to buy muffins so that no tax is paid on them. They are beginning to go into stores and argue that maybe the banner in the store that says: "We absorb the GST", does not really do any good when they pay the provincial sales tax on top of the price of the goods and a so-called absorbed GST. People are beginning to have some sense of the nuances.

One of the things that disturbs me about this bill is that it is basically a continuation and an expansion of the nuances of the whole income tax system.

I think we should start with the name of the bill because I would defy any of the Ministers of the Crown and any of the half dozen or so members who are here this afternoon to be able to just kind of flip this one off your lips. It is just not possible to do that. Here is the size of the bill. Most towns in Canada do not have a phone book this size and this is not the whole package, this is a partial package. This is the beginning of the latest round of shuffling of the deck.

I think that Canadians, as a group, have a legitimate beef when they say this to people like me. They want to know why, when they sign a contract with the Canadian Tire store, with Woolco, with K-Mart and with any other business with whom they might come in contact, the laws of Canada, Ontario and most of our provinces say that when you draw up a sales agreement, the consumer has some rights and one of the rights is the very simple right of being able to understand what they are being charged and what the process is. If somebody came into a member's office and said: "Listen, I got this bill in the mail and it says I signed a contract. I tried to read this thing, but I do not understand it. Do I have to get a lawyer to interpret this contract?"

Most of us would say well, wait a minute, there is probably a law somewhere on the books provincially or federally which says the consumer has a right to a reasonable amount of knowledge and the obligation is on people in the private sector to explain in reasonable language the service they are providing. And so the day, supposedly, of being able to write up a contract that no one can understand except your lawyer and thereby disabusing the public in some way is long gone.

I defy anybody, any ordinary Canadian, to pick up an income tax form and tell me what the hell it is all about. It cannot be done. I am one of those who was pleased last year when a short form was put out, a short form that was intended to allow people to fill out their income tax a little faster and be a little more convenient for the public.

Well I got the short form. I have been reading short forms like this for about 30 years. I did not understand it. We had to have family conferences about what this short form meant. When we compared the short form to the longer form, we found out in our family that in order to get to use this shorter form, we had to forgo several privileges that had been previously extended to us in the income tax system.

Maybe we should put a stamp on the outside of the short form that says you can use this form, but it is going to cost you money. If you want to use the short form you have to pay more income tax this year. Danger. Warning. Just like on a pack of cigarettes. If you fill out this form it is going to be dangerous to your pocketbook. That would be fair for the consumer, but it did not say that. Instead it purported to be something that would simplify paying your taxes to the Government of Canada.

Reading through this bill is a challenge which I doubt most Canadians will take. As a matter of fact, I doubt that most members of this House will read it either. But if you read this bill, it is a confusing array of reality. It is kind of a bureaucrat's portrayal of what is going on here.

I want to read into the record just one section because I think some of this is pretty interesting. Subsection 28. Follow this if you can, and determine for me, Mr. Speaker, whether it is English, French or something else.

> Subsection 10 is applicable after June 17, 1987 except that that portion of the definition small business corporation in subsection 248(1) of the said act, preceding paragraph (a) thereof as enacted by subsection 10 shall, after June 17, 1987 and before September 14, 1988 be read as follows:

An hon. member: Would you repeat that?

Mr. Breaugh: What does it mean? In which of our official languages was that written? Is it conceivable that the Canadian public could understand that? I know that someone will explain to a poor soul like me that this is not meant to be read by the public, it is meant to be read by lawyers, it is meant to be read by tax accountants, it is meant to be read by bureaucrats.

Most of us who have been members for a little while can tell some little anecdote about someone who came to their office last week and you tried to explain, as I have done on several occasions now, why it is that the Government of Canada is suggesting to people that he or she really does not want to be married. You want to be divorced because if you get divorced, you fall into this definition of this regulation in this act, and therefore there is a financial advantage to you.

Surely that is not our business, and yet that is the way this bill is written, and that is the way most acts that have to do with income tax are written. It is the definition.

Try to explain to somebody who is trying to earn a living as a commercial fisherman why it is so difficult for them, and yet so attractive for someone who wants to set up a charter fishing company as a tax loss. That is a confusing thing to try to do, and it is a hurtful thing to try to do. Surely that was not the intention of the Income Tax Act in the first instance.

I am constantly reminded that income tax was supposedly a temporary tax. Hardly. If you go through the provisions that are in this bill, one almost despairs that there is any sense of fairness left in the approach to it all. I understand, as somebody who has been in politics for a little while, that the income tax provisions in a very broad sense are used as the levers of a government to encourage some things to happen, to discourage other things. Perhaps what needs to be done is at some point in time you need to take all of those incentives and kind of hive them off in some other way, because caught in the middle of this is the ordinary person who has the pay cheque. They are the poor, unfortunate souls who are the victims of this process. They are the ones that cannot afford to play the game, and so they do not have a great many investments. They do not have any money left in their take home pay to do any investing.

They are the victims in the sense that they are dependent on other people to interpret simple tax forms so they can fulfil their obligations under the law. An interesting test would be, and I cannot think of a similar circumstance, to see how fair it would be if there were other laws that people just simply could not interpret, could not function on the signs of the law.

In the Highway Traffic Act, for example, if all the signs were posted in the jargon that income tax laws are written in, it would be interesting to see what would happen as everybody went up to the stop sign, ran out and had to get a lawyer to interpret whether the sign said stop or go, whether the light was green or red, to seek professional advice to follow the letter of the law. We all say that is nuts. In effect, that is exactly what this approach to income tax causes all Canadians to do.

I want to get back to something I said a little earlier about the bitterness out there about the process. I am not sure that Canadians ever want to understand this bill or the income tax process entirely. Most of them do not care. Quite frankly, that is not why they are living their lives. That is not the purpose that motivates them every day. It is something that is now beginning to impede them and they are beginning to become increasingly aware that they are victims in this process, that this is not designed to be a fair process. This is a process which mitigates against them and their families and prevents them from accomplishing very much in economic terms during their working lifetimes. They are now beginning to understand that at the end of their working lifetimes, it continues to work against them, it hits them when they retire and it hurts them where it hurts the most, in their pocketbooks. When they try to provide for themselves and their families, they know they are working in an income tax system that is written against their best interests.

It is also true that it is written in the best interests of a very small percentage of the population, those who have the ability to compete in this kind of a field, those who have the ability to hire the lawyers and use the tax accountants and to use them well and to use them every single day.

Most people I know who are in business now would probably count their tax advisers among the most important people in their whole business organization, not the people who actually make things, not the people who actually dream up things, not the people who are productive. The people who are critical to the operation very often turn out to be their tax advisers. That is the critical point on whether somebody can stay in business. That is the critical point on whether a product line can expand. Was that the intention? I do not think it was. I think that a long time ago we had a very different concept of what an income tax process was all about.

The bitterness in Canadian people is beginning to manifest itself in some rather unfortunate ways, and I do not think anybody would deny this. More and more people I know are consciously working to find a way out of the whole income tax process entirely.

This summer at my home in Oshawa, I had a string of people banging on my door offering me one price if I wanted to pay by cheque or by credit card, and quite a different price if I wanted to pay by cash. There was a little wink and a nudge attached to that. There was no doubt in my mind that what was going on here is that the guy who wanted to coat my driveway with some kind of sealant had figured it out to the extent that if there were paperwork involved, there was income tax involved. If the paperwork involved me putting some green money into his hand, there was no income tax involved and from his personal perspective that was better than running a legitimate business that might be taxed at some point in time.

I think Canadian people are beginning to sense that the system is wrong. It is not a fair system. It is not one which tries to differentiate between the rich and poor, except that the rich have an ability to utilize the system better than the poor. Caught in the middle are all those people who work for a living, all those who take home a pay cheque.

We had a little debate in here this morning. It was unfortunate, because I thought it was a good idea for a Private Members' Bill to say to seniors: "Here is an answer for you. It may be to your advantage to pay your income tax once a year, rather than quarterly". The government had no time for this kind of concern.

There are a lot of people who are now just beginning to think: "Wait a minute. If somebody else on my block can avoid paying income tax, how did they do that". Maybe if I had an ability to hang on to my tax money for most of the year instead of giving it to the government earlier on in the year I could use my money to pay my debts instead of giving it to the federal government.

• (1630)

They are beginning to understand simple things like this: So what if there is a tax credit involved? So what if there is some kind of a rebate involved? First I have to pay the tax and then wait six months, eight months, nine months, twelve months, for some government agency to send me out a cheque. They are beginning to figure out that there is a disadvantage in that for them, that the cheque never seems to quite match their original expenditure and even if it does, they have to give somebody the money for a year and then wait to get it back.

That is not a fair system. The problem with all of this, aside from just the wrong-headedness of it all, is that this is an income tax system which cannot work in this country. I have heard other members say this before me so it is not a revelation and it is not a view which I alone hold. This is a tax system which is based on the simple notion that it is fair enough that the people will pay without having to do a whole lot of auditing or chasing after people. They will see it as a fair system, they will see it essentially as one in which they are paying their fair share. The moment people see it as something other than that, if they see it as a system which cheats them, they are going to try to cheat the system. They are going to try to cheat back. One can hardly blame them for that because they see examples of it all around them.

They see corporations which operate within the letter of the law, one should not be accusing the corporations of breaking laws here, with the advantage of having a resource of tax advisers who tell them how to work that law, who tell them how to delay the payment of taxes, who tell them how to avoid the payment of taxes, who tell them how to borrow money so they can write it down, and who tell them what to write off and what to not and to what extent.

When ordinary citizens take a look at that, they say "wait a minute, maybe I had better find some of this information out, maybe I had better start to use some of this information too". I believe that moment has already set in. I guess the basic thing is, to go back to something I stated originally, to ask the question of whether it would it be a reasonable thing, by any member's standards in here, if someone came to you and presented you with a contract in which people said, quite bluntly: "I don't understand this. I have to get somebody to interpret this government document for me." Is it reasonable to expect people to simply accept that? I do not believe it is. I think people have begun now to understand that this is an income tax process, however simple it might have been at the start, which has gone astray.

At the very least, it must be understood by the Canadian people, and it is not. At the very same time, it has to have some large measure of fairness involved in it. The people have to be able to say "Well, I don't like paying taxes either, but I understand we are all paying roughly the same kind of taxation." People certainly are not saying that. They certainly are not saying that.

As one goes through the provision of this bill, one can see the kind of traditional approach which basically says "we have identified a problem over here, and so we addressed the problem over there, and maybe that will solve it". We all have watched this process long enough to know that this is not going to work. It never has worked, it never will work, there is not even a chance that it is going to work.

In conclusion, I am not making a pitch for a flat tax or anything as simple as that, but I am making a pitch that in all fairness the people of Canada should be able to pick up a tax form that is put out by the Government of Canada and read it and understand it, and they cannot. There is something basically wrong with that. There is something basically wrong with the notion that my father, who was 91 years old when he died and had a grade seven education, paid somebody $50 every year to tell him that he did not owe the Government of Canada any income tax. He did that to his dying day. There are millions of Canadians in the same boat who cannot function within the system.

The process, I believe, is clearly wrong. The process seems to be almost impenetrable, there is almost no way that one can break through it. I notice that the ministers who are carrying this bill seem to kind of move around. Nobody wants to stay in the Chamber and defend the faith on this matter, with good reason. It is indefensible and it ought not to be.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Oshawa for his interesting dissertation. He touched on a couple of points that I know are of some consternation both to myself and many of the constituents I represent.

I think it is the current minister of national health who used to be the minister in charge of nuclear submarines who, when he was in opposition, was the revenue critic for the Conservative Party. He and his party in 1984 and again in 1988, but particularly in 1984, made a great to-do about a campaign to simplify the tax system. I wonder if the member for Oshawa remembers that and if he could perhaps comment a little further on what progress he thinks it may have made in a few ways, if there was any progress, in terms of simplifying that tax system.

Also I would like to comment for a moment and reinforce what my colleague said about the attitude, the Canadian culture, that used to exist that while nobody liked their taxes they paid them. There was some aggravation that perhaps they were paying a little bit more than their fair share, but as long as it was not too burdensome and they could see that their own economic situation was improving however slightly year by year, they were willing to put up with it. It seems to me as it does to my colleague that we are in danger of almost moving into the tax culture of the population in France where people have been making a career for years and years and years now out of tax avoidance. That is the total difference in the whole Canadian culture and attitude toward government, revenue and taxation over the last few years and a very unhealthy one.

My questions are: In what ways, if in any way, has this government since making its major promise to simplify the tax system gone about implementing that? What further comments does my colleague have on the changing tax culture among Canadians and how much more can they take?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, here is the answer to whether anybody is getting anywhere with the simple application of the Canadian tax system. This one would just choke a horse, and with good reason. This is the kind of legislation in which one minister comes into the House and reads a very succinct speech on why this is wonderful and then leaves and lets somebody else carry the can. This is indefensible.

I do not want to justify this, but in fairness I think we should acknowledge that the way modern governments operate would swallow anybody's conscience. It chokes them. Around them are people who advise them on things they can say and things they cannot say. Ministers of the Crown are rarely allowed in this place to actually say what they think. They say what is written and no more and no less.

It is that kind of controlling mechanism which is in part causing the problem. I regret that. I regret that people with good intentions in all political parties in my experience have tried to make changes. I think all of us who are practising politicians understand those changes must come. The tragedy is we have not managed to get that message across to those who are supposedly there to serve, to advise, and who have somehow become people who are there to control.

The second question is more disturbing. It is for me because I am of that generation of Canadians who have felt very good about this country and who felt that while I did not ever enjoy in my lifetime paying income tax, I always felt it was my obligation. I always felt there was some fairness somehow in the system that would work itself out and I am beginning to join the ranks of those who are bitter that they are the last ones left on the line so to speak, that they are there to be exploited in large measure by governments at all levels.

That is wrong and it is particularly wrong when I look around in my own community, and everyone of us here could do that, at people who are very well off who pay no income tax. That is a tragedy and I was reminded of that tragedy again in the last little while and this mindset still seems very strong in the Government of Canada. People at the bottom of the process, people who stand at the wickets and face the Canadian public, our civil servants, are expected to take a zero per cent wage increase this year. The government is in this House every day attempting as best it can to articulate why it is absolutely necessary that somebody else who already has a very nice salary needs a substantial bonus and how there is fairness in that.

Whatever the legal niceties of that argument might be, the Canadian public looks at that and says words that I am afraid are a little unparliamentary. They do not accept that argument any more. They have sufficient understanding of the process to know that they are the bitter recipients of an income tax system that is wrong.

While they are not exactly sticking their heads out the window, yelling that they are as mad as and are not going to take it any more, I would warrant that they are sitting down at the kitchen table explaining as a family unit how they are being victimized by this process and exploring as many ways as they can to avoid paying their fair share of the income tax. I do not know whether they will be as successful as most of our major corporations, but I will bet that they will give it a try.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to rise in this House to speak on Bill C-18, an act to put forward further amendments to the Income Tax Act.

A government's ability to mobilize the will of a nation is based upon trust. Nowhere is the lack of trust more evident in this country than in our current tax system.

The current tax system of Canada with its rules, regulations, exceptions and exceptions to exceptions goes on and on. There is absolutely no way the average person today can fill out his own tax form.

When I was preparing to speak on this bill today I was actually encouraged when I read from the news release from Revenue Canada dated May 24. I noticed the following in the second paragraph: "The fairness package is an important part of my continuing commitment to make the tax system simpler, easier and fairer". This was said by the Minister of National Revenue.

He went on in the third paragraph and talked about how the amendments that would benefit the individual taxpayers in matters such as penalties for late filed returns and interest charged on outstanding balances.

In addition, the fairness package will allow refunds for taxation years starting with 1985 and streamline the process by which individuals can make a formal objection to an assessment issued by the department.

When I read that I was encouraged. Then shortly behind it came Bill C-18. Just the amendments to Bill C-18 total 400 pages. Today I just took any page and pulled it open. It was page 220, I want to read one paragraph and ask any member of this House if they can honestly decipher it. It is clause 94, the relevant portion of subsection 118.6, and it is talking about qualifying the educational program. Here is how it reads:

> The description of A in subsection 118.9(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor.

This is the amendment, simpler, easier and fairer, and I read:

> A is the less of
> (a) $600, and

I am not a lawyer and I am not a tax accountant, but I would challenge any tax lawyer or even any tax accountant to tell me what that means.

I agree almost entirely with the hon. member for Oshawa. The current tax system in this country is a disincentive to national productivity. We have been sitting around this House now for many months talking about national productivity. The one instrument that we control in this House that can generate and motivate a positive attitude toward every man, woman and child in this country is the tax system.

Our tax system is so complex, so unfair, so inefficient and so unworkable that there is absolutely no way we have a chance to become a productive nation. The whole system is designed to be a disincentive to productivity.

If we want a mobilized and productive work force we have to treat them fairly. How can we possibly have a work force turned on to what their responsibilities are if they do not understand? Right now it is blind faith in our tax system. What do they read? We read day after day—and we know it to be true—that just two years ago there were close to 7,000 people in this country whose incomes were in excess of $250,000 a year and they paid absolutely no income tax. We heard from Statistics

Canada three years ago that there were 2,200 companies in Canada with retained earnings in excess of $25 million, excluding companies with losses carried forward. Those 2,200 did not pay any taxes at all.

It is not, by the way, that these people who made in excess of $250,000 and did not pay any tax or the companies that did not pay any tax were doing anything illegal. They are working with legal loopholes. These are laws that are written in to the Income Tax Act of Canada which they are naturally working at and they are doing their job.

What an absolute negative energy. Instead of promoting creative ideas on how we can expand our economy, how we can create more jobs, create more wealth, instead of that kind of a thought process, we have high priced chartered accountants and tax lawyers working with negative energy, legitimate ways to avoid tax.

This is no longer just happening in medium sized and larger corporations. The hon. member for Oshawa earlier today cited examples of people coming to his door and saying there is one price if you pay on a credit card or an invoice and there is another price if you pay cash. Now, because of the tax regime of this country, we have an underground economy that goes into the billions of dollars.

• (1650)

Those are not my words, those are the words of Professor W. E. Dewart from the University of British Columbia, who spent many years of his life analysing the underground economy in this country.

I believe that if we are serious about mobilizing the will of this nation, about galvanizing the will of this nation, about creating a productive work force, we have to start by taking dramatic steps to change the tax act for this country.

I have been working with a group of Canadians from coast to coast who believe it is time to do something radical. We believe it is time to come out with a simplified system, something that everyone understands, something that is simple, because from simplicity you can judge fairness, and when you have simplicity and you can judge a system to be fair, efficiencies pick up and this will cause us to become a nation that will ultimately create better products and services at better prices. This is how the tax act of this country is really a macroeconomic issue.

The hon. member for Oshawa talked earlier about the fact that people sit around in their kitchens or their living-rooms or their backyards, their gas stations or in restaurants and talk about the frustration of the GST, the paper burden of the GST, the complexity of the tax act, the inefficiency of the tax act. They count on us, not only to realize that and hear those words, but they count on us, the people of Canada to do something about it.

I believe the time is now to do something about it. I have been working hard with many other people to promote the idea of a single tax. You could do a single tax idea, Mr. Speaker, on a form that is no bigger than the size of a postcard. There were tax professionals from all over the country who have verified that this is a doable system.

What you basically do, Mr. Speaker, is you take your gross revenue, whether it is personal income or corporate income, whatever form you are working on, and after you take the personal tax credit, the senior's tax credit, child tax credit, charitable donations tax credit, RRSP credits, after you take all of those credits, at the bottom, 20 per cent. If we do that both on the corporate side and the personal side, we will have enough revenue to satisfy the social requirements of governments in this country.

When you have a simplified system which is about the size of a postcard, then people can judge fairness. When people feel they are being treated fairly, they are motivated. They advance. And when foreign investors look at a country and they see a motivated work force, that is when foreign capital moves in.

That is what we need in order to reduce interest rates, in order to put more money into the marketplace for entrepreneurs, to reduce the cost of mortgage rates, cars. Those are the things that expand an economy. When an economy is expanding, and there is a labour force that is working rather than unemployed, those are the things that put downward pressure on deficits and ultimately on the death of the country.

I believe that the only way we are going to get this country back on track is by radical reform of the Income Tax Act of Canada. I know there have been many people who say this idea is off the wall, it is not doable, it is not workable. We are at a crisis point in this country and it is time for the political leadership of this country to take bold measures. It is time for the political will of this country to listen to what is causing people to advance.

The current tax system right now is designed in a way that the harder we work the less we keep. If an entrepreneur in this country decides to work nights and evenings, the harder he or she works the less he or she keeps. It is absolutely upside down.

What is wrong if a person is an achiever, works hard and makes $200,000 or $300,000 a year? We should not have a system that takes nearly half of that. We should not have a system like that. We should not have a system where some of those people can hire very effective tax lawyers and pay absolutely nothing.

The unique thing about a single tax system is that it is an airtight system. Everyone will pay their fair share. No one is exempted. Everyone is in. Legitimate expenses are put on the table, but after that everyone pays their 20 per cent. That is the system.

The current system right now is a disincentive for foreign investment in this country. It is a disincentive to productivity. It does not reward the achievers.

I am happy to have had the opportunity to speak on Bill C-18. The spirit of this government was trying to make things better, but once again the bureaucracy of the Department of Finance wins the day. This bureaucracy in finance—and I realize that it has some of the finest minds in the country—has a self-perpetuating environment in that building.

Can we imagine trying to sell something like a single tax to the Department of Finance which if implemented would probably mean, after a couple of years, about two-thirds of the jobs would have to be reapplied to different departments?

An hon. member: Is it Liberal Party policy, a single tax?

Mr. Mills: The member asked: "Is it Liberal Party policy?" No, it is not Liberal Party policy, but it is just one simple idea that is being put forward to try to advance the debate on tax reform.

I will say, seeing as the hon. member asked me, that two weeks ago the Young Liberals of Canada passed it as a priority resolution. That is a beginning.

There are flaws in the single tax system. I know that there can be honest debate on whether or not the tax credits for seniors or the tax credits for children that I am putting forward are too generous. The point is that it is a constructive alternative to the existing system.

Are the members over there against simplicity? Are they against fairness over there? Are they against efficiency? There is not one of the members on the government side who is against those things, not a single member.

When we throw an idea over there—and they have always challenged us—why not take up the challenge? I should say the member for Mississauga South has put forward some concerns about the single tax, and some of his concerns are good concerns. At least it gets an honest debate on tax reform going.

Right now, with respect to the government members, they are all captive. I have worked on that side before. I know how tough this is. They are captive of the officials in the Department of Finance. Whenever they put something forward as a government that is simple and fair, senior officials try to find ways to knock it down. This town is a town that lives on paper. It lives on words.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-18. I continue to hope that there will be a groundswell of caring government members who will eventually challenge the cabinet of Canada, the Prime Minister of Canada, by saying it is not too late to take another fresh start at comprehensive tax reform.

• (1700)

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions in particular for the Liberal member for Broadview—Greenwood. I would like to ask him to take his memory back a few years. I am sure he remembers, as someone who has studied the tax system, that at the end of World War II, the distribution of the tax system in Canada and the tax burden was approximately 75 per cent corporate tax and 25 per cent personal income tax.

By the end of the Trudeau government in 1984, that situation had totally reversed itself to where it was at that point 75 per cent personal and 15 per cent corporate.

I would like to know how that measures in with his concept of tax fairness.

The other thing is a little more recent, but it is still about 10 years ago. I am sure my colleague will recall the infamous MacEachen budget of 1981 or 1982, in which Allan J. professed at that time that it was his intent with that famous budget to plug loopholes. He did, in fact, plug a number of outrageous corporate loopholes in his proposed budget. At the same time, he also plugged a number of the very few loopholes available to ordinary working Canadians, especially those who worked in northern Canada, who used to get special housing benefits, special fly-in, fly-out benefits—not benefits, but exemptions from taxation for extra cost of living bonuses—in order to make sure they stayed in the north.

At the same time he was proposing to plug all these so-called loopholes, he said: "Well, seeing as we are plugging the corporate loopholes, we will lower the marginal tax rate". There was a chorus of opposition to that budget, because apparently there was no proper consultation. It was not well planned, which always struck me as very unlike the minister's lifetime habit. I had never known him not to plan anything out very carefully. But he lowered the marginal tax rate.

Then there was a chorus of opposition, and he then unplugged all the corporate loopholes again. As far as the loopholes for ordinary workers were concerned, he got rid of those, but he opened up the corporate loopholes. At the same time as he did that, he forgot to reinstate the former marginal tax rate.

What ended up after that entire budget was a taxation system grossly more unfair than that which existed at the beginning.

I am sure the member for Broadview—Greenwood has some recollections of Mr. MacEachen as well. Does he think that kind of action which was supported by the Liberal party, and is still part of the historical record of that party and its financial record of mismanagement in this country, could have really been an accident? Could that have been an accident and not just, instead, typical of the continuing Liberal record of foisting more and more of the tax burden on to ordinary, working Canadians.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Kootenay West for his question.

On the first point he raised regarding the percentage for corporate income tax at the end of World War II being about 75 per cent, and personal income tax about 25 per cent, he is absolutely correct when he states it is a complete reversal today. It is approximately $49 billion in personal income taxes that go into the national treasury today, and about $11 billion from corporate tax. Of that $11 billion, about 80 per cent is made up of mostly small and medium-sized businesses.

I totally disagree with the system as it is today. That is why I am trying to change it and put forward a different approach. I dare to put something on the table which can be challenged and which is certainly less than perfect. It is a conceptual approach at this point, but it has been analysed by the social development model of Statistics Canada.

The main thing is that it is a doable system, in that it will generate the amount of revenue that the Government of Canada needs to meet its requirements. On that point we seem to be in agreement.

On the second point in terms of Mr. MacEachen's budget under my former boss, Mr. Trudeau, I was around at that time and I remember vividly the frustration, the anger that the country exhibited on that honest attempt by Mr. MacEachen to try and clean up the system. If I were to say one thing about what I learned from experiencing that exercise and what I have seen subsequently—I mentioned it in my speech earlier today and I am not against the Public Service so please do not take this out of context—it would be that it is very tough to move the officials in the Department of Finance when it comes to cleaning up the Income Tax Act of Canada. I do not think Mr. MacEachen, for whom I have the deepest respect, was tough enough. I do not think he was radical enough in simplifying and making the system more efficient. It was a great attempt but in the process of falling short you end up not advancing any more. That is the point I am making today. I believe that the days of tinkering with the system are over. It is time for a total radical approach.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask our colleague from Broadview—Greenwood—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a point of order but it is a point I have made time and time again. The intention of this question and comment period in the minds of the people who were on the committee on parliamentary reform, i.e. the McGrath committee, was that it should be a period for questions to be put to the hon. members who just spoke on a priority basis by members of parties other than the one of the person who just spoke.

In the absence of people rising who belong to other parties, the recognition of people from the party of the person who just spoke is quite in order, but the intention is for members of other parties. I know this is not exactly provided for in the Standing Orders, but I think the spirit of the reform was that and I never hesitate to get up and remind speakers, deputy or otherwise, that is what is supposed to be happening; not these cosy little chats between members of the same party.

In the absence of other people rising that is fine but otherwise it is not.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the hon. member from Winnipeg Transcona for his comment. The Chair does try, in the spirit of the rules, to recognize members from other parties so that a variety of views can be heard.

In this case, I had already given the floor to the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke and I admit that it may be simply because the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre is closer to me—

[English]

So he can catch the eye of the Speaker easier than you. I note very carefully your remark.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I had a very legitimate question that I wanted to ask my colleague. We did not have any kind of friendly chat. It was a simple question.

The president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business is Mr. Bulloch, or at least I know he used to be the head of it. He probably still is. I know that he made some criticism concerning the single tax concept, and I would like to know what my colleague's answer is to the criticism by Mr. Bulloch.

• (1710)

I want to respond to the member for Winnipeg—Transcona by saying that I will give a short answer to my colleague and I would be more than happy to answer any question that he would put forward.

The current small business rate is approximately 10 per cent and the single tax rate at this point, we are talking about a totally integrated system 20 per cent, effectively doubles the rate from 10 to 20 per cent.

Mr. Bulloch puts forward a legitimate concern. Imagine a small businessman making a net profit of $50,000 or a net profit of $100,000 a year. The current rate would be 10 per cent. The rate I am proposing is 20, so that would be an extra $10,000.

Under the complex system that is put forward right now, that small businessman between accountants' fees, lawyers' fees, paper burdens, et cetera, more than pays a 10 per cent factor and it is all negative energy. That is just one answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time is up unless the House gives unanimous consent. Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-18 gives us a chance to raise a very important question and I think that the most important thing in a democracy is the way we tax ourselves. I say ourselves, because after all, this government represents the people, and we elect our representatives to reflect the views of all Canadians. However, over the years, we have developed a tax system that has become so complex and so incomprehensible that it takes lawyers specialized in tax law to find ways to save money for big corporations, the wealthy and the financial elite of this country. Look at how thick this volume is! More than 1,400 pages for personal income tax! And so complex it would take someone educated by the Jesuits, and then some, to understand what this is all about. And now, Mr. Speaker, the government wants to introduce amendments—400 pages worth to explain what was not in the document. That gives you some idea of the lack of simplicity and fairness in our tax system.

I imagine the average person and the members of this House realize there is something fundamentally wrong with our tax system. There must be a reason for all these feelings of frustration. The tax system has become so unfair and unjust that people spend a lot of effort, a lot of negative energy, to quote the hon. member to find ways to avoid paying taxes. Our tax system should be simplified to make it not only fair and equitable but also appear to be fair and equitable. However, as long as we have volumes this thick, it certainly does not look like a system that is simple, fair and equitable.

The hon. member mentioned that about ten years ago, a former Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, tried to introduce tax reforms in this House. He was inspired by the findings of a royal commission, the Carter Commission, which was appointed between 1962 and 1963 and existed until 1967. Kenneth Carter, whom I consider a great Canadian, made a thorough study of our tax system and produced a document that was literally revolutionary. It contained some unprecedented elements for a democracy genuinely based on every single group in our society. Our Minister of Finance at the time tried to introduce some of these elements. The hon. member mentioned that this aroused a storm in Canada, but Mr. Speaker, it did not come from the middle class but from the big corporations and the financial community. They saw in this tax reform something that would benefit the middle class. Mr. Speaker, business people obviously take care of their businesses, and it is their business to save as much money as possible. You can hardly blame them. They are not doing anything illegal. In fact, they are well within the law. Here is the law: fourteen hundred pages worth, and another 400 pages of amendments.

Obviously, big companies and financiers can afford to call on lawyers, specialists and tax experts to find ways to pay as little tax as possible. Of course, if this class, the wealthiest in our society, does not pay its fair share, the burden falls on someone else: the middle class, the backbone of our society, indeed the backbone of democracy in all civilized countries. Nevertheless, we in the middle class have had unprecedented tax increases in recent years.

Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to say that our friends opposite, the government, the Conservative Party, are totally responsible for the tax increases. That is not what I am trying to say. I would like to be fair and equitable by saying that for years, governments have not really managed to find a fair and equitable system. That is the issue before us. They call it a reform, but we are not so gullible as to believe that it is one. What reform has been made in the tax system? Has it been simplified? On the contrary, it is more complex than ever. Does the middle class pay less? The people listening to me, Mr. Speaker, know very well that they pay more than their share. How can it be that millions of Canadians find themselves in a situation where the system has become unfair? Unfortunately, I find that our constituents, especially those in the middle class, cannot afford tax experts, specialists and lawyers to check their income tax returns to see if they are paying $200, $500, $1,000 or $1,500 too much.

In any case, they are too busy earning their living and working every They have other things to do and their purpose in life is not to find out how the tax system works. They take it for granted that those who sit in this House are working in their best interest, but it has been a failure on that score. It was a failure because we do not reflect the real values of our society for the middle class. Is it a great discovery to say that the middle class is the backbone of our society? Let us look at how they are treated.

Mr. Speaker, I was greatly influenced by a book written by Lynda McQuade on the tax system. In French, it is called La part du lion and in English, Behind Closed Doors. I found it extremely interesting because it showed that especially in the last twenty years, the financial elite and big companies have exerted pressure—and I am not saying that they have done anything wrong or illegal—they are looking after their business. They literally had the Department of Finance give them some tax breaks that are to their advantage. It is obvious that is what they did and she shows how it was done. People used to say that the rich don't pay. That's all very well, but if you can't prove it, what can you do? But in her book, she shows how the wealthy in our society were able to benefit under a tax system that was biased in their favour, and there are any number of examples. It's very complex, but it's all there.

In recent years, the middle class has started to realize that its tax burden has become intolerable. In the past few years, people have started to realize that we are becoming less and less rich. In other words, the middle class is having trouble maintaining the same standard of living it had in the past.

The sixties and the seventies were years of prosperity. The figures are there, and I am not going to quote Global Economics extensively, but this is an in-depht study which shows that during the sixties, a person earning an average wage could save up to 29 per cent of his net income, to spend on holidays or recreation.

In the seventies, this percentage dropped to around 17 per cent. Today, in the nineties, a member of the middle class who earns an average wage will save less than 1 per cent of his net income.

But what does it all mean? It means that we have to pay more than our share. Obviously, something has to be done.

Mr. Speaker, I was on an open-line show with the local host of a popular radio program, Alain Dexter, who has a wide audience and is very much aware of the way our tax system is biased against the middle class. He called me up and asked me to go on one of his shows to talk to his listeners. It was obvious from what people said that they were completely frustrated and, worst of all, they felt powerless. Although we represent the majority of Canadians and although they elect us, they feel powerless before a tax system that is biased against them.

However, what people must understand is that business people have done nothing unlawful. They take care of their businesses, and their business is to save money. Now that makes sense, doesn't it?

Our role, as middle-class Canadians, is to tell everyone who wants to represent us in this House that changes are required. This bill does not contain any. The middle class is taxed more than ever! What is needed is an in-depth review. We have an advantage over many countries in the world. We had a royal commission, the Carter Commission. We can draw inspiration from it to find ways to tax our people fairly and equitably. And once people will have realized that the fiscal system reflects the social values of integrity and justice, there will be no problem. There is no doubt in my mind that they will readily accept the fact that there is a deficit which has to be brought down.

I have to congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, because everyone here knows how hard he has worked on his single tax concept. His efforts should be recognized. He sought the advice of experts in the field. One of our friends opposite said that there are flaws in his plan, Mr. Speaker. Undoubtedly, and he admitted it himself. However, it is far easier to correct flaws on 2 pages than on 2,000 pages. He made an effort and it was a good way to start the discussions on how to approach the subject. He may not have all the answers, but it is certainly a start because it is by discussing and by submitting ideas— I know that he is aware of the Carter Commission because that was a revolutionary document and he was here then, when the Minister of Finance of the time, Mr. MacEachen, wanted to implement the findings of that commission.

Nothing is easy. It is obvious that everyone wants to protect its own interests. As a former Secretary General to the United Nations once said: "There is no such thing as permanent friends, and there is no such thing as permanent enemies. The only thing that is permanent in this life are personal interests." It is obvious that everybody will fight for that!

But for us the middle class, as well as those who represent it here, our interest is to make sure that the people that we represent are treated in a just and fair manner. That, however, is not the case. They use words such as "reform", but there has not been any reform. And as long as I will have the honour and the privilege to represent the people of the riding of Gatineau—La Lièvre in this House, I will work and work and ask the residents in my riding and elsewhere to create a united front. You mau say that everything starts with a dream. The dream that I have is that, at a given time, great numbers of voters will approach all the members of this House to tell them that they are not convinced that this tax system is fair and that they want us the members of Parliament to get on with the task of making sure that it is indeed a fair system.

As I mentioned earlier, there is nothing more fundamental in our society than the tax system. We tax ourselves. If we are incapable of finding a solution, how can we succeed in motivating Canadians to work harder, to keep on paying taxes, and to realize that we live in a great country, that we enjoy many benefits and that we want to protect them?

Mr. Speaker, what strikes me when I talk to people is their feeling of powerlessness. It really hurts me because the strength of our country is precisely its people. It hurts me to know that workers refuse to work overtime because they say that they pay too much in taxes. What does this mean, Mr. Speaker? They are convinced that they are paying too much in taxes, that is what they are saying. In fact, they feel that they are paying more than their fair share.

Therefore, I ask my voters that, together, we start saying everywhere what we think, and start saying that we are not pleased, that a reform is needed, and that as long as it is not implemented to bring fairness, there is no chance of keeping the social benefits that we enjoy now. We cannot expect the middle class to forever be the milk cow, because those people realize that there is less and less disposable income.

When I hear the Prime Minister say that the recession is over, I wonder since when it is over. We don't have any more money overnight. We have less and less disposable income; that does not change overnight. If the Prime Minister had really wanted to understand what the people go through, and especially the middle class, do you think that he would have imposed a 7 per cent tax just like that? Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that it could have been imposed gradually, 1 per cent a year for five or six years or 2 per cent a year, to show that an all-out effort was being made to be understanding.

We saw the frustration with the GST. What more do we need to see the deep dissatisfaction in our society with our present system? I will conclude with that, Mr. Speaker. I am not saying that they are to blame for all the problems on earth and in this country—that is not what we are trying to say. But I am trying to say that their attempt is far from convincing and does not tackle the real problem facing our country.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, I would like the government to realize that in this House, we all have the same values to defend, regardless of the political parties represented here. We all have the same values to defend. But if we go on having the same frustrations with the tax system as in the past few months, if we are unable to see something that clear, what hope do we have for the next generation, which sees that a solution cannot be found for a problem that exists and is at the heart of our democracy?

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that we all hold to the same values. I think part of the problem is that we do not all hold to the same values. We have different values. That is why we have different political parties and this is a place where we debate which values will actually inform and instruct legislation, in this case the Income Tax Act.

Obviously there is quite a difference in the value system which the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood employed in his idea of how the tax system should work and the value system which the hon. member for Ottawa South, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party, brings to his discussion of the taxation system.

On the one hand, we have the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood defending the idea of a flat tax, a single tax, which we know is particularly associated with him. He has been promoting it for a long time in a constructive way. That is fine, but it is confusing for the people of Canada who are trying to figure out what the Liberal Party stands for in terms of tax reform.

Perhaps the hon. member who just spoke could help us in this regard because, on the one hand, we have the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood saying: "Everybody, no matter what they make should be taxed the same," and on the other hand, the member for Ottawa South complaining on the same day that one of the problems with the tax system we have now is that in the upper income bracket, everybody is taxed the same, whether you are making $60,000 or $600,000, you are taxed exactly the same.

What we have in the upper income bracket right now is exactly the policy that the member for Broadview—Greenwood is advocating. Yet his colleague, the member for Ottawa South is saying that this is one of the things that is wrong with the tax system.

Perhaps the hon. member who just spoke could explain to us how Liberal policy works. Perhaps he could shed some light on the mystery that surrounds the making of Liberal policy, particularly with respect to tax reform.

It must be very confusing for members opposite and for members on this side to figure out just what is the status of the comments of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. It is one thing to have constructive debate within a party. I am not against that, and I think we should see more of that. If that is all that there is to it, that is fine.

Perhaps he could tell us what the official Liberal position is with respect to the single tax.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has given us a good example of how complex the law is. He has even managed to confuse other people. We are not discussing policy, we are discussing ideas.

We would like to hear the hon. member's ideas on tax reform. We want to be sure that the tax system is fair and equitable. Is there anything simpler than that? That is what we would like to see. There have been attempts in the past when this particular party was in power to come up with elements that could have made it simpler and more equitable.

We never said it was perfect. We are just discussing ideas. The message that comes through loud and clear, as I mentioned before, is that the middle class in our society is paying more than its fair share. They feel it. They are becoming more and more outspoken, and I think that it is time that we addressed the whole problem. We are listening to all ideas. Our friend from Broadview—Greenwood brought up an idea, the single tax. It certainly has a lot of merit and has been discussed in many quarters, but it is one of the ideas that is probably going to bring us in time to what I hope to be a truly fair and equitable tax system and we certainly have not seen it yet.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago from the NDP is interested in what the Liberal Party is going to do, he should listen to the member for Gatineau who just spoke and read the writings of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who has written so many papers, books, and everything. He spent days, nights, and months writing. The hon. member should read some of his writings and listen to the hon. member for Gatineau.

I want to ask a question in the form of a comment. Every time I have listened to the hon. member, and I have heard him over the years—I heard him in another assembly speaking about this subject of taxation as it relates to the middle class—he has always proposed in his speeches before today that the middle class must organize itself to become more effective in the political system vis-à-vis tax reform. Could the hon. member elaborate on that statement he has always made?

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, that is probably the biggest task we have before us. There is so much information out there and it is so complex. You can imagine the average citizen when he sees volumes of this size. Nobody wants to be ridiculed. Can you imagine trying to wade through this and finding an answer?

Obviously we have to find a simpler way. That is what we have been hearing from our people and our electors who form the middle class. They do not want to go into it page by page and the bits behind it. They know they would be lost in no time and they could be ridiculed. Nobody likes to be ridiculed. But they understand one fundamental thing: they are paying more than their fair share. The odd time they read about people earning more than $100,000 or so and not paying any income tax. People having write-offs, multinational companies—there is no end to it.

How can they be indifferent? They are upset and as I mentioned they feel powerless. The middle class needs to get organized.

Obviously I have been in contact with different organizations. They are ready to take up the battle and I know that it is going to take time. In my area there are going to be more groups paying visits to candidates in the next federal election, and they are going to ask, not in 50 or 400 pages, it is going to be one page, how candidates feel about the tax system and where they stand on reform that will be fair and equitable to all Canadians, and that will not be easy to achieve.

In this political system when the different candidates see that the majority want an answer to a problem like that and they see that the electorate is concerned, we will get answers from the members who will be sitting here after that election.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about people coming to members wanting to know where they stand. That is precisely what I want to know from him, where he stands with respect to a discrepancy between what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood had to say and what the hon. member for Ottawa South had to say and he gets up and tells me they are just talking about ideas, not policies.

First of all, maybe he could tell me the difference between an idea and a policy because it seems to me they are intimately related. Second, he could maybe give some answers on behalf of the Liberal Party. What is its policy or idea with respect, for instance, to the GST? Can he get up and say unequivocally that the Liberal Party will get rid of the GST if it comes into office? That is the kind of thing that people want to know from their political parties.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, that is an example of a member of this House who, instead of advancing the debate, is trying to find all sorts of "holes" and wondering what will happen if we give up something for something else. Is that really constructive? We are trying to find a complete answer.

An hon. member: He talks about values!

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, we are trying to advance the debate. Of course, it would be easy for any opposition party to say that it would abolish this or that, as we saw in the past. We just want to point out that it is in the interest of most Canadians to have a thorough study of our tax system done. Saying that you will abolish the GST will not solve the problem. It will not solve the problem, which is much deeper than that!

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I too want to join in the debate on the changes to the income tax and other legislation. Later on I will be dealing with one of the proposals in the legislation, the northern tax allowance, and how that is introduced into this legislation.

First let me talk about the policy of the New Democratic Party with regard to taxation versus the policy of the two members who spoke before me on behalf of the Liberal Party. I listened to the two members speak. I tend to forget that they were the government for most of the time since World War II and that the discrepancies and the inherent discrimination that exists within our taxation system is not only as a result of the last seven years of Conservative rule, but is basically as a result of the taxation system that the Liberal Party of Canada put into place.

The present Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Chrétien, the former Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Turner, were both ministers of finance. When they were not members of Parliament they were both corporate lawyers sitting on various boards of directors. They received, as we all know, much of their campaign funds from corporations. We have to wonder how a Liberal member in this House can get up and say: "It is true that in 1949, about 75 per cent of the income tax came from corporations and only about 25 per cent came from individuals". Then the hon. member said: "Of course, that is changed now." It is true that individuals pay about three-quarters of the income tax and actually much more than three-quarters and yet corporations only pay the smaller percentage. He said: "It is true that of the percentage that is paid by corporations, it is the small businesses that are paying the lion's share of it, not the large profitable corporations".

An hon. member: Where are the New Democratic Party ideas?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, take a look at what has happened in this country. We know there was that old line: Who pays more income tax, the bank clerk with the salary of $15,000 or $18,000 or $20,000 a year of the bank? And Canadians knew what the answer was. It was the bank clerk who paid more in income tax.

I find it ironic today that the Liberals have a speaker get up and say one thing, and another Liberal getting up and saying a different thing. That is so typical, because the members of the Liberal Party do not have a policy when they are in opposition. They have many different ideas, but they do not tell Canadians where they stand. Somehow they forget that their leaders, the present leader and the previous leader, were ministers of finance who helped to create the very system that is a problem today. There is example after example of how corporations have not paid their fair share of taxes.

Someone asked, where are the New Democratic Party ideas? We do not have to only quote from the policy papers that we have put forward in opposition to the GST, where all members of this House know we were the only party that gave specific examples of how we would raise taxes in this country as opposed to having the GST.

We gave examples and we had no fear about sending our report out to Canadians. Thousands of Canadians asked for that report and we sent it out. That was a party document, that was not the document of one individual. We explained our policy, whereas the Liberals as usual were ducking. That is what happened with the Liberals.

As I was pointing out, it is not a new idea. It is not new for the New Democratic Party to say that there are problems with the tax system. It is not new for us to say, as the Liberal member for Broadview—Greenwood is now saying, that the corporations are not paying their fair share of taxes. It was 19 years ago when our previous leader, the late David Lewis, wrote his book on corporate welfare bums The Louder Voices. The louder voices in our society had the ear of government. They had the ear of the elected representatives, again basically of the Liberal Party, but they also had the ear of the bureaucratic elite within our society.

In other words, the 1,400 pages that form the Income Tax Act today are a result of those louder voices. The 400 pages that we have in front of us as amendments to the legislation are again a result of those agencies within our society that have the louder voices.

As usual, scattered among that Income Tax Act and scattered among the 400 pages, there are a few good ideas that will help the disabled and that will help people in some northern communities. There are always some good ideas, some ideas that help the ordinary Canadian. However, by and large the changes in our taxation policy have not benefited ordinary Canadians.

It reminds me of the debate we had in the House of Commons earlier on the Public Service Alliance strike where it was said that people at the top would get zero and people at the bottom would get zero and that seemed fair. Then we found out that a whole bunch of other things were happening like bonuses and all sorts of performance pay so that the people at the top were still going to get more.

What has happened in our society is that the people at the top have always been getting more, whether we have a 0 per cent wage increase in place or whatever because there seems to be a different set of values, a different set of beliefs in how we should treat those at the top and how we should treat regular, ordinary Canadians. Somehow it has always been okay for corporations to have the three martini lunch and have that written off as a tax expenditure. Somehow it has always been okay for those in business to have a second family car and pretend it is a business car. It has always been okay for certain of their vacation costs to be covered by taxation. That seems to be an accepted belief within the government parties.

Governments have always written the taxation laws in such a way that a working Canadian on a regular salary is always going to be paying much more than his or her fair share of taxes, but those who run corporations, those who are at the top of the corporate ladder, those who are at the top of the government bureaucratic ladder, are going to have all sorts of benefits that are not taxed. That is a problem within the taxation system.

There are good ideas that can help alleviate that, but we have to understand that unless a political party is actually going to stand up and have its leader say that that is its policy it really means very little. It means very little when we know that the leader of the particular party has instigated a lot of the discrepancies and problems in our taxation system. It is very interesting to know that. It is very interesting to know that it is not just one, but it is a number of the Liberal leaders who have actually been behind the taxation system in this country at this time.

It is unfortunate that the Liberal Party does not have any ideas as a corporate whole and that it has to say: "We have somebody over here with a good idea on taxation and on human rights". That person over there might have some good ideas as a Liberal on human rights. That person speaks for the Liberals but he really does not speak for them on aboriginal affairs.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: The Liberals get upset when that is pointed out. I point that out, not only to criticize the Liberal Party, but because that is the exact problem we have with the present Prime Minister and the Conservative Party.

Remember the famous line of the hon. member for St. John's West: "If we told you what we would do, you would never vote for us". That was the Conservative line. They did not want to say what their policy was. They too had a strategy. Somebody over here would be saying: "We should have a simple income tax system". This is not a new idea. We used to have Conservative backbenchers giving the same suggestion, but it was never Conservative Party policy. It certainly was never taken up by the Conservative leadership.

There are problems in our taxation system. We do know that corporations are not paying their fair share of taxes and that we have created a system which is so complicated that it can never be fair.

It is ironic that we have had government after government, Minister of Finance after Minister of Finance getting up and saying: "I have proposals here which will make the taxation system simpler". Well, it ain't simple and it is not getting simpler.

Let me give an example, as it relates to the bill, of how complicated government has made taxation. When I was elected in 1979 there were certain benefits that people in the north received which were not taxed. Then as part of the MacEachen budget that was referred to earlier, it was decided to tax some of those benefits.

Then some people said: "Maybe that is not right". So all together we had three different years of moratorium on the taxation of northern benefits. That took us through the first six years of the period when I was elected.

Then the Conservatives came in and they decided they were going to have a northern tax allowance, but they would tax those things like housing, free travel to and from remote communities. They were going to have a northern tax allowance and that would resolve the problem.

Then two years later, after the government made that decision, the Minister of Finance came down with some new criteria which would take away 134 communities that used to receive northern benefits. While he was cutting these northern communities, he added communities to the northern tax allowance system that were bordering on the United States. I am not talking about the Yukon—Alaska border. I am talking about the border that comes around the 49th parallel. There was another system coming in from government.

A number of communities, including the communities of Thompson and Wabowden in my riding, were quite upset. They were not northern communities, but communities down south all of a sudden were northern communities.

The minister set up a task force with a mandate to come up with a northern benefit system that would be fair and would neither increase nor decrease revenue from the federal government. The commission went out and held hearings for a couple of years. Then after they had finished holding hearings the former Minister of Finance, now the Minister for International Trade, changed the guidelines for that committee. He said it was okay if it came down with a set of packages that may increase or may decrease revenue. Before it had hearings it was told to be basically revenue neutral. Then it had three years of hearings and the guidelines were changed so it could come down with a report which would in effect increase revenue.

That is exactly what the task force did. This task force came down in the fall of 1989 and recommended a procedure that would have created a situation whereby 2,740 communities would lose their benefit.

Obviously that created a bit of a problem for the government because a lot of those communities were in northern Tory ridings. A year later, they decided that idea was not a good one, so they have people coming to government and saying well, we want to change that, we want to change this. So the government came down last December and decided that we will not have one zone for northern tax benefits, we will have two zones. They drew a map and they had it presented and you know what? The idea in itself may have some benefit, but they drew these lines across the country. There is no appeal process, and some of the clauses in the legislation in front of us today basically enables this new process come into place.

Let me give an example of what has happened. Little Grand Rapids is a community in my constituency. It is hundreds of miles from any roads. It does not have a railway, it does not have ships. We are talking basically about a community where everything has to be flown in, or where you need to have winter roads. That is considered to be in the intermediate zone. In other words, it does not receive a full northern tax benefit, but only a 50 per cent tax benefit.

Another community which does not have roads, which does not have any regular access, the community of Bloodvein, is not even considered. This community does not receive any northern tax allowance.

The bureaucrats in Finance came across with a good idea in terms of setting out two different criteria, recognizing that some of the communities should receive 100 per cent northern tax benefit and others should receive a lesser percentage; 50 per cent was the suggestion made here.

But they do not allow for the people to really explain what the situation is. How do you feel if you are in a community in northern Manitoba, northern B.C., northern Saskatchewan or northern Ontario. You do not have any roads, and you are told you are not in a northern community.

I have raised the issue of northern tax benefits more often in this House than any other member. I have had to do so for the last 12 years that I have been a member of Parliament. One of the problems is not the fact that there is a northern tax benefit. The problem is that no one is really listening to the people who live in those communities. That is a specific problem that I felt should be addressed with regard to the legislation.

I think that same problem exists with a lot of other clauses in the Income Tax Act. It always seems that the louder voices are listened to, that the corporations can make the Minister of Finance believe that the three-martini lunch is a reasonable tax write-off because that is necessary to promote business.

We know of all sorts of people who run around making sure they pretend to pay the bill at the end of every lunch so they can write it off as a tax expenditure.

Ordinary Canadians who have to go out and buy tools in order to practise their livelihood are told: "No, you cannot write that off as an expense. What do you need tools for? What do you mean you are a carpenter? You are a welder. Why do you have to buy this equipment?" It may be stipulated in your job description that you need this equipment, but you cannot write it off as a tax expenditure. Now, if that person could go out, he or she could probably quite successfully explain why she had to have three martinis for lunch and have that written off as a tax exemption, but not the tools they need for their trade.

It points out the real problem in our tax system, and that is, who is being listened to? Until we find a way to make sure that corporations pay their fair share of taxes, to make sure that expenses are really business related expenses, we are not going to have any fairness in our taxation system.

• (1800)

A single tax may sound attractive to many people, but that is not going to resolve any issues as long as corporations are in a position to declare certain things as regular reasonable business expenses that we know are not really business expenses.

That is the problem, there is no fairness in the system. There is no desire by this government or by previous governments to be fair in the taxation system. There is no policy by the Liberal Party to have a simple, fair taxation system. There is certainly no policy by this Conservative government that gives us a fair and simple taxation system. It goes against their corporate interests.

There is no doubt that there are many people in this society who do not want a fair tax system. It means that the very people on top of the ladder, those in charge of corporations, are going to have to pay more. They know that, and they do not want a fair taxation system. They will ensure that we do not have a fair taxation system in this country.

Unfortunately, as long as the Liberals and the Conservatives are beholden to the corporate elite in this society, they are not going to change the taxation system in this country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member from the New Democratic Party for the last 20 minutes.

He talked about different ideas that we were trying to put forward in order to advance the debate on the tax condition in this country.

I noticed that not once did he put forward a specific idea of the New Democratic Party or, for that matter, from his own riding.

I campaigned in the last election against the New Democratic Party. If there is one thing that I noticed it is that people in Canada are fed up with listening to politicians who just oppose for the sake of opposing. They want to hear constructive ideas and alternatives.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to utilize the following few minutes available to me to revisit a question I asked on September 23, 1991 of the Minister of Transport with regard to the open skies negotiations with United States of America.

We all know the troubling times that the aviation industry is going through. There were some 3,000 people laid off last summer as you will no doubt recall between Air Canada and Canadian. A few weeks ago, there were another 2,300 people laid off between Air Canada, Canadian and Nationair.

The suggestion is that we ought to make the industry stronger, that we have to right the wrongs and we have to try to establish a strong foundation for a domestic airline industry. It seems to me that this government, going into the open skies negotiations, with suggestions that we are going to get cabotage, which is a fancy code word that says that any American carrier can travel freely across Canada to pick up passengers and drop them off at any point, and therefore compete openly with our domestic carriers.

That will not make an industry stronger, but in fact push not only Air Canada and Canadian probably to merge, but in a number of years, without sounding alarmist, I do not think we will speaking of a Canadian-owned, Canadian-controlled industry.

When this government gave us deregulation in the air, promised diversification and greater competition, meaning better prices for Canadians and meaning more competitiveness in the private sector.

What we have in essence is a duopoly. What happened to all the regional air carriers, the commuter services that were basically gobbled up by the two air carriers, Air Canada and Canadian. In the open skies negotiations, if we give the Americans carte blanche to do to Canadian and Air Canada what Air Canada and Canadian did, with all due respect, to the regional airlines, then I think the conclusion and the net result are quite predictable.

• (1805)

Therefore, I and other colleagues of this side of the House have been asking the government for a clear assurance, a clear commitment that in the open skies negotiations the Canadian negotiating side would not give in as our side gave in during the free trade talks to granting Americans cabotage rights. That is to say, we are in favour of trying to bring the agreement which has been last visited in 1974 up to speed. We are prepared to take a look at various parts of the industry. However, we are not prepared to completely deregulate the industry. We still wish to deregulate it and we still wish to protect our carriers in the face of the giant American carriers. We do not want to do in the air what this government has done to the truckers on the ground.

Therefore we ask the government for a clear undertaking that there will be no cabotage at the end of the negotiations. If there was a choice between cabotage and breaking off the negotiations, this side would be in favour of the latter in respect of our industry and the realities they are in. The minister did not want to answer in a clear concise way, and I am hopeful and am looking forward to the relatively new parliamentary secretary, who has had a fairly auspicious start, who has been fairly co-operative, to perhaps clarify the situation today for Canadians in favour of a Canadian domestic industry.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member opposite has given me an opportunity again to put the position of the government on the record.

The approach taken by Canada at the bilateral air negotiations with the United States takes into full account the financial state and the needs of the Canadian airline industry.

At the exploratory rounds held to date, Canadian negotiators have repeatedly emphasized to the U.S. that any new agreement must include a phased approach to implementation and meaningful safeguards to provide conditions that will ensure the ongoing viability of the Canadian airline industry.

These negotiations have included a consultation process that is unprecedented in scope for bilateral air negotiations. The Canadian delegation at the negotiations includes representatives of the airlines, unions and communities. Their views are given full consideration in the Canadian negotiating position.

There is no intention on the part of Canada to give U.S. carriers access to Canada in a manner that would be to the detriment of the Canadian industry, as suggested by the opposition member.

The issue of cabotage has been greatly over-emphasized. Canada will not negotiate cabotage or any other right unless it represents a good deal for Canadian carriers and does not threaten their viability or the preservation of Canada's air transportation system.

As my hon. friend also knows, there are many other important issues to be taken into account such as fair and competitive access to U.S. airports and advantages for Canadian carriers to offset U.S. carrier strengths. All of these have to be addressed so that we end up with a good deal for Canadian carriers and for Canadian users of trans-border air services.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, on May 28 I rose in this House to ask the minister what he was going to do about the very serious unemployment that was accelerating and unemployment that was denuding our industries of their work forces and their ability to compete.

At that date in May, unemployment in Canada was at 10.5 per cent. Today unemployment has gone up, in spite of the fact that this government claims the recession is over. Unemployment is now at 10.6 per cent.

In my area of metropolitan Toronto, unemployment is at 10.8 per cent, above the national average. Toronto used to be the industrial heartland of Canada.

What is happening? This government's policies of giving us free trade and at the same time increasing the value of our dollar by 20 per cent, increasing our interest rates, increasing our tax levels, has driven businesses out of business. It has caused bankruptcies. Thirteen per cent of Canadian manufacturing jobs have been lost in Canada since free trade came in due to this government's economic mismanagement. Two hundred and sixty-one thousand manufacturing jobs have been lost. If this recession ends, many of those jobs will not come back. Sixty to seventy per cent of them are gone forever. The ones that were not just wiped off the map have moved south to the United States.

• (1810)

Why is this? It is because this government has been totally oblivious to the needs of our Canadian industries and what it takes to make our industries competitive and strong.

What is even more alarming is not just the number of jobs we have lost today, but ask anybody in this country who is putting up new industrial plants, who is building new factories. No one. They are just not there.

Is the mood turning around now that the recession is supposedly over? The Canadian Federation for Independent Business revealed in a survey that 36 per cent of small and medium-sized businesses in Ontario are considering moving out with a potential job loss of 500,000 jobs.

We see something that is happening at de Havilland, metro Toronto's biggest industrial employer; 4,200 workers today, announced layoffs of 1,300, plus a threat to close the plant. Will this government give us one firm commitment that it is prepared to stand behind de Havilland and its workers, a leading aerospace industry in the world, producer of the best commuter aircraft of its class in the world?

This government's economic mismanagement has not only driven jobs out of this country, it is continuing to drive those jobs out, and business has lost confidence in this government.

Dramatic measures are necessary and it means a complete reversal of this government's policies, not just for my province, but right across this country, or otherwise this ruination, this deindustrialization and this transformation of Canada from a branch plant into a warehouse economy will continue.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to expand in greater detail on the questions of May 28 by the member for Willowdale.

As the hon. member will know, the world economy has experienced its worst slump since 1945. For the first time since 1945, the total production and income of all nations will decline. Canada, unfortunately, has not been immune from these events.

This government shares the concerns of all Canadians with the effects of the slowdown which has recently ended. This government is working to strengthen the Canadian economy and foster the recovery.

The government's policy of debt reduction and fiscal restraint is beginning to yield results. The Bank of Canada rate has fallen by 4 per cent in the last 16 months and is now at its lowest rate since February 1988.

As well, over-all output in the economy has recorded gains in the last four months and the composite leading indicators at Statistics Canada continued to strengthen in July, after three previous increases.

Through its policies of actively pursuing freer trade and harmonious international relations, the government is seeking to increase markets for Canadian goods. International competitiveness is strong in certain industries and workers will have to adapt to compete in international markets. Changes will have to be made and adjustments will occur as a result of a shift in global economy.

The government has recognized that some industries and workers will be negatively affected by this adaptation and it has responded by introducing numerous programs and services. This year alone, Employment and Immigration Canada has allocated more than $3 billion for training and employment assistance for workers, industries and communities.

In the hon. member's home province of Ontario, and the province of my colleague for Cambridge, Ontario, in 1991-92 Employment and Immigration Canada has earmarked $800 million for training and programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy. These programs are all part of the labour force development strategy, a strategy designed to give workers and industry more direct say in how federal resources are used to address labour market problems.

• (1815)

This labour force development strategy is our government's long range plan for building a strong, highly skilled—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time is up. The next speaker is the hon. member for Drummond.

[Translation]

TEXTILE AND GARMENT INDUSTRIES

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight as I did several times over the past year and for seven years now to look after the interests of the textile workers and industries in my riding and across Canada.

With the Uruguay Round in 1986, the ministers have embarked upon the most ambitious multilateral trade negotiations ever as well as the most complex and detailed to have been conducted to date. Normally, the Uruguay should have produced a new textile trade framework mechanism.

In fact, the Minister for External Trade described Canada's objectives in these terms on March 2, 1990: first, to strengthen the multilateral trading system while providing sufficient protection to national industries through fairer and more foreseeable competitive conditions at the international level; second, to ensure that, during the transition period, our industry is granted the same protection as our main trading partners, particularly the United States.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, the MFA, which governs the international trade in textiles was renewed unchanged for 17 months on July 31, 1991, because the Uruguay Round did not turn out as planned in December 1990, in Brussels.

After examining the latest version of the text by the textile negotiations group, to be used as the basis for the new framework agreement, the textile industry has concluded that it does not meet those objectives.

A number of major changes are necessary, more specifically in the provisions relating to growth rate and competition restrictions. The transition must be very gradual, otherwise Canadian producers will suffer and be at a serious disadvantage, compared with their American competitors, under the new system of international trade.

I urge the minister to instruct his officials to conclude an agreement that meets the stated objectives and to consider the objections expressed by the textile industry in its letter to the minister dated September 19, 1991.

Under free trade, both countries must have more or less the same external quota system, in other words, the same tariffs and quotas.

If American businesses enjoy better policies than Canadian businesses, it will be a strong incentive for the latter to invest in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, American manufacturers enjoy better protection than Canadian manufacturers. Almost all U.S. textile imports from developing countries are regulated by quotas and bilateral agreements.

The United States have quotas for imports of certain fabrics manufactured in Japan or Indonesia, while Canada does not. In Canada, only 11 per cent of textile imports are regulated by quotas.

Mr. Speaker, if Canada had always applied the same trade policies as the United States, it would not have been necessary to restructure production the way it has done. To become and remain competitive internationally, the textile sector needs external needs the same protection enjoyed by U.S. textile manufacturers.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the last three years have not been very good for the industry. Its giant, Dominion Textiles, is still losing money. Manufacturers' investments and production capacity have dropped, mainly because of the recession, but also because of the uncertainly around the GATT talks and because of recommendations by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, which favours a 26 per cent reduction in customs tariffs. The industry is also faced with an overvalued dollar and very high interest rates, as well as requests—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must interrupt the hon. member. The rules state that it is four minutes. Therefore, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has the floor for two minutes.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to congratulate the hon. member for Drummond who has done an extraordinary job as regards the textile issue, since he was elected in 1984. I think that his good work must be emphasized. The hon. member always expresses his opinions in a pragmatic fashion and in a way that is beneficial to the interests of the people in his riding.

• (1820)

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to answer, on behalf of the government, the important question raised by the hon. member. I want to assure this House that the government works on several fronts to ensure the long term viability and competitiveness of the Canadian textile and garment industry.

For instance, during the present Uruguay Round of the multilateral trade negotiations, we work hard to obtain the gradual and progressive reintegration of the textile and garment trade under the GATT, over a transition period of ten years, so as to give the Canadian industry a reasonable chance to adapt to the new international trade environment.

We are also in the process of negotiating a new mechanism designed to protect our industry against sudden increases that could hurt the textile and garment exports during the transition period leading to the implementation of the normal GATT rules.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, we and our trade partners intend to approve the GATT protocol that will extend the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, which expired on July 31st 1991, to December 31st 1992. This will also have the effect of extending the existing bilateral agreements on the limitation of textile and garment imports until the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of negotiations. We expect that new transition rules will be implemented immediately thereafter.

In the context of North American free trade, the Canadian negotiators are in close consultation with our textile and our garment industries, to make sure that their interests are reflected in the Canadian position during the negotiations.

Finally, Mr. Speaker— Unfortunately, I once again—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is because the new rules for this period have become very strict and I cannot allow an exception for anybody.

Adjournment Debate

[English]

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, elaborating on my question of September 30, why do we need greater support for multiculturalism in Canada?

This past summer we witnessed acts of racial violence against black Canadians in Halifax and Montreal. Continuing injustices against native Canadians were documented in the Manitoba aboriginal justice inquiry.

Last week I reported on discrimination against persons of colour at Canadian border crossings. Today we read that the Solicitor General of Canada defends the use of ethnic crime data which is contrary to sound human rights practices and will increase racial stereotyping.

Employment equity is not enforced by the federal government and racial minorities do not have equal opportunities for employment and promotion.

While racism escalates and systemic discrimination continues, we have also heard a growing backlash against multiculturalism, particularly against the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

The Spicer report illustrated a lack of public understanding of multiculturalism, although its recommendations for a review and for closer co-ordination with immigration and settlement were appropriate.

The Reform Party advocates discontinuation of multiculturalism altogether and funding of multicultural programs. Not to be out-reformed, the delegates to the Conservative Party convention voted unanimously to do away with the Department of Multiculturalism and all funding for multicultural organizations.

Tory resolutions called for the abandonment of multiculturalism in favour of a melting pot policy, restrictions on where new immigrants can live and restrictions on citizenship to require five years of residency.

Canadians deserve to know whether the Prime Minister and his government will follow these Conservative Party policy decisions. Will funding for programs to fight racism be cut? Will advocacy groups that speak for minorities be refused funds? Will obligations on the Multiculturalism Act be abandoned? Will employment equity for visible minorities continue to be ignored?

On September 30, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Multiculturalism replied to my question, defending his department and in particular his priority of working to combat racism.

I appreciate his sincerity but must insist that to be effective multiculturalism policy must have strong support from the Prime Minister and cabinet to become a government priority. The early examples I have cited prove how far we have yet to go.

I also asked the minister to undertake a major public education program to promote a better understanding of multiculturalism.

• (1825)

I did not mean just the programs undertaken on March 21, the international day to counteract racism. We need a revision of Canadian history books to reflect accurately ethnic history. We need to enlist actively the support of the media which too often add to stereotyping and hysteria. We need thoughtful public discussions about the changing nature of Canada, our multicultural heritage, our appreciation of diversity, and our national commitment to protect minority rights.

As Canadians reconsider our future, we must have full participation of persons and groups from all ethnic origins. Multiculturalism is not just for ethnic minorities. It reflects the very nature of our citizenship and our national values. Recognition of this fact must be reflected in all aspects of government and in public policies.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, given the time available, I will try also to give my colleague as comprehensive an answer as possible. First of all I would like to stress that the hon. member for Vancouver is supporting the eradication of racial discrimination in Canada. I would like to point out to her that there is a big difference between the preliminary resolution, passed by delegates at the last Conservative convention and the actual policy of the government. Indeed, the constitutional proposals recently tabled in the House confirm the government's strong commitment to equal participation, common citizenship and national unity.

The federal government is determined to play a leading role in the eradication of racism and racial discrimination in this country. However, this is a task which it cannot carry out alone. We need the cooperation of all Canadians, all government organizations as well as the private sector if we want to achieve progress in eliminating barriers to equality and full participation in our society. That is the reason why, Mr. Speaker, last summer, following some incidents in Halifax and Montreal which increased racial tensions, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship set up in Nova Scotia an Advisory Committee on Race Relations.

This advisory committee, made up of representatives from all three government levels and the black community, had the mandate to come up with an action plan and make recommendations to fight racism. In thirty days, the advisory group was able to write a report which they presented to the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship on September 11. That is an excellent example of what we can achieve by working together.

Mr. Speaker, Canada continues to act on the basic principles mentioned in the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. I would like to point out some of the initiatives taken so far, such as the creation of the Canadian Centre on Policing and Race Relation. That centre seeks to improve relations between the police and various cultural groups in Canada.

I would like to continue, Mr. Speaker, but I can see my time is up.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on October 25, I put a question to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds concerning the financial disaster which is facing Canadian farmers. I pointed out to the minister that spontaneous rallies were being held across the country, from Lucknow, Ontario to Miami, Manitoba to Russell, Manitoba to Rosetown, Saskatchewan and right across the country.

I put this question to the minister: How much longer do farmers have to continue to rally? How much longer do they have to continue to lose their farms? How much longer do their families, their livelihood, their integrity as farmers in rural Canada have to be put under this kind of sledge-hammer action by the government before there will be action?

It was very interesting that when the minister replied he said: "You would think that the whole problem is the result of this government's policy". That is exactly the problem. The government provided very extensive support to farmers in 1987, 1988 and 1989.

We will recall that 1988 was an election year. What we are concerned about is the way the government dramatically chopped support last year. It cut support across this country to Canadian farmers by $1.3 billion, approximately $1 billion in western Canada and $300 million in eastern Canada.

• (1830)

At the same time that this government was chopping support to Canadian farmers, the value of their grain was dropping by some 30 per cent from roughly $135 a tonne for wheat to about $95 a tonne for wheat.

This spring the government brought in a new safety net program. Generally farm groups were saying they supported the safety net program with one proviso. Because of the government's cutback in support last year on the 1990 crop, they were asking that there be special, transitional support this past spring. In the west they talked in terms of $1 billion. In eastern Canada they talked in terms of $200 million.

What we have seen since that legislation was passed is a series of non-cash assistance. In fact, no cash significance of any amount has been provided since last spring. That is why we are seeing momentous rallies forming all over this country. This is why farmers tell us they are in the worst financial crisis in living memory, because of the price of wheat, because the government has welshed on its commitment to provide that emergency cash transitional assistance.

The most maddening part of it is that we hear all kinds of smoke screens as to why it is not doing this. It is consulting with the third line of defence. The Prime Minister threw out a tidbit last week in Winnipeg that he is considering it. He is asking for a recommendation.

The farmers have been asking, simple and plain, since last March and April: "There is a crisis on our hands. If you don't do something there is going to be a desperate situation". Canadian farmers are facing that desperate situation now. They want action by this government.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be able to respond to the hon. member for Algoma. I want to say that this government has always supported our farmers and will support our farmers in this great nation of Canada. To have someone say that we have not is just not the case at all.

GRIP and NISA were developed at the request of producers to replace a system of ad hoc payments. That is what it was over the last few years, just ad hoc payments to deal with a situation that is not predictable. How can a farmer go to the bank with a program like that?

That is the reason the safety nets were put in place. They are bankable programs. Before you plant a crop you can go to your lending institution and get the support that is necessary to plant that crop.

Also, because of those safety net programs, over the next 12 months approximately $2 billion will be delivered to farmers through these programs. That assistance will be most helpful, I know. No matter what the hon. member for Algoma says, $2 billion is a lot of money. As someone said in the House today: "That is not chicken feed".

We know there continues to be hurt out there. There is no getting away from that. We are committed to doing the very best that we can to support our farmers through this very difficult time. The fact is that the government has been there for Canadian farmers, as I said before. As I said, our record of support for agriculture is unprecedented.

Just last Friday the Prime Minister met with farm leaders in Winnipeg to listen to their concerns but, more important, what the Prime Minister did at that time was he gave his commitment that further cash assistance would be forthcoming. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds will be reporting their findings and recommendations to the Prime Minister by the end of this week.

We will then be able to respond to the needs expressed by the farm leaders throughout Canada. That is part of the established program that is there to work with the farm leaders in this country to deliver the programs as are needed.

We will still continue to pursue our efforts through the GATT agreement and the negotiations that are taking place there. I just want to reinforce that this government does support our agricultural industry in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed carried.

[English]

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce this bill today.

This bill toughens up the parole provisions of the Parole Act. It provides for victim impact statements and says that sentences should be served consecutively.

This bill is in response to a meeting that the members of the Edmonton government caucus had with victims of Larry Takahashi last spring. We believe it will go a long way to meeting their concerns and the concerns of many other Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Thorkelson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have here before me a petition on national unity from the citizens of Winnipeg, many of whom are from my constituency. It is in conformity with the rules and regulations governing such.

These petitioners point out that during the last several years there has been a great deal of work done on constitutional renewal. They point to the Citizens' Forum as another initiative and the joint Senate--House of Commons Committee on the process for amending the Constitution, the Beaudoin-Edwards constitutional committee.

The petitioners indicate as well that these have been supplemented and reinforced by several provincial and territorial studies. Of course they note that there is an initiative before the Canadian people today.

The petitioners call upon the leaders of each political party to work together to build a stronger, more united Canada for this and future generations.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have a second petition to present with your permission Mr. Speaker. This one is on education. It is in conformity with the rules and regulations of the House of Commons.

These petitioners point out that the government speaks of globalization, competitiveness, increased productivity, a stronger economic and social system to respond to the needs of Canadians, but at the same time it reduces transfer payments to provinces for education in a significant kind of way, almost a half billion dollars this year.

Of course they lament the fact that there have been increases on students when certain taxes such as the goods and services tax have been imposed. They are particularly angry at the 3 per cent tax on student loans, that one which affects those students who need to borrow, the one where they have to pay cash up front before they get the loan.

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins--Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition signed by a number of my constituents in Iroquois Falls, South Porcupine, Timmins and the other areas that I represent.

They are calling on the government to support our rural way of life, to stop the devastation and to stop the closing of our rural post offices as we know them today. They are asking that the government understand that there is a rural way and for these post offices to remain open.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins--Chapleau): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I also have two petitions to present signed by numerous Canadians from Cambridge, Foleyet, Timmins, Wawa and White River. They are asking that this government realize that the CBC is by far, in most cases, their only link with the rest of Canada.

They are asking that the services continue and that the funding remain in place. It not only keeps them linked with the rest of Canada, but it also represents some 1,200 job losses if this funding does not continue. They are asking the government to come to its senses and renew this funding.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from Abitibi, for residents of Malartic and Rivière-Héva. Whereas preventive withdrawal from the work force of pregnant women is a desirable and necessary option for working women, therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to seriously consider the shortcomings of the Canada Labour Code during the review process and recognize the need for including in the Code certain clauses concerning the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-16, an act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto, be read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have in front of us Bill C-16 at second reading, which is an act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act.

We have had a significant amount of agricultural legislation in front of the House since we have been the government, since 1984, and we have done it pretty much in consultation with the industry.

• (1020)

This is another example where producer input has been important in bringing the amendments to us that we have here today. They do not in any way dramatically alter the Agricultural Products Marketing Act but are necessary to increase the responsiveness of the act to the industry's current needs.

The bill will confirm that wood and wood products are considered agricultural products under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. This covers any wood product, be it pulpwood, hard or soft wood, or wood produced on a farmer's lot or by non-farmers. Since the 1960s the Department of Agriculture has considered wood to be included in the definition of an agricultural product. Because of this interpretation a number of orders were passed for wood and wood products, particularly from the province of Quebec.

It is interesting to note that in 1981 the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations suggested that wood is not an agricultural product as defined under the act. More recently the committee suggested that the act be amended to include wood and wood products clearly in the definition. Members can appreciate, therefore, the desirability of moving ahead with the amendments before us today. Previously approved wood orders might be challenged and declared ultra vires and new orders cannot be approved until these amendments are passed.

There are several benefits to producers associated with an effective wood marketing system from the perspective of farm woodlot operators. These benefits include, first of all, increased income and employment opportunities from the production of wood in addition to the traditional agricultural commodities on the farm; second, the potential for greater diversification through research into new products and processes; third, a more stable farm operation; and, fourth, some improved environmental controls with respect to shelter belt and water course control.

Non-farm wood producers also benefit from the improvements in services provided by the wood producers marketing boards, services such as improved marketing information and co-ordinated marketing.

To clarify the status of wood and wood products further, the bill will also confirm the validity of previously approved wood orders. Provincial boards and agencies have also asked that they be given the authority to recover unpaid levies through civil legal action. While the recovery of unpaid levies is not in any way a major problem at the present time, the boards and agencies noted that they have this authority when collecting levies under provincial jurisdiction and would like to have a parallel authority under the federal act. An amended clause to the bill gives them this authority.

