With regard to performance pay for the Governor in Council community, including heads of Crown corporations, bonuses are only awarded based on performance in achieving corporate objectives. They have not yet been approved or paid for performance during the fiscal year 1990–91.

I would like to add that bonuses for heads of Crown corporations are only awarded on recommendations of boards of directors.

This elaborate consultative and administrative process accounts for the delay in implementation.

• (1820)

The government rejects the view that the restraint measures should reach back to some people retroactively, for previous years' service, but not to others. This clearly would be unfair. The same principle should apply to everyone.

In keeping with the government's restraint program, performance pay has been suspended for the fiscal year 1991–92 for all senior executives and Governor in Council appointees inclusive of the heads of Crown corporations. This combined with a wage freeze for 1991 means that senior level total compensation will be subject to zero increase in that year, similar to collectively bargained employees. I should add that for the latter, however, salary increments will continue to be paid during that period.

I would like you to know that senior level compensation is normally established on the basis of independent advice and recommendations to the Prime Minister from the advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service. That group is made up of eight senior executives from the Canadian business community and has provided advice over the past 23 years to successive governments. They support performance pay for senior executives as an alternative and a more cost efficient and effective method of distributing compensation. I should add that this method of compensation is widely used in the private sector.

Finally, as the President of the Treasury Board has indicated time and time again, there will be no salary increases nor performance pay for fiscal year 1991–92 for members of the management category and Governor in Council appointees including the heads of Crown corporations.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, two weeks ago in this House I directed a question to the Minister of Finance. It was answered by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It had to do with Mr. Lou MacEachern who received the Entrepreneur of the Year Award in Calgary.

Upon receiving his award, Mr. MacEachern announced that because of the GST, the high dollar and other taxes, he was selling his business, and I said: "and leaving the country".

I asked the minister: When was this government going to stop drowning small business in red tape and taxes.

The minister, who is a skilled parliamentarian, was at the dinner and got up and said that Mr. MacEachern was not leaving the country. I naturally felt like the minister sort of blew me out of the water. I felt that my facts were not really correct.

Subsequently, I went and had a further chat with Mr. MacEachern who did receive the Entrepreneur of the Year Award. There are two points that I want to make. The first one is that the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology was right in that Mr. MacEachern himself is not leaving the country. But the real truth of the matter is that Mr. MacEachern, a man who employs over 300 people, is selling off his businesses. He wrote me a letter: "Further to our telephone conversation, Mr. Mills. If I had not received the Entrepreneur Award this year, it would never have happened to me in Canada because the entrepreneurial spirit has been killed in Canada by government and is dead in me so for as Canada is concerned".

He went on to mention that he showed the Minister for International Trade a number of articles, which he attached, as to what some of the problems were with taxes, red tape and paper burden in this country. He then went on to say: "Having started many people in business in this country, I shall not be doing it any more." He started selling off his assets and will have all of his assets sold by the end of 1994. He said: "My reasons for not staying in business: GST, fines, withholding tax reporting, government operating and regulating at the same time, such as UIC, WCB, no offsetting write-offs when a deal goes bad and abuse by Revenue Canada. I have one big problem in business: government, government, government! Yours sincerely, Mr. Lou MacEachern."

I appreciate the minister doing his best to put me in an awkward light by saying that Mr. MacEachern was not leaving the country.

There are 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country right now. They are begging this government to listen. What they want the government to hear is that the paper burden and the tax designs of this government are crushing their entrepreneurial spirit. Tomorrow is an emergency debate on small business and so we can continue this discussion then.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to what was said by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. Perhaps I may remind him that his party, which was in power for many years before this government was elected, put a very heavy burden on small businesses and on Canadian business in general.

The hon. member has, I believe, a business background. I am sure there were good times and times when things were not so good. He must admit that government tax burdens and red tape did not start in 1984 or 1988. It started well before that time. The hon. member knows the business community. He must have realized, and his friends must have told him, that since 1984, this government has been working very hard to enhance the position of Canada's small businesses. It has introduced policies to help Canadian small businesses become more competitive and more actively involved in export markets.

[English]

My colleague will remember that not too long ago we replaced the old manufacturers' sales tax with a new tax, the GST. The GST being a different tax is not a new tax. It replaces the tax that put a burden on our economy, on the capacity of our small business to compete and to export.

As my colleague said, tomorrow there is a special debate on this issue. I am sure that all members of this House will welcome the opportunity to talk about it.

Adjournment Debate

POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have the opportunity this evening to rise in response to a question that I posed in this House to the Prime Minister on October 2 that had to do with the rate of child poverty in this country.

I thought perhaps at the time that the Prime Minister had unintentionally misconstrued what I was asking in my question because of the response I got from him in which he said I was trying to mislead the Canadian public and was giving false information.

I tabled information in this House which corroborated the statement I made which was that there are more than one million children living in poverty in this country. I say that I thought that perhaps I had been misinterpreted and gave the Prime Minister the benefit of the doubt. I was frankly appalled by a response I got to my question from the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which he critiqued what I had said in the document that had been tabled in the House.

Subsequently I have been in touch with many of the agencies that deal with those living in poverty in this country and particularly children. In 1990 Statistics Canada tells us that there were 5.6 million children under the age of 14 years living in Canada. Those human beings who are aged 15, 16, 17 and 18 are also considered to be children in this country. One in six children today is estimated to be living in poverty in this country. That makes more than one million children living in poverty in this country. It is a dreadful legacy that we leave for the future of this country to permit such a thing to exist.

Beyond just the argument over statistics and numbers, I was very concerned with what the Minister of National Health and Welfare was saying in his letter. At one point he stated that we should be proud of certain statistics about Canadian initiatives and other federal initiatives that have been taken vis-à-vis children.

For example, the government has made a dollar commitment to eliminating the problem of family violence. That is very important and we support that. We know that the situation of poverty contributes to family violence in this country and the government is not facing the reality of how children are living in this country.

I certainly am affronted by the response and the attitude of this government. It is not only myself. There are many people who care for children and their future in this country and our country's future is our children today. The government will hear more from me and those agencies on this issue in the coming days.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I believe that in his exchange with the hon. member for Northumberland, the Prime Minister mentioned major programs the government has launched in response to this appalling situation that affects us all, both intellectually and emotionally: the thousands of children living in poverty in this country.

I heard her refer to a letter she received from the minister with further details on the government's initiatives. Of course, it is quite a challenge, and it is also a very complex issue that is difficult to quantify when we realize, for instance, that there are poor children who are fortunate: they eat three meals a day, are cherished by their parents, cared for and protected. These children may be poor, but they are not unhappy. On the other hand, there are poor children who lead miserable lives because they come from a disadvantaged environment, broken homes, families living in extreme poverty, where many of them are beaten and abused. Single-parent families are most likely to be living on low incomes, and the children in these families are particularly exposed to poverty.

Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member doesn't like figures, but I think I should mention a few, because the government spends $15 billion annually on aid to children through family assistance programs. The hon. member is aware there are provincial jurisdictions involved as well. At the present time, there are 956,000 fewer low-income people than in 1984. I agree we must do more. We are very concerned, Madam Speaker, and we are actively seeking ways to improve our response to the needs of these children. It will take the co-operation of both opposition members and the government to find short and medium-term solutions to this very serious problem facing our society.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 6.30 p.m, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the innovations and jobs created by Canadian entrepreneurs constitute the best hope for the Canadian economy and society and that, therefore, the government must take immediate steps to reduce interest rates, to lower the level of the Canadian dollar, to reduce the paper burden on small businesses, and make available more funding and loan guarantees for early-stage companies.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity to begin today on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, Her Majesty's Official Opposition. I think that too often in this House over the last few months we have forgotten about the Canadian entrepreneur that exists in this country.

When I first came to this city 12 years ago as a young entrepreneur I never dreamt at that time that I would ever have the opportunity to stand on the floor of this House and debate on behalf of the 900,000 entrepreneurs that create almost 90 per cent of the jobs in this country.

Most of the entrepreneurs of this country today are in deep pain. The loss of confidence in our community, the low morale, have produced a chain reaction. It has produced a chain reaction which is causing fear, tension and a lack of confidence. Most entrepreneurs feel today that their government, their leaders, are in fact not listening to them. We know that the government, day after day, especially in the last couple of months when we tried to put forward questions regarding high interest rates, the high dollar, and we talk about the problems and plight of small and medium-sized businesses in this country, the government always comes back with numbers and statistics.

It is a reality that interest rates have come down by almost 6 per cent in the last year. It is a reality that inflation is reduced. In fact if you would take away the government inflation in this country right now inflation is practically zero. Those are realities.

Where I would like to challenge the government today is not with a debate about statistics. I would like to challenge the government today on the way that it has handled the national will of this country. I believe that the problem we have in this country today is the fact that there has been a fracturing of the national will, the national spirit and nowhere is this fractured national will more evident than with the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country.

Entrepreneurship is a state of mind. It is an attitude. It is an attitude where if you are feeling confident in the environment then you take risk and that risk when properly managed is probably the greatest wealth creator this country has ever had. It seems to me that this government has not focused on that asset of 900,000 entrepreneurs. That has led to this fracturing of national will.

In 1961, John F. Kennedy said: "We are going to put a man on the moon". With that single sentence, he began the process of galvanizing the will of Americans from school children, grade schools, high schools, universities, small business, big business. A whole new spirit invaded the American system. In 1969, when Neil Armstrong landed on the moon, the American will was at its most galvanized point in many, many years. That is what is missing in this country.