I think this is a fairly straightforward amendment to a bill that has been in existence for a long time in this House. In conclusion, I would ask that members join with me in supporting these amendments which, just to reiterate, would include wood under the definition of an agricultural act as far as the Agricultural Products Marketing Act is concerned. Second, they would facilitate levy collection from producers within a marketing board. Third, they would confirm the role of this act in continuing to facilitate interprovincial and export trade.

These changes respond directly to the wishes of wood and other agricultural producers. They are another demonstration of our government's willingness to work with producers. They are very straightforward amendments. They simply respond to producers' needs and concerns over the way the present act operates. They also respond to what used to be called the stats and regs committee, statutory regulations. It is a joint committee. We think the amendments as far as the APMA is concerned will receive wide support in the House.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-16, respecting the Agricultural Products Marketing Act.

This act is really the basis for orderly marketing by provincial marketing agencies such as those which exist in provinces for poultry, dairy and many other commodities. It gives them the legal authority to produce commodities and have agencies which will have a marketing thrust beyond the borders of those provincial boundaries. It is very important legislation especially to provincial agencies, including the agencies which market food for Quebec farmers. Much of the production and marketing of wood goes through an agency and that is what this bill is all about this morning.

The statutory instruments and regulations committee back in the early 1980s called into question whether or not orders made under this act for the marketing of wood were legitimate or not. The then Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Whelan, was notified as to the validity of the federal government marketing orders which were made under this legislation as it affected the marketing of wood by Quebec producers.

The legislation which we have before us is really to legalize the wood marketing orders made as far back as 1983. In fact, the specific orders include Quebec wood orders made in 1981, an eastern township wood order, a Gatineau wood order, a Pontiac wood order, a Quebec south wood order. They were mentioned in a letter to the Hon. Eugene Whelan on October 12, 1983, and were signed by Senator John Godfrey who was the joint chairman of the regulatory and statutory instruments committee of the day and by Mr. Beatty who was the co-chair and by Mr. Kenneth Robinson who was the vice chair at that time.

This legislation is of a technical nature. It is designed to clarify the legal status of those marketing orders which were made many years ago. It also gives the marketing agency the power to collect under civil action from those producers who have not paid their levies. Apparently in the past there were fines levied by the courts but often the fines were often less than the wood orders that the unco-operating wood producer had failed to pay. It was really questionable how effective the fine would be if they failed to pay it.

As I understand it, this legislation will give the marketing agencies in Quebec the authority to collect those levies which are placed on the producers. It also has a provision which would make those existing orders retroactive and legalize those wood orders made right back to 1983.

This legislation is long overdue and should have been brought forward in 1984 or fairly soon after the problem arose in late 1983. However, the government has procrastinated for some six or seven years. We believe that the legislation should go forward and should be approved as soon as possible because it will make for a more legalized arrangement for those agencies as marketing agencies.

One of the great problems in agriculture today, perhaps the greatest problem, is the lack of orderly marketing. We do have it in some commodities, for instance, the Ontario Milk Marketing Agency and the milk marketing agencies, right across the country through the power of this legislation.

It is being called into question as to whether or not the government will be able to maintain that orderly marketing which has not only provided a stable farm income for those commodities which are marketed under the authority of the agencies in provincial jurisdictions but because of what is happening in negotiations at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in Geneva this fall.

Certainly there is a great deal of concern. I met last Friday with the milk producers from Manitoulin and Sudbury districts, which are in my riding. They were expressing extreme concern about orderly marketing, whether the kind of orderly marketing which we had since 1965 in that commodity can and will be maintained. There are reports that the government may not be maintaining those international instruments of agreement to maintain that kind of orderly marketing. The same kind of orderly marketing that we seek for grains and oilseeds in the international realm is equally important in that realm.

Can we maintain an orderly marketing system wherever we have one as we have for supply managed commodities? Domestically we see stability, we see certainty, we see ongoing viability of that industry.

That is what we seek in our negotiations in the international field as well, because marketing that is chaotic, that is decided by powerful, international marketing cartels and companies is not to the benefit of the producers.

That is the greatest challenge I see both for us domestically and internationally this fall. It is to try to put in place regimes that will not see producers selling grain or oilseeds or whatever it is at half the cost of production.

Only by international agreements can we outlaw massive export subsidies or subsidy programs which are designed to drive the price down, push somebody out of the market, capture markets or to destroy producers. Not only is it destroying Canadian agriculture, but agriculture in other countries that are of comparable size such as Australia and other jurisdictions.

What we have in many realms domestically through our supply management system is an orderly marketing regime that provides producers with a reasonable return, provides consumers with a fair price, good supply and an opportunity for those agriculture producers to maintain and diversify activity, to be able to practise good conservation techniques, sustainable agriculture and concern for the environment.

That is what we seek in commodities like poultry, dairy, fruit and vegetables that we market domestically. We seek the same thing internationally. With respect to our grains and oilseeds, 80 per cent of them are marketed internationally.

I believe that is why so many Canadians are very concerned this year. They see producers facing destruction of their very viability, of their ability to produce basic foods that are needed both domestically and internationally.

The legislation before us this morning is really more of a technical nature. It legalizes the existing arrangements which have been provided over the years for marketing orders. In Quebec much of the wood production is by farmers through local wood marketing agencies and this legislation simply gives them the power, the legal authority for the arrangements they have had for many years. But it also puts those marketing agencies for wood on a more firm legal basis. It allows them to recover through the civil courts money from producers who fail to pay the levies that are provided under the marketing agencies, and it also legalizes those orders which have been made for many years, back to about 1981 or 1982 which have been called into question by the statutory instruments and regulations committee of the House.

We do not see any problem with this legislation. We wonder why the government has waited almost seven years to bring it in. We see it as a useful piece of legislation that should ultimately be adopted by this House and by the committee and added to the laws relating to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C-16, an amendment to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act which has the effect of including wood in the definitions of agricultural products.

As has been said, this is a housekeeping amendment but it presents an important principle which is, I guess, the reason why the government has put it forward. That important principle is that all law in this country and all power to act, in this case in the marketing of agricultural products, is a general rule of the law under a parliamentary system that things cannot be done by the cabinet without the passage of a law in the House of Commons, and its eventual approval by all of the Parliament of Canada, both the House and the Senate.

That is essentially what is happening here today. The current law did not include wood specifically in its description of what were agricultural products or natural products under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. One of our standing committees, as long ago as 1981, pointed out that there could be some dispute as to whether wood was or was not covered. This amendment specifically includes wood as one of the natural products covered by the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. This amendment puts it in compliance with some of the acts that exist in provinces, particularly in Quebec, where wood is described as one of the products.

I think this type of business should go through the House very quickly. The committee agreed in 1981 that there was a probable lack of specificity in the act as it existed then. The federal government and some of the provincial governments had already acted as if wood was, in fact, a natural product according to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. So what we do here today will not change anything except the future possibility of a court case revolving around the fact that wood had not been specifically mentioned until this bill passes. It is a relatively minor thing in the day of the House. I would think it is the kind of thing that we would generally do in all stages and have done with but that is not the choice that has been made by the government. There is going to be part of a day spent on it now, some time in committee and more time later on, as it goes through third and final reading.

• (1040)

The sector that it is intended to address is the forest industry. The two provinces that have the most at stake in this particular piece of legislation are Quebec and New Brunswick which have organizations within their provinces formed under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. Quebec has already been granted, I understand, the power to carry its program beyond the borders of Quebec for wood products, and that has been the case for a lot of years. This simply makes certain that that is in fact legal and is a right that is granted from this House of Commons rather than only from the cabinet level.

The private woodlot sector in Quebec makes up 15 per cent of the territory of the harvestable commercial forest in that province but supplies 25 per cent of the province's softwood and pulp and paper products. It is an extremely important sector. To have the ability to market the product and promote the product through a marketing board is something of use to that province's producers.

About one-third of the people who are involved in the woodlot industry in Quebec are also farmers. Aside from the pulp and paper and sawmill products that are produced in those forests, maple syrup, essential oils, charcoal, Christmas trees and wood for heating also come from those privately owned forests. It is a relatively important sector of the agriculture and resource industry in that province.

As I said earlier, New Brunswick also has associations formed under its agricultural products marketing legislation. It has about 38,000 woodlot owners who sell some $90 million worth of pulp wood and saw logs on the slightly less than 2 million hectares of the province that are covered by woodlands.

The president of the New Brunswick Federation of Woodlot Owners points out that their province is in fact a net importer of wood, but they do export some to Maine and to Europe. They do not charge a levy at the moment on wood that is exported to Maine, but this legislation would make it possible and would make it legal for them to do so should they decide that that is the route to go.

The effect on the rest of the country is less clear because none of the other provinces have woodlot associations that are formed under the agricultural marketing legislation, although I am aware in my own province of a very active woodlot owners association which is attempting to encourage the production of wood on privately held land and on farms both as an environmental addition through fence lines and the provision of routes for wildlife to move and to live in.

It is also seen as useful in developing types of wood which will be useful for commercial purposes along with farming itself. While the trees can provide a wind break and a habitat for wildlife, they can also have commercial value as well. This is something that I think will become much more evident in the coming decade and in the next century where agriculture and the production of wood will begin to go hand in hand instead of the tradition in the pioneer era of agriculture where the trees were seen as the enemy and farmers worked as hard as they could to tear them down to open up land. So we are starting to see a companionship between agriculture and woodlot production which I think this legislation will permit to go on. As I say, it does not change any of the procedures that have occurred or will occur. It simply reinforces the fact that Parliament is supposed to pass legislation and grant the rights that previous cabinets had done and it corrects that anomaly in the system.

I am very supportive of us doing this and only question that we have to take so much time to do it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping to be seen by the Chair.

I understand that the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex is about to make a speech and I just wanted to compliment the hon. member from northern Saskatchewan, who obviously has had a great deal of experience with wood-cutting and woodlot operations in that area of the country, on his speech this morning. The information that he provided to us is really valuable.

I just wanted to make those brief remarks. I know that the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex is also going to speak on this topic.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton--Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate today because it was about 40 years ago last fall when we first became involved in the orderly marketing process.

This legislation goes back further than that, of course. It was legislation that was passed by the Government of Canada to bring order out of chaos, chaos in the marketplace, chaos that was caused by forces putting pressures on those who depend on the marketplace for their livelihood, really pressure that is caused by lack of co-operation, perhaps by the primary producers themselves, but also caused by a concentration at the level of the buyer.

It is only too clear that if a farmer takes a load of wood to town or a load of wheat, he has to take what is offered. He cannot really negotiate very much without taking that load of product back home.

This legislation, of course, is to transfer the power from the federal government to the provinces. This particular piece of legislation is really to give the powers to collect the levies and make certain orders and regulations at the provincial level.

This act has served the nation well over the years, but like any piece of legislation, if society changes the legislation has to be amended and changed to keep pace with the needs of various sectors of the economy.

In 1972 we passed the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act to enable producers to set quotas or certain levels of production, to establish levies and to establish control over its interprovincial and export trade. Of course, under the provincial legislation, they already had the power at the provincial level to control movement intraprovincially within the province.

• (1050)

These two pieces of federal government legislation have provided Canadian farmers with the option to bring order out of chaos in the marketplace and as a result we have the most sophisticated marketing systems of any country in the world, particularly, in our poultry and dairy sectors.

We have the Canadian Dairy Commission and the corresponding provincial marketing boards that have already received a very, very high level of sophistication and stability in that total industry.

It is interesting to note that with the exception of the $267 million that goes toward the industrial milk sector, neither the poultry nor the dairy industry has received any government assistance since their incorporation.

In relation to these two sectors, I wish to tell this government that it would be sheer madness to even consider giving up these systems in the GATT negotiations. I ask the ministers in this House today specifically to dig in their heels and not to give into these economic terrorists who are seeking to destroy our Canadian system, which is one of the best in the world.

It is sheer economic terrorism when you see what is going on in the grain industry. I also ask the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds today to stand up, not only to the European Common Market people, but to dig in his heels and implement the provisions as laid out in the free trade agreement. Implement those provisions where it was agreed that we would not subsidize products in each others markets. Of course, under chapter XVIII of that agreement, we can ask for consultations and compensation. This should have been done immediately when we became aware of the export enhancement programs and how the Americans have been continuously violating this agreement.

I am pleased with the change in this bill today and I commend the government for bringing it in. I think it is a positive move. I hope that in the process that it will bring in other guidelines. I am particularly pleased that the ministry of forests is represented here today in the House because I believe this goes beyond just agriculture marketing. I realize, of course, that most farm woodlots are well cared for and harvested as the timber matures.

My son and I have a woodlot of about 80 acres on our farm. I am appalled at the damage done to woodlots during the mechanical harvesting procedures. I am completely appalled as well at the devastation caused by clear-cutting, which is mainly seen on Crown lands and not privately held woodlots. Woodlot owners in the province of Quebec are to be commended for the organization they have set up and for asking for legislation like this. I also think we should be examining some of the procedures and regulations, not as practised perhaps by these individual woodlot owners, but some of the commercial operators.

I am well aware that some of these owners of the small woodlots still use horses to minimize woodlot damage. I have used them myself in past years. On our own farm, my son and I designed and built a hydraulic drive winch skidder that mounts on the back of a small farm tractor. We did this after we saw the damage and devastation caused by some of the commercial skidders, damage that was avoidable if the equipment was used properly. But it was not used properly. The damage to younger saplings and regenerating growth will take years and years for Mother Nature to repair. It is because of this damage that I wish to ask if the Minister of Forestry will examine a set of standards that should be adhered to on a national basis during the harvesting process.

For example, guidelines toward woodlot management will have to be done with the co-operation of the provincial authorities because the harvesting of those woodlots within a province will be within provincial jurisdiction. But I think at the national level we should perhaps set up a set of standards to adhere to.

I believe we should have a set of standards, for example, that would reflect the damage done by acid rain. On our own woodlot I see this damage. I see the tops of the maple trees dying. Certain trees will survive depending on the soil types, but certainly not the hard maple. I think we should be looking at ways to try to save those forests, to save those trees. In southern Ontario where I come from I believe less than 7 per cent of the land is forested, but I see the ongoing devastation that is being caused as these woodlots shrink in size.

We complain about the cutting of the rain forests in Brazil, but we have not been very good managers of our own resources here in Canada. I am particularly appalled that some of the woodlots in the north that took years and years and years to develop will be completely cut off in a matter of a few decades.

I think we should be looking at what is happening with acid rain. Perhaps we can neutralize its effect through the aerial spreading of limestone to counteract the acidity and bring it up to a seven on the scale. I believe that we have to look at it very seriously. A well-managed woodlot will subsidize farmers' incomes from their crops, which are at the worst level in terms of real dollars of this century.

This act, if amended and I hope it will be, should go a long way toward providing the owners with a reasonable return, not only for the years of investment toward the development of a woodlot but a return for labour, management and risk.

I am well aware of the need for environmental concerns. If those producers could collect levies, they could be used to enhance their marketing system. Some could be put away to be used to improve the woodlot, to plant new trees or to help with the regeneration process. That alone is well worth the effort.

I would further like to suggest that in the maple sugar industry we do have a surplus of products in some of the provinces that have been held by the government so they will not be allowed to go on to the market to create a surplus and undermine the price structure. Again, that is federal legislation which is being put to extremely good use to allow these people to take advantage of the price at the marketplace.

In summation, I am pleased that this legislation has been brought forward. I would ask that the government, under the Minister of Forestry, look at setting up a set of national standards in co-operation with the provinces. The woodlots across Canada could be brought under a uniform type of management. Certain standards could be set for the harvesting of those woodlots so we would not have the devastation or damage caused by mechanical harvesters and certainly acid rain could be looked at even though we know there is going to be a cutback. Some of those soils definitely have to be neutralized before the regeneration that is required will take place.

I believe that under this legislation part of these things can be accomplished if the producers get a proper return for their product. It is in this context that I support this legislation and hope for a speedy passage through this House.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I did not really have a question for the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex. I just wanted to comment. I think there have been suspicions around the House that there is agreement to deal with this bill in committee of the whole so I would suggest that we might be able to move toward committee of the whole now.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that there have been discussions among the parties in the House and that we are prepared to complete the second reading stage now and then go into committee of the whole and complete third reading stage on this bill shortly thereafter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-16, an Act to amend The Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto.

On clause 1—Definition of "agricultural products"

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

On clause 2—Debt due to board or agency

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I thought in reading the amendments that we were making an amendment in the article immediately following section 1 of the act. Is the minister moving that or what is happening here?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I am not so sure I understand the hon. member's concern. If he could be a little more explicit it would help us in dealing with the matter.

Mr. Foster: Yes. I just did not catch the words, Mr. Chairman. Have you passed section 1.1 adding wood to the agriculture product?

Mr. Mayer: Yes.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Clause 1 includes both clause 1 and subsection 1.1 and has been agreed to.

[English]

On Clause 2—Debt due to board or agency

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Chairman, I would be interested to know from the minister and the officials if there have been occasions where the wood marketing agencies in Quebec have been unable to collect the levies which have been placed on producers because this legislation did not have the authority, and how many fines have been levied.

As I understand the background of this legislation, fines have been levied and collected in a court of law but they have not been able to collect the levies. I am just wondering how many times in the past 10 or 15 years since the agencies have been using the authority of this legislation that they have been unable to collect levies and how many times fines have been imposed where they were unable to collect levies.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): In direct response I am informed that there has been one case in Prince Edward Island. In general the legislation will provide the basis under which you can impose or collect the levies. If you cannot collect the levies, then you can go with fines.

The situation presently is that when there are no means of enforcement, there would be very few cases where anyone would proceed because there is no basis on which to proceed. Someone resisting the payment of levies would be on pretty solid ground and the agency trying to collect them would have no real legal foothold on which to pursue any action.

I think it is not so much a question of how many fines have been collected. It is a question of how many times there have been cases when people have wanted to proceed in which they had no basis to proceed. That is in effect what this legislation does.

Mr. Foster: In the background information provided by the government it was suggested that marketing agencies have been able to impose fines for not paying the levies but they have been unable to collect the levies because there was no legal authority.

I am surprised that there is only one case where they were not able to collect the levies because there was no legal authority. I just thought it would be an interesting matter, since we are going to the trouble of bringing in this legislation and the amendments to put wood under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, as to just the number of occasions when they have not been able to collect the levies that have been imposed.

It is my understanding that even under this legislation they will not be able to necessarily collect the levy except through a civil action by the marketing agency against the individual producer who fails to pay his levy for the services provided by the marketing agency.

I would be interested to know if that is the way the minister and the officials understand the legislation.

• (1110)

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, as I interpret section 2, which we are on, levies are charges imposed by a board or agency pursuant to the authority granted to it under subsection (2) and constitute a due debt to the board or agency and may be sued for, and recovered by it, in any court of competent jurisdiction.

If I read the section correctly, I think that answers the hon. member's question.

With regard to the first question that he had, I am informed by officials that in the case in P.E.I., we were notified by an agency that it would have liked to have proceeded but did not feel that it could because of the lack of authority that we are granting, or making available, to people under the amendments.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, is the P.E.I. case the only one on record where they had wanted to collect levies and had been unable to do so because there was no apparent legal authority to do it?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, that is the only one that we are aware of. There probably were several other cases in which I would suspect people would have liked to have proceeded but did not have the legal basis under which to proceed. It is a very difficult question to answer. It is almost like saying: "Would all those who are absent please indicate." I mean, if you are absent you cannot indicate. We do not know what in fact would have happened had this type of legislation been in place. So it is a very difficult question to respond to with any amount of clarity.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, my question probably bridges both clause 2 and clause 3, which we still have not got to. It is because clause 3 in effect legalizes the practice that has gone on before and since there may or may not be cases where outstanding levies or outstanding fines are being pursued by one or another of the provincial marketing agencies before the court, can the minister or his officials tell us in particular what we can expect if there are outstanding cases now which may be coming before the court?

Does this in fact strengthen the hand of the marketing agency to pursue those or will it still be a legal defence for some of those producers or handlers of wood to say that this had not followed all of the legal procedures and did not have the authority of the Parliament of Canada behind the actions and, therefore, they were not responsible for carrying out some of the directives of the board as applied to movement of wood outside of the particular provincial jurisdiction?

Does clause 3 permit, under clause 2, the clear ability and authority to grant that authority retroactively? I think we are all agreed in this House that we should do this retroactively, though I am getting a little ahead of myself as this is part of clause 3. It is not a practice that we normally follow and I want to make sure that before we do follow it that we do not catch a number of cases in the legal system. If there are not any, or only one or two pending, perhaps they could be dealt with under the old procedures and we could make it clear cut. Otherwise, it makes for rather questionable law making if we are going to go backward in time quite a number of years and change all of the laws that apply. It is a precedent that I do not think the House is particularly eager to get into if there are any or very many outstanding cases before the courts now.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can help. They really are two separate issues. Clause 2 applies to everything, not only wood, but to everything under the act. I believe there some 160 commodities named under the act. I can speak on clause 3 now or when we get to it. But clause 3 applies just to wood. We are just talking about actions that are presently under way. I am informed that there are two presently in process and two more pending. We are talking about a very limited number that would be referred to and covered under clause 3.

I agree with the hon. member's last comment. The last thing we want to get into is retroactivity. I think that is more than questionable law making, it is very bad law making. The two clauses are entirely separate, if that helps.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, for clarity, the maximum we are aware of is that there might be as many as four cases that might get caught in the transition.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, to confirm that number is accurate. Yes, four is the maximum we are aware of.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall clause 3 carry?

On Clause 3--Deductions from receipts

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my questions with regard to clause 3 really relate to the whole question of retroactivity. I assume that we do not normally pass legislation in this House which is retroactive because it is obviously a very bad precedent to follow.

I know what the government is seeking to achieve here. Orders have been made and the stability of the industry is important. Clearly, when these agencies' orders were made back in 1983, or earlier, the government and the agencies thought they had the power to pass these marketing orders. However, the question is, if we are going back seven, eight or nine years, I wonder if the minister and his officials could have sought the legal advice of the law officers of the Crown as to the legal authority, or the legal precedents, to make retroactive legislation going back seven or eight years. The Regulatory and Statutory Instruments Committee struck down those orders to some extent, or called into question the legality of those orders, because it was not sure whether wood was a valid agriculture product.

The question now is, did the government seek the advice or a report by the law officers of the Crown? If it has, what does it say, and will it make it available to members of the committee this morning so that we will know we are not passing something here which is in violation of the advice of the Department of Justice?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member raises a good point. The information I have is that this is simply a validation of the delegation of authority that the Government of Canada did back in 1983. From discussions with officials, I am informed that legal people believe this is something that is useful as far as proceeding and seeing that we can bring into force, if those are the right words, the delegation that was granted back in 1983. This is something we would see as being in order.

With regard to a legal opinion, I do not know that we have that available. I do not know what the status would be. Whatever it is, we do not have it with us this morning in the House.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose the world is going to turn in one direction or another because the government failed to get that legal opinion from the law officers of the Crown. I would hope that the minister could provide assurances to the committee this morning that this was at least drafted and approved by the Department of Justice and, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, is a valid retroactive amendment to be making. Surely that is the least we can expect from the government. I am surprised that it would not have the legal opinion from the Department of Justice available for the committee's consideration this morning because it is very seldom that we pass legislation here which is retroactive for eight or ten or twelve years.

• (1120)

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I do not think either one of us are lawyers and I am not sure we are using the right terms here, but we are really proceeding as a result of the Joint Committee of the House and the Senate on Statutory Regulations. We were advised by the Department of Justice that this was the proper way to proceed as far as validating the delegation that was granted back in 1983. Really that is why we are here. The delegation, when it was granted, had some concerns associated with it as outlined by the Joint Committee on Statutory Regulations and so what we are doing here is proceeding on the basis of legal advice that we have from the Department of Justice.

I am not so sure that in any way this should be looked at as being retroactive because this delegation of authority occurred, as I said, back in 1983 and there was concern that there was not the proper authority with that delegation to see that the delegation could be used.

So, to suggest, as the hon. member for Mackenzie did, and I agree with both of the members, Mr. Chairman, that this is retroactive, I am not so sure this is accurate. What we are doing simply, just to say it again, is providing the necessary parliamentary approval, authority I guess, to use and make valid a delegation that was given to the provinces back in 1983.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, time has passed, some seven or eight years, since this report of the statutory instruments and regulations committee. Could I ask the legal officials with the minister if there is a statute of limitations or anything that invalidates this amendment? Clearly this thing has been sitting on somebody's desk since October 12, 1983, when the statutory instruments committee recommended to the Minister of Agriculture that these amendments be brought in to validate these five or six wood orders. I am just wondering whether, with the passage of more than six years, one can retroactively take something back that far, whether it is legal regardless of the length of time going beyond the normal six-year period of the statute of limitations.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of the joint committee saying anything about that. I am informed by officials that there has been no concern raised along these lines as far as any legal proceedings are concerned. I think we are just bringing parliamentary authority into line with the delegation that was granted back in 1983. If there is any problem we are not aware of it. I think very strongly that if there had been a concern there that the same committee that advised that it had a concern over this would have advised us to proceed in a different way to correct it. We are proceeding in precisely the way that it suggested as far as correcting it in this legislation.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, this is not directly affecting this legislation, but I seem to recall when I was new here that corrections to various pieces of legislation as proposed by the committee on statutory instruments and regulations were often brought in as a sort of omnibus series of amendments. There would be one bill that might amend 15 or 20 different pieces of legislation, somewhat as the two that we have before us, except that they would have simply been listed as one bill.

I am wondering if there is a reason for dividing these amendments into specific legislation rather than to bring in a host of minor amendments, which a lot of these bills essentially are, in the interest of House time and making the corrections much quicker.

I recognize the problem of having this bill and another one that we are going to be doing later today sit waiting for parliamentary time. Perhaps he can comment on why they are no longer bunched together and why they are introduced as separate bills, recognizing that it can take a lot longer to get it through as separate bills.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and myself were elected at the same time. We both came here in the 1979 general election. I know being in opposition and since being in government listening to the opposition, the previous government and ourselves have taken a fair amount of criticism for bringing in omnibus legislation that put a host of legislation in one bill.

Whether it was ourselves or the previous government, we were accused of trying to railroad certain things in because one bill was judged as being rather innocuous and another bill would have some consequences. The question then was: "Are you trying to force something through? It is an all or nothing situation".

I think in direct response to the member's question that the reason we are doing this is to provide a maximum opportunity for opposition parties to take a look at the legislation in isolation and raise concerns, so that we do not get a situation, as I said, where you have many different bills coming through as one and either you accept all of them or you do not get any of them.

I think just as a matter of principle that this is probably a better way to proceed. This is not taking a lot of House time and certainly gives everyone a chance to look specifically at one piece of legislation by itself.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I notice clause 3 refers to section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. I wonder in view of the wording at the start of clause 3 if the minister envisions other orders and regulations that may be required by the people in the province of Quebec other than the imposition and collection of the levies themselves?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that if there are any we have not been notified and we are not aware of them. As far as we know, this is it.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause 3 agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, agreed to, read the third time and passed.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: On a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent to amend the order that will now come before the House to send this bill to a legislative committee and that the unanimous consent would rather be to deal with it in Committee of the Whole immediately following second reading stage today.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable to our side.

Mr. Mayer: In view of the urgency of this measure, I would ask that it be referred not to the standing committee but to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)) moved that Bill C-23, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to a Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, again this is a rather straightforward bill. It is a technical bill. I do not intend to speak long on the bill, just perhaps a few introductory remarks and then some specifics on the bill.

As most people in the country will know, the Canadian Wheat Board is a Crown corporation that is over 50 years old. It is a well-run Crown corporation. It operates very independently of government and operates with a head office in Winnipeg with five commissioners that are appointed by the federal government but once appointed, operate very independently from government.

Over the years the commissioners have been responsible for the marketing of, first of all, wheat, then barley, then oats and latterly, just wheat and barley. They are the sole marketer of wheat and barley now in the international market, so that anything a barley or wheat producer in the designated area, which is basically western Canada, produces and wants to sell for export has to go through the Canadian Wheat Board.

Additionally, producers in the Wheat Board designated area that wish to sell for domestic human consumption also have to go through the Canadian Wheat Board. So the Canadian Wheat Board plays a very large role in the life of rural western Canada. It has over the years established a very good reputation as a selling agency. It regularly sells to some 60 countries around the world and, as I said, has developed a reputation second to none for being able to execute any contract or agreement it signs with a country or a customer. Their reputation as far as delivering on that agreement is very good. That has served us well over the years in terms of maintaining our market share even though prices have been very depressed.

There were concerns raised in 1989 and 1990 by the Auditor General as to the type of authority that the Canadian Wheat Board had from the Parliament of Canada for credit. As things have changed internationally, the use of the credit has become much more of a factor in international sales. Many countries offer concessional credit. By that I mean credit that is below prevailing rates of interest for long time periods at rates below commercial credit. The Wheat Board is not in the business of operating with concessional credit, but it has been able to make use of credit to increase its sales. As economic conditions have changed in the world, the use of credit has become much more of a factor.

There was a time when less than 10 per cent of the board's operations was based on credit. We are in a situation now where closer to 20 or 25 per cent of the board's operations is based on credit.

Bill C-23 simply provides for proper parliamentary authority with respect to its accounts receivable arising from credit grain sales that are approved by cabinet. This simply means that the Canadian Wheat Board as a Crown agency operates with guarantees from the Government of Canada. It has been doing this since 1972 when the minister of the day sent a letter of comfort to the board, in effect saying to the board that because we, the Government of Canada, have agreed with you, you can continue to sell on credit. We regularly established lines of credit for various countries around the world based on all kinds of things, but mostly the number of tonnes or the number of bushels a country is going to provide for us and our estimate of the need for credit.

Therefore, when we provided this credit the Auditor General was concerned that we did not have the proper parliamentary authority for the government and the Parliament of Canada to grant the credit to the Canadian Wheat Board that it needed to operate properly. Therefore, we are proposing to amend section 19 of the Wheat Board Act to provide proper parliamentary authority for the Wheat Board to use the credit it needs more and more to be able to sell.

Basically, it is a technical amendment. It means that the board will continue to operate in exactly the same way that it has in the past, except that we are responding to concerns raised by the Auditor General to put what he considers a better legal basis for that type of operation to continue.

The second amendment is under section 33 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. I should explain that one of the main principles under which the Canadian Wheat Board operates is the use of a pooling or an averaging system. So, whether a producer sells at the beginning of a crop year, which is August 1, or he sells at the end, which is July 31, a 12-month period, a producer will receive the same price per bushel and the same price per tonne that he would have if he had sold at any other time during the year.

They do this on the basis of a pooling or an averaging system. When a producer takes a load of grain into an elevator and sells, for instance, on September 15 or October 8, he receives what is called an initial payment for that product. Throughout the crop year the Canadian Wheat Board then goes ahead and sells and takes all the prices it receives for the various products it sells to different countries, and you can understand that the price will vary over a 12-month period. At the end of the 12-month period, it does the arithmetic to arrive at an average price. As long as the average price for the product the producer has sold throughout the 12-month period is more than the initial payment, the producer receives a final payment. The final payments are usually available three or four months after the closing of the crop year.

Again the Auditor General was concerned that the Canadian Wheat Board did not have the proper legal basis, the proper parliamentary approval to go ahead and make final payments until, as the Auditor General said, payment had been received in full. Under this amendment to section 33, we are providing a legal basis for that to occur. I think everybody would agree that if you are going to provide a loan and it is guaranteed by the Government of Canada that once those moneys are advanced or borrowed by the Canadian Wheat Board, they should then be in a position to go ahead and make final payments even though the repayment of the moneys owing on sales that had been made in a previous crop year have not yet been received.

Just to summarize, we are providing better parliamentary authority for the Canadian Wheat Board to operate in two areas; first, as a result of a guarantee by the Government of Canada, the granting of credit to various countries and customers that the Canadian Wheat Board sells to; second, once that credit is granted, to provide whatis considered a better parliamentary authority for the Canadian Wheat Board to distribute funds to producers once the sale has been concluded.

This does not alter the way the Canadian Wheat Board operates with regard to any of its procedures, whether it is the pooling system or the way they sell or the way they deal with customers. It is simply responding to two concerns that the Auditor General raised in both 1989 and 1990 with regard to two sections of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, namely section 19 and section 33. That is what Bill C-23 does today.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to say a few words on Bill C-23.

The minister suggested that this is just a technical amendment. I guess anything that we do in this House is a technical amendment from the point of view that it is changing a clause or a word or a sentence in a bill, but clearly this matter that is before the House today was important enough that the Auditor General raised it both in his 1989 and 1990 reports. He pointed out that the Government of Canada had not sought parliamentary authority to guarantee $4.2 billion owing to the Canadian Wheat Board. If this is only a technical amendment, it is the largest technical amendment in history when we look at the $4.2 billion owing to the Canadian Wheat Board and not having parliamentary authority.

It is a very important issue and certainly one that the Auditor General has picked up on two occasions. Clearly the necessity of passing this legislation is apparent.

I think most of us in this country are very supportive of the Canadian Wheat Board because it provides a great deal of stability in the way we market our grains in this country, especially in western Canada. There are similar wheat boards, not quite the same but of a similar nature, in Ontario and in some of the other provinces, but the granddaddy of them all, of course, is the Canadian Wheat Board which operates in the four western provinces and brings a great deal of stability to that industry.

Without the Canadian Wheat Board, I think our ability to compete in international grain markets would be sharply diminished. We not only have the expertise of this agency, which is able to move into all kinds of markets that individual producers would not have the opportunity to do, but it provides stability to the marketplace. Without it we would have four or five big grain companies carving up the market and seeing how they could drive down the price.

In this way the Canadian Wheat Board offers producers right across the prairies a stability which they, in my opinion, could never achieve. We only have to look at some of the grains and oilseeds which are not under the Wheat Board authority to see how they are able to carve up the markets to their advantage.

I think that whatever we can do to strengthen and support the Canadian Wheat Board is very important. Even though it is really a farmers' agency for the marketing of their grains, it is under the authority of the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. I was pleased this morning to see him supporting the Canadian Wheat Board because he has not always been seen as a great supporter of it. Clearly when he took oats away from the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board he was seen as very unsupportive of the board, and I don't think farmers have benefited by the removal of oats from the board. It was seen as something to give away to those who are opposed to the Canadian Wheat Board after the 1988 general election.

The various grain producing associations or groups in the west who were opposed to it pressed the minister to give them something in return for the support that they gave him in the free trade debate and the general election of 1988. And so oats was removed from the authority of the Board, even though the Canadian Wheat Board Act itself really provides for wheat but barley has historically been under the authority of the board as has been oats.

This is a very important piece of legislation from the point of view that it gives legal authority to the Wheat Board to make sales internationally. We have never faced such a disaster in grain prices in history. Those of us who work in the field of agriculture in the House of Commons complain that regardless of how serious the disaster is, that seldom if ever is it carried on the national news. Certainly it is never carried to any extent in the major daily papers like The Toronto Star. However, the disaster in Canadian grain and oilseeds has been so intense this fall that we have seen a three-day period of full page coverage in The Toronto Star and major stories in other newspapers as well as major coverage on the national news. I guess we are glad to see this coverage from the point of view of agriculture being reported in the daily and national press. We are sorry to see it covered because of the magnitude of the calamity, the disaster facing this industry today.

I spoke earlier about the need for orderly marketing. That is what every agriculture group, certainly the producer groups, are seeking in the international realm today and that is what we hope will ultimately come out of the negotiations at the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva this fall. If it does not, the disaster which is facing our producers will continue.

We have seen a quantum decline in the production of grain and the viability of the industry in countries like Argentina and Australia, and to some extent Canada faces the same kind of financial disaster because our exports are so large--some 80 per cent of our production goes into export sales--relative to the size of our urban society, and ultimately the resources of the country come from all sectors of society. Clearly the European Community with its 340 million people, the United States with its 250 million people, have more capacity per capita to withstand the kind of international trading war that we have faced since 1985. The United States decided in their farm bill in 1985 that it was going to bludgeon the European Economic Community into submission and stop the export subsidies.

Unfortunately it has not succeeded. It has spent billions of dollars. This year the commitment is $900 million. Next year it will be $1.2 billion. God only knows how much the European Community has spent. In any event, that trade war goes on and on and on.

For farmers in Canada this year the initial price is the lowest in 16 years at $95 a tonne for No. 1 red spring wheat. It is less than half of what it was 10 years ago. Of course the cost of production has probably doubled in those 10 years, leaving farmers in the most desperate situation which we have seen in a lifetime.

That is why we see parades of tractors 30 miles long south of Lethbridge in Alberta on our televisions screens. That is why we saw mass rallies of farmers, 3,000 or 4,000 strong, last week at Rosetown, Saskatchewan, to protest the lack of action by the Government of Canada.

We do not know when the government is going to act. Clearly it must act soon. We thought the kind of proposal the government made last spring before the House of Commons would be carried through, that the government would provide a third line of defence. There were three mechanisms inculcated in the safety net system. One was the Gross Revenue Insurance Program which was to provide a guarantee to producers of gross revenue per acre, so that regardless of whether the world price for wheat went down or whether there was a drought and production was low, there would be a sort of gross revenue income mechanism.

Then there was a second provision, the NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account. It was to allow farmers to put money into a stabilization account which was to be matched by the two senior levels of government to ensure stability over a long period of time based on some 2 per cent of their gross sales and allowing for additional contributions.

For 1991 the third element was the most important. That was the third line of defence, a mechanism to provide an injection of cash when the first two systems failed to function.

If there ever was an occasion when the third line of defence mechanism should have triggered, it was last spring. Producer group after producer group came before the agriculture committee that studied this bill and said: "We agree generally with the GRIP and NISA proposals, the first two lines of defence, but there is a problem. They are for the 1991–92 crop year. Our problem is the 1990–91 crop year, the crop that was grown last year".

Unfortunately 1990 was the year the United States export enhancement program provided the maximum amount of subsidy and drove world prices down well below $100 a tonne.

The exact figures are not known yet, but it is way below the cost of any reasonable production.

At the same that those world prices for grain and oilseed commodities were going through the floor boards, the government was reducing its support program in western Canada by $1 billion.

At the same time in eastern Canada they were reducing their support program by $300 million. Every grain and oilseed group that came before the agriculture committee said: "Look, we agree with those two first lines of defence for stabilization of our grain and oilseed economy. The problem is that the 1990 crop year has been such a disaster. There has been such a pulverizing of farm income that there must be a third line of defence".

This spring we want to see an immediate cash injection of assistance not only to cover the reduction in price of the grain, but to cover the reduction in support programs which the federal government unloaded on Canadian producers.

The government brought in a program called FSAM, Farmer Stabilization and Assistance Measures. Unfortunately, there is a very small amount of cash in that system and none of it has been delivered. It is a mechanism to reduce premiums. Big deal. There never were any premiums on programs like the special grains measure. There never were any premiums on programs like drought assistance in 1989.

Those programs provided for crop cover programs but the actual cash is a very small portion. It is a kind of mixed up measure under the Net Income Stabilization Account program. The assistant deputy minister told us in the agriculture committee back in late August that they hope to have some cheques out by Christmas.

Christmas is far too late. We want the assistance now, we want it in cash and it must come.

We are really facing a very difficult time in the whole grain and oilseeds industry. The government has removed oats from the Canadian Wheat Board and the United States is bludgeoning us daily with the Export Enhancement Program. The Minister of Agriculture is quoted as saying he is going to take retaliatory action against the European Community by the end of this year if the subsidy war continues.

It is strange to me that no action has been taken against the United States. Although the Europeans are a major grain producer now, they were not in the 1950s. I still believe that the United States has a more profound influence on what the world price of grain will be.

I would hope that since the government has entered into a free trade agreement that it will take the same retaliatory action against the United States as it is taking against the EEC.

Clearly the biggest player on the block is the United States. The European Community is important but the same action should be taken against both governments.

The Canadian Wheat Board is playing an important part in distributing income fairly among the producers so that whenever a producer markets his grain, whether it is in the fall or the spring, if it is of similar quality and category it will receive the same benefit.

This legislation which is before us today will legitimize the credits which the federal government has provided in the past for those sales abroad which amount to billions and billions of dollars. We hope that the price of grain will soon rise so it will be even more billions of dollars and those producers will have an adequate return for their investment, their labour and their expertise.

The second part of course is that it provides for the funds to be paid off and the credit to be provided before the pool account can be closed and those payments of both principal and interest are made.

We support the bill. It is of a technical nature. It is one that is very important because obviously we seek markets around the world in eastern Europe, Poland and other areas, especially the Soviet republics. This legal authority for sales of grain will be important in the years ahead. It will provide an adequate and proper legal authority from Parliament to give credit to the Canadian Wheat Board for the excellent job it does of marketing our grain abroad.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment that is being proposed to the Canadian Wheat Board today which has the effect of correcting an anomaly that has existed. It puts into words and into law by authority of this House of Commons the authority of the Canadian Wheat board to make sales on credit, the contingent liability of which rests with the Government of Canada. In fact it does not change anything in terms of the operations of the Wheat Board. Since 1972 when the then minister Otto Lang sent a letter to the board authorizing them to make credit sales, it has done so. It has not shown those credit sales in any way as a liability to producer accounts. It has always assumed that the payments were made on time even when they were not because the Government of Canada, in the eyes of the Wheat Board and in the eyes of the farmers, had already committed itself to being liable for any shortfall or any inability of a borrowing country to make payments on time.

From the point of view of the Wheat Board the payments to the producers were made annually as if the sale had been completed and as if the account for the loan was up to date.

Not only did they consider that the loans were up to date but they also had to consider, for purposes of accounting, the surpluses that would accrue annually to the farmers which are paid out as a final payment.

They considered that interest due on the loans was also up to date and received and the Government of Canada made certain that the cash flow persisted and existed to make the Wheat Board accounts good so that those final payment cheques would in fact be good cheques.

The only thing wrong with this process that has been going on almost 20 years according to the Auditor General is that the authority of the House is never asked for. Today with the amendments the government is putting before the House it is asking for the approval of the House for the Governor in Council, that is the cabinet, to in fact provide the loan guarantees that have been a fact of life in the conduct of international grain trade since 1972.

There are some questions of course that this raises. In 1972 there were no qualms anywhere about extending credit to purchasing countries. The world economy seemed to be going into an upward spin which is now sometimes described by some economists as an inflationary cycle. At any rate, in 1972 going into debt was not considered a problem by any of the borrowing countries which needed the food in any case and had very little choice except to feed their people.

That contingent liability has accumulated to the point where in the last Auditor General's report he pointed out that the government still had not received parliamentary approval for a guarantee of $4.2 billion which is owed to the Canadian Wheat Board to finance troubled foreign countries.

I was told by officials out in the hall today that that contingent liability accumulation is now in the neighbourhood of $4.6 billion. That is not necessarily in the form of bad accounts, it is simply in the form of loans that have been extended, and some of them are being kept up to date and some of them are not.

It raises some problem for all of us as parliamentarians because it is this body here that authorizes the expenditures of money and when we have a contingent liability, as we have in this case, Parliament does not, in my view, seem to have a very good way of handling this kind of authorization. All we can do on an annual basis is see a number in the budget which might be applied for possible bad loans or possible default and approve that on an annual basis.

We have no way that I am aware of that easily tells us as parliamentarians how much contingent liability we are backing as a country at the end of any one year. With a great deal of diligent research one might find it going through all of the agencies and departments and various commitments to foreign debt and foreign loans that the Government of Canada has made, but we really do not have an accumulative total that tells us as parliamentarians just where we are going.

I know that in good times none of us as private citizens or as people acting as representatives of private citizens really spent too much time worrying about the notes that we have co-signed or the contingent liabilities that we have taken on. But as the debt situation in the world and the apparent recession fills more and more countries, it is something that we would probably have to be aware of. That is one of the things that this particular legislation brings to mind in that we know and we realize in this House that it is absolutely vital that the Government of Canada stand behind the export trade credits that organizations like the Canadian Wheat Board incur. There are a number of other loans that we make through other agencies and through other departments which are vital to the continuance of the Canadian economy and to the ability of importing countries to buy our products. It has both commercial justification and human rights justification.

A lot of the countries that buy Canadian food, for instance, have to do it on the basis of long-term credit. They are not paying for the food when it is consumed. They are committing themselves to a long-term debt to pay for the food that has been consumed in the year that it was imported. There is really no choice for those countries except to import food other than to watch their population starve.

As I say, it has basic human rights. Questions have to be answered with this question of contingent liability and loans. We also as parliamentarians are responsible for the money that taxpayers expend and those taxpayers expect us as their representatives to have a handle on how much of these commitments we have been making and to have a handle on how we expect to handle the situation if foreign governments and foreign customers are unable to make the payments. The whole system of these loans and the trade that is incurred by credit sales makes some assumptions about the viability of the international monetary system, the kinds of guarantees that each country provides to each other to make sure that their currency is still sound and that their credit is still good.

As I said earlier in my remarks, this whole system is becoming a little more fragile as the recession sinks in, as countries whose economies appear to be going through a vast disruption, countries such as those in central and eastern Europe, but also countries in Africa that have been going through drought, famine and civil war and the apparent collapse of their social, economic and political structure. When all is said and done, these countries do need our food.

It is in the best interests of the country for this Parliament to grant the authority that we all thought was in place over the last 19 years to back the loans and guarantee the loans that the Canadian Wheat Board makes to finalize sales to countries which need food and our products but do not have the immediate cash, and that this continue.

The farmers of this country recognize that this is of assistance to their efforts to produce food for hungry people and to facilitate the movement of that food from their farms to the mouths of those hungry people. I believe it will generally be applauded. As I have said, as parliamentarians we also have to find a better way of handling the whole question of contingent liability because we do have concerns and responsibilities to our taxpayers for not only the accumulated debt of the country which seems to be fairly clear cut—we can count that, it is now over $400 billion—but we have no immediate way, without a great deal of research, to find the accumulated contingent liabilities of all the departments and all the commitments we have made through agencies on behalf of ourselves as the Government of Canada.

I simply wanted to point that out as a question that has to be answered for backbenchers and ministers as well if this Parliament is going to continue with its function of approving all of the expenditures and all the commitments the executive branch makes on our behalf.

I applaud the government for bringing this legislation to the House and requesting approval to grant cabinet the authority to make these loans, which it has been making over the last 19 years.

I am pleased that with the passage of this legislation we will have followed the proper procedure of going to Parliament before the expenditure of money takes place.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the two points the hon. member was making at the end, if he wants to look at page 48 of the last annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board, he will see that there is a number shown there about one third of the way down the page that shows $4.625 billion. It says: "See note 2." That in effect is a listing of the contingent liability of the Canadian Wheat Board.

In the case of this Crown corporation it does not take a lot of work to dig this out because it regularly publishes it. He will also note that the year previous it was $3.7 billion. So, it is shown very clearly as a continent liability. Nobody is trying to disguise anything. It is there for full public disclosure.

Second just to make the point, and I will just speak for the board, when the Canadian Wheat Board makes a grain sale to a country and the country signs the guarantee, it is considered sovereign debt and ultimately collectable or repayable. That is the position that we take as a government and that is consistent, as I understand it, with accounting procedures. Now, there have been cases in the past where there has been rescheduling through an agreement, the Paris Club is an example, where some of this debt has been set aside. That is by general agreement of all the countries involved and one has to deal with whatever is going to be rescheduled or set aside at that time.

Just to make two points: The contingent liability for the Canadian Wheat Board is shown and published in every annual report. The loans that the board makes are to other sovereign countries and are therefore ultimately repayable. So if anything changes, then that has to be reflected in the way the Government of Canada keeps its books.

Mr. Althouse: I do not think anything I said contravened the information that the minister re-entered on the table. The point that I had been very much aware of, and in fact I used some of the figures from the Wheat Board's annual report, was that it provides accurate figures on the contingent liability of the Government of Canada, as do most of the other agencies. It is just that when we come to passing budgets in this House, private members of Parliament are generally not confronted through the budget documents with the accumulated contingent liabilities from all of the various agencies and departments that have accrued over the intervening years. We do have a final figure for the national debt, we do have final figures for a whole host of things, but we generally don't get a list of the accumulated contingent liabilities from all of the various nations with which we deal. I reiterate from my speech, this has generally not been of any concern to anyone because all of the countries of the world had, until very recently, been considered not to be having any great difficulty as sovereign nations meeting their debts and obligations.

That is changing, however, with the onset of this last recession or depression and will probably require some consideration from this House, and from the Ministry of Finance, as to how to present those contingent liabilities for the approval of this Chamber in the coming years. The situation is changing and not all of those loans and liabilities are going to be repaid on time. We are still presuming that all of those sovereign nations will still exist and that the debt will be recognized and honoured, but that changes over time as well.

We may in fact find ourselves having to write off some of them, although I think that the debts which have accrued through the sale of Wheat Board grains, wheat, oats and barley until recently--now it is just wheat and barley--have been made with due appreciation of the ability of the debtor to repay the debt.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton--Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, as you know, Eglinton--Lawrence is not in the farming community but I felt I had to intervene in this debate. I have been impressed by the fact that the debate has been so gentlemanly, with all due deference to the female members in this House, that there has been a tone of courtesy and deference from one side to the other, and you know, Mr. Speaker, I really cannot understand it.

We are talking about a bill that has enormous consequence for one of the major resource industries of this country, for one of the major social components of the fabric of this nation, a fabric that is being torn apart by international affairs, international conditions, and by our own domestic problems. And everybody is very polite. The minister says we are only dealing with a technical change. The tone is muted. Attention is vivid. We have members on both sides talking about relativity of some problems from one sector to another, as if this were an academic exercise.

• (1220)

About the only thing that I heard that was of significance is what my hon. colleague who just finished speaking said about members of Parliament in this House being responsible for expenditures from this Parliament and this government.

He is right because we are responsible for every cent that we spend. There is not one cent that is better spent than those that we spend on our own citizens, whether we do it through ensuring credit sales or whether we do it in outright relief.

At this moment in Canada in the agricultural community, farmers require assistance by this government. We have the highest quality of wheat and grains in the world. Bar none, bar none. We are very efficient in the way that we produce those products and yet we have no sales.

We have an anomaly. We have farmers with bins full and cupboards bare and we are talking about a technical amendment to the bill. We should be talking about what is happening world wide in the agricultural community. In Saskatchewan, 4,000 farmers felt that their livelihood was in such jeopardy that they had to abandon all that they normally do at this time of year and protest their conditions. We in this House and those who are in a position to make a decision should make one that is favourable to the fabric of Canada and the livelihood of the farming community. We should stand up and take notice.

We are polite. Our tone is muted. We are talking about jobs. We are talking about livelihood and a way of life. We are talking about a farming community that is slowly but surely being eroded before our very eyes. We are talking about families who can no longer plan for a livelihood within a family with respect to a profession that was both noble and useful.

I was at the International Ploughing Contest a couple of weeks ago. There was a very important button that I saw with a slogan. It said: "No support, no farmers, no food." We are talking here as if this is again an academic exercise. When we talk about food shortage world wide, who in heaven's name is going to produce while we sit back and watch our farmers disintegrate before our very eyes as their industry collapses because "You know, we were going to have a discussion on technical purposes of this bill."

I do not mean to diminish the interest of the House or the interest of the government, or the minister. Most of our members here are quite aware of what is going on in the agricultural community.

I am speaking from the view of an Ontario member, one from an urban environment such as the city of Toronto. It is almost criminal that we can point to retail prices for food products that have escalated dramatically upward over the course of the last 10 years while farm gate prices have remained at the same level that they were at the beginning of the last decade.

We can talk very politely about bushels of wheat being at the same price in absolute nominal dollars as they were a decade ago. It is just insane. It is just insane. We expect our farmers to maintain not only their way of life but an annual production, improve their quality, make themselves more efficient and make Canada much more aggressive in world sales of a much needed product.

We do not do that in the industrial sector. One of my colleagues from Broadview—Greenwood in Toronto was the first to tell us in this House that one of the things that happens in the industrial sector is bang, bottom line, out we go, because we are not making the dollar.

We are essentially asking people in the farming community and in the agricultural community to subsidize a very luxurious way of life for us. We are paying top dollar at the retail level for some food products while the farmer at the farm gate is getting what he was getting 10 years ago.

If I take a look at what has just happened in my own province of Ontario, farm income projections for this year indicate that the net farm income for Ontario will have declined by 27 per cent in the last four years. Twenty-seven per cent. Imagine maintaining an industrial enterprise with those kinds of figures, knowing that at the same time during the same period interest costs and operating costs have increased by 15 per cent.

On the one hand we have interest expenses increasing by 15 per cent over four years and net income decreasing by 27 per cent. It is no wonder that the farming community is in chaos, total chaos. We have high quality wheat, international prices that are low, and no sales or relatively little. We are talking about one major deficiency. One of the problems that my colleague from Algoma has pointed out is that we have not really addressed the implications of the free trade agreement and its impact on the agricultural industry. We have noted that there is a subsidy war, a trade war, between the United States and Europe and who is getting caught in the crossfire? Our agricultural community in Canada and most of all those of us who are consumers.

We have not looked at the implications of the free trade agreement when it comes to subsidies. We are supposed to eliminate tariffs on profits. I thought and the general impression I dare say among most members in this House is that subsidies that would be deemed unfair would not be applied. Yet we have the United States artificially maintaining a low price for many of our agricultural products, preventing our farmers from being able to sell a product on the world stage that will bring great benefit to Canada.

In fact again, for Ontario and Ontario alone, with total farm cash receipts of over $5.6 billion annually, we are not talking about an insignificant industry. In fact it is so important that agriculture in Ontario alone generates a further $17 billion a year for the Ontario economy. Seventeen billion dollars. That is similar to the total amount of money that is spent in the province of Ontario for health benefits.

Can you imagine what would happen if that kind of industry were allowed to go in the direction where it appears to be going, thanks to our lethargy. For those of us who are concerned about jobs and employment, I hasten to remind everybody that the agricultural business and associated business provide 12 per cent of all jobs available in Ontario.

Can we sit idly by and allow that pool of job creation opportunities to lapse and to collapse? We sit here with courtesy, with appropriate demeanour. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I am shocked. I am shocked that we have not seen Canadians—maybe this is characteristic of the way that we deal with things as Canadians— out here at the front of the Commons ensuring that we pass legislation. My hon. colleague who spoke before me suggests we account for kinds of expenditures that go for the benefit of our citizens. If we do not spend our money for the benefit of our citizens and if we do not spend our money to maintain a lifestyle and a quality of life that we hold dear and we say characterizes Canada and all of its inhabitants, for what purpose are we in this place?

We are talking essentially about seeing an integral part of Canadian society being transformed completely.

• (1230)

We are seeing farms abandoned on a daily basis. We are seeing families abandoning a livelihood that has been there for generations and moving to cities. At the same time, we are seeing cities like those of Toronto, specifically Toronto, experiencing an enormous increase in unemployment. There has been a 73 per cent increase in welfare costs over last year and a 50 per cent increase in unemployment since the beginning of this year. We are seeing the collapse of an industrial base that would be required to absorb this enormous migration from rural Canada to urban centres.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the minister wants to put forward a bill that would allow us to go into the traditional form of sales with the appropriate caution. We have to safeguard, of course, the hard-earned dollars of all Canadians.

I wish that we would be a little more energetic when it comes to selling the product that is second to none in the world and when we come to guaranteeing a livelihood for Canadians who have sweated by dint of their brows to ensure that we are vigorous and productive world-wide.

I do not really want to say much more. What is happening is that we are getting very high retail prices for a product that is very, very good and we are recognized as being a very efficient producer, but we are providing our producers with very little. We seem to be taking a secondary position to some of the more aggressive nations in the world when it comes to selling our products.

Mr. Speaker, I know you want me to finish but if you would give me a moment, I just want to refer to some statistics of destinations of Canadian agricultural exports coming from Canada's trade in agricultural products in 1986, 1987 and 1988. It shows, for example, that we have had a precipitous decline in our agricultural products everywhere around the world, most specifically in the United States. We can see why with the artificiality of the low cost of their products.

We see an enormous decline in exports to developing countries. The only place where we seem to be holding our own is Japan. To the EEC, thanks again to this trade subsidy war that we are engaged in with the United States, we are going downhill.

What is required, Mr. Speaker, is not just simply minor amendments and technical bills. What is required is an aggressive action by this government, its agencies and the Canadian Wheat Board to sell the products that our producers have so diligently and so properly put together and provided for the marketplace and for consumers world wide.

We owe it, Mr. Speaker, not only to ourselves and the agricultural community in Canada but to the world market and all consumers world-wide to be aggressive and dynamic in selling a product that is so purely Canadian.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we certainly appreciate the intervention of the member opposite, especially somebody coming from an urban riding. I agree with him and I think there is a lot of concern out there over the agricultural situation. I would like to just give him a few numbers to help put the issue into perspective.

First of all, the hon. member talks about prices that were as bad as they were 10 years ago. It is even worse than that. Prices are basically the same in some commodities as they were 30 years ago. In fact, if you want to do a direct comparison, the price of wheat now is essentially what it was in 1971, which is 20 years ago. The point he makes is well taken and that is to try and think of a farmer making ends meet or a business operating with today's expenses on the income that he had 20 years ago.

Second, I want to suggest to him that the situation is the same right across the country, whether it is in Ontario, the prairies, the maritimes or Quebec. If it is the grain and oilseeds side of things, prices are very, very bad. There is no question about that.

Third, you talk about the free trade agreement, Mr. Speaker. Members in the House should know that as a result of the free trade agreement, the U.S. is now becoming more and more a customer of Canadian products. The U.S., believe it or not, is the second most non-subsidized market that Canada has. We sold over one million tonnes of all grain and oilseeds to the U.S. in the last crop year. When you think about it, the U.S. is the largest exporter of grain and oilseed products in the world and yet it is about our fourth or fifth largest customer. So the free trade agreement has provided a more secure access to the U.S. market than we have ever had before. A result of that is that the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board, the Canadian Wheat Board, other agencies and individuals who sell into the U.S. market have done so in increasing amounts. So the free trade agreement has actually helped us in terms of quantity going into the U.S. Also as I said, after Japan it is the second highest market in the world.

When the member is talking about the free trade agreement, he should take some of those things into consideration.

The last thing I wanted to just point out is that he talked about our markets going down. In fact, that is not the case. Canada has maintained its share of markets but we have done so at horrendous costs as far as price is concerned. So we continue to sell.

The reason we do not sell as much to the European Community as we did previously is that it has what is called variable import levies in place that very much keep the Canadian product out of their market. We can be as aggressive as we want but unfortunately there are no trade rules that apply to agriculture products the same as there are for other products. That very much keeps us out of that market.

We are being very aggressive. In fact Canada and the Prime Minister have taken the lead in putting these issues on the table internationally to try to get a resolution to them.

We are not sitting idly by, by any means. The record is there to indicate otherwise.

I want to conclude by agreeing that this is a very serious situation. I intend to say some things at third reading that point out the problem that we have and how absolutely criminal it is in many ways that when the world needs food and we can produce it, prices go down and we see more people going to bed hungry.

Mr. Volpe: I welcome the intervention of the minister who took great pains to agree with some of the statements that I made. I acknowledge that and I thank him very much for understanding that we do have a serious problem. The real value of income coming back into the agricultural community is akin to that which it was 20 years ago, or in some instances 40 and 50 years ago. That already shows that we have a problem of disastrous proportions.

I have to take some exception to the attempt to correlate a positive component of sales with the free trade agreement. The minister has given us an indication that we have maintained our market share but that does not indicate for the producer in Ontario and Saskatchewan, Alberta and elsewhere that we have actually continued to sell very productively. We have already talked about the value of the sales that we have made in real terms and that value, to all intents and purposes, has gone down. You can maintain a market share all you want if you are not getting the appropriate income from it.

With respect to the United States being a major consumer of our products, that is one of the misfortunes of our marketing strategies. It might be true and it is true that the EEC has some very prohibitive legislation for our products but the EEC is not the only market in the world, nor is the United States.

We have just learned that one of our major flour mills, Ogilvie, is actually importing U.S. wheat for its milling operations. The situation is not as the minister would have us believe that we have secure access to a market in the United States. One of the things that the United States is doing is buying our product knowing that the prices are so low, handling the sales and turning right around and selling the product on the international market.

I can see the minister saying: "Well I cannot believe that that is true." Well, it is true. All he has to do is go down to the brokerage houses in Toronto and he will see what is happening.

• (1240)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): I have just a brief comment, Mr. Speaker. I am impressed with the enthusiasm that we are getting from some of the urban members. I wish that more of them would be as interested and supportive in what is happening to their food sources.

I guess because I have been here 11 or 12 years watching with great concern the decline of rural communities that it is not as easy for some of us who live it every day to be as enthusiastic as he was in our presentations. When one is watching the decline of the place where one grew up, and the families one knew, and the problems that your own family is having, it is not easy to become enthusiastic. I appreciate and applaud what he has done today by putting a fresh approach on the humdrum presentation of the facts, and by an acceptance of dealing with the legislation that we have before us.

What we are hoping to do with the quick passage of these two pieces of legislation here today is to make room on the parliamentary agenda for the government to present legislation that will provide a $1.3 billion pay-out to farmers this year, which is the shortfall that exists in net farm income for the 1991 crop year.

We are very enthusiastically awaiting the announcement by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the various ministers responsible for agriculture for that to occur.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, my enthusiasm should not be confused with any kind of eagerness. What it should be interpreted as is the kind of energy that is required I think to drive home the point that this is an issue that affects all Canadians. That is where I come from on this. It is not a situation where I am getting enthusiastic because I see farms collapsing on a day-to-day basis. Nor is it one where we see Canadians suffering virtually everywhere in this country.

In fact, it comes from a desire to ensure that a very important component of our social fabric and a very important dimension for the Canadian economy is not only preserved, but is nurtured, maintained and moved forward for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Mayer: I have just a brief comment, Mr. Speaker. The member made reference to Ogilvie importing wheat from the United States. I believe he is talking about a shipment of some 19,000 tonnes. That sounds like it is too much. I forget the number. It may have been 19,000 tonnes. The information I have is the reason Ogilvie did that is because of what happened with the grain inspectors. Because the grain handlers refused to cross the picket line, Canadian supplies were not available.

The member should be a little bit careful when he talks about linking that kind of a purchase which is, as I understand it, a one-time shot simply because Canadian supplies were not available. If he is criticizing that, then he should have been voting for the legislation that put public servants back to work, including the grain inspectors which, if they had stayed at work, would have not meant that Ogilvie had to go outside the country to buy wheat. He should be a little careful when he uses some of that information.

Second, I agree with the member for Mackenzie. I think this kind of support and enthusiasm, and I say enthusiasm in the best possible use of the word, is very helpful as far as having urban people understanding farm issues. I would be very happy to spend some time with the member. I invite him to come to committee and we can air some of these things and he can get a better understanding.

Again, I am not saying that his understanding is not useful, but he could understand fully some of the implications of the trade war and some of the things that we are trying to do to support farmers. I think this kind of support in the House from urban members is very welcome.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I just could not let the minister's comment go unchallenged. The fact of the matter is that Ogilvie with its one shipload, which is a substantial amount of wheat that will have been imported if we accept the minister's calculation, does not come necessarily from the grain inspectors. One of the problems is that we have had an erosion of a transportation system in this country, thanks in large measure to his government's policies over the course of the last seven years that are not permitting us to move grain as efficiently as we need to move it in order to get it to the markets where it is required. That has been the problem. It has not been the legislation that was before the House last week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The House is constituted as a committee of the whole to consider Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Shall clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1--Guarantee

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions to put to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

In the Auditor General's report he suggests that there is some $4.2 billion which is not properly authorized by Parliament. I wonder if the minister could say who the five top largest debtors are, or who owes that money to the Wheat Board. What countries are involved in that?

In the Auditor General's report of 1990, reporting on the fiscal year 1989, the Auditor General suggests that some $3.4 billion of this money is from financially troubled countries. I am not sure if that is a great exclusive club because it seems to me a lot of countries which are supposedly rich countries are also financially troubled countries, including our own. But I am wondering just which countries are in debt to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Auditor General's report goes on to suggest that the value of the board's troubled receivables is impaired by at least $2.1 billion, and this impairment continues to grow at the rate of $300 million a year.

I am assuming that that word "impairment" might better mean that they are not able to repay at all, or are incapable of repaying, since it is suggesting that some $300 million a year is added to the account or the debt. I wonder if the minister could tell us just which countries owe the $2.1 billion that appears not to be able to be repaid, and whether the government is planning to write that off, or whether it just continues to build up at the rate of $300 million. In fact, it was suggested by the hon. member for Mackenzie that the $4.2 billion that was in the Auditor General's report for 1990 had grown to $4.6 billion.

What we are trying to do is to give legal authority for new shipments of grain that are bought on credit by countries and by individuals around the world. We are trying to give legal authority to the existing debt. I wonder if the minister could tell us about those details.

• (1250)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the member's first question of who owes the Canadian Wheat Board money as a result of credit sales, I am sure the member will know that this is a very competitive market and what goes on as far as transactions is very sensitive and, therefore, is commercially confidential. We make every effort to comply with customer's concerns, even over the price that a sale has taken place for, for an appropriate period of time.

For me to stand in my place and signal to everybody, because this is full public record, who is owing money to the Canadian Wheat Board would not at all be appropriate and I do not think would be very useful. In fact, it would be very destructive to the board in its sales efforts.

With regard to the rescheduling and what the Auditor General says there, I made the point with the member for Mackenzie previously, that again we consider all of the debts as being sovereign because the Canadian Wheat Board signs agreements backed by central banks and governments of countries that we do business with. Therefore, from our point of view, if it is a sovereign debt it is ultimately repayable.

On the occasion when there is rescheduling that takes place, and there is a standstill, and we give countries breathing space, and a judgment call is made, then that is handled differently. That is put on the books in a different way. But until some of that rescheduling takes place, then the amount outstanding, because it is sovereign with other countries, is considered fully collectable.

The last point the member asked about is the rescheduling. If one looks at page 43 of the annual report, again it is not appropriate at all for anybody to talk about which countries are rescheduling, but there is a number there toward the right hand side of the page at the bottom. As of July 31, 1990, total rescheduling amounted to $3.3 billion, including $1.25 billion which is the Canadian equivalent of $1.8 billion receivable in United States funds.

In terms of countries, again it is a very difficult thing to do because we in no way want to impair the Canadian Wheat Board's ability to sell based on information that would not be useful in a commercial relationship. The numbers are there in terms of the total amount. If the member wants to turn to page 48, again as I pointed out to the member for Mackenzie, there is a listing which could be considered contingent liabilities. It is up from $3.7 billion in the previous crop year to $4.6 billion as of the crop year ended a year ago. The annual report for the just concluded crop year is in preparation. It will not likely be available for, I would think, another month to six weeks.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, the minister has the annual report open. Perhaps he could put on the record the amount of federal monies that went to the Wheat Board account by way of interest that was not paid by the defaulting countries that was paid into the account so that the farmers and the board were not responsible for those losses.

Mr. Mayer: I am wrong when I say that the report will be available. It is not available until some time, I believe, in February or March. I just wanted to correct that.

Again, it is not appropriate. If we were to put that kind of information out it would be very simple to calculate from the interest back to what the principle would be. If the member wants to look at page 43, there is a list of the various countries the board does provide credit to.

Just so that we use the right words, I am not so sure that "default" is the right word. As I said, because the debts that are incurred, or the loans that are made, are to sovereign countries and they are considered, therefore, as part of a country's sovereign commitment, we consider them collectable until they are rescheduled. So, I am not so sure that the member should use the word "default."

Mr. Althouse: For clarification then, were there any funds that went from the Government of Canada to the Canadian Wheat Board account in lieu of either interest missed or debts not paid in any of the past years and if so, what would that amount be?

I am not asking for commercial information. I am simply asking something that taxpayers and members of Parliament should be aware of. How many tax dollars did go to the Canadian Wheat Board, if any, to pay for either interest or loans that had not been kept up to date so that the farmers or the Wheat Board did not have to carry that liability?

Mr. Mayer: Let me try to explain it this way if I can. It is simply that when you think about transferring money from the Government of Canada to the Wheat Board to the farmers, that is not really what we are talking about here.

When the board makes a sale, if in fact the people who they are selling to do not pay fully, it goes to the market and borrows money.

We put a bill through the House, the hon. member will remember, about three or four years ago to give the board better opportunity to operate on the market. It can now issue its own paper in Canada and the United States. It is expanded to credit unions, trust companies and the whole thing. The member will be aware of that.

The board then decides how it is going to raise the money. It does so on a sovereign guarantee from the Government of Canada. If in fact that country or that individual cannot repay, the board has to keep borrowing. As the interest piles up or increases, the government guarantee just increases with that.

To suggest that the Government of Canada pays money into an account as a result of interest accruing on debts that have not been satisfied is not the right way to think about it.

If the member is talking about money on a deficit in the pool account for which the board has not been paid, then there is provision in the act that the government pays interest. I think the member will know what I am referring to there.

There have been cases when there has been a deficit in the pool account. Because the board has not received the full amount of money from its purchaser, the government pays interest from the end of the crop year for an appropriate period of time to satisfy that requirement so that the producers are not out.

Again, I do not think it is right to say that the Government of Canada actually puts money into a Canadian Wheat Board account to satisfy interest as a result of a customer not paying its loan when they anticipated they would be able to.

Mr. Althouse: Perhaps the minister or his officials could explain the impact of the amendment to section 33 of the act. It refers on the second page to the principal so guaranteed and any interest that accrues during that pool period with respect to sales of wheat on credit, et cetera.

The guarantee of the interest was part of the act before this change. That was why I was curious as to whether any payments had in fact been made under that particular portion of the act that has been in existence for the last two or three years, or whether this is simply something anticipating a situation.

From what the minister has been telling us, apparently there has been no transfer of funds to pay interest foregone or interest that could not be paid and that is really all I need to know if that is in fact what he was telling us.

There has not been any requirement for money to move from the Government of Canada to the Wheat Board under this particular section of the act.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, that is precisely my understanding of it.

What simply happens is that the line of credit or the credit limit simply gets raised to take into account the amount of interest that has to be paid by somebody to keep that loan outstanding.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton--Middlesex): Mr. Chairman, I rise to make some comments on this bill today. I must say that I am very much in support of the amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act that would allow the government to authorize the Minister of Finance to make these payments.

As I indicated earlier this day, every piece of legislation has to be amended from time to time. In that context, I think there has been an oversight here and I want to propose a very simple technical amendment that requires the addition of two words to correct a huge error that was made a little over a year and a half ago.

I am sure in the minister's own mind he realizes the blunder that was made in early 1989 when oats were removed from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. We all know that the price of oats plummeted shortly after the decision was made and the price never recovered.

Of course the positive impact I believe for the minister himself, because I am aware of the criticism levelled at him when this was removed from under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board, is that this amendment would ensure that such a mistake would never happen again. If such a move had to be passed by this House, we in the Liberal Party would never allow it to happen.

So this removes the government discretion and makes this inclusion mandatory that these grains are included in the act itself. Therefore, I move:

> That Bill C-23 be amended by adding thereto the following clause:
> "3.18(2) of this act is repealed and the following substituted therefor: 3.18(2) Except as directed by the Governor in Council, the Board shall not buy grain other than wheat, oats and barley."

I move this amendment, Mr. Chairman, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair takes under advisement the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex.

It being one o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again later this day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago today multiculturalism became official Canadian policy. It came alive here in the House of Commons. Then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau christened it with these words:

"A policy of multiculturalism commends itself to the government as the most suitable means of assuring the cultural freedom of Canadians--National unity, if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity; out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share—"

Indeed, multiculturalism as a policy affirms that "freedom to be ourselves cannot be left to chance."

Canada is home to all who have chosen to live here. The people of many cultures have built this country. The nation is living, breathing and always changing.

It was in Canada's interests that this House proclaimed multiculturalism as an instrument of national unity 20 years ago today. It is in Canada's interests that today this House reaffirm its commitment to multiculturalism. National unity may depend upon it.

DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Haitian community, I wish to thank and congratulate our Prime Minister for his firmness in defending rights and democracy in Haiti.

The thanks of the Haitian community also go to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his courage and determination and to the Minister for External Relations for her firm stand.

Many organizations, associations and friends of the Haitian community in Quebec and Canada have assured me that they would never forget this remarkable stand our government took to restore democracy in Haiti, despite some difficulties.

AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian AIDS Society has declared this to be AIDS Awareness Week. The theme across Canada is AIDS: Our Challenge for Life.

If the government's original response to this challenge, the National AIDS Strategy, announced in June 1990 is to succeed, there must be more funding and support. The organizations in Canada working to control and reverse the AIDS epidemic are having to deal with increasing numbers of cases without a corresponding increase in funding. Even the current limited and increasingly inadequate federal commitment will end on March 31, 1993.

Mr. Speaker, AIDS is not the disease of the 1980s. It is still with us in the 1990s and the crisis is far from over. We must increase resources and extend our commitment to fight this terrible disease, as the Ontario government announced yesterday it will do.

I am certain the persons living with AIDS and their loved ones in this country and those who have died already as a result of this disease are looking to us for concrete evidence of our understanding that AIDS does indeed pose our challenge for life.

BLUE BOX PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a company that continues to show leadership in waste control.

Friday, October 4, marked the 10th anniversary of Laidlaw Waste Systems blue box program. Laidlaw currently recycles 40,000 tonnes of household and commercial recyclables per year. The anniversary was celebrated with the opening of a 10,000 square foot expansion to Laidlaw's Mississauga facility, establishing it as the most innovative recycling plant in North America.

When the Laidlaw blue box program started 10 years ago in Kitchener, the company collected three products for recycling; newspaper, glass and cans. Building on the success of the original program, Laidlaw now recycles 12 products through its Mississauga facility including corrugated cardboard, glossy magazines, household plastics, textiles, and white goods such as fridges, stoves and their associated CFC gases.

I want to congratulate this private sector firm for working hand in hand with governments in accepting the responsibility of preserving our environment and at the same time preventing the wasteful use of our natural resources.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend members of the Company of Young Canadians held their 25th reunion. CYC volunteers from across the country convened to discuss those very special creative years and to share insight into current social problems which plague our country.

The CYC was brought into existence through legislation to encourage young people to share their energy with communities across the country which faced grave social and economic challenges. Training sessions in community development and human relations enabled these same young people to contribute greatly to the communities sense that they deserved a say in decisions that affected their lives and that the sound principle of participatory democracy was indeed a principle to be upheld and respected.

These same volunteers voiced sincere concern that today young people do not have in place a similar opportunity to serve their country. They also reaffirmed their ongoing concern and commitment to continuing to contribute to and assist in promoting the principles of community development and concern for their fellow citizen.

I bow to and honour these CYC volunteers who remain as energetic and caring today, 25 years later.

STATEMENTS MADE BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval Est): Mr. Speaker, as a member of a minority, I feel I must comment on the statement made by the former Liberal Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau. A statement of this kind by a man who has an international reputation and enjoys a certain credibility is unworthy, irresponsible and libellous. I would even call it psychological terrorism, an attempt to intimidate those who are seeking a country that is tolerant.

Minorities are full-fledged Quebecers and are treated as such by all Francophone Quebecers. Distinct society or not, minorities have nothing to fear. As far as scare tactics are concerned, Quebecers were exposed to worse during the seventies under the Trudeau government.

It is high time someone told him: "Put your feet up, Grandpa".

TREASURY BOARD

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, when the treasury board president announced that top level government appointees would receive big fat bonuses at Christmas while all other public servants would get nothing, not even a lump of coal, my phone rang off the hook. And all of this on the coat-tails of the largest back to work order in Canadian history.

For the record, here is what some of my constituents had to say: "You should demand that the treasury board president resign". "I didn't picket before but if they went out again I would be on the line". "I am outraged at the blatant display of political shenanigans". "I am disgusted".

Mr. Speaker, I share these opinions. This is a government run amok. Let us call a spade a spade. The rules of fair play have not been applied here. When will the government realize that if you do not pay Peter you cannot reward Paul. The minister responsible for Treasury Board should resign.

PERSONS CASE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 62nd anniversary of the Persons case. In that connection I am privileged to rise today to extend my congratulations to a member of my constituency, Ms. Doris Anderson, who is a recipient of this year's Governor General's Award in Commemoration of the Persons case.

• (1410)

Ms. Anderson has been at the forefront of the women's movement in Canada for more than 30 years and has distinguished herself as a journalist, author and equal rights activist. Perhaps best known as the long-time editor of Chatelaine magazine, she has also served as President of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women and President of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. She has also played a major role in the movement to entrench equality rights for women in the Constitution.

Through her work she has made innumerable contributions to the advancement of women in this country and I ask all members of this House to commend her on this important award.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, across Canada, farmers are facing extreme economic hardship. For a variety of reasons beyond their control, many farm commodity prices are below the costs of production. Many are being forced to sell their farms or go bankrupt.