That will, which has been fractured in this country, needs immediate attention. The force of the 900,000 entrepreneurs is the force that I believe members of the House should be paying attention to.

Can you imagine, Madam Speaker, 900,000 enterprises in this country? Can you imagine if in the next 24 hours each one of those enterprises hired just one more person? That would reduce our unemployment rate by almost 6.5 per cent, and it would be a savings on the treasury of almost $8 billion to $10 billion.

Can you imagine if over 60 days they hired a second person? That would put the economy of this country back on track. In order to get the entrepreneurs of this country thinking in that direction, we have to provide the proper environment.

What this government has failed to do is read what motivates the entrepreneurial spirit of this country. When the Minister of Finance came to power, Mr. Wilson, in 1984, he made a commitment to the people of Canada that he was going to address the complicated tax system of this country, a tax system that I was a part of for many years.

He made the commitment that we would redesign the tax system of this country. The government failed in comprehensive tax reform. It went ahead, and instead of honouring the commitment that many members on that side made during their leadership campaign of saying we must put comprehensive tax reform into this city, task forces when they were in opposition, they somehow just ignored the words and the radical tax reform which they promised was never implemented.

In fact, the opposite happened. We ended up having a further complication of the system and a further 32 tax increases. That is precisely the thing that is a disincentive to the entrepreneurial spirit of this country.

For the next seven years, this government has built a litany of disincentives for the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country. It is not all related to the tax system.

The free trade agreement. I did not totally agree with my previous leader, Mr. Turner, when he stood up in this House and said, "If I was running this country, I would rip up the free trade agreement."

I thought when I was campaigning during the last election that those words were a little too aggressive. Upon reflection and upon examination, I think Mr. Turner was right. I cannot see any benefit to this current free trade agreement.

I think this free trade agreement has been one of the biggest hoaxes perpetrated on the people of Canada, and ultimately, the entrepreneurs of Canada. When I say "entrepreneurs", many of them on blind faith bought in.

I can remember when I was campaigning in Broadview—Greenwood in the last election and after the debate, people were saying: "Mr. Turner convinced me. This is not a good deal for Canada." Then, almost magically, full page ads appeared in newspapers in my city such as The Sun, The Star, The Globe saying: "No, do not listen to Mr. Turner. This free trade agreement is a good deal." The entrepreneurship of the country bought into this government's free trade agreement. With entrepreneurship in this country, if it were asked today, would they still buy those full-page ads and tell their staff, their employees, their customers, that it is a good thing? I believe they would think twice. In fact, I would venture to say that probably all of them would decline on buying those full-page ads.

The litany of disincentives to the entrepreneurial spirit in this country goes on and on and on. One cannot galvanize the will of a nation when one is constantly putting out these disincentives to productivity.

Let us just deal with the issue, for example, of productivity. This government constantly talks about productivity; we must be more productive, we must be more innovative. I worked for one of the greatest entrepreneurs in this country for two years. The man's name was Frank Stronach and he is the chairman of an organization called Magna International. Magna International makes auto parts. It is probably one of the most competitive industries in the world, making auto parts, because one is naturally competing in a very tough market. Frank Stronach had a very simple answer when people would ask him: "What is the secret of your success?" He would say: "Well, I make a better product at a better price". Then people would say: "But Frank, how do you motivate people to make that better product at a better price?" Again he would simply answer: "You must treat your people fairly."

That is what we in this House forget.

Dofasco Steel in Hamilton says it clearly. They say: "Our product is steel but our strength is our people". This is where we miss in this House. The strength of this nation is our people.

We have to ask ourselves, all sides of this House: "Are we treating our people fairly?" I bet there is not a member in this House who would not acknowledge the fact that the tax designs of this country, this government, are the most complex—they are definitely unfair—and the most inefficient and, I bet you, they rank with being the worst in the world.

It seems to me that rather than having ad hoc decisions to help the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country, it is time that we, in this House, put forward a comprehensive approach. Let us begin with the one instrument that the Government of Canada controls that affects every person in our nation and that is our tax system.

I believe that if we had a comprehensive approach to tax reform, that is the secret to motivating the will of this people to becoming one of the most productive nations on earth.

But the converse of that is also true. If we continue to be captives of officials in this city who tend to work as word smiths, tend to forget about what drives people, tend to forget about what drives entrepreneurs, we are not going to advance.

We are going to have a long day today to debate the difficulties of business in this country. We are not just talking small business, we are talking the medium size and the large corporations of this country. They are all crying out for help. They all ask themselves these days: "Does anybody up there in Ottawa listen? Does anybody up there understand the kind of pain we are in? Does anybody up there have any ideas?" Quite frankly, it is all well and good for those of us on this side of the House to get up and challenge the government for its lack of political will or its lack of action.

It is also incumbent upon us on this side of the House to throw some challenges in a very specific way at the Government of Canada and say: "Why are you not experimenting? Why are you not trying to put into place some of the ideas that we are hearing from the people we are talking to when we walk the streets of our ridings or visit other parts of the country?"

I have one very specific recommendation for the Government of Canada. I personally believe, and I know there are a few other members in this House who believe, and I am not speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada right now, but I am speaking on behalf of thousands of people in this country, that it is time for a comprehensive approach to tax reform.

I personally believe in the single tax system. I believe a single tax of 20 per cent, corporate and personal, would probably send a signal to the people of this country that we are serious about radical tax reform. I know John Bulloch at the Canadian Federation of Independent Business thinks I should be banned to Siberia because my tax system is asking smaller business to go from 10 per cent to 20.

I say to Mr. Bulloch, and I say to the entrepreneurs: "Would you not rather have a 20 per cent rate and throw away the thousands and thousands and thousands of pages of tax law, rules and regulations? You could cut down on your paper burden. You could cut out the red tape. You would save on administration and overhead".

Just imagine a small company that might have a net profit of $100,000 a year. Under the current tax system it would pay $10,000. Under the single tax it would pay $20,000. But it would save in the paper burden, and in the cutbacks in accountants' fees and lawyers' fees. More important, it would have a motivated labour force, because it would not spend its time on negative energy trying to figure out all the rules and regulations and exceptions to exceptions, all the disincentives to the creative process, the things that suck the entrepreneurial juice out of a person when they are trying to imagine and create ideas that expand a business and expand wealth. It would be adding jobs to the labour force rather than cutting back and diminishing. I believe that a single tax system would go a long way in advancing the strength of entrepreneurship in this country.

The second thing I would like to challenge the Government of Canada on is its communications practices. I noticed last week that the government sent out a message on the Constitution to every household in Canada. An Invitation to Help Build a new Canada.

I am not disinterested in the Constitution. But I can tell you that most of the people that I talk to suggest that yes, the Constitution is important, but it seems like the only thing we talk about in this country right now is the Constitution.

It seems that this government is going to extraordinary pains to communicate the message of its proposal to the Canadian people. I really do not have a problem with that. What I do have a problem with is the fact that there are fabulous programs and services that exist within the Government of Canada. There are fabulous programs within the Federal Business Development Bank, match making exercises where investors can be matched with small businesses that are short of capital.

There are fabulous programs in many other departments of government which, I would say, 99 per cent of the businesses in this country do not even know exist. My experience is that it is only those corporations which can afford to have government relations people working in Ottawa, or lobbyists working in Ottawa, that know these truly good programs exist within the Government of Canada, within the bureaucracy of Canada.

I must confess at the same time that I feel there is a fine line here because we know that this Prime Minister has an extraordinary sort of communications skills. His tactical skills sometimes makes me nervous. However, I still believe that the Government of Canada should be communicating to the 900,000 entrepreneurs the fact that there are programs and services available to them which can help relieve some of the pain that they are going through. This is my second recommendation. The first is comprehensive tax reform. The second is a very specific, small business-directed campaign on programs and services available.

The third point that I want to make is on tourism. I think tourism is a gem we have in this country that has been neglected. It seems that very few officials understand the power of tourism in this country. If I were to make a third recommendation to the government in terms of helping the tourism sector of this economy which is, by sector, the largest job creator we have, I would quadruple the tourism budget in this country. Not only does it create jobs, but it also works at galvanizing the will of this country, and making us feel good, and making us feel proud about this country again which is something that we are all in desperate need of.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on his speech. He has always had an abiding interest in the concerns of small businesses, and today's speech is eloquent testimony to his interest and dedication.

[English]

The member for Broadview—Greenwood, who has taken a major lead on the issue of tax reform in this country, has spoken today again about his concern, and the important implications for small and medium-sized businesses and, indeed, large businesses. He asks how one can reduce the tremendous paper load and simplify the system so that Canadians can function in the global economy.

There is another area as well on which our speaker has been very eloquent in the past and that is the whole issue of environmental technology. This is something that he shares with many of us in our party as, indeed, the issue of tax reform. Environmental technology is one of the great growth areas for this country. It is, unfortunately, one that the current government is completely neglecting. As I understand it, it may well be that it is because it does not understand that Canadians can compete with anybody in the world.

I believe, and I know that the previous speaker believes, that there is a tremendous role for small business in the development of environmental technology. I think that it would be very helpful to this House, and to Canadians across the land, if the speaker was allowed perhaps some time to give us his views on the relationship between small and medium-sized businesses and that which we in the Liberal Party feel is very important, the opportunity for Canadians to take the lead in this very important area of the economy.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for LaSalle—Émard for his question.

I believe that the support for environmental technology in this country is something that can create a new thrust for jobs which we are in desperate need of in this country. With almost two million people unemployed, and a planet that is deteriorating at the rate that ours is, I think it is absolutely ludicrous for us not to blend the two; the unemployed factor and also the environmental technology that we have in this country that is not given proper exercise or proper support.

I attended the Water Pollution Control Federation Convention last Monday in Toronto. There were 12,000 delegates from all over the world and close to 500,000 square feet of exhibits of environmental technology from all over the world. We did not even come close to having substantial representation, and it was in Toronto, Canada.

I totally support my colleague's view that we must, for the sake of the planet, factor in the fact that we have human capital available and willing to work on environmental technology. I think it is incumbent on this government to get on with it right away.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on his excellent presentation and his initiative in moving the motion before the House. Like the hon. member, I am familiar with the advantages of small business. We are lucky to have 900,000 entrepreneurs who are the real key to economic development and job creation across this country. It is always risky to put all your eggs in the same basket and to consider only big business. The hon. member is absolutely right.

I would like to start off by saying that I agree the economic environment is extremely important and that our banking system, which influences the economy, is faced with two problems—in fact, I and all average Canadians are very much aware that interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar can make or break small business.

Madam Speaker, I would appreciate the hon. member's comments.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. The problem we have with small business vis-à-vis the interest rates and the dollar is that at the same time that interest rates go up in this country the banking institutions begin their process of restricting credit. One of the scariest things for small and medium sized entrepreneurs is when that bank manager calls them in and says: "Listen, even though I am making a little bit more, I have to tell you that I am curtailing your line of credit or even reducing it because I am a little bit nervous about your cash flow and your ability to handle it".

The other thing happening right now is that the government talks about the fact that interest rates have come down 5.5 or 6 points in the last year. There is a sense of: "Wow, isn't that great". Do you know what is happening, Madam Speaker? None of the banks are lending any money. There are big posters in bank windows saying: "Mortgage rates 9.5 per cent", but go and try to get it. If you are a small or medium size business go and see if they will. Interest rates are down now, and that is usually a signal that the economy is getting better. Well, it does not seem to be getting any better for the banks.

That crushes the entrepreneurial spirit of this country. When that is multiplied by 900,000 entrepreneurs, that creates a national malaise.

As my colleague from Willowdale said yesterday, for every penny the dollar goes up we lose $1.3 billion worth of exports. In the last six weeks the dollar has gone up by almost 3 cents. That is almost $4 billion worth of sales. Translate that into jobs, mostly in the manufacturing sector.

• (1040)

The interest rate problem and the high dollar are causing deep pain for the 900,000 entrepreneurs of this country. When the government says that the interest rates are going down and the dollar is holding, and we hear these statistics every day, it is missing the point.

We must go beyond those statistics and see the spirit, the will, and the heart of the entrepreneurs. Those statistics, at this point in time, do not mean a darn thing.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): In 1980, 1981, and 1982 interest rates were at 22 per cent and inflation at 13 per cent and the dollar was where it was. Look what happened to the economy then.

Is he suggesting that with a lower dollar and higher interest rates we would have a better economy, as we did in 1980, 1981 and 1982?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I am so pleased that the minister responsible for entrepreneurship for the Government of Canada has entered into the debate. He refers to that world-wide recession of 1981 and 1982. I was here in this town at that time working for Mr. Trudeau, the then Prime Minister. I want him to know that we did something different then.

Mrs. Bourgault: What did you do?

Mr. Mills: We did let the deficit rise, but we put people back to work. We had a special recovery program which put people back to work. It was a cushion for the pain that was going on in this country.

We also did another thing. We were also very sensitive to the fact that if we were going to get out of this high inflation—and it was high—we were going to have to do it with the will of the people. That is when we came out with the six and five program. The six and five program was an effort to recognize that the only way we could pull out of that mess was by galvanizing the will of the people and getting them all involved in the anti-inflation fight.

When we left office in 1984, we left the Conservatives with one of the hottest, most productive economies in the world. Yes, we left with a deficit of $180 billion, but over the next seven years the Conservatives blew it. They blew it. They doubled the debt because they forgot one fundamental thing. They want to chop this country up into blocks but it does not work that way. It is necessary to galvanize the national will, but their programs are not designed in the national sense. They tend to be in blocks and in regions, and that will not work.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I don't know where to begin, having just heard that the six and five program galvanized people across this country. It certainly galvanized people across my constituency. It galvanized them into throwing the Liberals into third place in Essex—Windsor for the first time in recorded history. It galvanized people in other parts of this country to ensure that the Liberal Party came back to this House with 40 seats, the lowest level of support it had ever received in any national election since 1867.

It certainly galvanized people. I have to say it galvanized the labour movement too. It galvanized the labour movement almost as much as the PSAC strike has galvanized labour, as the PSAC efforts to win justice for clerks, for the low-paid people in the Public Service, while those at the top will get their bonuses. They were sent back to work by this government.

That has galvanized the labour movement too. It galvanized the labour movement in such a way that it will mobilize across this country as I gather it mobilized last night in my constituency of Essex—Windsor to welcome one of the figures who represents this government's economic policies, the Minister for International Trade. He was met with anything but pleasure in the city of Windsor when he visited it yesterday.

Yes, there are events which can galvanize people but there are also policies which can galvanize an economy. This Conservative government has been in power since 1984 but sometimes you would not realize it the way it tries to blame the Liberals for its mistakes. Unfortunately this government has not been able to find policies to give this economy the drive and dynamism to give us growth and economic fairness, or to give us the kind of employment people need throughout this country.

Let me deal with each of these points. We talk first about employment because the latest unemployment figures came out today. I have already said they are good news for the country because they show a decrease in the unemployment rate from 10.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent. The fascinating thing about these statistics is that in the province of Ontario the decrease was from 9.9 per cent to 9.2 per cent. That was by far the biggest decrease and the most important part of the over-all decrease within the country evident any place in Canada.

Why has that taken place? It has taken place because the government in the province of Ontario has taken the problem of getting people back to work seriously. It has taken the concerns of Canadians, the concerns of small business and the concerns of farmers, it has taken all these concerns seriously. The results are starting to show up in the national statistics that came out today. There are 40,000 fewer people unemployed in the province of Ontario as of this past month of September.

The budget of the province of Ontario which this government on the other side so strongly criticized and condemned is in fact showing itself to be getting people back to work while national policies continue to leave the country in stagnation, while national policies continue to leave us with unemployment rate changes in provinces such as that in Quebec for instance.

[Translation]

If we consider the Province of Quebec which applied this government's economic policies, decided to cut spending and opted for the politics of austerity, what are the results? The result for the month of September was an increase in unemployment.

• (1050)

[English]

In Alberta, another Conservative province which has followed the national government in trying to squeeze things in the face of a recession, again the unemployment rate has gone up.

Mrs. Vézina: But speaking about Ontario and Manitoba—

Mr. Langdon: I talked about Ontario already. The unemployment rate there decreased by .7 per cent, from 9.9 per cent to 9.2 per cent. Compare that 9.2 per cent figure to the Quebec figure of 12.1 per cent.

The politics of austerity in Quebec—

[Translation]

The politics of austerity have created an unemployment rate of 12.1 per cent in Quebec. In Ontario, where the government is applying an expansionist policy, the unemployment rate is down to 9.2 per cent.

Madam Speaker, I think this is a clear indication that the economic policy they have in Ontario was the better choice.

[English]

If we move to the question of growth, I think that this government has also demonstrated its inability to generate the kind of broad-based fair growth across this country which would give us a recovery from this recession to the benefit of all Canadians. Instead, what we have seen is a continuation of regional differences which show up again in the unemployment rates that came out today.

In Newfoundland 17.8 per cent of the population is out of work, in Nova Scotia 12.6 per cent is out of work, in New Brunswick 12.8 per cent, and in Quebec 12.1 per cent. It is only in provinces like Ontario that have chosen policies aimed to help people that the unemployment rate is down to 9.2 per cent.

If we take the policies of this government, and we could take a great many of them but let us just take one, let us take its tax policies. We were at the very height of a recession, the very worst period of economic development for our country in 10 years. What does this government decide to do? It decides to put into effect a massive new goods and services tax, a 7 per cent hammering of consumers across this country. I believe that 7 per cent hammering had the effect of prolonging the recession, of making recovery from the recession significantly more difficult for our economy. It was a move in taxation terms which has also been especially painful for small businesses.

I talked to small business people in my constituency and in other constituencies throughout this country. For instance, the foundry manufacturers, the mould makers in Windsor, had to come to me as a New Democrat finance critic to get action from this government on a piece of absolute nonsense which had been put into place because of the GST.

Mould makers, as anyone who knows the industry will know, move their goods back and forth across the border, especially in areas like Windsor, for different processes which are undertaken with respect to those moulds. Those moulds, for instance, have to be etched. Often these are sent to the United States to be etched. The Government of Canada had decided that every time these moulds were moved back and forth across the border they had to pay the GST again, regardless of whether the GST had already been paid on a previous movement across the border.

It took us three months to persuade the Department of Finance to finally eliminate that provision which was so seriously damaging hundreds of mould-making firms in the city of Windsor and in many other communities in southern Ontario.

We were pleased that the Department of Finance finally moved. However, it put a tax like that into effect, not realizing how detrimental the effects of that tax would be when we live right beside the United States, a country which does not have a tax of this sort anywhere in its economy.