Canadians must understand the importance of farming to our national well-being. We in Canada, compared to all other nations, pay the second lowest portion of our income on food purchases, yet we complain. The fact is that if we in Canada lose our ability to feed ourselves, we will end up paying whatever the hand that feeds us demands: our cash, our natural resources, our political support.

Farming is also vital to our Canadian economy in terms of trade revenues and its spin-off support to supply, handling and processing industries. Farming supports the rural lifestyle preferred by so many Canadians.

In my riding of Northumberland and across Canada, farmers demand that this government commit to defending and improving the viability of the whole Canadian agricultural industry at the upcoming GATT negotiations. In particular Article XI of GATT must be clarified and strengthened to protect our supply managed producers.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend the member for Willowdale, who is the Liberal industry critic, was at a conference in Toronto and was a cheerleader for a free trade agreement with Mexico.

The spokesman for the Liberal Party is quoted as saying that this is a marvellous opportunity to amend the free trade agreement. How naive, Mr. Speaker. The Liberal Party should recognize the fact that the present trade deal has cost over 200,000 jobs and that a further trade deal with Mexico is a more massive threat to Canadian workers.

Why are the Liberals waffling? Are they seeking to regain the financial support of the large corporations which are sponsors of the free trade deal? Now is the time to stand against the free trade deal. It is not the time to be tricked and trapped by the Prime Minister and his corporate friends who want a corporate agenda for all of North America.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, according to the Minister for International Trade, Mr. Wilson, a proposal to update the Constitution and improve market efficiencies within the country does not go far enough to solve the problems facing the Canadian economy.

A close examination of the Canadian economy would support this position. For example, between 1985 and 1990 unit labour costs in the U.S. declined marginally whereas in Canada they climbed 48 per cent. As well, wages in Canada have increased 27.6 per cent compared to 18.6 per cent in the U.S.

In response to these realities, the Minister for International Trade will embark upon a prosperity and competitiveness campaign. We look forward to the minister's prosperity initiative as we face the realities of a global marketplace. As it is often said, Mr. Speaker, there is no place left to hide.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I attended a meeting of over 500 farmers in my riding in Nova Scotia on Friday concerning the general picture of agriculture. They have an understandable concern about western wheat and/or the wheat war and that our international trade negotiators might forget Article XI of GATT.

I want to take the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to impress upon the government, especially the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture, that while there is the understandable concern about western wheat, that in the negotiations under GATT going on in Geneva now, there can be no back-peddling on the position we put forward December, 1990 on Article XI of GATT. Any change would be a disaster for supply management and would affect so many farmers in other parts of the country than the west.

ENVIRONMENTAL CHOICE PROGRAM

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to draw your attention to the Environmental Choice Program and its first national consumer awareness campaign.

Environmental Choice was created by the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada in June 1988 to provide consumers with environmentally responsible alternatives in the marketplace.

Since its creation the program has come a long way. Today its symbol of certification can be found on more than 500 products and services of some 80 companies. These range from re-refined lubricating oil to residential composting systems and diaper services, and the list grows every week.

The awareness campaign is designed to reach out to Canadians across the country through television and print messages. It will help consumers more easily identify products and services that are less harmful to the environment. It will also help industry recognize the market advantages enjoyed by products and services that bear the program's certification.

I ask that Canadians take note of this important program. Only with their widespread involvement can Environmental Choice make a significant impact.

QUEBEC'S SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, there are people who say Quebec's sovereignty will cause a flight of investment capital. We must realize that capital moves for various reasons: interest rates, availability of labour, market conditions, technological change, and so forth.

The government's financial position also has an impact on the movement of capital. Political instability will also affect this movement.

Today, foreign capital is avoiding and even leaving Canada, mainly because of the deficit and also because of political instability.

In Quebec, we know what we want. We want to get rid of federal bad management. We want to get rid of political instability, in order to build a prosperous Quebec.

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon--Souris): Mr. Speaker, the financial farm crisis which exists in western Canada today is the worst in recent memory.

With farm gate prices slashed to early 1970 levels, grain producers are unable to pay their operating loans let alone meet their long-term debt obligations. Consequently there is an immense amount of pessimism in the region, the most severe in fact that I have ever seen.

As our grain producers have a genuine and immediate need for financial assistance, I was pleased to be present in Winnipeg last Friday when the Prime Minister promised the third line of defence committee that additional federal dollars would soon be forthcoming.

However, western grain producers and the businesses that support them are also dependent on those who move the grain to market. That is why striking grain handlers at Thunder Bay must be legislated back to work. Moreover, grain handling must be declared an essential service so that farmers will never again be the innocent victims of highly destructive strikes as they have been this autumn.

The farmer's plight is extremely severe and we must respond immediately.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the time has come to get serious about job training in Canada. At a time when companies are warning our government that new jobs will materialize only if we can generate enough skilled and educated people to use the latest technology, our response to this challenge has been unacceptable.

Federal expenditures on training as a share of the GDP have fallen from .19 per cent to .17 per cent during the period 1987 to 1990.

On the job training is outrageously inadequate. In 1988 the average worker in Japan received 200 hours of training. In Sweden, 170 and in Canada, less than 7 hours.

At a time when we have a 30 per cent high school dropout rate, I urge business, government and labour to devise a strategy and to co-operate so that we can have an effective and dynamic training program for our youth, our workers.

The federal government must take the lead.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Some 50,000 farmers, or one out of every five farmers in Canada, are in danger of losing their farms.

Nowhere is the situation more desperate than in Saskatchewan, but the Prime Minister seems to be waiting for just the right moment in the Saskatchewan election before announcing an emergency aid package.

When is he going to stop playing politics with the lives of farmers? Why does he not announce an emergency aid package for western farmers right away?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend would seem to suggest that our interest in western agriculture has just begun. A point of fact, in the seven years that this government has been in office we have increased assistance to western agriculture by 650 per cent from the levels left by the Liberals.

We have tried, as best as any government can, to stand with the farmers. I met in Winnipeg with the representatives of the third line of defence. I pointed out to some people after that in 1962 when I was private secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, which is 29 years ago, the question then was $2 wheat and the question today is $2 wheat, some 29 years later. This means that everything else has gone up and the farmers' prices have remained stable at 30-year old levels. This is unacceptable.

The Government of Canada has stood with the farmers before and we will stand with them again.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that my interest with the farmers of western Canada goes back to my grandfather who was a farmer in Alberta and goes back to all my uncles who have been farming in Saskatchewan and Alberta, so it is not new for me to talk about farming in western Canada.

What we see happening today seems very familiar. Everyone knows that during the last Saskatchewan election the Prime Minister was able to find a billion dollars just at the right time.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is he waiting for another midnight call from Grant Devine, who will be defeated anyway?

The farmers of Canada cannot afford to wait. The farmers of Canada want action right away. Why does he not do what has to be done right away?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know, unlike my hon. friend, who will be elected in Saskatchewan at the election. That will be the decision of the people of Saskatchewan. The problems of the farmers of western Canada are unrelated to any electoral results. They are related to justice and well-being. This government has stood with them in the past and will stand with them again.

We are moving as quickly as we can. As I indicated last Friday in Winnipeg, I instructed the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to try and bring together, within a week, a specific proposal that we would then share with the members of the third line of defence committee, which is the way we have been working with them since last spring. That process seemed to meet with fine favour among all the representatives who were there from across Canada. I think it is a reasonable and appropriate way to proceed, in co-operation with the provinces and in co-operation with the pools and producers, and that is what we are trying to do.

With regard to my friend's grandfather from western Canada, he is one of our strong supporters.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, not only are this government's agricultural policies destroying the foundations of Western Canada's economy, but this very day, conservative economist

Thomas Courchene said that Canada was in danger of disappearing as a result of high interest rates and an overvalued dollar.

Why does the Prime Minister not act immediately to make Canadian goods more competitive abroad and bring the dollar down to a normal level so that our workers can find employment throughout the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, interest rates have fallen nearly 6 points in almost a year. For the past three months, inflation has been below 3 per cent and we are aiming for a rate of 3 per cent next year. Economic growth is expected to be 3.5 per cent next year.

So I think that the government's economic strategies are working fairly well, considering that the IMF just said that economic growth in Canada would rival Japan's next year for the lead of all major industrialized countries. The record is not so bad.

Now if my friend, a former Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board, is telling us that the Department of Finance should give the Bank of Canada a directive to lower the value of the Canadian dollar artificially to 80 cents, let him say so directly, because he knows the immediate disastrous consequences for Canadian investments; he knows that the inflationary impact in Canada would be catastrophic. What will help lower the value of the dollar are falling interest rates, rising growth rates and prudent management of public affairs, which we are doing.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, Thomas Courchene who is director of the School of Policy Studies at Queen's and an advisor to this government, told the Canadian Exporters Association that high interest rates and the overvalued dollar are creating "a reserve army of the unemployed".

I ask the Prime Minister: Why will the government not cease now those policies that are conscripting 1.5 million Canadian workers against their will into its reserve army of the unemployed? Why does this government insist on leading them in a death march to economic oblivion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are following a course of economic development that my hon. friend can--

Mr. Peterson: It is not working.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Willowdale says it is not working.

Ten years ago this morning, when his government was in office, the interest rate was 20 per cent. Today it is 8.75. Inflation ten years ago this morning was 12.6 per cent and rising. This morning it is 5.8 per cent and declining. That is the program of this government.

We are not going to return to that kind of philosophy. It does not work. We have inflation that is dropping. We have investment that is increasing and we have the economy on track for what the OECD says will be impressive economic growth in 1992 and 1993. I think that is good news for Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said that the economy is on track, but Professor Courchene told the Canadian Exporters yesterday: "Our overvalued Canadian dollar is hollowing us out all along the production, tourism, cross-border shopping spectrum". "Moreover", he said, "our monetary stance is imperilling our future". That is a strange way to keep the economy on track, to take steps that will imperil our future.

I ask the Prime Minister: Will he cease those policies now that are imperilling our future and bring back hope to the Canadian people about their economy and their future?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an alternative to the course that we are following, that is the course pursued by my hon. friend when he was President of the Treasury Board where spending in Canada increased by 14 per cent a year every year for 15 years. During that period of time the debt in Canada increased by 1,100 per cent. That is a lethal course for Canada and we are not going to follow it.

An hon. member: Deindustrialize Canada.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Willowdale yells his favourite word "deindustrialize". A point of fact, since the free trade agreement was brought in, the net inflow of foreign investment in Canada, positive investment in Canada, was some $4 billion. For the first time in 15 years there is that kind of net investment flow into Canada creating the new jobs that Canadians need.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton--Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister is aware of the absolutely desperate situation among prairie farmers. In a way it is very difficult even to describe the tension, the stress, the problems with families, the suicide rate and such things in the rural prairies.

In view of the fact that farm income now on the prairies is less than one-quarter of the rate of the national poverty level in this country, I wonder if the Prime Minister can level with the House today and assure us that when he makes this announcement there will be an emergency package of more than $1 billion for farmers in this country. Can he tell us exactly when that payment is going to be made?

• (1430)

Families out there are really under stress. They need an answer and they need it now.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in Winnipeg, even though the Government of Canada does not have the money, we are going to try to find the money as quickly as we can to put together a package that will help the farmers who are affected by this crushing drop in commodity prices.

As I speak, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds are putting together a proposal for cabinet which I believe will come forward on Thursday. As quickly as I can thereafter I will be happy to advise my hon. friend.

We are trying to help the western farmers in every way we can. I know, in keeping with that, he would want to help the farmers by asking his friends in organized labour to cease that work stoppage in the Lakehead which is stopping the sale of western wheat.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton--Melville): Mr. Speaker, our party has been asking for mediation in that dispute now for a long time. We have been trying to get both sides back together. The Minister of Labour is fully aware of our endeavours.

What I want to ask the Prime Minister is: Why can he not announce that package today? He has known of the problems now for many months, in fact going back six or eight months. The situation has not changed. It is desperate on the prairies. Why the delay? Does the delay have to do with Grant Devine's election schedule? If so, why this cynicism? Why not announce it now? Why play games with people's lives, is what I am asking?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows that we have put together the GRIP and NISA programs which will be putting, within the next eight months but as of September, some $2.5 billion into the pockets of Canadian farmers.

What we are talking about is a deficiency payment over and above that to meet the shortfall on income that affects individual farmers across the country but principally in western Canada.

This is something that was dealt with by the third line of defence which brought together people from across western Canada. I met with them on Friday. We had a lengthy and productive meeting. All of the people representing the family farms, the pools and so on across the prairies seem to think that the way we are proceeding is the right way and the productive way.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Liberals seem to find this funny, laughing at the opinions of the western farmers, but I can tell you that I think the farmers will welcome the prudent, thoughtful and I hope generous manner in which we are proceeding.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

I do not think that farm women who bear intolerable burdens because of the poverty, the insecurity and the stress in their lives and the lives of their families will feel that the approach this government is taking in delaying so long any kind of emergency help is the right way.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: How does he think that families can manage on $6,300 net income and feed their families? When will the government make a commitment and pay these emergency funds that families are waiting for and desperately need?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand, I think, very well the concerns in rural Canada, not just in western Canada but in Ontario, Atlantic Canada and Quebec. What we have been doing is working with the farm leaders in that area to bring about whatever assistance we can as a government in Canada. That means that we will have to, as the Prime Minister said, use every resource to address the need.

What we have to do, though, is understand that there was an announcement last summer of some $543 million that flowed. There will be another $1.5 billion that will flow before Christmas and $1.1 billion will flow after.

That being said, it still does not bring a return to the producers of grains and oilseeds in Canada any higher than the return they got 29 years ago in 1962.

We are going to be able to address it. I hope the opposition will support every piece of legislation and every necessity that this government puts forward to support agriculture, including helping to settle the strike at Thunder Bay which is harming agriculture in western Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Canadian farmers are facing the worst financial crisis in a generation because the government cut support programs by $1.3 billion and has not provided any cash assistance this year so far.

The Minister of Finance has aggravated the situation because of his high dollar policy which is costing Canadian farmers over $400 million a year. When is the Minister of Finance going to help Canadian farmers? When is he going to lower the value of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the rationale for the question from my Liberal friend.

How are we going to lower the dollar? Is he suggesting that we arbitrarily set the price of the dollar? Are we going to say the price of the dollar is now 75 cents or 80 cents? Is that what they are suggesting?

I do not have a background in economics, but anybody who does thinks that that is an absolute asinine way to run an economy in a country.

As far as the assistance to agriculture is concerned, the hon. member knows that we have been working with the established groups. We have been working very hard over the last two years, first of all, to put in safety net programs and, second, to address the stupidity of the international grain war with the Americans and the European community. They are really, really carrying out a ridiculous war and harming Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and other farmers. Third, we are looking at ways of supporting the market. We are looking at ways of supporting our agricultural producers by allowing others who need our products the opportunity to buy them.

This takes some time, but I would say to the hon. member that the crop year that we are talking about is still under way. Corn is still being harvested in Ontario and grains and oilseeds have just been completed in western Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, every one of the farm established groups told this minister and told the government last spring that it needed at least $1.3 billion of emergency cash assistance last spring. The government has not provided one cent of that money.

After the Rosetown rally of over 3,000 protesting farmers last week, the minister said that he had no intention of providing emergency assistance to Canadian farmers. Last Friday the Prime Minister said that there is going to be aid. I want to know: Who is telling the truth?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the western Canadian, the Ontario and the Atlantic farmers know who is telling the truth.

They know who has been beside them since 1984. They know who has increased agriculture spending. They also know the assistance they got from his government when interest rates were 24 per cent and when farms were being foreclosed.

This government, since 1984, has assisted agriculture 650 times more than his government did. I say to the hon. member: When I was asked in Saskatchewan about aid being provided, whether there would be $1 billion for the province of Saskatchewan alone, I said: "No, that was ridiculous".

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance.

A recent study of our oil and gas sector said: "The appreciation of the Canadian dollar since 1985 has cost the producing industry a total of about $3.5 billion in lost revenue".

Our farm, pulp and paper, mining and other resource sectors have been devastated by the dollar which has gone up since 1985 successively. Many jobs have been lost. Farms have been lost. Which one of the options available to the Minister of Finance does he intend to take to bring the dollar down?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear from that side of the House the talk of high dollar.

Back in 1978 the dollar was at about 87.5 cents and today we are seeing interest rates at a much lower rate than back in those days. That is what we are trying to do: get inflation down, get interest rates down, and keep them down. That will allow our people to be more competitive.

I might remind the hon. member of a quote of Dennis Williams, chairman of General Electric Canada: "A lower dollar might make everybody's life a lot easier, but it is not the difference between winning and losing".

• (1440)

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The pulp and paper industry in Quebec, and of course in the other provinces, is in danger. Hundreds of jobs have been lost in recent weeks because the Canadian dollar is overvalued. Will the Minister of Finance finally listen to all participants in the economy and bring down the value of the Canadian dollar?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think, in the example that the hon. member gave in the pulp and paper industry, he knows full well that there is an oversupply in that particular industry at the present time and it is a competitive position.

Most economists will tell us here in Canada that it is not the high dollar where we are having our major problem. Where we are having it is in our lack of competitiveness. It does not have to do with the high dollar, but in fact they talk about the labour costs in manufacturing which have increased in this country by 28 per cent while our productivity has only risen 1.2 per cent.

For our major competitor, the United States, in the same period of time salaries went up 18.2 per cent, but at the same time its productivity went up 18.6 per cent. We have to be more productive in this country and that is why the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is working so hard on this area with his colleagues and with the people of Canada.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the person that we have been talking about throughout this Question Period, Thomas Courchene, professor of economic and financial policy at Queen's University, as well as a previous adviser to this government. He has said that the Canadian dollar and its increase has cost Canada two-thirds of our competitiveness against the United States.

Given this very strong criticism and given that Mr. Courchene has been a key adviser to the government in the past, will this government accept his recommendation to lower the dollar to 80 cents and cut interest rates to help our exporters right across Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me correct the hon. member. Mr. Courchene is not an adviser to the Government of Canada. The second point that I make is that we have seen in the past where the Canadian dollar has gone down. It was 103 to 105 cents in the middle seventies and it hit bottom in the middle eighties at less than 70 cents.

During that time we did not get more competitive. We saw our standard of living slip.

If we look around the world today to the Japanese and the Germans, they have the strongest currencies. They have the strongest economies. I think the hon. member has to reflect on the fact that the level of the Canadian dollar is but one element of competitive position. If we only focus on that we are going to miss the boat because there are other elements of competitive composition such as the amount of research and development that is spent by industry, the amount of training that is done in the country, the amount of investment that goes into improving the productivity of companies, the competitiveness of our domestic market, and our ability to sell internationally into other markets in the world.

It is that combination which allows—

Mr. Speaker: It is time to move on. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor will put his supplementary question.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about these other areas, but the failure of this government in those other areas has been just as great as the failure with respect to the high dollar policy.

Does the government not realize that it is time for it to act, or is it just going to let John Crow continue to run his high interest, high dollar policy until the economy of this country is completely ruined?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the statements by the hon. member are simply not supported by the facts, and he knows that because he is an economist himself.

The point that I think must be made here is that John Crow does not sit in his office pulling big levers to set the level of the Canadian dollar. We have seen since the end of May 1990 interest rates come down by nearly 6 percentage points. We have seen the spread between the United States and Canada come down by nearly 3 percentage points. Yet the dollar at the end of May 1990 was 84.60. Today it is 88.60. So how is my hon. friend going to explain the level of the Canadian dollar? He has a lot of questions to ask of himself.

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister concerning the very critical situation in Yugoslavia.

The British Foreign Secretary this morning said that the European community has done all that it could to bring about a cease-fire in that country and has now asked the United Nations to intervene directly.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: What specific measures Canada will take today to help put an end to the bloodshed in Yugoslavia and to protect the people in Croatia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position adopted by the European community today in regard to the United Nations is a position that the Government of Canada put forward to the Secretary-General of the United Nations exactly 10 days ago.

We believed at that time that this truce was unlikely to hold and as a result we felt it imperative that the Security Council be seized of this matter and that a peacekeeping force be invited in. Canada was ready to be part of that and I signalled that to the Secretary-General.

We believe that this would be a beneficial presence, as it has been around the world. There is no reason whatsoever for young Serbs and Croats to be dying in the interests of 18th century nationalism in Europe. That is a situation where the United Nations can intervene and can be helpful.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I thank the Prime Minister for the answer.

HAITI

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. Unfortunately, all mediation efforts by the OAS delegation to restore democracy in Haiti have failed.

Last week, the Prime Minister said he was considering all options, including the use of military force, to ensure the return of democracy to Haiti.

In view of this commitment, will Canada recommend that certain measures used by the OAS? If so, what are those measures?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the OAS has already intervened substantially in the situation in Haiti, and on behalf of all members of this House, I would like to offer our congratulations to the hon. Barbara McDougall, our Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was there, representing with great dignity and courage the interests of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Today, at the United Nations and through the Organization of American States, we are pursuing various peaceful solutions. I can inform the hon. member that we are also listening to what is being said by Haitians, and I would like to quote a comment made by President Aristide this morning, about his personal preferences: He said the following:

[English]

"We are looking for ways to liberate the Haitian people and military intervention is not one we even consider. The strategy of the Haitian people is more peaceful. We are looking toward economic boycotts, diplomatic boycotts".

This is the impression of the President of Haiti. It is a course he is prescribing for the Organization of American States and the United Nations and it is one that Canada will vigorously pursue.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander--Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the minister told us in the House yesterday, an advisory group on executive compensation appointed by this Prime Minister--and I have the report--reported on December 15, 1986: "For the largest corporations we recommend that the top executives appointed by the Governor in Council be eligible for incentive pay of up to 25 per cent of their actual salaries".

• (1450)

Why have these executives been receiving bonuses of up to 25 per cent of their salaries since 1987 without public disclosure to the people who are footing the bill, the people of Canada?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, that committee the hon. member referred to was a committee established by the previous government as a way of coming up with fair and reasonable remuneration to the heads of Crown corporations and agencies and so on. As I offered yesterday I offer again: if there is a better, fairer way to do this, fairer to the taxpayers, to the corporation involved, to the people, we wait for the suggestion.

But again I repeat that as of the budget of last spring, everybody for the pay period starting after that budget will receive a zero per cent increase and, as the President of the Treasury Board said, in addition performance pay will be zero for heads of Crown corporations for that pay period.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we retroactively go back three or four years and recover these performance pay bonuses, let him say that overtly. I do not think that would be fair or equitable or in keeping with the budget statement made in the spring.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander--Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, there are also 10 and 15 per cent bonuses for government appointees. The former PC leader in Newfoundland, Mr. Tom Rideout, who has just been appointed to a board, will be able to receive up to about $10,000 in an annual bonus. No wonder there is a by-election in Newfoundland. Ed Broadbent, about $15,000; former cabinet minister Thomas McMillan, about $14,000--

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker: By what logic can the government justify paying bonuses to ambassadors and consul generals all over the world? Why, they don't even have to pay their rent. There is a bonus to the consul general of Los Angeles and to the consul general in Dallas. Why, even J. R. would be jealous of that.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, let me repeat for perhaps the seventh or eighth or tenth time in the last few days that for the pay period commencing after the budget of last spring the bonuses will be zero per cent.

Let me repeat again the invitation I make to the hon. member, his party, or anybody else: If they can come up with a better, fairer way of establishing a remuneration for heads of agencies, Crown corporations and so on that will be fair to the taxpayers, that will ensure that the persons are remunerated based on what the rest of the economy gets, we wait for that suggestion.

In the meantime, because of the fiscal situation of the government, because of the example we want to set, their performance pay will be zero per cent. As we have said ad nauseam, it is zero per cent increase, zero performance pay for everybody.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the Croatian issue and ask a question of the Prime Minister.

In view of the June referendum in Croatia in which 94 per cent approved independence, reaffirmed last night by a declaration of Croatian independence, and in view of the continuing violence by the Yugoslavian army in Croatia in addition to the measures already referred to in this House by the Prime Minister involving the Security Council of the United Nations in peacekeeping, will the government show leadership on this issue, first, by again strongly condemning the violence by the Yugoslavian army; second, by insisting that the Yugoslavian army withdraw from Croatia; and, third, will the government today commit itself to back up those measures with tough economic sanctions in concert with the European community?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with my hon. friend in one important area. The Yugoslav army is absolutely out of control and has caused extraordinary damage both to the Serbs and the Croats in Yugoslavia who have lived for some four or five decades in a state of peace and economic growth and prosperity in that country.

With regard to the question that he raised, on October 4 I wrote again—I think it was the third or fourth time—to the President of the Republic of Serbia and to the President of the Republic of Croatia making precisely and in the strongest possible language the points my hon. friend has raised.

In regard to the fundamental issue, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated yesterday that Canada believes that the twin track approach agreed to on October 4 is the most realistic way to solve the crisis. This agreement provides for those republics that wish it to gain recognition in a framework of a general negotiated settlement that would protect minority rights, ensure against unilateral and forcible changes of borders, and provide for a loose association or alliance of sovereign republics.

This is consistent with everything that previous governments have stated in regard to a problem of this nature, and it is a case that we have vigorously made at the United Nations Security Council.

We are going to try again, both at the Security Council and with our colleagues in Europe, to make sure that there is an intervention because the violence and the killing in Yugoslavia must cease.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for the answer and ask a supplementary question.

The Croatian community in Canada, as well as other members of Parliament including the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, have been urging the government to move immediately on humanitarian assistance in Croatia, particularly in food and medicine.

Will the Prime Minister now advise the House that the government will move on humanitarian assistance routed through an independent Slovenia direct to the people of Croatia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the leaders of both the Serbian and Croatian communities in Canada. We have already committed humanitarian assistance to these peoples, and Canada is prepared to do more.

The edicts of the European community and the expression of will of the United Nations Security Council must be heeded. There is no reason whatsoever for sane men and women to tolerate a situation where an army is absolutely out of control and bringing death and destruction to an otherwise quite prosperous nation that was struggling for unity.

We hope that the intervention of the United Nations and/or the economic community will bring the parties together so that both Serbs and Croats can realize that their destiny can be a peaceful and a productive one together.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Last night on the CBC news, former employees of Nationair charged the airline with very serious safety violations.

We also learned, and I have a copy of the document, that for the very first time in aviation history a safety review of the airline was ordered by Transport Canada two weeks after a DC–8 Nationair crashed in Saudi Arabia on July 11, which killed 247 passengers including 14 Canadians.

I ask the minister: In light of the evidence presented last evening, will the minister immediately make public the findings of this special review so as to reassure Canadians and the travelling public that Nationair is safe to fly?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that Nationair is safe to fly. It has been complying with all recommendations that have been made occasionally by Transport Canada.

I think the member knows that the airline industry around the world is in very big difficulty. I do not think that allegations of this kind are profitable to Nationair or to any other industry, because Canada is still the country with the best safety record in the air.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the minister obviously did not hear my question because I made no such allegation.

Now that the allegations of former employees of Nationair are in the public domain, given that his own department for the very first time in aviation history has issued a safety review, given the fact that he has said that Nationair is safe, and I am happy to hear that, and given the fact that a review has been put in place by this government, can the minister release those findings so as to reassure Canadians that what he has said today in the House is backed up by facts and information issued by his own department?

• (1500)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that all recommendations which have ever been made by Transport Canada regarding Nationair or other airlines are always very scrupulously followed. We make sure that they have been corrected. Every time we receive a direct complaint from an employee, we keep the records confidential. It helps anyone who wants to make a complaint to do it in all confidence that the information will not be revealed and therefore he or she can be very open in their comments.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was quoted as saying that: "The GST was a matter of tax policy. It was a change in policy. It was not a measure designed to raise revenue".

My question for the government is this. If the GST was not intended to raise revenue, why is the government proposing a debt reduction account into which all of the GST revenue is supposed to be paid?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): The total amount of the GST funds will be put into the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund so that Canadians can be satisfied that the full amount of the GST will be paid to service and reduce the debt. That I think is a principle which is fully supported by Canadians.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, if Canadians are going to be satisfied about reduction of the deficit and the debt, would the minister explain how Canadians are going to find this reassurance when the debt reduction account itself will be in a deficit of almost $27 billion this year and that after five years it will be in a deficit of about $122 billion?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I think Canadians will be well satisfied by the fact that the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund, plus the legislation to control spending increases to a rate of 3 per cent per annum, will get this deficit–debt problem under control. They will be reflecting on the fact that for 14 or 15 years prior to our taking office in 1984, it was a 14 per cent per annum increase, compared to the 3 per cent per annum increase that we are legislating.

I can tell that members opposite do not like to be reminded of this, because that 14 per cent increase in spending means an increase in taxes and that is what--

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halton--Peel.

PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton--Peel): Mr. Speaker, constituents in my riding are increasingly concerned about the justice system's ability to protect them. It seems criminals have more rights than victims and technical loopholes allow criminals to get off lightly.

I see we have new legislation today changing the corrections and parole system. My question is for the Minister of Justice. I would like to know what assurances she could give my constituents that these changes are going to address some of those fundamental concerns.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will not go into the content of the legislation in the House. I would simply like to say to the hon. member that I share his concern.

The Solicitor General this morning did table legislation that will address concerns about parole by establishing protection of the public as the number one decision-making criteria for release of any offender from prison.

BANFF NATIONAL PARK

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the people of Banff National Park are waiting to hear when phase 3 of the highway twining project at Banff National Park will take place. Accidents and fatalities are still occurring at an alarming rate on this very dangerous section of the highway.

My question is for the minister responsible for Parks Canada. Will the minister agree to allocate funds from the 1992-93 budget for the continuation of the twining of this highway?

Point of Order

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern. The hon. member for Wild Rose has brought up this issue with us on many occasions.

Parks Canada is responsible for the maintenance of the road. It is Public Works Canada that is responsible for the construction. My understanding is that Public Works Canada is currently completing a major redevelopment of the Castle junction interchange in Banff National Park.

Furthermore, Public Works has just completed the design work for the twining of the section from Sunshine Village ski area road interchange to the Castle junction interchange.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex--Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise as a point of order the question of Mr. Courchene.

In an exchange which took place between myself and the Minister for International Trade, the question came up as to whether Mr. Courchene had worked as an adviser to this government. We have just checked with his office. He worked on contract in 1986 as an adviser to this government.

Mr. Speaker: He may or may not have, but that is a question of debate and it is not properly a point of order.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, just to keep the record straight, the Minister for International Trade said that Mr. Courchene was not now an adviser to the government so he did not misinform the House.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 100, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act--Mr. Mayer--Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The House again in Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

[English]

When the committee was interrupted at one o'clock p.m., clause 1 of the bill was under consideration. When the committee rose, the Chair took the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex under advisement.

According to citation 698 of the sixth edition of Beauchesne, an amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant or beyond the scope of the bill. Bill C-23 seeks to amend only two sections of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, sections 19 and subsection 33.(1).

• (1510)

The proposed amendment reaches back into the parent act and seeks to amend section 18. Accordingly the Chair must find that the proposed amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill and is out of order.

Resuming debate on clause 1.

On clause 1--

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to put a couple of more questions to the minister. I must say in passing that it is unfortunate that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex was ruled out of order. It is unfortunate because it really represents the wishes of the vast majority of prairie grain producers.

The producers were appalled. There were votes by the Wheat Board Advisory Committee pummelling the minister. He has hardly recovered from it since, because he took oats away from the Wheat Board. It is a pity that the amendment is beyond the scope of the bill because I think even the minister, in retrospect, would say to himself and this House that he regrets having taken oats away from the Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker, all you have to do is look at the annual report of the Wheat Board for 1989-1990 and you will see that when the minister took it away, he also took away the assistance that was available to those wheat and oat producers. You can see in 1989 the assistance available was some $26 million for oats and $2.688 million for designated oats.

Even the minister, if he could be totally candid here today and of course he carries the responsibility of office with him so he has difficulty doing that, would say it is a pity that oats and barley are not under the Wheat Board Act as the motion from the hon. member proposed.

The minister said he could not reveal what the debts of individual countries are. I recall when Lech Walesa was here and met with the standing committee on external affairs, a question was put to him by, I believe, the hon. member from Edmonton on our side of the House. He asked him what could be done that would assist Poland. This was at a time when it was going through a return to democracy. He replied that one of the greatest things would be if the government could forgo those debts for, I believe, $1 billion or $2 billion for wheat and food aid.

In view of that, I wonder if the minister can indicate a couple of things to me. First, have the Canadian Wheat Board and the Government of Canada actually forgiven any of the money owing under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. It would be interesting to know just which countries have been given that forgiveness. I would be interested especially to know in view of the representations made by the Prime Minister of Poland if the government did move on that recommendation or that suggestion. That was my first question.

My second question is this. I wonder if the minister today could indicate to the House the exact magnitude of the wheat pool account deficit for the crop year 1990-91 completed on July 31. I wonder if the minister could indicate the amount of that deficit. I note that in the annual report one of the countries that obviously owes some of the $4.6 billion owed to the Canadian Wheat Board is Haiti. Has aid been cut off to Haiti because of the military coup which occurred there a couple of weeks ago and because of the decision by the Organization of American States to impose certain economic sanctions against that country? Could the minister respond to these three questions, including my question as to whether or not he still agrees that it is wise to have oats included under the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I get quite a large charge out of the hon. member and the oats issue. This is really a red herring. I stand by the decision and there are all kinds of people in the industry who support that decision. In fact the hon. member should have been with me a week ago last Friday when I had the pleasure to cut the ribbon at a new oats processing facility in Portage la Prairie. It has the potential to process, once they are up to full capacity, something like 80,000 tonnes of oats annually. Now 80,000 tonnes may not mean a lot, but put it in this kind of context. There were years in the past when total exports out of Canada for all oats did not exceed 100,000 tonnes. Eighty thousand tonnes is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent of the total production in Manitoba.

The significant thing about the announcement was that the president of the operation called Can-Oat Milling Products Incorporated said at the opening ceremony that there were primarily two reasons why this plant was being built, in addition to the transportation facilities and the quality of oats they could purchase in the area. First was the free trade agreement because they had better and more secure access to the American market and upward of 80 per cent of the product is going to move out of the country.

The second thing he said that made it more feasible was the fact that they could go out and contract directly and have more control over the raw product that they buy to make their various forms of oat products from.

For him to suggest that we are rethinking the oats decision is nonsense. He said I was going to have difficulty being candid. I am being very candid. I do not have difficulty in speaking about what I believe in. If he wants to be straightforward he should look at the drop in price of oats since, let us say, the crop year beginning August 1, 1989, which is a little over two years ago and compare it to wheat. He is going to find that in percentage terms wheat has dropped more. To suggest that because oats was taken away from the Wheat Board there has been a big drop in prices and that is the sole reason is absolute nonsense. If he wants to be more than candid, if he wants to be straightforward and do the arithmetic he will find out that is the case.

The other point I want to make is that oats on a volume basis was half of 1 per cent of the board's operations. That is how much it was. I think it was their 11th or 14th most important product as far as exports from the country, and by value it was probably closer to one-quarter per cent of what the board did. To suggest that oats has been a major crop and that it is causing all kinds of problems as far as producers are concerned is absolute nonsense and he knows that. He is just raising red herrings. We have more important things to talk about here than that. We have some serious problems in the prairies and in the part of the country that the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex represents. We would be better off spending our time talking about how to solve some of those problems than to drag up things like oats.

He mentions Poland. Again, there has been no forgiveness of debt as I understand it. There has been some rescheduling as far as Poland is concerned. It is my understanding, and I could get him further details, that we have also offered them some consideration down the road as far as interest payments are concerned.

Other than that I do not think it is appropriate to comment very much on commercial arrangements. I mentioned that.

He also asked about the Canadian Wheat Board deficit. When the board has all its numbers done and is in a position to announce final payments --and I don't think it is any secret that there is not going to be a final payment in wheat this year--the board will announce all of the numbers. For me to speculate or to announce ahead of time is not appropriate. Starting in 1984 the government, myself namely, stopped announcing final payments. I said: "Look, we are going to announce initial payments because the Government of Canada guarantees initial payment. That is a government decision". When the board goes out and sells, that is as a result of its sales efforts so it announces the final payments. Good or bad, it has announced final payments every year since 1985 and I have no intention of changing that practice--which I would be if I were to announce a deficit prior to all the calculations being done and the board announcing final payments.

If the Canadian Wheat Board uses the same timetable it has in the past, final payments will probably be available right at the end of this calendar year, or at the beginning of 1992.

With regard to Haiti, I don't know that I can say anything more than what has been in the news. I am not totally up to date because I think some of these events are happening almost as we speak. But we have done some business with Haiti. It is my understanding that there has been consideration by the UN of sanctions. I don't know where that is at. But to date, as a result of the unfortunate circumstances in Haiti, I am not aware of anything that we have been doing differently as a result of that situation compared to what we were doing a week or two weeks ago.

Mr. Foster: A couple of weeks ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister paper put forward in a newspaper article done by Carole Gour of The Toronto Star the idea of an international kind of reserve of wheat for food stocks especially designed to assist those republics in Russia that are facing starvation or serious shortfalls this winter. Some observers in the international food aid programs suggest that if there was an international arrangement for wheat reserves for food for starving nations that was well put together, the actual reserves available for cash sales would be very little more than what is adequate for the market around the world. Those reserves have been drawn down, I think to something like 22 or 23 days of supply.

I am wondering whether the Canadian Wheat Board or the minister's department are involved in any of those discussions. Was the parliamentary secretary, who comes from a wheat growing area, only talking in a general way about something that would be highly desirable in the world or was he was flying a trial balloon from the Prime Minister's Office? Just what is happening there? Have there been any discussions by the minister or the Wheat Board with international food agencies as to what kind of arrangements could be initiated? Clearly the situation in the world is pathetic when you look at the amount of reserves there are and the need for food aid assistance around the world, and then you look at world prices. It is just a disaster that the price of wheat is not at least where it was 10 years ago and not where it is today, which is about less than 40 per cent of where it was some 10 years ago.

I am just wondering if the minister could advise us or is this done entirely by the Department of External Affairs and not by his department. Obviously any serious calculations or international discussions at the end of the day would end up back with the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds and the Canadian Wheat Board. It is after all the agency which would have to provide those supplies and reserves required for some kind of international assistance and food reserve program.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to an article by Carole Goar in The Toronto Star I believe last week. I agree with the member when he says that the situation is absolutely deplorable around the world when you look at food reserves and the fact that we have the capacity to produce. We have all kinds of money being spent on subsidies, and yet more people are having problems feeding themselves. We end up with problems of farmers trying to stay in business. It literally boggles the mind.

We do I believe on a regular basis purchase something like one million tonnes of wheat a year. I do not know how we would compare to other countries but I suspect quite favourably. CIDA through its operations purchases something like a million tonnes of wheat a year, most of it from the Canadian Wheat Board, and some of it from the Ontario Wheat Growers, and other products as well.

There was some concern over Ontario soya beans. They have recently become eligible to supply. We do that. There is also on a voluntary basis the Canadian Food Grains Bank that is headquartered in Winnipeg. There are arrangements made where if a farmer wants to donate a certain number of bushels of wheat it will be matched by the government through CIDA. That is all the grain that is made available as far as development assistance.

Beyond that, again I have to agree with the member that this does not make any sense. I do not know where the member gets the 22 days. I think what he is talking about is 22 per cent of stock to reserve ratio.

Having said that, it is still a relatively small number compared to what it has been. It has been up as high as 30 percent, 32 per cent and 33 per cent, and now we are down in the low 20s, but even 20 per cent of 365 days is not much more than two month's grain supply. That is not, by any measure that I am aware of, an excessive amount and one would wonder why prices could not increase with that stock to reserve ratio being as low as it has ever been, maybe even historically.

Beyond that, I do not think the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister was floating a trial balloon. He has had a long-standing interest in this area and has been active himself with the Canadian Food Grains Bank. There have been many suggestions that this should be something that could work.

If one has surplus that one cannot sell, every country has a share that it would put into some kind of a food reserve or a grain reserve. One would have to establish prices going in and establish rules coming out, and establish some kind of criteria for countries to be eligible, and to segregate countries that can afford to pay. Obviously, a country like Japan that is not food self-sufficient is in a much better position to pay than some of the countries in Africa.

Canada was, I like to think, the last country to comply, not only with the spirit but the intent of the last international wheat agreement that really collapsed in the middle 1970s. As a country, we have a pretty good record of trying to work with international organizations to bring about the kinds of things that we are all concerned about here.

We have been looking at almost anything and everything that we can do, bearing in mind the fragility of the GATT negotiations. The member would also be interested in knowing that there is some renewed interest in the International Wheat Council headquartered in London. There are things that I think many of us would like to see happen to the International Wheat Council, that it needs to be more than just a monitoring and a statistical collecting agency and that it should be able to take a more active role in proposing things like the hon. member is suggesting and that the parliamentary secretary has suggested.

In terms of a definite proposal, if there is a total walk away from the table at GATT, and none of us wants to think about it, then with all of these things that we have done some preliminary work on, we are going to have to pursue as many of them as we possibly can to bring some stability back to the international grain market.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to delay the proceedings, but I think the minister must share, at least to some extent, our disappointment in the fact that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex was out of order.

I know that he would like to facilitate perhaps an opportunity for members of this House to express their views because I understand that a lot of the members on his side of the House realize the government made an error in removing oats from the Canadian Wheat Board.

• (1530)

The hon. member shakes her head. I think she realizes I am right. If she does not agree, I know some of her colleagues do. She should not look like that. She should agree with me.

Mr. Foster: She is being coy.

Mr. Milliken: She is being coy, as the hon. member for Algoma suggests. What I would suggest is that perhaps the minister could give his consent and with the unanimous consent of the House, the motion can be put. Then we could vote on it to see if members do favour putting oats back under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Foster: It would test the whole House.

Mr. Milliken: It would test the whole House, as the hon. member for Algoma says. I think the majority of members, even on the other side, realize that the government made a big blunder. Certainly Canadian farmers do. Apparently the price has gone down continuously since the jurisdiction was removed. Really it could not have been worse. I think the minister might want to see the error of his ways and change his vote and put this back in the bill.

I wonder if he would give his consent for that to happen?

Mr. Mayer: The hon. member makes a pretty convincing case. Unfortunately I am not so sure he even convinces himself of what he is saying. I appreciate his interest in agricultural matters, but I would suggest that if he wants to talk to the farm community, especially in the Province of Alberta, where the hon. member comes from, that produces, I think, 60 per cent of the oats in the country and about 80 per cent of the oats exported that that is where the decision should be made.

If the hon. member wants to talk about oats, I think he should talk to the producers involved. I would be very happy to take him to the producers who think this is the best thing that could have happened as far as oats is concerned.

There is no question that oats went down in price. I want to suggest to him that barley went down more in price than oats did over the same period of time after it was taken away from the board. Durum wheat went down considerably more in price. Milling wheat went down. They all went down because of international prices.

There have been cases where oats have been selling almost as high a feed barley, which is unheard of. Therefore, it is a pretty sticky wicket for us to get into philosophy on the floor of the House of Commons, when really we should be talking to farmers, which is what we did before we made the decision.

In conclusion, I would also point out that the one co-operative in western Canada that deals right across the prairies, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace River part of British Columbia, voted at their last annual meeting to remove oats from the Canadian Wheat Board. To get up in the House and suggest that there was unanimous opposition to what the government did as far as oats is concerned, is certainly not the case at all. It has been a good decision. It has been well received by producers. The results are there and we stand by the decision.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the minister with his officials would explain to the House what procedure the government goes through in its budget making to annualize the contingent liabilities for each year's budget? How does it arrive at what will be shown as a contingent liability that may cost the government some money for that year? Does it do it on the basis of what was lost the previous year? How does it present a more or less accurate figure to the House?

The reason I asked this is that in Part III of the agricultural estimates, the Department of Agriculture points out that deficits arising from sales on credit are relatively rare. We had a somewhat different opinion from the Auditor General who shows that on the contrary, over the past few years, according to him, significant payments have had to be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. He cites 1986-87, where $208 million had to be paid and in 1987-88 more than $113 million. Then there was the interest on a delayed payment which, I presume, was made to the Wheat Board account where the pool account deficit amounting to $33 million for the year 1989-90 was not paid to the board until the following year. While we understand that the payments do go on occasion to cover that account or interest on accounts that the government was a little slow at paying, we know that the farmers are not supposed to be taking a slightly smaller payment because of delays and that the funds themselves are in fact are forthcoming. We know that happens.

How do we have it presented to us for budget purposes when the House approves a budget? Is it done on the basis of contingent liabilities that have proven to be a cost to the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the year before or is there simply an estimate made? If there are estimates, what process goes into the production of that estimate?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I will try to answer in two or three ways. First of all, I think there is some misunderstanding concerning contingent liabilities that the board has that are ongoing on behalf of the Government of Canada in deficits in the pool account.

The deficit in the pool account, and there was one I think four years ago of $208 million, $176 million of which was barley, a small one in oats and $23 million in wheat if my memory serves me correctly.

Once the pool period is closed, which is usually some time about now, the end of September or the first part of October--we would have to talk to the board to know exactly-- and if there is a deficit, the Government of Canada picks up interest on that deficit until the final payments are made.

The producers themselves do not have to take any less money in their final payment as a result of there being a deficit in the pool account, if the hon. member follows me.

If the member is talking about deficits or contingent liabilities, that is money owed to the Canadian Wheat Board by sovereign states, or at least by entities backed by sovereign states. If they are unable to pay, the board just borrows more money against that account for which the Government of Canada backs them. I hope that clarifies the difference between a contingent liability and a deficit.

If the member is asking how do we arrive at a number as far as a contingent liability, I think it is simply a matter of arithmetic. As to how we arrive at the levels of credit that are available to each country, we have a committee of ministers which look at various countries in conjunction with the board, looking at projected sales for a given period of time. Then we establish regular lines of credit that the board is able to use.

It is the same for other non-board commodities. The board works with the Export Development Corporation, EDC. Again, this is not concessional credit. This is commercial credit on reasonable terms. I think the most we have gone, as far as length, is three years.

This review process goes on on an annual basis. It is reviewed regularly each year. If there is a need to adjust for whatever reason, either up or down, throughout that year we have a provision made to have a turnaround quite quickly so that the system itself does not encumber the board, or anyone who is dealing with EDC for that matter, if they have an impending sale for which they need to have some adjustments in their over-all credit.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the minister's comments with regard to international co-operation. I do not want to even use the words international grains agreement because it has a bad history.

If the GATT agreement falls apart this fall and we do not succeed, it will be a disaster for everyone in every way, both in the supply managed industries and in the grains and oilseeds industry. It seems to me that there has to be room somehow for international co-operation.

• (1540)

In 1983 the price of a barrel of oil was about $2 and the price of a bushel of wheat was around $2. The oil producers around the world organized themselves and they are getting $20 or $23 a barrel for their oil. Canadian farmers and farmers around the world are getting only $2 a bushel, the same as it was almost 20 years ago.

It seems to me that if the GATT negotiations are not successful this fall, we need to look at ways in which we can co-operate in supplying food aid to the nations and peoples around the world, and some way of co-operating among the producers. As the minister has already indicated, we have something like a 22 per cent situation with 30 or 40 days of wheat in the world. I was very encouraged by his comments in that regard.

I hope there will be ongoing discussions in the Wheat Board, External Affairs and CIDA as to what kind of co-operation there could be on aid, perhaps at the international level with the trade ministers, as to what there could be in co-operation.

During the farm financial crisis this summer, one of the issues that has been raised time and time again by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the wheat, grain and oilseeds producers, the soybean and corn producers, has been that they do not have the same level of export credit arrangements that producers in western Canada have under the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

This is a very important issue for them. They have to go through the Export Development Corporation or some other agency of government which apparently does not have much flexibility and as much value to them as the Wheat Board has.

Granted, the Wheat Board takes possession. It sells the wheat. It is a much simpler type of situation, but it seems to me that in tight markets and in tight situations such as the one which we are facing now with the cost of production, with the cost of many grains and oilseeds at half or two-thirds the cost of production, that we should be giving every possible tool to these producers in eastern Canada.

I wonder if the minister is looking, since he is the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds for the entire country and not just for the Wheat Board, at improving those techniques and those instruments that are available for eastern producers in marketing their grain in overseas markets both in terms of credit, forgiveness, flexibility and all the rest.

Has he been able to take any action on the recommendations and the representations made by those five groups in Ontario, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the commodity council, the corn producers, the soybean producers and the Ontario Wheat Growers Association?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes a good point with the last point he makes.

We certainly do not want to see one producer in one part of the country treated differently or have an advantage over one in another part of the country simply because of the way things are organized on his behalf.

We have, as far as CIDA criteria, made CIDA aware. It has agreed to use specifications when it tenders for oilseeds so that it can include soybeans and not just canola oil. I think that is a step in the right direction.

I have had a chance to meet with the Ontario Wheat Growers. There have been occasions when it has expressed concern about the matter which the member raises concerning aid. If it has some direct concerns, we will take them up and do the very best we can to address them.

People outside of the Wheat Board area—it would be the same for canola in western Canada and flax, for instance, that were to be exported which were not under the board—make sure where they can that the EDC is as accommodating with non-board sales as the Wheat Board is able to be with board sales as a result of government involvement. Having said that, it is maybe not that easy to accomplish but we have to work at it and make sure that where we can, we see that there is no difference.

I should point out that I remember when we signed a long-term grain sales agreement with Egypt four or five years ago. The Canadian Wheat Board signed it but Egypt had an interest in Ontario wheat. At the ceremony, we had Bob Holmes who was president of the Ontario Wheat Growers at the time, make sure that Egypt knew that while the Wheat Board was signing a long-term grain sales agreement, there was interest in other parts of the country in selling to Egypt. We had an opportunity to see that the Ontario Wheat Growers were represented at that signing ceremony.

I would also point out that the $150 million line of credit that has been offered to the Soviet Union has been there for some time now. There has been interest in Ontario corn as far as that line of credit is concerned and I think that will be the major grain that will be involved in terms of that line of credit. There is an example where Ontario corn growers will be able to take advantage of a specific line of credit that again should help producers.

The member makes a good point. Other than offering him and other people in Ontario who are exporting our full co-operation and being as accommodating as possible, I do not know what I could do.

I should point out to the member and I am sure he is aware, that when we assumed office in 1984 one of the first things we did as government was to host a meeting of the five major wheat exporters, namely the United States, the Community, Argentina, Australia and ourselves. We hosted that at Whistler on the west coast. There was a second meeting, a follow-up, that the Americans called. We very much wanted to see if there were ways to co-operate, not to necessarily form a cartel but a way of seeing that if we are going to compete that we do so in a rational basis so that everybody benefits.

I do not think consumers of grain around the world are going to benefit if in fact prices that they pay farmers to produce that product are so low that the farmers go out of business. We very much wanted to continue that dialogue. Unfortunately after the first two meetings, the one that we hosted to get the meetings going in Canada and the one we had in the United States, nobody has seen fit to call another meeting.

One of the things we have been thinking about is to try to get another meeting like that going. I think we are going to have to wait until the GATT process concludes either successfully or unsuccessfully, but I certainly think there are ways in which we can co-operate. One of the things we are going to be encouraging the International Wheat Council to do is to take a more active role and do something other than simply collecting and disseminating statistics. I think it has a role to trying to work with various countries and do the things that the member referred to as far as bringing stability to the international grain market.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 1 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

On Clause 2--Deductions from Receipts

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Chairman, as I read clause 2, section 33, this will provide authority for the Canadian Wheat Board to close its pool accounts each year and distribute the final payments to producers prior to repayment of the principle and interest owing by the purchasing country.

Does this in any way change the existing arrangement where it was strictly a letter of comfort from the minister, where there was actually no legal authority for the loan guarantee or the parliamentary authority? It seems to me that this is a very crucial part of the whole arrangement for this Bill C-23.

Could the minister comment on that.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Chairman, the amendments to section 33 are in one sense connected and in another sense not connected to the letter of comfort. The Auditor General simply said in paragraph 3(12) of his 1990 annual report that the board's practice is to make final payments on sales made during the pooling period or the crop year regardless of whether the grain is sold on credit. His concern was that if the grain had been sold on credit and the credit had not been repaid, there was some question as to the legality for the board to make that sale. All we are doing is amending section 33 to say that once the credit has been provided and the board has made the sale and all the conditions of the sale have been met, including acceptance of the credit provisions and the terms have been agreed to, that the board is then in a position to go ahead and make final payments out of the pool.

• (1550)

This in no way changes the pooling system or the pooling practice. It just satisfies the Auditor General that we are in a position of being able to administer this section with a better legal foundation and better authority from the House of Commons.

Mr. Foster: In this arrangement, the credit that the Canadian Wheat Board operates under is charged to the producer up until the moment of the sale. Once the sale takes place, if the whole thing is a credit arrangement, then the credit of the sale from that point forward is charged to the purchasing company or the purchasing government.

Regardless of where the credit is being charged, whether it is being charged back to the producer or being charged to the purchaser, the pool is closed and the funds distributed among the producers in proportion to what they have produced. Is that right?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, let us just take a hypothetical case. The board has arrived at a price with a customer and they have agreed on the amount of grain and where it is going to be delivered and the customer needs some credit.

The board then goes to the banks, credit unions, trust companies and issues its own paper in order to raise those funds. It does not ask the country or the customer to raise the funds. The board itself borrows the money so that the board can repay the producer for his grain. I hope the hon. member understands me.

There is no question of money not being available to the producer. This amendment provides for a little firmer legal basis for the board to continue the present practice. So it is not a question of any money either going or not going to the producer. It is just a question of having a better legal basis under which to continue present practices.

The Auditor General was concerned that when the board went to banks or to the market to raise money, which it can do now, there was some question as to whether the final payment could be made when payment in full by the customer had not been made.

What we are saying is that as long as the credit is there and the banks have advanced the money to the board to pay the producers and those credit arrangements are in place, the board has a better legal basis on which to operate and continue the present practice.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question. Because the cost of the debt is spiralling up by $300 million a year so that it is now at $4.6 billion, there must come a point where the debt is hopeless and is written off.

Clearly, the banks got a sweetheart deal from the government when they were writing off their debts in Latin America. Surely, many of these impoverished countries are hopelessly unable to pay for food. It is like trying to pay for a grocery bill when the food has already been eaten. I am wondering whether the government has any plans to write off these debts. I suppose the Minister of Finance is rather gun shy about doing that because it would show an increase in his deficit, which they are very sensitive about since the government's outstanding debt of the country has doubled in the last five or six years. I am just wondering if it really presents a realistic situation for the Canadian Wheat Board to be carrying deficits of $4.6 billion on annual credit arrangement of 20 or 25 per cent of its sales.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I just say again that while the debt shows in the Wheat Board annual report, it is guaranteed by the Crown and therefore it is really not a debt that would be attributable to the Canadian Wheat Board because the government backs it. It means that the Canadian Wheat Board, at the end of the day, is not going to be called on to make that payment. It could not do that because the Wheat Board, outside some asset in its office building and some hopper cars, really does not have any assets.

It is our view that these debts are sovereign. They are owed by sovereign states. They are fully collectable. If in fact there is going to be any rescheduling or, as the member refers to, sweetheart deals, writedowns, standstills, then that would have to be done as part of an over-all rescheduling package I would think involving many countries.

To date the only one that I am aware of—and I think the details are public; we could certainly make them available if the member is interested—is what happened with Poland. There was I believe a standstill on some of the interest down the road but nothing has been, it is my understanding, written off or viewed as uncollectable. It is all looked at as being collectable pending further arrangements.

Just to emphasize again, while it shows up on the board's books as a big number, it is not at the end of the day the kind of money that the Wheat Board itself or the producers would be involved in. It is the Government of Canada, the taxpayers of the country.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, October 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

• (1600)

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on Bill C-18.

To begin with, this bill is very difficult to read. It is like a telephone book. One would have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to understand most of the language, the way it is written.

However, there are two areas that I want to bring to the attention of the House which I think are of concern to every member of the House. I am referring to those sections which deal with tax credits for individuals who may have a disability.

When the Minister of Finance first revealed his budget earlier this year to the House and to the Canadian public, there were certain provisions made that on the surface would be of great benefit to a number of people who have disabilities. Many of these proposals are welcomed by myself and by those individuals I speak of.

There are a number of changes to the Income Tax Act which certainly need some clarification. At the present time for an individual to qualify for a tax credit or a tax benefit under existing legislation, the definitions are fairly clearly defined by regulation. The new language that the House is considering at the present time is not clear to me. It certainly must not be clear to people who are heavily and directly involved with the disabled community in Canada, some of whom I have spoken to in the last couple of days.

This is very technical and I do not want to bore people, but under section 89, subsection (3), there is a section here that deals with attendant care for individuals who are severely disabled and require an attendant to be with them to offer assistance that may be required.

As I read the initial proposal by the Minister of Finance dealing with this subject, it was my impression that the government had finally listened to presentations that had been made by the House of Commons Standing Committee on the Status of Disabled Persons and then subsequently by a new committee, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. For the last 11 years they have been making the argument that the provision of attendant care to a person who requires it is extremely important if we are to assist that individual to participate in the mainstream of Canadian life.

When I read the actual legislation it does not say any such thing. What the legislation appears to talk about is the tax relief that will be given to the attendant and the individual if they travel to a place that is not less than 80 kilometres from the locality where the patient dwells to obtain medical services. That is not what either the disabled community or the standing committee has been arguing for all those years.

The legislation is still addressing the need for attendant care on a medical model. Many of the individuals who have addressed this committee over the years do not suffer from a medical condition. They happen to be disabled. This provision is not going to satisfy the needs from that very large group of Canadians who have that form of disability. That is one area I wanted to bring to your attention.

Another area that gives me great concern is under section 91 of this act. Clause 91 replaces the existing definitions of what constitutes a disability. I will read the section that is being replaced into the record for individuals who may not be able to or cannot get access to this particular act within the next few days. This is what it says it is replacing, and this is the present definition:

> (a) a person shall be considered to have a severe and prolonged impairment only if by reason thereof he is markedly restricted in his activities of daily living and the impairment has lasted or can reasonably be expected to last for a continuous period of at least 12 months; and
> (b) the Minister may obtain the advice of the Department of National Health and Welfare as to whether a person has a severe and prolonged impairment.

That has worked fairly well over the years, but now it is proposed that we have a new provision to define disability and impairment. I want to read that out for the record. The new section under clause 91 on page 218 of this proposed act reads:

> (a) an impairment is prolonged where it has lasted, or may reasonably be expected to last, for a continuous period of at least 12 months;
> (b) an individual's ability to perform a basic activity of daily living is markedly restricted only where all or substantially all of the time, even with therapy and the use of appropriate devices and medication, the individual is blind or is unable (or requires an inordinate amount of time) to perform a basic activity of daily living;
> (c) a basic activity of daily living in relation to an individual means
> (i) perceiving, thinking and remembering,
> (ii) feeding and dressing oneself,
> (iii) speaking so as to be understood, in a quiet setting, by another person familiar with the individual,
> (iv) hearing so as to understand, in a quiet setting, another person familiar with the individual,
> (v) eliminating (bowel or bladder functions), or
> (vi) walking; and
> (d) for greater certainty, no other activity, including working, housekeeping or a social or recreational activity, shall be considered as a basic activity of daily living.

As I read that new definition, that is going to exclude literally thousands of Canadians who have a mental impairment. By "a mental impairment", I am talking about an individual who is developmentally handicapped, who is quite capable of dressing oneself and of communicating with some difficulty in some cases, but primarily able to communicate, having all the employment opportunities in the present models that we have of sheltered workshops. This individual, probably without skilled training of some degree, would not be able to enter what we would normally call the normal work force.

Those individuals who are presently on disability pensions, either under provincial legislation or with assistance from the federal government, would be excluded from being eligible for any relief under the tax regime if this goes into place.

• (1610)

I want to be fair, and as I said in the beginning I am not a lawyer. The wording as it is presently says to me that those individuals who are currently under existing legislation eligible for tax relief will be excluded under this new provision.

I would urge the legislative committee which will be examining this legislation in detail, and I hope will be calling witnesses and allowing them to appear before that committee, to put these sections I have referred to under strict scrutiny.

If we do not, it seems to me that we will be doing a severe injustice to a large number of Canadians who are least able to defend themselves. It seems to me as parliamentarians we have a clear responsibility in that regard. That is to at least lend some assistance to individuals who are least able to help themselves.

Several weeks ago the government introduced with great fanfare something I welcome as an individual who has been involved in issues of concern to the disabled community in Canada for some time. It was a five-year strategy. The strategy in and of itself has been a long time coming and has been welcomed. We are not sure how that strategy will be implemented over the next five-year period, but that is something we can argue about both in committee and in the House.

The point was that the government took an initiative that has been a long time coming.

If that strategy is to be designed to allow and assist disabled individuals to enter the mainstream of Canadian society, these provisions I just referred to in the Income Tax Act are going to negate any improvements that were promised at the beginning of September.

I could take the opportunity and make the argument that a whole number of government initiatives over the last several years have been harmful to the disabled community: cutbacks in the Canada Assistance Plan, cutbacks in funding for housing programs and cutbacks for post-secondary education.

I could make these arguments, but I will leave that for another time. I do not want to enter into partisan debate because I think it would detract from the arguments I am making about those sections under the Income Tax Act as we see them.

I do not want to take too long and I do not think I have to in order to belabour the argument but I seriously ask the House that when those members on that legislative committee review this legislation, they pay a great deal of attention to those two or three sections which I think are detrimental to the people who we are trying to assist.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West--Revelstoke): Mr. Chairman, while it is certainly not my intention or that of my colleagues to drag this debate out unnecessarily, there are, while we still have a bit of time this afternoon, a few points that I would like to raise.

The bill before us, Bill C-18, does a number of things, some good and some not so good. One of the items that I noticed has to do with some changes for taxation for persons who benefit from the Older Worker Adjustment Program.

Programs for the older worker's adjustment income will become taxable the same way as unemployment insurance income now is. We are aware that we will not change the government's mind on this particular proposal within the bill but a moral argument could be made that some of these people, especially those former employees of Route Canada, some of my own former fellow workers at Kootenay Forest Products in Nelson, British Columbia and others have suffered more than their share already as they have seen their operations close down.

Some of the closures are due to actions of the federal government and others are due to actions of a provincial government. They are not simply decisions within the private sector.

They have suffered more than their share already and, being wage earners, many of them have paid more than their fair share of taxes already. We do have to ask: Why should their income be fully taxed when, for instance, capital gains are only taxed at 75 per cent? In that regard we wonder, if someone who earns $500,000 from capital gains only has to pay the capital gains tax on three-quarters of that amount, then why is it that a long-time worker who has seen his operation shut down and has lost his livelihood through no fault of his own and gets a meagre $100 or $200 extra a month in pension benefits as a result of the Older Worker Adjustment Income Plan is taxed on the basis of 100 per cent of those earnings? There does not seem to be much equity there.

There are two ways we can look at the matter of taxation. One is the tax system and tax changes themselves, and the other is some of the things that the government spends its money on. I found it rather interesting, at a time when the government and the finance minister are talking about the need for restraint and additional tax measures in order to pay for the operations of government, that we have some of the kind of spending going on that still continues.

I refer now to an item that was in today's Quorum from The Montreal Gazette of October 8. The headline is:

> Taxing Subject Matter
> In time of government restraint, how much do we need to know about eunuchs in imperial China?

It is datelined Ottawa. It reads:

> At a time when the government is paring services, it is spending $15,435 to finance a study on eunuchs in imperial China, with special focus on the 10th to 14th centuries.

That makes it even more vitally important if you look at the timeframe.

It says:

> As it is freezing public service salaries, the government is spending $305,070 toward its continuing financial backing of a private project to assemble a dictionary of old English, or rather, auld English.
> Among other projects Canadians are helping finance through taxes like the GST are a study of the modern American diet ($27,700), an analysis of criminality and religious charity in 16th century Bologna--

That is really vital to the welfare of the Canadian taxpayers.

> --and a look at the late prehistoric archaeology of the Ha'apai Islands in the Kingdom of Tonga ($80,318).

These are just a few of 680 scholarly projects supported in the fiscal year 1990–91 by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada funded by this government. That agency, created under the Secretary of State Department in 1977, handed out some $82 million in 1990–91 which is up from $75 million the year before.

The president of the agency says:

> --the federal spending squeeze meant 473 projects worthy of support had to be turned down.

That is really a shame. I wonder about those kinds of projects. At this time of fiscal restraint and when the government is imposing new taxes on Canadians, what are the gems that we missed out on in the last little while?

These are some of the spending priorities that this government obviously has and at the same time it is making some other tax changes.

I want to refer back to one that makes these other ones seem rather minuscule because this one has to do with forgiving perhaps billions of dollars of revenue from some of the richest families in Canada.

The finance minister would have us believe that he scrounged around to find every possible source of funds that could possibly be put toward deficit reduction. I am quoting at some length here from an article in The Globe and Mail from last March 13:

> But few Canadians are aware that just before his deficit-slashing budget last month, Mr. Wilson's own department quietly gave up a source of potentially billions of dollars that were scheduled to come into the national treasury beginning in the next 21 months.

• (1620)

This change does not appear in the bill currently before us, but we are expecting it momentarily. The government has suggested that it is coming. In many ways this is a major measure of tax forgiveness to the wealthiest families in Canada, which it has been attempting to sneak through over the Canadian people at the same time that we have a cap on social spending arrangements with the provinces and people on welfare and social assistance and small children are not getting enough to eat. This assistance which cities across Canada are dependent upon and many other vital programs all members have agreed are vitally necessary for the welfare of the people of Canada but are being cut back and slashed.

The Public Service on which we depend for the delivery of many of our programs is being told that it will get zero and zero, unless its members are willing to give up either their jobs or the jobs of their fellow employees.

Coming back to this matter of changes dealing with private trusts:

> The money would have come from the richest families in the country as part of an overhaul of the tax system worked out two decades ago. It would have come from the private trusts of these families--storage places for great wealth that are almost entirely shielded from the public eye.
> While considerable information is publicly available about the income and assets of individuals and public corporations, almost nothing is known about these private trusts. So, although the owners of the private trusts have long known that they would owe major taxes starting in 1993, the general public was unaware.
> Not surprisingly then, nobody paid much attention on February 11, 1991, when the finance department issued a dull press release No. 91-018 about some seemingly technical matters dealing with family trusts.

I want to go on a bit, because it is about time that some people realized just how this government is taking them for a ride.

> Behind the technical language, release No. 91-018, in fact, announced the government's intention to introduce a generous new loophole that would allow the deferral of a fortune in taxes.
> Only two weeks later the then Finance Minister was on his feet in the House of Commons declaring an all out assault on the deficit. While many Canadians listened apprehensively to the minister's speech, the owners of the private trusts undoubtedly breathed a little easier knowing that although times may be tough, the government had at least spared them.

The story behind this press release and the action it refers to begins back in 1972 when the Liberal government of Pierre Trudeau introduced some fairly sweeping reforms to the tax system.

One of the items was the removal of the federal inheritance tax. That action resulted in a lump sum gift of about $12.5 billion to rich families, according to calculations by University of Toronto economist, John Bossons.

> The extent of this windfall for the wealthy was actually far greater over time, since it removed the inheritance tax on future accumulations of wealth, including the enormous increase in private fortunes in Canada during the 1980s.

To partially offset this loss of revenue, the government introduced, as part of the 1972 reform, a partial tax on capital gains, a key source of income for the very richest among Canadians.

> Up until 1972, capital gains, that is the profits made on the sale of assets, such as stocks, bonds, jewellery or real estate, had been tax free.
> Although the Royal Commission on Taxation had recommended in the late 1960s that capital gains be taxed at the rate as other income, the government apparently viewed this as too punitive for the well to do and opted instead to tax capital gains at only half the rate applied to other income.

Now who says our governments have not had a heart?

This was a Liberal government and it is known to have a heart. This is the kind of heart it had. Now this Conservative government wants to make the matter even worse and extend these same privileges for another 21 years.

> The other special treatment capital gains were to receive was that they would only be taxed when the asset was sold. Its owner could hold onto it for 50 years or more as its value increased, but no tax would be paid until it was actually sold. Stocks could be passed from one generation to the next, thereby permanently avoiding tax.
> To prevent huge family fortunes from permanently avoiding tax in this way, the 1972 reform package specified that any increase in the value of an individual's capital property would be taxed as capital gains at his or her death, whether or not the property was actually sold.
> But private trusts seemed to provide a nice escape clause. By putting assets into a private trust which never died, they would not be taxed when their owner expired.

The Trudeau government set a time limit of 21 years on this. At the 21-year mark, any increase in the value of assets held in the trust would be subject to tax as capital gains. So, Mr. Speaker, justice would finally prevail. That 21-year mark, though, was coming due on January 1, 1993, just in time to provide some badly needed revenue for the federal government's deficit-ridden coffers.

The government, however, created a new loophole that would allow family trusts to put off the payment date well beyond 1993. Proposed in the aforesaid press release No. 91-018, the loophole allows wealthy families in almost every case to choose to put off payment until their youngest child dies, delaying taxes for another generation or more.

Tax experts generally agree that a dollar of tax deferred is a dollar of tax saved. It amounts to tax exemption, because the money saved, if properly invested in the intervening years, multiplies in value.

Release No. 91-018, for all its dry, technical jargon, is the government's signal to wealthy families that it intends to give them an enormous gift. It has done this in a very furtive manner.

It chose, for instance, not to announce the change in the budget. A change of this magnitude would usually be announced and some estimate of the lost revenue would be provided.

The finance department has resorted to some specious arguments. For instance, it says in its press release that the 21-year rule might interfere with trusts established by parents for the benefit of their disabled children. How many wealthy families happen to have disabled children? Undoubtedly a small fraction.

And those families who do would undoubtedly have structured a trust differently to provide the child with an ongoing income rather than a lump sum capital gain at a point far into the future.

The government says its new rule will prevent assets from being transferred from one trust to another tax-free. This is a red herring, however, since other tax laws already prevent such tax-free transfers.

Considering the seriousness with which the Conservative government views the deficit, it could have toughened the rules on family trusts instead of easing them.

Canada could have followed the example of its free trade partner, the United States, which is not known for being tough on the rich. But it has tougher laws about this sort of thing than Canada does.

Some time in the very near future, Mr. Speaker, we expect the government will try to pass its proposed new change quietly into law. It will present the change to the House of Commons in the form of a legislated amendment and hope that the few MPs and members of the public which will be watching will have little awareness of the money at stake.

And then, of course, it will return to the pressing matter of reducing the deficit.

I said that the bill now before us does not contain the provisions outlined in the government's press release 91-018 but we do know it is on the government's agenda. I would ask those members opposite: how can they possibly justify some of the increases in taxation on ordinary Canadians, who already pay more than their fair share, which are proposed in this legislation and in the budget and all of the other measures this government has brought before us, at the same time as they are quietly prepared to hand out billions and billions of dollars to the very richest Canadian families. We are not talking about those who are well off, we are talking about the super-rich in this society. Why do they need charity when permanently laid-off workers who receive meagre benefits from the Unemployed Workers Adjustment Program need to have an increase in their taxation as a result of this bill before us.

It is socialism for the rich and free enterprise for the poor, as some people have called it. That is exactly what it is. I do not expect this government to have a change of heart, but I do wish it would stop smiling about the deceit which it has been peddling to Canadians about the sacrifices that ordinary Canadians have to make, while the richest among our citizenry continue to get billion-dollar handouts from this government.

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa Centre--Farm Credit Corporation; the hon. member for Don Valley East--National Unity; the hon. member for Scarborough--Rouge River--Correctional Service Canada; the hon. member for Mackenzie--Agriculture; the hon. member for Saint-Boniface--Student Loan Program.

Question and comment period, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West--Revelstoke speak and rewrite taxation history in Canada in his very colourful way. He certainly explained his views of Canada's tax structure and the way it has evolved in the last 25 years in a very thorough and all encompassing manner.

I want to solicit his views on a particular issue. He talked about the evils of the capital gains tax and the way that former governments had applied that tax. As he indicated, and he is quite correct in this, the government at the time imposed a tax on only half of capital gains. In other words, half the capital gains earned by an individual were exempt from any form of tax. They previously had been completely exempt. One of the other exemptions that the government of the day made was to exempt one's principal residence from the application of the tax.

None of these was particularly recommended as I recall by the Carter commission whose slogan was: "A buck is a buck is a buck", and proposed taxation on all dollars however earned. He seemed to imply in his remarks that he supported the Carter commission in its report.

Does the hon. member advocate taxation of capital gains on principal residences as part of the policy? Is that part of the New Democratic Party's program for revamping the taxation structure in Canada? And does he take the view that only the wealthy own homes in Canada, only the very rich, the most select few who pay capital gains tax, which again he implied in his remarks? If so, I suggest that his view is misleading and deceptive to Canadians.

I would like him to become clear and tell the House whether or not he supports the imposition of a tax on the gains realized on the sale of one's principal residence.

Mr. Kristiansen: The answer briefly stated, Mr. Speaker, would be no, not unless there are very serious restrictions on the amounts involved.

What we are talking about here, and going back to the Carter commission, is the need for a fair taxation system in Canada and a taxation system which is seen to be fair. It can be argued in many circumstances, because it is not a perfect world, that there is a need for exemptions from certain types of taxation in specific circumstances to meet a whole variety of very important personal and collective societal needs.

What we say is wrong is when we have a taxation system that again and again and again accords understanding and sympathy to the richest among us when we are not prepared as a government—at least that government and often the government that preceded it—to show that same kind of understanding, sympathy, common sense, equity and sense of fairness to the poorest among us or those average Canadians who work hard and already pay more than their fair share which the Carter commission well catalogued and which many members on all sides of this House catalogued again and again and again.

Let us have some equity, let us have some fairness and treat those who are in the middle and those who are the poorest at least as well as we treat proportionately those who are at the top of the income ladder in this society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think you would find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until five o'clock p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do members give their unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, of course, we are very happy to give our consent to the arrangement.

I want to point out that we have made great progress today. Three government bills have been passed, two through all stages and one at second reading.

I just want to make it very clear that when we next hear from the government about obstruction or delay tactics on the part of the opposition, we hope it will refer to today's events as an indication of the excellent co-operation that was forthcoming from the opposition.

SITTING SUSPENDED

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The business of the House is therefore suspended until five o'clock this afternoon.

At 4.36 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved that Bill C-211, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (temporary community service) be now read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee A.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege of leading off the debate in this House on a Private Members' Bill which I sponsored and whose purpose is to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, section 14 of the Act prevents people who are obliged to perform their civic duty, for instance as members of a jury of members of emergency teams, from receiving unemployment insurance benefits if they happen to be unemployed.

I am sure you will agree this is absolutely unfair and that many people are caught in a bind in such cases. Mr. Speaker, I think this section contradicts the intent of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Thiis legislation was passed more than 50 years ago to provide income security for all Canadians, not to punish them when they have to perform their civic duty.

[English]

The object of Bill C-211 is to amend section 14 of the Unemployment Insurance Act to ensure that persons in temporary service to the community, as jurors or emergency workers, are not regarded as disqualified from a benefit merely because of their participation in such an activity.

At present, anyone performing their civic duty while collecting unemployment insurance benefits is penalized by the federal government for no valid or obvious reason. Anyone performing jury duty for more than two days will not be eligible for benefits since the law considers that they are not available for work. Although jurors are usually granted a stipend for expenses incurred while performing their duties, anyone submitting unemployment insurance claim cards to receive the difference in UI benefits will receive nothing. I guess to explain it a little better I will refer back to an individual case in my riding that I am quite well aware of that made the media quite extensively in Atlantic Canada. It came to my attention because it involved a constituent of mine.

At that time that I was referred to this case I thought it was a misunderstanding and so did the person in question. We came to find out that the regulation is in fact there. The best way of explaining it, Mr. Speaker, is to read this letter which I received from my constituent that she also forwarded to members of the media in the form of a letter to the editor. It says:

> Dear Sir,
> In September I experienced the luck of having been laid off after paying maximum unemployment insurance premiums for the past 25 years.
> In November I experienced the luck of having been selected as a juror for the murder trial recently held in Campbellton. The mental stress of trying to absorb nine days of testimony and summations was emotionally draining.

The added stress I would also assume is that she was on unemployment insurance benefits, or so she thought and obviously at a reduced salary with no work and not able to look for work.

I am sure that if she knew she was not eligible for UI, her stress level would probably have been that much higher. I quote again from her letter:

> At the conclusion of the trial I requested and was given a letter which stated the days I had been present in court and the amount of money that I would receive from the court. I mailed this letter along with the UI card on November 27.
> In December I received a letter from the Unemployment Insurance Commission informing me that I was disqualified from unemployment insurance benefits for the two weeks in question as I had not been available for work.
> I immediately telephoned the letter-writer to register my disbelief only to be told that I had not been available for work and that there were no exceptions for jurors.