We see massive increases in cross-border shopping spending. We have seen massive increases in the number of Canadians going to the United States on tourist trips this year. We have seen an increase of 10 per cent this year alone in the number of tourists choosing the United States instead of Canada. At the same time we have seen a decrease of 2 per cent in the number of American tourists coming to this country.

This shows us what the GST is doing to economic development in this country. It is seriously damaging the prospects for the future of our land.

I mentioned not just growth, not just the question of employment, but the question of fairness, because that, too, is important. What we have seen from this government from 1984 is a series of tax changes which have benefited those at the top and hurt those at the bottom. We have seen, for instance, $100,000 in exemptions provided for capital gains tax benefits. This is of benefit to that small percentage of people at the top of our economy who earn a great deal of money from capital gains.

We have seen the top rate of income tax, which the Liberals first decreased down to 34 per cent, brought down even further by this government to 29 per cent. The decrease has been combined with a shift of taxation to the ordinary people of this country, a shift to the GST which falls on middle and lower middle class Canadians, working class Canadians, a shift to the manufacturers' sales tax before that, which was increased year after year after year by this government. So the ordinary people in this country pay much more tax than they did in 1984, while those at the top pay less tax. We have seen unfairness. We have seen lack of action with respect to unemployment. We have seen lack of action with respect to growth. Instead we have seen things that have hurt growth in this economy.

We have to take a new course. I think the course which the Liberals have suggested is in a sense some of the same old stuff which they have tried to pursue in the past and which has not built a solid basis for our economic development in the future.

For us as a party, we certainly would hope that the next election will bring changes that make it possible for us to start to get some of those benefits which Ontario is enjoying of dynamic expansion and of reduced unemployment which we see in the unemployment figures today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will interrupt the hon. member. There will be two minutes after our daily routine business for him to conclude and after which we will proceed to questions or comments.

It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, this weekend is Thanksgiving when Canadians offer thanks for the many blessings that we enjoy in this great land. As we offer thanks and pray for the future of our nation, it is appropriate to reflect on the contributions that families make to the Canadian way of life. It is also appropriate that Family Service Canada sponsors National Family Week just before Thanksgiving.

I thought much of my family this last week and how important they are to me. My wife and youngest son celebrated their birthdays at home while I was here. I had to console myself with the fact that what we do here will help all Canadian families.

Programs like the recently announced $136 million commitment by the federal government to help eliminate violence against women, children and elders are unfortunately necessary. Other federal government programs, like the family allowance, child tax credits and supplemental tax credits for children under six are all important to families.

The government is committed to families and I encourage that commitment.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, 150 years ago Queen's University was established by royal charter. The document was granted by Queen Victoria on October 16, 1841, after years of effort by the Presbyterians of Upper Canada. Classes began on March 7, 1842, when Queen's College at Kingston opened a small wood frame house on the edge of the city with two professors and 13 students.

Known as Queen's University since its separation from the Presbyterian Church in 1912, it is one of the oldest and most distinguished universities in Canada with a long established tradition of service to Ontario and the nation. Today there are more than 70,000 Queen's alumni living and working throughout Canada and in more than 100 countries around the world, including nine hon. members of this House.

This year, Queen's invites Canadians everywhere to help the university celebrate 150 years of achievement. Oil thigh na banrighinn a'banrighinn gu brath, chagheill.

NATIONAL AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, the World Health Organization predicts that by the year 2000, 40 million people, including 10 million children, will be suffering from AIDS. In the United States, 100,000 people have already died of AIDS. According to recent Canadian figures, more than 5,000 Canadians have AIDS and their numbers are increasing.

Madam Speaker, this is National AIDS Awareness Week, an important event indeed. Front line workers already working in this area across the country will try to make Canadians more aware of the existence of AIDS, and its disastrous effects, and how it can be prevented.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

VINAY DOPHE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, in what are most definitely compassionate circumstances, the Canadian government has again refused a request for a visitor visa.

Almost four years ago, 11 year old Vinay Dophe was the innocent victim of an acid attack which left him sightless. Thirteen operations later, the metro Toronto Herbie Fund helped bring young Vinay to Toronto sick kids hospital for further treatment.

As Vinay prepares for yet another operation in which he will receive a cornea transplant, he would like his mother by his side. The Government of Canada has refused on two occasions to give her a visitor visa.

A former federal Ontario Human Rights Commissioner has already written to the Prime Minister on behalf of Vinay and his mother. I too would like to lend my voice to his appeal and call upon the minister or the government to reconsider the visa, or grant a permit to Mrs. Dophe so that she may be by the side of her very brave son for his upcoming and delicate surgery.

THE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I want to appeal to the Prime Minister and his minister of Finance to avoid making political capital at the expense of formerly unemployed Canadians who are now on welfare.

In fact, instead of rejoicing in the latest statistics on unemployment, we should deplore these figures which obscure part of the facts. unemployed workers who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits.

Madam Speaker, we cannot afford to sweep under the rug the fate of thousands of Canadians who during the past months have been looking for jobs that do not exist.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, the next few months present Canadians with a unique opportunity to contribute their opinions to the constitutional design for Canada's future.

This is a special opportunity for members of Parliament as well to stimulate such dialogue in their constituencies and to encourage all citizens from all walks of life to express their views about our country.

The 28 proposals for political and constitutional change which are now before us represent a critical and constructive stage in Canada's long journey toward national unity. They demand and deserve our most dedicated deliberations.

In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury in any possible way, through citizens' committees, at public meetings and in every other such forum, our common theme will continue to be: "Please come. Let's talk about Canada."

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the Thanksgiving weekend is coming up, and at this time of the year, many Canadians give thanks for the abundance they enjoy.

However, there are also many Canadians who have not been as lucky and do not enjoy that abundance.

[English]

Within the shadow of the Peace Tower, Madam Speaker, the Ottawa Food Bank operates year round supplying emergency hamper programs, shelter and soup kitchens.

This weekend, the Ottawa Food Bank is asking area residents to please think of those who are needy, and give generously. Food can be dropped off at any of the 37 major grocery stores tonight and tomorrow.

There has been an increase in demand for food of 20 per cent over last year. This is not good news. This should not be happening in a society where apples in this area rot in the fields because producers are overstocked.

Food banks all across this country need donations. Please give so that many others can give gracious and thanks to the Lord for this great country.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Madam Speaker, this year, the first day of October was a special day for a businessman in my riding.

In fact, Nicola Cortina, a jovial gentlemen, officially inaugurated his pasta plant, Cortina Inc., the only plant in Quebec that produces fresh pasta and sauce.

This ultra-modern plant, Italian in inspiration, which will enable him to compete with the Americans, was built thanks to a partnership of federal, provincial and municipal levels of government, and to financial assistance from the private sector.

Mr. Cortina, a real fighter, known as a persevering and sometimes even obstinate man, has taken advantage of all resources at his disposal to carve out an enviable niche on the market, both in Canada and throughout the North American continent. This is someone who isn't afraid to build! Good luck, Nicola!

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I wish to rise today to underline the seriousness of the economic situation within my constituency, and indeed, on the island of Cape Breton.

Today it was announced that the unemployment rate in my constituency is in excess of 17.5 per cent, which is twice the national average.

We have steel workers without jobs or bridge benefits. We have miners without jobs or hope of jobs. We have construction workers who are unemployed and have been denied the privileges and the benefits of an older workers' adjustment program. We have fishermen without fish to catch or benefits in order to feed their families. Our youth have no hope of economic opportunities in Cape Breton.

I would urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to work in concert with Enterprise Cape Breton and the various municipalities in industrial Cape Breton to put together a measure of job programs in order to sustain those individuals over the winter months.

I see that the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation is in the House. I would hope that he would use his good offices to assist in a very, very difficult situation.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, Canadians are very disturbed at the justification offered for racist and sexist remarks made in the House yesterday. We are all subject to heckling here. Sexist and racist remarks are not simply personal insults, they are insults to a significant portion of the population.

How do those members think racial and ethnic minority people feel when a member of Parliament refers to a committed, active and respected member of Parliament by a slave name? How do those members think women feel when women members must deal not only with all of the regular put-downs of this place, but insults that are directly related to their gender? It not only shows a lack of respect for the individual, but for women in general.

There is never a justification for racism and sexism. It is not simply a matter of decorum. Racism and sexism do not belong in the House of Commons nor anywhere else in Canada.

SUDDEN INFANT DEATH SYNDROME AWARENESS MONTH

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, this is SIDS, or Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Awareness, Month. This term refers to the sudden and unexpected death of an apparently healthy baby. Such a death is a tragedy that strikes not only the mother and father of the child, but also other children in the family, their grandparents, playmates, teachers and everyone in the community.

Few are aware that SIDS is now the leading cause of infant death under one year of age after the newborn period. The number of infant deaths from other causes has decreased while death from SIDS have not.

From November 1 to 3, Prince Edward Island will be hosting the annual Baby's Breath Conference sponsored by the Canadian Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths.

I would urge everyone to participate in the activities aimed at increasing the awareness of SIDS during the month of October. Families affected by this syndrome need our compassion. Only through the concerted efforts will we make progress in understanding and some day eliminating this phenomenon.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, on September 27, immigration adjudicator Susan Lavendar ruled to grant refugee status to a Trinidadian couple who had been waiting 23 months for action on their case. Her decision, based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, indicated that the long wait to which the couple was subjected was an unreasonable delay, causing them mental and physical suffering.

Unfortunately, this type of delay is not the exception, but the norm. People all across Canada, particularly in the metropolitan Toronto area and in my riding of Scarborough-Agincourt, are experiencing exactly the same mental and physical hardship.