She goes on to state:

> My tax money helped pay the salaries of the participants in this case, including the RCMP, the prosecution staff, the public defender, the sheriff's department, the court staff, and not to mention the room and board of the prisoner in question.
> In retrospect I could have ignored the summons to appear for jury selection and I would have been fined $50 like the dozen or so other good citizens who failed to show up. I could have requested a letter to be sent to the court by a sympathetic doctor exempting me. I could have lied and said I knew someone connected to the case. I could have lied on my UI claim. Someone suggested that anyone showing up for jury selection with a rope thrown over her shoulder would probably be rejected by the defence team.
> However, I did none of these things. I tried to be a good citizen, but I have come to the conclusion that when dealing with big brother honesty is really not the best policy.

That puts it in a nutshell, Mr. Speaker. Basically the person was on UI, was receiving benefits after being laid off employment, and did her civic duty by appearing on the jury.

To further matters I have a news article on a situation that happened in Nova Scotia, a little different situation, mind you. I would like to quote from this article and then comment on it. The headline on this article which appeared in The Moncton Times in transcript February 1991 says: "Judge Excuses Potential Jurors, Calls UI Rule 'Stupid'". The by line on the article is Sydney, Nova Scotia, and goes on to say:

> A Nova Scotia Supreme Court justice excused nine people from jury duty Tuesday because they would not be available to collect unemployment benefits if the trial took more than two days.

He goes on to say and this is a direct quote from Justice Hilroy Nathanson:

> I think it's a stupid ruling, but who am I?

When we look at who this judge is without looking at the person, but looking at the office that he holds, we see a person who is very familiar with justice.

• (1710)

He is very familiar with the legal system and with making sure that people have justice throughout the land. We have this hon. justice saying that this rule is stupid. Obviously, if we go one step further, we would have to say then that it should be changed.

That is why in a way this came to my attention again. After listening to my constituent and seeing this article in the paper, after consulting with my colleagues on all sides of the House, I decided to put forth this bill. I hope that I will have the support today of all my colleagues in the House.

Quite often when private members' bills are presented in the House, government members will come here and try to refute the bills. Quite often they get orders from above. Looking at it in general, I can pretty well predict what they may want to say.

I just want to speak on that for a few moments. First of all, there is a basis principle in UIC. We will probably hear time and time again that to receive unemployment benefits a person must be available for work and must be actively pursuing work.

In the case that we are looking at presently, which is under review and which we hope that this bill will rectify, we find that the lady in question was on UI. She was receiving benefits and decided to do her civic duty. She had no choice. It was not that she had a choice of not being available for work.

Quite often when people are disqualified from UI benefits, it is through an intent of their own to break the regulations. In this case, the lady in question had no choice but to appear for jury duty so she was not available for work through no choice of her own. She was forced to appear for jury duty.

Second, it is kind of hard to pursue employment actively when one is sitting in a jury box. It is very difficult. Obviously she did not meet those two principles. You may hear that from the other side, Mr. Speaker, but when we look at it in a realistic and practical way it was impossible for that woman, that constituent of mine, to meet those two conditions.

Another thing that you may hear is that we are scared to set a precedent. I believe that if you look at the regulations, you will find that precedents have already been set. There are people, Canadians receiving unemployment insurance who are not available for work and who are not actively pursuing work. There are actually some Canadians doing this. It is legal and it is right. There is nothing wrong with that. People do receive sick benefits from UI. They are not available for work, nor are they actively pursuing work. In this case there are precedents involved.

In jury duty we are not talking about a great number of people. Most jurors who appear are already working. We are talking about people who are already on unemployment insurance. We are not talking about people who are unemployed going to jury duty and then getting on unemployment insurance. We are talking about people who are already on unemployment. I would like to mention that.

Another thing I would like to refer to is that you may hear some members today, Mr. Speaker, say—and I hope not—that the justice system, the jury system is a provincial responsibility.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all members of the House that justice is everyone's responsibility. It is everyone's responsibility. I also say that injustices that appear in the system and can be rectified from any level of government should be rectified. In this case there seems to be an injustice done and a further injustice being created by the federal government.

I will try not to be too partisan because I think that in all honesty this bill is a good bill. When you get partisan sometimes, people tend not to want to support you as much. I have no choice but to say that if the government is saying that it is a provincial responsibility then I think it is shirking its duty. I think it is just passing the buck. In fact, when I mentioned that to a number of my constituents and said I would be speaking today, they actually said: "I find it hard to believe that they are passing the buck because they seem to be collecting as much money as they can get through taxes and just passing on the problems to someone else". That is an opinion shared by a number of Canadians; not necessarily every Canadian, but it is certainly shared by some.

I want to come back to the intent here today, and that is to correct an injustice in the system. It is just a matter of housekeeping. I have talked with a lot of individual MPs and they have told me that it is a good idea. When we talk about private members' hour, the problem is that quite often the government does not want to pass private members' bills. If we look at the record of private members in seeking to pass a bill, we see that is a major problem.

I want to go back and talk a little bit about the Constitution and the new constitutional package which this government wants to promote across the land. A new pamphlet has been put out entitled An Invitation to Help Build a New Canada. That is going to go to every household in Canada, so I am told. On page 6 it says: "We need to make our federal institutions more democratic and more responsive to Canadians. At the heart of the problem is a need for parliamentary reform". I believe all members would agree with that.

It goes on to say: "Many Canadians tune in to televised sittings of the House of Commons, but they are turned off by what they see". They want to see more free votes; that is what they want to see. The government has agreed to that and most members agree that we should have more free votes. That is why I hope we will see later when the vote is taken that it is not just a party vote where maybe the government of the day decides it does not like the bill or it will not get the credit for passing the bill and it has told its members to say this about it, just talk about it, and then at the end vote against it.

I would hope that we would start now with this constitutional package, if it really means something. I would hope that we would set the example. I would hope that members opposite and adjacent would look at the bill for what it is worth and say: "I think it is a good bill. I will vote for it", or "I do not think it is a good bill and I will vote against it". If that is their wish that is no problem, but I would hope that it is an individual desire to vote one way or the other.

I would feel very satisfied with that. I also hope that we would not hear all the government members opposing it just for the sake of opposing it. I believe that is at the root of some of the problem in the land. People have lost a little bit of trust in the system, not in politicians. People tend to equate that with a loss of trust in politicians. If you go to your constituents and talk on a one-to-one basis, there is no problem with politicians as such. It is the system they are complaining about. It is a system like this one where this woman had a problem with UI.

It only makes common sense. If you talk to people they agree with what should happen. They are hoping that members of Parliament who are here today will listen and will improve the system. That is what it is all about. We should start here in private members' hour. In fact that is where the ultimate free vote should always be. It should not matter. We should not even get a declaration from the minister about whether he is for or against. We should just come in here and say: "Let us go to it", and if you agree with it, you agree with it.

[Translation]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I think all members of this House should support my amendment. I think that in this case, partisanship should be relegated to second place and the interests of all Canadians allowed to come first. I therefore urge members of all political parties to support this amendment. The interests of their constituents are at stake.

• (1720)

Since it was created in 1940, our unemployment insurance system has always had equity as its main characteristic. Since section 14 ignores this principle and is basically unfair, it should be amended. Any vote against this bill may very well be perceived as a vote against the interests of Canadians.

[English]

I hope that my pleas to reform the unemployment system have not fallen on deaf ears.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today, Bill C-211, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act tabled by my hon. friend, may appear at first glance to have very laudable goals, to permit people serving on jury duty or performing other community services to continue to receive unemployment insurance benefits while carrying out those functions.

The hon. member has already informed us that no Canadian should be penalized for undertaking such civic duties as serving on juries or firefighting or things of that nature. I fully agree; no one should be penalized for carrying out his civic duty.

It is not the unemployment insurance system that is penalizing people for fulfilling their civic duty but the provincial justice system. It is true that people serving on juries are not eligible to receive UI.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Shields: I wonder if the hon. member could, instead of speaking, open his ears and listen and maybe he will learn something. I was very quiet and listened to the words of my hon. friend across the way. I will be prepared to sit and listen to the words of this hon. gentleman. Perhaps he will just listen to what I have to say.

It is true that people serving on juries are not eligible to receive UI benefits for the time they sit on the jury. This is because they cannot be considered available for work at that time. I will have more to say about that in a brief moment or two.

I would like to point out that it is also true that the fees paid to people for serving on juries in this country are extremely low. For this reason someone receiving UI benefits who serves on a jury is very likely to face financial hardship when he or she is disentitled from UI benefits. But it should also be noted that I do not believe that any judge in the land would ignore a plea to be excused from jury duty when one is seeking employment and on unemployment insurance. That should be underlined.

I have had occasion to be in court rooms when judges will excuse people from jury duty for a number of reasons. If I were unemployed and was called for jury duty and I went before the judge and explained that I was looking for a job and that my UI would be cut off if I had to serve, he would excuse me from jury duty.

Let us briefly explore how the act applies to this question. The Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 was enacted June 23, 1971. Although numerous changes have been made to it, this act forms the basis of the current legislation. Under the act claimants attest to their entitlement to benefits on a bi-weekly reporting card. Here they indicate that they are unemployed, that they are capable of and available for work and unable to find suitable employment. Those are the basic criteria for receiving unemployment insurance.

This process of determining the claimant's eligibility is not limited to when they file their initial or renewal application for benefits but continues throughout the benefit period. Once a benefit period has been established, claimants serve a two-week waiting period before benefits start. Claimants must also show that no conditions or circumstances exist that would disqualify or disentitle that individual from benefits.

UI legislation requires claimants who are receiving regular UI benefits to prove that they are capable of and available for work and that nothing prevents them from immediately accepting any suitable offer of employment. This is really the crux of the matter, and I would repeat that again. The legislation requires claimants who are receiving regular unemployment insurance benefits to prove that they are capable of and available for work and that nothing prevents them from immediately accepting any suitable offer of employment.

This is the test laid out in section 14(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This requirement is mandatory under the legislation and there is no discretion to waive or vary. It imposes on each individual claimant the burden of proving availability for each and every day of employment. The claimants primary preoccupation on a daily basis is to become re-employed. To that end a claimant must be continually seeking work and be immediately available to accept an offer of suitable employment.

If a claimant is unable to accept employment immediately because he or she is serving on a jury there is a strong presumption, I would submit, of non-availability. However, as in all cases availability is evaluated on the individual's circumstances. The decisions will vary according to the particulars of the specific case.

In recent years the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has developed a policy that permits some flexibility and allows claimants to prove their availability for limited periods of up to two working days in cases such as jury duty, family illness or attendance at a funeral, when claimants would otherwise be able to prove their availability.

This is the most flexible interpretation possible under the legislation which in section 14 requires the individual to be available for work, capable of working and willing to work.

Nevertheless as a general rule a claimant is not considered to be available for work while serving on a jury. The length or uncertainty of the time of duty interferes with the claimant's search for and acceptance of employment.

I would submit that anyone unemployed and looking for a job being called to do jury duty, having a job offered to him and not being able to accept it would be very upset indeed. It goes beyond civic duty.

If jury duty lasts more than two working days in a row, it is difficult for a claimant to claim to be available for work. If arrangements have been made for the claimant to be informed immediately of any opportunity for suitable employment and if it is possible for the claimant to be released and report for work within the following 24 or 48 hours, the claim may be credible.

If in fact the solution to this problem lies not with UI legislation but with provincial judicial systems, generally provincial payments for jury duty are much less than UI benefits. Consequently UI recipients could be penalized for fulfilling their civil obligation.

I agree that people should be compensated for an important function such as jury duty, but the real question is: Who is responsible for compensating them? Is it the employer and the workers themselves or is it the judicial system, as I would submit, of each individual province? I would argue that since they are serving the provincial systems it is their responsibility to provide adequate compensation.

I am going to review very briefly for the House what the provinces are paying for jury duty. Prince Edward Island pays its jurists $40 a day from the first day of jury duty. The average duration of jury duty is seven days in that province. Nova Scotia pays $15 a day from the first day. The average duration of jury duty is three days. New Brunswick pays no fees for the first nine days and it pays jurors $10 a day in mileage and $25 for a full day after 10 days. Quebec jurors are paid $25 a day for the first 10 days, $40 for the eleventh day on. The average duration of a jury in the Montreal region is seven days. Ontario jurists are paid nothing for the first 10 days of trial. I think those kinds of payments for jury duty are not acceptable and the provinces should address them. Manitoba pays $20 a day for the selection of panel, $30 a day for jury duty. The average duration is five days. Saskatchewan pays $25 a day from fourth day of jury duty in criminal cases and $25 for the first day in civil cases. Jurors in Alberta get $10 a day for days one through five of jury duty, $40 after that. Four days is the average number of days served on a jury. The Northwest Territories pays $25 a day and $40 a day. British Columbia pays $10 a day and $30 a day with a two to three day average.

• (1730)

In conclusion, the primary requirement for entitlement after being unemployed is being available for work. I would submit, and I submit very strongly, that it is not the UI system that we should be attacking or seeking compensation from for the individuals to allow them to serve on jury duty. We should go where the problem lies and that is in the judicial system of each province.

Provinces should take the responsibility that belongs rightfully to them and pay the jurors a decent remuneration for sitting and doing a civic duty.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to support Bill C-211 which has been put forward by the member for Restigouche.

This bill is cleaning up something that was overlooked when the original act was put in place. We are not suggesting for a moment that it is going to cost the UI fund any more money. We are not asking the federal government to put more money into the fund. It does not put any into it now.

What we are saying is that when people are performing a civic duty they should not be penalized by having their benefits cut off, thereby not only putting them under undue stress but also their families.

A lot has been said about people serving on jury duty and a lot should be said about that. When we consider people sitting on jury duty, it is a right and a privilege. Those people who are denied that right and privilege are not being dealt with fairly. When we say that you are going to sit on jury duty but you are not going to be able to collect unemployment insurance benefits, we are taking away their right.

I would like to put emphasis on other volunteers in a community. In my riding of Timmins--Chapleau we rely a lot on volunteers. We have numerous volunteer fire departments. We have a first response team in a town called Foleyet. A lot of people on that team are unemployed. A lot of our volunteer firefighters are unemployed.

The bill also asks for an exemption to the rule or a change in the rule for those people who provide food, flood control and shelter. We have an organization called the Lord's Kitchen which offers some 350 to 400 meals per week to underprivileged people, people who need help.

Are we telling all these volunteers who may in some cases be on unemployment insurance: "You can't do this on a continuous basis because you are not actively looking for work. You can't go out and help your community any more. You have to go out and look for a job"? Albeit they are looking for a job, does that mean that every waking moment they have to be out there banging on doors looking for work? Does that mean we have to deprive them of the opportunity of serving their community on a volunteer basis?

If that were the case, what would happen to the Cancer Society, the Heart Fund and the United Way, all those volunteer agencies that without volunteers will not exist? Is this the message that we are sending to our communities?

When we hear the government say "some of these areas fall within provincial jurisdiction", the government is passing the buck. The government is shedding itself of its responsibilities.

The government is not contributing to the UI fund. It is paid for by employers and employees. Why is there a problem with saying that people engaged in performing a civic duty or volunteer work cannot collect UI? Does that mean that those volunteers and those people who are performing jury duty are not actively seeking work? They send out resumes. They fill out applications. They make appointments.

An employer will call you and say: "Come on in and let's have an interview." Does that mean that it has to be specifically at the time they are sitting on a jury, or could they make a time that is more convenient. Accommodations can be made. Potential employers, no. They are reasonable people and they know that when people are performing their civic duty, allowances have to be made.

I think this bill, as I said in the beginning, is a good bill. It is a clean-up bill. It is not one that is going to cost the government one red cent. If we look at the percentage of people who would be affected, the cost to the fund is very, very minimal but the benefit to the community is extremely large by having these people in place to perform these voluntary duties.

I do not really understand why the government members would want to rise in this House and speak opposing this bill. I would hope, as my friend from Restigouche--Chaleur has already pointed out, that this debate will take place in a non-partisan way, that when you look at the bill you look at the value of the wording, exactly what it will do. Never mind going outside the parameters and playing one political party against the other. I have no problem supporting this bill. It is a Liberal bill but it makes no difference. I would hope that the Conservative members will rise and speak their own minds as to exactly how they really feel about this bill. I am sure that in the end they will see that there is benefit, there is no cost, and that they, like us, will support the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the hon. member's bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

On the face of it, the hon. member's desire to amend this bill seems quite reasonable. I am sure hon. members will agree that it is incumbent on every citizen to perform his civic duty, such as serving on a jury or helping in the community when necessary. Helping the community through volunteer work is a noble endeavour that benefits our society as a whole. However, Mr. Speaker, even if it may be the right thing to do, and I refer to making up for the financial losses of citizens when they take part in activities to help their community, we should ask ourselves how this should be done and whether an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act is the right answer.

Mr. Boudria: Who wrote that?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Glengarry--Prescott--Russell asked me who wrote that. I did. I have a right to prepare my notes. If he wants to take a look, he can come to my office.

Mr. Boudria: If the notes were yours, they would make more sense.

Mr. Saint-Julien: The hon. member talks about sense. I often notice he reads his own notes during Question Period, but I never made an issue of it. In any case, I am not going to argue. Mr. Speaker, I feel that although the amendment proposed by the hon. member is well intentioned, it is clear it is not up to the federal government to offer these people compensation through the Unemployment Insurance Act. Now, did you get that?

Consider the situation. From the outset, in the forties, the main objective of the Unemployment Insurance Act has always been to help workers "temporarily out of work". Canadians can be proud of this legislation because it is an integral part of programs that reflect our social responsibility. However, to make it effective, we have included measures to counter abuse and set criteria to ensure that the money paid during a period of unemployment goes to people who are out of work and are actively seeking a job. I emphasize, these people must be actively seeking employment. I am sure the hon. member will agree that without this provision, human nature being what it is, there would be considerable abuse of unemployment insurance funds. Section 14 of the Act, the section the hon. member wishes to amend, puts a heavy responsability on unemployment insurance recipients. I wish to quote subsection 14(a):

> (a) capable of and available for work and unable to obtain suitable employment on that day--

• (1740)

Mr. Speaker, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the main concern of a person who is unemployed must be to seek employment, not for three or four days a week but every day. That person must look for a job and be immediately capable of accepting a suitable job offer.

I think the hon. member will agree it is reasonable to assume that if a person serves on a jury or works as a volunteer fireman, laudable though those activities may be, that person is not immediately available for work.

However, Mr. Speaker, the federal government realizes that sometimes there are special circumstances. That is why every application is assessed on its own merits, and as a result, decisions will vary. However, when a UI benefit recipient is selected as a jury member or as a member of a rescue team, if he makes arrangements to be called immediately as soon as suitable employment is available, and if that he then reports for work within 48 hours, then he is eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I think the real problem is not the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act but the low rates of compensation paid by the provinces for jury duty. For instance, in Ontario, jury members receive nothing during the first ten days of a trial; from the eleventh to the forty-ninth day, they get only $40 a day, and starting on the fiftieth day, they receive $100 for their expenses. That is the rule in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, I have yet to see a single federal member urge the Government of Ontario to increase those amounts. They should, but I think they are asleep on the job.

Mr. Speaker, in Quebec they get $25 a day for the first ten days and $40 a day for subsequent days. In Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, employers are responsible for compensating employees who are called for jury duty. Unemployed workers in Newfoundland who are called for jury duty receive $4.75 an hour, but in Nova Scotia they only get $15 a day.

Mr. Speaker, I don't want to waste the precious time of hon. members by quoting figures for all the provinces. The ones I gave are fairly representative for the provinces as a whole. I hope opposition members understood those figures, and they should, if they can add and subtract. Suffice it to say that in general, the compensation paid by the provinces to persons serving on a jury is far less than UI benefits. However, I am sure hon. members will agree that UI benefits should not be used to subsidize provincial judicial systems.

UI benefit recipients who ask to be exempted from jury duty do so because the compensation is inadequate. Mr. Speaker, I think that judges who believe compensation paid by the provinces to persons who do jury duty is inadequate should do something about this problem. Mr. Speaker, despite the good intentions of the hon. member who proposed the amendment, the answer is not to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act but to ask the provinces to increase amounts paid to individuals who perform their civic duty by serving on a jury or working as volunteers in their communities.

I have reached the end of my speech, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope the Liberal member who tried to intervene during my speech listened to what I had to say.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry--Prescott--Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Abitibi. I must tell you that I accused him of reading a speech that was not his but, Mr. Speaker, I did so as a compliment, a tribute to him because I know that his own speech, one that he would have written himself, would be thirty times better than the one he was given, Mr. Speaker.

I trust the hon. member opposite, but I have no confidence in those who wrote that speech because obviously they are not at all as intelligent as the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Abitibi and the hon. member for Athabasca were telling us earlier that unemployment insurance is a system that exists to provide benefits so long as the beneficiaries want to look for work--no exceptions. But that is not true, Mr. Speaker. I will quote section 14 of the present law to you.

> 14. A claimant is not entitled to be paid initial benefit for any working day in a benefit period for which he fails to prove that he was either
> (a) capable of and available for work and unable to obtain--employment--or
> (b) incapable of work by reason of prescribed illness, injury or quarantine on that day, and that he would be otherwise available for work.

So recipients of unemployment insurance who are sick, quarantined or have other valid reasons given in section 14 can still receive benefits.

Mr. Speaker, we are not here today to see whether or not there are exceptions to the rule. There are exceptions. What my colleague from Restigouche--Chaleur is telling us today is that there should be another exemption, not that there should be exemptions--that is already established, it is in the law and the government has not challenged it or tried to eliminate it. So it is there. My colleague is saying that there should be other exemptions.

[English]

Let us listen to rules on how it is today. If a person serves on a jury, that person is technically unavailable for work that day and cannot draw unemployment insurance. Some members across say that is the fault of the province because it does not pay enough for jury duty.

Another hon. member said that was fine but those people who are not rich enough to serve on juries should ask the judge to exempt them. I thought it was a principle of common law that we had a right to be judged by our peers, not that we had a right to be judged by the rich. What kind of mind-set is that?

I have an article here from the Mountain Times Transcript of February 6, 1991. I ask my colleagues across the way to take note of this. Never mind the speech that the officials of the department gave to them to read. It says: "Calls UI rule stupid. Judge excuses potential jurors". This explains how the judge in this case allowed a juror to go home because the person would lose her unemployment insurance benefit. The judge called this ruling stupid. The members across want to favour a ruling that is described by a judge as being "stupid". Is that what they want to stand for by reading the documents given to them by functionaries of the department? I say to my colleagues across, never mind that nonsense. Speak your mind. Never mind what the officials told you to read. They are not the boss. We are. We were elected to this place by our constituents to make laws that are fair and reasonable for all Canadians, not to read junk prepared by some minion in the employment department or by a sidekick to the minister.

The members across have referred only to jury duty. They have some sort of a bent that only people who are rich have a right to serve on jury duty. What about the firefighter, the volunteer firefighter, the flood control worker, the rescue worker? Say that some members have a problem with the last clause "provider of food or shelter for the community".

Let us assume there is a problem with that with someone across the way. I do not think there should be, but let us say there is one. Why do they not all go to committee and remove that portion of it if they have a problem with it?

Here is the situation now. If there is a flood on the Ottawa River going through my constituency, someone who is on unemployment cannot volunteer to go help in that flood because he will have his unemployment benefits cancelled. That is a case of an emergency, and that according to the government across the way is what the rule should be.

Last year there was a fire in Baie Comeau, in the Prime Minister's own riding. Is it logical that a volunteer should not be able to help with the fire because he is receiving UI?

• (1750)

No, that is not logical. I know the members across do not believe it is logical. I say to them, never mind what you were told to read by some functionary, some sidekick to the minister. Speak your mind. Say what you think on behalf of your constituents. Let us change this role. Let us make it right for the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Bring it up with the provinces!

Mr. Boudria: The hon. member opposite says: Bring it up with the provinces, at the same time. Volunteer firefighters are not paid.

An hon. member: Yes, they are.

Mr. Boudria: Volunteers who go fight a fire are not paid!

An hon. member: Yes, they are.

Mr. Boudria: The hon. member opposite thinks he knows everything. He thinks there are no volunteer firefighters in Canada. If some of them are listening to us, they will write to the hon. member for Abitibi and let him know they provide their services to all Canadians, they greatly contribute to this country. The unemployed are entitled to fight a fire without asking permission to the hon. member for Abitibi or to anyone else! They should have the right to continue to do so. The same thing applies if there is a flood in my riding or in yours, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I say to the members they should have an examination of their own conscience before they read the prepared text that was dictated to them and should speak their own mind. Perhaps the people of Canada will then have some faith in this institution, instead of thinking that we are all a bunch of wimps reading documents prepared by someone else.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, an amendment to an act of Parliament should improve that act in some way for all concerned, rather than merely complicating it.

My hon. friend wishes to make the unemployment insurance program fairer for jurors and emergency workers whose unquestioned value to society makes our response to this amendment all the more heartfelt.

The hon. member is to be commended for bringing this issue to our attention. What scares me about the amendment before us is that it emphasizes the creation of more and more exceptions in an act already almost overburdened with special cases.

Meanwhile, the end result sought after in the case of jury duty and maybe emergency workers as well is so much easier to achieve through simple administrative changes at the provincial or territorial level and through augmented fees where shortages exist.

We either rewrite the UI act to include more exceptions in special cases or we ask the provinces and territories to pay their jurors more in line with present day wages.

Do we really want to create yet another group of special claimants whose major complaint is that they are often grossly underpaid by their provincial masters?

If the provinces which need their community services so badly are not willing to pay for it, then let them exclude the UI claimant from service.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is geared increasingly to helping Canada build a strong, globally competitive, highly skilled work force. Its cornerstone is that each and every claimant be available for work and actively searching for it and each and every day benefits are paid.

Obviously, someone empanelled on a jury or performing emergency service, whether paid or not, is not available for any other work. With respect to jury duty, I believe a simpler solution is already at hand which avoids amending the UI act altogether.

The preferred solution in my view can be found in a small booklet first published by a Tory government in Ontario and issued every since by the Ontario Attorney General, entitled Your part in Justice—A Guide to Jury Duty.

This booklet is mailed to every Ontario resident who is summoned for jury duty, whether or not he or she is actually selected.

In it, on page 11 of the current issue, article 16, UI claimants are told to identify themselves to the court and they will be excused from jury duty if they so request it.

Ontario's solution recognizes how important it is for UI claimants to identify themselves as soon as they are summoned. I am certain the mover of this amendment will agree that while Ontario's solution does not satisfy all cases—the civic minded UI claimant who yearns for an opportunity to serve as a juror, for example—it certainly is the answer for all those UI claimants for whom jury duty under the present circumstances is an outrageous and personally aggravating interruption in family earnings which they can ill afford.

Perhaps the hon. member would join with me in a motion that asks every province and territory which has not already done so to allow UI claimants to exercise the exclusion privilege conferred by Ontario. It seems a very sensible privilege to offer claimants and a practical one too.

I am informed by the local sheriff's office in Ottawa—Carleton that UI claimants do, in fact, exercise it when their names are chosen. I acknowledge the possibility that this solution may, in areas of extremely high unemployment, leave the court short of jurors, with the result that, as sometimes happened with blood donor clinics, service to the community is shouldered by a small core of willing repeaters. In these rare instances, might I suggest that the province or territory could perhaps selectively augment the jury fee to bring it into line with UI benefits in the affected community. But I do not wish to download this issue on to the provinces, Mr. Speaker, nor will I tell them how to manage their affairs.

Let us keep our priorities straight and let us encourage our provincial and territorial partners to do the same.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur, New Brunswick, on a job very well done. Obviously he has done his homework before he came forward with this legislation.

I too was somewhat surprised and astonished when I received a newspaper clipping dated February 6, 1991. The headline read as follows: "Judge excused potential jurors; calls UI rule stupid". The story goes on to say that a Nova Scotia Supreme Court justice excused nine people from jury duty Tuesday because they would not be able to collect unemployment benefits if the trial took more than two days. Canada Employment states that people must be available for work to qualify for payment. There is a quote by Justice Hilroy Nathanson where he says "I think it is a stupid ruling, but who am I?"

Mr. Speaker, not only are the rules somewhat stupid but in my view they are extremely unfair. I think it is our duty as parliamentarians and it is the duty of the government that whenever it introduces legislation to make sure that legislation is fair.

I heard some of my colleagues talking about the fact that this whole question falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial government. That might be true, but as my colleague indicated a little earlier, with the latest development in the UI proposal by the federal government, the federal government is washing its hands of the whole question of transfer payments to the provinces.

Just for the benefit of the viewers, I would like to point out that in Ontario alone, according to the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General, between the months of July 1, 1990 to June 30, 1991 there were 10,843 people who served on juries. I wonder how many of those people would have qualified for UI if they were unemployed.

• (1800)

The system is unfair because it does not treat all of the people equally. When you look at the provinces you see that as of March, 1989 jurors who might be called to duty do not receive any money in Ontario from day one to day eleven. In New Brunswick, they do not receive any money between day one and day eleven, while in Manitoba, for instance, they receive $30 for each day they serve. Well, here we have two provinces, Mr. Speaker, where somebody who is called to duty does not receive any money at all, while in another province they receive $30 a day.

It is not only the system that is not fair at the federal level in terms of the policy-making end of it, but also at the provincial level where the provinces are not treating the jurors on an equal basis.

British Columbia, for instance, pays $10 for the first day and after the first day it is $20 per day and after 10 days it is $30 per day. In Nova Scotia, jurors are paid $15 per day.

I guess, Mr. Speaker, the government in its wisdom thought that it was a provincial responsibility but one could ask, what would happen if a juror is called to the Federal Court? There is no provincial say in what happens at the Federal Court because the Federal Court falls within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Is the federal government going to say that those people who appear in the Federal Court will qualify to collect UI but if they appear in provincial court they will not qualify?

Mr. Speaker, that is somewhat unfair. I can see it is six o'clock.

An hon. member: Maybe we will have a chance to debate this question again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 39 is deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this question because I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question in the House the other day about the relocation of the Farm Credit Corporation headquarters to Regina.

At the time, I saw the move as being unnecessary and I indicated that it is going to cost farmers a price they cannot afford. At the same time I indicated that the burden of these increased costs will fall squarely on the shoulders of the farmers themselves. I also indicated that the relocation will make the credit office headquarters significantly less accessible to a variety of Canadian support groups.

In my statement I clearly indicated that the office, if it is to be relocated as the government has indicated to make it easier for farmers to borrow money, one would understand. However, the reality is that the move of these offices to Regina will not benefit the farmers any more than they would benefit if the offices were located where they are right now.

Simply put, the regional offices that already exist in the provinces are in charge of giving loans to the farmers. The offices right now in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, mostly concentrate on developing strategic plans with ministers and with federal departments.

In my question to the minister I asked him to clarify for us why the government decided on a move at this point in time, on the verge of an election being called in Saskatchewan.

Also I asked him to give us the rationale for this move. What sort of a study has the government done? What sort of justification has it? I asked him the question twice hoping to get an answer from him, but unfortunately rather than answering my question, he moved on and started fighting with the NDP.

I can understand that there is a bone to be picked between the minister and the NDP but I think it is also a serious matter. The people of Saskatchewan are wondering now what will happen if the Conservatives do not win in Saskatchewan. Would the government carry on with its move, or will it be cancelled altogether?

I would like to ask the minister to give us a complete analysis of what has taken place to lead the government to the conclusion that this office had to be moved out of here.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Farm Credit Corporation is a key institution for Canada's agricultural sector.

Since its establishment in 1959, the corporation has been an important source of loans and financial services to farmers all across Canada. It plays an important role in assisting Canadians to establish and maintain viable and productive farms. At the end of the 1990–91 fiscal year, the Farm Credit Corporation had a loan portfolio outstanding of 61,475 loans totalling $3.6 billion.

The relocation of FCC's head office from Ottawa to Regina will strengthen the presence of the Government of Canada in Saskatchewan and demonstrate the government's commitment to decentralizing its agencies and services throughout Canada. Relocating FCC's headquarters will greatly benefit the city of Regina and the province, adding up to 200 new positions in Regina.

FCC currently has about 185 field and regional staff in Saskatchewan of which about 75 are located in Regina. With the relocation of FCC's head office to Regina, over one–third of FCC's employees will be located in Regina and almost one–half in the province of Saskatchewan. This move also fits perfectly with the provincial government's plan to shift provincial government jobs to smaller communities.

The hon. member for Regina--Wascana tells me that the people of Saskatchewan and farmers in western Canada welcome FCC headquarters staff to the prairies. They hope that by FCC being located in a more rural oriented city that staff will be able to develop a closer relationship with its western clients. In 1990–91 and to date this year, some 45 per cent of FCC loans have been to prairie farmers.

The decision to move FCC's head office is strictly a federal decision and is not related to provincial elections. It is a decision which is consistent with this government's policy on decentralization and is similar to the government's decision last winter to move the National Energy Board to Calgary.

I can assure hon. members that the National Energy Board has successfully completed its move to Calgary. I know that, like the National Energy Board, FCC will greatly benefit from this move by being closer to western Canadians.

The corporation has recovered from its financial difficulties of the 1980s and in 1990–91 recorded its first operating surplus in nine years.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the government has now unveiled its constitutional proposals.

According to the media at least, there were some differences of opinion among ministers in arriving at those proposals. Finally the differences were resolved. They were resolved not openly and publicly but privately behind closed doors.

The proposals that have been put forward deal with most but not all of the concerns that Canadians expressed to the Spicer commission during its hearings. Now the proposals have been referred to this special all–party parliamentary joint committee for public hearing and also, as I understand it, a summary of the proposals are going to be sent out to each and every household in Canada.

Now it is an opportunity for all Canadians to finally discuss and debate these proposals in an open and public fashion. It seems to me that it is extremely important that the joint committee, our government and all of the provincial governments involved in this whole process must not only be willing to listen to the public. They must also be prepared to accept constructive amendments to the government's proposals that have been put forward and new constructive proposals that come directly from the public. They may have nothing to do with the proposals that the government has put forward itself, although perhaps some of these proposals might be ones that the government debated privately without the benefit of public input behind closed cabinet doors before unveiling the actual proposals themselves.

It seems to me that unless there is this openness and willingness to accept constructive proposals from the public on the part of governments, we are going to be right back in the position that we were at the beginning of this whole process as identified by the experience of the Spicer commission. It found that Canadians were very distrustful of our government process and of politicians themselves.

Of course, they expressed those concerns based on the belief that they had not been represented by the members of Parliament, that members of Parliament had not represented their views on such things as the debate on taxes on their old age pensions or the debate on the GST. In fact, the public feels that the members of Parliament were saying: "We know better than you do what is good for you". Therefore, the public feels that their views were not being represented.

That concern reinforced the feeling that grew out of Meech Lake that things were being done privately behind closed doors and not in an open fashion whatsoever. From here on in it is important that everything be done publicly. If there are compromises and trade-offs to be made, the public understands what the basis of those trade-offs are all about.

A recent poll, as you know Mr. Speaker, found that 60 per cent of Canadians think that the government is just playing politics by introducing these constitutional proposals and 51 per cent, slightly higher in Quebec, believe that these proposals should finally be approved by a national referendum.

Tonight I want to ask the parliamentary secretary if he is going to assure us that the final constitutional proposals are going to be put to a national referendum by the government for final approval or rejection by all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on May 28, 1991, the hon. member from Don Valley East asked that the Government of Canada give its undertaking to accept, without modification, parliamentary recommendations on the constitution. He also asked that the Government promise to deal with the entire issue in an open way.

Mr. Speaker, this government has made a commitment that I will repeat for the record: in cooperation with the people and Parliament of Canada, together with the provinces, the Government of Canada will seek an open constitutional covenant in an open fashion.

The Special Joint Committee will listen to the views of interested groups and individual Canadians on how to improve our constitution in the course of its broad hearings from coast to coast. However, both Houses will wish to know the views of the provincial legislatures which, Mr. Speaker, also represent the people of Canada, and which play a formal role, as we know, in authorizing constitutional amendments. Under these circumstances, it would be inappropriate for us to close doors prematurely on the process of improving our constitution.

If we hope to embark on a truly open process, Mr. Speaker, we must expand, rather than curtail, the participation of other groups and individuals in this process. To exclude everyone but the members of this assembly would run directly counter to the goal of democratizing the system of altering our constitution. That is why the work of the Special Joint Committee is essential in developing a national consensus.

Mr. Speaker, it is the people of Canada, expressing themselves through the House of Commons, their provincial legislatures, and as individuals, who will ultimately decide the content of their own constitution.

I encourage the honourable member from Don Valley East to play an active role in this process in the months to come. This House will still have the final word on any new constitutional covenant, according to the rules of our current Constitution.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE CANADA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to follow up on a matter raised in a question on June 17, 1991 in connection with Corrections Canada put to the Solicitor General.

At that time there was some fear that a strike might take place within Corrections Canada in a way that would cause security problems in our corrections institutions. Fortunately that type of a strike or withdrawal of services did not occur. Consequently the fear that we would have significant problems, while not unfounded, we can file in the past. However, a number of issues lying behind the question remained.

Coincidentally just yesterday I visited the Edmonton Institution in Edmonton, Alberta, a maximum security institution, where issues relating to that question were taken up with management and employees. Also coincidentally this morning the government has put a new bill before Parliament respecting a new Corrections Act and also dealing with a number of issues related to that area.

While in Edmonton and discussing these types of issues, mostly related to previous escapes from custody but not confined to that, I had an opportunity to deal with case management officers, security officers, and one employee incognito who did not wish his name to be known. The themes that came up at that time, the issues which also bear relevance to the question put that day in June to the Solicitor General, are threefold, I believe.

First, in dealing with the question as put to the Solicitor General on the issue of staff relations, I believe that Corrections Canada can do better in its employee relations. As I look at the field I see shades of the post office, the way we used to discuss management-employee relations in the post office. The ministry and Corrections Canada have to improve the way they deal with their employees. As Corrections Canada itself changes, they have to make sure that the pace of change does not outstrip the ability of employees to train themselves to adapt to new situations.

I remember one individual at the institution yesterday making that point very clearly. He said: "Mr. Lee, I have been here 19 years and I have never seen so much change as we have gone through lately. Please take my message from other people here that you cannot change things so fast that we fail to do our job properly", and a very important job it is too because if they make a mistake dealing with some very dangerous commodities we all as a society have to bear those risks.

The second area was public relations. Corrections Canada has done a woeful job of its own public relations. In the communities where it has institutions there is a very high, ultra sensitive threshold of sensitivity here. The communities are worried and in some cases have reason to worry that the institutions are not properly dealing with the communities that surround them and that they are not taking into account the risk factors existing inside the institution when dealing with the public.

Lastly, the issue I have already touched, Corrections Canada has to make sure that the training it makes available to all of its personnel is properly delivered and that the service properly carries out the functions, mandate and mission statement of CSC.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I respond to my hon. colleague. As you know, I am also interested in that issue since there are five prisons in my constituency, plus the largest correctional facility. But there is also the best training centre for French-speaking guards in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General, I am pleased to address the question raised by the hon. member during Question Period on June 17 regarding labour unrest, low wages, reduced staff levels and insufficient training of correctional officers.

First, I would like to assure the hon. member that the Solicitor General takes his responsibilities with regard to public safety very seriously. As a matter of fact, today, the Solicitor General introduced a bill that shows how important public safety is and how the government is determined to restore public confidence in the correctional system.

• (1820)

[English]

With respect to labour unrest I would like to remind the hon. member that federal correctional officers are designated as essential employees for obvious security reasons. As the hon. member is aware, there were some disruptions during the recent strike but public safety and operations were not jeopardized.

The hon. member expressed concern over low wages paid to correctional officers. The member should know that their salaries compare very favourably to their counterparts in other jurisdictions. They are paid 6 per cent more than the average maximum rate earned by their provincial counterparts.

With regard to reduced staff level the members should know that the ratio of correctional officers to inmates with the Correctional Service of Canada is 2.5.

It may interest the hon. member to know that the ratio in the U.S. federal system is one staff member for eight inmates.

[Translation]

I would have liked to go on, Mr. Speaker, but I see that my time has already expired.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to use the time allocated to me tonight to discuss the situation in the farm industry in Canada. The government is not dealing with the problem of last year's shortfall of more than $1 billion in farmers income. Farm organizations are urging the government to put in place a third line of defence to provide financial assistance to farmers.

[English]

Today the Women's Institute of Canada was in town and had representatives here to point out the harm that is being done to rural communities and to families due to the lack of funds in rural Canada.

The shortfall in realized net income has been calculated to be about $1.3 billion. That calculation is arrived at by taking the average of the last five years' net income and looking at the actual income from the crop year just completed, and the shortfall between the five-year average and the actual income for the year that was just completed in August is $1.3 billion.

We should remember that net farm income has been declining in each of those five years so we are in a sliding scale downward and even so the income for the crop year just completed will be $1.3 billion short of that declining balance.

What this means is that a lot of farmers are carrying excessive debt. They are carrying debt that is being pushed on to the small business people who supply farmers as the banks withdraw from the lending market. The fertilizer dealer, the equipment dealer, the seller of pesticides and hardware carry a greater and greater amount of credit accounts because farmers cannot go to the bank anymore to borrow the money. They simply build up an account with the local business people.

GRIP and NISA are coming in the current crop year. They will be available for the crop that is now going into the bins, but there is still a huge shortfall of $1.3 billion which will simply be carried forward as additional debt. I remind the House that the agricultural committee found that farm debt had not declined over the last four years. When we completed our studies we saw that farm debt was stuck at $22 billion. We have some data to indicate that debt is now rising.

The call for $1.3 billion has been made by all of the major farm organizations in Canada, which was raised by me on the first day that the House came back in a question, prompts this intervention, and has been raised at numerous farm rallies across the land. The government must act soon to provide this assistance to grain and oilseed producers in Canada.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Canadian grains and oilseeds farmers have watched over the last six years while an international grain export subsidy war has devastated prices. This is a battle over which our producers have no control and it is one which has hurt them deeply.

Who would have believed that in 1991 Canadian farmers are getting the same price for their wheat that they received in 1972? The escalating subsidy war has done just that. Until the European community and the United States put an end to their fight, our farmers will continue to suffer at their hands.

Canadian farmers are fighting to survive in spite of these record low prices. This government is helping in that fight by providing unprecedented support. We have been working along with farmers through the development of new safety net programs and now on the third line of defence committee to address the income problems of the sector.

The committee met October 2 through October 4 in its efforts to review and recommend action. The Prime Minister attended the meeting last week and spent about an hour with farm leaders to hear their views. He also told them that this government is prepared to provide special assistance for immediate short term. The Prime Minister has asked for recommendations from ministers by the end of the week.

This demonstrates the commitment of this government to support the grains and oilseeds sector. Already this year the federal government has provided strong support to grains and oilseeds farmers. About $2 billion will be going out to farmers from now until the end of June through the new safety net programs. Of that amount, cheques through the NISA program are in the mail now and an interim payment is expected through the GRIP program before Christmas. More of the GRIP money can be made available in two more interim payments before spring seeding in 1992.

These payments are part of a long list of support measures this government has taken over the last six years to help the grains and oilseeds sector. There was a special Canadian grains program in 1986–87 which paid out $2.1 billion over the two years. In 1988 we provided $850 million to farmers to deal with the drought. In 1990 we provided a further $500 million through the special income assistance program.

We recognize that despite these programs--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please.

STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want Canadians to know why this particular kind of session is being provided. A member asks a question and when the information provided by the minister in response to the question is unclear, insufficient or the minister has not answered the question, we get an opportunity to make the point again. Hopefully this time we get the answers we want.

What was my question? My question was a very simple one. Will the minister remove a 3 per cent administrative fee imposed on student loans? I did point out to the minister that this was an unfair tax and there is not anyone involved in education who would disagree that it was possibly illegal because it asks those who will no doubt pay their loans back to pay a tax for those who do not. Clearly it is immoral.

This is that very tax system in which you, as a poor student in a sense because you would not be borrowing money unless you needed it, need to pay the cash up front before you can get the loan.

I was trying to help the government. I was trying to point out that this is a silly insensitive tax. I recognize that we have had 30 some tax increases and none of them has been particularly popular, but this has got to be the silliest of all.

Will the minister remove this tax? It is as simple as that. The minister said that we had a program available for 27 years and that there had not been a great deal of changes and that he would soon be making recommendations to cabinet and then they would be presented to the House of Commons.

I understand that, but will he or will he not remove that tax? He was given a wonderful opportunity--

[Translation]

It is unfortunate that it did not chose to do it. The governement talks about globalization, competitivity, productivity, and then what do they do? They cut in education budgets. There is less money available now for training and retraining, research and development, than there was before. It seems to me that this is the way to go to ensure that we can meet economic, social and other needs of Canadians.

I ask the question again in the hope that this time I will get an answer.

[English]

Will this government act now? Will it remove this insensitive tax, this immoral tax, this possibly illegal tax, this tax that is damaging the students who want to return to their studies?

[Translation]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I would like an answer, immediately.

[English]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, to answer my colleague, all taxes are silly especially when you have to pay them.

[Translation]

In response to the question of the member for Saint-Boniface about the 3 per cent warranty cost, it is important that I remind my colleague of the parameters of the Canadian Student Loan Program called CSLP.

Firstly, the federal government does not offer loans to students. He gives a warranty to lending institutions that the loans granted by them to full time postsecundary students will be refunded.

Secondly, the program pays the interests on the loan for the duration of the studies and up until six months after their completion.

Lastly, more than 200 000 borrowing students enjoy fixed interest rates and attractive terms of redemption, among other benefits. Since its creation, in 1964, the program has been an important source of support for postsecundary students, with a total amount of guaranteed loans of more than 6 billions granted to more than 1.7 million students.

The reason why a 3 per cent warranty cost is imposed is, Mr. Speaker, that statutory expenses for CSLP have increased from 300 millions dollars, in 1985–1986 to 442 millions in 1990–1991.

When a student does not refund his loan to the financial institution according to the pre-conditions, it is the government that refunds the institution and takes charge of the grievance procedure with the students at fault. I do not know if my colleague knows how many they are and how they do that, but it is terrible.

Mr. Speaker, the commitment of the government to helping the postsecundary students remains as firm as it has been since the creation of this program, 27 years ago. Our government is also committed to reduce the national deficit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

PHILLIPS CABLES

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): The workers at Phillips Cables in Brockville, Ontario have recently agreed to an unheard of four year wage freeze, that is zero, zero, zero and zero as well as other wage concessions.

Mr. Speaker, these major and very generous concessions by the workers of Phillips Cables are being offered to give the employers options as they try to compete in today's world market. These actions will result in far less disposable income for the workers of Phillips Cables for several years to come. As President Brian McDougall of Local 510 of the Communication and Electrical Workers of Canada has said, "the ball is in the company's court now".

It is hoped that when the company is considering its plans for the future of Phillips Cables in Brockville, it will take into account and remember the loyal and generous workforce that has made a tremendous sacrifice in their acceptance of a four year wage freeze in order that the plant may remain open in Brockville.

PERSONS CASE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I offer very warm congratulations to Dr. Ursula Franklin, a recipient of the 1991 Governor General's Award in commemoration of the Persons case.

A distinguished scientist, teacher, the first tenured female professor at the University of Toronto and a well-known public speaker, Dr. Franklin has been a tremendous source of inspiration for women across Canada in the fields of science, technology and education.

She has devoted much of her time to promoting the interests of women in academia and to encouraging young women to consider non-traditional careers. Like the famous five Alberta women who fought to have women considered as persons under the British North America Act, Dr. Franklin is an outstanding role model for young women.

I ask my hon. colleagues to join me in showing appreciation of Dr. Franklin's many achievements. She is a person who has made a difference.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I join in the congratulations to Dr. Ursula Franklin and note that Dr. Franklin has a reputation as one being vigorously opposed to nuclear energy in this country.

My concern is about another scientist, a Dr. Rudd, who works with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. We saw reported on the news last night that he is being stifled by this government, by his department, in bringing to the attention of the public certain things which he has found out with respect to the effect of massive flooding on the production of greenhouse gases.

I would ask the government to instruct the department to permit Dr. Rudd to make this kind of information available. It will be too late if it waits, as has been suggested, for two or three years for this information to become complete. By that time we would well be in to the development stage of the Great Whale project which is something I think all Canadians are very concerned about and have come to be very sceptical about.

It is time for us to re-think our commitment to massive flooding of northern Canada as a way to solve our export and/or our energy problem.

FAMILY LIFE EDUCATION COUNCIL

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, Calgary is privileged to have an extraordinary organization working to support families. FLEC, the Family Life Education Council of Calgary, can be proud of the role it has played in bringing hundreds of family support organizations together. It co-ordinates information exchange and referrals among Calgary's family support services.

This being National Family Week, I am particularly pleased to honour FLEC today, since it was FLEC that initiated family week in Calgary in 1971. In 1985 it became a national event sponsored by Family Services Canada.

On Monday I attended the National Family Week kick-off breakfast in Calgary. Some 190 people were present, representing 85 of Calgary's family support organizations. I applaud all these organizations for their role in preserving our traditional values. Their efforts clearly capture the spirit of National Family Week, strengthening families, a plus for all of us.

EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, today the Commission of Inquiry on Canadian University Education released its report summarizing more than a year's research.

The commission strongly recommends that the government make a student loan program widely available, with loan payments automatically deducted from income once the graduate's income rises above a certain level.

Such a program would give low-income students better access to education. This measure could also reduce the pressure on full-time university students. They would no longer have to work extra time to pay for their education, and they would no longer face the threat of a huge, unpayable loan as a graduation gift.

As a result, students would find it easier to graduate. Currently about 50 per cent do not complete their programs. This government keeps cutting back funding for education, Mr. Speaker. This year alone the government has cut $1.3 billion from college and university funding, while tuition fees have increased between 6 per cent and 25 per cent.

I strongly urge the government to endorse the commission's recommendation and take action to make education accessible to all Canadians.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, my government tabled a bill to reinforce gun control. Canadians have spoken out in favour of tighter gun controls. This clearly shows the kind of society Canadians want today, and we in this House must ensure that our legislation reflects the choice of the people.

Bill C-17, although not perfect, is a satisfactory response to the concerns of Canadians that also respects the rights of firearms users. Any amendment tabled in this House must support the principle of establishing stricter and more effective gun controls in this country. Any amendment that does not should be rejected outright by members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-17 is a good bill that provides Canadians with the kind of protection they expect in our society. We are choosing the kind of society we want, and we must do so without hesitation.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, last week the Official Opposition in this House held an opposition day on Canada and its position on GATT. Prior to that, my colleagues and I and my party met with supply management groups from across Canada representing farmers on the disastrous effects of a GATT without Article XI. I want to add my support to those 500 Nova Scotia farmers who passed a resolution in Canning, Nova Scotia last Friday, a resolution that both my colleagues from Annapolis Valley and South Shore have endorsed in this House.

• (1410)

I want to read that resolution into the record:

Be it resolved,

That the 500 people gathered at this meeting reaffirm support for Canada's official position as stated at the GATT negotiations in Brussels in 1990, and

That any deviation from this position without the support of Canadian agriculture would be totally unacceptable.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong support for reforming Canada's penitentiary and parole system.

Key proposals in the legislation will tighten parole eligibility for violent and serious drug crimes. In these cases, full parole can be delayed at a judge's discretion to one-half the sentence from the current one-third.

This bill also adds sexual offences against children and serious drug offences to the existing category of violent crimes so that these criminals can be kept in a penitentiary for their entire sentence.

Victims of crime will be recognized in law for the first time. This legislation is the first major reform of the penitentiary and parole system in Canada for decades.

Protection of society is the primary objective of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

I applaud this legislation which reflects the wishes of Canadians to restore public confidence in the system and make our communities safer.

CORPORATIONS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this week we have three more nominees for the corporate carpetbagger award.

Nominee number one: Inglis Ltd.; 650 jobs lost; moved its manufacturing production in January 1991 from Toronto to the United States.

Nominee number two: Bendix Safety Restraint Ltd.; moved its production from Collingwood, Ontario, to the maquiladoras. The last 80 workers lost their jobs in October 1990.

Nominee number three: Redirack; 136 jobs lost. Redirack shut down on Friday, September 28, 1990 informing its employees of the closure with letters to their homes on Saturday, September 29. It moved its Toronto production to Oakwood, Illinois.

The envelope please. The corporate carpetbagger of the week is Bendix Safety Restraint Ltd.

PERSONS CASE

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise today to offer my congratulations to Jane Manuel of Chase, British Columbia. Jane Manuel is a highly respected figure in her community and in the British Columbia Native Women's Society.

Her many efforts to improve the lives of aboriginal women in her province and her work to repeal the sections of the Indian Act that are discriminatory to women have now been recognized with her receipt of the 1991 Governor General's Award in commemoration of the Persons case. Placing the welfare of her people above all else, she has dedicated many years to working with aboriginal people on health related and legal issues, including child welfare and drug and alcohol abuse.

She has also been active in fostering the renaissance of traditional beliefs and culture in her community.

I am very pleased that Jane Manuel has received this honour for her service to Canadian women.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to congratulate more than 1,000 children who signed a petition supporting the commitment made by the Prime Minister of Canada at the World Summit for Children.

This petition was signed by the following schools in my riding: Félix Leclerc, François La Bernade, René Pelletier, Saint-Marcel, Sainte Marguerite Bourgeoys, Sainte Maria Goretti, Saint-Octave.

On behalf of these children in my riding, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister of Canada for his interest and for the concern he has shown for the children of this world. And here are the petitions, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Questions

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Guy Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, Canada's economy is in a free fall as a result of the poorly designed policies of the Tory government and its failure to act.

The government has said repeatedly that it has to keep interest rates up to fight inflation, conveniently forgetting that its policies created the problem in the first place.

If we consider that the same government is maintaining an overvalued dollar, we have a recipe for creating an army reserve of unemployed Canadians, to quote Professor Thomas Courchene. In fact, the government's obsession with maintaining the dollar at this level is devastating for many sectors in our economy.

[English]

The Tory high dollar is taking its toll on agriculture, tourism and all export related sectors. We have heard enough of the government's pious platitudes, pretending that it has the best interests of all Canadians as motivation behind its economic policies.

The government must stop devising fly-by-night and knee-jerk strategies that imperil our future. It must put our economy back on track by lowering both our interest rate and the dollar.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the world is watching in horror as the Yugoslavian army decimates the people of Croatia.

The world cannot and must not stand by as witnesses of the destruction of a people. Canada and the world must act now. In March of this year as chairman of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association, I tabled a report calling for United Nations involvement in Yugoslavia.

I am pleased to see our Prime Minister taking action at the UN Security Council offering the use of Canadian soldiers as peacekeepers. This decisive leadership is certainly applauded.

The people of Croatia have democratically determined their future as an independent nation. I call upon the Government of Canada to recognize this fact and act immediately.

We must not fail our friends in Croatia. Let peace descend upon that troubled nation.

JUSTICE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court decision was split four to three when it decided to allow the extradition of Joseph Kindler and Charles Ng.

Supreme Court judges Cory, Sopinka and Lamer in their dissent wrote: "Canada has the obligation not to extradite a person to face a cruel and unusual treatment or punishment—To surrender a fugitive who may be subject to the death penalty violates section 12 of the charter just as surely as would the execution of the fugitive in Canada".

It follows that the minister must not surrender the appellant without obtaining the undertaking described in Article 6 of the treaty which simply requires the requesting state to undertake that it will substitute a penalty of life imprisonment for the execution of the prisoner if that prisoner is found to be guilty of the crime. The Minister of Justice did not even ask the United States to give such assurances.

"To refuse to seek such assurances is to give an official blessing to the death penalty despite the fact that Canadian public policy stands firmly opposed to its use." wrote Mr. Justice Sopinka, while Mr. Justice Cory called capital punishment the "ultimate desecration of human dignity."

These words are an indictment of the minister's action.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This weekend, Canadians will celebrate Thanksgiving, a holiday that traditionally highlights the valuable contribution made by our farmers, their contribution to our national identity and sovereignty.

Today, each farmer produces the food that 65 families need. Nevertheless, most farmers' wives must work off the farm just to make ends meet.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to provide emergency aid of $1.3 billion in new money immediately? Is he prepared to help these farmers not next week but today so they do not lose their farms, their daily livelihood?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, according to what was said in the House yesterday and on several other occasions since 1985, this government has understood the difficulty in rural Canada.

This government has increased the expenditures in the agricultural area some 650 per cent.

The hon. member is quite right. The agricultural industry in this country produces high quality food. Canadians spend less than 15 per cent of their disposable income in food.

I can tell the hon. member the ongoing discussions that we have had concerning the third line of defence with various agricultural groups will bear fruit. The hon. member will have to wait. We understand the urgency and are addressing it in that way.

• (1420)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the most recent bankruptcy figures released today show that in the month of August one farmer a day went bankrupt in Saskatchewan. Last year, this government cut farm support programs by $1.3 billion and it has refused all year to provide an emergency aid package of $1.3 billion in new money for Canadian producers.

How many more farmers have to leave their farms, their homes and their livelihoods before this government will announce a program of emergency assistance for our grain farmers?

I would like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture: Why won't you put cash in the pockets of farmers right now—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to remember that we have a tradition in this place that questions are put through the Chair and not directly to the minister.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's new-found interest in agriculture and I presume it is sincere. The hon. member says "Why won't you do it today". The hon. member is fully aware of the difficult decisions that government has to make in order to bring a deficit that was created by the party he now represents under control.

We have in the past been able to address the needs of Canadian agriculture. As I have said on several occasions, prior to September of this year, over $500 million had moved to Canadian agriculture, particularly for grain and oilseeds producers. Between now and the end of this year some $1.5 billion will flow from the safety net programs GRIP and NISA. Before seeding next year there will be an additional $1.1 billion. The producers, the provinces and the Government of Canada have contributed to this action.

I say to the hon. member that we recognize that that is not enough. The Prime Minister has recognized it is not enough. This government will do its best to address the shortfall which we recognize. I hope the hon. member will recognize it when it is done.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as we speak some 7,000 farmers and their urban supporters are gathering at the legislature in Manitoba. Towns have closed down. Something like 80 buses have brought people to Winnipeg today for a gathering to demand action which should have been forthcoming last year, as the minister knows. The government has known about the problem for months and has done nothing.

What is the Prime Minister waiting for? Another midnight call from Grant Devine? When will the Prime Minister and the government stop playing politics with our farmers? When will the government put 1.3 billion new dollars in the pockets of men and women across Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange. I am asked a question, I stand up to answer it and the Liberals start to hoot and howl. The farmers will really be questioning the sincerity of the questioner on such an important matter.

In response to a question from my friend's leader yesterday, I indicated that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture, pursuant to a meeting I had with the farmers in Winnipeg last Friday, would be bringing forward recommendations possibly to cabinet as early as tomorrow morning and that shortly thereafter I would be in touch with the House to advise it of what they might be.

There was a statement issued today by Ralph Jespersen, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, who expressed his strong satisfaction with statements and commitments that this government has made. The minister has pointed out that in this very serious problem of Canadian agriculture, we have already increased aid by over some 650 per cent beyond the limits we found it some seven years ago. I recognize that this is not perfect and the farmers are hurting. We plan to do more, but I think my hon. friend would agree that this attitude is better for farmers and their families than that of a former Prime Minister who said: "Why should I sell your wheat".

PORK INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows he has yet to keep his promise to Canadian farmers.

My question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister should be aware that the American government is slapping a $22 per hog duty on live hogs being shipped to the United States from Canada, a 300 per cent increase. This will have a devastating impact on our pork producers already facing tough times and clearly goes against the free trade agreement.

Will the Prime Minister explain to this House what he is planning to do to protect our Canadian pork producers?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member I know has a longer memory than he professes to have. He can recall just within the last four months that because of the CUSFTA, Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we were able to take action against unfair trading practices by the United States government. We put forward the facts and were successful.

As the hon. member knows, the third and fourth panels found that there was subsidy. We are discussing with the Pork Council to use the same method as in the past for a presentation of facts to a Chapter 19 panel. Once we present the facts, we abide by the recommendation or the outcome of the panel.

We have a process and we will put forward the facts in conjunction with the industry as we did previously and we were successful at that time.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister knows that the U.S. government subsidizes its pork producers in various ways. His government failed Canadians by not getting the definition of subsidy prior to signing the free trade agreement. Now the U.S. is defining subsidies when it wants it and how it wants it just to meet its needs.

I ask the Prime Minister: When is he going to stand up to the Americans on behalf of Canadians and get fair trading rules with the Americans?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at one point the hon. member from the opposition says: "Why do we not define what a subsidy is". I draw to his attention the dispute resolution mechanism in CUSFTA which even he recognizes works and the pork producers recognize that it works. I suggest to him that we are going to continue to use the process to define subsidies.

We will work with the pork industry to present the facts to a panel. The panel will make the decision on the presentation of those facts.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday, Saskatchewan Premier Grant Devine came to Ottawa to meet with the minister. Can the minister tell us if Mr. Devine has now come around to the realization that a third line of defence payment of $1.3 billion is needed? And can the minister assure this House that any aid package that will be announced on Friday deals directly and specifically with the $1.3 billion shortfall in average net income for the 1990–91 crop year and will not borrow money from GRIP and NISA payments due in the 1991–92 crop year?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that the hon. member has a concern that I met with the premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

This government and the ministers of this government meet with premiers as part of our responsibilities. He will recall that I met the premier of Prince Edward Island about a very serious matter within his province.

The premier of Saskatchewan wrote my colleague, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and myself on September 28 expressing his view of the shortfall. The hon. member knows the contents of that letter. It has been widely circulated. The premier of the province last night put forward a very strong case on behalf of agriculture in Canada, not just in Saskatchewan, but agriculture in Canada. We have met on other occasions and we will continue to meet to address needs of the farmers.

The hon. member knows there will be an announcement coming shortly and I advise him to wait. He knows what we have done in the past for producers, he has recognized that.

• (1430)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, today on a Regina open line program, the premier was implying that a guarantee of $5 for wheat for the next five years had been made. Will the minister give this House that same commitment?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member knows, I am not going to criticize the premier's arithmetic. The hon. member knows that at this time the GRIP, the assistance program that was designed by farmers, the provinces and the Government of Canada, a price of some $4.15 a bushel was put forward.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. The minister knows that the port of Churchill is issuing layoff notices as early as Friday of this week as almost all the grain that goes through Churchill comes from the province of Saskatchewan and for over 10 days over 10,000 tonnes of grain has been sitting at Hudson Bay, Saskatchewan, instead of being delivered to the port of Churchill, which is almost completely empty. How can this government say it is trying to sell all the wheat that is out there?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): First of all, I do not know of the vessel availability for the port of Churchill. If the NDP would just be quiet we could try and discuss this because it is important to farmers, if it is not important to the hon. member from Edmonton.

What we have now is a work stoppage in Thunder Bay. To my knowledge, we do not have vessels in Churchill. I say to the hon. member, and I know members from the Canadian Wheat Board district will agree, the mandate of the Canadian Wheat Board is to maximize returns to the producers. The Canadian Wheat Board has done that very well in the past and will continue to do it.

I suggest to the hon. member if there is a reason, it may be that returns are not being maximized according to his suggestion, but in the way the Wheat Board has been doing business over the last number of years.

GATT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations is entering a crucial phase. Canada is at a difficult crossroad. We will be facing strong international pressures to abandon our position in support of article XI, which allows for effective supply management programs in dairy and poultry.

Will the minister assure the poultry and dairy farmers of Canada here today that the Canadian government will not be part of any GATT agreement that fails to maintain, enhance and strengthen article XI of GATT?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as always the policy of this government has been developed with stakeholders. The policy we have put forward, the enhancing and strengthening of article XI through the Uruguay round was developed with the supply managed industries and with the producers in Canada. We have not changed that position.

I can tell the hon. member, rather than receiving pressure to bring about change, I have been meeting with the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary Madigan. I have been meeting with the European Commissioner of Agriculture, Ray McSharry. Rather than receiving pressure from the European Community, I received support for our position, because they believe there is an opportunity for Canada and the European Community to work together to clarify and strengthen article XI.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Canadian farmers want firm assurances from the Prime Minister. Can he promise us today that his government will protect and strengthen article XI of GATT that allows farmers to have quotas? Is he prepared to undertake not to sign any multilateral agreement that does not protect the quotas of Canadian farmers?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member must have missed by answer to his colleague. The same question was asked in another language.

I say to the hon. member that the policy of this government and what we have put forward in strengthening and enhancing article XI in the Uruguay round was developed with the producers in Canada, developed with provinces in Canada. It is there. We have not backed away. As I have said on other occasions, we are seeking alliances within the Uruguay round. The hon. member keeps shaking his finger and muttering things. I am not too sure whether he is interested or whether he is grandstanding.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds. Atlantic Canadian agriculture is in a very unfair position. For example, transportation costs for grain makes it 11.5 per cent more expensive to produce dairy products in Atlantic Canada than it does in Quebec, and 33 per cent more expensive to produce hogs than it does in Ontario.

This government has effectively reduced transportation assistance to Atlantic Canada by 60 per cent.

Will the minister now give assurance to this House that he will respond to the needs of Atlantic Canadian farmers and implement the Atlantic Canada feed policy proposal put forward by the Atlantic Farmers Council last June?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, without giving credibility to the numbers that my hon. friend has put forward, I can inform him, as he well knows, that under feed freight assistance the Government of Canada on behalf of Canadians provides assistance to the agricultural sector in Atlantic Canada. As he also knows, at a meeting of federal–provincial ministers of agriculture in Kananaskis last July there was a decision made by all ministers present that we would study the transportation system as it pertains to agriculture. That means the feed freight assistance system in Atlantic Canada; it means the western grain transportation system in western Canada.

We are studying that to see that the dollars we have put forward on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers through agriculture is being used in the best interests of producers, and that has the support of producers.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, according to a proposal the Atlantic Farmers Council made, the federal expenditures in support of the agri–food industry over the past 10 years rose in Atlantic Canada by 4.3 per cent; in Ontario and Quebec by 9.2 per cent; and in the prairie provinces and western Canada 29.5 per cent.

That does not seem to me to be very equitable treatment for Atlantic Canada in comparison to its immediate neighbours to the west.

A supplementary question to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. At the meeting in Alberta in July, every provincial minister of agriculture endorsed the proposal because they all knew full well that the Atlantic Canadian farmers were getting shafted.

Will the minister give an undertaking to this House that he will respond to the desperate need for feed freight assistance and put Atlantic Canada back on a level playing field, and will he assure us—and this is most important, Mr. Speaker—that this assistance will not be countervailable under this government's free trade agreement?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his previous question suggested that there was a necessity to provide grain to the agricultural sector in Atlantic Canada because of its importance in supply management. He knows better than I do that one of the benefits of supply managed industries in Canada and one of the reasons that producers and governments support them so fiercely is because they take the cost of their production out of the supply managed system.

Therefore, I suggest to the hon. member, if he speaks to his colleagues in Atlantic Canada, if the supply managed system in Atlantic Canada was not taking a double bite, one out of the supply managed system and the other out of the free trade assistance, there would be adequate support for the feed freight assistance in those non-supply managed areas in Atlantic Canada.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Smoke and mirrors, smoke and mirrors.

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My question is to the Prime Minister.

West coast shipyard workers are incensed at the unfairness in the awarding of shipbuilding contracts by this federal government, which denied the promised Polar 8 to B.C., closed down our largest shipyard and laid off hundreds of workers, as the Prime Minister knows. Meanwhile, Quebec shipyards receive billion dollar contracts and the maritimes have contracts worth millions.

What does the government intend to do to restore the B.C. shipbuilding industry and treat B.C. equitably? We also are part of Canada.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, if she has been following the rationalization of shipbuilding in this country, will realize that there has been rationalization on the Great Lakes, there has been a great deal of rationalization in shipbuilding capacity on the St. Lawrence, there has been some in western Canada, and we are looking forward at some time to be able to introduce it in the maritimes.

On the contracts which have been given, I should point out to the hon. member, that the contract which was won in the Halifax-Dartmouth industry was won clearly by that, and the bid that was put in by the west coast industry in 1988 was not successful in that bidding process. They failed.

• (1440)

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we in British Columbia know that rationalizations mean shutdowns and unemployment, not revitalization.

Literally hundreds of skilled maritime workers who are very senior workers have been on welfare for almost up to two years. This is because of the government's delay in providing appropriate compensation which was promised.

What is the government's work adjustment plan and when will these older workers receive their promised compensation?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions going on with the province of British Columbia and with the various maritime outfits out there in putting together a proper plan. We are looking forward to receiving that finally. It should be coming forth within the next couple of weeks.

I should point out that in that last major shipbuilding contract that went to Halifax Dartmouth Industries and Fenco the largest part, the most intelligent part, the part with all the brains and new high technology, all went to British Columbia, to MacDonald Dettwiler. Fifty million dollars of that went to MacDonald Dettwiler.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the crisis in Yugoslavia.

The latest cease-fire with the basic terms being to lift the naval blockade, withdraw troops from the barrack areas, and begin the distribution of release supplies to the cities is the most promising to date.

It is essential that the international community do everything in its power to ensure, unlike previous cease-fires, that this one has a chance to succeed.

Would the Prime Minister share with Canadians what additional action the Canadian government has taken today to ensure strict adherence to the cease-fire by all parties involved and to bring an end to the unnecessary violence and bloodshed in Yugoslavia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may recall that the Government of Canada was the first government to prevail upon the Secretary-General of the United Nations to involve himself and his organization in the great tragedy that was unfolding in Yugoslavia.

As a result of that and subsequent actions taken by other G-7 members, the Secretary-General of the United Nations appointed Mr. Cyrus Vance as a special envoy to Yugoslavia. He is to depart imminently, we understand, for Yugoslavia and help arrange a cease-fire that we believe and hope will be permanent and durable.

To that end Canada originally asked for the invocation of the United Nations special authority. We offered concurrent with that the presence of Canadian peacekeeping forces as an important component of a more global and comprehensive United Nations approach to the Yugoslav tragedy.

We are happy to see that progress along these lines is being made because we believe that the dimensions of the tragedy in Yugoslavia are so enormous that it took more than the European community, that it would take the intervention of the UN Security Council, and that process has now begun.

HAITI

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the OAS, in its efforts to return President Aristide to power in Haiti, corroborated the recommendations of Aristide by calling for a trade embargo against Haiti. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs offered Canadian participation in an international observer team to monitor Haitian human rights situations and to bolster democratic institutions.

I would like to know what specific action the government has taken here in Canada to implement and support these statements.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been very active. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is one of the architects of the policy of the OAS. She very ably and I think courageously represented Canada's interests in Haiti in extremely difficult circumstances. She has participated in putting together a package of sanctions and other pacific means of causing the will of the OAS to be implemented and respected.

We are acting on that and a number of other fronts to try and bring about the reinstallation, the restoration of the democratically elected president of Haiti. To that end we have volunteered, for example, the presence of civilian Canadians as part of a larger OAS or United Nations force. This is because we believe that one of the errors that was made was that while peacekeeping observers were sent in advance of the elections, democracy and democratic institutions in Haiti are much too embryonic to have been left alone immediately thereafter.

There is a very important role for the United Nations and the OAS in making sure that a commission of surveillance be there to assist in revitalizing democratic institutions in Haiti which have not existed there forever and a day.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, in St. John's, Newfoundland this morning offices of the fishermen's union were attacked by an angry and frustrated group of fishermen. They are threatening to do the same thing with the federal fisheries offices as well.

Fishermen are upset everywhere because of low quotas for Canadian fishermen off the east coast of Canada, while foreign nations are having a field day both outside and inside the 200-mile zone.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans why this government negotiated a few weeks ago quotas for next year, for 1992, in zone 3NO where all of this dispute is taking place, inside and outside the 200-mile zone, 6,000 tonnes of cod for Canada, 7,200 tonnes for foreign nations, 1,600 tonnes to the U.S.S.R., all within the 200-mile zone.

Why does this government continue to infuriate fishermen with this preference for foreign fishing fleets?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will not and cannot enter into debate with the hon. member on all the things he said.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Let me advise the House, I mean those who are interested in fishermen, that as we speak officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are meeting with the fishermen in Newfoundland to try to solve the problem that the member just outlined.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, last night—and this is typical of what really infuriates Canadian fishermen—another Canadian boat was arrested, six crew members aboard, by the warship Margaree, 240 crew, and a fisheries patrol vessel. The Canadian skipper was arrested as he was between two Spanish purse seine fishing boats. The Spanish boats were not boarded—this is inside the 200-mile zone—and the Canadian boat had a measly 200 pounds of cod aboard that was being used for bait.

Our fishermen want to know why these foreign boats are not being boarded. What does the government think the Spanish boats were doing? They certainly were not catching a sun-tan.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Another Liberal who talks about deportation.

Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated to the hon. member that officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are working right now with the fishermen in Newfoundland to try to address their concern. I think instead of just throwing oil on the fire the hon. member, maybe for a first, could come up with a positive suggestion to help the fishermen and stop just gabbling at it.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Recently the minister's message to the executive of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees stated that there is need for a better protection of the neediest refugees such as women and children who are the majority of the 18 million, some of them needing resettlement in countries like Canada.

However, since 1988, under Canada's program Women at Risk which has no ceiling, this government has landed only 32 cases of mother-led families per year.

• (1450)

My question for the minister is: Will he undertake to follow his own good advice by bringing in at least 100 women at risk this year?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member is not criticizing Canada and the refugee determination process that the government has put in place. Canada's reputation in the world is one that is envied. We are as a government and we are as a country doing our share.

I met recently with the UNHCR representative in Canada who is lauding Canada's collaboration and co-operation with the UNHCR, and we are going to continue in that direction.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question was not about the determination process in Canada, as the minister would prefer to think. My question is about our overseas program in which the government has announced that it will only bring in half as many refugees this year as the measly 13,000 that it has promised for the last four years.

I am asking him: Will he try to fill that gap with some and more of these women at risk with their children at risk?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the reason why Canada was unable to meet that target of $13,000 is because of the situation in that part of the world which the hon. member well knows.

What we did instead was take 2,000 of this 13,000 target and speed up the admission to Canada of members of the families of refugees who have been determined as such in this country. That again was lauded by the UNHCR which thinks that Canada is doing a super job.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Quebec mining industry eagerly awaits the signing of the next Canada-Quebec agreement on mineral development. Quebec and Canada are about to come to an agreement on tourism, regional development and forests. Has Quebec started negotiating with the federal government on a subsidiary agreement on mineral development for the mining sector?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed received authority from the Governor in Council to negotiate agreements, first on industrial development, forests and tourism, and that is what we are doing with the Government of Quebec. As for mining, Quebec had not originally given it particular priority. However, Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, tells me that he is in contact with the Quebec Minister of Mines and if that province expresses a particular interest, we will obviously be prepared to consider the question.

PORT OF THUNDER BAY

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

The minister sent one of his officials to Thunder Bay last night to meet with both parties in the Lakehead grain elevator workers' dispute. At present it is unclear what role the official is playing.

Can the minister clarify for us what exactly Mr. Edmondson is doing in Thunder Bay, what he has reported to the minister to date on his discussions with both parties and, further, can he tell this House whether he is intending to introduce back-to-work legislation?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I did send the director general of Labour Canada's mediation and conciliation service to Thunder Bay to assess the situation after having talked to the union leader and the lawyer representing the pools. Mr. Edmondson will get back to me later today.

My message to the parties in this dispute is that they should settle it themselves. My colleague is aware that over 90 per cent of work disputes in this country are settled through the collective bargaining process. We want them to settle and we want them to settle now.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the union wrote to the minister last night requesting that he use provisions available to him under the Canada Labour Code and appoint an industrial inquiry into the grain handling industry in Canada. There have been significant changes in this industry over the years. The last industrial inquiry in 1975 dealt only with the Vancouver port.

Will the minister agree in this House today to call an industrial inquiry into the grain handling industry? Also, would he look particularly to the sector in Thunder Bay to see if there is any way we can help this port with its difficulties in the future?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I did speak to the union president, Mr. Daniher and he did bring up the subject of an industrial inquiry commission. He was quite specific in his conversation with me when he said: "Let's talk about this issue once this dispute is settled".

I would ask that all efforts at this time go into settling the dispute.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Micmac Family and Children's Services of Nova Scotia was informed last week by Indian Affairs Atlantic that it had been refused funding under Project Haven for a desperately needed transition House for native women and children.

Could the minister tell us why this desperately needed project has been turned down?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to advise the hon. member that I am not aware of the reasons for rejection.

I am certainly very familiar with Project Haven and the tremendous importance it has for aboriginal communities, women and families in need, and I will certainly look into this matter immediately.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the problem here is that the minister's own regional office had told Micmac Family and Children's Services that its documents were out of time. However its documents were in time. They were in the multi-year plan and they were declared to be the primary priority of the department.

I understand that the minister is not aware of the situation, but I ask that he undertake today to review this situation as there are no services for native women and their children in Nova Scotia today.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the normal means of raising such an important issue on the part of a member of Parliament is to send me a note to lay out the circumstances that the hon. member will raise with the House so I might be given the benefit of an opportunity to seek an explanation from my officials.