What about the thousands of cases still sitting in the backlog? Where is the justice for them? Even the immigration adjudicators, appointed by this government, recognize the injustice of the situation.

I call upon the government to alleviate this suffering and set up a review process which will find a reasonable and constitutional solution to the immigration backlog.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, once again Canadians and their leaders are engaged in a round of constitutional discussions.

Our government has come forth with a comprehensive set of proposals which seek to respond to all the various deficiencies that have been identified by one group of Canadians or another.

In particular, the proposals attempt to respond to alienation from western Canada to the unacceptability of the status quo to the indigenous peoples of Canada and to the sense of betrayal that is so widespread in Quebec resulting from what, to many Quebecers, was the great betrayal of 1982 and the rejection of the Meech Lake Accord.

Most Nova Scotians do not take great issue with the constitutional status quo. Not surprisingly, many say they are bored or even disgusted that their elected leaders and much of the energy of government will once again be distracted from what they see as far more pressing economic problems.

To these people I say we must be prepared to listen to the frustration and imperatives of our fellow Canadians if we wish them to be sensitive to our needs and concerns.

Without a united Canada there cannot be an economically strong Canada. This time it is the Canada round. I urge all Canadians to get onside and participate.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House an endeavour put forth by the Committee for Base Cornwallis in the Annapolis—Digby area concerning a United Nations peacekeeping training centre. This would be a centre in which armed forces from other countries could be trained in Canada.

Canada is well known for its efforts on peacekeeping. This would extend our role as international peacekeepers if we could train for the United Nations' future peacekeepers.

About a month ago, Premier Cameron presented this proposal to the Prime Minister. This week, the Minister of National Defence told the committee nothing would be done.

I call upon the government to start negotiating with the United Nations to see if there are countries which would like to have their troops trained in Canada in peacekeeping. We have the facilities at CFB Cornwallis. We would welcome these foreign troops. Will the government at least pursue this matter with the United Nations.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask today rhetorically where has the Minister of Agriculture been for the last seven months. The population of the farm community in Canada has been calling for farm payments for many months. Since spring, the New Democrats, the Saskatchewan New Democrats, the wheat pools, the National Farmers' Union have called for payments for farmers.

It just so happens that over the course of this period of time, the Minister of Agriculture, who is supposed to defend the interests of agriculture producers., has been saying that there is no money for farmers in western Canada. In Rosetown, his own constituency, he stood up and said there was no money for farmers. Yesterday, magically, there was $800 million announced. That was very appropriately timed, Madam Speaker.

Where was the minister when the people were calling for an agriculture payment? He was not there.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I want to put my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Last year the government cut farm support programs by 40 per cent. This year the government has been stonewalling farmers' demands for emergency cash assistance. Now we learn that the government's announcement yesterday for farmers may not actually be paid for the next six months.

Why is the government refusing to make the payments to farmers now? These are farmers who are facing the loss of their farms, their homes and their livelihood this fall. Why is the government stonewalling?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must realize that we are not stonewalling. We have been working with the farm industry over the last number of months. Our intent is to support agriculture, and we will be doing that.

Of the $1.5 billion that will flow between now and Christmas and of the $1.1 billion originally designed to flow from January to June, adding to it the announcement yesterday of an additional $800 million, will amount to on a seeded acreage basis, if you want to use that as a calculation, of $40 an acre assistance in the programs that have been designed by the farmers, the provincial governments and the Government of Canada.

If the hon. member will reflect back to when he sat on the government benches when interest rates were at 24 per cent, when farm land was being taken over, when inflation was running at 13 per cent, he will recall that there was no—and I repeat, Madam Speaker, no—assistance coming from the government that he was part of.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, to the minister. The minister knows that we are talking about the emergency assistance—even though it was only 60 per cent of what was needed—that the government announced yesterday.

The minister knows that his senior officials have told farmers that they could make the payments within three to four weeks if they used the NISA program. What I want to ask the minister is this: Why does the government not use this program, stop stalling and get the cash out there now. It is needed now.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am not too sure who the hon. member has been talking to, but I would like him to tell me. All the advice I have received has not only been from senior officials in the Department of Agriculture, but from farm groups. They have worked over the last seven days, at the request of the Prime Minister, along with the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the Minister of Finance and myself, to come forward with a program within the draft report received from that farm group, that industry group. They suggested that it was inappropriate for them to make a suggestion, a recommendation to the government, as to how the money should flow because they believed there was further work necessary.

I can inform the hon. member that that committee will be meeting on Tuesday of next week, recognizing that Monday is Thanksgiving. They will get together and design how the dollars will flow from this program.

Unlike other governments, we believe it is important to listen to the producers when it comes to giving them assistance.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, if he listens to the members of the third line of defence committee, they will tell him that they should make the payments and make them soon, just like his most senior officials have told those members of that committee that the payments could be made in three to four weeks if they used the NISA program.

Farmers have been suffering right across this country during this year because the government has refused to make the payments. I want to ask the minister if he thinks it is fair that this payment should have been held up and farmers should have suffered all year long so that the Prime Minister could make an announcement in the middle of the Saskatchewan election just to help his political buddy, Grant Devine, save his political skin.

Does he think that it is fair to make farmers suffer all year so that this announcement could be made in the middle of the Saskatchewan election, a cynical, political ploy? Do you think it is fair?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had the best interests of the farmers at heart he would say to the government, as farm leaders have said to the government and to the Prime Minister who has given unprecedented support to agriculture in this country in the last seven years, that farmers recognize that we have a deficit in Canada. The Prime Minister recognized we had a deficit in Canada. The Prime Minister said to farm leaders: "I will do everything within his power to find assistance for you in this difficult time". The Prime Minister has done that.

I want to get back and say to the hon. member that I have a few quotes from farm leaders.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. McKnight: NDPers are calling "Order", because they will not like this.

"The Canadian government responded to the plight of thousands of farmers who risk losing their farms because of a continued subsidy between the United States and the European community", said the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

"That is 60 per cent of what has been identified as needed in the province. It is short but you know I don't believe very many farmers are going to send cheques back and say it wasn't enough. It is vitally needed"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will interrupt the hon. minister. I think this is getting into a speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday, the minister gave us an announcement, after letting Canadian farmers languish for six months. But the minister has still not answered the question asked earlier. After waiting for six months, why must Canadian farmers now wait another six months for the Conservative government to get organized?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, no one has said the producers should wait another six months. What we have said and will continue to say is that we will do everything within our power to make that money flow.

We have asked the third line defence committee to give us recommendations as to how it will flow.

But the member says that the government has done nothing over the past number of months. He will recall that NISA was announced in April and May of this year. He will recall that producers only have to file, and to fill out a form, and they can receive their NISA benefits. To this point, if we are going to be able to flow $1.5 billion to producers in Canada before December 31, we are going to have to have those forms returned. At this point we have had only 20 per cent of those forms returned to the NISA office.

It is available. It is there. Farmers need it, and I think from the quotes I have here that farmers appreciate it.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, with all due respect, the minister has still not answered the question. Farmers are going bankrupt every day, throughout Canada. The government has been asked for help—emergency assistance!—for six months.

Why must Canadian farmers be made to wait another six months before getting organized? Why not offer aid now, by Christmas? Help in farmers' pockets, before more go under!

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, why does the hon. member and why do the members of the Liberal Party not recognize that there is assistance available to producers in Canada?

That assistance has been available for over eight weeks. There are forms that are available. Producers now are starting to send them in. I say to the hon. member that it is not fair and it is not reasonable to say that there has been nothing done.

The member knows full well the support that has been given to agriculture across Canada by this government. We have available through the—

Mr. Foster: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member had an opportunity to ask his three questions. Now I am trying to reply to his colleague.

The hon. member knows that the NISA forms have been available. Farmers will fill them out. Support is available now. He also knows that cash advances up to $50,000 interest-free are available.

The hon. member is misrepresenting, maybe not deliberately; it may be because of lack of knowledge. We have a third line of defence committee made up of the industry. We are going to listen to it and we are going to do what we believe we can on its recommendation.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Today the unemployment statistics are down slightly and that is certainly good news. However, there is still across the country a great human tragedy that is occurring, whether it is salaried workers who are unemployed, farmers, or small business.

What it has meant is a great loss of faith in this country and a great sense of despair. Surely a country in despair cannot be a country united. As the Acting Prime Minister will know, in many cities across this country school lunch programs for hungry children are being created at a faster rate than jobs.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister: How does his government propose to address this human tragedy now? It is not just a statistic. It is a human tragedy when we have unemployment at double digit rates.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, indeed we were pleased to see that the statistics on unemployment had dropped somewhat, and that is a good sign. There is lots of good news out there today. I think that we can be negative and bring forward all the bad news, but there is a lot of good news out there and there is a lot of hope for Canadians. I think that is very important.

If we take a look at interest rates, they are dropping at fairly significant rates. I think that is most important for Canadians. It is obviously helping in the housing industry, as it is helping in other industries as well. We are also seeing all the legitimate economic prognosticators coming out with some very encouraging news for Canada, the latest being the International Monetary Fund which is projecting that real growth next year will be in the 3.8 per cent range and that in fact our inflation rate will be down to 2.8 per cent, the second lowest in the industrialized world. That is most encouraging.

The policies of the government are working. We promised that there would be a little growth this year, not spectacular, but a little growth that is starting to happen. We are very encouraged by those signs.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): On a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, the fact remains that there are still 1.5 million unemployed in this country.