I have undertaken to do so. I only regret that the hon. member did not call me earlier, before raising the question.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today, ten million Canadians received a very personal message from his government. Indeed, the government, through its propaganda agency, just sent out ten million pamphlets. I looked through that document but I can't find the Prime Minister.

My question to the Prime Minister is: Does he not endorse those proposals? Is he ashamed of them or is he ashamed of himself?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had seen everything. Last week, I saw his acting leader defend federalism, and now the hon. member is taking my defence, protecting my interests!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: If my picture appeared on the leaflet, the hon. member would be the first to rise and complain that the Canadian government was engaging in partisan propaganda. Canadians know that when the awards are handed out, the hon. member for Shefford will win first prize in Canada for hypocrisy!

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Of course, the Prime Minister's picture is not in that leaflet, which is nevertheless a document of constitutional propaganda, of partisan propaganda and of personal propaganda, not for him but for his successor.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister: How can he justify spending $15 million to promote his successor for the leadership of the Conservative Party?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, having won first prize for hypocrisy, the hon. member now wins second prize for stupidity!

Mr. Speaker, I certainly don't know who will succeed me at the head of the Conservative Party, but it won't be for a long time yet. Also, whoever succeeds me will be Prime Minister of Canada. But you, my friend, never will be!

PROPOSALS ON ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for my hon. colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. According to an article published on October 4 in the Journal de Montréal, the finance critic of the Parti Québécois said: "Otto Jelinek has just revealed the true nature of the federal proposals by saying that Ontario would never have increased its deficit 300 per cent had the economic union been in place." Mr. Speaker, can the minister explain that statement, taking into account that the Minister of Federal–Provincial Relations says that the new proposals for economic union will have no effect on the province's budget policies?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I believe that concerns arise out of the misleading headline in Le Devoir last week which did not reflect what I said to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, nor indeed did it reflect the body of the article under that headline.

In order to clarify the situation, let me quote directly from the transcript when I said, and I quote: "The economic union package does not interfere in any way, shape or form from the provincial jurisdictions at all, budgetary or otherwise. It is not interfering with anybody's process".

I said that last week, I say it today, and I will say it tomorrow.

MINING

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The mining industry in northern Ontario is in dire need. Last year in the Timmins area alone we lost approximately 1,000 mining jobs. Every second day, at least once a week, we hear of a mine cutting back or closing down.

My question to the minister is: What is the minister going to do to help this industry?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member puts forward a valid question and one that is being debated both with provincial ministers and the federal government. There was a recent meeting of mines ministers in Halifax, at which time a number of industry representatives were invited including prospectors and developers.

There are some who would like to see new incentives especially for the junior companies. Most who have been giving us advice know that is not the way to go, and I agree with them.

In terms of mining, there is no question that competitiveness is taking over. It has to. Also, in terms of modernization, we seem to see some of that, for instance in Sudbury and Thompson, just to mention two.

Hopefully we can get an MDA agreement very quickly with Ontario which would help in putting forward not only new technology but also through that new technology getting additional reserves.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): At least the government is consistent. The answer is no.

I have a question for the Minister of State for Privatization through you, Mr. Speaker. On Monday the minister suggested that indeed the assistance as indicated by Finance was in order for Algoma Steel. An official from Industry, Science and Technology suggested that what the minister had said was not the decision or the final opinion as stipulated by Industry, Science and Technology.

Who knows the final answer? What is the final answer? Will there be tax credits? Yes or no.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we have set out criteria for tax credits in those employee shared projects. The criteria is there. The provincial government of province of Ontario knows what the criteria are.

Some of the criteria cannot be met by Algoma and that is why that particular project was not approved. But the criteria is there for certain share ownership of employees. I sent the criteria to the hon. member and I am sure he understands what it is.

PRIVILEGE

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMENTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period in an exchange between the Minister of Employment and Immigration and members of the NDP, there were some interjections by an hon. member from the NDP. I also made comments which I categorically and completely withdraw. The comments were inappropriate and ill advised. I want to apologize most sincerely to this House.

Some hon. members: What did you say, what did you say?

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I simply wanted to ask —

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu raises a point of order, but first I must recognize the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, as somebody who heard the reference to which the previous member has referred, which was a reference to my colleague—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The tradition and the practice here is that if a withdrawal is made and it is without equivocation the matter is over. The hon. member may want to pursue it with discussions or in some other way, but the reason that the rule is applied in this way is that under some circumstances there might clearly be no end to it. It could go on and on and on and there has to be an end to it.

I have listened very carefully to the withdrawal. I regret the incident. The withdrawal is given and that is the end of it.

Is it that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor has another point of privilege? Is it something different?

I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Langdon: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that if somebody is withdrawing something it is necessary in my view for the—

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker: I am trying to make it very clear that it is not appropriate to continue endlessly a debate when someone has got up and made a clear and abject apology and a withdrawal.

There has to be an end to it, otherwise we would be here all afternoon.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, just now, I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister use the words "hypocrite" and "stupid" in referring to members of this House. Is this kind of language parliamentary, Mr. Speaker? If so, we will start using it too, but I still think it would be preferable to withdraw these terms from parliamentary usage.

Mr. Speaker: I will examine the exchange that took place. Generally, the word "hypocrite" is unparliamentary, but perhaps we should consider the context—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: As soon as I have had a chance to consider the context, I will hand down a ruling.

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: I have a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the government House leader and then I shall hear the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow an opposition day.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Essex—Windsor tried to make a point which I insist on having the opportunity to make.

Within the last few weeks, it has been decided that there should be a committee to pay special attention to the use of sexist terms in this House.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty that I am in—and I am sure that the hon. member would want to co-operate with the Chair—is that our tradition and our practices are that if somebody has offended this House or offended a member and said things that are clearly wrong, the responsibility then lies with the House to complain to the Speaker. If something is clearly wrong, the Speaker then orders a withdrawal or the member can be expelled or the member may not be recognized for a great deal of time.

• (1510)

The member in this case, as has been the practice, has apologized. Hon. members clearly feel very strongly about the matter as perhaps so does the Speaker. I cannot allow, just because this is a hard case and hard cases can make very bad law, that a practice build up of continuing the debate.

If the hon. member wants to broaden the scope of the advisory committee which has been raised as a consequence of some sexist remarks, I invite the hon. member to make representations to that effect.

The hon. member may remember that at the time when we had to deal with that, the Speaker made it very clear that there was more to this issue than just sexist remarks in this Chamber. Decorum does go beyond just sexist remarks. There can be other kinds of remarks that are equally offensive to all fair-minded and reasonable hon. members.

If the hon. member wants to make a suggestion to me that this be considered, I will take it up with House leaders. I ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and not extend the debate over the actual exchange, which has been withdrawn.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, my submission is simply this. In response to a particular incident in this House, the House has undertaken to look at the issue of the use of sexist remarks in this House as a particular case.

I request now that the House expand the purview of that committee to include racist remarks in this House.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly will take the hon. member's representation and discuss it with colleagues.

I also want to thank the hon. member for co-operating with the procedural limitations in how far I could let that discussion go, and I thank him.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Richelieu. On the same point of order? On another point of order? The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, there was a lot of noise, so I did not hear exactly what you said. Did you say you would come back with an explanation of when the word "hypocrite" may be used and when not? Or will you ask the Prime Minister to withdraw, tomorrow?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: What I said was that I will look very carefully what exactly was said, the context in which it was used, and I shall report back to the House.

I want to look carefully at it and I give the hon. member the undertaking that I shall do so.

HEALTH

NATIONAL AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, October 7 to 13, 1991 is National AIDS Awareness Week, and for the first time since its inception, this week is being recognized all across Canada. From Victoria to Newfoundland, community-based organizations and front-line workers will work to broaden people's knowledge of all the aspects of HIV/AIDS.

The fact that this week, which started as a small local initiative in 1984, has become a nation-wide event is a testament to the dedication and exhaustive efforts of all those involved in the fight against AIDS.

[Translation]

Still, information about what it means to have AIDS and how it is to be prevented needs to reach many more people.

This week is about awareness, getting as many people as possible to understand that AIDS affects all of us. It is about education and prevention and about the care, treatment and support for those who live with AIDS. It is about joining forces, increasing the collaboration between the spectrum of organizations that together are combatting this epidemic.

[English]

It is also about international co-operation. I announced earlier today that my department has issued a notice of compliance for DDI. This follows the first joint review of a new drug by the United States FDA and our health protection branch. This means that people with AIDS who are unable to use AZT will now have ready access to DDI. This is good news in our battle against AIDS.

[Translation]

HIV and AIDS have been part of Canadian society for ten years, during which the response from all levels of our society has increased substantially, Mr. Speaker. However, with a disease like AIDS, we cannot afford to become complacent, especially among those who do not see HIV and AIDS as pertinent to them. I believe it is precisely these people who need to be reached this week. The compassion and concern which characterizes Canadians can only be demonstrated when every one of us realizes that AIDS affects us all.

AIDS Awareness Week provides a chance to increase our understanding of this disease. For once we understand something, we lose the blind panic that comes from a fear of the unknown, and fashion tools to fight and eventually conquer. AIDS Awareness Week is also about learning how to provide support and compassion for those who are living with AIDS and HIV, their caregivers, friends, families and loved ones. We need to make this country a more comfortable place for people living with this disease.

[English]

Confronting our prejudices is not an easy task, but once these barriers are taken down, we see that illness takes precedence over discrimination. This is a message that can be shard by all walks of life to all Canadians. Awareness and knowledge will empower all of us to better understand and empathize with anyone who is affected by this illness.

Let us hope that awareness of and action against AIDS will continue long after this week is over and increase until such time as a lasting cure is found.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my fellow colleagues on all sides of this House and beyond these walls to do what you can to help in the promotion and success of AIDS Awareness Week.

Routine Proceedings

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, for you and I this week is like any other week. It is seven days long or 98 hours of work, sleep, time with friends and family. But for a person with AIDS a week can be a lifetime of wishing there was a cure for this terminal disease.

This week marks AIDS Awareness Week. It is the time when Canadians should be made aware of the seriousness of the disease, the pain and suffering this disease causes so many young men and women and children here in Canada.

I have to wonder, is it Canadians who lack the awareness, or is it the government of Canada?

The National AIDS Strategy that was announced was a tremendous disappointment. The strategy had no new moneys allocated, only a reshuffling of old money. During the previous health minister's address at the Fifth International AIDS Conference in Montreal on June 9, 1989 the minister said: "The second thing that I realized was that we can succeed in this struggle. It lies within our power. I believe that here in Canada the federal government has a crucial role to play. We can provide leadership to help mobilize everyone to work together to defeat this terrible disease".

On June 19, 1991 the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare returned its final report to the House of Commons. It contained recommendations that took months and months of consultations with expert witnesses to prepare. Among those witnesses were people who were trying to deal with AIDS, both personally and professionally. They said high risk groups were weary of HIV testing and needed guaranteed anonymity.

With guidance from these people, the standing committee recommended that there be anonymous surveys in AIDS research and that HIV testing be accompanied by appropriate guarantees of confidentiality.

• (1520)

Also the committee pushed the federal government to encourage the provinces and territories to develop more flexible forms of remuneration for physicians that will more accurately reflect the needs of patients in their practice. Last, the federal government must adequately fund community-based support groups for AIDS patients and for continuing education programs on AIDS treatment and support for physicians, nurses and other health care professionals.

Canadians would like to ask the minister; what has happened to these recommendations? It has been four months since that report was tabled in this House. Where is the urgency?

Three years ago the minister's department requested a document from the Federal Centre for AIDS. The report was meant to brief the government on the mental health needs of people who are HIV positive and the care givers of these people. Canadians want to know whether this report has been completed. When can this House expect to see it?

It is my hope and prayer that documents and studies like this one are not simple make work projects that buy the government a reprieve to do very little. Canadians want to know what became of the recommendations of the parliamentary ad hoc committee on AIDS requesting the government to create a joint Senate and House of Commons committee to advise the cabinet and the government on AIDS policy, thereby ensuring programs get adequate support.

I remind the minister of what Henry Sigerist, author of the book Civilization and Disease once said: "We must never say that health conditions are good but must rather ask ourselves constantly whether they are as good as they could be.

Mr. Speaker, please let me say this to the minister—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I regret to interrupt the House leader who was making a learned presentation, but I cannot get over— We just had what is called a minister's statement, and the minister is no longer here! Has he disappeared? The House leader is trying to comment to the minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I wish to remind both sides of the House that the Standing Orders say that House tradition forbids indicating the presence or absence of another member. I again recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: In conclusion, let me say this to the minister. Thousands of Canadians are painfully aware of the travesty of the horrors of AIDS. As a minister of the Crown, it is important to lessen the suffering, the sense of hopelessness and loss. The minister can make health conditions the best that they can be.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to act and to act expeditiously this week and indeed in the weeks to come.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, October 7 to 13 has been designated as National AIDS Awareness Week. It is significant that from a small local initiative started by the lesbian and gay community in 1984, AIDS Awareness Week has become a national event that focuses on expanding the total community's understanding and knowledge about AIDS.

AIDS affects us all, not just those with AIDS and HIV, not just their families and friends and not just their care givers. Three thousand Canadians have died of AIDS. Another 30,000 are infected with HIV.

During AIDS Awareness Week we must pledge to do four things. First, we must improve our education.

We must direct education at all parts of society. We must ensure that it understand AIDS, understand how it spreads and understand how to stop the spread of AIDS.

We must focus our educational efforts on all groups: youth, aboriginal people, gays, lesbians, heterosexual couples, the total community. We must help the community understand about this disease so we can conquer our fears and prejudice.

Second, during AIDS Awareness Week, we must strive to improve our treatment of those with AIDS and HIV. This means we must turn our concern and compassion into better medical treatment and improved community care facilities. We must ensure that bureaucrats do not hold up the use of experimental drugs.

I am very happy to see that the minister has announced that DVI is going to be made available. We must expand our health and community care. We must provide support to friends, families and care givers. We must change people's fears and prejudices so that people with AIDS are not discriminated against in housing and in jobs.

There must be an amendment to the Human Rights Act as was requested by the all-party committee on AIDS and as has been promised by this government. If we are truly concerned about the treatment of people with AIDS, we must be concerned about more than just their medical treatment. We must be concerned about their rights and the quality of their life.

Third, we must commit ourselves to expanding research aimed at improving our knowledge and finding a method of eradicating this disease.

Fourth, we must continue our fight against AIDS on a global basis. Canada must continue to help, particularly developing countries, with treatment, education and prevention in AIDS.

During AIDS Awareness Week, I trust all members of this House will lead the way in helping all Canadians understand that AIDS affects the total community. AIDS awareness is not enough. We must commit ourselves to an action plan that improves the care of people living with AIDS and HIV, and an action plan that increases our research so that we may eradicate this disease.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PACIFIC PARLIAMENTARY LEAGUE FOR EDUCATION CULTURE AND ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the preparation meeting for the establishment of the Pacific Parliamentary League for Education, Culture and Economic Co-operation held the 26th and 27th in Singapore.

This meeting was extremely important to Canada because Canada sells more of its exports to Asia-Pacific markets than to all of Europe. Three of Canada's largest six markets in the world are in Asia. Eight out of twenty of Canada's strongest markets in the world are in the Pacific region and 42 per cent of immigration to Canada comes from this region.

Therefore, the establishment of a new interparliamentary organization is of new and continuing importance. The member for Saint-Denis and myself urge the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian government to send representation to the foundation meeting that will be held in Canberra in December.

We present this report and urge that it be followed up with the interest and concern of the government and the Speaker.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

• (1530)

This report, unanimously adopted, is the result of consideration of the uncensored and unexpurgated versions of the reports to Corrections Service Canada by, one, Mr. Weir concerning the escape of Daniel Gingras in the province of Alberta and, two, by the Board of Investigations concerning an offender, Allan Legere, unlawfully at large in the province of New Brunswick.

Mostly to clarify and reinforce the rights and privileges of Parliament and its committees, the committee recommends that the Privacy Act, the Access to Information Act and the Canada Evidence Act be amended to require government institutions holding personal information records or information to produce them in their unexpurgated form when properly ordered to do so by either the Senate or the House of Commons.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-312, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (Canadian citizens residing outside Canada).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is quite simple. It is to allow Canadian electors who are out of the country for an extended period of time, such as government employees or employees who are working for large companies, to take part in elections. They continue to be Canadian taxpayers and many of them want to take part in elections. At the present time, there is no system for them to vote.

This arose out of a letter from a constituent who was in Europe during the last federal election who wanted to vote but could not. He was ineligible for a proxy vote. The purpose of this bill is to remedy that situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Wilbee moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PARLIAMENTARY CHANNEL PRIORITY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That notwithstanding the report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business, concurred in by the House on October 20, 1989, the following will be the order of priority for access to the parliamentary channel during the mandate of the Special Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's proposals for a renewed Canada: 1. House of Commons proceedings live. 2. Replay of statements under Standing Order 30(1) and of Question Period. 3. Proceedings of the Special Joint Committee live where it is technically feasible. 4. The replay of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee. 5. The replay of the House proceedings or portion thereof beginning with Question Period. 6. The weekend replay of the previous week's proceedings of the Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary for giving us a copy of this motion. Unfortunately, his leader, the Prime Minister, did not proceed with the same courtesy. I think that television, televising a circus like the one ahead of us now—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Does the House give unanimous consent for the motion moved by the hon. parliamentary secretary?

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to bring forward a petition from residents in my constituency concerning Bill C-21. They request that all parents, either biological or adoptive, receive the same pay leave under the necessary legislation.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from people in Launay, Guyenne, Villemontel, Authier, Lac Berry and Languedoc, in Abitibi, who humbly ask the House of Commons to consider the possibility of preventive withdrawal for pregnant women as a desirable and necessary option for working women.

For these reasons, the petitioners humbly ask Parliament, when it reviews the Canada Labour Code, to consider seriously the shortcomings in it and to recognize the need to include in the Code clauses concerning preventive withdrawal for pregnant women, with pay, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of 190 residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically from the towns of Kapuskasing, Moonbeam, Val Rita, Hearst, Hornepayne, Smooth Rock Falls, Mattice and Fauquier, Ontario.

Your petitioners strongly oppose the clause in Bill C–21 which has reduced adoptive parent leave from 15 weeks to 10 weeks while, at the same time, increasing biological parent leave to 25 weeks. The petitioners call upon Parliament to amend Bill C–21 with respect to adoptive parental leave and that all parents, whether biological or adoptive, receive the same paid leave to enable them to spend time with their new child or children.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

REPUBLIC OF CROATIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I request today under Standing Order 52 leave to have an emergency debate on the aggression against the Republic of Croatia by uncontrolled and unconstitutional armed forces of Yugoslavia.

A genuine emergency has arisen due to the fact that the deadline for the moratorium on the declaration of independence by Croatia passed as of midnight, October 7, 1991. No peace has been achieved. As well, the democratically elected government of Croatia is under siege by an aggressor and we cannot reward aggression. That fact we established by the coalition against Iraq.

I am calling for immediate debate because it is of the utmost urgency that Canada take a stand concerning the recognition of the democratic, duly-elected government of Croatia. In order to do that, there must be a debate with the representatives of the people in the House of Commons. I believe members of all parties are cognizant and supportive of that fact.

As Your Honour is aware, there is an all-out war against Croatia, including an attempt by the military to kill both the Chairman of the Presidency of Yugoslavia, Mrs. S. Mesic, and the President of Croatia, Mr. Tudjman.

Efforts by the European Economic Community and the Security Council of the United Nations have failed. Therefore, the debate being of urgency, it should take priority over the day-to-day business of the House.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member raises a very important question that no doubt concerns many members of this assembly. But given what the Standing Orders say about emergency debates, unfortunately, I cannot follow up or accede to his request today.

Mr. Kindy: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like you to explain the criteria for having an emergency debate.

COASTING TRADE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-33, an Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade, be now read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to begin debate on Bill C-33, an Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade.

This Act is intended to bring Canadian coasting trade legislation up to date. This governement is committed to working in partnership with our industries for the betterment of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to reserve what is commonly called the "Coasting Trade" to Canadian ships in waters over which we have jurisdiction. The Bill reserves all commercial marine ativities to Canadian ships within the 12 mile territorial sea and the internal waters of Canada.

In the offshore, that is beyond the Territorial sea, all commercial marine activities related to the exploration and exploitation of non-living natural resources are reserved to Canadian ships.

At the present time, coasting trade activities in Canada are governed by part ten of the Canadian Shipping Act. The current legislation defines "coasting trade" as the carriage by water or by land and water of goods or passengers between two places in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port.

Under the present legislation, such carriage is limited to British ships which includes all commonwealth ships. The time has come to clarify this legislation. For one thing, the concept of a British ship has changed since the British Commonwealth merchant shipping agreement was terminated in 1979. The law of the sea was adopted in 1982 by an international convention and the customs and excise offshore application act was passed in 1983. All these events have impacted upon the Canadian Coasting provisions and made it necessary for a new Coasting Trade Act to be adopted.

The current provisions were established in 1934 and were amended in 1966, 1983 and in 1987. Since 1934, a number of things have changed. The most obvious, of course is the offshore oil and gas developments that were not thought of in 1934.

[English]

An important part of both the present and proposed legislation is the waiver system that permits the Minister of National Revenue to issue a licence to a foreign ship to engage in the coasting trade of Canada if no suitable Canadian ship is available. I will speak further about the waiver system in a moment.

Before I proceed I should point out that a predecessor to this bill, Bill C–52, was considered during a previous session of Parliament and was passed by the House. However concern was raised in the other place regarding the treatment of cruise ships which delayed the bill until the session prorogued. This concern has now been resolved by defining coasting trade so that a cruise from Vancouver to Alaska and back to Vancouver would not be included in the definition. It is important to note that the definition requires the cruise ship to return to the port of departure and make a call to a foreign port.

This provision does not apply to the Great Lakes, thereby protecting the important tour boat industry that operates day cruises on the Great Lakes. Bill C–33 reserves the Canadian coasting trade to Canadian ships. As with the current legislation, we must appreciate that there is not always a suitable Canadian ship available or capable of carrying out the task needed. Thus, Bill C–33 retains the existing waiver system.

It goes further by establishing a pecking order if there are no suitable Canadian ships available. In such cases, first priority is given to what are known as non–duty paid ships and second priority to foreign ships. A non–duty paid ship is a foreign built, Canadian registered ship on which duties and taxes have not been paid.

[Translation]

This legislation provides for a number of exemptions. For one thing, a specific exemption is granted to a foreign ship used as a fishing vessel as defined by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act as well as to a ship engaged in any ocean research activity commissioned by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Similarly, exemptions are made for ships operated or sponsored by a foreign government and authorized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. These exemptions will ensure a minimum of conflict with other legislation.

To be consistent with the law of the sea convention, an exemption is provided to salvage operations in waters that are beyond the territorial sea of Canada and above the continental shelf of Canada. It also exempts salvage by U.S. flagged ships in waters contiguous to the United States as permitted by our Canadian Legislation known as the U.S. Wreckers Act.

In the time since Bill C–52 died on the Order Paper, we have determined that there was a need to ensure that no confusion exists during a marine pollution emergency. Thus there is specific provision in Bill C–33 that a foreign ship may engage, with the approval of the pollution prevention officer, in activities related to a marine pollution emergency.

[English]

This bill also recognizes the normal maritime practice whereby in both offshore and Canadian waters ships assisting ships in distress will not be subject to the provisions of this bill. I do not expect there will be any misunderstanding or conflict over this practice.

Another straightforward aspect of this legislation will make the flag requirements for ships compatible with the Canadian Customs regime. These two regimes, while not identical, are very closely aligned. In fact this bill will ease the situation for those wishing to operate ships in Canadian waters and waters above the Continental Shelf of Canada by clarifying the flag requirements which must be observed. The Customs requirements are already well known.

To summarize, the proposed Coasting Trade Act will extend the jurisdiction of the current coasting trade laws to include: (1) all commercial marine activities within 12 miles with the exceptions noted and (2) all commercial marine activities related to resource exploration or exploitation out to 200 miles or the outer edge of the Continental Shelf, whichever is the greater, again with the exceptions noted.

This act protects operators of Canadian flagships wishing to work within Canadian waters and on the Continental Shelf.

[Translation]

At the same time it allows international cruise ships to operate without meeting the requirements of the Coasting Trade Act. As a consequence cruise activities in Canada can grow and develop and jobs for Canadian ship crew will be protected. As market conditions improve more jobs opportunities will be created for ship crew and those in related industries.

Mr. Speaker, I have set out before you and the members of this House the goals and objectives of this legislation now before us for debate. While I have no doubt that my Honourable friends opposite will have comments to make, I believe that you will find that the time has come to bring our important coasting trade legislation up to date. I believe that this Bill addresses many of the concerns of our industries, and will be of benefit to all those engaged in this vital aspect of our economy. Thank you, Mr. Speaker

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise as the Official Opposition critic on transport and on behalf of my colleagues in response to the second reading of Bill C–33, an act respecting the use of foreign ships and non–duty paid ships in the coasting trade.

• (1550)

As members from all sides of the House will know, the coasting trade bill was previously debated in a much similar form in Bill C–52 during the 1987–88 period, but due to the call of the federal general election the legislation died on the Order Paper.

During the time allotted to me I would like to share with members of the House some concerns that I have vis–à–vis this bill. Bill C–33 deals specifically with the coasting trade in Canada, or as mentioned in the legislation and I quote: "the carriage of goods by ship or combination of ship and other mode of transport from one place in Canada or above the Continental Shelf to any other place in Canada or above the Continental Shelf".

Of course the bill explains similar provisions for the transportation of passengers, both within the confines of our inland waterways and again to the reaches of the Continental Shelf or the 200–mile natural resource zone.

The principal feature of this particular piece of legislation is that it extends the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act relating to the transport of goods and passengers from the existing 12–mile territorial sea limit to the 200–mile Continental Shelf or natural resource zone. Furthermore, the bill amends the Canada Shipping Act and places the coasting trade provisions within the confines of its own legislation and not under the guise of the Canada Shipping Act. It talks more about the territorial aspects of the marine industry as opposed to some of the other technicalities.

Under the bill foreign ships cannot operate within Canadian waters unless a select group of criteria is met. This legislation allows foreign ships to apply for a waiver to operate in our coasting trade. If after applying the National Transportation Agency determines that a Canadian ship is not available to perform a required service, then Revenue Canada would grant a coasting trade licence to that particular foreign vessel.

As well, foreign ships or non–duty paid ships cannot engage in our coasting trade unless they belong to a select group such as fishing vessels, research vessels, scientific marine research, certain salvage operations and pollution prevention operations. Other cases when a foreign ship may operate in Canadian waters are in times of an emergency when a Canadian ship cannot come to the assistance of another in distress.

Another amendment proposed is that foreign ships which are granted a licence to operate in Canadian waters will, under the bill, have their licences withdrawn with penalties of up to $50,000 if they contravene any act of Parliament which may apply. Provisions in the bill also allow for the detention of the vessel and its potential sale by the federal government following a non–appearance at their trial for violating our laws.

Although 99 per cent of our coasting trade is performed by Canadian ships and this bill intends to further protect our industry, I do have a number of concerns in a number of areas which I would like to touch upon quite briefly in the time allotted to me.

First, I would like to raise the safety provisions that foreign ships operating in our coasting trade are subject to. I believe that they should be liable to meet every stringent safety standard that our Canadian vessels must comply with. Our safety standards are tougher than those of many countries, especially the United States, and therefore they cost our vessels that much more.

As well, Canadian passengers on cruise ships would like to be assured that regardless of who transports them they will be guaranteed the same safety standards from any company incorporated on any side of our border.

Clause 4 requires that following:

> (e) all foreign ship meets all safety and pollution prevention requirements imposed by any law of Canada applicable to that foreign ship.

But what about any inequities between the laws applicable to Canadian ships and those applied to foreign ships? Will we suffer in terms of safety and of pollution prevention measures because foreign ships do not have to meet the laws imposed on Canadian ships?

We all know that Canadian ships must meet Canadian standards. Of course Canadian owned ships operating in Canadian waters must meet stringent Canadian standards, but what about those foreign ships who apply for waiver? Will they have to meet the same provisions as our Canadian vessels?

Will provisions relating to crew members aboard a foreign passenger vessel be universally applied? Will there be an equal number of masters, deckhands and an engineer on board in Canadian waters regardless of whether the ship is Canadian or whether it is foreign?

I am positive that Canadians do not want us to reduce our standards, nor to increase our danger upon boarding a foreign vessel. These provisions are of concern to many Canadian shippers, whether they operate on rivers in the Thousand Islands region, the Great Lakes or on the east or west coast.

In terms of residency, clause 2 on page 3 of the bill relates to the definition of a "resident". It defines "resident" as someone who has been in Canada for six months and a day, as mentioned in the Income Tax Act.

Some observers have expressed concern over any fly–by–night shipping operation. That is to say, will they cut corners at the expense of Canadians just to make a dollar? Therefore the question is: What is the level of that commitment? In terms of ownership, what about the ownership provisions in this bill? As we know in the airline industry, a Canadian airline must be 75 per cent owned by Canadians.

We would support a similar amendment to the Canadian Shipping Act that would introduce a provision that would perhaps be along similar lines where it is not now mentioned.

What about the provisions of the coasting trade bill to allow American ships to transport goods to Canadian Distant Early Warning Line sites? What about Canadian shipping opportunities in that area? Again, there have been concerns raised by a number of observers whether we should, above all, be transporting goods to our own DEW Line sites.

Finally, clause 8 on page 7 states:

> (2) The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the criteria to be applied by the Agency in making the determinations referred to in subsection (1).

Does this mean that a carte blanche is given to the government in determining licence for foreign ships, or should this in fact be protected and based in legislation?

We opt for the latter because it is a greater insurance that in fact the government of the day will certainly not be able to make an Order in Council that may be against the national interests of the time.

I believe that the minister and the government must come clean and explain some of these provisions during the second reading phase and clearly in committee stage. Though the government may claim that this bill is its version of the American Jones Act, it does not even come close to the restrictive and prohibitory measures that the American shipping interests enjoy south of the border.

Canadian shippers in the marine industry are looking for leadership from this government to help our industry and, sadly, the government's actions in recent times have meant just the opposite.

We do not have to look too far to see that some of the negative policies of this government have adversely affected the domestic Canadian marine industry. One of those irritants is the cost recovery and user fee program. This government's zeal for cost recovery aims to impose user fees on Canadian marine industry companies. We on this side oppose this policy, as does much of the industry.

Do not take my word for it. Let us see what the industry is saying about the government's own policy. First, from Mr. Nicol, president of the Shipping Federation of Canada, who says: "The federal government's cost recovery policy may do irreparable damage to the Canadian maritime industry and its associated infrastructure. The proposal will increase the cost of doing business for some companies by amounts in excess of $1 million per year". He also says to the minister that "there is no way of applying a cost recovery program".

Do not take just the Canadian Shipping Association's word against this particular economic policy. What does Mr. Cresswell, president and CEO of Algoma Central Marine, the second largest shipping company in Canada involved in transporting commodities on the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, say about user fees?

He said in a letter to the former Minister of Transport: "The application of cost recovery is discriminatory and will impede the long-term survival of a shrinking number of operations. The cost recovery policy comes at a time when the marine transportation sector is not in a strong financial position due in part to existing government policy. Moreover the proposed policy falls hard on the heels of transport deregulation. We strongly urge Transport Canada to withdraw this proposed cost recovery policy".

Other individuals have spoken out against the government's policy including Mr. Peter Smith of the Chamber of Maritime Commerce and Mr. Norman Hall of the Canadian Ship Owners Association.

What about shipbuilding? We all remember the Progressive Conservative agenda for government concerning the shipbuilding industry. It was written in 1984 and said: "A top priority of a Progressive Conservative government will be to create a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry". What has happened to that industry since then?

When this bill was debated as Bill C-52 in 1987 and 1988 Conservative members boasted about the shipbuilding policy. At the time they mentioned that the construction of the Polar 8 ice-breaker would help the sagging industry on the west coast.

As all members no doubt know, not only did this government absolve itself from any commitment to Arctic sovereignty but it backed out of the Polar 8 ice-breaker deal and Versatile Pacific Shipyards breaking the government's credibility in the Canadian shipbuilding industry and sending hundreds of workers scrambling for work.

When the government abandoned Versatile Pacific Shipyards in North Vancouver its mayor wrote the Prime Minister earlier this year and criticized the government's decision to rationalize the shipbuilding industry on the west coast. As yet, no positive response has come from this government.

The Alliance of Shipbuilders Unions in its publication entitled An Industry in Crisis states that today there is practically no commercial vessel construction in Canadian shipyards whatsoever. What does Mr. Les Holloway of the Marine Workers Federation say about the government's shipbuilding record and shipbuilding policy? He says: "We are now facing possible extinction in the not too distant future if immediate action is not taken by the federal government to secure the industry". These are but a few of the many testimonials against the government's marine and shipbuilding policies.

If Canadians examine closely this government's inaction concerning the marine and shipbuilding industry, they will discover according to the 1991-92 Department of Transport estimates who the winners in terms of increased funding were. The minister's motor car allowance was increased as was the departmental administration's. The losers were, among others, the marine and Coast Guard sector. Their funding decreased by almost $58 million. In fact, total departmental expenditures decreased some $24 million from the year before. Cost recovery, user fees and no shipbuilding incentives are but a few of the concerns currently facing the marine industry.

It is not only the demise of the shipping and marine industry that has been of some concern for some years in this country, but a general concern that the transportation network, the transportation infrastructure, the transportation industry as a whole, is crying out for some assistance.

We have witnessed in this House and across the country the demise of the trucking industry following deregulation by this government in 1988. For two years now Canadian truckers have been waiting for some government action.

There have been a number of ministers in the interim who have promised relief, who have promised aid packages to help the industry. However, unfortunately we have no such aid program to date.

We know what has happened to the rail side of the equation. We know of the gutting of VIA. We know that there is no high speed rail plan on the horizon. We know what is happening in the airline industry. It is an industry that is certainly on shaky ground, to say the least. It was supposed to be fuelled by deregulation. We were supposed to have more competition. Instead what we are left with is basically a duopoly.

To aggravate the situation even further we have a government that heads into bilateral open skies negotiations with the Americans without even having the courage and foresight to say that it is prepared not to negotiate cabotage rights.

As recently as a few evenings ago the parliamentary assistant to the minister basically commented on the question of cabotage. He, like his political bosses, left the whole question of cabotage rights to American carriers very open at a time when the industry requires the determination of a government to stand tall in the face of American demands.

We are discussing the shipbuilding industry in Bill C-33—and I know that the ministers are counting the clock but I believe that opposition responses have up to 40 minutes—but the question concerns not only the shipbuilding industry. It is not only the maritime industry. It concerns the transportation network per se across this country which has helped build this country, which continues to try to keep this country intact by keeping Canadians travelling and getting to know each other, transporting goods and commodities, and which is under attack.

There there a number of positive movements in this bill in terms of extending the limits of coasting industry in this country. However, there are also a number of concerns which I hope my hon. friends on the other side—and I appreciate the minister's attendance in the House today—will take to heart and endeavour to address in this bill in second reading and at committee stage where the work is really done. Perhaps we will be open-minded, try to make this bill a better bill and allay some of the fears and concerns raised in light of Bill C-33 and, more important, examine the transport industry as a whole and begin to do some of the things that have been asked and which to date have not been done.

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, with your permission and after consultation, I would like to move:

> That after second reading Bill C-33, an act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade, be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is unusual indeed for such a motion to be put at this time. Maybe I was too quick to recognize the opposition member.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent for the motion tabled by the minister?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: Not to the motion, Mr. Speaker, not to the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is to transfer clause-by-clause study to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would consent to the minister moving the motion at this time. However, at this stage I take it we are not consenting to the adoption of the motion which is how I heard you move it. I would like to make that clear so that we have the opportunity to continue to debate second reading.

I certainly consent to the minister having the opportunity to move the motion now.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the motion is to send the bill the Standing Committee on Transport rather than to a legislative committee. Members from all sides on that committee have had a good discussion and there seems to be unanimity on the committee so we have no problem with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is the motion to refer.

Mr. Brewin: What I wish to do is to put on the record the views of the New Democratic Party on second reading.

I heard you asking the House whether it agrees to the motion.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Brewin: Just relax over there. If I have your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I proceed on second reading?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think there is a problem of comprehension or translation. The motion is not to agree to the main motion but to modify the main motion to transfer clause-by-clause study to the Standing Committee on Transport.

• (1610)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I failed to understand the way in which the motion was put. I think we now have it all sorted out. We are now proceeding with second reading, and it is agreed that after second reading this motion will ultimately go to the standing committee rather than to a legislative committee. That is what we have just agreed to.

This last little contretemps was a procedural matter. I would like to state on behalf of the New Democratic Party our basic support for Bill C-33.

However we do have some concerns about the bill which we will generally be addressing at the committee stage. I would like to set out our reasons for supporting this bill and also indicate why in our view this bill is a relatively minuscule step to deal with the problem which it seeks to address, and that is the condition of the shipbuilding industry in Canada. This is a most modest step for the government to be taking. The shipbuilding industry deserves far more. It is a very important industry to Canada which this government and preceding Liberal governments have failed.

In clause 3 the bill states that:

> —no foreign ship or non-duty paid ship shall, except under and in accordance with a licence, engage in the coasting trade.

That is to say trade on the coasts of Canada. The coasting trade is a technical term which is defined in the act. On the face of it this is fine. However it provides for a set of exceptions and it is those exceptions which we will want to review very carefully.

In his remarks on the bill the minister referred to one exception and that concerns cruise ships. The example he gave of a trip from Vancouver to Alaska and back to Vancouver is a helpful example and one with which we would agree. However there are many other similar cruise ship visits which we want to be assured will be dealt with properly in this bill.

For example, as the member for Victoria I am familiar with cruise ships from the American coast which stop in Victoria and/or Vancouver on their way to Alaska. Are those cruises exempt? If not, what is the significance of this bill for the cruise industry, which is a very vital industry for the Victoria region and B.C. in general? We will want to examine that question.

The concept of requiring licences, in other words taxes and duties to be paid by foreign ships using Canadian waters, is in itself valuable. As I suggested it does not go far enough. It is a minuscule step in the effort to do something for the shipbuilding industry in Canada.

Shipbuilding has a long and honourable tradition in this country. Almost from the beginning of settlement in Canada shipbuilding has been an important part of the work that Canadians have done.

During World War II we built one of the strongest, most effective shipbuilding industries in the whole world. Canada's effort in World War II was a remarkable achievement for this country. At that time we built up an enormous capacity to build effective, good, high quality ships with a high level of technical skill on both coasts of Canada and central Canada as well.

The tragedy has been that since World War II successive Canadian governments operating under the principles of so-called private enterprise have allowed the Canadian shipbuilding industry to slowly sink into decline. Today it is barely kept alive by government procurement, in particular defence spending. Every so often communities are given a final respite in the form of some kind of government project which keeps them alive for just a little bit longer.

Canada is one of the few countries with a shipbuilding industry that fails to provide concessionary financing for its own shipbuilding industry. This alone has put Canadian shipbuilding at a significant international disadvantage.

It is said that over the next number of years there will be 60,000 ships built in the world. What we as a country need to decide is whether we are going to compete effectively for that shipbuilding. We also have to decide whether we as a country are even going to compete effectively for our own domestic shipbuilding.

Government studies have indicated that over $1 billion a year is spent on shipbuilding domestically in Canada. Yet much of that is beginning to go outside our borders.

Canada is a maritime nation. Many of its exports are carried by ships. The United States requires, under the Jones Act, that shipping from the United States be done in American-built ships. Canada does no such thing.

The number of U.S.-built ships purchased by Canadian operators alone since the free trade agreement came into force has increased from 10 to 28. The free trade agreement has been perhaps the final nail in the coffin of the shipbuilding industry of this country. However, we still retain because of government procurement policies at least the shell of an industry. It is essential that we on all sides of this House, and the transport committee perhaps can take some leadership because certainly the government has not taken any leadership, begin to develop a comprehensive shipbuilding industry for this country.

We must make the first and fundamental decision. That is that we in Canada can again lead the world in shipbuilding. We have a highly skilled population. We have a solid domestic industry. We are familiar with how it works and we have the capacity to build an effective shipbuilding industry that can compete internationally.

If we are going to do that we are going to require a comprehensive set of policies of which the bill before us is only one small part.

Let me outline some of the comprehensive policies adopted by the New Democratic Party at its convention in Halifax in June. First, we must require that new fishing vessels be issued licences to fish in Canadian waters only if they are constructed and maintained in Canadian shipyards and all present fishing vessels must be maintained in Canadian shipyards as a requirement of a Canadian fishing licence.

We must understand that we start at home in providing markets for our Canadian industry. We must be willing to recognize that we want to build an industry on both coasts, the east coast and the west coast, and provide long-term continuity of employment on both coasts and in central Canada.

On the west coast we have seen the government break a fundamental commitment it made to the Canadian people and in particular the west coast of Canada when it cancelled the Polar 8, the new icebreaker that was to be built on the west coast of Canada. That firm commitment made to Canadians and British Columbians was broken by the government after the last election when it went to the voters of British Columbia and Canada specifically on the understanding that if it was re-elected the Polar 8 would be built. As a result of that fiasco and the broken word of this government and failure of this government to provide any alternative to the Polar 8, to the frigate program or to the most recently announced mine sweeper program, we find that there has been no serious effort by this government to take leadership in retaining and building a west coast shipping industry.

The fishing industry itself becomes a place to start and that is where we would start.

Instead of decreasing tariffs, which this government has done under the free trade agreement, it is important that tariffs be increased from 25 to 40 per cent. We make that commitment to the Canadian people. The tariff would apply to all vessels, newly constructed, purchased or refitted outside this country and that would be strictly enforced.

On the other hand, we call for the elimination of all tariffs on vessels entering the country. When they are imported into this country, the parts and so forth needed for vessels, the exceptions that are now provided, would be eliminated. There are so many loopholes in our tariff policy that our Canadian industry is facing dire competition from around the world. Other industries are given concessionary financing by their governments.

Let us look at that. Japan, with the largest shipbuilding industry, offers its ship owners financing for up to 60 per cent of the cost of a new ship, repayable over 13 years and carrying an interest rate in 1988 of 5 per cent.

In Korea, ship owners receive loans of up to 90 per cent. Taiwanese ship owners receive loans of up to 80 per cent. Many areas, West Germany, for example, provide direct subsidies of 20 to 25 per cent on the contract price of vessels. The European Community provides subsidies of 25 per cent on the contract value of new ships.

The concessionary financing and subsidies that are given by these other governments are done as investments in the industry which provides enormous returns to those countries. We know that in our own country when we look at such communities as Victoria, we see the tremendous value to the community of shipbuilding as an industry. Shipbuilding provides good, solid jobs, jobs which involve technical skills and are an important arm of any industrial strategy for any community.

Countries such as Denmark provide special tax and custom duty exemptions. The Netherlands provides exemptions. It is time that the Canadian government, instead of getting out of the business of providing essential and critical support for shipbuilding, began moving in that direction so that our shipbuilding can be come internationally competitive.

This would include tax benefits that have to be looked at. It includes financial assistance in a range of ways.

In this bill we have already begun to address the idea of goods moving between domestic ports. We would add that the provision should be made that these vessels not only must be built and repaired in Canada, but must be crewed by Canadians.

This bill is an important and useful step, but it is only a small step. We urge its support but we say that we will be making the point at the committee that it must go much further than it has already gone.

Let me just finish by making a special plea to the government in the area of shipbuilding. In the last week or so we saw the award of the 12 mine sweepers as they were originally called, or patrol vessels, to Nova Scotia. We from the west coast do not begrudge Nova Scotia the work.

I had the opportunity of visiting the Halifax shipyards earlier this year, as well as the Saint John shipyard where the frigates are being built. We saw the importance to those communities of this kind of work.

We know from our own experience at home the importance of this kind of work. But what we say is that the government has a larger issue than simply shipbuilding and handing out jobs in one area or another. This country faces a constitutional crisis. It is important in the management of the affairs of this government that the government act fairly to all areas of Canada. Shipbuilding is critically important to the regions of Canada. It is one of those very particular industries that has grown up, not in the industrial heartland, but in the regions of Canada.

This government and this Parliament will be going to the people in all regions of Canada asking for their support for constitutional proposals designed to try to hold this country together. This government persists in handing out one contract to one place and another contract to another, yet in British Columbia it is leaving the shipbuilding industry on its knees. This will add to the difficulties we in all parties will have, of urging those from British Columbia to give support to this confederation.

It is important that all parts of Canada be treated fairly. We ask the government to review completely the approach it is taking on shipbuilding. It must recognize the importance of shipbuilding to all coasts and all parts of Canada and begin working with the industry, the unions and the communities in British Columbia, as with other communities across Canada, to build a shipbuilding industry that serves the public and private sectors, that can compete effectively internationally, as I know we can do. It should reflect a completely different vision of Canada than that we have seen in the last few years, a vision of selling out our heritage as a country and the technical skills we have built.

The time has come to work with Canadians to build a strategy that works for all Canadians so that we can again grasp the pride that this particular industry engenders in those who work in it, and the communities in which it is situated.

We ask the government to listen to the pleas that are coming from the west coast, and to help us all build a strong shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member for Victoria, speaking on behalf of his party, believes that industries generally should be subsidized. Should we subsidize heavily as he says the shipbuilding industry, the automobile industry, or would he think of more farming subsidies? Would he think of other industries that might be subsidized in various parts of the country?

Is it the policy of the New Democratic Party to just build up national debt and borrow more money to subsidize more and more? Does he not think that perhaps we might be better off if we did not subsidize at all? Should we not just keep our costs of government down so it does not come out of the backs of our taxpayers, our children and our children's children, so we would not have to pay the present debts and interest payments we have to pay on a national debt, caused by massive subsidization?

Is it the continuing policy of his party that we should continue to subsidize and subsidize and subsidize businesses that cannot cut the mustard.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, we have been listening for the last number of days, particularly during Question Period, to the agricultural industry in this country making an overpowering case for support at a time when their competitors are being heavily subsidized overseas.

The ideological rigidity of the position suggested by the hon. member that subsidies in themselves are automatically bad and should not be given, leaves industry and the economy of this country completely, vulnerable to international competition from countries which do subsidize their industry either through direct government subsidies, as in the cases, I mentioned, or through completely inadequate wage and working conditions in other countries.

Surely the lesson of the free trade agreement and the disaster it has been for this country suggests the complete negligence of the government in its approach, the ideological rigidity that is leading to the disaster we are in. In the shipbuilding industry in particular a strong case can be made for effective subsidies. A subsidy should be considered on a cost benefit basis, that is to say, in certain industries where we are competing internationally by providing some form of concessionary financing, ultimately the decision is going to be that the returns to our community and to our country will far exceed the subsidy given. That is the business decision which we as a country make.

For us to just continue blindly in every single industry to have the same market conditions apply, to impose for example on the shipbuilding industry exactly the same marketing conditions as on the auto industry or other manufacturing industries is ridiculous.

The government surely must know it by now because it has to look at the results of its policy. The results of its policy is that industry all across Canada is dying and particularly the shipbuilding industry is in grave trouble.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister as he introduced the bill and to the comments just made by the NDP and also the comments made by our critic. I have looked at the bill and I have found to my amazement, to my shock—I just cannot believe it—that we have a bill before this Chamber that is about shipping and ships. There is one big exception. One has to wonder why the exception; I mean, who approved this exception?

When you are drafting a bill for legislation, Mr. Speaker, normally in a department like the Department of Transport, a copy of that bill prior to its printing is sent around to each federal government department and agency. Sometimes it is sent to provincial governments for their input.

I rather suspect that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is responsible for this outrageous, unacceptable, unthinkable exception that is present in this legislation. It is under clause 3. It is under "prohibition". It says that this bill applies to all vessels except in clause 2 does not apply in respect of any foreign ship used as a fishing vessel.

What is the purpose of this? What is the purpose of the Canadian government bringing in a bill which says: "Oh, this does not apply to a ship if it is a foreign ship and it is used as a fishing vessel". You start to think and wonder why an exception is made.

True, we have foreign fishing vessels all around the east coast of Canada. We have Bulgarian ships, Cuban ships, Denmark ships; that is, the Faeroe Islands and Greenland. We have EEC vessels, vessels from Iceland and Japan. We have foreign fishing vessels from Norway, Poland and the U.S.S.R. Then there is a section called "others". That is nine foreign nations, plus others.

What I am reading from is a sheet of paper that is called "the quota table for 1992 for foreign fishing vessels". These things are approved for 1992 by the Canadian government in consort with the nine other nations to allow these nations to carry on fishing activities around Canada's coastline. The bill says: "any foreign ship used as a fishing vessel is excluded from the act". Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting insert by the federal government.

It is very interesting because we are at a moment in time when we have an absolute crisis in the fishing industry. Even the fishermen raided the offices of the Fishermen's Union this morning in Newfoundland, and sort of beat up the place. I understand they smashed the windows and a few other things. These are frustrated fishermen, frustrated not so much at the Fishermen's Union but with the federal government, that the federal government would be in such a cosy position with these foreign fishing vessels that are described in this bill before us today.

Why, do you know that this year, for the first time in Canadian history, those very foreign fishing ships outlined in this bill, and excluded from this bill, are allowed to fish in our waters for Canadian quotas, hired by Canadian companies? That is why it is in this bill today. Now we have discovered it. Oh, yes. That is why it is there, because Canadian companies have been offered by this government foreign ships to catch their own quotas.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Baker: It is shocking. Here we have the best fish that comes out of the water, the fish that a man fishes over the side with a hook and line—that is the best fish that comes out of the water—not something caught by some gigantic 450-foot Soviet factory freezer trawler.

The Government of Canada for the first time in our history, for the first time since we joined Confederation in 1949, is allowing foreign ships to be used by Canadian companies. Mr. Speaker, would you blame the Canadian company that hires a foreign ship like this? Would you blame him? Would you blame a company that would hire a ship from the U.S.S.R. or Cuba to come up and catch their quotas in Canadian waters? Would you blame them?

Why, Mr. Speaker, those ships don't have a bottom line. Talk about free enterprise. They can go out for two months and fish, there is no bottom line. The government of Cuba owns those vessels. The government of the U.S.S.R. owns those vessels.

The Canadian government turns around at a time of desperation in our fishery and says to the fish companies: "All right, fish companies, you can use these foreign vessels described in this bill today; you can use them to catch quotas of turbot up in zone 2-J off the Labrador and northern Newfoundland coast; you can use Soviet vessels to go up on the Labrador coast; you can use Japanese vessels to go down off Nova Scotia and catch squid; you can use vessels that are from Poland and you can fish for redfish up on the northeast coast of Newfoundland; you can do all that. We see it today in the bill. Oh, what protection! What protection the Government of Canada gives to a foreign ship if it is used as a fishing vessel, it is excluded from the provisions of this bill. The NDP stands up here today and says; "Oh, we are in favour of more shipbuilding". Very carefully the critic said; "We want to maintain foreign fishing vessels in Canadian shipyards".

Interesting, Mr. Speaker. Maintain them? Maintain factory freezer trawlers? Why, Mr. Speaker, they should not be allowed in our waters.

No foreign nation today, nobody on this list provided by the Government of Canada and excluded from this bill, not one of them can teach a Canadian anything about catching fish. I tell you what they can teach them; they can teach them how to destroy the fishery. They can teach them how they destroyed it up in the northeast Atlantic and down around Africa. That is why countries like Namibia turned around this year and chased them out.

If we had a bill like this, which we do, in other nations in the world—Britain, France, Portugal—could we see something like this in the bill? No, because Canadian vessels are not allowed to go off the coast of any country in the world and fish or carry on an activity like that, not one country in the world.

• (1640)

Yet Canada this year and in 1992 has approved these outrageous quotas for nine foreign nations. It is an outrage. I brought up one of them today in Question Period and I was looking at another one a moment ago: 12,965 tonnes of cod in a zone called 3M commonly known as the Flemish Cap.

It is a piece of water in the Atlantic that comes up to about 15 fathoms out off the coast. It is a marvellous fishing ground because the sun gets in and goes to that cap. The fish congregate around it for spawning purposes. The scientists turned around last year and said: "We do not agree with any nation in the world fishing there."

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what Canada did, together with these nine other nations in the world in Halifax, Nova Scotia three or four weeks ago? They sat down in the privacy of their meetings and opened a new quota for the first time in eight years, against the advice of the scientists to catch codfish.

Who got the quota? I will tell you who got it. EEC, 6,465 tonnes; Denmark, that is the Faeroe Islands and Greenland, 2,900 tonnes; Norway, 1,200 tonnes; U.S.S.R., 1,200 tonnes; Poland, 500 tonnes; Cuba, 480 tonnes; Canada, 100 tonnes.

We have a bill before us today that is called an act respecting the use of foreign ships. What does it do? It turns around and makes one exception for foreign ships in our waters, and that one exception is foreign fishing vessels. It is an absolute disgrace.

Why this year, we had 100 factory freezer trawlers off our coastline. Do not forget that we have only one factory freezer trawler in Canada. National Sea has one. We do not have them because we felt over the years and governments past always felt that if you brought in factory freezer trawlers, you would have your fish plants on the ocean. You would have to freeze the fish, then unfreeze the fish if it was not good quality and yes, you would probably make more money.

It probably was not a good technology because it would destroy the spawning grounds. This year, 100 factory freezer trawlers fish the coast of Canada with a licence from the Canadian government. We see them here today. These are Canadian quotas for Canadian companies that now will be able to be exempt from this act before Parliament, because that is in the bill.

It is a disgrace. That is all I have to say about it. I do not know what else I can say. It is an absolute, total disgrace to the people of Canada. This morning we had fishermen ripping up their own union offices in total and utter frustration because last night at 8 p.m. a boat was brought in by the warship Margaree, the Canadian warship.

It was a little Canadian boat. There are six people in the crew. Last night, they were sitting between two Spanish purse seine trawlers who would be exempt under this act inside 200 miles. They were sitting there, the captain told me on the phone. All of a sudden, out comes a fisheries patrol vessel and behind that the Margaree with 240 crew members aboard from the Canadian Navy, swooping down.

What do they do? They come and get that little Canadian boat, and they see 200 pounds of codfish aboard that was being used for bait for tuna, and the armed forces seize the boat. They take it away from the two Spanish vessels and they bring it right into port in Newfoundland. The captain then has to turn around this morning and buy back his own fish. It cost him 52 cents a pound for a total of $104 for the fish that he had aboard that he was being arrested for, but those two Spanish vessels were not touched.

An even greater disgrace than that is that in that zone, this year coming up, 1992, the Soviet Union will have 1,624 tonnes of cod given to it inside Canadian waters, inside of our 200-mile zone. The former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans knows exactly what I am talking about. He knows what I am talking about because I will tell you what he did, he exchanged it for capelin. Right, Mr. Minister. The minister got them out of there by saying: "Oh, go catch capelin and go catch redfish and go catch silver hake".

The minister is nodding his head because that is what he did.

Again, Mr. Speaker, here we have a crisis in Canada, and the Soviet Union is shown for 1992 with 1,624 tonnes and a Canadian boat gets picked up last night for catching 200 pounds. Here we are today debating a bill that is going to exclude all of those foreign vessels if they are used as fishing vessels.

I understand how difficult it is to be a minister in a government and to be advised that External Affairs has done this and that and this is the custom to do and the department says: "This is the way it has always been done and you cannot really disturb that." All it takes is for somebody to sit back and say: "Right is right is right and wrong is no man's right. We are going to stop these foreign boats from getting these Canadian licences and from being exempt in this bill. We are going to stop them because we are not allowed to go and do the same thing off their coast". Let us do what Namibia did. Imagine little Namibia last November. Let us do what it did, kick them out and have no more of this nonsense of saying as a policy: "Well, we are going to exclude them from the act and what our party position is". That is what the PCs say and the NDP; we will maintain them in our own shipyards.

That is not good enough. Canadians want them booted out. Canadians do not want them in Canadian waters any more.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am listening and enjoying what are always entertaining comments of the member. They are always entertaining if not redundant. It reminded me of the great western Canadian, former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker. There was a story that went around about Mr. Diefenbaker that whenever he got a question in the House, if there was any doubt about it, it went something like his response would be: "Are you asking me about wheat? I love Parliament". He liked to talk about Parliament and would answer the question about Parliament. So if he did not know the answer he would talk about something like Parliament. I am always reminded of that when the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls gets up.

I appreciate that this bill, Bill C-33, an act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade, was just introduced this afternoon so one cannot expect the member would have had an opportunity to have read through it. I am sure he would not have made the comments he had had he made an effort to read right through it.

With respect to the comment made several times by the hon. member, subclause 3.2. states:

> Subsection (1) does not apply in respect to any foreign ship or non-duty paid ship that is
> (a) used as a fishing vessel, as defined by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, in any activity governed by that Act—

• (1650)

The simple answer is if the member had only read the next paragraph from the one that he got so exercised about he would have seen that all of his reservations are completely covered by the bill. It is simply a matter of his concerns being covered in another act. We cannot have two acts saying exactly the same thing. We simply make this exception in subclause 3(2)(a), used as a fishing vessel as defined by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, so that we do not have double legislation. It is already covered in the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. I want the hon. member to be aware of that so he would be perhaps less exercised and more straightforward with the viewing audience as it were.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the hon. member is relatively new in the House and perhaps he has not read the legislation as carefully as he should.

For years, as you know, I had a job as a law clerk in a legislature and if there is one thing I learned in that position it was to thoroughly read the section.

Does the hon. member know what the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act is? That is the question. The Coastal Fisheries Protection Act is the act the governs the fisheries. It governs what happens around the coastline of Canada. It covers licensing. It covers what boats do. It covers what boats cannot do and what they can do, It is under that act that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans gives permission to the Halifax regional office and the St. John's regional office to issue the very licences for fishing that all of these foreign nations get. It is under that act. And the member stands up there and says: "Oh, but his concerns are covered under that act". That is why I am talking about it. It is under that act that they get the licences. Now it is under this act they are exempt.

It is rather interesting. That covers the hundred FFTs, the factory freezer trawlers, off our coast. There are another 20 or 30 of them out there. The second clause covers them. It says that also exempt are ocean research activity foreign vessels commissioned by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

There were 17 such licences issued this year by Halifax DFO and they were out there fishing various things: mackerel, herring, a little bit of cod up north. There was not one observer aboard these vessels, not one representative of the Government of Canada aboard one of those vessels in section D because they are exempt from the observer program of the Canadian government, and we wonder where our fishery has gone.

Section B of this act here exempts even those vessels that are in Canadian waters. Come on, foreign vessels, you can have a free–for–all here. It is only Canadians who are prevented from going out and fishing.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that this legislation today deals with many concerns that we have with coastal transportation. I would like to put a couple of comments to the hon. member since he shares a piece of geography that is very similar to the one I represent. I would like to deal with some of the communities in that area and one in particular.

Our concern for this government's absolute neglect of coastal transportation starts basically with the cancellation of the northern tax benefits which has absolutely shafted people who live in your communities and in my community. To put it down in this transportation problem is that food in the community of Ocean Falls costs 300 per cent to 600 per cent more than food you can buy in Vancouver or in Ottawa. A two litre container of milk costs $6 if you are lucky and can get it fresh. Everything else, fruit, vegetables and things along that line are almost unobtainable fresh. Automobiles: to remove an automobile or take an automobile in is $600 each way. Health care: if you are lucky you get a doctor once a month if the weather permits. Dentists: one of the residents I was talking to the other day had an emergency, a toothache, that absolutely incapacitated him, a $500 charter in and out, $52 for a tooth extraction. It is absolutely paralysed because of the coastal transportation policy of this government.

Air traffic to Vancouver is more than $500. You can fly to England or Hawaii cheaper than you can actually move from Ocean Falls to Vancouver, Bella Bella to Vancouver, from Kitsault or the Klemtu area to Vancouver.

The coastal transportation policy of this government is nothing short of disgusting. For someone who managed to pick up a job in that desolate area it took $10,000 to move their household furniture, themselves and their kids into that area because of the coastal transportation policy of this government.

In each one of those communities I mentioned, Bella Bella, the Klemtu or Ocean Falls, the Department of Transport has said it is no longer interested in building wharfs to move goods in and out and passengers in and out. They say that in the 80 year life cycle which is up in 15 years, no more wharfs. Their highways are gone. Their transportation is gone.

This bill today on coastal transportation has probably got—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. Baker: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I totally concur with what the hon. member said, especially as it relates to British Columbia and the east coast of Canada. I want to alert him to the fact that the critic for transport for the Liberal Party, the official party spokesman for transport for the Liberal Party, stood up in this House a few moments ago and made reference to something that every member of Parliament should get a copy of. It is the new charges to be imposed, as he said, by Transport Canada on every ship that uses the Canadian coastline because now they are going to have to pay a fee for using the navigational aids, which includes buoys.

Mr. Speaker, did you ever think you would see the day when you had to pay to use buoys in the water? This government is introducing a policy and I am sure that we can make sure that the NDP gets a copy of this so that they too can see what this federal government is doing to shipping.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, this bill is an important piece of legislation before the House this afternoon. It is important to discuss the transportation policy of this government in relation to second reading of this bill.

The thing that I would like to make a couple of points on is basically the deprivation that this government has created in a rational transportation system along the coast of British Columbia. I am sure my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls concurs in the same dilemma that is faced by rural communities, coastal communities in Labrador and Newfoundland. We get a situation where it would be nice to have any kind of a coastal vessel that provided rational transportation.

There is a community where the Heiltsuk Indian band lives at Bella Bella of about 1,700 people, a community that has been there more than 12,000 years. It is likely going to be there another 12,000. They need one thing to make their community work, an absolutely critical thing. They need a roll-on, roll-off ramp so they can connect to barges that come in and connect to the B.C. ferry. That would reduce the cost of food in that community about 600 per cent. It would reduce the cost of building materials 600 per cent or more. It would reduce the cost of moving an automobile or a pick-up truck that is needed in a community like that or construction equipment about 600 per cent, from $600 down to probably less than $100.

This government absolutely refuses. It will talk about coastal shipping but it will not talk about the infrastructure needed to get that coastal shipping, passengers and freight into those communities.

• (1700)

At Bella Bella it is absolutely critical that this government provide the infrastructure to deal with coastal shipping. A roll-on, roll-off facility is needed there and it is absolutely crucial.

It is interesting that this is an Indian community, the Heltsuk Indian band. It obtains a good measure of funding from the federal government through the Department of Indian Affairs, Health and Welfare and a number of other federal agencies. This demonstrates the use, or abuse, of the taxpayers' dollars by this government because it is this government that is paying 600 per cent more for food. For a family on social assistance, the federal government must pay the social assistance at rates that provide food at 600 per cent. It would drop down to a normal figure if the government would simply provide that roll-on, roll-off facility.

Bella Bella, like many other Indian communities in Canada, is in serious need of housing. There are two and three families living in some houses. When they are paying hundreds of percentage points higher than in urban areas it is coming out of the federal taxpayers' pockets. The way to reduce that is to allow it to come in by major hauler on the B.C. ferries. The B.C. ferry could stop and unload there if the federal government would place a roll-on, roll-off facility on the Indian reserve.

This is one of the most outrageous things I have seen in the 12 years I have been in this House of Commons. I have been asking the federal government to consider that facility for 12 years. When we started talking about it the cost was $1 million. The federal government has spent far more than $1 million every single year on the excessive costs for food, shelter and basic services because it has not addressed the key transportation issue for the Bella Bella area, the Campbell Island home of the Heltsuk Indian band.

It is time for the ferry facility. The roll-on, roll-off facility which will hook into coastal shipping and transportation is now estimated to cost $5 million. The cost of food has gone up, the cost of building materials has gone up, and the cost of construction equipment moving in and out has gone up. The cost of plant and equipment for their new fish processing operation has gone up. Yet, that is still an extremely good buy.

The B.C. Ferries, the Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of Transport and the provincial Ministry of Transport could co-operate to place that facility there tomorrow and everybody would save a substantial amount of money.

The policy of this government is absolutely disgusting. It is bent on depriving people of an opportunity for a decent life, especially in this Indian community.

If this was the only problem maybe we could say: "Oh, well, it is just a small community on the coast of B.C." However, about 30 miles away is the community of Klemtu. Klemtu is the home of the Kitasoo Indian band, about 500 people scratching a living off probably one of the most barren areas in British Columbia. Coastal shipping is absolutely critical to them. Yet this government will not in any way help them. Their costs for food are similar. For example, a two litre carton of milk which would cost $2 at Mac's Milk here costs $6 in Klemtu if they can get it.

Just simply having decent coastal transportation that will dock there will help. There are two other Indian communities adjacent to it that nobody will service. However, if proper infrastructure was built in those communities so that they could move freight on and off their dock easily, if the federal government made an arrangement with the B.C. ferry system to stop in those Indian communities, the price of food would drop about 600 per cent; the cost of building houses and the cost of bringing construction equipment in there would also drop.

In these communities it costs more than $500 to go to Vancouver and back. That is an outrageous cost. They cannot leave there. It costs too much money. Many people in those communities are unemployed and on social assistance. If there was decent coastal transportation from Vancouver direct, such as the ferry service or another coastal shipping operation, that cost could be cut in half. As well, the service could virtually be guaranteed in all weather. It is astounding that the attitude of this government is to cut, cut, cut. What is happening is that it is cutting into its own spending. It is amazing what it has done. It is prepared to deny these people a decent transportation system, a roll-on, roll-off facility to connect to the B.C. ferry system. At the same time, it is willing to pay 600 per cent higher costs in food. It is willing to pay higher costs for fuel, oil, gasoline and diesel in the community. It is willing to deny, in the case of Ocean Falls, these communities medical and dental health, and other critical services.

It is a strange thing. It pays for the cost of the housing in those communities at outrageously inflated costs because they have got to be brought in by barge, and in some cases by landing craft. This is an intolerable situation. It is allegedly saving money on one hand and then throwing it away with vigour on the other because the people have to live, must have housing and food. Yet the federal government will pay them as long as they are on welfare. This is a government that actually facilitates the growth of the welfare system by denying some rational development in terms of a roll-on, roll-off ferry service in one area, and denying Klemtu a decent transportation system.

The people of Bella Bella have come forward with a plan. They want to put lights on the airport runway so they can have a reasonable scheduling of air services in and out of there, so that if somebody gets sick and needs a Medivac out they can do it more safely. They need a non-directional beacon on that airport so that there can be some instrument approaches made.

It is astounding. The federal government has been very, very reluctant to provide any of the infrastructure in that community that would allow safety, rational costs and the potential for economic development. It is time both for compassion for the people who live there and concern about their quality of life, which has been devastatingly poor because of the fact that nothing can be afforded. It is hard to get decent housing, it is hard to get food at a reasonable cost. It is truly time that this government woke up. Even with the wrong-headed economics practised by this group since 1984 and the devastating effect it has had on those communities, any kind of a sense of compassion would ensure that this happened.

It is amazing. The government packs off close to $250 million to transport particles around in this KAON development. I am sure it was done as a political stunt in order to help a dead government but certainly that dead government will not benefit one ounce from that $250 million from the federal government. It is viewed by most British Columbians as a joke, as is the waste of the $250 million contribution by the provincial government.

If we had that $500 million on the coast of British Columbia for things like economic development, proper housing, and proper transportation, the people living in the communities of Ocean Falls, Bella Coola, Bella Bella, Klemtu, and Shearwater would have a basically decent life. From the signals we receive from the present Conservative government it is not likely that any consideration will be given to those people during their term of office.

It is my hope that they will be able to move ahead. At Klemtu there is an important project to put an airport in there. The cost of servicing that community with food, other items, and passenger transportation by float plane costs an arm and a leg. Several of the airline companies have asked that this government consider putting a fixed-wing strip in there so that they can provide the community with freight and transportation at a much cheaper rate. So far nothing. Hopefully the government will come forward and provide an opportunity to create a co-ordinated coastal transportation system.

This government is closing down the lighthouses. I do not know what coastal shipping and coastal aviation is going to do. Several years ago when this issue came up there was a huge uproar about automating the lighthouses.

• (1710)

They said: "Yes, we recognize that it is the wrong-headed thing to do. The safety of coastal shipping depends on that". They said: "We will upgrade it. We will give them hourly weather reports. We will give them radio communications and we will enhance the services provided by those lighthouses".

Every transportation medium said: "We need them. They are a safety element". What did they do? They have now come back with a proposal where the public is not involved. They will try to shut them down again to save a few lousy bucks that will put in jeopardy the lives and the transportation safety of the system in British Columbia.

Second, they are now starting to close down remote communication outlets in such areas as Bella Coola and Ocean Falls. You need to have those remote communication outlets. They are saying: "They are not used enough". That is because they are used in an emergency. They are there when you cannot communicate with anybody else.

What these guys sitting on the government benches, the Conservative Party members, are prepared to do is to say when people are in emergency, when there is an aircraft or ship in difficulty and they need a Medivac: "Sorry, it costs a few dollars to keep that remote communications outlet open. We are going to shut it down".

It is time that stopped. That is part of the coastal shipping operation. That is part of the coastal transportation and the safety of the people who live and work there, of the Indian communities in the area. It is absolutely a right of those people to have a decent system of transportation and decent safety.

They are now closing down transportation beacons along the coast. One individual was saying that it is now getting more and more dangerous to fly up and down the coast of B.C. He was describing one operation he was involved in, transferring from Vancouver to Alaska the baggage that had been left from the cruise ships that go up and down.

It turned into quite a nice little business for the airline to bid on, but they said they are now closing down non-directional beacons and radio navigation equipment along the coast of B.C. I do not know what we are talking about when we say "coastal shipping". There is not going to be anything for these people to work with.

Again, the member for Gander—Grand Falls turns around and rightly informs the public and the House that they are now going to start charging user fees for the navigation system, for buoys and things along that line. That is absolutely ludicrous. Of course, they have been trying very hard to get a user fee system involved in getting weather services to save people's lives by getting good weather reports.

They are going to charge people for that. People are not going to use it because it will cut costs. Everybody wants to sharpen the pencil. Someone is going to venture out into bad weather and kill a whole shipload of people or an aircraft full of people.

It is not only in the marine sector where they are trying to impose the user fees. It is in the air side as well. It is time to stop this wrong-headed approach. Nobody puts a toll on the Trans-Canada Highway that the federal government helped to build, and the provincial governments maintain the highway system in the provinces.

Those are regarded as infrastructure for the convenience, the safety of the public and the economic development of the province and the country they are found in. This wrong-headed, stupid approach to charging the people who live on the coast of British Columbia and on the coast of Newfoundland more and more money is an absolutely wrong-headed and unsafe approach.

With regard to the transportation policy of this government, I cannot resist putting a couple of more things on the record. At Port Hardy, the people who live in Ocean Falls, Bella Coola, Bella Bella, Klemtu and in Shearwater all move up and down the coast of British Columbia. It is right on the Pacific Ocean. The storms howl in all winter, and it really is a tough place to work in the marine environment and in the air environment.

Every day those aircraft go out. They are trying to serve those communities at very high cost. How does the Conservative government try to help them? They come along, go to Port Hardy and say: "We are going to take out your BHF direction finding equipment."

When an airplane is lost out there, the flight service station will not be able to locate it and help it find its way back to that flight service station in the airport. It is on its own.

What happens is that as in the past, that thing saved people's lives. I personally heard it happen on the air, using that VDF direction finding equipment. It must be maintained in there. If it breaks down, the government will say: " We are not going to put it back". But it has got to be kept in there.

There is another absolutely blind, stupid thing done by this government in that same Port Hardy flight service station which is a transportation key on the coast of British Columbia. It turned around and said: "Oh well, we are going to save some money. Instead of operating this flight service station 24 hours a day, if somebody phones in sick, we are not going to pay any overtime for anybody else to come in. We are just going to close it down".

When they close it down, they cannot give them an altimeter setting for the aircraft. They cannot monitor whether or not the instrument landing system is functioning. So now when a pilot arrives to take somebody out of the hospital on a Medivac they cannot descend below 5,400 feet because they are on a non-precision approach. What happens is that the person is going to sit in that hospital because these guys have to over-fly that airport.

This is to save a few lousy bucks. I do not know who the government is prepared to let die in that hospital because they cannot be flown out of there. When is it going to stop? The people who live and work in those communities deserve some fair treatment. They do not deserve to be hung out to dry for a few lousy dollars, an overtime shift that could cost somebody their life.

When the navigation equipment on an airplane acts up, which it does, and an airplane gets lost with a load of people, the only thing between them and oblivion is that VDF direction-finding equipment. The government could save a few bucks, but it will lose a plane load of people, and it is prepared to make this unworkable, unsafe and extremely expensive.

I do not know what kind of an appeal could be made to the government members. It is time to look into that transportation system. Look at the money you are paying out in some of those Indian communities for welfare, with a 600 per cent increase in food and housing costs. You are killing economic development. Any hope is lost for many of those people to be able to get up on their feet. There is tremendous initiative there, all kinds of innovations. Some of the hardest working, creative people I have ever worked with are in there and yet they are absolutely stymied by the unwillingness of this government to look seriously at what the needs of the transportation system are, to help the quality of life and to help economic development.

I would urge the government, using this bill dealing with coastal shipping, as the mechanism to look at smaller communities such as Ocean Falls, Shearwater, Bella Bella, Bella Coola, and I make an appeal. When you are paying $6 for a two litre carton of milk, 600 per cent more for bread, eggs, fruit to give your kids, and fresh vegetables, all this can be saved. But for some help, why not leave the northern tax allowance in place. You do not need the money that badly, to deprive kids of decent food, to deprive people of safety. You do not need the money that badly. Those people work hard and it is just amazing what this government has done to them.

Restore that northern tax credit and allow them to at least retain some of the money they work so hard for, and give their children a benefit in that area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

STATUS OF THE ARTIST ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-7, an act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how delighted I am to rise on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Communications, to begin debate on this extremely important piece of legislation.

There is an urgent need to recognize the status of artists in Canada. The status of the artist's legislation has been discussed by commissions, committees, standing committees and task forces for the last 15 years. The principles which lie behind it have been debated for at least the past 40 years. All parties represented on the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture have urged the government to act on the status of the artist. The arts constituency is urging the government to act on this bill and the public at large is equally supportive. Our homework has been done, thoughtful discussion and consideration have been given, and the time for action has now come.

• (1720)

Canadian artists need Bill C-7 because it enunciates the principles through which the federal government will act on their behalf. It will provide the leadership combined with the actions of Quebec, which has its own status of the artist bill, to encourage other provinces to provide similar legislation at the provincial level.

[Translation]

I am thinking of a province like New Brunswick, where our Acadian artists are working very hard to make a name for themselves. I think the Province of New Brunswick would do well to follow the lead of the Parliament of Canada and adopt its own legislation on the status of the artist, as Quebec already has.

[English]

Because, the Lord knows that artists deserve it. Their contribution to our society is invaluable and their creations give an expression and human dimension to our deeply held convictions. Sometimes some people say that subsidies for artists are sufficient and ask why we need to do more. Well, a closer look at the facts tells a very different story.

There are approximately 30,000 artists in this country and the Canada Council provides 15 per cent of its funding, or roughly $15 million, in the form of direct grants to artists. It does not take a genius to figure it out. That is not very much money per person. In fact, it is about $500 per person.

[Translation]

Professional groups working in the performing arts in Canada today have a total budget of $350 million, but only one third of that amount comes from our three levels of government. The remaining two thirds comes from box office receipts or private sector funding.

As you can see, the community's financial contribution, although essential, is not really substantial while the artist's contribution can be quite substantial.

Generally speaking, in Canada artists have a university education—an average of 17 years of schooling during which they developed their skills. However, at the peak of their careers, most artists can expect to earn less than a garbage collector.

People sometimes ask me, and I am sure other members in this House have been asked the same question: Why do we need special legislation for artists and not for engineers, lawyers or plumbers? The answer is quite simple: an artist's life is unlike that of any other worker in this country. Take, for instance, an actor who plays a role in a current play, say for four weeks. In the morning, he might have a workshop or a rehearsal for another play; that afternoon, he might work at McDonald's to earn some extra money, and the same evening he is on the stage.

Now, how would you describe this person from the tax point of view? Is he a student? A contractor? An employee? For performing artists, this kind of life tends to be the rule, not the exception. It is bad enough artists have trouble surviving. It is intolerable that they do not have a recognized special status in this country.

The purpose of the bill before the House today is to officially recognize the importance of artists in our society. It covers the whole area of professional relations between artists, associations and producers under the jurisdiction of the federal government, including the CBC, the National Film Board, the National Arts Centre and the broadcasting industry.

[English]

The bill provides for the creation of a tribunal parallel in structure to the Canadian Labour Relations Board which is designed to be sensitive to the specific needs of Canadian artists. It will do this by accomplishing three tasks. First, it will divide the arts universe into sectors. Second, it will certify an artists association for each sector. Third, it will regulate scale agreements entered into by certified associations and producers.