[Translation]

More than two million people live on welfare. All those who are no longer looking are not part of the statistics. This government does not lack ideas to ensure the prosperity of the rich and powerful. Where are its ideas to ensure the prosperity of those who are desperate? Now!

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, there are programs in place to help these people. Those programs are helping these people at the present time. The important thing is to get the economy back on track to create jobs. That is the best method of solving the poverty problem and getting people off unemployment insurance and off welfare.

That is the plan of this government in co-operation, I might say, with most other provinces in the country in trying to get our fiscal house in order so that in fact we can have employment created in this country, get people off welfare, off unemployment insurance, and back on the working rolls where they rightfully belong.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, clearly it has been the high interest policy, the high dollar policy of this government and the trade deal that have led us to this situation. Canadians are not going to believe that those people who led us into this tragedy are going to lead us out of it.

When the minister says that the statistics are improving, that the recovery is under way, who is it under way for? We saw 7,000 farmers this week demonstrating. We see people going from the unemployed rolls to the welfare rolls.

I want to ask the minister: When is this government going to make full employment in this country a priority so that we do not have to deal with the human tragedy of children going hungry, food banks increasing and the homeless increasing and get Canadians back working?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned farmers. I think the Minister of Agriculture yesterday made a very profound statement to help farmers out in their difficult times and he should be congratulated for that.

The hon. member mentioned the trade deal. All the manufacturing industry will tell you that the trade deal has helped them through these difficult times, and that in fact if they had not had the trade deal the recession would have been a lot worse.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: That is a fact and that has been stated clearly by industrialists in this country.

I am mystified at the hon. member talking about the high interest rate policy of this government. Interest rates today are lower than they were four years ago. The highest interest rate was over a year ago at around 14 per cent. If you want to talk about high interest rates, talk about 22 per cent interest rates back in 1982 and 1983. That was high interest. Now they are coming down and we are going to keep them down because we are getting inflation down. That is going to help the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are getting into a speech again.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, the government claimed in this House yesterday that it was concerned about our cod fishing resource and conservation of that resource in eastern Canada.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs: Why then did Canada sit down recently with nine other nations and decide to reopen a cod fishing zone that is internationally recognized as a cod spawning zone, 290 miles east of St. John's, Newfoundland, against the advice of our own scientists and give to nine foreign nations 13,000 tonnes of cod and to Canada 100 tonnes?

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the minister let me respond to this question.

The zone to which the hon. member refers is one of those that straddles the 200-mile zone, not directly associated with the interests of Canadian fisheries. My recollection is that we voted to extend the moratorium for conservation purposes at NAFO and the hon. member's information would therefore be wrong.

Not only that, we do have the support of other nations to keep the Spanish and the Portuguese fleets, the rascals that have been overfishing in that zone, in line.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada abstained from voting in 1991 at that meeting and went along with it for 1992. It is agreements like this that will destroy forever and an eternity the very fish in our ocean.

Is there any limit to the efforts of the Department of External Affairs to satisfy every fishing country in this world except Canada? What was the Secretary of State for External Affairs doing yesterday? She was meeting with representatives of the Government of Denmark and claiming they were talking about fish conservation, when Denmark will receive 29 times the quota of Canada in that zone for 1992. Why, the Danes must be laughing all the way to the fishing bank.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, all I know is that many of the problems that we are facing in the fisheries today, particularly in our relations with the international fishing fleets, are problems that we inherited from our predecessors.

While this member is standing in his place here pontificating about historical problems, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is down there in the trenches trying to fix some of the problems that were created by those people over there.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could say to the hon. minister that it would be much better if the minister of fisheries got out of the trenches and back into the House of Commons so we could deal with the important fisheries problems of this country. That is where we need him.

I have this question. We are seeing the collapse of the resource industries right across Canada. We have seen announcements now dealing with the western farmer and to some extent with eastern fishermen. What we have not had a response to is the plight of the fishermen in the prairie region, the inland freshwater fisheries, who are now also facing collapse because of the cutbacks and pullbacks of support.

I want to ask the government: Why has it refused to deal with that request and come to the aid of the inland freshwater fishing industry of Canada?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is a marketing system in place, one that is policed and managed by the fishermen themselves. There has been all kinds of programs put in place to save that fishery and to restore it to its health and prosperity. It just does not help to be standing here and pontificating about these problems. Every once and a while you have to get out and deal with them on site and help the fishermen. The hon. member never did that.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is exactly what I did this summer. I met with the fishermen of inland Manitoba, something the minister of fisheries refused to do.

Madam Speaker, I want to point out that the Government of Canada participated along with its provincial counterparts in a report and study that I initiated to deal with the plight of fishermen. Half the fishermen in that province are of native origin. I want to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development: considering that these recommendations have been available since last February, why has this minister and this government refused to take any action for eight months to deal with the plight of fishermen and what will result in the destruction of the lake communities and northern communities of Manitoba unless this minister does something about it? Why are you so late?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the report that the hon. member speaks of would be much more useful to me if he would send it to me directly and speak to me about it.

Furthermore, I am extremely concerned about the importance of the freshwater fisheries to the native communities of northern Manitoba and the northern prairie provinces. It was the Liberal government, I believe, in the late 1970s that took the authority for the fisheries and the benefit of the fisheries away from the native people of Manitoba and put it into the hands of a Crown corporation they created, which has destroyed the freedom of the fishermen individually to produce and market their product.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, I will direct my question to the Minister of Justice. A former agent of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Guy Chamberland, a constituent of mine, says that he was contaminated by bacteria during a top-secret search of debris from the Soviet consulate in Montreal after the fire of January 1987.

My question is: Since this search was part of "Project F" (for fire) and other agents were involved, I ask the Minister of Justice how many other agents were involved. Why does the department refuse to compensate my constituent? And how many other people, organizations or political parties were the targets of these spies, the federal government's amateur garbage cleaners, in direct contravention of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would respectfully suggest that that is a question more appropriate for the Order Paper. The hon. member will know that it is the policy of the government not to comment on the operational activities of the service.

With respect to his constituent, I understand that legal proceedings are ongoing, and I think it would be inappropriate for me to comment on them at this time in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Considering the hon. minister's answer, I would advise the hon. member to be very careful in his supplemental.

• (1140)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I understand that there are certain things which are sub judice and that we have to be careful in this House.

However, in a general sense, I am asking a question about a practice of this government and the direct violation of the charter of rights and liberties where people are having their garbage looked into and their agents, probably because of budget cuts, are inadequately protected.

I would like for the minister, not for the Order Paper, to confer if possible with the Solicitor General and perhaps we can have this thing at least aired out so that my constituent will be able to get some kind of help from the government.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would be very happy to bring the hon. member's comments to the attention of my colleague, the Solicitor General.

CN RAIL

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister who is answering for the Minister of Transport.

CN's own accounting staff has done an examination which shows that CN has the worst productivity of any railroad in North America and on the average has twice as many administrative workers as any railroad in the United States.

Why is the government standing by and allowing branch lines to be cut by CN, when CN is allowing themselves to have such a generous administration staff? Why is the government paying these fat bonuses to CN executives? Why does the government not order CN to stop its privatization and start serving the Canadian people?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is asking a fallacious question. Obviously CN is acting in the best interests of its shareholders and not as has been suggested by the member.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, it seems that the best interests of CN are for the government to pay fat bonuses so they can cut branch rail lines and run the most inefficient railroad in North America to save their own skins.

Why is the government allowing this to happen? Why is the government allowing the CN to run this kind of railroad? Why does the government not say to CN: "Look at your own offices instead of cutting branch lines in Nova Scotia."

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has just stated the obvious.

Canadian National has recognized its inefficiency. Every time Canadian National, on behalf of the shareholders of Canada, takes steps to become more efficient, the members in the opposition say: "Do not do that. We have to keep operating as we were 50 years ago."

What the Canadian National management has recognized is their own inefficiency. It is taking steps to serve the shareholders in a much better manner.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I wish to pose questions on foreign policy positions. In the absence of the Prime Minister and the minister, I will pose them to the Acting Prime Minister.

At the Commonwealth Conference to be held in Zimbabwe next week, continuing sanctions against South Africa's apartheid regime will be a major topic of discussion. In view of the fact that Europe and the United States have dropped economic sanctions against South Africa but black South Africa leaders and front-line states are calling for maintaining economic sanctions, what will the position of Canada be at the Commonwealth Conference?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as my hon. friend is well aware, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been the chair of the group of foreign ministers who have been reviewing these matters.

She will be with the Prime Minister presenting the conclusions of the working group of which she has been the chair and the heads of government will be responding to those recommendations. Out of that will flow a recommendation and a decision.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the situation in Yugoslavia continues to deteriorate as we see the failure of yet another cease-fire.

Guarantees of safe passage and of humanitarian assistance have been sabotaged. For too long we have had no answer to questions about Canada's efforts at the United Nations to deal with the situation.

I ask again today; what proposals is Canada presenting to press the United Nations' response to this critically violent and internationally peace threatening situation in Yugoslavia?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is very much aware of the initiative that was taken by the Prime Minister in seeking the involvement of the United Nations in this crisis because it ceased to become, in our judgment, simply an internal affair but a matter which had international implications.

We are working with representatives in the United Nations. We are working with the European community in trying to put in an international effort there which will involve peacekeeping, which could involve sanctions and, out of that, hopefully maintenance of the cease-fire and the cessation of the loss of life that has arisen from the violence.

I think the position of Canada has been very straightforward, very open and one of leadership in trying to resolve a very, very difficult situation.