The principal advantage of this process is that artists and producers associations which are certified will no longer be liable to prosecution under the Competition Act. The tribunal will be vested with the powers needed to arbitrate grievances, to settle cases of unfair practices, and to impose penalties for infractions.

By legally acknowledging the specific working conditions of artists and recognizing their right to form associations and negotiate minimum conditions of work, this bill will finally establish a place for artists in our labour relations legislation.

I am aware that representatives of the artistic community have expressed some concern regarding certain aspects of the operation of certified associations under the regime instituted by the bill. The Minister of Communications has indicated the government's willingness to consider improvements to the relevant provisions provided that any modifications are seen by all sides as preserving the balance and the basic principles underlying the legislation.

Bill C–7 also creates a council on the status of the artist to advise the Minister of Communications on matters relating to the professional status of the artist as well as to conduct further studies and research.

The council is composed of outstanding Canadians who promise to speak forcefully and effectively on behalf of their colleagues.

The highlights of the bill are formal recognition of the professional status of artists in Canada, the creation of a tribunal, and the formation of the advisory council. However, no one should view this bill as the sum total of what we need to do for Canadian artists. Rather this bill is a foundation upon which we can build. It is a stepping stone to examine a whole range of issues which affect artists. We are taking measures to protect artists' royalties from the bankruptcy of a cultural enterprise. In addition we hope to put a program in place which will ensure that the artist receives the royalties which are his or her due.

Recently my colleague, the Minister of Finance, prepared legislation which allows employed artists to deduct some of their professional expenses. It will also provide incentives for visual artists to donate their paintings or other works of art without penalizing them on their tax returns.

These are but a few examples of actions we are taking in this field.

[Translation]

With Bill C–7 before the House today, the government wishes to provide a framework for government involvement in the arts community which goes beyond mere subsidies. In fact, my colleagues and I see the arts world as a dynamic and growing industry that goes to the very heart of our identify and deserves government support.

• (1730)

I am convinced that Bill C–7 will improve the status of the artist in Canada, but I would also like to address some doubts that have been voiced in this respect.

Some members of the arts community said they were afraid that decisions by the tribunal on the status of employee or dependent contractor, as opposed to independent contractor, might be reviewed and reversed by the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Let me say right now that this cannot happen. The Canada Labour Relations Board will not be able to review the decisions of this tribunal, any more than the tribunal will be able to review those of the Canada Labour Relations Board. All appeals will be heard by the Federal Court of Appeal, which will have sole review jurisdiction over the Board and the new tribunal.

[English]

Canadian artists represent a dynamic pool of talent upon which numerous industries draw. Obviously the performing arts, but also broadcasting, book publishing, sound recording and film industries, our newspapers, magazines and reviews, draw upon them. Our educational system is learning to draw upon them.

This talent pool is absolutely vital to Canadian interests in terms of our identity, our shared cultures, and our social and economic well-being.

This bill is so elementary, so straightforward, so absolutely necessary that it should not require massive debate. It will finally, after 40 years of discussion and debate, give us the foundation from which we can move forward on a whole range of policies.

[Translation]

—Mr. Speaker, I therefore move:

That Bill C-7, an Act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada, be referred, after second reading, to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their place.

[Translation]

And fewer than five members having risen

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Fewer than five members have risen. Pursuant to Standing Order 73(3)(b), the motion is deemed adopted.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on second reading of this most needed piece of legislation.

I want to begin by doing something that I do not often do, which is agreeing whole-heartedly with the Minister for Employment and Immigration. The hon. minister said today that this bill should not be taken as the sum total of government policy on status of the artist, that it should be taken as a foundation. What I agree with in particular in his words is when he said it should be taken as a stepping stone. Perhaps the stepping stone analogy is a good one, when we talk about bills of this nature and even when we talk about the process of development of legislation within the Chamber.

I would hope that the stepping stone that the government has introduced to date will be added to with more stepping stones and a stronger foundation when it indeed goes to committee for further review and for possible amendment.

I would like to quote from the Applebaum-Hébert report, the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee of 1982, when it was said: "The largest subsidy to cultural life in Canada comes from unpaid and underpaid labour of artists, from the artists themselves".

That is probably the truest comment that has been made, not I must admit on the status of artists in Canada alone, but on the status of artists of artists world-wide. It is probably true in any country of the world that artists are the major subsidizers of culture and cultural life.

We come to realize this. It was nine years ago that a federal committee made the statement and told us this. The difference is that we have an opportunity to assist the artistic community and to remove some of that incredibly onerous burden of being the main subsidizers of cultural life in Canada.

I think it is particularly apt that this bill should come forward at this stage in our development, at this stage in our history when we are all so concerned with our national identity, with questions of national unity, and when we are all looking for the ties that will bring us together as opposed to those that will push us apart.

Bill C-7 had its beginnings 11 years ago when Canada signed the UNESCO recommendation to consider the implementation of a broad range of policies to recognize and encourage the development of the role of the professional artist within society. That UNESCO resolution included funding, training, professional status for artists, access to social programs such as health care, pensions and unemployment insurance, and protection from unfair labour practices.

Pursuant to that, in 1986 the hon. minister of culture of the day appointed Gratien Gélinas and Paul Celene to consult with Canadian creators to develop recommendations for the federal government as to how to implement the spirit of the UNESCO declaration.

The 41 recommendations made dealt in the main with measures which fall under federal government's domain. The very first recommendation that the government acted upon was the creation of the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artists.

Under the co-chairmanship of Paul Celene and Henri Dominique Perras, it included representation from major disciplines in the arts. It developed draft legislation referred to as the Canadian Artists' Code with the Department of Communications and other departments of the federal government.

In 1989 the then Minister of Communications appeared before the committee on communications and culture regarding various policy options on the status of the artist. That committee eventually made 11 recommendations in its report to the government.

In May 1990 the government tabled its response to the standing committee and promised the following measures: first, to extend the right to collective bargaining for self-employed artists and the creation of appropriate administrative procedures; second, to create a permanent body, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of the Artist, to advise the government on a continual basis on ways to improve the socio-economic conditions of professional artists; third, to provide a maximum $1,000 employment cost deduction for employed professional artists; fourth, to provide a mechanism through which visual artists can donate works of art from inventory for tax credits; fifth, to protect the royalties of artists from the bankruptcy of a producer; sixth, to recognize the right for compensation for public use of works of art; and, seventh, to provide a statement of fundamental principles.

The absolute necessity of this bill having the teeth to deal with the recommendations promised by the government can be seen by anyone who has had anything to do with almost any segment of the artistic community of this country.

We have across this country thousands of people who live basically a hand to mouth existence. It is an amazing thing that two years ago I attended the ACTRA lobby on the Hill. It was a very exciting day to meet face to face with some of the most revered and respected actors on the Canadian theatre, television and movie scene.

I spoke to one woman who shall go nameless, but her name would be instantly recognizable across this country, and she told me that for the year just past she had made in the vicinity of $4,400 in her profession. It is a ludicrous amount of money. We know that.

Frequently, as artists will tell you themselves, they do not have much choice in the matter. There is something in the God-given talent that they have that says to them: "I must do this. I don't have a choice. If I don't do this, my life is not working the right way. I am not happy". It is unfortunate that in pursuing the muse, in pursuing the talent that they were born with, they are forced to live in what does not even come close to a poverty line existence in this country.

It is something that we cannot as a nation go along with any longer. Some 500, 600 or 700 years ago in Europe actors were considered to be gypsies and to be a class of people just barely above robbers, highway men, thugs and thieves. Even then when bands of actors and entertainers came to villages and towns across western Europe everyone turned out because it was something that brought together the spirit of the community, that made people able to face their lives which in those times were particularly terrible with a lighter heart, with a better feeling about themselves, and with an opportunity to learn something perhaps about another part of their own country, about a different country, whatever.

I do not think there is any question and I do not think there is anyone in this House who does not agree that the existence of a vibrant, active, creative artistic community is an absolute essential to the existence of a vibrant and creative Canada.

There are two kinds of contributions that they make. We have talked a bit about the cultural contribution. Those creative people, playwrights, artisans, crafts people, directors, choreographers, film makers, the producers of radio programs and on and on, all of the different creative arts that we are fortunate to have in this country, also create jobs. If they were paid what they were worth, if they were paid even close to what they were worth, they would be expanding the tax base in this country as well. It is in the best interest of all of us to see that their financial situation is improved and augmented in the best way we possibly can.

It used to be, again in the European tradition, that wealthy individuals would sponsor certain artists. It is doubtful we would have the great treasures of Michelangelo were it not for the Medici. It is doubtful that we would have the writings of Shakespeare were it not for the patronage of the Earl of Surrey. It is doubtful whether we would have many of the great works of art, literature and music that form the basis of the cultural of western civilization, were it not for the patronage of the wealthy. There still is a role for that to a degree. That is why we see private foundations and private donations to the arts. There is a place for that. However, in the modern nation state that is Canada the major benefactor for the arts, to ensure that the arts develop in line with the national vision that we are defining and redefining every day as we speak, has to be the government.

The government has a responsibility to be the Medici of the latter part of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st in Canada.

The government has to set the policy and the standard. Otherwise, the regional pulls, the various cultural pulls might create an imbalance and we do not want an imbalance. We want to see a sense of fairness and we want to see the continuation of the vertical mosaic, not the melting pot that is Canada.

These contributions are what enable us to define and distinguish ourselves as a nation different from and unique among other nations. We must provide an adequate network of support which would be an enabling factor in the improvement of the socioeconomic status of the artist.

We know that the cultural sector has been weakened, and weakened severely, by the free trade agreement. Although I believe that every member of this House firmly believes that culture should not be on the table in the new round of free trade talks between Canada, the United States and Mexico, does anyone seriously believe that if Carla Hills, the American trade representative, says it is on the table Canada is not going to have to discuss it, at the very least, at some point? The scales have to fall from the eyes of hon. members on the government side. Ms. Hills is not to be trifled with. If she says she is going to talk about it I think she is going to talk about it.

While I am delighted to hear the protestations of the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Communications, the Prime Minister and other members of government that culture is not on the table it is going to take more than mere words to protect Canada's cultural industries and Canada's cultural creators from that massive cultural machine to the south of us.

As we sit on our side of the longest undefended border in the world, we know that on every television set in this country and on every radio station we are inundated with American television programs and American music, we are inundated with American literature, American motion pictures, American newspapers, American magazines, and so on and so on.

Amazingly in spite of this, Canadian cultural industries and Canadian creators and artists have managed to survive and even thrive in what has not been a garden adequately watered.

I remember as a child delighting in the few Canadian productions I used to see on the fledgling CBC. I remember when television first came, at least when it first came to Cape Breton Island, and I remember watching a Canadian Howdy Doody instead of an American Howdy Doody. I remember watching Robin MacNeil, now a co–host of the MacNeil–Lehrer Report on public broadcasting in the United States, do a wonderful program for children out of CBC Ottawa called: "Let's Go to the Museum". I remember watching puppet shows that were Canadian, produced in Montreal. I remember watching a librarian from Toronto, whose name I believe was Beth Gilanders, on a show called Hidden Pages on early television get Canadian children interested in going to libraries. All of these things were wonderful and we have always done reasonably well in cultural endeavours relating to children. We give ourselves a good start but then there is this vast wasteland in between. That wasteland begins at the age when children become teenagers and start to develop their own interests in cultural matters.

• (1750)

As a teenager I do not think that I saw a movie made in Canada. They were not being made in Canada, with the possible exception of short subjects before feature presentations fortunately made and kept alive by the National Film Board. I certainly was an adult—I believe I had finished university—before I saw my first Canadian-made feature film. There was one exception, the movie The Little Kidnappers made in Cape Breton in the late forties or early fifties shown when I was a child. However for the next 25 years there was nothing else.

Over the last 15 years we have seen a tremendous rebirth, a renaissance, or perhaps first birth, of Canadian culture in the making of films, the writing of plays, and the creation of literature. We have a literature in Canada that can stand on its own with any other. The fact that some of our greatest writers happen to be women is merely an added attraction of our cultural industry.

It says something to young Canadians, and to older Canadians as well, when they turn on their television set and see a program that is clearly set in a Canadian city or in a Canadian rural area. It gives them a sense of self within their national context. It gives them a sense that this is what their country is creating and that it relates to them. For the young Canadian in Birdall, Manitoba, seeing a movie set in Montreal gives him a sense of identity and connection with another part of the country. He says to himself: "That was made in my country, and that is important to me, and that adds to my sense of identity as a Canadian".

I happen to be spending more time talking about actors but I suppose it is because that is the cultural industry I have been fortunate enough to be somewhat close to. I think of an actor such as Kenneth Welch and remind everyone of his magnificent portrayal in the mini series based on the Thatcher murder case. Ratings on the network that showed this mini series in Britain a couple of months ago were the highest ever recorded in the British Isles. That is a Canadian-made series with Canadian actors based on a Canadian situation. We can compete, in both our official languages, with any other country in the world and do well, not only do well but excel.

Everything must be done to support the position of those creators of this culture and to safeguard the position of those who mirror the values of our society, the political, social, ethical and economic values of this country. We must protect our ability to exercise our sovereign rights as a nation with respect to a strong cultural sector.

In May 1990 when the government tabled its response there was a tremendous response from the cultural communities themselves. Bill C-7 has two major domains. First, labour relations. The legislation provides self-employed artists the right to be allowed to collectively bargain through their organization. In order to receive recognition for the purposes of collective bargaining, organizations will seek certification from an independent commission to be known as the Canadian Artists and Producers Professional Relations Tribunal. We applaud this, but there are concerns relating to clause 22(2). This clause states: "No artists association may be certified if any of its bylaws has the effect of prohibiting its members from working with artists who are not members, are former members or have been suspended or expelled from the associations for reasons other than professional misconduct".

It is the understanding of ACTRA that Bill C-7 will thus prohibit closed shop in the cultural field.

The goal of such legislation should be not so much to prohibit the entry of performers, but to ensure that Canadian performers are assured of employment opportunities. There is no question that art should be international. There are great artists we would want to see perform in our country and there are certain circumstances where we would be mad not to permit this.

The situation that comes to my mind first and foremost is the one that surrounded the transfer of the musical Miss Saigon from London to New York. As most of you who are familiar with the cultural industries are aware, the American performers' unions made a concerted effort to say that there were American actors who could have played the role. That is the point. It is not to take anything away from the British actor who originated the part, but there were American actors who could play the role.

I think there are exceptions to this that we have to deal with in Canada, as in any other country. When I think of the great Maggie Smith, John Gielgud and great actors from various countries in the world, when we have the opportunity to have them in our midst, we should be grateful and take that on.

However as with any profession, the kings and queens if you will, are few and far between and the vast majority of the performers are good, solid, journeymen professionals who can do the job. There are just as many in Canada as there are in any other country.

The particular fear surrounding 22(2) is that Canada is opening up its cultural borders in this particular area when other countries are closing theirs down. We have to create a balance that supports our own home grown actors, who are as fine as any in the world, who are envied the world over. We have to set up a situation whereby there would be reciprocity between different countries. We can do this, but we have to say to our own actors: "You are good enough. We do not need to import someone. When productions are being done in this country, you are going to have the first shot".

The Canadian Conference on the Arts, in speaking of the creation of the Canadian Council on the Status of the Artist, has called for the council to be managed at arms length from the Department of Communications and any other government department or agency for it to be the most effective. We support this and we are sure that this will be the end result of the creation of the council.

The Liberal Party supports the bill, but really hopes to see improvements at committee stage because we feel it does not go far enough. It only marginally improves the socioeconomic status of Canadian artists and does not fulfil the government's own promises in response to the standing committee's report of December 1989.

What is missing are taxation provisions, bankruptcy protection, compensation for public use of art works and access to social benefit programs. Artists are still waiting for the government to take action on the income averaging provisions.

The standing committee recommended that artists be given the right to stabilize their income by setting aside a part of their artistic income in an artistic account on which tax liability would be deferred and that the Income Tax Act be amended accordingly. The government only promises to examine income averaging provisions as it seems to be its view that such allowances already exist through liberalized RRSP rules.

• (1800)

The response of the Canadian Conference on the Arts is that the RRSP solution is seriously flawed. RRSPs were created to provide pension incomes, not to serve as an income averaging device. This is a very specialized situation and one that needs a very specialized response. Bill C–7 does not address the government's commitment to protect artists' royalties from the bankruptcy of producers.

On the recognition of the right of compensation for the public use of artwork, the bill remains silent on the right of compensation by the government for the public use of works of art.

Clause 2(e) recognizes the importance of compensation but it does not provide for any formal recognition or mechanism so that that compensation may be paid.

With regard to the access of social benefit programs, many artists are self–employed and unable to benefit from health or income security plans and unemployment insurance plans. That is why the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture recommended that proposed legislation give artists who are represented by certified professional associations the right to be an employee for unemployment insurance purposes on that part of income generated from salaried employees. The UI Act should be amended accordingly and the Minister of Communications should explore the demand for and the viability of establishing private group benefit plans for creative artists.

That is what the need is, Madam Speaker, and I know how well you know that.

The government's response to the first recommendation was to continue to examine the eligibility criteria of the UI program with a view to expanding coverage to artists within the framework of the UI Act.

The government's response to the second recommendation was to pass the issue over to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of the Artist to propose options to solve the problem.

With the greatest of respect and as much as we want this bill, I think that we can find the options now and I hope that we will be able to do so within the amendment process. We feel that the government has failed to adequately address and act upon the four unanimous recommendations of the standing committee.

If the government is committed to improving the socioeconomic status of the artist and I believe it is, it would also provide adequate funding for the CBC so that job cuts are not so necessary.

It would remove tax on books and magazines and newspapers because this tax is causing fewer publications to be purchased and fewer authors to be published.

It would restore postal subsidies to Canadian magazines.

If the government is committed to fostering and promoting the Canadian film industry, it would fight the American domination of cinema screens by introducing the long awaited film distribution bill.

This bill is, in the words of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, a first step, a foundation, a stepping stone. But we need more than just a stepping stone. We need a bridge, and we need a strong foundation. It is my firm belief that that firm foundation can be built on this bill as it stands with a few changes, a few amendments. I firmly believe that it is the desire of the government and all members of this House to ensure that as a group, the artists of this country deserve the best that we can give them. They are utterly and intrinsically important to our cultural survival, our sense of self, our sense of identity as Canadians, our ability to communicate among ourselves, to ourselves and about ourselves.

I believe all of us who sit in this House represent artists. There is not a riding in this country that does not have its artistic contingent. All of us—I know I certainly feel this way—have almost an envy, if I can use that in the best sense of the word, for those people who have been given the talent, drive, ambition and perseverance to continue to create in an atmosphere that does not foster creativity. They continue to create when they could make more money and have more security elsewhere. They continue to create when, because it has taken us such a very long time to get even to this point, they must sometimes wonder if we are listening here, if we are aware of what it is they are trying to do and if we care.

I think, Madam Speaker, that we do care. We care very much. We care for the artists in this country because we know how important they are, just as everyone of us in this House cares for this country and, I pray, is determined to preserve it. Part of that preservation, a very major part, is the cultural input of creative artists in this country.

Therefore I say in conclusion that this bill is a good first step. It needs some improvement. I cannot wait to get to the part where we are allowed to make those improvements.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I think it is tempting to perhaps cite the irony of the fact that this legislation, Bill C–7, which is the bill to recognize the status of the artists in this country, should be presented by a government that has conferred such significant cuts on the cultural institutions in this country. It has imposed a GST on books and has put the cultural industries of this country at risk by the free trade agreement that was negotiated in the past and a trilateral free trade agreement now in the process of being negotiated. It is a government that has failed as yet to provide sufficient protection for Canadian film distributors.

I think that that would be perhaps mean and inappropriate at a time when the artists of this country have for the first time achieved what they have been seeking for so long. They have achieved recognition of their status as an important part of this country and as professionals in this country with the protections that they ought to have as workers, artists and professionals.

I am going to say a great deal during this debate about the significant contributions that those whom we describe as artists provide to this nation. I think there is a danger that in treating them in the abstract in an idealized and perhaps philosophical manner, citing the historic contributions that they have made to the human psyche and the way in which they have reflected the best of our imaginations and our creativity, we will glamorize them too much and probably see worth in glamorizing even the starving artist.

The fact is that our artists, our performers, have to grapple with the same economic hard times as the rest of Canada Being the parent of two artists, one a dancer and singer and the other a singer, I must say that as a parent, proud as I am of their talents and skills, I cannot help but say that I feel a gnawing concern about their financial futures. The starving artist is in fact too much of a reality.

For example in 1990 ACTRA members earned an average of $8,540 from work as professional performers, writers and broadcast journalists in the recorded media.

• (1810)

Revenue Canada information indicates that professional artists are among the lowest paid groups of workers in society. In fact they are the lowest paid group in society. They earn less than pensioners. Self-employed artists in this country earned an average annual income of around $16,000 in 1988. This small pittance was not earned without hard work and without having gone through a great deal of training and apprenticeship in their crafts.

The average artist has acquired 17 years experience in his or her artistic field and devotes from 35 to 45 hours a week to their crafts. So there is a significant need to attach to the status of the arts the appropriate economic return to ensure that artists and their families can survive.

The New Democratic Party supports this legislation because the New Democratic Party supports the arts and the artists' place in this nation, not because it is politically convenient but because the arts is an important component of Canada's well-being.

We see the work of the artistic community as being somewhat complementary to the goals of our own party. That is to improve and enrich the lives of Canadian citizens. That is not just in an abstract way. There are significant economic benefits that accrue from the creativity of artists. It is one of the most important portions of our economy and those who are engaged in this enterprise should be aptly rewarded.

In supporting Bill C-7 we are acting in accord with our past record in supporting legislation, as we did for a revised Copyright Act, that would enhance the status and the economic returns for those who are engaged in the creative arts.

Bill C-7 comes at an interesting time. It comes at a time when we are trying to define ourselves and determine what gives us unity. We must recognize that an important part of this projection of our unity and the identification of what constitutes the basis for our national unity is the contribution of the country's painters, writers, performers, designers and poets. They must be recognized as important to crystallising that identity.

We support Bill C-7 because it recognizes the important contribution of artists to the cultural, social, economic and political enrichment of Canada, as well as the right of artists and producers to freedom of association and expression. It does indeed give legislative force to their recognition as professionals.

It also calls for the establishment of a permanent Canadian Council on the Status of the Artist with a mandate to promote the interests of artists not only to the Minister of Communications but generally throughout this nation, to enhance the status of the arts and artists, and to maintain close association with those organizations that represent the artistic disciplines across Canada.

Most important, with respect to the desperate economic straits of professional artists, Bill C-7 provides for a Canadian artists and producers professional relations tribunal which will be responsible for overseeing the collective bargaining process in the arts and culture sector, including the recognition of professional associations and the creation of a process for negotiation ending in arbitration.

This is an important step which recognizes the unique position and unique needs of artists and separates them from the purview in most aspects of the Canadian Labour Relations Act. The tribunal in defining the professional status of artists will determine whether, for example, a person is a producer or an artist or whether an independent contractor is a professional artist or not.

This is a positive move, according to artists, toward the same rights as other workers and other professionals have. There are, however, significant flaws in the legislation which we hope to address in committee and to which we hope the government will be sympathetic.

One of these has been identified by the Canadian Conference of the Arts, which acts as a voice on cultural issues for over 200,000 Canadian artists and cultural supports. It cites clause 2(e) with its rather cryptic reference to the importance that artists be compensated for the public lending of their work.

This is an issue which is extremely important to artists. They are given short shift because there is no place in the legislation that will give force to this identified right. Unless there is provision to ensure the appropriate compensation for the public showing of art, it should be deleted.

There is no use having something in the bill that means nothing. We will be struggling to ensure that clause 2(e) is given legislative force to ensure its implementation. It is especially important for writers, visual artists and others who will not belong to a collective bargaining unit.

Passage of Bill C–7 with an appropriate amendment in this regard will certainly be seen as a real benefit to artists.

Clause 22(2) of the bill also creates a problem for Canadian artists. It restricts cultural labour organizations from taking action against non–members.

The intention of this is to ensure that there will not be a closed shop approach to the cultural labour market. In fact, what it does is prevent cultural labour organizations from taking any measures to protect jobs in Canada from foreign workers in a situation where there is not corresponding access to the market in the country from which those artists might have come.

The artists want this clause of the bill amended to allow protective measures to be taken against foreign artists where there are no reciprocal agreements in existence. The provision should be completely removed.

We would also like, along with the artistic community, to see amendments to Part II, clause 8(3), of the bill accepted. The bill in this regard defines artists as independent contractors or free lancers but gives the Canada Labour Relations Board the power to decide which artists are deemed to be employees for the purpose of labour relations. These artists so deemed would not be covered under the Status of the Artists Act.

This means that those artists could be subject to rules which are inappropriate to the arts, the inappropriateness of which has been recognized by the creation of the new tribunal. Therefore, the members of the artistic community would like to see an amendment to the bill that would allow the tribunal provided for in the bill to make its own determination and have equal footing with the Canada Labour Relations Board in that respect.

As it now stands the act would give precedence to the CLRB instead of the tribunal. The Alliance for Canadian Television, Cinema and Radio Artists which represents 10,000 professional performers, writers and broadcast journalists working in Canada put forth recommendations for a compromise which calls for the institution of an appeal process. Second, it calls for the amendment of the wording to state: "Unless such persons shall be independent contractors at common law". This would be added to clause 8(3)(a) and (b).

The New Democratic Party supports recommendations for these amendments. There are some others which need not be detailed here.

The bill does not address some of the issues concerning taxation in respect of which artists have called for reform. They want to see additional personal exemptions for employed artists. They want to see the establishment of a social benefit scheme for artists. They want a dual status for artists: freelance for the purpose of the income tax and copyright and employee for the purpose of social benefit. They want to see bankruptcy provisions and income averaging. These issues should be pursued with alacrity.

• (1820)

We have always as a party advocated a comprehensive review of the tax system, not only to provide fairness for artists but fairness for all Canadians. What the artists seek is appropriately a part of that kind of reform.

The bill, as we said, initially is welcome. It is long past due. It is of paramount importance. The artistic community wants it and they need it. The country needs it particularly at this time.

We look forward as a party to making appropriate contributions to strengthen the legislation so that full satisfaction will be given to those needs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member has the floor.

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today to the bill on the status of the artist, because I am convinced Canadian artists have a fundamental role to play in expressing the personality of our country.

Here and abroad, it is our artists who have given eloquent expression to our collective identity and the distinctiveness of our regions. However, despite their success, those same artists are often forced to live in economic circumstances that are marginal, compared with those of their fellow citizens.

In 1951, the Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences said in its report that:"One mesure of the degree of civilization attained by a nation might fairly be the extent to which the nation's creative artists are supported, encouraged and esteemed by the nation as a whole." The time has come to recognize the tremendous contribution made by Canadian artists and to improve their working conditions.

The status of the artists bill is the final stage in a long process of careful reflection. I would like to recall, for the benefit of all members, some important milestones in that process.

The Massey-Lévesque report stated in 1951 that most artists in this country could not make "even a modestly comfortable living" and was concerned about the paucity of cultural assets in this country.

In 1982, the conclusions of the report of the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee were scarcely more optimistic. The report stated that although the contribution made by artists had increased steadily in the past 30 years, their working conditions had remained practically unchanged. The committee said that artists could be defined as poor, highly specialized workers.

The Siren-Gélinas task force created by the Government of Canada in 1986 felt it was both remarkable and unfair that Canadian artists had been able to gain national and international recognition while remaining well below the poverty line.

The task force recommended creating a Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artist, with a mandate to survey the needs and aspirations of the arts community and advise the government on all matters, issues and policies affecting the status of the artist.

What is the status of the artist in Canada? A study ordered by the federal Department of Communications found that the average professional artist was about 44 years old, in most cases self-employed. He had 17 years of experience in his particular discipline. He spent from 35 to 45 hours a week practising his art, while another 10 to 15 hours was spent doing other work in order to survive.

The average annual income of artists in Canada is $15,000, which is not a lot compared to that of an assembly line worker in the automotive industry, $27,500, or a high school teacher, $36,000.

I would add that artists' income is most often variable and intermittent and that they are not entitled to the benefits most Canadian workers enjoy, in particular unemployment insurance, disability insurance and retirement plans.

Therefore, we may wonder whether the working conditions of Canadian artists are as good as they can be and, that being so, we may be concerned for the new generation of artists whose often bold, experimental and provocative production is necessary for cultural renewal. It is not surprising that more than half of the creators consider their work a vocation rather than a business or a profession.

To do so, it will create the Canadian Artists and Producers Professional Relations Tribunal whose purpose will be to accredit self-employed professional artists' associations so that they can negotiate and enforce labour contracts that set minimum pay and working conditions for their members, without risk of prosecution under the Competition Act.

The bill will also set up the Canadian Council on the Status of the Artist. Its mandate will be to inform and advise the Minister of Communications regularly on any matter concerning the status of artists and it will succeed the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artist. The experience of this committee was conclusive. The Government of Canada benefited from its contribution in its last three years of existence.

That is why the government wishes to establish the Canadian Council on the Status of the Artist permanently, so that it can carry out the necessary research and work and propose viable solutions to the problems that have confronted artists for many years, concrete problems like access to private benefit plans, tax matters or unemployment insurance.

The Council will therefore advise the government on projects and measures to promote the status of artists in Canada.

Furthermore, the Government of Canada intends to provide artists, creators and performers with a favorable climate for artistic creation and expression and to take more account of the realities of their profession.

With this in mind, the government proposed additional measures in response to the report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture to improve economic conditions for artists. These measures include raising public awareness of the arts, improving tax breaks for visual artists who give works to organizations designated by the Cultural Property Import and Export Act or to the state, considering a compensation program for artists in case cultural enterprises fail, preparing a study on access to private benefit plans for self-employed artists, and introducing measures to enable salaried artists to deduct for income tax purposes work related expenses up to $1,000 or 20 per cent of their income from artistic activities.

These examples show that the Government of Canada wants to give artists their rightful place in Canadian society. I would add that many decisions made in previous years already went in that direction. For example, for several years, artists have been able to deduct the depreciation of their musical instruments from income tax. National service organizations in the arts sector will soon enjoy special tax status giving them the same benefits as charitable organizations.

In 1988, we revised the Copyright Act to better protect the economic and moral rights of creators.

• (1830)

In March 1990, the government of Canada established the Task Force on Professional Training for the Arts in Canada to help develop a policy in that area.

Madam Speaker, in closing, this government intends to live up to its commitment to the arts community. On October 31, 1989, the Prime Minister told this House that the government would act as swiftly as possible to allow the legitimate needs of the Canadian arts community to finally be met, and this for the first time in our history.

However, I want to point out that, had it not been for the commitment of the Siren-Gélinas Task Force, for the perseverance and untiring co-operation of the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artist as well as for the support of the arts community, there would never have been a bill on the status of the artist.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved that Bill C-238, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is the same bill that was introduced in the last session of this Parliament as Bill C-314 and we had two days of debate on it. When I filed the bill again for this Parliament, and having had the bill drawn, the committee examining the bill wanted to know if it was an important bill. They decided in their wisdom for the second time that they believed this House ought to pass the bill.

Essentially this is a bill concerning criminal records. Before I continue with my remarks, I want to read into the House record the provisions of section 736 of the Criminal Code. The section states:

> Where an accused, other than a corporation, pleads guilty to or is found guilty of an offence other than an offence for which a minimum punishment is prescribed by law or an offence punishable in proceedings commenced against him by imprisonment for 14 years or life, the court in which he appears may, if it considers in the best interest of the accused and not contrary to public interest, instead of convicting the accused by order direct the accused be discharged absolutely or on conditions prescribed in that probation order.

Then when you go on to section 3 it says that where the court directs under subsection (1) that an offender be discharged of an offence, the offender shall be deemed not to have been convicted of the offence, except the offender may appeal from the determination of guilt as if a conviction were in respect of the offence, and (b) the attorney general and in the case of summary convictions the informant, or the informant's agent, may appeal from the decision of the court, not to convict the offender of the offence as that decision were a judgment or verdict of acquittal of the offence or a dismissal of the information against the offender and the offender may plead a quattr' occhi in respect of any subsequent charge relating to the offence.

The guts of the matter is very simple, you are not convicted. You may have done the act. You may have been wrong. You may have offended the principles of criminal justice but you are not convicted. The judge said that he is not going to convict you. You are absolutely discharged or if you do certain community work or whatever is in the order you are discharged if that work is done. There is no conviction.

Yet our bureaucrats in their great desire to keep records under the Criminal Records Act decide to keep records. We have to keep records on everybody and you know the cost of keeping records. Of what do they keep records? They keep records of the fact that the fellow was not convicted. Otherwise they keep records of convicts. They keep records of convictions. They keep records of sentences. They keep records of all the nasty things people do. And in this case they keep a record that he was not convicted. He was not convicted. Yet his record is kept.

What is the penalty? The penalty in most criminal convictions in my experience as a lawyer in a small town is in the long run not the fine or the jail term. It is not the conviction so much as the record because the record sticks like you-know-what to the blanket. There it is and it ain't lint.

I want to tell you that that is what the penalty is.

People not convicted suffer the same penalty as people convicted because in order to get rid of the record they have to apply to the National Parole Board to get off the hook, to get a discharge, to get a clean slate.

If you decided you were not going to convict somebody, but you decide they have committed an offence, so lots of us have committed offences. One was a member of our former cabinet but was not convicted. He was given an absolute discharge. A member of this House, very recently, was given an absolute discharge. Guess what? He has a criminal record. If he goes to a border point, maybe he has a criminal record and they will not let him in. It appears on the television screen. In the office they pump it out, they put your name in, and there is the record.

• (1910)

The judge said: "Absolutely discharged. I discharge you. There is no record". That is what the Criminal Code of Canada says—no record, no offence, no conviction. But there is a record. Oh, boy there is a record. We keep that record to make sure that this person pays and pays and pays, no matter what.

Why did I bring this bill forward? I have had case after case as a member of Parliament of young people coming to my office in Mississauga who all of a sudden have been faced, either at the U.S. border or in employment offer or elsewhere, with somebody who has drawn their criminal record. Now they got discharged. They were never convicted, but their criminal record maintained by Canada is there. By golly, even though the judge said "discharged, go home and sin no more", they are convicted as far as the criminal records department is concerned.

Forget the criminal vote. Forget Parliament. Do not worry about what Otto Lang said, what this party said or what the New Democratic Party said when this provision was made in the Criminal Code in 1972. Forget Parliament. We are bureaucrats and by golly, boy, we are going to keep those records. We are going to do it and we are going to make sure that he pays and pays and pays. That is the kind of thing we have right now in our jurisprudence. That is the kind of thing that causes me, probably once every two months as a member of Parliament, to have to do something in one way or another to help a constituent.

The other day, for example, my constituent David Clark was to attend a university course in St. Petersburg, Florida, to become a better organized person to deal with psychological assistance to alcoholics. He attended that course all last spring and went back to Florida on September 16. He was arrested at the U.S. border and handcuffed for two hours while they checked his record out. Then he was told he could no longer enter the United States of America because 10 years ago a judge in Brampton gave him an absolute discharge. He was at a party that was raided by the Peel Regional Police and was found with two joints of marijuana.

This druggie was stopped of course because he was a druggie and there was his record. Record of what? A record that he was discharged. A record that the judge said: "You are not convicted, go home and sin no more". But there was that record. By golly, we kept it. We kept it good. The record said: "You can't come in, fella. You can't take your course. You can't come back into the United States". He had been there several times, but this time they happened to bring him up on the computer.

This has got to cease. This kind of thing is not the kind of thing that a society like ours can allow to continue. It is not a big thing. It is not a massive change in law or anything like that. It is a situation where this Parliament has been snubbed, this Parliament has been put down by members of our own bureaucracy. Why? Because they love to keep records, love to tie people up. It is about time we cleaned the matter up. It is about time we changed the system.

Since I brought the matter up the Solicitor General's department has been on to it. It has done some investigations. It has found that the cost of getting a pardon through the National Parole Board involves on average 13 months in time and 91 person-years of public servants' efforts. Imagine. That is the average. That includes people who are really convicted, real criminals who want to apply for a pardon and they have got to prove that they really were not involved in nefarious activities since the date of their conviction.

It also involves people like David Clark who 10 years ago was caught at a party and had two joints of marijuana in his pocket. What a terrible sin that he should be stuck with this against him forever and ever and ever, unless we spend on average 90 hours of public servant time cleaning it up and on average 13 months of time in the National Parole Board. It is overloaded with applications because of looking after this nonsense.

The minister says he is going to do something about it. He says maybe we can look at situations where people have not offended again in a three-year period and, if they did not, for a three-year period we might automatically discharge them.

My view on this bill is that if someone has been convicted this way let the appeal periods go on because obviously the informant may want to appeal or the Crown may want to appeal the conviction and so on. There may be the problem of raising atrophies acquit. After two months from the date the guy went to court, automatically get rid of all the records. Get rid of them. Throw them out. Throw them away. Indeed let him be there while they are thrown out so he knows his record is not there.

After all the judge has said, like our Lord said: "Go and sin no more". Let us get rid of this piece of legislation. Let us get this matter changed. I ask the House to adopt the bill and to move it to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I take pleasure in once again entering into this debate. I spoke on it, I believe it was December of last year, when the hon. member for Mississauga South introduced it into the House for second reading debate as Bill C-314. It has now come back as Bill C-238.

By way of introduction, though, I wish to make the point that a year ago it was not the opposition that held up the bill or talked it out. It was his own party, and I believe it was the parliamentary secretary to the then Solicitor General.

• (1920)

I stand corrected by the minister's parliamentary secretary, but it was one of them at least who came in to the House and simply talked the bill out.

Obviously at that time, and that was less than a year ago, the government did not see fit to adopt this bill. I hope that in the interim it had second thoughts, will adopt this bill and pass it into law after it goes to committee.

I have no objection whatever, Madam Speaker, in allowing this bill to pass second reading tonight without a vote. I assume it would be unanimous and then it would go to a legislative committee.

Before I do, though, and I will be very, very brief, I think the member for Mississauga South touched a very raw nerve when he talked about records and bureaucrats keeping records. I simply want to expand upon that for a moment or two.

Recorditis is a disease. It is a disease of virtually every police force and law enforcement agency in the world. When the RCMP turned over its records from its counter-intelligence and security department to CSIS, there were no fewer than 500,000 records that CSIS had to go through. Finally, I believe CSIS has been able to do away with about 95 per cent of those records.

Obviously, they were not important in terms of national security. That is a very major field in this country. I dare say if you go to any police department in Canada, the United States, the Soviet Union, the KGB, in England MI-5 and MI-6, in France and Germany you will find the same thing. Police officers and their agents suffer from recorditis. They cannot find security of a personal nature in their work unless they have literally tons of records on people, whether they are guilty or innocent, whether they have gone through a trial and been convicted or whether they were given in this case an absolute discharge or conditional discharge. I see absolutely no reason why anybody in a free society such as ours, a liberal democracy where the rule of law is the basis of our justice system, who has been given an absolute discharge or conditional discharge should have any record at all from that moment on. I see absolutely no reason for that.

And yet, as the member very eloquently stated a few moments ago, we have this situation in this country where law enforcement agencies, courts and so on, have to keep records.

The hon. member made reference to, I believe, somebody in his constituency who attempted to get into the United States. Well, the member knows that once the Canadian authorities hand over any information to the U.S. immigration department or the border patrol or whatever it is called, then of course it is up to the United States authorities as to whether or not they want to put it in their computers or more importantly, keep it there.

Unfortunately, we cannot do anything about that. I am very fearful that even if this bill becomes law, everything that is in their computers as of the day this becomes law will remain in their computers. There is untold damage that has already been done and I am afraid that would be perpetuated year after year, generation after generation, as the names remain in their computers.

I agree with this bill, particularly clause 4 which provides for the destruction of a criminal record where that record relates to an offence for which a person has received an absolute or conditional discharge under the Criminal Code and sets out when such destruction is to occur. It also gives a person the right to view the destruction of that record.

I think that is key, because there will always be a lingering doubt because of past experience, that somewhere there is a copy in some computer bank that will remain forever and ever. The person should be present when the record is destroyed so that that person is satisfied that he or she no longer has a record.

Madam Speaker, that is all I have to say. I give concurrence that this bill should go to committee and be studied further. I hope the government will see fit to pass this into law.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this bill but I was in the House and listened very carefully to the proposer of this bill and also to my colleague from the NDP.

I want to make a few comments and perhaps play the devil's advocate. May I say that I have no problem with the bill proceeding to committee for further discussion. In playing the devil's advocate, I would like to ask a question and examine the situation.

In Canadian criminal law, only three things can happen. Either a person is acquitted, in which case it is found that the person did not commit the crime, or the person is found guilty of the crime but is given a conditional or absolute discharge. Third, a person is found guilty and convicted.

What sort of criteria do judges use when they start the determination after a finding of guilt whether or not to register a conviction or give an absolute or conditional discharge. Of course, that is what happens.

The first thing the trier of fact has to decide is, is there guilt. Once the judge decides yes, there is guilt then the next question becomes: Should we give an absolute or conditional discharge or should we register a conviction?

Let us not forget that there is a finding of guilt. We are not talking about an innocent person. We are talking about someone who has been found guilty of committing the Criminal Code offence for which they have been charged.

Having said that, what sort of considerations are taken into account? Among them is the severity of the offence and whether or not that person has been in trouble with the law before. That is a very important consideration.

We have all heard the old adage: you are entitled to one mistake. You can learn from your mistakes. Why destroy a person's life with one mistake. I agree with that. It makes eminent sense to me, and that is one of the things that the judge will look at.

If it is two joints of marijuana and the person is 19 years old, is that the kind of offence we want to have a conviction registered for so that that person stands convicted? Of course not. In that circumstance, we give an absolute or conditional discharge. That makes sense. It is fair and it is humane.

Now we come to: What do we do with that information? We have this bill and the bill provides in the explanatory notes that the purpose of this act is to provide that where a person is discharged under the Criminal Code in respect of an offence, all records relating to that offence must be destroyed.

What comes to my mind is the following. One of the criteria that is used by a judge in determining whether an absolute or conditional discharge should be granted is whether there have been previous brushes with the law, previous findings of guilt. While that person might very well be given an absolute discharge the first time he is caught with two joints of marijuana, that same judge might decide to give a conditional discharge if it is the second time he has been found guilty of possession of two joints of marijuana.

Suppose he is arrested and found guilty a third time of possession of four joints of marijuana or half a kilo of marijuana. Maybe it will be a conditional discharge, but just perhaps it might be a conviction. What is my point?

My point is and I ask the question—there might be an answer, and I hope there is and I certainly hope that the committee considers it—if all the records are destroyed, how does anyone know who is considering whether to give an absolute or conditional discharge whether that particular person, having been found guilty of that offence, has been found guilty of a previous offence, perhaps a similar offence, which may be relevant in the judge deciding whether or not to grant an absolute or conditional charge, or indeed, register a conviction? If all record of that conditional discharge has been destroyed, I presume there is no way the judge could ever know that this offence occurred or how many times before a conditional or absolute discharge has been given for similar offences. This, from a devil's advocate point of view, troubles me.

If there is an explanation for it we will hear about it in committee. If there is no explanation for it we should think about it because it is relevant, the person is not innocent. They have been found guilty but are judged not to merit the registration of a conviction against them.

In that circumstance we are not talking about an innocent person. We are not talking about someone who has been acquitted. There might be an instance where it would become relevant on a subsequent charge of which the person has been found guilty when the trier of fact and the imposer of the sentence are trying to decide whether the second time they have been found guilty it is appropriate to give an absolute or conditional discharge, whether there should be a conviction registered. It might be important for that judge to know that this person had received an absolute discharge at some point in time for the same offence and obviously did not learn his or her lesson and has now been found guilty a second time.

If that concern is not dealt with in this private member's bill might I just mention that perhaps there should be some consideration of that. Perhaps the record should be sealed as opposed to being absolutely destroyed, banned forever from use except upon a finding of guilt again another time.

It might be relevant to the judge who decides whether there should be another absolute discharge or a conditional discharge or a conviction. It might very well be relevant to the protection of the public whether that person had been given an absolute or conditional discharge.

I merely bring that to the mover's attention. There may be an explanation, I hope there is, but if there is not I hope it is considered in committee. I certainly think the intent is worthy of being moved along.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Mississauga South has brought before us a piece of legislation that is thoughtful, well researched and worked over. I think it would appeal to members of all parties to recognize that there is an obvious wrong done when a person has to bear the burden of a record throughout a lifetime and there was no further misdemeanour or offence by that individual.

That position was presented and received the agreement of the hon. member for Brant. We were then challenged by the hon. member for Scarborough West who brought before us the reflection that there may indeed be some reason to give some more thoughtful consideration to this matter because the judges themselves may very well be opting for a lighter sentence, or no sentence at all, on the basis that they believe a first offence did not warrant the criminal charge. His point was that the record should be there if there were subsequent offences so that it could be then considered in any subsequent offence.

Clearly the concern for members of the House is the criteria that trigger the dismissal of all records, or the timeframe or the combination of those two matters.

As I am persuaded by the member for Mississauga South and the member for Brant on the one hand and also that there is some logic in the caution expressed by the hon. member for Scarborough West, I move:

> That the hon. member for Mississauga South withdraw his bill and that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General for study and a recommendation to Parliament.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot has moved a motion. The House has heard the motion and we have the assent of the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, order discharged and bill withdrawn.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations.

In accordance with Standing Order 123, it is my duty to inform the House that this report contains a resolution to revoke the agricultural exhibition loans order, Consolidated Regulations of Canada, 1978, chapter 318.

Pursuant to Standing Order 123(1), a copy of the order is attached as appendix A to this second report.

This report constitutes a portion of the disallowance procedure set out in Standing Order 123.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for unanimous consent to waive notice and introduce legislation which would deal with return to work of the grain handlers in Thunder bay.

I wonder if there would be unanimous consent on the part of my colleagues to allow me to waive notice and introduce the bill?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, we are willing to waive notice to have the bill printed and circulated at this time. It is also our intention to allow the debate to commence later today if the government should so choose, but until we see the legislation and how the minister reacts to certain amendments and suggestions we cannot make any guarantees as to when the debate would finish.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could assist the House. The hon. minister has moved for consent to introduce the bill. I take it that consent is given. However we need a royal recommendation which is not yet with us.

Under the circumstances I would ask that we stand this down until the royal recommendation arrives and then proceed.

Is there agreement on that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

THE CONSTITUTION

TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, you will know that yesterday I tried to move a motion relating to the televising of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution and was not given unanimous consent at that time. It is my understanding that I will have that consent now.

Therefore I would like to move the following motion:

That, notwithstanding the report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business concurred in by the House on October 20, 1989, the following will be the order of priority for access to the parliamentary channel during the mandate of the special joint committee on the Government of Canada's proposals for a renewed Canada.

(1) House of Commons proceedings live;

(2) Replay of Statements under Standing Order 31 and of Question Period;

(3) Proceedings of the special joint committee live where that is technically feasible;

(4) Replay of proceedings of the special joint committee;

(5) Replay of House proceedings or portion thereof beginning with Question Period;

(6) Weekend replay of the previous week's proceedings of the special joint committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the parliamentary secretary in his point about replay of the proceedings meant to replay those parts that had not been played live. Is that correct? I wonder if he could confirm that.

My understanding is that the House will be played live. Question Period and Statements under Standing Order 31 will be replayed. Then any live proceedings of the committee then taking place will be played. Then any committee proceedings taped during the House proceedings, for example, or at other times that have not been played would be played and then the replay of the House would follow as number five.

I wonder if he could confirm that that is the understanding. I do not think it is the intention to replay the special committee's proceedings immediately and not replay the House. Is that the understanding?

• (1020)

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am sorry. I passed my copy of the motion in so I do not have it in front of me.

Clearly I want to make two comments. First of all, this is the House order that we had agreed to among House leaders the other day. As I recall it, it uses the words: "House of Commons proceedings live". In fact it does cover off the concerns of the hon. member. We agree with the assertion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition from residents of Amos, Authier, Berry, Saint-Félix, Saint-Mathieu, Guyenne and Manneville, in the Abitibi area, who respectfully submit to Parliament that the regulations on compensation for pregnant women fail to consider all criteria for working conditions under the Canada Labour Code. They ask that preventive withdrawal for pregnant women be made a desirable and necessary option for women at work.

Wherefor your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to give serious consideration to the deficiencies of the Canada Labour Code during the upcoming review process and recognize the need for including clauses on the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Are all questions allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you have detected here, we are endeavouring to work out the day's agenda on the fly, so to speak, in the sense of having to deal with the question of the stoppage in grain movements at the port of Thunder Bay in an appropriate manner.

This day had been designated an Opposition Day and should that occur we would not be able to get to this legislation tomorrow. I do not know when the Senate would be able to handle it, and that could make several unnecessary days of delay in the restarting of grain movements, to nobody's advantage.

What I would like to propose is an extraordinary measure in a sense, that the House in essence start the second reading debate in the expectation of receiving the royal recommendation which I understand may be right there so we could complete first reading introduction that was called for.

The second reading can start with agreement that it shall not go past one o'clock. We would use that period to see if we could reach some accommodation in treating the bill for the rest of the day. I know there is a desire for Committee of the Whole discussion.

If no agreement is reached, we could go to Government Orders on the return of the House after Question Period with the understanding that the Opposition Day would be postponed until tomorrow.

The fact that that is a Friday rather than a Thursday would be acknowledged by allowing the Liberal Party the first right of refusal, so to speak, of the next Opposition Day to make up for any perceived loss of position in that regard.

That is rather complex, but I think it reflects what I thought I heard the member for Churchill say earlier, that he was ready to start the debate on it but did not want at this point in time to give a commitment as to when it would be completed in all stages until they have an opportunity to discuss some elements of it.

The Liberal Party has acknowledged that it also has some questions on a specific that it would like to talk to the Minister of Labour about. If that were the agreement then perhaps we could proceed on that basis.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker there is a bit of confusion. I said that we were quite willing to start the debate. Of course, when I made that offer I assumed that the government had royal proclamation and was able to give us an actual copy of the bill. It is sometimes very difficult to debate a bill that you do not really have in front of you. However, I am willing to start the debate with a final copy of the bill given to each of the members in the House, with or without the royal proclamation. What I have right now is just a draft and I have no idea if it is the exact wording that we will be receiving later. It is very difficult to debate that.

We are willing to start the debate. We are not at this point willing to say when second reading will end, but we are willing to start the debate whenever we can have a copy of the bill.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Chair. Is it my understanding that you do now have the royal proclamation?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, we do now have the royal recommendation. Would the House agree that we do first reading now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: By unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THUNDER BAY GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–37, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Danis moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed. Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

An hon. member: Later this day.

Madam Deputy Speaker: By unanimous consent later this day.

Mr. Andre: I am suggesting that we commence debate which has been agreed to and that at one o'clock, if we do not have a House order in place, we will return to Government Orders when the House resumes after Question Period. This is not to suggest that second reading would necessarily be over at that time but merely to give us that period of time rather than an unlimited period of time in which to work out the modalities for treating the bill through the rest of the day.

Point of Order

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, we agree with the suggestion of the government House leader, but I wonder if he would perhaps give us an undertaking that the Minister of Labour would forthwith meet with our critic who is available to discuss certain provisions which we allege might be in the bill. We would have to see the bill in its complete form. If he could do that forthwith—and I presume some consultations will take place with members of the New Democratic Party as well—we could get a firm indication from the government and from the House on the way in which they wish to proceed with this particular bill.

One o'clock does not seem to be an inordinate amount of time before a House order could be given, but if necessary we would be prepared to sit through the lunch hour in order to address this matter as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, I will of course meet with the opposition critics. If the hon. opposition House leader will let me do the opening speech in the debate, I will do that immediately after.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on an entirely different subject on a point of order which really ought to be raised today. I want to speak to the matter of how the House deals with the question of language which has been found offensive enough to be withdrawn by hon. members.

I know that you, Mr. Speaker, are very concerned about what happened in the House yesterday. I am not here standing on my feet today to reflect on the way in which you dealt with that or any previous incident, but simply to speak to the matter of how the House in general and how the House's tradition deals with these matters and how we might deal with them in the future.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, as you so rightly pointed out yesterday that a tradition exists in this House. When a member withdraws a particular comment and apologizes, that has traditionally been the end of the matter. I understand that tradition and I think it is a good one.

You can look at the literature with respect to these kind of incidents. For instance, Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 325 states:

> When the Speaker takes notice of any expression as personal and disorderly,—

He then goes on to talk about retracting the offensive expression and apologizing to the House et cetera for the breach of order. The point I want to make here is that this tradition has developed in and around what have been regarded as personal remarks, those which are offensive to the individual person.

We do not really have a tradition of dealing with remarks which are offensive to an entire group of people. The problem has arisen in the last little while of language which is thought to be insulting not just to the particular member. Therefore it has traditionally been satisfactory for the person to get up and withdraw that personal insult. If the member to whom the insult has been made is satisfied, that has been the end of the matter and rightly so I say, as you pointed out yesterday.

The fact is that an entirely new concern is developing now and that is how do we deal with language which is offensive to an entire group of people.

An incident arose a couple of weeks ago in which sexist language was used and was found to be offensive to all the women in the House of Commons and Canada. Language was used in the incident yesterday which is found offensive by an entire group of people in Canada, in this case the black community.

How do we deal with that? It seems to me that that is the question which the House at some point has to address itself to and that is why I raise this point of order. It may be that there are other things that have to be done. The government itself has to be accountable for the behaviour of its members. That is another matter. That is for a political debate between the government and its critics. I am not here to raise that particular point.

I am here to talk though about how the House deals with it. The House has this tradition which you pointed out yesterday, but what I am submitting is that that tradition has developed around the question of personal insults and is not adequate to the problem of dealing with what are seen to be words that offend an entire group of people.

I might also say, Mr. Speaker, that in the same vein, although I think you were well within the tradition to deal with it the way that you did, that there are other motions which have existed over time in which unparliamentary words, as a result of motions, for instance, have had to have been recorded by the Clerk. The words which were used had to have taken place on the floor of the House, which is not what happened yesterday.

I would also ask you to consider that element of the existing tradition by which there have been instances where the offensive words have been put on the record, so to speak, particularly of course when they happen off the record, but members hear them as many members did yesterday. The words were withdrawn, but at no time was there a public acknowledgement of exactly what had been said. We are left to an ongoing debate about whether x was said or y was said.

We do know that there was an apology made and presumably people who apologize know what they are apologizing for and the House ought to be able to deal with that directly.

There is also the tradition, and again I refer to Beauchesne, that the member himself who has been offended has to be satisfied with the result of the exchange, in this case the withdrawal or apology. I contend that in the instance where the language is not the kind of personal language that the tradition has traditionally addressed itself to, there needs to be more happen than simply the withdrawal of a personal insult.

There should be an acknowledgement on the part of the member and/or someone speaking for the member's party that this not only reflects on the member who made this remark, but it reflects on the entire House of Commons, the government and the political process. It is simply not enough to get up and say you are sorry after all these things.

As anyone knows, particularly those who are parents, you only get away with saying you are sorry just so often. At some point the behaviour has to change. It seems to me that is what this House has to address. I know there has been an informal committee struck already to deal with the question of sexist language. Mr. Speaker, you might want to consider ways in which that committee might be explicitly instructed to deal also with the question of racist language and other forms of language which offend groups, rather than just people.

That might be one way in which we could deal with it but in the final analysis, it is not just a question for the House. It is also a question for the government and I realize that is not a point I can pursue on a point of order, and I will not. However, it may be pursued by others in another context.

I would ask that all these things be taken into consideration by the Chair and that you might report to us at some point as to how you propose to deal with what I think is really a new development. We are not just talking about personal insults here, we are talking about a dimension of offensive language which goes far beyond what the tradition has been developed to deal with.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this perhaps gives me an opportunity to indicate some action that I have been talking about for well over a year. The whole question of the decorum of this institution has been the subject of much debate around the country. The Spicer commission indicated that people were disgusted with the behaviour of this institution, the barracking, the name calling, the yelling.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: You have not seen the tape. Ask your colleague there. He has seen the tape. Maybe he will stop that accusation. Your colleague from Kingston knows it is a false accusation. It is precisely this kind of barracking that is at the root of the problem here. This kind of false accusation, false demeaning and the attempt to slander. I would ask the hon. member to check the tape which his colleague, the hon. member for Kingston has seen, and stop making that accusation.

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker: Given the seriousness of this question, I wonder if all hon. members could exercise some considerable restraint and allow each other to address the Chair.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has raised a matter which I think the House knows is serious. The hon. government House leader has referred to the fact that across the country there is an unprecedented mood, at least in current times, of antagonism toward not just those of us who happen to be elected but to the whole political process. Some of that is manifested by complaints as to what happens in this place.

We have had several incidents recently which I think have given concern to reasonable and decent people in this place, which means the majority of us. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona is raising as a point of order whether or not we are adequately dealing with some of the things that have happened. What he is asking the Chair to do is to consider these matters and perhaps find a way to report back to the House so that we can reach the objectives which most of us wish to not only meet, but to maintain. We must also keep in mind our obligation to this institution, the history of the place, our country and the public.

• (1040)

In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, the government House leader is rising. He started off by talking about concerns which he has already mentioned in the past about decorum in general in this place.

I certainly think it appropriate, given the circumstances, that I should hear him.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as you summarized, the question of decorum, the behaviour in this House, has been the subject of much public discussion and much public disgust, frankly, as it sees the manner in which we operate.

Too often, if we do not like the answer, the statement or the debate from the person opposite, we shout, we yell, we try to shout them down and we try to throw them off track. It is almost like we do not want to hear what they have to say.

Yet, the public who is watching expects us to debate in seriousness the major issues that are facing the country. We are not to howl down each other. We are not to use epithets and so on.

There is a question of epithets being particularly harmful and hurtful to the individuals concerned. There is no question about that. Epithets of any sort should not be used in this House. Some do hurt personally to a greater degree than others, and sometimes our mouths get in motion before our brains are in gear. Things might happen.

The hon. member over there is interrupting me again. He will not listen to what I have to say. He has to interrupt. He is a member of the New Democratic Party.

This debate has been going on and on. We have had discussions about it. We keep interrupting each other when we talk about it.

There is the member for Victoria again, interrupting me.

As a result of this reputation and the demeanour which has come into disrepute, I have raised the matter on many, many occasions with House leaders opposite in this House.

We struck a management committee in the last reforms. We have asked it to deal with a lot of aspects of how we perform in here and to come forward with recommendations.

Frankly, this is an opportune time for me to commit now to this House, and I will of course discuss it with opposition House leaders first, that after the break when we come down, I will put a motion before the House which will define clearly what is inappropriate behaviour in this House and empower the Chair to enforce that code of conduct in a direct way.

I will commit now that we will make it a free vote. If it is a government motion, we will make it a free vote. I will commit now to have that motion on the floor of the House, let it be voted on and then the Speaker will have been empowered by this House to deal appropriately with any in this House who feel that epithets, barracking, yelling, interruption or any of those behavioural things which the public finds offensive can be dealt with.

I will make that commitment now since for a year now we have been talking about it. Nothing happened. Perhaps it is time to bring it to a head, and when the break is over a motion will be brought forward to that effect.

People can debate it. We will vote on it and see if we can live by our own record of decision.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona has made a valuable intervention. I would hope that the Chair would want to act upon that intervention as quickly as possible.

The government House leader has made reference to a motion which would be brought in, but in point of fact, Mr. Speaker, you already have the authority under the provisions of the Standing Order to act where you believe that the behaviour of members of Parliament on any side of this House is out of order. I would be happy to discuss with House leaders at any time, as would I am sure my colleague to the left, the substance of that particular motion and ways in which it might assist you in terms of how you exercise your responsibility as the arbitrator of this great Chamber.

Perhaps we could move on, Mr. Speaker, with a matter which we were told last night was of great urgency, namely the grain handlers dispute and perhaps hear from the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. On the same point?

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the same point.

I listened with care to the words of the government House Leader and I agree with most of what he put forward, but I think that so often Canadians at large do not really see what goes on in this House and they do not understand that quite often there is a provocation that exists from the government side toward the opposition in terms of its approach to questions we ask. Quite often, at the same time, when we are giving answers there is also barracking and heckling on the government side.

In the member's approach this morning, he seemed to indicate that his own House was in order. I would suggest that sure, it is okay for us to maybe put some discipline into our side of the House, but he should not think that his organization could not stand some review itself.

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker: Just before I hear the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, who has raised this matter, I think, in a very carefully structured way and within the rules, I will just respond momentarily to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Let me make it very clear to the hon. member and to all hon. members that having been here for many years, there is no particular monopoly of virtue on either side in this assembly when it comes to anything from heckling to something worse. But that is not the point. The point is that when decorum degenerates, it leads to further and further excess and it may very well be that both sexist remarks and racist remarks are a direct result of the state of decorum in general. It is very difficult to disengage completely the one kind of excess from the other.

The hon. member has talked about provocation. I do not think we need to have a House committee to remind ourselves that there often is provocation in this place and it comes on both sides. There has to be, of course, some common sense to our approach because this place has never been a tea party and strong-minded men and women who believe passionately in things are going to express that passion and conviction from time to time. But certainly I am prepared to try and assist along the lines expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, the government House leader and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

I will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. Perhaps he can be of further help to the Chair.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay things any more than I have to, but I do want to say that there is a distinction to be made between concerns that have been expressed for a long time and, most recently, in the Spicer commission, but by many other people about general matters of decorum in the House of Commons and what happened yesterday and a couple of weeks ago. There is a qualitative distinction to be made and I am not sure whether the government House leader simply did not understand my point of order or whether there is an attempt to bury a much more serious matter of how we deal with sexist and racist language in the question of the general decorum of the House.

• (1050)

You cannot reduce this to a silent Chamber. There are going to be political exchanges. There is going to be the kind of vigorous back and forth both on and off the record stuff that the House of Commons has always been and, I think, always will be. This is not a corporate board meeting where everybody agrees about what the bottom line is. This is a place where we exchange values and ideas, where we fight for things in which we believe. But we do that within certain parameters and we do that within certain rules and lately we have done it in a way that the Canadian public has found offensive.

That is one issue.

I have been here twelve and a half years and it is only in the last three or four weeks that we have had to deal with the problem that I am raising now and asking the Speaker to deal with. That is the question of open sexist and racist language. That is different from what the government House leader was talking about. That is what I ask you to address.

We are addressing the other question in the subcommittee on parliamentary reform dealing with Question Period and other things and we need to deal with that. But let us not confuse it in such a way as to bury the significance of what has happened in the last few weeks.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. I understand perfectly well the distinction that the hon. member is raising and I am very sensitive to it.

At the same time I do ask hon. members and the public which is listening to keep in mind that the general decorum is also of importance because when that is reduced too far beyond what is acceptable, it leads to other things.

The other thing, and I repeat what I said to my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood and other members, is that this is a tough place. It always has been. That is not an excuse for excess, but it is and it must be remembered that the most precious things and the most vital issues that this country faces are debated here and there will be at times expressions of great commitment, conviction and passion.

I am sure that people will understand that in a free country, provided that those expressions are done in such a way that they do not wound others or bring into indignity the institution itself, that is probably something we have always had and probably something that will continue.

The other thing I want to say to hon. members is this. What we are discussing are a couple of incidents that only took a few seconds in this Chamber out of the many hours in which debate takes place. It is no secret that most of the time in this place there is not only excellent decorum but the place is relatively calm and there is debate which is seriously proceeding.

I think on behalf of all members of the House I have to make this statement. Maybe it is a misconception to say that this place is always in excess or even in an uproar because that is not so. There is also no doubt in my mind that the public is asking us to improve.

I might just say to hon. members, remember many years ago when in order to express our approval of some brilliant move on the part of one of our colleagues or some brilliant criticism we pounded the desks. You will remember that it was shortly after television came into the House that we began, all of us, to receive letters and telephone calls saying that we should stop it.

What stopped it is that one party stopped it and substituted it with applause and within a few days it had ceased. It does not take place any more. That is an example of the House responding to public opinion.

I will not go on any longer because I can see some members are tempted to pound their desks in approval of what I have just said. That would sort of defeat the example.

I will do the very best I can, in response to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. I understand exactly what he is saying. I am conscious that it is a serious matter and I shall try to assist the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THUNDER BAY GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS ACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C–37, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario be read the second time, and by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, I think that most hon. members do share my feelings that collective bargaining, for the most part, serves the public interest in this country and serves it well. The federal industrial relations system embodied in Part I of the Canada Labour Code has proven to be an effective vehicle for the resolution of labour disputes over the years. The vast majority of negotiations have been resolved without resort to strike or lock–out activity. However, it is equally part of the collective bargaining process to include strike or lock–out action.

Such is the case, Madam Speaker, in the current dispute involving the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association, representing Cargill Limited, Manitoba Pool Elevators, Parrish and Heimbecker Limited, Richardson Terminals Limited, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and United Grain Growers Limited on the one hand and on the other hand the Transportation Communications International Union, Lodge 650, representing some 900 grain handlers in the port of Thunder Bay.

Unfortunately the parties have been unable to reach agreement on certain issues in their attempt to renew the collective agreements covering employees of the six grain companies having terminal elevator operations in the port.

[Translation]

I should point out, Madam Speaker, that this dispute involves parties that have demonstrated the ability to resolve their differences in the past with relatively little disruption to the Canadian economy. There have only been three strikes of Thunder Bay grain handlers in the past twenty–five years and, during that same period, eight other bargaining rounds were settled without resort to work stoppage action.

The previous contract negotiations were settled at the direct bargaining stage following the provision of conciliation officer assistance. This occasion marks the first time that legislative intervention has been required to terminate a work stoppage in the grain handling industry at Thunder Bay and bring about a resumption in the flow of export grain through the port.

[English]

The current dispute involves negotiations to renew the previous collective agreement between the two parties which expired on January 31, 1991. The parties did meet in direct negotiations on several occasions between January and May 1991 in an effort to arrive at a contract. Despite their efforts, the two sides were unable to reach agreement and a conciliation officer from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of Labour Canada was appointed on June 17, 1991 to assist the parties in resolving their differences.

Meetings with the conciliation officer were held during the months of July and August. Even with the provision of third party assistance, the association and the union were unable to find common ground to settle the dispute.

Following the receipt of the report of the conciliation officer and a review of the status of the dispute, I decided not to appoint a conciliation commissioner or establish a conciliation board.

• (1100)

The collective bargaining process provided for under Part I of the Canada Labour Code places the onus for reaching a resolution squarely on the shoulders of the parties to the dispute.

By declining to provide further assistance to the parties at this particular stage of the negotiations, I was in fact conveying the message that the parties ought to have been able to resolve the outstanding disputes themselves in a short timeframe.

It was my view that the appointment of a conciliation commissioner would have served only to protract the process, entrench the parties in their positions and delay the ultimate conclusion of a new collective bargaining agreement.

Despite the responsibility placed on the parties, no further negotiations took place and the union commenced legal strike action on October 3, 1991. This followed a period during which grain handlers in Thunder Bay were laid off effective September 10, 1991 as a result of the strike by the Public Service Alliance of Canada. It involved federal grain inspectors and weighers in the port.

As you can see, Madam Speaker, grain handling operations at Thunder Bay have been virtually at a standstill for the better part of the last month. For a port which handles approximately 40 per cent of total Canadian grain exports, this is unacceptable for this country's farmers and for Canada's reputation as a reliable exporting nation.

As an indication of this government's concern, I spoke with the representatives of both parties last Friday urging them to return to the bargaining table and extended the offer of mediation assistance.

This past Tuesday, given the serious consequences of the work stoppage action, I instructed Warren Edmonsdon, Director General, Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to travel to Thunder Bay and meet with the parties to assess the situation, and determine the possibilities for a settlement.

Mr. Edmonsdon met with the two sides in Thunder Bay yesterday and conveyed to them my strongest possible concerns over their failure to resolve their contract dispute. The parties were also made aware that the government was not prepared to stand by while serious damage was inflicted on our farmers and the country's economy.

While Mr. Edmonsdon has advised me that there is some room for a negotiated settlement of the dispute by the two parties, prospects of an immediate resumption of grain handling activities in the port remain remote.

If we were faced with an industrial activity that offered reasonable alternatives or in which the parties inflicted harm only on each other, the work stoppage might be allowed to continue until the parties took the action necessary to settle the dispute. This is not the nature of the grain handling industry at Thunder Bay.

The Thunder Bay terminals are the largest elevator facilities in Canada. Approximately 40 per cent of Canada's grain exports flowed through Thunder Bay in the last crop year which ended July 31, 1991. The significance of the elevators to the economy of Thunder Bay is obvious. Their importance to the ability of western Canada's grain producers to get their crops to domestic and world markets is equally self-evident.

Madam Speaker, the economic impact of the strike at the Thunder Bay terminals is clearly of great concern to the government. The intensity of the competition among grain exporting countries is well known. The threat to the viability and income of our grain farmers is well appreciated by members of the House. What is unfortunate, Madam Speaker, is that this strike occurs at a time when the Thunder Bay terminals are experiencing a rebound in the volume of grain exports after two years of low exports.

[Translation]

The volume of grain exports increased considerably in the last crop year and we do not want to see this improvement jeopardized further by this strike and by the preceding stoppage involving the PSAC grain inspectors and weighers.

[English]

I know that the Prime Minister and my colleagues, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds will have more to say on an assistance plan for grain farmers. But at a time when this government is working on a significant measure of assistance for grain producers, it is unthinkable that a work stoppage in the grain handling industry could jeopardize these efforts and the welfare of the grain producing industry of western Canada.

The proposed Thunder Bay Grain Handling Operations Act provides for the immediate resumption of grain handling operations in the port of Thunder Bay. It also makes provision for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator to deal with all matters remaining in dispute between the parties. The bill extends the term of the collective agreement to include the period beginning February 1, 1991 and ending on a date to be fixed by the mediator-arbitrator not earlier than January 31, 1993 or later than January 31, 1994.

Under the terms of the legislation, the mediator-arbitrator is given 90 days or such longer period as the minister may allow to endeavour to mediate all of the matters in dispute.

In the event that the mediator-arbitrator appointed under the legislation is unable to bring about agreement with respect to any such matters, he or she is required to render an arbitral award on the issue.

For the information of hon. members, the main issue in dispute during this round of negotiations centres on pensions. I can assure hon. members this and all other issues will be placed before the mediator-arbitrator.

Nothing in the proposed legislation restricts the right of the parties to agree to amend any provision of the agreement other than that relating to the term of the agreement.

The bill also contains enforcement provisions to ensure compliance with the legislation.

The Thunder Bay Grain Handling Operations Act, while bringing about an end to the current work stoppage, does provide the parties with an alternative to an imposed settlement. By providing for an appointment of a mediator-arbitrator, the legislation presents the two sides to the grain handling dispute with the further opportunity to avail themselves of a neutral third-party assistance in arriving at an acceptable solution to their grievances.

Equally important is the fact that although Parliament is being asked to move urgently on this legislation, the parties can still take advantage of the opportunity to settle the dispute themselves before enactment and before proclamation.

I am prepared to continue to offer our assistance to the parties, but time has now become critical. I urge the negotiators for the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association and the Transportation Communications International Union Lodge 650, to seize this occasion and make every effort to reach an accommodation on the outstanding issues in dispute.

[Translation]

As I indicated earlier in my tenure as Labour minister, it is not a pleasant task for me to introduce such legislation. However, the parties to this dispute have had ample opportunity, including conciliation assistance, to resolve the issues in dispute and have failed to do so. They have imposed the consequences of their dispute on Western grain producers.

[English]

I am sure hon. members would agree that this government has an obligation to act in order to protect the economic interest of the agricultural sector as well as Canada's reputation as a reliable grain exporter. This legislation underscores this government's commitment to that responsibility.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments relating to this back to work legislation and what the minister has just said in his opening remarks. I also want to suggest some alternatives that could have been put forward before we had to again, as a government, get involved in labour relations.

To a certain extent, I want to say to members in this Chamber that it is becoming quite obvious to us who are involved in labour negotiations that the government has now become part of the collective bargaining process and that, in essence, is the final conclusion and that we, as members, are being asked more and more often to be the final arbiter of whether a particular dispute should be allowed to carry on or whether a particular dispute has any ability of success.

I want to deal first with some of the background of this particular dispute in Thunder Bay. By doing that I think it is important to rely on a couple of interesting statistics. This strike is not an unusual strike in the sense that it is the fourth such strike in the last 20 years in Thunder Bay.

There is something unique about this and that is that in the previous strikes with the grain handlers in Thunder Bay, they were all worked out before back to work legislation took place. For example in 1968 workers were out two months before a mediator was appointed and that mediator helped the process to a final conclusion and there was no back to work legislation.

In 1981 during a very difficult period in our history as a country there was a world recession, a massive recession. Workers were out for two weeks and again a mediator was appointed and there was a resolution to that dispute before back to work legislation took place.

Again in 1986 workers were out five weeks and a mediator by the name of Bill Kelly was appointed and again I want to emphasize that there was a resolution to the dispute without back to work legislation.

I want to suggest to the minister and members of this House something about the belief that this particular strike has been going on for a long time. In labour terms a week is not a long time. It is unfortunate, I want to emphasize this, that we are putting two particular groups against each other. We know that the farmers are having tremendous difficulty in the west and that there are bankruptcies every day. I also want to emphasize that we have a position in this House to maintain and that is that collective bargaining and the rights of workers also at the same time have to be maintained.

That is a very delicate situation for members of Parliament. There are competing interests as we well know in this House. We have been lobbied by our own colleagues. I suggest the minister has had the same difficulty I have had and that is members from his caucus and members from my caucus from western Canada and those who are really involved in the grain industry are suggesting that it is totally inappropriate for a particular strike like this to be going on at this time.

I want to suggest to the minister that I am very disappointed in some of the comments that have been made by him in the last few days. On the one hand he suggested in answers to me in the House of Commons that he wanted both sides to come to some sort of agreement without back to work legislation.

On the same day that the minister was saying that to me and members of the House of Commons, another minister of the government was suggesting that in essence they have already agreed in cabinet that there would be back to work legislation and they would not allow this dispute to go on any further.

I want to point out to the minister and to members of Parliament who are interested in this issue that when those kinds of statements are made when a dispute is ongoing, one has pretty well completed the process for the two bargaining parties. Simply, one cannot negotiate when one side does not believe that there is any reason to negotiate.

I talk specifically about the terminal employers, the individuals who are at this time trying their hardest to ship grain out of the Thunder Bay port. I think it is very important that the Lakehead Terminal Elevator Association be aware that we on this side of the House do not appreciate the belief that it does not have to bargain in good faith any longer because the government will bring down the axe as soon as it feels that there is any pressure or any heat from the public.

In a situation like this there is guaranteed to be heat and pressure applied by all sides because of the effects of a strike of this nature.

I want to put on the record some of the issues that are ongoing and one of the reasons why this particular negotiation has not had the ability to be rectified by both parties.

People have to be aware that the union, the transportation communication workers, have said to all those who are prepared to listen that this is not a fight between farmers and grain handlers in Thunder Bay. This is basically a negotiation for survival.

Since 1984 these particular employees have lost in this union in the city of Thunder Bay, which is something we also have to be very cognizant of, a minimum of 1,000 jobs.

Also, to follow suit, out of the 900 roughly who are still there, only 400 are considered to be full time. Full time in the harsh environment in which we live in Thunder Bay is a maximum of six months employment. You can understand when looking at it in that perspective just what that means to the members of the union, to their families and to the city of Thunder Bay.

In essence what we see is a complete dismantling of that particular port. The argument the union is making is that if there is not some sort of understanding of where we are going as a country as it relates to the handling of grain and the shipments of grain across Canada, and if we do not have some sort of plan of how we are going to deal with that, then these people cannot continue to feel that their jobs are secure and that they have an opportunity like all other Canadians of making some sort of plans in their lives. They do not know whether they will have a job tomorrow.

This is really what the negotiations are about. One is about job security, and one is about the lack of sensitivity of the terminal employers in Thunder Bay. They do not realize that the employees need to have some semblance of where they are going to go.

I want to use one example, the pension plan itself. Apparently, and this is what we are being told, the union has a pension plan to which the two parties contribute. This plan has a surplus of $7 million. In the plan the employer is asked to contribute a certain amount. What the argument is in negotiation right now is that in essence the employer has not contributed a red cent. It has refused to contribute.

To make matters worse, because of technological change, because of pools being put together in an amalgamation process, there is going to be some job loss and we very much in this place understand that.

What the union has asked the company for is the ability to remove the employees in a more humane way through attrition. Instead, what it has decided to do is remove the employees at the top end of the pension scale, meaning those employees who have up to 14 years of seniority. Just this spring 27 of those employees lost their jobs, the reason being very simple. It is cheaper for those particular companies to hire young individuals who are not going to cost them any pension benefits down the road.

Because of that scenario and the lack of ability of the workers to get the companies to discuss pensions at the negotiating table, the negotiations broke down.

I want to suggest to the government that it did not do a very good job as a third party, a helping hand type of philosophy that the Department of Labour has in past disagreements been used for. It took one of its top officials in the ministry of labour and sent him to Thunder Bay on Tuesday night with a last ditch attempt to make it look like it was interested in a negotiated settlement.

You cannot sit with a particular group in a span of a few hours and at the same time get statements over the wire as were made by the minister of grains and oilseeds and expect anything to come of it.

• (1120)

In essence the government on the one hand wants Canadians to pretend that it was quite prepared to let both parties come to an agreement as quickly as they could without interference, but at the same time had already made its decision that it was going to legislate these two groups back to work as of Friday, which is tomorrow.

I want everyone to know in this place that under those circumstances, we will never get a negotiated settlement in this country when there is a strike on if that is the kind of attitude this government is going to take.

For that reason I would like to talk about a particular amendment I am going to be putting to the House today. That amendment simply has to do with who will be helping the two parties make a decision in this particular dispute.

Under clause 8 of the particular bill we are debating here today, the mediator-arbitrator is going to be appointed by the government. I have suggested to the minister and now I am suggesting to all Canadians that because of the difficulties of this particular situation and the quickness of the government's reaction to the pressure of the farmers, and I can understand the tremendous amount of pressure it felt because I know colleagues of mine on this side of the House have felt the same pressure, there was not the opportunity for the mediator who was to be appointed under the understanding that I had from the minister, as of today for example, to discuss this issue further with the groups.

That mediation never took place. A mediator was never formally appointed to sit down with both sides. He was there simply to feel out both parties to see if there was room for a settlement.

The minister has stated in the House today that there is room for settlement, there is some room for manoeuvrability. Because of that, if we were not so quick to act, I am quite convinced that there could have been a settlement to this disagreement.

For that reason I would like to ask the members to consider in this place that we appoint an arbitration panel, a panel with expertise from the company and expertise from the union, because the particular issues that are being dealt with are very technical. Due to the fact that there was not a lot of discussion beforehand by the mediator, what took place was a lack of consultation and a lack of homework by both sides.

I think it would be very appropriate to give the minister time to look at the idea of a panel in order for us to look at the technical aspects of the disagreement. I am suggesting that the union be allowed to appoint someone to this panel and the company be allowed to appoint someone to this panel and that the arbitrator appointed by the government allow the minister and the members of Parliament and the public at large to have representation and the arbitrator appointed by the government would have the last say in this whole dispute.

We have not had an opportunity for both sides to bring their arguments forward because the company has refused to this date to discuss the issue of the pension and job security situations in the port of Thunder Bay.

I will be presenting that motion later on today. I give notice to all the members who are here to think about that because it is a little bit different than what is normally put in place. I think in this particular case the uniqueness of it will allow that sort of situation to take place.

I understand the minister is now looking at that seriously. I think his fear is that this might become unruly and in essence the government appointed arbitrator will have to make the decision anyway.

I am hoping that with both parties at the table in the sense of being a more active participant, with the technical expertise of those other two individuals, we may be able to get some sort of long-term resolution to this problem and not a short-term band-aid that a mediator-arbitrator normally puts in place. An arbitrator is normally not capable of dealing with the intricate issues of the whole industry because, to put it simply, that individual does not work in that industry on a daily basis. I look to the government to look on this particular amendment favourably because it is something that I am sure that the workers and the people of Thunder Bay would like resolved in the long term, and that is just what the Lakehead terminal employers are proposing to do with the 900 employees who are left in that particular city.

I want to suggest also to the government that we on this side are very concerned about the process of back to work legislation that is being put forward to us in this House on a fairly regular occasion. I want to make mention of three pieces of legislation that we have seen; one as late as last June and the last two, this one we are talking about today and the PSAC back to work legislation.

I first commend the minister on this piece of legislation and the one in June allowing us a mediator-arbitrator. Hopefully we will expand on that and have a panel. I must confess that I am a little bit lost to understand why they would not also allow for a mediator-arbitrator in the PSAC dispute and the back to work legislation that we saw by the President of the Treasury Board not too long ago in this place.

The inconsistency of the policy of the government as it relates to labour relations in this country and the lack of policy and direction that it is giving employers and employees alike is going to create some difficulties for us down the road if it continues.

I caution the government not to continue to put these kinds of pressures on the collective bargaining process. If it does, it will completely fall apart. I do not want to sensationalize this issue, but I want the government to realize that there will come a point in time if it continues this back to work legislation on a regular basis where employees will refuse to go back to work. Then the whole system of our laws and our institutions will fall apart. It is not that drastic a move for people not to realize that it could happen. It simply could happen if we continue not to have the sensitivity that is necessary to allow both sides who are in dispute to work out their differences without the hammer coming down.

I have discussed this issue on numerous occasions with the minister. I have discussed this with both parties on numerous occasions. I want all in this place to know that I do not for one believe that the Director General of Mediation and Conciliation or the Minister of Labour and his department have done a job which could even be considered decent in this whole issue.

We have no choice in this place as members of Parliament but to vote in favour of legislation like this because of the competing interests and the pressures that are there. We do not have to like it, even though we do vote in favour of it because we realize the sensitivity of the problems that the farmers in the west are having at this time and the difficulties of our international reputation of shippers of grain to the rest of the world.

Having said that, I would like to conclude by saying to the minister that we on this side would like to suggest to him and to the government that they reflect on what the union has asked them to do and that is to take a look at a particular appointment: "Therefore, under Canada Labour Code Part I, division 7, general promotion of industrial peace, the Transportation Communication Union, lodge 650 hereby make formal application to the minister to appoint an industrial inquiry commission to examine the following".

I want to put this on the record because this is really the issue that we are dealing with. What we are dealing with right now is the immediate crisis in the grain industry, the immediate crisis that farmers are having. In the long term we need a solution to the problems that are becoming more and more obvious to us all. What they would like the minister to look at in this industrial inquiry commission is: (a) outstanding bargaining issues currently in dispute between the Transportation Communications Union and the Lakehead Terminal Elevators; (b) upon settlement of the current labour dispute, the commission would then examine matters that will affect industrial relations, including future negotiations between the TCU Lodge and the Lakehead terminal employers. One is the effect of reduced grain handling through the port of Thunder Bay. Two is the effect of decline in grain prices for prairie commodities. Three is the effect of technological change. And four where they would like to consider the elevator's consolidation.

This is very important because, as I said at the very beginning of my intervention, we have lost a total of 1,000 jobs in Thunder Bay since 1984. You can understand how the people in Thunder Bay feel about this particular issue right now, not just the employees, but all the people who are associated with the city of Thunder Bay.

I think it would be very much appropriate for the minister, once we have dealt with this piece of legislation today, to take a look at this particular request by the union, which is really a request by the city of Thunder Bay, to get an understanding of where we are going in this country as it relates to grain handling. Is it going to be a fact, as a lot of people in Thunder Bay think, that most of the grain in this country is going to be shipped from the west coast? Is it true? If it is true, let us be up front about where we are going with this and say to the employees and their families in the city of Thunder Bay that in the long term, the next 10 or 15 or 20 years, this is what we envision the structure of grain shipments in this country will look like.

If we think that this particular piece of legislation by the minister and the government of the day is going to rectify the issues that are before us in the city of Thunder Bay and across Canada, we really are whistling in the dark.

I am suggesting to the minister and to the government that we have to look at both these issues. One, in the short term, is the arbitration panel that I have suggested in order to talk about some of these issues that the city of Thunder Bay and its employees and employers are talking about, and also the application for the inquiry to the minister to look at the over-all issue in general of this particular industry.

Having said all that, I would urge the government to realize, first and foremost, that this side is not very appreciative of this particular piece of legislation because it does walk all over the whole process of collective bargaining, but we, in essence, when all is said and done, will support this legislation because we believe that the crisis situation will not be helped in the short term by delaying the legislation, but in the long term, we emphasize we would like to see some process put in place that will be fair to all sides and especially to the city of Thunder Bay so that this situation will not happen as a regular occurrence.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I, too, wish to speak on this back to work legislation. In starting out, I would like to point out to the minister that we have been co-operative to-day in that we have allowed him to waive notice and to start this debate without the usual 48 hour notice that is required under the House rules.

I want to, in retrospect, make it very clear that we are not stalling this legislation but, on the other hand, we do not believe in giving the government a blank cheque.

I was somewhat disturbed to hear that the Liberal Party will vote for this legislation and I was very disturbed to find out that one of the Winnipeg members of the Liberal caucus said that they would support the legislation even before they saw it. The one thing I have learned with this Prime Minister and this government is you never give them a blank cheque. I just do not trust the government and I think there are a number of reasons in recent history why many, many Canadians do not trust this government and would certainly not wish to give it a blank cheque.

In looking at the legislation, I too believe that for the most part it is reasonable legislation, although I have always objected to the high fines that are there and which are obviously very high on the employees and do not have the same economic impact on employers. The reality of the situation is that the employers can always afford these fines where individual Canadians cannot afford them.

The other aspect of the legislation that disturbs me is the fact that it was brought in because the director of mediation services says he cannot successfully complete his work.

Let us look at what happened yesterday. The director of mediation finally arrives in Thunder Bay. It was his first day there. He has a meeting with the union and the company. They agree to get back to the table. There is an understanding that the outstanding issue, which was pensions, would be dealt with at this meeting.

As the meeting is about to commence, there is a Canadian Press story saying that the minister of grains and oilseeds has announced that the government will be introducing back to work legislation.

At the same time that story barged its way into the mediation room, the House of Commons committee that deals with labour matters was also meeting. I got a copy of that CP story which I showed to the minister in the committee. The record will show that.

I said that the announcement would destroy the work of the director of mediation. Later that afternoon, I had a chance to talk with the union side. The first thing that was said, even before I had a chance to open my mouth was: "Did you see what Mr. Mayer said?" Their caucus was up in arms.

They said—I understand that the director of mediation echoed it—that the whole mood of the mediation changed as a result of that premature and completely unnecessary political announcement by the minister of grains and oilseeds.

I do not know whether or not mediation would have worked. I am not going to make one of these announcements that says: "If Mr. Mayer had not said what he said, then mediation would have succeeded." I do know that it failed as a result of the unnecessary and unwarranted intervention of the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds.

I have been a negotiator and I know how important it is to have a good mood in a negotiating room, to feel that you are being treated fairly so that you can work out the problems.

As I said earlier, yesterday was the first time that the employers were willing to allow the controversial issue of pensions to be dealt with. It was the first time, at the very first meeting on the issue that is preventing a settlement. Then the dagger was dropped.

The dagger was dropped by this government, not by the minister responsible for labour, the person who has been saying in this House that we have to let mediation work, that he wants the mediator to go in there to try to resolve this issue and to get both parties together. No, that power was taken from the Minister of Labour. It was usurped by the minister of grains and oilseeds, a man who is completely insensitive as to what the job of a mediator is. He was completely insensitive to how damaging his remarks would be.

His words may have played well in certain parts of the country and they may have played well in a province that is facing a provincial election on October 21, but they were unnecessary remarks. They were inappropriate remarks and they were very damaging remarks. I wish the minister of grains and oilseeds was in the House and could apologize to the people of Canada.

I come from western Canada and I do understand the plight of the farmers, especially at this time. I understand their concern for making sure that grain flows. We could understand that. We can support that but I find it ironic that this government wants this legislation passed now.

We have had the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and various Conservative backbenchers get up and say we must let the grain flow. Yet yesterday in the House of Commons I asked the Minister of Agriculture this: "If you want the grain to flow, why are you laying off workers in Churchill tomorrow, Friday of this week; why are you closing down the one port that has not been affected by strikes at all this year?"

• (1140)

The minister said: "Well, there are no ships in Churchill".

The minister was wrong. The minister is completely unaware of what is happening in the port of Churchill, western Canada's only prairie seaport. It is not surprising that you hear these statements from the Prime Minister, the minister for grains and oilseeds, the Minister of Agriculture and other Conservatives. They don't even know what is going on at a prairie port. They don't even know that they are closing down a port early. They don't even know that grain has been sitting in full grain cars for over 10 days, grain that should have been going to Churchill is sitting at the Hudson Bay junction, not flowing.

The Minister of Agriculture also got up and said that there is no storage at Churchill. There is lots of storage room in Churchill. Again the ministers of this Crown, who get up and pretend to be so concerned about farmers, do not even know what is happening in their own areas of responsibility.

Madam Speaker, I could go on for a long time but I think what we want to resolve in this House today is how, now that the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds has caused all this commotion, how we resolve this dispute—not just for today, not just for next week, but for the long term.

One of the suggestions that I had made was that of the three person panel, instead of having a mediator–arbitrator. I talked to the minister and he said this was a cumbersome approach, that it is not done federally. Well, it is done in many provinces and it works successfully. I say that not from an academic background or anything of that nature, I know it works because I have used three person arbitration boards when I was negotiating for teachers in northern Manitoba and as an employer who has negotiated on the employment side I have sat on a three person arbitration board.

From personal experience I know it works. I really would recommend that the Minister of Labour and this government consider a way of having this legislation passed fairly quickly through this House and at the same time make sure that the local concerns of the people of Thunder Bay are understood.

The minister might be able to find a mediator–arbitrator who is experienced. He might find someone who as an individual is respected by both labour and management. But that does not guarantee that the concerns of the employees in Thunder Bay, the concerns of the employers, are truly understood when the final decision is being made. That is the advantage of a three person panel; you don't have to have this arbitrator sitting by himself or herself in isolation, making his or her decision on the basis of various formal presentations that have been made. He or she would be in a room with two people who have understanding of the situation, the history in Thunder Bay, the history of the elevators, the real economic situation that faces both the employees and the employer. A three person panel allows for those concerns to be dealt with in whatever final report that comes out.

It ensures local participation. It ensures a thorough understanding of the issues and it ensures that the history of Thunder Bay where I believe somewhere in the neighbourhood of a thousand positions have disappeared over the last while, is understood and when making a decision this is dealt with.

Madam Speaker, I cannot stress how important this is. I have also been in a situation where we have had a single arbitrator. I have seen arbitrators with all their knowledge and with all their experience lack the important information to come down with a settlement that really resolves the issues that are in conflict.

As I said, we have many fine arbitrators in this country, many very skilled mediator–arbitrators but they do not necessarily have all the information at their fingertips that is necessary.

I would say that there can be an almost just end to this labour dispute in Thunder Bay. Forget about the minister for grains and oilseeds' unnecessary and unwarranted intervention; forget about the fact that various cabinet ministers have got up in this House and blamed the workers for everything, because that has happened; forget about the fact that mediation was never really given a chance to work in Thunder Bay; forget about the fact that this legislation was announced not by the Minister of Labour but by another minister who should not have been involved in the first place.

Let us look at what we can do now. Let us look for a way where this government and this House can show justice to the people of Thunder Bay. Let us ensure that we have a three person panel that can understand the issues as they apply in Thunder Bay, understand the broader issues of grain handling, the concerns of the pools, but make sure they also understand what is really happening in that community. That is one way that this government can show good faith.

I would hope that the Minister of Labour would show that good faith and make those necessary amendments when we get to committee of the whole. It is a way of resolving it. It does not require any more time. There are clauses in the legislation before us that give the mediator-arbitrator 90 days to make his or her decision. The same thing can be done with a three person panel. It is not cumbersome. Yes, it is more difficult in some ways for some individuals. However, it does ensure along with that difficulty that we actually deal with the issues that are there and it gives us a much better chance of providing a long-term solution to some of the problems that exist in Thunder Bay.

I would also like to point that this is not a union that has been on strike each and every year. This is not a union that has required back to work legislation in order to resolve its disputes. For the most part the grain handlers at Thunder Bay have negotiated with their employers and have settled the situation without the need for back to work legislation.

Now that it is before this House I think that it is imperative that the government give the tools to the employers and to the employees to ensure lasting peace at the port in Thunder Bay.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on this legislation, an act to provide the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay. I would like to address it from three aspects; first of all, the seaway itself from the aspect of agriculture and the farmers and third, from the aspect of all Canadians. I had a great deal of sympathy for the hon. member from Thunder Bay. I have sat on the transport committee different times when a great deal of concern was raised about the seaway and grain handling. Anyone who has sat on the transport committee knows the history of that situation.

• (1150)

I believe at one time about 75 per cent of the grain came through the Thunder Bay route and the St. Lawrence Seaway. That has changed drastically. Having been a farmer on the prairies and living to the east side of Moose Jaw, I know that the cut-off point for the transportation of grain generally speaking has been from Moose Jaw west and from Moose Jaw east through Thunder Bay.

The numbers are dramatic. Also I do not believe he drew attention to it but the price of grain at the port of Vancouver is higher than the price of grain at the port of Thunder Bay. This all comes into play.

It is very important to the St. Lawrence Seaway and to grain handling in Thunder Bay that the movement of grain is continuous and not held up. I think it is in the best interests of the workers there that the grain keeps moving and this continues because there are difficulties that surround the whole movement of grain. I indicated earlier that 75 per cent of the grain used to come out and there were return loads such as steel and other things for the boats coming in. This is very important. We understand that and I certainly heard what the member had to say. However I am pleased to hear that they are going to support this legislation because they realize the impact of the significance of this to a country.

From the aspect of agriculture, we saw in Winnipeg yesterday the very difficult situation that farmers are facing. There is no question about that. It is obvious to this House and to anybody in Canada who is watching the situation what farmers are facing.

I was at Rosetown. The presentations made by farm groups and farmers were very important and made in a direction that was non-political. Yet they said in a very direct way to the people of Canada and to the government that grain handling and the situation of farm income is so important today. No one would argue with that. We are talking about farm income figures at $6,300 a family farm, which of course is a number that comes from Agriculture Canada. Within hours I think we will hear announcements from the government addressing that situation.

The Prime Minister was in Winnipeg and had a very good meeting with the farm leaders. He indicated very clearly that there would be help coming from the government for the farmers.

However, the movement of grain in this situation is very important. It is important to the continuance of our customers. Boats come in and there are demurrage costs. The Grains Commission indicated that the cost at the strike was something like $50 million a week in demurrage and cost of grain sales. When boats are turned back or not loaded, sales are lost. They could go to Seattle and load or they could just lose confidence in the ability of the grain movement in Canada to meet the need. This is not helpful.

It is most important that we have an effective system so that we do not lose our markets, especially when we are facing the problems on the international scene.

We know what it means in terms of dollars and cents to the farmers and the farm situation.

I was speaking to representatives of some of our elevator companies in Saskatchewan last evening. They indicated that they could take grain if they could get it moving. This is most important to our farmers and to their livelihood.

The third area that I would like to speak about is the importance of this movement of grain to all Canadians. I think there is something happening in Canada that I am not entirely enthused about. In fact, I am very, very concerned about it.

There seems to be an undeclared war between urban Canada and rural Canada. This ought not to be. This ought not to be, and I want to emphasize this. Grain movement and the conditions of agriculture are important to every Canadian citizen.

One of the strengths of this country has been that we have been able to provide cheap food for Canadians. Maybe it is too cheap. Agriculture Canada tells us that probably 14 per cent of the income of Canadians buys their food. In many, many countries, it is up to 50 per cent and I am not saying that that is ideal.

What I am saying though is that as Canadian farmers, and I am one, have provided a service; the production of food for Canadians, for North Americans and even for the world if you will, at a very, very reasonable price.

It is important that we have the strength to continue to do that. I believe that we need understanding from the urban community and the rural community.

One of the advantages, if there are advantages, of carrying the message through these rallies has been that the Canadian citizen, whether rural or urban, becomes conscious of a very, very serious problem that exists.

This problem is not only at the local and rural level, it is also at the national and the international level. Our government has taken steps and the Prime Minister has given leadership, particularly at the international level.

I attended the meeting in Vancouver with the Prime Minister when he met with 50 farm groups going to Tokyo. The topic of agriculture was not on the agenda of the G–7. Thanks to the Prime Minister, and too often he has received no thanks, it was put on the agenda of the G–7 and is now running at the forefront. This is important at the international level. It is very, very important.

We are getting tired of hearing the word "GATT", but it is very, very important that we see and find some agreements in that area.

I want to point this out on grain movement. We have sold to Russia over the past 30 years about 37 per cent of the production of agricultural commodities and grains and oilseeds. It is about 37 per cent.

That country is in a position now where it has no money. One of the major problems that we face in agriculture and from the international aspect as well as the national is that many of our sales go to countries and people who cannot afford to pay, yet they need the products.

This certainly begs an international problem which needs an international solution of making food a priority. If there is one human right that any individual should have anywhere in the world, it is the right to eat. It should certainly be a priority.

We must say that that is not the priority in the way it exists today. Our government and our Prime Minister recognize that. Our Prime Minister has been giving leadership at the international level although you might say: "We have not seen much proof of it". It is on the table and it is important.

I think we have a window of opportunity right now, when the Prime Minister is dealing with Mr. Gorbachev and Mr. Bush and the G–7 countries saying "how are we going to come to grips with this problem." There is a window of opportunity to deal with this very serious problem, but it is going to need understanding from all of the countries of the G–7, Japan included.

I would like to get into that sometime, but it leads into another subject. When I go to my farm and I pick up bearings that I get from the John Deere Company, they will have "Japan" written on them. I go and start up my grain loader and it will have a motor that was made in Japan. I walk up the hill to the House of Commons and I count the cars coming up and I look at the makes and they are Toyota and many makes that are made in Japan, East Germany and other countries.

My own view on this is that some of these countries are going to have to start carrying some of the load of producing food and providing food to people who cannot afford to pay for it, because the farmers on the prairies or in Ontario or Quebec or wherever across this country cannot subsidize the Third World. We cannot do it. It is impossible.

We need an international approach, which the Prime Minister has been taking, which the Minister for International Trade has been taking in international trade, which our Minister of Agriculture, our minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, our Minister of Finance and so on have been taking.

I would now like to move back to the national scene, the importance of grain handling and co-operation between the rural community and the urban community. We had a good example yesterday. The hon. member sitting behind me here was at that meeting when we met with the chicken producers of B.C. and the turkey producers and, I believe, a representation of the dairy producers.

The whole situation of article XI certainly comes into play here with respect to the GATT. I made the point to that delegation that the best friend it had in B.C. in dealing with this problem at the GATT was the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec in the dairy industry and in the feather industry has the same problems that it has. There is strength in unity, not in separation as some are directing. There are political movements at both ends of this country that would divide the unity of this country.

I made the point to the farmers there that it was most important if they were to have a strong feather/dairy industry in B.C. to have the support of the farmers in Quebec. I made the point by saying: "Let us say this country separated, God forbid, but in 18 months or two years from now, you could have a much bigger problem than just dealing with article XI of the GATT".

We must recognize the importance of this country working together, both ends of the country, every province, to strengthen agriculture for the benefit of all Canadians. I make the point that we need an understanding of agriculture, of rural Canada and of urban Canada. I think we all agree that at this time it is most important that the grain move down the St. Lawrence Seaway as well as to the west.

I am very, very pleased about the debate that has been introduced today. I am sure that every farmer in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, B.C., Alberta and right across the country are together in this thing. We are together in this as Canadians for the benefit of Canada. For the benefit of having a strong Canada we must have a strong agriculture and a strong economy.

If you want to look at the example today of what happened in Russia, its agricultural industry went down to the point where it cannot feed themselves. God forbid that that would ever happen in North America, but it is important that we not take things for granted and that food becomes a priority in the mind.

I should not get off on this subject because it is a pet theme of mine, as many of you know. Food is not a priority in the world today but it should be. It is one of the basic human rights, but I believe that there is a consciousness today across this country and a consciousness this fall that may bring about some rethinking in political circles all around the world that says every person has a right to eat, but you cannot have that food unless you have got a producer out there who can produce that food. We need to work together, rural and urban, all Canadians, to build a stronger industry, to build a stronger Canada, for truly this country has been an example of a country in which we do not know shortage.

I want to throw this in. I talked to a doctor from Austria. I asked him the question on subsidies. He said, very simply: "You North Americans"—he qualified us all as North Americans—"don't understand hunger. In my lifetime I have seen hunger three times. You do not have an appreciation for food or the priority of it that you ought to have".

I think that today Canadians need to have a new appreciation of the priorities that should be put on food, and this goes right down to the producer, to grain handling and to the urban centres. We are all together in this. I cannot emphasize enough again, as we look to this bill, the importance of doing something that will move quickly to get the grain moving.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I want to put a few remarks on the record with respect to this legislation.

First of all, though, I would like to point out that I concur with some of the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary a few moments ago. When he talks about making food a priority I agree with him. I see food as part of our security. I think it is essential to the security of this country because if we cannot maintain a viable agricultural industry, if we cannot feed ourselves then we, as a nation, are not secure. I support the parliamentary secretary on that point.

When he talks about a better understanding or needing a better understanding between rural folk and city folk, or between the rural communities and the urban areas, again I concur in those remarks because when you come right down to it, we are all in this together. We all eat. We all need a strong agricultural community. We have to work together. There has to be a major element of co-operation.

When you witness the kind of development that has occurred at Thunder Bay, that is a strike of grain handlers, a strike that impedes the movement of grain, that creates difficulties, in effect it pits farmer against labour and that is unfortunate. There is no reason in the world why farmers and blue collar workers have to be at each other's throats, that they have to be adversaries. I am idealistic enough to believe that they should always be on the same side of the ledger or the same side of the equation.

There is no doubt that a strike of the kind that is currently in place at Thunder Bay creates difficulties. We have got to remove that impediment as fast as possible and as much as possible not take away the very essential rights that belong to labour in this country.

There is one other point that I want to make. It relates to something that the parliamentary secretary mentioned just a few minutes ago. He was talking about the assistance required by farmers. He was mentioning the alleged Prime Minister's leadership on this question.

We are all aware of the plight of the farmers. We are all aware that they are getting $2 or less than $2 a bushel for their wheat. That is a starvation price. They need help and they need it very quickly. I am told that just minutes ago the Minister of Agriculture did announce some kind of aid package. I am not familiar with the details but I am hoping it is the kind of aid package that farmers will appreciate.

If there is an aid package that is welcomed by farmers, is it really because of the Prime Minister's leadership or is it because of the farmers in this country taking matters into their own hands? I think it is the latter. If we do have an assistance program announced today, I think most of the credit, if not all the credit, should go to the farmers in this country. They are the ones who held the rallies. They are the ones who held rallies in Miami and Brandon, Manitoba and in Rosetown and Weyburn, Saskatchewan and the granddaddy of them all, insofar as rallies are concerned, was held in my home city of Winnipeg yesterday. It is estimated that about 7,000 farmers gathered on the grounds of the Manitoba legislative building to make their case, to tell the world about their plight, about their financial situation. If there is some assistance announced today I think the credit should go to the farmers.

The government knew about this situation months ago. In a way the government's procrastination or the government's dithering really put the farmers through a terrible wringer. They have gone through hellish moments in the last few months. This is what they have had to do. They have had to hold rallies to tell this government to act.

I think it is unfortunate that they had to do that. I do not think it is in the nature of farmers to do what they have done in the past few weeks. I know it is not in their nature. Farmers in conversation can make their points and make them very strongly. It is not in their nature and not in their history really, although it has been done on occasion in the past to gather together in huge crowds and loudly protest. That is not the way they do it.

They did it because of the situation they are in. They did it because the government was not acting. The government was not moving.

Now I hear that the government has announced something. I wish I had the details. I hope it comes some way in helping farmers through this very difficult period. But I can tell you this: All the emergency aid in the world is not the ultimate answer. I say this because we have an unbelievably vicious trade war going on out there over subsidies. Until we deal with that situation, we will not find a resolution to some of the major problems facing farmers.

With respect to the legislation, my good friend from Kenora—Rainy River has already spoken to the specific issues. He has put those issues on the record and has spoken eloquently. I think the House better understands the situation as a result of his presentation a few minutes ago.

I want to say that I find these situations difficult because I wish collective bargaining would do the job. I wish that we MPs did not have to involve ourselves the way we have. We have done this a number of times. Just recently we did it in the month of June and that had to do with the work stoppage in Vancouver.

I do not like the way the system is working. I believe in collective bargaining. We give people the right to strike, we give them certain rights and privileges. They use them for whatever reason, and then because of the impact on the farm community in this case or on the economy, we yank those rights away. We unfortunately do not have any choice in this particular case. We don't have any choice but I think the system needs improvement. I said it in June and I will say it again, we have to examine this system and see if we can come up with improvements. It creates all kinds of tensions and I don't really think that we are the experts, are we? We are not the experts. We are here to lay down policy, to enact laws, and after that it is up to the parties involved to work out what is best for them.

I really urge the government to look at this in a very, very serious way, because we need improvement.

Our labour critic, the member for Kenora—Rainy River, talked about amending the legislation. He talked about the need for an arbitration panel consisting of representatives from labour and management and a neutral third party. To me, certainly on the surface, that makes a lot of sense. If you have a three party panel, you have expertise from a labour point of view and expertise from a management point of view. Then you have a third neutral objective person who can perhaps bring it all together, and bring about a settlement satisfactory to both parties.

When the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole, I hope this is something that can be examined in detail. I think that it has a lot of merit, certainly on the surface.

My final remarks, and again it is from an agricultural perspective, have to do with the current situation on the farm. Yes, we support the legislation because there is no choice. We have got to get the grain moving. Just minutes ago a farm package was announced and there may be some help there for the farmers. But we have got to get the grain moving. It has to go through the Lakehead. It is crucial that the exports are maintained, that our sales are maintained. It is very important to farmers that when they make a commitment to a nation, a commitment of sales, that that commitment is kept. If you do not live up to contractual commitments, as my friend from London West has just said, the competitors will step in and they will keep the commitment that you made in the first place. The farmers understand that and I think we all understand that. This is why the strike has to be ended. The work has to be resumed.

• (1220)

I checked the figures just this morning, Madam Speaker, and there is something like 3,700 boxcars waiting to be unloaded. That is a lot of wheat. That is a lot of boxcars. That is a lot of work and it has to be done right away.

In conclusion, I want to say it is of paramount importance to farmers, particularly on the prairies and in western Canada, that work resume at Thunder Bay. The grain must move.

It is unfortunate again that we find ourselves in a situation where farmers are pitted against organized labour but in this case economic factors are at the fore and they must be dealt with. The only way we can deal with it right now is to get this legislation passed as quickly as possible so that the grain handlers can get back to work.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House are sorry, as I am sure the government is in its own way, that it had to come to this but we are faced once again with back to work legislation, albeit in a different context than the back to work legislation we were faced with over the strike by the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

The dilemma throughout the week has been that on the one hand we wanted the minister to give as much time as possible to the collective bargaining process in order for it to work. At the same time we knew that the closer we got without success to the end of the week prior to the one when Parliament was not sitting, we were creating the possibility of having to deal with this legislation in a very short time frame. This is one of the reasons we have made it possible for the debate to begin in the way we did this morning. We will continue to be in discussion with the government over the course of the day as to how things ought to proceed.

I might say in referring to how things unfolded this week that there might have been a different outcome. The possibility of an agreement being reached was sabotaged or endangered—however you want to put it—by the statements made by the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds at the rally in Winnipeg yesterday, that things were proceeding. There was no guarantee that they would proceed to an agreement but nevertheless there was progress. When people heard at the rally in Winnipeg that the minister had announced back to work legislation, this indeed soured the mood and made the possibility of an agreement even less likely.

I think that is unfortunate and is one of the contributing factors to why we find ourselves in the situation we are now in.

It is not just farmers, although obviously it is farmers, who are most greatly affected by this. These strikes affect other people and other sectors of the economy as well. I speak as one who has a great many railroaders in my riding. When the grain finally piles up and the boxcars are not being emptied and not coming back, that eventually begins to affect employment in ridings like Winnipeg Transcona.

Railroaders know what it is like to be on strike.

I keep that in mind when I deliberate upon what my response might be to the kind of situation I find myself in now and which my colleagues and I find ourselves in as supporters of the collective bargaining process and as people who are generally critical of back to work legislation, but who realize also that there are situations, particularly when the government has made up its mind, that call for some arrangement to be made here in the House with respect to the legislation.

Again, the government could have made all this a lot easier and still could make it easier if it would agree to the very reasonable requests that are being made by the union vis-à-vis the legislation.

One of the sticking points over the last little while in the negotiations, as I understand them, has been the refusal of management, the company, the pools, to put pensions on the table. It seems to me reasonable for employees to want to be able to negotiate, at the time of renegotiating a contract, to want to have the matter of pensions on the table. This has not been the position of the companies.

All that the minister had to do, and I understand that he has said something in this respect, earlier on in the week was use whatever clout he has as the Minister of Labour to make sure that pensions were on the table in a way that might have helped an agreement to come about.

There has also been a request by the union for a three person arbitration board, rather than the one person as the government suggests, the idea being a person selected by management, another person selected by the union and someone else mutually acceptable is a preferable way of having settlements like this arbitrated.

As the hon. member for Churchill said, this is not uncommon. It is a process that has worked. It is not as if it is some radical new idea. It is just a radical new idea to the bureaucrats in the Department of Labour who do not like to do anything different. They have their ways. They are set in their ways. Heaven forbid that anyone should come up with a suggestion that they have not come up with already.

It seems to me that the minister should take this request seriously now. I understand that he has rejected it. If he has rejected it, he might consider another proposal by the union which is that at the very least the person who is appointed the arbitrator be someone who knows a great deal about pensions, someone who can take the pension concerns of the union seriously and deal with them fairly and adequately because that person knows what they are talking about when it comes to pensions.

I would certainly ask the minister to take that into account and perhaps to say something about that later if he can when we get into Committee of the Whole for instance that would reassure us and reassure the grain handlers that that kind of concern is going to be adequately dealt with.

If those kinds of commitments could be given, it would certainly facilitate the passage of the legislation. I hope that we can over the next little while hear something back from the minister on this so that we can be able to say that the process here was not a fait accompli, that the government was open to suggestions from the opposition and from the union and that we might actually make some progress in improving the bill which has been put before us.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the bill before us, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario, raises a number of questions that I and a number of my colleagues have some difficulty with, both in principle and in operation.

While we understand the very natural anxieties of the agricultural community on the Canadian prairies, we also through a long history of involvement, for many of us a direct involvement, in matters dealing with industrial relations have considerable sympathy and understanding for the very real daily problems faced by employees at Thunder Bay.

Politics is a matter of choices. My colleague from Churchill earlier today asked a couple of very pertinent questions as to why the government, when it has so loudly proclaimed its very valid interest in getting the grain moving through the terminal at Thunder Bay, has not taken what action might be taken in order to ensure that the port of Churchill, which has storage facilities that are unused and which is able to take its former historic role as being a key shipper of prairie grain, remain functional. It has not been put on track when the government should have been able to see this problem coming.

No one wants to question motivations, but it still is a question that should be answered. If it is so vital that that prairie grain move and if the government could see this problem emerging, as most of us think it could, why then was action not taken to see that the port of Churchill remain functional? That is a question the government has to answer.

Other of my colleagues, the member for Winnipeg–Transcona and the member for Churchill, spent some time, and I want to just touch again, on the question of single person mediation and arbitration as opposed to the request that has been made for a three member panel for mediation and arbitration.

The normal and valid argument against third party intervention generally is that the immediate and almost sole interest of a third party that is intervening is to end an existing dispute and simply get a contract signed. That arbitrator does not have to live with the results of whatever is contained in that collective agreement and no third party has to live through the daily, weekly, monthly and yearly very serious problems and relationships that often exist within any given industrial undertaking.

We all agree that in some way or another because of the important public interest involved in this dispute, there will be some third party intervention. We understand that but once that choice has been made, surely we should attempt to define that intervention in such a way as it can most accurately reflect and work out answers to problems which are understanding and sensitive to the continuing problems that take place within the Thunder Bay operation and within that industry.

What we have submitted and what other parties have submitted is that can best be done not by a single mediator/arbitrator but by a three member panel in which there is direct involvement from both the employees who are most directly involved and the employers who are most directly involved because they know what those relationships have been.

That is something you cannot learn by simply listening to submissions and reading briefs within a necessarily very compressed period. It is something that you can only really get to understand if you have lived through the previous history within that specific undertaking or operation.

We would submit again, along with many of the other parties involved, that it is important in order to not only get a settlement, but to get a settlement that hopefully will allow the two parties in Thunder Bay to live together in a constructive relationship for a significant period to come. The parties most directly involved should have direct representation in the arbitration process.

It just seems like common sense to me. We recognize that there are across this country, not many but a number of individuals with some experience as single arbitrators who have done yeoman service and have shown a great proclivity to gain a deep understanding, in relatively short periods of time, of some of the specifics involved in the various disputes that they have been called upon to intervene in. It is, in an area of our economy that is so sensitive and so important to the needs of so many, maybe asking too much to expect any single person, no matter how efficient or how experienced, to be able to exercise the wisdom of Solomon.

We would again just ask the government to reconsider and give very, very special and sensitive attention to that request. We think the request has obvious merit and we think that many people across the country, even the farmers directly or indirectly affected by the dispute, would understand that as well. If it takes just a little bit longer in order to come up with the appropriate personnel, and we cannot really see why it should, I think everyone would be understanding and appreciative of it.

We also understand that pensions have been one of the major issues in dispute, and not really even in dispute so much as that the employer, for whatever reason, has refused to place those matters on the table.

In an industry which has seen a great number of layoffs and a great deal of insecurity over the period of the past few years and the past few months, I think we have to be sensitive to the likelihood that a large number of those employees and the community that surrounds them are going to feel that matters relating to retirement, early retirement and the kind of pensions which their members who may find themselves among the victims of layoffs again in the near future must have, are of great great priority, not only personal priority but community priority. They want to see that there is some stability as changes continue to take place.

We would hope again that the government, however this process evolves, will attempt to make clear to those who are going to be involved in the mediation–arbitration that they are advised to take the pension issue very seriously, not to tell them how to deal with it, but that it must be dealt with.

The whole matter of compulsory settlement is one that we certainly do not relish having to deal with. However, as a government and as a party that has formed governments in a number of provincial jurisdictions, and in the near future will likely do so again, we have found it necessary from time to time in a given public interest dispute to recognize that there are limits to freedom when a vital public interest is involved.

• (1240)

While it is a question of principle, we have always in the past been quite prepared to deal with the realities of the situation. We will be willing to deal with those again today, or whenever the time finally comes for a decision. The events of the past few weeks in this place have seen another major intervention by the government in imposing a settlement on the Public Service Alliance and the employees of the federal government. I think almost all Canadians, no matter which side of the debate they were on, thought this was unjust. This has left a certain atmosphere among many in the work force across Canada, both public and private, that there is perhaps too quick and ready a proclivity on the part of this government to move to deny people certain basic fundamental rights and freedoms in the name of some broad public interest. This dispute may more readily lend itself to a resolution that will perhaps find a broader measure of agreement than did the previous Public Service dispute. Our proclivity to move quickly to impinge on those freedoms leaves a bad taste. It makes it much more likely in the future that this government will face great difficulty, even in instances in which it may be quite justified, to attempt to gain public or parliamentary support for its actions.

If we cry wolf too often, people are not going to answer. I think the government ought to take a very close look at its own record in this regard and the fairness of the measures that it does impose when it does decide that measures must be imposed.

It is for that reason, again, that I just want to go back very briefly and urge the government to (1) consider advising whatever person or panel of arbitrators is finally appointed to consider the serious pension issues that have been raised by the employees at Thunder Bay, and (2) to give very serious consideration to the request that has been made for a three member panel so that we can have a solution that the industry, the employees and the community at large can live with. Hopefully we will see some continuing peace and justice within that community and that industry for the next number of years.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am rising to participate ever so briefly in this debate today. I just want to commend the government for one aspect of this bill. We, as my hon. friend from Kenora—Rainy River has indicated, are in support of the legislation in principle. We believe it is necessary at this time. So there is no misunderstanding as to why we support back to work legislation today and yet not have supported the back to work legislation with respect to the Public Service, I want to make it clear that we are supporting this bill in part because it contains an arbitration or mediation clause.

What the government is doing by this bill is appointing an arbitrator—they call it a mediator/arbitrator—to adjudicate on the matters in dispute between the parties and effect a collective agreement between the parties. The bill that was introduced to force the public servants back to work contained no such provision. It simply ordered the public servants of Canada to resume their employment and it gave them a zero per cent increase. We objected to that legislation because of its manifest unfairness and we would, of course, oppose such a bill in future. That is clearly unfair. The government should never have proceeded in that way.

In this case it has returned to an element of fairness. It has at least provided that an independent third party will adjudicate the matters in dispute. That of course is what it should have done in the case of its own public servants. What it did in that case was act as judge, jury and ultimately executioner for its public servants. It should have appointed a third party arbitrator who could have determined what was a fair contract in the circumstances between the government as employer and its employees.

This bill at least is fair. I know my hon. friend from Kenora—Rainy River has striven to ensure that such legislation was not necessary, but unfortunately it appears that the talks are not continuing at least in a way that will lead to a settlement. He has indicated that we as a party will support this bill in principle. I am pleased to have participated in that discussion. I want to make it clear that the principal reason we are doing so is because of the change in this bill from the previous bill in that it provides for an independent third party to adjudicate the matters in dispute.

On that basis, we will support the legislation.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I want to underline certain points about the bill to order the grain handlers back to work. With the rest of my party I understand the need to get the grain moving. In particular, I understand the need of the farmers to get even the measly $2 per bushel that may be all they get. I am also aware that there is a different kind of need on the part of large trans-national operations such as Cargill which are taking over the world marketing of grain little by little, but moving fairly fast.

I am informed that the big issue is pensions. The amount of grain moving through Thunder Bay has been declining. The number of jobs moving the grain has been declining. The remaining workers are very naturally concerned about the pension system.

It seems that the employers refuse to discuss that. They are not bargaining in good faith and are not willing to address an issue that was legitimately on the table. It is an issue that is of extreme importance not just to their employees but also to many of the residents of Thunder Bay. Those pensioners if they have a decent pension will be spending their money mostly in Thunder Bay where they have lived most of their lives.

It is unfortunate that the weight of this bill may be directed primarily not against the employers who are unwilling to talk about the chief issue, but against the workers who use the only means they have to bring the employers to the table on that issue.

As has been mentioned by my colleague from Churchill, the scale of the fines is superficially equal: $100,000 on the employer, $100,000 on the union if it does not follow the legislation. That is in the spirit of the French proverb that I understand in English says that "The law in its majesty forbids rich and poor alike to stale bread or to sleep under bridges". In other words, Cargill can simply chalk up a $100,000 fine to expenses and take it from the consumers at the other end of the commercial pipeline. The unions have nothing but the dues of their own members with which to pay a fine. In reality, the fines against the union and against the company are not by any means equal. They favour the company.

Nevertheless, I am glad that the minister sent his representative who had some prospect of getting some movement on the pension question. He was able for the first time to bring the employers to discuss that issue.

• (1250)

I am hoping that the arbitration will be able to deal sensitively with the issue of pensions and other issues on the table.

I also want to support the idea that there should be an arbitration board, one named by the employer, one named by the union and the chair named by the minister.

I want to refer to my own experience. I have had no direct experience in arbitration, but as secretary of my local union for 12 years in a factory that made corrugated paper boxes, the union that is now the Canadian Paperworkers' Union, I had a good deal of indirect experience with arbitration and much direct experience with the steps leading to arbitration. I started as an employee doing unskilled work, moving stock around the plant, becoming eventually a machine operator in the press department. I also became a steward and then an officer in the local. As such, I participated both in the negotiations with the company, which were at first annual and then biennial, and in the settlement of grievances or disciplinary situations.

I think it is very clear that people who are engaged in the same work not only are better able to defend their fellow workers but are better able also to decide when a proposed line of defence is unreasonable. In other words, there is some peer judgment exercised by a local union in the matter of its members' individual disputes. There is also a great weight on the local union not to ask in collective bargaining for something that is unreasonable. In my union, and I believe in other unions such as this one, offers by the company must be brought back to the members for a vote. The recommendation of the executive or the bargaining committee, one way or the other, sometimes is overturned by the membership vote.

What I am illustrating is that there is important knowledge and expertise to be had from a union appointee to an arbitration board. Without question, there is important knowledge and expertise to be had from an employer appointee. I cannot speak so directly of that.

I seriously urge the government to consider enlarging the board in the way that has been suggested by some of my colleagues on this side. I think if the government were to do that, it would make its initiative in this law far more credible. The reason I mention that is that the government's action to date in this matter is questionable in at least one way, and that is the outburst or whatever it was, planned or unplanned, of the minister of grains and oilseeds yesterday, which completely made a mockery of the Minister of Labour's representative sitting down with the disputing parties. To ask them to come together and discuss the very thing on which they were divided and then have the news that that does not matter because there is going to be back to work legislation in any case certainly makes bargaining impossible.

In many, many bargaining sessions between my local union and our employer, Continental Can, the question of trust, the question of confidence in the bargaining process was essential. During the 18 years I worked there, we did not have a strike. I do not claim that was because of my participation, but I am saying that the union and the company were both willing to reach a compromise on all those occasions.

I do not suppose that the cabinet was responsible for the intervention of the minister of grains and oilseeds but because of the unfortunate timing with which it occurred, I think the government would get better support not only from the grain handler workers, but from other workers in general in the country, if it showed sensitivity by enlarging the arbitration to a three man board.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I enjoyed the hon. member's speech but I was unable to discern from it whether he is supporting this bill.

Could he tell us his position or his party's position on whether they support this bill? It was not clear to me from the speech.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, the matter is being discussed within our caucus and the hon. member will learn in due course what stand we will be taking.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I too would like an opportunity to make a quick statement and then pose a question to the member.

One of the things the member mentioned was that his party seems to be very much in favour of the discussion that I have had in my speech about a panel versus an arbitration board versus just an arbitrator-mediator. I thank him for that because I think that is a concern that the union has.

The reason it has that concern, as I said before in my speech, was that the particular issue that it is dealing with is very technical in nature. It seems to me that we should, as parties on all sides, look at that particular issue and come to agreement on it.

I have discussed this with the union, and it does not see any sense in prolonging this strike because of the fact that the company through its listings in the press has come to the conclusion that there is no need to negotiate any further. There is going to be back to work legislation very shortly.

I have taken the lead somewhat from the workers in Thunder Bay who have said to me and I am sure to other members in this place: "Do not prolong this whole issue." If we can get some legitimate negotiations going through an arbitration board, then we may be able to get a lot further down the road than we are now. So far, the company has refused to deal with the pension issue, which is the major issue.

I would like to ask the member to tell us whether he personally thinks it would be beneficial for the party that he represents to vote in favour of this legislation. With the help of this particular arbitration board we will then have the right mechanism in place to deal with the issue as quickly as possible based on the economic situation that we are in.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, as I said before the matter is still under discussion in our caucus because we do not know what the government is going to do, for example, in committee or in report from committee about the recommendation that the hon. member himself and others have advocated.

We do not know. We were quite surprised when one of the Winnipeg members of the Liberal Party gave a blank cheque to the government and said:"Anything that the government does, I will vote for". The debate is not finished, and as I have said we will discuss it within the caucus.

The question is whether a person is to make a decision without having the information with which to make it.

The Liberals may be happy to say: "Anything the government does is just fine by us". I am not. I want to see what the government is going to do. We do not intend to prolong the debate unduly, but we do not intend as the Liberals clearly are doing to simply surrender all the union's requests and abandon all the union's requests by telling the government: "No matter what comes, the bill will be passed".

• (1300)

We do not approve in general of this back to work legislation, but given the points raised not only by the hon. member but previously by our own members, that delay for the sake of delay would be useless and harmful to all concerned, we do not intend to delay it but that is different from the question of whether we will give final approval to the bill as such.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I think there is consent on three things: first, if you put the question, you will obtain the consent of the House to adopt Bill C-37 on second reading, on division.

[English]

Number two, I was going to suggest that you call it one o'clock afterward. We are getting very close.

The third point would be that immediately after Question Period, which would be three o'clock, we proceed then to Committee of the Whole.

Hopefully with the co-operation of my colleagues we may proceed through all stages of Bill C-37 this afternoon.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, there have been discussions and it is agreed that we would accept second reading on division because at this point we do not support the legislation.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party, we very much agree with what the minister has said and we find it quite interesting that on the one hand the member who just spoke did not know whether his party was going to vote in favour or against and then the Whip for the NDP all of a sudden told us exactly how it was going to vote.

I sure wish the members would make up their minds so we could get this done with in a more amicable way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, racism is on the rise in Canada. This week at a Canadian Jewish Congress conference, Ottawa police reported that an incredible 38 per cent of all youth crime in the city this summer was racist crime. Thirty-eight per cent. Violent race riots have also occurred in Montreal and Halifax.

Just last weekend a revisionist who denied the holocaust tried to spread his lies just two blocks from this House. Closer to home, in this House yesterday a racist slur was uttered by a member of Parliament. What a fine role model for Canadians.

Six months ago I asked the Prime Minister what the government was doing to stop the spread of racism in Canada. He spoke eloquently but did not offer specifics. We do not need platitudes. We need action.

I will ask again; what does this government plan to do now to stop the alarming growth in race related hatred, violence and crime in Canada?

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this week, October 7-13, 1991, is National Family Week, sponsored by Family Service Canada.

This week is dedicated to public recognition of the contribution families make to the Canadian way of life. It is also a good time to highlight the activities undertaken by the Department of National Health and Welfare for Canadian families.

Over the years, the Department has launched many initiatives for this purpose, such as family allowances, child health and income security programs and the National Adoption desk. More recently, the Department has played a key role in initiatives against family violence and in the national anti-drug strategy.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that all these programs contribute to the greater physical and mental welfare of children and families.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, Mogar Timber Mill Ltd., a small lumber processing firm in my riding of Surrey, B.C., is in danger of closing because of the government's mishandling of the GST.

The company has written to the government stating:

> I have not received my GST refund cheques for the months of May, June, July and August 1991. This is a total amount of $32,602 that is owing my company. There is no company that can survive when they have to pay out their profit and working capital. We are fed up with your system, we cannot figure out how this government can stay in power after causing so many small companies to shut down. You do not understand how important the working capital is to us.

If these delays continue we will be forced to shut down the company and lay off our employees.

On behalf of Mogar Timber and all small business I call upon the government to not only change the GST refund system but to scrap the GST.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, on August 25 the Minister of the Environment announced that the federal government has committed $25 million in green plan funding to strengthen Canada's fight against ozone layer depletion.

The government will strengthen controls, establish programs for the recovery and recycling of ozone depleting substances and increase our program of research and monitoring.

A permanent high Arctic ozone observatory will be established at Eureka, Northwest Territories that will place Canada on the leading edge of ozone science.

The government is also increasing the existing Canadian ozone monitoring program by 20 per cent and will augment Canada's participation in joint international research programs.

The 1987 Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer was the first environment treaty signed by 25 nations addressing a truly global threat.

Canada has set up a domestic control program to exceed the agreed international targets. Our commitment is to phase out CFCs by 1997 and other major ozone depleting substances by the year 2000.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, despite our finance minister's sunny proclamations that the recession is over, thousands of residents in my riding of Northumberland ask: "Over for whom?"

Personal and small business economic crises are rampant, resulting in extreme family difficulties, emotional trauma, farms, small business and personal bankruptcies and closures.

The fact that there are so few jobs available in my community has caused welfare rolls to grow at such alarming rates that the system worries that its capacity to sustain its present load, let alone cope with the increases which are predicted.

The people of this country cry for leadership, vision and compassion. This government must recognize that its greatest asset, its people, are willing to work and want to be trained for good jobs, its small business entrepreneurs are willing to risk and help the economy grow. Crippling high taxes, the high dollar and unemployment policies must be addressed by this government.

MEMBER FOR GLENGARRY—PRESCOTT—RUSSELL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on October 8, 1991, the Liberal member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said in this House, during the debate on Bill C-211:

Last year there was a fire in Baie Comeau, in the Prime Minister's own riding. Is it logical that a volunteer should not be able to help with the fire because he is receiving UI?

I would like to clarify two points on this subject. First, the fire in question was this year. Second, La Presse of July 27, 1991 contained the following: "Elected officials on the North Shore want to fight forest fires with volunteers, but Quebec refuses." The Quebec Minister of Forests, Albert Côté, said: "We put in all the resources required in the circumstances. It would be irresponsible to send people into the forest without proper training and supervision."

CULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about leading cultural institutions in my home city of Winnipeg.

I am informed today that the Manitoba Museum of Man and Nature faces a cut of almost $200,000 in financial assistance from the Department of Communications. This cost will place a terrible financial hardship on the museum.

In fact, if the government proceeds with this cut, it will threaten services now provided by the museum to schools and rural communities in Manitoba. It might also mean job losses.

The museum already has a deficit and will have serious difficulty in coping with this latest blow. The Winnipeg Art Gallery also faces a similar cut.

I urge the Minister of Communications to reverse these decisions. These institutions are major contributors to the quality of life in my home province.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, in Bramalea—Gore—Malton, we are waiting for the sounds of silence.

We were told not to worry about airport expansion, not to worry about noisy aircraft, not to worry about flight frequency. We were told that all these things will not matter when the airlines start flying quiet planes. With airlines competing for a dwindling world travel market, I am concerned that our airlines will not be able to afford to replace their fleets with quieter aircraft.

If the prominent airlines cannot afford to fly the new quiet jets, what about other less prominent airlines? In the United States, the FAA has unveiled legislation that would require airlines to have 25 per cent of their noisy planes removed by 1994 and the remainder by the year 2000.

Can we expect equally definitive legislation in Canada? Mr. Speaker, forgive us if we are not optimistic. Forgive us if we just do not buy the latest solution to living with airport noise.

PERSONS AWARD

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the winners of the 1991 Persons Award, named for the day women officially became persons in Canada, October 18, 1929. The winners are Doris Anderson, Solange Fernet-Gervais, Ursula Franklin, Jane Manuel and June Menzies.

• (1410)

These women have made outstanding contributions, advancing the cause of women from advocacy on behalf of farm workers to repealing sexism in the Indian Act to working for equality for women in non-traditional fields. They are five courageous women.

I also want to congratulate women who have not received awards for a lifetime of work advancing the cause of women in Canada. We need to better appreciate the work of our foremothers, our sisters, our daughters and, of ourselves, in applying skills, intelligence and talent to a commitment to achieve full social and economic equality for the women of Canada.

FAMILY ASSISTANCE POLICIES

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, the time has come to review our family assistance policies to make sure that they match the reality of the 1990s.

The present support system was developed on the basis of the needs of a traditional family composed of two parents, one of whom earned a salary. This system had two parts: a benefit plan and rules to prevent tax avoidance through income splitting. The tax system was later modified to follow trends in family structure, for example by setting up an equivalent credit for wholly dependent persons.

Today, the benefit plan and the rules are in flagrant contradiction. Thus, unmarried couples with children are in a better tax situation than married couples with children. The problem was recently recognized by Statistics Canada, Mr. Speaker, and is real. We are aware of it and will try to solve it.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, let us examine the Tory yearly salary policy. The government refuses to give a salary increase to its employees this year and has limited the increase to 3 per cent for each of the next two years. It is fiscal restraint. But now the government has been caught giving fat bonuses to heads of Crown corporations and to other Order in Council Tory appointees.

Mr. Speaker, if you were a good CN president last year, you get an $87,000 Christmas bonus this year to top up your measly $365,000 a year salary. If you have been a bad boy this year, oh, well, not to worry because you will only be judged next year for what you did last year in order to get a bonus this year, and the year after that, of course.

Mr. Speaker, that should clear it all up. By the way, is this not the year of the pig? No matter how you cut it, if you are a Tory bigwig, you can always agree with the tire salesman who once said that it has been a very "Goodyear", but if you are an ordinary taxpayer or government employee, every Tory year is a bad year.

AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, this is AIDS Awareness Week. Since there is as yet no cure or vaccine for HIV infection, education and prevention programs remain the most effective tools in preventing the spread of the disease.

Community groups are fundamental to fighting AIDS, as they provide preventive education programs and are key players in the provision of care and support to those who are HIV infected.

The many challenges that Canadian society faces concerning AIDS will be brought to the attention of all citizens and all levels of government by the many community-based organizations.

This week, Mr. Speaker, represents an opportunity for us to show our support in the battle against HIV infection and AIDS. I urge all members to participate in the many activities planned for this week.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE FOR A RENEWED CANADA

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Special Joint Committee on the Future of Canada began its work yesterday. Before that, we had the Charest Report, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee and the Spicer Commission, better known as the "Spicer circus".

It seems less serious to us than commissions like those chaired by Fulton-Favreau and Pepin-Robarts. We should call it "the remake of the Spicer Circus", something like Rocky I, II, III, IV.

The Bélanger-Campeau Commission would be a more appropriate model, according to Liberal André Ouellet. Canadians deserve better, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, it would be preferable to have one-to-one discussions between Quebec and Canada once Quebec has held its referendum. We would benefit from following the European Economic Community, Mr. Speaker, which, remember, is an economic organization of sovereign countries.

GOVERNMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, Premier McKenna of New Brunswick announced the make-up of his new executive council. Responding to the need to reduce government as expressed by the people of New Brunswick, the premier reduced his cabinet from 24 members to 18, a 25 per cent reduction.

This, along with mergers and streamlining of government departments, will save the taxpayers of New Brunswick an estimated $3 million to $5 million a year. The number of women in ministerial positions has also risen to five, the highest in the history of the province. Mrs. Shirley Dyshart will become the first woman Speaker of the New Brunswick legislature.

I congratulate the premier and all members of his new government, particularly those from my federal riding: Mrs. Ann Breault, a new addition to the cabinet who becomes Minister of Income Assistance; Sheldon Lee who retains his position as transportation minister; and Bruce Smith who becomes our new Solicitor General.

I along with my colleagues in this House look forward to working with the Government of New Brunswick in making a better New Brunswick, indeed a better Canada.

SERVICE MEDALS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, recently members of the Canadian Armed Forces who served in the gulf war were recognized for their outstanding dedication and professionalism when the Canadian government created the Gulf and Kuwait Campaign Medal. Earlier this year, in June, the government announced the creation of the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea.

The Cameron Association in Winnipeg asks us all to recall an event of great significance in the course of the Second World War in Europe: the raid on the French coastal port of Dieppe in 1942.

Many Dieppe veterans are asking, with the 50th anniversary of the Dieppe raid approaching in 1992, that the Government of Canada finally do the right thing and strike a medal to acknowledge the dedication, professionalism, heroism, sacrifice and contribution that was demonstrated by so many Canadians on August 19, 1942.

BILL C-17

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, late last night the legislative committee passed Bill C-17, the government's proposed gun control legislation.

I want to congratulate all those who contributed to the process, but in particular committee members from all sides of the House, for the diligence and dedication required to achieve this improved bill.

For some of us the process began a number of months ago with the special committee on Bill C-80. Many said that we were attempting to hijack, scuttle or water down the bill. It will be obvious to all in this House that this has not happened. In fact the opposite is true.

The democratic process was allowed to function and the result is legislation that is stronger and more effective, just as predicted by the Minister of Justice.

BURMA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, did you know that Petro-Canada, still 80 per cent owned by the people of Canada, is currently training the son of the managing director of the state owned Myanmar Oil Corporation in Calgary?

The military government of Burma, according to Amnesty International, operates one of the most oppressive regimes on earth. It has no basis to exist in law or in democratic practice.

The 85th Interparliamentary Conference held in Korea earlier this year passed a resolution expressing concern that the Burmese Parliament had not been allowed to sit since the May 1990 elections and that 62 elected parliamentarians had been arrested.

The latest sleight of hand by the Burmese regime has been to amend the election law with the retroactive effect of barring anyone convicted of a security or moral offence from running for Parliament.

Petro-Canada will never retrieve the $6 million paid as a "signing bonus" for the right to drill for oil in Burma, but it could still retrieve some of its honour and Canada's by disentangling itself, even at this late stage, from its involvement with a regime that has shown no regard for human rights or democratic principles.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

We keep hearing all the ministers of the government saying that the recession is over. I want to tell the Prime Minister that if they would take the time to go across the country like I have, they would meet the plant workers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I met 7,000 farmers yesterday and they all know that if we had not put pressure on this government for a month and a half nothing would have happened.

If they were to talk with the plant workers who are losing their jobs, they would know that these people do not think that the recession is over. If they were to meet with the single mothers who are obliged to go to the food banks, they would know that they do not think the recession is over.

• (1420)

I would like the Prime Minister to realize that there is a human face to this recession and we want to know the truth. Is the recession over or is it not over?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will acknowledge, with economic growth in the last three months annualized at 4.9 per cent, with inflation in the last three months below 3 per cent, with interest rates that have declined by six percentage points in the last year and 13 basis points more today and with 49,000 net jobs created in the last number of months, that those signs are all encouraging.

What is even more encouraging are the results of the IMF and the OECD which indicate that in 1992 Canada's economic growth is liable to tie that of Japan's, thereby leading the industrialized world.

There are no guarantees in this life, but I think that the record is encouraging and I hope my hon. friend would agree.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister for International Trade was in Montreal. He spoke to businessmen who complained the dollar was too high, exports were going steadily downward and they had to lay off hundreds of workers every week. The minister said that businesses that wanted to compete on international markets should not let themselves be influenced by the strength of the Canadian dollar.

I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister: Does he agree with the minister's statement or does he in fact think, as we do, that this is no way to heat people who want to create jobs but need help at this time? Does he agree that when we have a situation like the one we are in today vis-à-vis the Americans, we must use our monetary policy to help our entrepreneurs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I responded to criticism about the value of the dollar, and I asked whether it was one of the Liberal Party's monetary policies to proceed with an artificial depreciation of the Canadian dollar, with all the disastrous consequences that would automatically ensue.

[English]

When the Leader of the Opposition was Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board and the dollar was trading at $1.02, he was asked whether he was going to order the lowering of the value of the dollar. He said: "I have not given any instructions to the Governor of the Bank with regard to the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is a floating dollar and it is the marketplace that will decide where the Canadian dollar should be. That is the policy of the Liberal government and I have not given any specific instructions to the Governor of the Bank to lower the dollar".

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): No, I have not done that, Mr. Speaker, but there is one thing I did that this government would have been well advised to do, and that is not to borrow abroad to finance the deficit of the government when we have enough savings in Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: It is the way he has trapped himself.

In those days, I would like to tell the Prime Minister, the dollar went down when we were there because in Canada the paper mills were closed down, the mines were closed down, and it was the instrument I used to bring Canada back to a competitive position.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to know if the Prime Minister, like his minister for external trade, tells businessmen who want to improve the competitiveness of their products abroad to take the 90-cent dollar and shut up, try to export, and you will never receive any help from this government.

What is the policy of this government in terms of making Canada competitive in international markets?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously the debt, the deficit, the productivity rate and foreign investment, all of these matters, impact very significantly on the value of the dollar as do the inflation rate, anticipated growth, and so on, as my hon. friend knows.

When he was Minister of Finance he was asked the question: "Are you ever tempted to fix the value of the Canadian dollar?" "A. No. No industrialized country's currency is fixed". "Q. Do you ever think of getting out of the finance portfolio for something less tough?" "A.

No. Yes. You know it is tough when I look back to all the problems of my predecessors".

The problem my friend referred to, he adopted a policy when he was Minister of Finance of letting the dollar seek its own level. That was a policy that has been endorsed by industrialized countries since the Second World War, and we think it is an appropriate one.

Now he says that when he was Minister of Finance he chose not to borrow abroad. He did not have to. He printed money recklessly, as a result of which the debt of Canada increased by 1,100 per cent in 15 years. The Leader of the Opposition is an architect of the destruction of public finances in Canada, and everybody with a brain in his head knows it.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This government keeps telling Canadians that we have free access to the U.S. market. However, fresh fish shipments are held up at the border by as much as three days, softwood lumber shippers now have to post bonds, shippers of breeding livestock are held up and detained as long as three days, and now we have a tremendous increase in the live hog—pork countervail.

This is nothing but harassment. Is this what this government means by free market access?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the difficulty with softwood lumber at the border. I think there has been considerable confusion on the part of the United States as to exactly what the softwood lumber arrangement should be, but we have made our representations to them and we have been guaranteed that there will be no further hold-ups.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister as well.

That answer indicates to the House that they are aware. What we want to know is what is going to be done. A Canadian pork producer today receives $110 for a hog, but in order to sell that hog into the United States that producer has to pay the United States government $24 Canadian.

My question is: Is this free trade? Is this market access? Is this fair?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, went through all of this yesterday in some detail. We know this is not an uncommon thing for the United States pork producers to do. Is our own industry going to object to this? The Government of Canada will stand behind the Canadian industry.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The farm package announced this morning will give farmers about $7 an acre, and the government has said that that is what farmers need. Well, yesterday I too met 7,000 farmers who said very clearly that they needed $30 an acre to continue or they are out of business.

So I want to ask the Prime Minister: according to his government's calculations, how many farm families will this shortfall put out of business permanently?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the crisis in the farm community is much more serious than the Leader of the New Democratic Party has put forward in her question.

Thirty dollars an acre amounts over $2 billion. That is on seeded acres. If it were uncultivated acres it would be amount to $3 billion. Neither the Government of Canada nor the provincial governments have the capacity to provide that support.

What we have done is work with the farmers and the provinces and put forward programs that will provide before seeding next year $40 an acre in assistance to the grains and oilseeds industry in Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister. As the minister well knows, farmers want to stay on the farm. When they say that they need $30 an acre to make up for the 1990 shortfall, they are not just making this up out of the air. They are saying this is a question of survival. Last year, 44,000 farmers had left the land for good.

• (1430)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: Forty-four thousand farm families have left the land for good. What is the minister prepared to do for those farmers who cannot make it on $7 an acre? They say they are going to go out of business permanently. I ask the minister again: What is he prepared to do now to assist them to survive?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to be as kind as I can. I think it is very important at this time that we recognize what has been done.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: The member from Toronto, who I am sure thinks agriculture is fine if Safeway is open, should maybe listen. We think it is very important.

The problem is that neither the Government of Canada nor any provincial government has the resources to provide what some farmers have suggested. I would read to the hon. member and to the House a document from the Saskatchewan Pool. It is addressed to my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds: "The farm aid packaged announced by the federal government today is appreciated and is a significant commitment to resolving problems being experienced by Canadian farmers".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKnight: We know that they could use more. We would like to have been able to provide more.

Canadians believe in their farmers. Canadian taxpayers are going to have to do what the taxpayers in Europe and the taxpayers in the United States have done: assist their farmers in their time of need. I am sure they are prepared to continue doing that.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

The minister indicated this morning that either through increased taxes or reduced programs we were going to have to pay for these programs for farmers. I understand that the government does not want to add to the deficit. That is understandable.

Given that, there are places where the Prime Minister can find money to assist the farmers of this country. I want to ask the him: rather than raise taxes for the middle class, will he close the tax loophole that is for business lunches and entertainment deductions for corporations? It will raise $1 billion for the Canadian government to assist farmers.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will be happy to look at any suggestions my hon. friend has when the Minister of Finance returns and introduces a fiscal measure in order to recover the amounts required on behalf of this expenditure on behalf of the farmers. We will be happy to look at any constructive suggestions that she may have, any suggestions from the opposition. I assume there will be a debate on the floor of the House and we will be happy to do that.

My hon. friend points out that there was $800 million sent out today to Canadian farmers. There is $2 billion more coming to assist agriculture, but the $800 million deficiency payment today is I think significant.

It is interesting that in debate the other night NDP Leader Roy Romanow in Saskatchewan said: "What the farmers need is a third line of defence, $500 million". We provided $800 million. I hope my hon. friend will be pleased.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, in my riding, a Sidbec employee recently lost his job. The president of the company and the president of his union told him that the suicidal level of the dollar had destroyed his future. Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the question I was asked by this employee to the Minister of Finance: If the president of the company, one of the bigger companies in this country, and the president of my union, quite an important union, agree on this point, why won't the Minister of Finance listen?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, of course the government is very much aware of current levels of unemployment, and it wants to do everything it can to enhance economic recovery. That is why the government must put its fiscal house in order. I think the hon. member will realize that when during the first six months of the year, provincial governments had to borrow $10 billion outside the country—more than was borrowed last year—this foreign currency was then converted into dollars, thus putting upward pressure on the dollar.

I would also like to recall what the Prime Minister just said about the option of letting our currency float. There is pressure on the dollar. There is a feeling of insecurity in certain parts of the world, but people have confidence in Canada, despite our problems. There is also our financial situation, where the government occupies all the space on the capital market. These are the problems we are addressing, because we feel things must improve. Today's drop in the bank rate is in fact further evidence that our formula is the right one.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons for the high dollar. Over the past seven years, first of all, we have had a strong Bank of Canada; and second, we have had a weak Government of Canada.

The issue, very clearly, is not simply one of bringing interest rates down, it is stopping the dumb, artificial propping up of the Canadian dollar. Eliminate the short-term interest rate gap between the Canadian and American interest rates and the Canadian dollar will come down; bring the Canadian dollar down and people will go back to work.

My question for the Prime Minister is this. When is the government going to move to eliminate the gap between American and Canadian short-term interest rates? When is the government going to move to bring Canadians back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the rate has dropped by six percentage points and the spread—

Mr. Loiselle: It has been cut in half.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is a successful business person. He knows full well that the spread has narrowed, has been cut in half over the last number of months between the American and the Canadian rates. He knows as well that all the economic indicators, including the one for last month, was positive. He knows as well that there are pressures on the dollar, that investment is flowing into Canada in very strong numbers.

My hon. friend, if he is suggesting, the rates are coming—

Mr. Martin (Lasalle—Émard): When are you going to eliminate the gap?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the gap has gone from 595 to 290 and is now on the way to 260 and declining. I think this is a remarkable degree of progress.

My hon. friend would probably agree with his leader when he was Minister of Finance when he said that " we do not think that the level of the dollar at this time is a good level for maintaining our competitive position. We hope that the fluctuation will not be downward, but if the pressures of the market bring the dollar down, we will live with it because we are not the ones who fix the dollar. It is the market which determines the value of the Canadian dollar". When the Leader of the Opposition said that, the dollar was at 87 cents.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that for every cent the Canadian dollar goes up, Canada loses thousands of jobs and $1.3 billion in export sales.

Will the Prime Minister explain to Canadians why he thinks that a rising dollar that cost us jobs, that cost us export sales, is good for Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I would like to repeat again that this government does not have a high dollar policy. The Canadian dollar fluctuates according to the market. We live in an open market economy.

The International Monetary Fund report, on which the opposition is very silent today, commends us for doing precisely what we are doing to allow the economy to prosper, taking control of the fiscal situation of our country and reducing the deficit, an effort that has been opposed every step of the way by the opposition for the last few years.

The Prime Minister was very humble. He said that the growth for Canada expected by the International Monetary Fund is the same as Japan. It is higher than that of Japan at 3.8 per cent for 1992, and we are very proud of that.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, let us look at the record. Since January 1, 1989 Canada has lost 261,000 or 13 per cent of all its manufacturing jobs.

• (1440)

Surely the Prime Minister recalls the report of his own Economic Council of Canada which told him three years ago that if we had an 88 cent dollar we were going to lost thousands of manufacturing jobs.

If the Prime Minister will not listen to Canada's manufacturers or workers, why did he not at least listen to his own experts?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I remember just a few months ago we were hearing the same questions from the opposition parties.

They were telling us that the short-term Canadian rates were 565 percentage points above the U.S. They were saying that it was a tragedy, that we should bring the dollar down and that that would solve everything. We have brought the interest rates down and the dollar is going up. How can he explain this contradiction? It is not as simple as he says.

Of course, if you give away your products, people will buy them. You live in a real economy, and you have to be competitive.

The dollar floats because of many reasons we have already expressed today.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As the minister knows, the government's own appointee condemned the unconscionable delays in Canada's refugee backlog system by granting refugee status to the Francois family as the sort of thing on which all responsible refugee groups have commented favourably.

Will the minister assure this House that he will not introduce yet further delays by appealing Ms. Lavender's decision?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will give that assurance to the hon. member that a binding decision by an arbitrator, which is not a court of law, will be reviewed by the Federal Court of Appeal.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, the United Nations subcommittee on human rights was sympathetic to the Canadian Council of Churches evidence that lengthy delays up to five years are damaging the emotional and mental health of refugees in Canada who have been separated from their families.

Will the minister now speed up the backlog program by increasing the resources available, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, so that the remaining 35,000 cases can be completed before December 1992?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the target date for completion of the hearing of backlog cases will be delayed a bit in the province of Quebec. It will be delayed also in the province of Ontario. In the rest of Canada, the target date will be met.

When he talks about damage, there is also the fabric of this country to protect. We need rules in place which allow us to have a proper system of immigration, and this is exactly what we are attempting to have. The resources required to deal with the backlog are in place. They will be spent to accomplish the objective first set when we introduced the backlog program.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, last year in Atlantic Canada foreign overfishing accounted for 150,000 tonnes which is almost equal to the total allowable catch for the whole region and represents 3,000 jobs.

This government is allowing foreigners to plunder the very resources upon which the Atlantic region depends. I would like to ask the Prime Minister when he is going to get seized with this problem. When is he going to get serious about protecting our fish for our fishermen?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it should be clear.

If the hon. member would care to look at the record of all the efforts the government is deploying to stop the overfishing, if he would look at the reality of the overfishing in Atlantic Canada, he would see the steps that have been taken by all levels of government and by the industry in Europe to try to stop this overfishing.

We have not succeeded completely, but the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is always trying to convince the EEC to stop overfishing and respect the environmental concerns of Canada in the North Atlantic.

The hon. members says that we allow foreigners. The hon. member should come clean with Canadians and tell them that no foreign trawlers are allowed within the 200-mile limit off Canada, except according to the rules set by NAFO, and that is the reality.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am going to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who, when he announced the aid package for Newfoundland and Labrador and the Atlantic region last week, stressed very much that the failure of the fishery was due solely to environmental problems.

If this is so, how can he account for Soviet fishermen giving evidence to Newfoundlanders on Soviet overfishing in our own waters, and how can he account for the rage, the anger and the frustration of the Newfoundland fisherman who cannot fish 45 miles off their own coasts in area 3NO without being arrested. More particularly, Mr. Speaker, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, is away on duty. You know, it is great to stand up and grandstand in the House. What he is not telling the fishermen in Atlantic Canada and in Newfoundland and Labrador is that the reason why the quota in 3NO from about two years previous was 46,000 tonnes and has been dropped to approximately 13,000 tonnes was for conservation reasons.

Maybe the Liberal Party is in favour of letting fishermen raid the resource and kill it. We are not.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The compensation payment for PVY-N for last year's crop has not yet been completed. Farmers have been waiting for over a year and a half.

The application forms for the 1991 crop are not yet available. What I want to know, Mr. Speaker, is when will the application forms be available. I especially want to know if the funds are in place to immediately respond to the losses, or will the P.E.I. potato producers have to wait until next year again.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, payments for last year to date are over $9 million. There are some 36 applications for assistance that have not been processed because there were some problems in filling out those forms for 1990.

We have established an action committee in Prince Edward Island of the stakeholders, producers, provincial government, federal representatives. They are the group that is working to provide an application form for this year's assistance.

I can assure the hon. member that the dollars to address this concern, as I said when I met with the premier of Prince Edward Island in Saskatoon and established the process, are available from the Government of Canada.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I hope the grain farmers of the west do not have to wait as long as the potato farmers of Prince Edward Island for their compensation.

I have a question for the same minister. Preliminary re-testing results of the supposedly infected fields showed an 80 per cent error rate. Potato fields were destroyed for absolutely no reason. The minister's department has been re-testing for the past several weeks. They admit this now publicly.

What I want to know, Mr. Speaker, is what are the results of the re-tests being carried out over the past number of weeks. Can the minister now tell the P.E.I. farmer what is actually going on.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when the virus was discovered in Prince Edward Island last fall, the plants were in the tuber stage. This year we have gone through a testing process that was agreed to. I want to emphasize to the hon. member that it was agreed to by the Province of Prince Edward Island and their scientists and by the Government of Canada and our scientists in a protocol.

• (1450)

We are in this together. We are in it for the betterment of the potato industry in Prince Edward Island. Yes, there is a hypothesis out there, a theory that there may have been some mistesting. But no one including the international panel of experts has any doubt that PVY-N is in Prince Edward Island. What we are doing together with the farmers and the province is attempting to eradicate that so that the industry will be able to sustain itself.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

At a time when we are trying to send out a signal to Canadians that Canada is a country for all Canadians, we have in the last two weeks witnessed derogatory remarks made in this House that have insulted both the women of Canada and visible minorities of Canada.