METRO TORONTO

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry.

In spite of the deficit and our growing national debt, the government has, quite rightly, found money for our hard pressed farmers.

I would like to ask the minister, however, what the government intends to do for metropolitan Toronto, where the unemployment rate has been in excess of the national average, where recently McDonnell Douglas has announced layoffs of an additional 1,000 employees, de Havilland 1,300 more, Philips another 300, where there are already 127,000 on the unemployment insurance rolls and an additional 65,000 on welfare because their unemployment insurance benefits have run out and there are no jobs available?

The Diefenbaker government provided a program of winter works. What does the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I am not sure that I heard the question, Madam Speaker, but I think I can—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may help the hon. minister. I did interrupt the member asking would he please put his question. The preamble was very, very long and I would like him to put a very specific question.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I think I did put a very specific question quite early. I asked what the government was going to do for metropolitan Toronto in light of all those very difficult economic situations.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think the best thing we can possibly do for the city of metropolitan Toronto, as is the case with economies right across the country, is continue to get interest rates down.

We are starting to see the impact of those lower interest rates in housing starts. For the last five months, housing starts have been over 150,000. They are up substantially from the early months of this year.

We have seen an improvement in automobile sales. That helps the golden horseshoe market with the involvements of General Motors and Ford.

My hon. friend referred to the very difficult situation in de Havilland. We are working very closely with the province of Ontario, with the Boeing Aircraft Company and with others which are interested in the resolution of the ownership situation with de Havilland. It is the uncertainty of that ownership which is troublesome. We are hopeful that with the active involvement of all parties we will be able to resolve that shortly.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, last Friday I put a question to the minister responsible for shipbuilding policy. Quite appropriately, the minister of state for small business answered, because that is what it has become in Ontario and on the Pacific coast.

He has had a week to think about my question. I want to ask the minister what specific assistance will be given to those shipyards in Ontario and in British Columbia who find themselves without either repair work or construction work on a long-term basis?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, if the shipyard owners are restructuring they can make an application for restructuring. There has been a restructuring fund in place for about five of six years and all workers are being treated equally.

At the present time, there are discussions on restructuring of the shipping industry on the west coast. There has been no decision made of any changes in the shipbuilding industry on the Great Lakes at this time, although there may well be an application forwarded to the government.

• (1150)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, the minister should realize that Ontario already has restructured by closing Collingwood, leaving only two yards, one in Thunder Bay, one in St. Catharines. There is not enough repair work on the lakes to sustain two yards. Even the contract that is going to Port Weller will not start for at least one year. They are in difficulty from now until then.

I do not think Canadians want further restructuring, meaning the further closure of yards. They need work. The federal government has the responsibility to ensure that they have access to work. What is this government going to do?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The hon. member's question begs the answer because he says there is not enough work, there is not enough repair work going on in shipping. If there is not enough repair work and enough overhaul work because not enough ships want to go into the shipyards to have this done, we just cannot artificially have the people sitting there waiting and collecting fees. We have got to have the work done.

There is very little shipbuilding going on in this country. The only people who build ships in this country today happen to be the Government of Canada and the provincial governments and ferry boats.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, the Commission of Inquiry on Canadian University Education has reported that there is a need to place greater importance on distance education, on continuing education and on the internationalization of education. It pointed out that there is a need to attract more students from aboriginal backgrounds, students from less affluent families, as well as handicapped Canadians and women. It has also pointed out that there is a need to produce funding to match that provided to U.S. state universities.

My question for the Secretary of State is this. How and when will this government act so that we can regain Canada's competitiveness?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I was quite happy to receive the report of Dr. Stuart Smith earlier this week. As my hon. colleague well knows, my department was very pleased to provide support for the work of the commission.

We are looking at the recommendations very closely. We find that many of those recommendations present an interesting possibility for the government to act. I will be reporting back to the House as soon as that review is completed and that should be very shortly.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, why hasn't the minister used his Student Loans Program to help these people, and I am referring to students on low incomes, women, the disabled and aboriginal people? Why hasn't he done something? When is he going to do something? Could he be more specific?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have already answered the hon. member's question more than once. I have told him on many occasions that the Student Loans Program is already 27 years old, has never been changed and needs a thorough going over.

The hon. member must know that this program is administered jointly with the provinces. Preparations for a thorough revision of this program are well advanced. After discussions with the provinces, in a few months we will be in a position to announce a program that meets the demands of the nineties and the twenty–first century, instead of the sixties.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the same minister. The European Community spends in excess of 30 per cent of the gross domestic product on social programs and education. Here in Canada we only spend 24 per cent of our gross domestic product on education.

My question for the minister is this. When is this government going to start catching up to the rest of the world and when is it going to close the gap?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I do not want to get into a debating match as to how much we spend compared to other countries. On a per capita basis we spend as much or more than any other—

Mr. Andre: As a percentage of GDP, second only to Sweden.

Mr. de Cotret: Absolutely.

Madam Speaker, that is the very purpose of the announcement in the Speech from the Throne, that this government wants to have a new training policy in this country because we are not happy with the results we are getting for the huge amounts of money this country spends on education. That initiative is going along very well.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, we have yet to see that paper. It is somewhere in the bureaucracy, or in the political arena.

I want to indicate to the minister that in the last five years the government has cut $3.2 billion from transfer payments for education and now the government funds will not keep up with inflation.

Why is this government cutting and freezing funding for post-secondary education when 40 per cent of all jobs in the country will require at least 16 years of training by the year 2000? When is this government going to wake up and smell the coffee?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, certainly sooner than the hon. member opposite will wake up and read the statistics. We have been increasing payments to education every year and that is the fact, so I wish he would look at the statistics more closely.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I am glad I got recognized because my question fits into the reform of Parliament where members will be taking next week off and going back to their ridings. It will be very interesting to get the playback from the people in the grassroots as to this question which arises from sort of the Keystone Cops, Gilbert and Sullivan situation we had here for the last two days on the official policy of gays in the military service.

I would like to know from whoever is answering for the government, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister, if we could find out today what the situation is in terms of government policy and the strange situation that there is a press release from the Pentagon quoting the Chief of Staff on this policy. Are the gays officially in or are they out?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as you know there is an interim policy in place and no announcement has been made concerning any changes in the policy of employment of homosexuals in the Canadian forces. Any changes in the current policy will be announced by the Chief of Defence Staff in due course.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer. My supplementary has to do with another rumour affecting the military that I am sure the government House leader is aware of, and if not we will certainly find out so that the people in the grassroots can again respond on things that people in the grassroots understand.

They do not have to have economic dogma on this thing because there is a very current rumour that the Victoria Cross which at the moment is the highest decoration for gallantry against an enemy—it is not a peacetime thing as we all know—will be eliminated through processes within the chancellery as the highest decoration for gallantry in the military force. Could the government House leader give me a statement on that?

In 1988 all peacekeeping forces of other nations got the Nobel peace prize, and since 1988 I understand that our military forces and those involved in peacekeeping are still waiting for a UN peace decoration or medal. Could you give me the answer on that so again grassroots people in the hinterland could give some pressure—

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on the question about the Victoria Cross or what is to be and what will be the highest medal for gallantry while serving in the Armed Forces, I cannot give the hon. member that answer. I will have to get back to him. I know that there is a lot of work going on in terms of ensuring that our service personnel, as they serve frequently under great personal risk in these peacekeeping situations around the world, will have that service adequately recognized by medals.

There have been a number of things done in the recent past, but I cannot on the spur of the moment give the hon. member an up-to-date comment, but I will have the department of defence get in touch with him to inform him.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Today The Toronto Star reported that a refugee board had refused a refugee claim made by an Iranian woman. The woman had been viciously whipped with a wire cable because she was not wearing a veil. The woman later lost her job.

The refugee board's decision makes it clear that they do not consider this a violation of her fundamental human rights.

• (1200)

Instead, they merely called it a crime that the religious laws of that country were being followed. Will the Acting Prime Minister act immediately to ensure that this woman is not deported, and that the refugee panels are immediately instructed to treat human rights violations based on gender seriously?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I can take the hon. member's recommendation as notice, but I would nevertheless like to make it clear that as a government we have a reputation for respecting the rights and freedoms of the individual.

I am sure that when processing this case, we will do everything we can, through our Immigration programs and policies, to ensure that the rights and freedoms of this woman are respected.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby will allow me to give another question to somebody else, as this question has been taken on notice.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, Canadians were certainly pleased to see the job figures today.

However, we have a real concern. Many economists are saying that the numbers of people looking for jobs are going down because so many people are hopeless. They have simply given up hope.

There are 844 people in my riding who received notices this week that they will be laid off permanently, forever, from the Steel Company of Canada.

Given the lay-offs pending at Stelco and the lay-offs announced last week at Consumers' Glass and the potential for a further 900 lay-offs at that company, when will the government bring in a sane dollar policy to allow Canadian companies to start exporting successfully to save Canadian jobs? We are begging the government to bring in a sane monetary policy.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I should say to the hon. member that the other side of the Stelco announcement she refers to is a reduction from approximately 1,800 people being laid off to only 800.

That demonstrates that there are new orders coming into Stelco which have allowed them to reduce that lay-off. Hopefully in a short period of time there will be a further reduction in the number of people laid off.

My hon. friend raises the question of the Canadian dollar. As has been the case in the past, the federal government does not control the level of the Canadian dollar. It does not control it now any more than it controlled it when her seatmate was the Minister of Finance some 10 or 12 years ago.