I know that the Prime Minister has a commitment to combating sexism and racism in this country, as I do, and I want to ask the Prime Minister: Will he take serious action to show that commitment by removing the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration from their duties to show his seriousness?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I thought this item had been dealt with quite effectively by yourself when it came up. In any event, the whole question of the demeanour of members of Parliament in this House has been a subject I have been talking about for a year. I committed earlier this day to bring forward a motion to this House. We can fully debate that, have a free vote, and impose on ourselves standards of behaviour that will make the people of Canada proud rather than disappointed in this House.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think everyone in this House will agree that we do not need a free vote on sexism. We do not need a free vote on racism.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that I as a leader will personally commit that, should anyone in my caucus make sexist or racist comments in this House, I will relieve them of their duties and I ask the Prime Minister: Will he simply do the same?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty at all in subscribing to the point of view expressed by my hon. friend.

I have sat here for seven years as Prime Minister and have been I think subjected to just about every possible epithet coming from the other side of the House. One of the members of the NDP, among other things, arrived here and slopped down a fish, with huge insults, on—

Some hon. members: That is not sexist or racist.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "We are of course opposed to sexism. We are of course opposed to racism of all kinds". I have stood against both throughout my political and private life.

My hon. friend will agree that this is a two-way street. We are going to enforce these requirements very severely on ourselves. I know that she will want and the Leader of the Opposition will want to enforce the same demands and the same high standards of conduct on all members of the Official Opposition.

The opposition does not require calumny, smear, character assassination, or any of the things to which we have been subjected for the last seven years. In the process I can commit to my hon. friend that we will subscribe to very high standards with pride and with pleasure. I know that they too will insist that the Leaders of the Liberal Party and the NDP do no less for their own members.

PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, Kemtek, a petrochemical company, announced that it intended to suspend all operations indefinitely. Mr. Speaker, this decision threatens more than 1,000 jobs in East Montreal. Last week, the minister responsible for Montreal and the executive and members of the union had a meeting to discuss a solution. My question is this: Could the minister give the House the assurance that he will co-operate fully with these people in order to save these jobs?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her abiding interest in this unfortunate sequence of events that recently struck East Montreal.

As the hon. member mentioned, last week I had a meeting with employers, employees and a number of people otherwise involved in this situation. The federal government and the Government of Quebec are very concerned. Every effort is being made to attract a new owner in order to keep the plant open and thus preserve a number of extremely vital jobs.

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I would like to know whether the minister has received confirmation from the provincial government regarding its position on this case.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Quebec, through the Quebec Industrial Development Corporation, has asked for the company to be declared bankrupt so that the case can be settled. A receiver was appointed yesterday, and I repeat that the federal government and the Government of Quebec are working very hard to maintain the company's operations, if at all possible, and to preserve those 1,000 jobs.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

At a time when this government is boasting about its prosperity agenda, 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. Now Statistics Canada reveals that their job prospects which were already dismal are at their worst point in seven years. With the made-in-Canada recession we saw factory after factory shutting down and jobs vanishing forever.

I ask the minister: When will this government face reality and take all the necessary steps to halt the deindustrialization of this nation and put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if that member is so concerned about the fate of workers in Canada, I do not know why he and his party and his cohorts in the other place fought Bill C-21 for so long. He likes to talk about unemployed people in this country. These people this year will get $1.8 billion more in training to adapt to the requirements of the changing economy.

Instead of just grandstanding on the issue, the Liberals should put their foot where their mouth is and support them.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The government strategy of jobs, jobs, jobs has been a failure, failure, failure. You promised Canadians a worker readjustment program. You have not certainly delivered.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Bevilacqua: The government now speaks to the issue of global competitiveness and at the same time cuts in the areas of education and training, both vital components to compete globally.

Given this government's failed employment strategy, how can Canadians expect the jobs that will enable them to compete against the world?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we outlined in the Speech from the Throne the will of the government to try something which of course Grits in previous generations never succeeded in doing, that is to bring together the people of Canada to work under the labour force development strategy and to try to get the business sector and labour in Canada to work together so that we could provide our workers, men and women all across Canada, with the tools they need to fill those jobs that are required.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Refugee Review Board has decided to deport the family of Guillermo Jerez saying it is not convinced they would be persecuted if they returned to Nicaragua.

Given that international agencies have documented 52 killings of people like Mr. Jerez and his family since 1990, why will the minister not personally intervene and overturn this deportation order?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, let me first say that I am just as appreciative of the member's concern as those who are trying to make the case that the process in place should not be followed. Mr. Jerez has had the benefit of the entire refugee determination process, including a full review of his claim by an independent tribunal. I am satisfied that he and his family have received due process at all stages. We have fulfilled our part of an agreement with the family last week and postponed removal until this week.

• (1500)

I want the hon. member and other members in the House to appreciate fully that we must respect the process that is in place. It is recognized throughout the world as being the most generous and fair in the world and it should be allowed to work.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, speaking of process, I would suggest that the Jerez family is not the only family in that situation. As a matter of fact, of the 100,000 refugees cases presently in Canada, only 4,000 people have been deported at a processing cost of $300 million and more. That is almost equivalent to the entire budget of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees around the world.

Would the minister call for an urgent administrative review to make our system more effective and save the lives of people like the Jerez?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member is really sure of the accusation he makes about this refugee determination system. We have in this country, as the hon. member knows, a system which must be not only fair but firm.

When he talks about removal, we have at this time of the year almost tripled the number of removals of people who have gone through the process but are not here legally. I do not think Canada should be ashamed of its record because we often get criticism like this but very few criticisms for the decisions that we make in favour.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Edmonton East, a single question and a short one, please.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I will decline, thanks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Northeast, even shorter.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am going to accept that question and it is directed to the Prime Minister.

As we know the fighting in Croatia continues. The cease-fire is not holding. The Stalinist Junta in Belgrade illegally took control of the armed forces of Yugoslavia and wages a war against the innocent children and civilians of Croatia.

Therefore my question through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister is: Will our government recognize the changes in the Balkans, the new reality, and recognize the duly elected Government of Croatia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been very active in trying to promote peace and a ceasefire in Yugoslavia, both through the CSCE and by offering to monitor through the European community. Canada also led the resolution in the Security Council at the United Nations.

But recognition, as the hon. member knows, follows a number of international criteria. Among them, there have to be settled boundaries and an effective government in its independent ability to control a territory.

We are encouraged by the latest ceasefire where we have the President of Croatia, the President of Yugoslavia and the defence minister in a tenuous accord that might result in the possibility of recognition at some point down the road once some of those issues are settled.

In the meantime, the most important thing is that the parties stop shooting and that they observe the ceasefire that they themselves have signed on to. Until that happens it is very difficult to take any further steps.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, just so that the Prime Minister is not seen as having misled the House, it should be pointed out that in his statement today quoting Roy Romanow the net income shortfall for Saskatchewan of $500 million is that province's proper share of a $1.3 billion—

Mr. Speaker: That really is not a point of order. That is a question of debate. I have to point out it is a question of debate and I do not think it should be proceeded with.

QUOTATION DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I quoted from a letter from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and I was not able to finish the quote. I want to be sure that it is on the record. It reads: "This assistance must be delivered to farmers as soon as possible. This farm aid package falls short of the income shortfall needed that was identified for both Saskatchewan and Canada. However we look forward to continued dialogue with the federal government relative to the support that will continue to be required as long as we are faced with the devastating effects of the international trade war". It is from President Garf Stevenson.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. minister, especially on this issue, but I do ask ministers and members during the 45 minutes that is allotted to us to all strive mightily to get the questions in and to also get the answers back. Otherwise on points of order we just extend the Question Period and that is something which of course puts some pressure on the good nature of the House.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader with regard to the business of the House for the remainder of today and tomorrow, as well as for the days after we return, particularly Monday and Tuesday of the first week after the break.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that this afternoon we can complete the back-to-work legislation for the Thunder Bay grain handlers so that the Senate might deal with it tomorrow and have it in place and have grain moving again to the benefit of western farmers.

I would like formally to designate tomorrow as an Opposition Day.

In terms of the business for the Monday on which we return, October 21, I would ask the indulgence of the opposition parties so that we might have the usual discussions tomorrow to find out what would be the most appropriate pieces of legislation to deal with on the first few days we are back. We will endeavour to get that solidified so that we can communicate it to members before they go for their holidays in the Bahamas or wherever else they are going for the break.

Mr. Speaker: We may want to return to this in just a moment.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I know that hon. members would want me to recognize the presence in the gallery of a foreign minister of a friendly and long-standing ally of Canada, the Foreign Minister of Denmark, His Excellency Usse Ellemann-Jensen, who is here, I might say, in the Royal visit of Her Majesty and His Royal Highness of Denmark.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

THUNDER BAY GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

House in committee on Bill C-37, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario—Mr. Danis—Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3—Definitions

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Chairman, I would like to move an amendment to clause 3, page 1 line 2 by inserting the word "board" after the word "arbitrator".

This is to follow suit with my amendment that I will be making to clause 8 which simply reflects the interest of my party.

For the minister's information, I have already given him a copy of this particular amendment. It is the interest of our party to have an arbitration board versus an arbitrator-mediator. The reason for that is simply that we believe that the circumstances in this case warrant the changes to the normal process and procedures of an arbitrator-mediator.

Due to the technical expertise necessary in this particular issue of pensions, we would request the minister and the government to support this amendment. We believe it would help both parties come to a resolution of the issue. In the long term, it would help both parties to understand the job security difficulties in the port of Thunder Bay, the job loss and also the direction that particular industry will be taking in the long-term.

The job security and pension issues are two of the fundamental issues that the company has refused to negotiate so far. I would ask the minister to support this particular amendment. I also suggest very strongly that the ability of this particular amendment to follow through would make the union much more secure in its fight to have this particular issue dealt with.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River for giving me a copy of his proposed amendment earlier today.

I have looked at the amendment very, very carefully. I realize as he and the hon. member for Churchill do that the issue of pensions appears to be the main stumbling block in this dispute.

I do believe that the bill as drafted now can meet the concerns of the union leadership. Obviously, they would like to have a fair opportunity to make their point known concerning the pension issue to the mediator-arbitrator.

The hon. member knows that the person whom we plan to appoint, of course, will be a fair person. I would hope that I would be in the position to appoint someone with a background in pension issues if possible.

Were that not to be the case, however, I can assure my friend from Kenora—Rainy River and my friend from Churchill that whoever is appointed will certainly get all the financial resources necessary to have whatever study he or she wants made on any pension issue. I can assure my friend of that.

With that assurance, I would hope that my friend would be satisfied that the government will make sure that all the concerns of the union are taken care of with regard to pensions.

The Chairman: If I may for a moment, we were taking into consideration the amendment as presented by the hon. member.

Please help the Chair here. He says that clause 3 be amended at page 1, line 2. I would imagine that the hon. member means clause 3. Yes, it is page 1, but could it be line 20 instead of line 2? After "mediator-arbitrator", he would like the word "board". It is line 20 and not line 2, correct?

We will come back in a minute with that.

Mr. Nault: Thank you for correcting me. That is exactly what we meant.

While we wait to see if the amendment is in order, I would like to ask the minister if he would explain to us what seems to be the difficulty with him accepting the amendment.

He has suggested to us in his response about the particular necessity to have an arbitrator-mediator who is capable of dealing with the very technical issue of pensions and job security, but he did not go that step further and explain to me what difficulty he would have with an arbitration type board or panel with the ability of the company and the union to have their own expertise at the table to explain in detail so we will not have to feel that even though it is not possible for the Minister of Labour to get someone with the capabilities, we will have that issue dealt with because it is the main stumbling block in the whole affair and, it seems to me, the reason why the strike is in process at the moment.

It is not good enough to suggest that it is hoped that we may get someone who is capable because that is very difficult to do. Those of us who are familiar with labour negotiation will quickly tell you that to be involved in the pension issue is a very complicated subject. As much as I think we have very capable arbitrators and mediators in this country, I feel that that expertise is very much necessary in order for us to get some long term stability to that port of Thunder Bay.

I ask the minister again, as a direct question, what seems to be the reasoning behind his reluctance to allow this amendment to go forward?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, there are two reasons I do not support the amendment proposed by my hon. friend. First, I believe it would be extremely difficult for the mediation part of Bill C-37 to proceed with three mediators in a dispute dealing mainly with one issue. Second, I know that the pools and the unions will have a full opportunity to make their cases known to the mediator-arbitrator, whomever she or he may be.

With those two assurances, I would hope that my hon. friend would then withdraw his proposed amendment.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Chairman, my question for the Minister of Labour is this. As the minister knows, the amendment is being put forward in very good faith. The minister has indicated on the floor of the House that both parties will have an opportunity to present their respective cases. I suggest to the minister that the distinction that he must draw between a single arbitrator and that of a board is the following: representatives will have an opportunity to present their cases but I would conclude that with an arbitration board with representatives from respective parties, this will be able to facilitate the arbitrator in coming to a decision which is much more equitable, fairer, and more than likely will be more expeditious in the process. That is what the arbitration board can do.

We have seen arbitration boards facilitate that process in a host of labour disputes, both with the public sector and the private sector.

The minister is shaking his head. I ask the minister to reflect very carefully on the substance of the amendment which is being offered, the fact that it is being offered in good faith, knowing full well that at least one of the parties, if not both of the parties, would prefer a board as opposed to a single arbitrator.

• (1520)

I think the minister will want to reflect on the fact that the onus being put on a single arbitrator, particularly as it relates to a very fundamental issue of this particular dispute, is somewhat onerous. It can be lessened by having the board which would then facilitate the process expedite the process and reach a fair and equitable decision. I would hope the minister would not discount the substance of the amendment, the way in which it has been offered, and perhaps he might want to reflect on it again.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, my first comment would be to say publicly that I do believe that the amendment brought in by the member for Kenora—Rainy River was done in good faith. That obviously is true and I really believe that.

Second, the hon. House leader for the Official Opposition said that the settlement should be equitable and fair. We agree with that too.

Third, my hon. friend, the opposition House leader, seems to want to rely a lot on the arbitration part of this legislation, I believe in the mediation part of it. I fail to see how three mediators can achieve the settlement that we want. I have absolutely no concerns whatever that this union and management have all the means possible to get their positions known to the parties.

My hon. friend, who is one of the best lawyers in this country, if he were hired by the union or management to plead the case in front of a mediator-arbitrator, would I am sure he do a good job. Why do they not do it?

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Chairman, I also would like to support the amendment suggested by my colleague in the Liberal Party. Earlier today I indicated that I believe a three person panel makes a lot of sense. I spoke about my own experience on both the employee and the employer side with arbitration boards. I know that they work well. They provide that in-depth knowledge, local knowledge that is quite often necessary to get long term settlements, especially to disputes which occur on a fairly regular basis, such as that in the grain handling industry.

My concern is with the legislation itself, with the very term mediator-arbitrator. The minister in his rejection of the amendment said: "A three person panel may deal well with the arbitration but does not deal well with the mediator part of that title".

I would like to say to the minister, and I have said it before to previous Ministers of Labour, that I think the labour department is making a mistake in combining those two titles. They are very distinct roles. I am sure that the minister and his officials who are in the House to assist him today recognize that when the two parties are dealing with a mediator, they quite often would say things they will never say to someone who is going to be in a position to arbitrate later on.

It makes it very difficult for the mediation role to succeed if that same person is going to be sitting in judgment as an arbitrator later on. To explain further, if you are a party in negotiations and you are using the services of a mediator, you will quite often say: "if the employer will just move in this area, we are quite willing to draw back over here". You may say: "This is our bottom line on this particular issue". You say a lot of things in confidence to a mediator in an attempt to reach a settlement.

If that same person is going to be sitting in judgment, and this legislation says that if mediation fails then that same person must make an arbitration ruling within 90 days, then it is very difficult for the two sides to sit down and treat that person as a mediator.

They are always going to be looking at the arbitrator half of the hat. They have to. They have to protect themselves. I am wondering if the minister would get up and explain why the government always combines these two roles into one, especially in this particular case in which we know that the director of mediation services unfortunately was not able to spend very much time in Thunder Bay before the negotiations broke down.

Would it not have been much better had these two roles been separated and two different individuals appointed, one to deal with mediation and a different person, or group, to deal with the arbitration?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, I must tell my hon. friend from Churchill that the system of mediation arbitrator has been used many times in the past. It has even been used on a voluntary basis by people in that industry on the west coast.

My friend will recall that, unfortunately, recently we have had to have back to work legislation for the grain handlers on the west coast and the same system was used of the mediation arbitration. When I did appoint the person in question I understand that both parties, even though both may not have been satisfied that the back to work legislation was passed, were satisfied with the person who was appointed and the system that was used.

I do believe that when the parties deal with the mediator in his or her position as mediator knowing that in the end that person may have the final say, the parties may become more rational and we may get a decision faster.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Chairman, if I could just pick up on this point, this may be jumping ahead to clause 8, but perhaps we can squeeze the point in here because of the way the discussion has begun.

If the mediator or the mediator-arbitrator, begins his work or her work, and the parties find that the system of shifting to become an arbitrator is going to impede the work of the mediator-arbitrator as a mediator, does the minister read the act to provide him with the authority of replacing the mediator-arbitrator with another person to cover the arbitration part of it later on? I appreciate that the powers would remain the same in the person, but if the parties came to the minister and asked for a change part way down the road, would it be possible for that to take place?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, the person who would be appointed by the government would be the person who would take the issue theoretically in 48 hours up until the end.

I can tell my friend that the parties can now—we talk about the first phase on mediation—if they want, negotiate and reach a settlement. Nobody has to wait for us to pass the legislation. We do not have to wait for the other place to approve it. We do not have to wait for Royal Assent or proclamation.

The parties can, if both of them are in good faith and want to negotiate, do that. Once the government proceeds, if the House and the other place agree to go ahead with Bill C-37, then there would be an appointment made by the government and that person would see the matter through to the end.

Mr. Brewin: If I could just follow up on the point I made. Both my friend from Churchill and the minister in their initial exchange made good points. That is to say there are occasions when the role of arbitrator interferes with the role of mediator and therefore that may not work.

Equally, the minister made a good point in saying that frequently it does work.

All I was seeking was some assurance from the minister that if as this process begins to work itself through with the mediator-arbitrator initially trying to act as a mediator, and if all of those participating come to the conclusion that they need to go to arbitration, and the mediator-arbitrator has somehow spoiled his or her role by acting as a mediator, does the minister contemplate at least the possibility of appointing someone else to complete the job?

• (1530)

Is that open in this legislation? All I am asking now is, does the legislation bar that happening or does the legislation at least leave that open, and should everyone, including the minister, see it as a useful idea?

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, my hon. friend is either being very hypothetical and theoretical, or being very pessimistic. Unlike my hon. friend, I do believe that has been tried on a number of occasions, unfortunately, before. It has worked.

My friend paints the absolute worst case scenario in a situation like that. If that ever came about, I would think that whoever would be in this position would resign the position and then I would appoint somebody else. That is absolutely the worst case position which I am not even contemplating.

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman I wonder if the minister and members of the other parties would be disposed to allowing clause 8 to be put forward with the amendment we were going to propose, which is what we seem to be talking about in this instance. We could then get into substantive debate about clause 8. I think that is what we are talking about now.

I did suggest the particular wording, which was on clause 3 at page 1 of Bill C-37. I wonder if we could do that now so that we could continue with the discussion. There are a few issues I want to bring forward but it is more appropriately done in clause 8 than it is running around here in clause 3.

The Chairman The hon. member may want to table the amendment he has for clause 8 at this time and we can look at it.

The problem I have is that there is already an amendment that has been not officially put to the House, but there is an amendment there. The way we accepted it was that if in the definitions at line 21 "mediator-arbitrator" means the mediator-arbitrator board appointed pursuant to subsection 8, then it would automatically be added for concordance. This was why I did not think we were out of order in discussing the matter which will come up in clause 8.

If there is unanimous consent to stand on clause 3 at this time and go to clause 8. I am quite prepared to call clause 8.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

On Clause 8—Appointment of mediator-arbitrator

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Chairman, I want to get back to clause 8 because that is really what we are involved in here.

I want to assure the minister, and maybe it is possible for him through his officials and himself to assure the parties, that the important issue of pensions and job security for the purposes of this legislation will be one of the most fundamental issues talked about and that the individual or the individuals who will be appointed by the minister through this process will have the expertise.

There are two ways we can do that. We can do that by simply creating the board to which I am referring in clause 8.(1), or we can amend Bill C–37, clause 8 at line 24 by adding after the word "agreement" the words "and resources for pension/job security purposes."

I have not given the minister the other amendment, which is the alternative to my whole argument which is that perhaps we can somehow insert for purposes of this whole discussion that we can be assured that the resources will be available. By resources I mean the individuals with the necessary expertise to work with the arbitrator–mediator in order to secure the kind of discussion that is necessary to come to some sort of consensus by the three parties involved, the government, the union and the employer.

I will put forward my amendment to clause 8 which reads:

> That Clause 8(1) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> 8.(1) Within 48 hours after the coming into force of this act, the employer shall appoint one member and the union shall appoint one member, and thereupon the minister shall appoint a chairman of the mediator–arbitrator board, and the minister shall refer to the mediator–arbitrator all matters relating to the amendment or revision of the collective agreement that at the time of the appointment remain in dispute between the union and the employer.
> Provided that should either the union or the employer fail to appoint a member within said 48 hours, the minister may forthwith appoint such member in the place and stead of the said union or employer as the case may be.

I put forward that amendment and I also would like to put forward one other amendment. It is simply for the minister's perusal and for the other members.

Hopefully, I have the right line this time. I suggest it is line 22 and it is 8(1), after the words 'collective agreement'. It says: "Clause 8(1), line 22, add after the word 'agreement': —and resources for pension job security purposes that, at the time of the appointment, remain in dispute between the union and the employer".

That gives us an assurance within the legislation that we will deal with this particular piece of legislation.

I do not know whether it is appropriate and I ask for your indulgence, Madam Chairman, again to give me some guidance here. Is it possible to suggest two amendments to the same issue by the same member? There seems to be a bit of a contradiction in terms. I wonder whether you could explain that to me before I officially submit this one.

Should I debate the one I have already submitted first, and then get into this one at a later date?

The Chairman: What the Chair suggested to the hon. member earlier was to please table those amendments with us so we could read them very carefully and then decide whether they are receivable.

We should have the first one back within a second. We had some photocopies made for the minister and for the Table. If I understood correctly what the hon. member has suggested, the second amendment would come if the first one had been agreed upon or negatived.

It is a bit difficult at this time for the Chair until we have both amendments in front of us. If the hon. member would be kind enough to allow us to have a look at both amendments, then maybe the Chair could help the House. In the meantime, I am sure that members and the minister will want to study the proposals as made by the hon. member.

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, I am not attempting to confuse the issue but it is the minister's belief that having a board or panel will make it more difficult for an arbitrator who has been appointed and I have given him another suggestion.

The final amendment that I have put forward to you suggests that we can add the ability for the arbitrator–mediator to have the efficient resources necessary. By "resources", I mean it was within his rights to bring forward pension expertise acceptable to both sides and that will allow us to get at the table with the parties involved a legitimate discussion on a very complex and technical issue.

I would be interested if the minister would confirm whether he would be willing and able to allow that type of an amendment to go through which would assure the union and the employer that particular issue, which is foremost in our minds, would be looked after.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, I do agree that all the resources, financial or otherwise, should be made available to the mediator-arbitrator to deal effectively and fairly with the issues of pension and job security.

• (1540)

I do agree with that and we all agree with that. We also agree, and I said so in the speech at second reading stage, that all issues are on the table for the mediator-arbitrator. I do not believe, with respect to my hon. friend for Kenora—Rainy River, that it is necessary to put that in the legislation.

If my friend wants to make sure that the mediator-arbitrator is aware of that, I will, at the same time as a letter of appointment, send today's debate with a letter of appointment to the mediator-arbitrator, but I do not think I need to do that. It is obvious that the mediator will get the resources and will deal effectively with those issues.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, I would like to take the minister up on his offer of having today's debates sent to the person he will be appointing as mediator-arbitrator.

I think it is very important when someone receives this appointment that he or she is aware of what is expected. It has been very evident in the debate that has taken place today that all three parties have indicated they believe the issue of pensions must be dealt with. That does not say what the arbitrator will rule if he or she gets forced into that situation, but it does mean that it has to be dealt with.

I really hope that the Minister of Labour will go the extra mile to find an arbitrator who is knowledgeable about pension plans and is able to make the appropriate judgments on this very important issue. I hope he can find such a person. I know it may be difficult, but I think it would be well worth the search because as we all know, those of us who have ever dealt with pension plans, it can become very confusing. If someone is not aware, the best advice may not make that person feel very comfortable in writing an arbitration board that would adequately deal with the issues that we are talking about.

Failing that, it certainly is necessary to make sure that the arbitrator does have all the necessary resources, consultants and information in front of him or her to be able to make that judgment.

I would ask the minister not only to table the debate or give the debate to the mediator-arbitrator, but to go that extra step. I would hope he would reassure the House yet again that he would do that.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, I can assure my hon. friend from Churchill that all the resources will be made available to the person who will be appointed as mediator/arbitrator in the dispute and that it will be made known to that person that all issues are on the table.

I agree with my hon. friend from Churchill and I will send a copy of today's debates to the person at the time of appointment.

The Chairman: The Chair will be with the committee in a minute. We are still studying the amendment proposed to clause 8. Can I be given a few more minutes, please?

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, maybe this would give me an opportunity to say something about the process of negotiations and the very fact that we in the House of Commons are now being asked by the government to pass back-to-work legislation. The three parties have mentioned the fact that pensions will be one of the areas that the mediator-arbitrator looks at. It is ironic that this is an issue that the employer refused to discuss at the negotiating table over the last period of time.

It is further ironic that it was only yesterday afternoon that issue actually got to the negotiating table. I find it ironic that here we are basically telling a mediator-arbitrator that he will be expected to do that which the employer would not do. He or she will be in a situation to deal with something that the employer should have put on the negotiating table. I am not going to tell the employer what he should have offered in terms of pensions. I do not think that is our role. It would have solved a lot of problems. It may have prevented a strike had the employer been willing to deal with this at the negotiating table.

It is ironic when I think back about the remarks made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, and some of the Conservative backbenchers who kept getting up in this House and telling the workers to go back to work. Not one of them suggested that perhaps the employer should put the issue of pensions on the negotiating table.

We heard speech after speech, snide comment after snide comment by Conservative members but not one of them suggested that the employer should negotiate on all the issues. If that had happened we may not be debating this legislation at this time.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, of course I cannot speak on behalf of the employer and I do not speak on behalf of the union either. I must tell my friend that on Friday last week and Monday this week I did contact both sides. I had a full and frank discussion with the representative of the pool, the attorney in charge, and made it known to the attorney that when they met the person who eventually turned out to be Mr. Edmondson I wanted some flexibility on the part of both sides and I wanted all issues to be brought to the table.

I understand now that in fact all issues were put on the table yesterday. I think an effort was made in good faith by both parties.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, in fairness, I was not including the Minister of Labour when I was attacking various Conservative cabinet ministers and various Conservative MPs for always referring to the employees' role and saying the employees should get back to work and never looking at the employer's side of the situation. I believe he was conducting his role as he should, dealing with both parties. I was referring to other members of his cabinet and caucus who only seemed to look at one side of the issue and perhaps were are not aware that the sticking point, the major issue, was pensions and that it was the employer who was refusing to negotiate that.

I want to make sure that the House understands that I was not impugning any motives to the Minister of Labour.

The Chairman: The Chair has looked very carefully at the amendment moved by the member for Kenora—Rainy River on clause 8(1). I cannot find it in order. The bill as approved by the House at second reading allows the minister to appoint a mediator–arbitrator.

The amendment would take some of that power away from the minister because the minister could not in a way name that person. We must go back to the first amendment that the member presented that dealt with the definitions. and said that mediator–arbitrator means the mediator–arbitrator board appointed pursuant to subsection 8(1). The minister could then be somehow allowed to name a board instead of one person, so this could be acceptable.

At this time it really is a new concept that there would be three people and that two other people would be part of the mediator–arbitrator and form a team. The minister would not have the ability of naming those people. This is a brand new concept that was not in the bill at second reading.

It goes really beyond the scope of that clause. Therefore, the Chair has no choice but not to receive this amendment.

• (1550)

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, I do not propose to debate with the Chair as to whether or not it is in order simply because I cannot.

An hon. member: Go ahead.

Mr. Nault: Oh, can I? If I can debate it I will. One of the problems that I foresee with the argument that has been put by the Chair is simply that it changes the scope of the whole bill and that is not necessarily true. The principle of back–to–work legislation and the principle of having an arbitrator or an arbitration board is to have someone to mediate a dispute. We have not taken that ability away from the arbitration process, and we have not taken that ability away from the Minister of Labour.

The Minister of Labour will still have the ability to appoint on the government's behalf a mediator–arbitrator. All I am suggesting is that the mediator–arbitrator process be extended to include two more people.

Therefore, if that were the case, the principle in essence of the bill has not been changed whatsoever. We are just expanding on the abilities of the mediator–arbitrator process to have more expertise within its process.

I for one am a little confused as to why the Chair would feel that it has changed the principle and the abilities of the minister to appoint the mediator–arbitrator because it has not. Indeed he still has the same abilities he had before the amendment. The only difference is that he is also allowing both sides of the dispute to nominate an individual who will participate with the chairman of that board, which is the arbitrator.

I do not see how that could simply change it. I certainly would be interested in knowing from the Table why it is that it senses it has changed the whole process.

The Chairman: What the amendment would do is allow the minister to name the chairman of that board. The board itself is not in the bill at second reading. Bringing the board in itself is a new concept that goes beyond the scope.

The hon. minister could then only name the chairman of that board. This is where the Chair sees that it brings in a new concept and it goes beyond the scope of the clause.

But, as I have told the hon. member, we are now in committee and I am just Chairman of this committee. He can of course appeal to the Speaker to rule on my judgment of this amendment. At this time I do not see how we can accept this amendment.

One more thing that may be helpful to the hon. member is that it is not so much the board concept as the fact that it is taking the power of appointing away from the minister. If the minister were appointing the three people—this is what the bill said at second reading: "The minister shall appoint a mediator- arbitrator"—the other people involved would not have been appointed by the minister and this is where it goes beyond the scope of the clause as accepted at second reading.

Am I being clearer to the hon. member?

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, let me assure you that if you read the whole amendment it suggests that the minister does indeed have the power to appoint those members.

The fact remains that unions will make the appointment of their particular individual but under this amendment the minister still has to accept that individual.

I get the impression by the discussion I have had with the minister and with the opposition on the other side, not so much the opposition over here, that it is not going to be accepted by the minister anyway.

I do not know whether we want to continue on with this debate at length now or maybe at a more appropriate time.

I would be most interested in asking the Chairman to rule on it, but how long would that take?

The Chairman: It could take maybe half an hour, I do not know where the Speaker is at this time, for him to be briefed on what the amendment is. Please bear with me for a moment.

The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River says that it is not taking any power from the minister. What the amendment he proposes says is that the union shall appoint one member, the employer shall appoint one member and then the minister shall appoint a chairman. It is taking away from the power that the minister has in the bill as accepted at second reading.

This amendment can really not be accepted.

Shall we revert to clause 3?

On Clause 3—Definitions

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is the original amendment on clause 3, the amendment moved by Mr. Nault which said:

> That clause 3 be amended on page 1, line 21, by inserting the word "board" after the word "arbitrator".

Is it the pleasure of the committee to accept this amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Nault) negatived.

Clauses 3 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 8—Appointment of mediator-arbitrator

The Chairman: On clause 8 the first amendment was not deemed receivable. We have a second amendment moved by Mr. Nault which says: "Clause 8.1, line 24, after the word 'agreement' and resources for pension and job security purposes that, at the time of the appointment". I must say the Chair has a certain difficulty with trying to fit the amendment within the paragraph. Can the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River be of some help to the Chair?

Mr. Nault: What I am suggesting is that after "collective agreement", I will read it for you:

> 8.(1) The Minister shall, after the coming into force of this Act, appoint a mediator-arbitrator and refer to the mediator-arbitrator all matters relating to the amendment or revision of the collective agreement—

And added in there is:

—and resources for pension and job security purposes. And at the time of the appointment, remain in dispute between the union and the employer.

• (1600)

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, if I may speak on the proposed amendment by my friend from Kenora—Rainy River, the powers given to that person would be the following ones.

In the Canada Labour Code, Part I, section 16, a person would have the powers:

—to summon and enforce the attendance of witnesses and compel them to give oral or written evidence on oath and to produce such documents and things as he or she would deem requisite, with a full investigation and consideration of any matter within its jurisdiction.

I feel that the law, as written now in Bill C–37, takes care of the concerns raised by my hon. friend, and therefore I see no need for the amendments, however well intentioned they may be.

Mr. Nault: Thank you very much, Madam Chairman. One of the reasons we wanted this particular assurance put into the legislation is simply that we are convinced, at least in the discussions that I have had, that with the limited amount of knowledge that an arbitrator–mediator will have in the area of a very technical subject, that being pensions, there should be added resources for that particular subject.

One of the reasons I am suggesting that in there is because if the company or the union wanted to allow the individual we suggested to take time off work, there would be added resources for that kind of situation. I am not convinced that under the legislation that we have now the individual with the expertise that we are talking about will have the opportunity to avail himself or herself of this whole process on a continued basis simply because of the fact that so far, as we have had the discussion, we cannot get both sides to talk about the issue at all.

I am quite worried that over a period of time, the month or so we will be involved in this issue, there will be added costs to that whole process. I cannot understand why the minister would feel that adding such simple words would affect at all the process in allowing us to feel assured that, in this sense, the whole issue that we are dealing with, which is pension and job security, will have the resources necessary to be dealt with in its total form. I am not quite convinced the minister is aware of just how difficult this whole process is and how complicated it can be and how much time it can take. If he can assure us that is the case, then again, I do not see any reason why he would not allow that small half sentence to be inserted in the clause.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, I give my complete commitment that the person who would be appointed once this bill is proclaimed would have the full and necessary resources to investigate or deal with any and all issues in dispute. My friend knows there is no way you could possibly settle this dispute unless you have an agreement or a decision of an arbitrator on the pension issue.

I am confident that the person will get all of the resources available and will also have all the powers available by section 16 of the Canada Labour Code, and will be a fair and knowledgeable person as far as possible.

Madam Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. members: No.

The Chairman: Negatived on division.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Chairman, I would like to move a further amendment to clause 8. I move:

That clause 8.(1) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Within 24 hours after the coming into force of this act, the employer shall nominate one member and the union shall nominate one member and thereupon the minister shall appoint a chairman of a mediator–arbitrator board and the minister shall refer to the mediator–arbitrator all matters relating to the amendment or revision of the collective agreement that, at the time of the appointment, remain in dispute between the union and the employer. Provided that should either the union or the employer fail to appoint a member within the said 24 hours, the minister may forthwith appoint such a member in the place instead of the said union or employer as the case may be.

The Chairman: The Chair has very much difficulty with the amendment as presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. The committee has rejected the amendment presented in clause 3 which presented the possibility of it being a board. This was rejected in clause 3. I have very much difficulty going back to this principle of it being a board even if it is such that the minister appoints and the union and the employer nominate.

Maybe the hon. member can tell me how, once we have turned down the possibility of a board in clause 3, I can now go back on clause 8 and accept it.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Chairman, clause 3 does not appoint the board. Clause 3 is merely a definition clause in the bill. The amendment to clause 3 was moved solely for the purpose of making it clearer what was meant if clause 8 were to be subsequently amended and it was drafted on that basis. In other words, had the amendment in clause 8, which is the substantive amendment, been adopted it would have clarified the bill to amend clause 3, but not the other way around. Clause 3 need not be amended just because in clause 8 it is a board. Clause 3 defines, I believe the term is mediator-arbitrator. Clause 8 still refers to mediator-arbitrator, it is just that it happens to be a board if this amendment to clause 8 is adopted. I submit that it is in order on that point.

I draw the Chairman's attention to the fact that amendments may be made to bills at this stage and that the amendment is relevant to the bill. I submit that it is not inconsistent with or contradictory to the bill insofar as it is agreed to by the committee because the clause 3 amendment, which has been rejected, was an amendment only to definitions, as I have said, and clause 3 could be left as is and it would still make sense given this wording. It is simply that it would have made it clearer and the amendment was drafted on that basis.

The Chairman: Mediator-arbitrator, as I see it, is in the singular and not in the plural. I guess we could give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt on that.

• (1610)

Mr. Milliken: Madam Chairman, citation 698 of Beauchesne's states:

> (5) An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to at the second reading stage is not admissible.

I submit that this amendment does not violate the principle of this bill which is to provide for the termination of this strike by way of mediation or arbitration, nor is it a negative of the bill. It is supportive of the principle of the bill which simply provides that instead of a one-man arbitrator, which I presume is contemplated by the current bill, there would be a three-person board of arbitration.

I submit that within the parameters of citation 698 of Beauchesne's sixth edition this amendment is in order.

The Chairman: At no time did the Chair let it be understood or pretend that the amendment was changing or reversing the main terms of the bill. What the Chair said is that we felt that the amendment went beyond the scope of the bill and it was a new concept.

What I would suggest now, which might be the easiest way, is to accept the amendment. I will put it to the House and we will see what happens then.

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment negatived. Shall clause 8 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 8 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 9 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 10 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 11 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 12 agreed to.

On Clause 14—Coming into force

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, clause 14 is a new clause. It is not the normal clause that we have in back-to-work legislation.

We were not given any warning that the government would be changing this particular clause. Normally there is a guarantee with regard to back-to-work legislation that the employer and employees will have at least 12 hours after the act is proclaimed.

It was just last week that we had the situation with regard to the Public Service Alliance strike that the Senate, in its rush to pass the legislation, did so at five or six minutes to eight o'clock in the evening.

The President of the Treasury Board was on the air saying he expected people to be back at work at eight o'clock the next morning. He gave them 12 hours and six minutes, or something of that nature.

Of course that created great confusion because there was no way that a lot of people would even know that the Senate had passed the legislation at five minutes to eight o'clock in the evening.

I should point out that I was one of those people. I was called by some people who said: "When do we have to report back to work?" I did not know exactly when the Senate had passed the legislation.

There are absolutely no restrictions in this new amendment. There is not even a guarantee of 12 hours. It is quite possible that if the Senate in its rush tomorrow passes this legislation at four o'clock in the afternoon, the cabinet could say: "We want you people back at work one hour hence".

It was not that long ago that we guaranteed people 24 hours before they had to return to work. Then the last legislation said 12 hours. Now there is no given time, no minimum time. I suspect that the minister might get up and give assurances to this House that he will not do anything nefarious or he will not use the store alarm that the President of the Treasury Board tried to use.

On the other hand, I would not like to see this clause, even if we get assurances at this time, used in the future. It gives too much power to the government with absolutely no guarantees that either the employees or employers will have adequate information and adequate time to do it as required.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, after the convincing argument of my friend from Churchill, I would be ready to move the following amendment. I hope my friend from Churchill will never say there is no co-operation in this House.

The amendment would be the following one:

That clause 14 of Bill C-37 be amended by striking out lines 19 to 21 on page 5 and substituting the following:

COMING INTO FORCE

14. This act shall come into force on the day immediately after the day on which this act is assented to, but not before the 12th hour after the time at which it is assented to.

• (1620)

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, sometimes you do not want to accept surrender.

I am encouraged that the minister has reinstated the normal clause. I would only ask in accepting this clause that he also assure that because we are not talking about a large number of work sites and that we are talking about one city, a limited number of employers and one bargaining unit, they would be given adequate time.

If for some reason the act received Royal Assent at some weird hour of the night, people should not be surprised, there should be adequate time allowed and we should not go through the charade we went through last week with the Public Service workers.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chair, I can certainly give my word to my hon. friend that no one will be taken by surprise.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Danis) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 as amended carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 14, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, I have a bit of a problem. I know when you are sitting in the chair at the table, you do not have the same view as you have when sitting in the Speaker's chair. Sometimes I have been up and you have gone on without noticing that I have been standing waiting to speak.

The short title reads:

This act may be cited as the Thunder Bay Grain Handling Operations Act.

I wonder if, since the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds was the one who announced that this legislation would be coming down, not the Minister of Labour, the government would be willing to have the title named after the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. Perhaps, if the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds feels that he is the one who announces labour legislation, the government would also be willing to look at further legislation combining the two portfolios with only one minister.

The Chairman: And I was about to apologize to the hon. member. I guess we can both talk about our sense of humour.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Danis moved that the bill be concurred in.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Danis moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, as we near the last stage of this bill in the House, I would like to thank the members of the House for their co-operation in enabling the government to pass this legislation as rapidly as possible.

I said in my earlier speech at the second reading stage that it is not with pleasure that any labour minister has to bring in back-to-work legislation. We feel it is necessary at this time for the economy and we feel it is absolutely necessary for the farmers of western Canada that the grain move.

Having said that, however, I would hope that the parties would take advantage of the opportunity they still have through mediation to reach a settlement through the normal collective process. I urge them both to negotiate in good faith and try to reach a settlement before the bill is proclaimed.

Having said that, I would like to thank members of the House for their co-operation.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I first apologize for not being a participant in this debate up to this point. Unfortunately I was attending a grain conference in Winnipeg when we found out at about two o'clock this morning that the assessment officer whom the Minister of Labour had sent to Thunder Bay to meet with both sides had failed to get both parties to agree on some form of a settlement and as a result the legislation that is before this House would be introduced this morning. Since it is very important to the grain industry in Thunder Bay I thought it my duty to return from that conference and attend to make some comments this afternoon with respect to this legislation.

Not to detract from what the minister has just stated and not to delay the passage of the bill, I want to assure him of that, but the remarks I am going to make concern some of the issues that affect the people who work in the grain industry in Thunder Bay.

During this whole unfortunate process I have spoken several times to both parties that were intimately involved in trying to reach a settlement. I think I should on their behalf explain to the House, and through the House perhaps to the people of Canada, the very issues that have stopped the flow of grain through the port of Thunder Bay for the last several days.

At the outset I think it is important to note that the grain workers in Thunder Bay are not selfish in what they have done. As we compare the grain workers in Thunder Bay with the grain workers in Prince Rupert and Vancouver, the grain workers in Thunder Bay are making something like $2.50 less an hour than their colleagues in Vancouver.

Coupled with that there is also the fact that the grain workers in Thunder Bay work approximately a six-month year, whereas their counterparts work up to a ten-month year. We can see that there is a substantial difference in the annual take-home pay of people who work in the same industry moving the same type of grain and, as I am told today, moving it to the same markets that traditionally were the markets serviced by the grain industry and the grain workers in Thunder Bay.

I will just relate a few personal incidents that I think are very important.

• (1630)

First and foremost, as the day approached we saw the very fine union representative, Herbert Daniher, in complete frustration at not being able to get the companies to sit down at the table and negotiate a contract. Although we may put fine words on it, the reason they did not want to negotiate was the fact that they made a pre-condition to sitting down at the table, stating that pensions were not to be discussed.

As it stands with this legislation now, it is very evident that when the conciliator-arbitrator is appointed after the passage of this bill, the mediator-arbitrator will certainly discuss the pension issue. I am certain that he will treat those people in the port of Thunder Bay with the degree of fairness that up to now they have not been treated with.

I also think of some of the incidents that have led up to this dispute, and I say that they are incidents that affect human beings working in a community that did not have to exist. I am thinking in particular of this summer and a man named John Pino coming into my office. He had worked for 15 and a half years for Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, had not been called back to work for the 18-month period, and had received his final termination from Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. This is a family man with responsibilities and a mortgage, like all of us. After dedicating 15-plus years to this elevator complex, he was told that his services were no longer needed, and this is the unfortunate part, because the grain was moving through the port of Thunder Bay and the people working at that elevator were working double and triple time and it chose to work people double and triple time rather than calling back these people who had 14 years and 15 years of seniority.

That is not fair play and that is the reason for the frustration in the grain industry in Thunder Bay today.

I think of people who have walked through my office in the last two or three months who were involved. Baldino Iello, whom I was at a hockey game with on Saturday night in Thunder Bay, contributed over 20 years of his life to this industry and finally gave up in frustration, saying that he could not carry on in the present circumstances any longer, mainly because the equity, the quality and the way some of these people are treated are no longer tolerable.

Those are just a couple of the human elements that I had dealt with throughout the summer. I think that is the unwritten agenda that has caused the frustration and the dilemma in which we find ourselves today.

There is no question in my mind as to what is needed. I would hope that the industrial commissioner Mr. Daniher has requested and whom the minister will appoint very shortly will continue after this legislation is in place and long after a settlement is reached by the mediator-arbitrator to look at what is happening in the grain industry, particularly in Thunder Bay, with respect to justice for its people, with respect to equity between the various parts of Canada, and with respect to consideration for the contribution which those people have worked long and hard in the grain industry in Canada to give. They should not be treated in the way they are being treated.

I would hope and would suggest to the minister that I hope the industrial commissioner he will appoint will be given a broad mandate in order to look into these injustices that have been perpetrated on the grain workers at Thunder Bay for so many years.

The dilemma they find themselves in is that five years ago we had over 2,400 employees working in the grain industry in Thunder Bay. Today there are fewer than 700 people working full time.

Of those 700 people there are usually 200 or 300 off on part-time work. In a period of five years that industry has gone from 2,500 down to less than 700. That is the whole substance. In essence, that is why we are here today passing back-to-work legislation to get the grain moving.

Let me also say that there is empathy on behalf of the grain workers in Thunder Bay for the farmers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I would want to address that issue for just a moment. I hope that those people who are on farms in Saskatchewan and Manitoba would not look unkindly to the people who are working in the grain industry in Thunder Bay because they face the same dilemma. The hardships that they are facing in the prairies today are much the same hardships that are being faced by the people who are working in the port of Thunder Bay.

The price of wheat is not what it should be, neither are the wages. That leads me to the issues that I think are so important to bring before this House and before the people of Canada. These are the fundamental issues over which the companies have refused to sit down and negotiate on behalf of the employees who are being directly affected because of the huge loss of jobs that are happening on our waterfront. What we are trying to accomplish is just a certain amount of stability in that area of commerce so there can be planning, so they can go out and make the purchases necessary to house and cloth their families, and that is being denied to those people who work in that industry.

The issues, and we have heard the words, deal with pensions and what is called job security. I have taken those two issues, and they are almost buzzwords in the negotiating field today, and I have broken down them down into four elements with the help of my colleagues in Thunder Bay. Let me just explain for a few moments what those four issues are.

In the bargaining package they want what is called credited service. Because of the long terms of lay-offs, up to 18 months in some instances, when an employee who has worked for a considerable amount of years in the grain industry in Thunder Bay came to retire he may have 35 years of seniority but only 22 years of credited service because of the amount of time that he worked. All the employees want in this bargaining process is the ability to pay into their pension plan their regular contribution. It is not free. They want to be able to pay a voluntary contribution to their pension plan so that during the times they are unemployed because of lay-off they will be able to contribute to the pension plan and when it comes time to retire they will have 30 years of seniority, as an example, and 30 years of credited service.

When you compare this to any other industry, I do not care whether you are in mining or manufacturing automobiles or tires or working for the government, when you retire after 30 years you are usually credited with 30 years of pension. That has been denied the employees in the grain industry in Thunder Bay and that is just what they are asking for. It is that simple.

The other thing and part of the area that was not discussed was that they wanted to reduce the retirement age to 55 in order that they could bring the work force into some kind of balance, retiring those people with more seniority and bringing on fresh talent.

Presently the age is 58. I think the figure that we use is 85: the age of the individual plus the number of years of seniority. If that equals 85 they are allowed to retire. They wanted the retirement age reduced to 55. The dilemma they find themselves in is that they could not negotiate—the company refused to negotiate—the difference between age 55 and age 58. Any one of us who has bargained at the bargaining table knows that you come in with one position on the one side and the other position, you sit down, and as long as you are talking to one another you are going to arrive at some kind of a settlement. You cannot arrive at a settlement if you are not going to sit down at the table and bargain. There is not a great deal of difference between a retirement age of 55 and a retirement age of 58. I think that is a non-issue that has led to this dilemma that we find ourselves in today because of the intransigence of the company in sitting down and negotiating these areas.

• (1640)

The other area—Madam Speaker, I know you are going to say this is trivial—is the benefits that an employee receives at the age of retirement. The employee who works in the grain industry is allowed at the end of the day, after fulfilling his terms of service which equal 85, to continue on with his drug plan as long as he agrees to pay $81 a month.

During the whole process of his employment he was on a dental plan. This is the crux of the argument here. As he approaches and decides on retirement, he no longer has the option to use the dental plan or participate in the dental plan after his retirement. That is just not fair.

When a person works in a company he is used to a drug plan and a dental plan as he is used to the other benefits. One of our Crown corporations, Canadian National Railways according to yesterday's The Globe and Mail, is one of the least competitive railways in North American according to research done by its own accounting firm. I suggest that we look at the benefits that these people receive and compare them to the benefits that these grain elevator workers receive in Thunder Bay.

In the last issue that prevented a settlement or even a negotiating point is something that they called income protection. There is not a great deal of job security when we talk about income protection. I do not want this to be misconstrued. This is not indexing as we know it and as I understand it. I am not in the pension plan of the government.

As I understand it, government pension plans in this very House are indexed according to inflation. I know among the school teaching profession that their pension plan is indexed to compensate for the cost of living. The elevator employees in Thunder Bay have never had the benefit of indexing in their pension plan.

What they have done and what happened up until 1984 was that the company would sit down with the union at the end of the year and say: "Yes, cost of inflation". They would negotiate for the pension plan something less than the normal inflationary rate that would allow the employee who had worked for the elevator company for a number of years to live with a certain amount of dignity.

In 1984 the company said: "That can no longer be the case. From here on in, in every bargaining process, we want what is called income protection on the table and we will bargain for it every year".

In 1988 they refused to bargain income protection so that the pensions that were paid in 1984 without any increase are the same pensions that are being paid in 1991.

All the union wanted was to have a certain amount of protection to say: "Will you look at the pension plan? We do not expect indexing. We are not asking for pie in the sky, but look at the pension plan and try to take into consideration some of the increased cost of living. Try to compensate us in some way toward achieving that goal". That is all that is. I do not see a great deal of job protection in that benefit.

Those are the issues. There are four issues: credited service, reduced retirement age to 55, minimum benefits on retirement, and income protection. Those are the only four issues that have caused the movement of grain to stop in the port of Thunder Bay mainly because the companies would not sit and negotiate.

They adopted the stance: "If you want to talk about pensions, we are not going to come and bargain". That is not fair. It is not fair to the work force and it is not fair to the system of bargaining and labour negotiations that we have come to expect in this country.

Therefore, I sympathize a great deal with the workers who I represent from the city of Thunder Bay. I know my party does not normally like to accept back-to-work legislation as we have seen it in this House. Given that the companies failed to respond, to sit down and bargain, I am satisfied—and I am sure my colleagues are satisfied—that the employees will finally be able to get a fair hearing with the assistance of the mediator-arbitrator who will be appointed immediately after this legislation is passed. At least there will be a certain amount of justice done on behalf of the employees who work in the grain industry in Thunder Bay.

I hope that is the essence of what we are doing here today for their benefit.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Don Valley East—Regional Development; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—East Timor; the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau—Public Service; the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood—the economy; and the hon. member for Northumberland—Poverty.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, we are in third reading. It is our intention to put up one more speaker. However, if we could get unanimous consent not to see the clock until he is finished his debate, we would appreciate it. I do not think it would be a problem but considering that it is just about 4.45 p.m., if he could have the extra time to finish his speech, we would not be putting up any other speakers and would allow the vote at that time.

Mr. Danis: Madam Chairman, of course I agree to the suggestion by my hon. friend from Churchill that after the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan completes his speech at approximately 5.05 p.m. we would then proceed with the vote at third reading.

Mr. Nault: We concur with that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Chairman, I thank the minister for defining a few minutes for me.

This is actually an historical debate for the city of Thunder Bay and for the port of Thunder Bay. It is the first time in 25 years that this House has found it necessary to legislate workers and/or the company back to work at the port of Thunder Bay. In the past the threat of legislation has been used effectively to force the parties to the bargaining table. This time, because of the new calendar of the House we are not sitting next week and I think the pressure was not appropriately applied in a way that would have brought forward the result of some kind of negotiations. I regret that.

I regret too the manner in which the workers in Thunder Bay have been attacked verbally by members of this House, ministers of the Crown, and representatives of certain groups in the prairies. I want to spend a bit of my time dispelling the myth that this particular strike taken by the members of the grain handling union in Thunder Bay was in some way punishing the farmers of western Canada.

We have seen headlines and news stories saying millions of dollars a day are lost because of the strike at Thunder Bay. One would assume that means that people have not been able to get the grain that they bought and therefore no money was coming into the system. We certainly know that it means that because the prairie elevators are full the farmer cannot deliver and therefore get paid. I grant that. However, in terms of the industry and in terms of the nation, two ships cleared the St. Lawrence River on October 4 and three ships cleared on October 7 carrying a combined total of 128,000 tonnes of grain that somebody was able to pick up and take to a customer. Madam Speaker, that suggests to me there has been no loss of sales. There has been no inability in this country to provide grain to its customers. Quite frankly, even if this rumoured $400 million sale to the Soviet Union is announced today or tomorrow, they are not going to be parked at Baie Comeau or Port Cartier or Quebec City tomorrow morning waiting to pick it up. Even if they do, assuming that the one million tonnes that is in storage in those downstream elevators is the right kind of grain, they could pick up some grains. So that we have not lost existing sales, we have not in any way impacted on our customers. And yes, some customers might want to wait to see how long it would take for the dispute to be resolved, but all they have to do is look back in history to know that in situations like this when there is a lot of grain to move that at the most it is one or two weeks.

The other thing that people have to know, Madam Speaker, is that Thunder Bay has a remarkable ability to rebound. We were only scheduled to get 1,500 to 2,000 cars a week coming in from the prairies. We can do 6,000 a week without any question. We have been able to do much more than that. So we could recover very quickly. And if this legislation receives Royal Assent tomorrow, it is quite conceivable that the grain handlers and the elevator companies can be back at work on Saturday. The 5,000 cars that the Wheat Board has had filled, sitting on the rail tracks somewhere between Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Thunder Bay, if not a lot are parked in Thunder Bay, will very quickly be dumped into the elevators and the 16 or so ships that are sitting in the harbour will be quickly loaded and steaming downstream towards the transfer elevators.

So, Madam Speaker, we can recover. If the government believed that this strike really was causing harm to the farmers, it did not have to legislate the workers back to work. It would have been very simple to go, farm by farm, to where the country elevators were full and fill up 5,000 grain cars and use them for storage. I can understand if they decided not to fill up the total fleet of grain cars— I can understand why they would want some flexibility. But they decided to fill up only 5,000 cars and use them for storage out of a fleet of 26,000 cars. They could have added another 5,000 cars for storage, freeing up some space at the prairie elevators so that the farmers could have brought their grain from the farm gate to the elevator to get paid.

But they decided they didn't even want to do that. They could have taken the unusual step of going to the farm, determining how much was in storage, and providing a payment based on a pre-sale of that grain in storage so that the farmer would have the appropriate cash flow.

But this government did none of that. It did not attempt to find a way around the problem of moving grain off the farm gate. It also could have, starting next week—and I regret to say this— started moving grain from Manitoba and part of Saskatchewan to Vancouver. It could have also cleaned some of the grain out of the prairies and moved it by rail past Thunder Bay to Quebec City—something called the winter rail program, only this time it would be in the fall. It could have done those things if the issue really was to help the farmers. Of course, the reality is that if there had not been an election in Saskatchewan right now, if there had not been a massive crisis in the farm community where they need $1.3 billion just to stay afloat, then perhaps the approach would have been different.

But this government I regret to say has been playing games with the lives of the people on the prairies and the lives of the people in the port of Thunder Bay.

Let us deal with the port for a second, Madam Speaker.

The Minister for Grains and Oilseeds is quoted in today's Globe and Mail as saying: "We are not going to sit by and see a port shut down that is a major part of our grain sales to one of our most important customers". He is reported to have said that at the rally at the Manitoba legislature yesterday.

Let us look at what has happened to the port of Thunder Bay since this government has taken office. At the outset I want to say that the initial cause is not its fault. It was the previous Liberal government that in 1983 passed what is now called the Western Grain Transportation Act which was the elimination of the Crow. In that act it provided a financial incentive to move a maximum amount of grain through the west coast at the expense of the port of Thunder Bay.

We have already been told that the number of grain handlers in Thunder Bay has gone from 1,700 in 1984 down to 700 today. That is 1,000 permanent well paid union jobs lost at the Lakehead.

We have also had the appropriate spin-off losses in rail. We have seen our Great Lakes shipping fleet cut in half in terms of the number of vessels we have. Madam Speaker, I want to say to you today if we have one of those bumper crops that we always dream about, this country can no longer move it to our customers should we have it. We no longer have the capacity to move 19 million tonnes out of the port of Thunder Bay throughout a year. We just cannot do it because of the neglect of the port of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system.

I said at the outset that it was Liberal legislation that created the situation, but this government has been in power since 1984. Seven years and there has been talk, talk, talk, but no action.

I just came back from a two-day conference in Winnipeg dealing with the issue of the direction of grain and how the WDTA is structured in terms of payments to the railroads or payment to the producers. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that the frustration there was we have been talking about this and it is time for some action, time to restore some balance.

If the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds is sincere about the importance of the port of Thunder Bay, then it is time that this government got off its butt and did something to ensure that it has a permanent role in the movement of grain products from the prairies to export position, particularly to the Soviet Union. Most of the grain that goes to the Soviet Union comes through the port of Thunder Bay. A small portion goes through the port of Churchill and that is an issue as well that has to be addressed, to provide some permanency and stability to that grain community.

Madam Speaker, you have been told that the issues that have precipitated the strike are pensions and job security. I am not going to get into the details, the technical nature of it. I want to tell you the human side of it. If you have seen 1,000 of your colleagues lose their jobs, if you have seen others who you have worked with for 15 to 20 years not have work for a year or a year and a half, if you had families who have lost their homes, marriages that have broke up because of the loss of employment, the loss of income, you can understand how important job security is to the people of the port of Thunder Bay.

This year has been a very bad year for us. We have lost one full paper mill with 400 plus people permanently out of work, another paper mill was downsized by over 400, a questionable future for UTDC, and thank heavens the province has stepped in to manage things until Lavalin can find a buyer so we can maintain that valuable rapid transit rail car construction facility in Thunder Bay. As we heard last week, our shipyard facility is doomed because of the lack of work for most shipyards in this country.

The strike has not been a good one. I do not blame the union for that. Everything that I saw leading up to it was a group of companies which wanted nothing more than to put their workers out on the street.

• (1700)

I want to give one example. On the Friday when the Public Service Alliance went back on the picket lines in Thunder Bay, one of the first groups to go back were the inspectors and the weighers.

I should tell you that the grain handlers union has a cause and a collective agreement which gives them the right to refuse to cross picket lines. Given that in the first phase of the PSAC strike, they did not cross the picket lines, one of the companies—I do not know which one—on the Monday after the PSAC lines were up again, had the nerve to call over 100 grain handlers back to work.

They called them off pogey, off unemployment insurance. They had to know that that meant they would lose unemployment insurance but not get any work because they could not cross the picket line. They would refuse to cross the picket line.

That is not fair bargaining. That is not setting a climate to provide for meaningful negotiations. The companies themselves have to accept the responsibility that they created the scenario that led to the walk-out by the grain handlers union.

I will just make a final few comments, because I realize that the time is running out. I want to say very clearly that I and my colleagues in this House will be saying "nay" when you ask if this legislation shall be passed. We will be voting against it because we do not believe that collective bargaining should be destroyed in this fashion.

I also want to make it clear that we are agreeable to see this legislation pass this House today, to be completed in this House today because we recognize that it will be futile from any point of view to continue this now that negotiations have failed.

Madam Speaker, let me leave you with one thought. Would we be doing this today if the House was sitting next week? I suspect not. I wonder once again about our priorities as we deal with these and other matters.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): I have a motion, Madam Speaker. I would ask if there is unanimous consent of the House for the following motion:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of this House that on Friday, October 11, 1991 the House shall suspend at the hour of adjournment to the call of the Chair for the sole purpose of receiving a message from the Senate respecting Royal Assent on the bill in the name of the Minister of Labour entitled an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario, unless the said bill receives Royal Assent earlier that day.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INCOME TAX ACT

INCOME AVERAGING

The House resumed from Thursday, October 3, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau had two minutes left. Does she intend to use them?

The hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau.

Mrs. Bourgault: Madam Speaker, I had two minutes left on what, exactly?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I realize that with all the noise and brouhaha in the House, the hon. member was unable to understand what the subject was.

We are about to resume debate on the motion of Mr. Althouse. The hon. member was the last person to speak when we debated this motion. She has two minutes left, but if she does not want to use them, we will resume debate.

The hon. member for Mackenzie, on a point of order?

[English]

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, there have been some discussions and unless members are anxious to make speeches on this, I would be prepared to have the vote deferred until the Wednesday after we come back into session.

Mr. Dorin: Madam Speaker, I was going to make some comments on this particular matter because I do know a little bit about the history of this. One of the things that I wanted to respond to was the fact that the hon. member, who has managed to find his way to the House after the vote which was trying to help farmers in Saskatchewan by getting their grain moving, is the same one who is now suggesting we should be assisting people who have high incomes in given years to pay income tax.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to stop the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest. There are 45 minutes left for debate on this bill. There are possibilities of debating until six o'clock. If the hon. member wishes to be recognized and speak on this, he has 10 minutes at his disposal and then we will see what the wishes of the House are.

What the hon. member was doing was really rising on a point of order and then starting to debate, so I could not let that go on. If the hon. member for Edmonton—

Mr. Dorin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I was going to debate. It is a little bit confusing here, I thought I was on debate and that debate was continuing. In the interest of solving this problem, one of the things I intended to raise was there was going to be an undertaking by myself that perhaps the member might wish to withdraw his motion so there would be no vote and the subject matter could be referred to the finance committee. I was going to offer an undertaking that we would then, sometime between now and Christmas, take up the matter.

However, I may withdraw that if we do not get an opportunity. I was going to give that undertaking which would mean that there would be no vote. I could not find the hon. member to ask him whether that would be acceptable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first person who rose was the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Is he relinquishing the floor right now?

Mr. Milliken: Yes.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, there were at least two options that were discussed: first, that the subject matter be referred to committee, like the hon. member just referred to; or, that unanimous consent be sought to cause the vote, but then to have it deferred until Wednesday, October 23. That is the preferable option in the mind of the hon. member whose motion we are discussing and so that is why the member rose to suggest that particular option. If the member would like to speak to the bill first then perhaps we could have an agreement that we would hear him and at that time we would have an agreement to have a vote and have it deferred until Wednesday, October 23.

• (1750)

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, there have been discussions between all three parties and I understood there was agreement to allow this vote to be deferred.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has suggested is the hon. member make his 10-minute speech. There will still be a few minutes left today. We could agree that a division has been demanded and it is deferred until Wednesday when we resume.

I understand there were discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that that is acceptable. I have not received any word to the contrary. Perhaps if the hon. member wishes to make a speech, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, we could proceed, hear the speech and then wrap this matter up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am quite prepared to recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest on debate. If there has been some agreement or there seems to be different interpretations to that agreement, perhaps while the hon. member is debating, other people may want to go behind the curtains and talk about it a little more.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, that is acceptable. Maybe I will speak for just a few minutes, agreement can be reached and we can deal with it. I am not going to stand in the way of deferring the vote particularly if that agreement is what is understood. I did not quite understand the situation. By the time I am finished, hopefully it will be resolved.

Briefly the difficulty with what the hon. member is proposing, which is to provide for five-year averaging for farmers, is that it creates a situation where persons may end up with substantial income in a given year, perhaps $50,000 or $100,000 but because they lost money the year before means that they do not pay any tax. The result is they show up in the taxation statistics as people who earned $50,000 or $100,000 that year and paid no tax.

If we go back to a debate that occurred in this place five or six years ago on the question of the minimum tax, I would like to remind members that the occupations of tax filers that can be determined according to the main source of income showed that the largest group of people who had high incomes and paid no tax were farmers, followed by fishermen, followed by small business owners.

It seems to me rather strange that we would have this proposal coming from the same party that was a very strong advocate of a minimum tax so that people could not earn$50,000 or $100,000 in a year and pay no tax. It would now like to recreate that situation which the government has sought to address by removing those kinds of tax loopholes.

I think it is rather strange that we would be doing this. However, I would also like to suggest that one of the things we have done in the finance committee is we created a subcommittee chaired by Mr. Soetens, the hon. member for Ontario, and we are inviting members as well as other people from the public to submit any ideas that they have for consideration. We will give them preliminary consideration.

If we think there is some merit to the case, we will then invite the particular individual or group to come and make a full presentation of their case. We will probably then also invite some people who may have other points of view. At the end of the day, if we can make a judgment, we will pass that judgment on to the Minister of Finance by a report to this House or whatever means.

We would like to do some of these things early enough this fall and next year to be in his hands before the budget that he will bring down some time around February.

I wanted to explain the process that will be available. It is for all members and everyone else. It may be a vehicle that could be useful for the member to take advantage of in a way of determining the pros and cons of his motion and whether or not it deserves additional support rather than simply having a vote on the matter today or next week and ending it there.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the member has moved that motion, or was that just a suggestion?

Mr. Dorin: Madam Speaker, I am simply making a suggestion, which the hon. member who has moved the motion may wish to take advantage of. It is up to him to determine whether he would prefer to withdraw his motion and refer the subject matter to a committee and use this other process, or have this vote, which will take place either today or next week.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was just trying to ascertain exactly what the hon. member had said. If the motion would be to withdraw the motion as it is now, of course it would need the approval of the hon. member who has moved that motion. If not, the motion is deemed withdrawn.

The only person right now who can say anything to that motion is the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, to very briefly close the debate, the elements of this debate have been made quite clear throughout the short time that the debate has ranged. The motion would affect people with widely fluctuating incomes, farmers and fishermen, who are most affected, but also authors, people who work under contract, et cetera. This would encourage the government to reintroduce that legislation, which is still in effect. There would not be a break in the rules that apply under income tax and Revenue Canada because the last of those years is still to come. We are almost at the end of the very last year.

I just want to point that out, and point out as well that I recognize the options that are available to me, to have a vote, which is my preferred option, which I believe would be deferred until the Wednesday evening following our return to this House. I realize that we also have the option of sending to this new subcommittee. My experience in this House with other motions has been that the House has tended to pass them—I presume that that may happen with this one—and the government legislation subsequently reflected the motion that was adopted by the House. If the House so chooses to take that route tonight, they can vote in favour on the Wednesday when we return after Parliament resumes on October 23.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might have the indulgence of the House to move that after hearing the member, whom we have now heard, and pursuant to discussions that took place earlier, a vote on motion No. 81, in the name of the member for Mackenzie, be deemed to have been caused and deferred until Wednesday, October 23.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I think there is a missing element. There has to be a time indicated. If it was to be the close of government business, it would be 7 p.m on October 23.

The other question I had, Madam Speaker, is whether the private member's motion for Wednesday, October 23, is a private member's motion that would in fact be a votable motion. If the private member's motion on that date were to be votable then a better time would be 8 p.m., at the conclusion of Private Members' Business on that day.

• (1800)

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the motion is before you there.

Given what the government Whip has said, it could be added "at 7 p.m. on Wednesday, October 23". It is a friendly amendment and the House could dispose of the question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: My understanding is that by unanimous consent the question is deemed put and a division of the question that would be now before the House stands deferred until Wednesday, October 23, 1991 at seven o'clock p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, do you happen to own a fur coat?

Do not answer that, Madam Speaker, because I know that is a controversial subject these days. The animal rights activists, for instance, have understandable concerns about the humane trapping of animals although most of us still do eat meat and wear leather shoes.

It is really not because of the animal rights activists' concerns that the fur coat manufacturers are hurting these days, but they are hurting. Many of the fur coat manufacturers in Canada are Canadians of Greek origin. A great many of those live in my own constituency.

There are families such as the Papadopoulos family, the Zaphiropoulos family and the Frangos family, all of whom are involved in the production and the manufacture of fur coats in this country and have been for many years.

Four years ago, there were many animal rights activists around but the fur coat manufacturing business was a booming one. In fact, the Canadians of Greek origin who owned and operated those kinds of businesses in metropolitan Toronto made representations to me and to the Minister of Immigration to bring more skilled workers into the country to be able to help and assist them.

Their business was booming, and they needed more skilled labour. Many of them come from the region of kastoria in Greece. Today, they are in serious trouble and many of them are seeing a lifetime of effort just go down the drain. Others are hovering on the edge of disappearing altogether, and with them, thousands and thousands of jobs, jobs that are skilled jobs and high paying jobs.

The fur coat manufacturing industry is only one of many, many examples of the problems that we are facing today with the industry in southern Ontario and in metropolitan Toronto.

Since 1989, some 47 different industrial plants in metropolitan Toronto have closed finally and completely. Unemployment is now higher than the national average in metropolitan Toronto. It is now something like 10.8 per cent whereas just a year ago, it was 4.7 per cent.

Of the 85,000 people who are depending on general welfare assistance in metropolitan Toronto now, some 65,000 of them are employable if there were some jobs out there for them to be employed at. There are something like 127,000 residents of metropolitan Toronto now on unemployment insurance benefits.

This is virtually the worst situation in metropolitan Toronto since the Great Depression of the 1930s. In the early 1980s, we had a worse recession for Canada as a whole, but not for metropolitan Toronto.

Now, metropolitan Toronto has been hit and it is hit hard by the economic downturn. There are programs in place as you know, Madam Speaker, to help Atlantic Canada, to help western Canada, and to help Quebec and northern Ontario.

There is none for southern Ontario because southern Ontario and metropolitan Toronto have been traditionally considered as the fat cats. Perhaps they have been. Perhaps we have been in the past, but certainly we are not now.

For years and years, the former Liberal government and now our own government has had a policy that has provided little if any help for southern Ontario. Well, southern Ontario and metropolitan Toronto now need help, Madam Speaker, and I want to ask the minister tonight what he is going to do about it.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): I would like to assure my hon. colleague that the federal government, in spite of what he said, is very active in southern Ontario. I would like to emphasize that we already have in place many policies and programs designed not only to prevent adverse economic development in southern Ontario, but also to provide the building blocks for long-term prosperity, not only in southern Ontario but for all Canadians from coast to coast.

Soon the government will launch its prosperity initiative and provide a forum in which Canadians can plan and work together to prepare for the challenge of a global economy.

In addition to concentrating on building long-term prosperity for southern Ontario, this government has already put in place many initiatives which benefit especially this part of the country. The program for export market development helps firms in Ontario to sell to border and southern states and the overseas market.

Southern Ontario firms benefit significantly from this assistance. I would like to also point out that the new exporters to the border states program has helped many southern Ontario firms get involved in the export market. So I think, Madam Speaker, that these initiatives and other federal initiatives and federal departments and agencies are playing an important role in supporting southern Ontario industries.

We realize on this side of the House, and my colleague is right in saying that there are problems in southern Ontario, as there are in many other parts of Canada, but the federal government is committed to helping the economy of those areas by providing means that will help the local economies of those areas and the local enterprises to grow and export and create jobs.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on September 18, in answer to my question, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada considers that Indonesian sovereignty over East Timor is a fact. She also said that we do not condone the manner of incorporation and that we deplore and condemn the loss of life that occurred.

Apart from the fact that those statements seem not entirely consistent, I want to point out other contrary facts in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Portugal is recognized by the United Nations as the administering power of East Timor and it has continued its dialogue in an attempt to resolve the state of invasion and oppression by Indonesia. It has recently sent a fact finding delegation and will soon send a parliamentary delegation to East Timor when the arrangements can be made.

It has taken Australia to the International Court of Justice for entering into a treaty with Indonesia to drill for East Timor's offshore oil.

Furthermore, Madam Speaker, on August 7 of this year, Amnesty International presented a 37-page report to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization in which they say, in part:

> Serious violations continued to occur in East Timor over the last year, accelerating patterns of short-term detention, torture and ill-treatment of alleged political opponents, many of whom may be prisoners of conscience, and persistent reports of extra-judicial executions, hundreds of unresolved cases of disappearance and the continued imprisonment of at least nine alleged Fretelin supporters sentenced in trials which Amnesty International believes were unfair.

Not surprising, in spite of the Indonesian government statement that people are free to visit, Amnesty International has not been permitted to visit East Timor yet. Furthermore, Madam Speaker, our history does not have clean hands.

• (1810)

When our ambassador, Glen Shortliffe, advised the Canadian government that the takeover was a fait accompli, he also pointed out that this would result in greater benefits to Canadian companies in improved trading relations with Indonesia. That is what has happened. Over 300 companies have been investing in Indonesia, looking for the abundant natural resources, the tax holidays and the oppressed cheap labour earning no more than $1 U.S. per day.

Furthermore, Canada has provided arms to the Indonesian government that it used in continuing the oppression of the East Timorese people. In 1984 Canada assisted with a weapons bazaar in Indonesia and eight Canadian weapons manufacturers had facilities there. The list of companies that do business, and obviously find it profitable in Indonesia and East Timor, is too long to list, but it includes Air Canada, Alcan, Bank of Nova Scotia, Bell Aerospace, Canadian General Electric, Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas, International Nickel, Westinghouse, Litton Systems— a famous anti-labour, anti-union employer—and Levy Auto Parts Company.

I urge that the Secretary of State for External Affairs revise her understanding and reverse Canada's policy of supporting the aggressor, the invader and the oppressor, and work with Portugal to liberate by peaceful means through the United Nations the oppressed people of East Timor.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, Canada considers that Indonesian sovereignty over East Timor is a fact, recognizing that there has never been any history of independence or self-government in the territory. Canada does not condone the manner of incorporation and deplores the loss of life that occurred. At the meeting of the UN Commission on Human Rights in February 1991 in Geneva, Canada expressed regret at the continued allegation of human rights abuses and urged Indonesia to ensure human rights are fully respected.

Canada expressed also its support for the Indonesian decision to open East Timor to domestic and international visitors.

Members of the Canadian Embassy in Jakarta make regular visits to East Timor to make inquiries on reports of human rights abuses, detentions, and the general living conditions pertaining there. The last visit took place in September. There are indications that tension is mounting in the wake of the visit of a Portuguese parliamentary delegation this month with possible consequences with respect to the human rights situation.

Canada continues to closely follow the situation in East Timor, and of course we fully agree with the hon. member's concern for the human rights situation in this part of Indonesia.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I rise this evening to address a question that I had posed in the House September 26 to the President of the Treasury Board. The question was raised with regard to the amounts of bonuses that are being paid to certain managers in the Public Service and the senior executives of Crown corporations.

There was some discussion at the time, if I recall correctly, that they were bonuses and then they were not bonuses; they were Christmas bonuses but they are not Christmas bonuses; they are part of their pay package, they are being paid at Christmas time, but it is not really a Christmas bonus.

To this date we are still not too sure exactly what they are. The fact remains that a lot of these executive types are getting upwards of $85,000 and in some instances which I will refer to in a moment they can get as high as perhaps even $99,000, in the form of a pay bonus.

We have been told by the President of the Treasury Board that these are a recompense for productivity.

This is happening at a time when the hourly rated workers are being offered zero, three and three. I take offence to the fact that when I addressed the question the President of the Treasury Board referred to the fact that if zero per cent were such a fast number, why was it not good enough for PSAC. I think that is an insult to the workers who are the very people who produce, who make the boss "look good", the senior executives who are getting these fat cat bonuses off the backs of these very workers who are being told they are getting zero.

There is something wrong when we hear on one side that there is no money, that the funds have dried up, that we have to tighten our belts, that we all have to contribute, that it is not time to spend and give raises. It is time for restraint.

On the other hand we say that some time ago there was 15 per cent taken out of the wage package of these senior executives and it is only being given back to them in the form of a bonus if they are productive.

It is a contradiction in terms. They are not the ones who are being productive. It is the people on the front line who are productive. They are the ones who are producing.

In the last couple of days there have been some votes in this House with regard to forcing people back to work. PSAC was one group. The grain elevator operators are the other group.

If things come in threes I guess the next group of people who will be ordered back to work if they do go out on strike—and it looks as if they probably will—will be the postal workers.

We are told by the President of the Treasury Board that the bonuses and the wage structure are regulated by an advisory board. That advisory board has told the government that the Canada Post Corporation president's wages should be between $248,000 and $310,000. If we take an average of $300,000 and that executive is entitled to 25 per cent, because that is also the guideline, he will get $75,000 bonus.

My time is up but I would love to go on much longer.

The point remains that this whole idea of bonuses has to be reviewed and I am asking the minister to appoint a review board or send it to committee, but this double standard cannot go on. I am asking the minister to respond.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the principle of the compensation for senior executives is that their total compensation consists of two parts: base salary and performance pay.

Increases to their base salary were limited to 4.2 per cent for 1990–91, which is the same average increase awarded other public servants for the same period.

Similarly, collectively bargained employees whose agreements expired prior to the February 26 budget will receive a 4.2 per cent increase as provided for in Bill C–29.