Mr. Chrétien: It went down.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member is proud of the fact that the Canadian dollar went down during the time he was in office. It went down when he was in office because the people in the international markets had no confidence whatsoever in the policies being followed by the government he was a part of at that time.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the government does control trade policy.

Right now this government is barrelling full steam ahead with the Canada–U.S.–Mexico deal at a time when Consumer's Glass, in my riding, risks the loss of 900 jobs because it is losing orders to Mexico.

When is this minister's government going to introduce some policies to help save the industrial heartland of this country that is bleeding, and bleeding badly?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think it is very clear that what the government has been doing is bringing down interest rates.

It is helping by bringing about the recovery that is under way right now. My hon. friend talks about some job loss. She is ignoring the fact that in Brantford Intercity 300 more jobs were announced by Freightliner.

I was in Windsor yesterday. A number of announcements have been made in recent months by Chrysler, Ford and Southam Press, which has announced a $40,000 expansion in Windsor.

I think the hon. member is doing exactly the disservice to the country of which she is accusing the government. When she only talks doom and gloom, she contributes to the lack of confidence she is concerned about.

If she would have a more balanced approach and talk about the positives as well as the negatives, possibly she would address the problem she is so concerned about.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these Orders in Council stand referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, in the course of the Oral Question Period which we just completed, my very good and hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls, obviously swimming in the current of his own enthusiasm, made a statement that is at variance with the facts.

Canada did vote for the extension of the moratorium of the fish catches at the 3N zone and against the establishment of quotas. I wish the record to show that.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, during Oral Question Period when the member for New Westminster—Burnaby asked a question, the minister said she would take it under advisement.

Unfortunately, because you decided that was a reason for her not being allowed a supplementary, there was more information that the member did not have a chance to indicate.

For example, the woman is going to be deported this coming Wednesday and it requires urgent action. Had she been allowed to ask that second question, the minister would be in a better position to act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do take the representation from the hon. member very seriously. I can assure him it was not a question of not wanting the hon. member to add to the information. I am sure the minister is still around and she will be able to do it.

I was trying to allow as many people as possible to ask questions. I am actually quite proud that we did have 30 questions today during our 45 minutes of oral questions. So I think it is an improvement on many days.

I do apologize to the hon. member and I am sure that someone on my right will make sure that further information that should and could be helpful will reach the minister as soon as possible. I do apologize. It was not a question of cutting the hon. member off in any way.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of Legislative Committee H on Bill C–17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, with amendments.

Madam Speaker, as you well know, this bill once again opened up for debate by our fellow Canadians the balance between our right to own and use firearms and our right to security. I want to assure you, Madam Speaker, that the members of Parliament serving on this committee from the three parties and one independent, worked long and hard on this bill and that the amendments truly reflect the evidence which we heard.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-313, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (engine development and exportation of atomic energy materials and equipment).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

• (1210)

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, there are many concerns about the use of nuclear energy in this country as there are in other countries as well. There are also concerns about the sale of nuclear materials and equipment to foreign countries.

The purpose of this bill is to generate debate on the issue and to have an investigation by this House of our nuclear industry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harvard moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-314, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (disability pension).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this particular bill is to bring more fairness to our income tax system. Under our current law, workers' compensation benefits are exempt from income tax while pension benefits are taxable. This bill addresses this inequity.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harvard moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to introduce a petition signed by Canadians from all across the land who are calling on the government to set up, or to establish, national education standards in consultation with national institutions, the provincial governments, educational professionals, industry and labour, parents, youths, volunteer organizations and individual Canadians.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition signed by residents of my riding of Hamilton Mountain and from various parts of Ontario: Pickering, Toronto, Kitchener and Oakville.

These petitioners are supporting the parents of Nina De Villiers in their request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1992 and the Parole Act accordingly.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of Canadians, in conformity with the rules and regulations of the House of Commons. It is being presented as a protest against the government's policies on education.

These individuals point out that the government talks about globalization, competitiveness and productivity. Yet, at the same time, it cut the transfers to the provinces for education this year by almost $500 million and imposed taxes such as the goods and services tax on student services. These petitioners are very angry at the 3 per cent administrative tax on student loans, the one where one has to pay cash before getting the loan.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—SMALL BUSINESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mills (p. 3627).

Madam Deputy Speaker: At eleven o'clock there were two minutes left for the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. After this we will go to the period of questions or comments.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, in a quick two minutes, let me say in summary that this government has failed the country because it has not dealt successfully with the human tragedy of unemployment. It has not created the kind of fairness in our tax system which should characterize this country and it has not given us the balanced and fair growth across Canada which would be the basis on which we could build a unified country.

It has also been an irresponsible government in the extreme so far as its financial affairs are concerned. In a period of seven years this government has more than doubled the national debt of this country. It has done so through tax giveaways to large corporations, and to rich and powerful individuals. It has not done so in a way that has helped the country. It has instead acted out its irresponsibility in such a way that our hands have been tied so far as responding to the seriousness of the recession which we have been experiencing as a country.

In short, Madam Speaker, I think this government deserves nothing but shame as it stands before the House of Commons to try to defend its policies.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member a question. He is speaking on a motion that has to do with small business and I heard almost nothing about small business in his whole presentation, except when he made reference to the GST. Over the whole length of last year, when the GST was before the House, he quoted continually John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. John Bulloch just a few weeks ago had something to say about the member's party in office in Queen's Park, and I would like to have his response to this.

John Bulloch said about the NDP government in Ontario: "They are very ideological, naive, and quite incompetent". He said: "Out of a survey that was taken, 36 per cent of respondents are considering moving some or all of their operations out of the province". The problem, said Bulloch, was taxes, the recent Ontario budget, the provincial government's apparent bias against business and proposals to change provincial labour laws that would make it easier for the union to organize.

"Consulting this government", said Mr. Bulloch, "is like consulting a tree; I don't even think they understand what you are saying. There isn't anybody here who has even run a lemonade stand".

I would like to ask the hon. member: Is there anyone on his side who has run a lemonade stand?

Mr. Langdon: I am not certain, Madam Speaker, if any person on this side, or on that side for that matter, has worked their way through university by running a lemonade stand. But it would seem to me that the issue might have more to do with running important institutions and balancing budgets, which many of us on this side of the House have done.

I did want to say something about the study that the minister referred to because we had some very interesting conversation about this in the finance committee just yesterday, or possibly the day before. It turns out that the interesting statistic is that the CFIB distributed over 40,000 copies of its survey. Over 30,000 businesses in Ontario, small businesses that are part of CFIB, felt that this was so irrelevant that they did not even bother answering it. So, the 36 per cent that the minister quotes is 36 per cent of the very small number of companies that felt strongly enough about the issue to send the report back. This was not a sample survey or anything scientific. In fact, it would seem to me that if three-quarters of the small businesses in Ontario do not feel the need to send back something critical of the budget, that is actually a reasonably good record for the province of Ontario.

Mr. Hockin: You quote them on the GST. Continue serving on the GST.

Mr. Langdon: The minister suggests I quote them on the GST. On the GST they are talking about the impact of the GST with respect to small business. They know a great deal about that.

It seems to me that the minister should have spent a great deal more time listening to the CFIB and to other small business groups across the country. The GST would not have had the negative impact it had on the tourist sector, which he was forced to admit this morning during his news conference.

He has mentioned that there are proposals for improvements in labour laws in the province of Ontario. I am very proud of those proposals for changing labour laws. I think that labour peace can be achieved, as it has been achieved in the province in Quebec, much better by saying when there is a strike that takes place, strike-breaking should not occur.

I would be interested if the minister is going to stand up and speak in favour of strike-breaking. I would hope not.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the NDP in this House almost constantly. They stand up and they criticize and they criticize. They are great knockers. They are "anti" just about everything. They are members of the coalition of "antis". But I have never heard one idea, one suggestion, one recommendation from the hon. member as to what we in this House could do to try and improve the spirit, the morale and the confidence that does not exist within the 900,000 entrepreneurs of this country.

I get a little nervous when I do not hear any ideas from the NDP. I was just reading a report card here. It is called The Interim Report Card on the Policies of the Government of Ontario in the First Eight Months. It has been put out by a rather right-wing organization, I must confess, the Fraser Institute—

An hon. member: I thought they were left.

Mr. Hockin: Objective.

An hon. member: Did you say Tory?

Mr. Mills: Parts of it are objective. But the point is that the NDP always talk a good game. Here is an instance where they got into power in the province of Ontario, and they are causing such fear and such a loss of confidence that this is exacerbating the lack of confidence problem that exists in this country.

My question is quite specific to the hon. member. What would he do, what specifics would he put forward to the government, if he had the challenge of operating this government?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, in commenting on the opposition day motion which the Liberal member has put forward, it did not seem to me to be my role to attempt to steal his thunder in putting his suggestions forward, but instead to make an evaluation of the government.

I certainly will send to the member for Broadview—Greenwood the 22-page document on economic recovery in this economy which our caucus issued this summer. It is full of detailed suggestions, and quite a few new ideas which he may even find useful to incorporate in a future motion.

With respect to the Fraser Institute study, I think that as the ammunition is shot from both sides of the ideological debate, as we get the CFIB or the Fraser Institute taking pot-shots, as we get parts of the labour movement taking pot-shots from the other side, it is important to look at the objective evidence. The objective evidence before us today shows quite dramatically that the rest of the country has remained about stagnant in terms of reducing unemployment, while in the province of Ontario there was the greatest decrease of unemployment in any region of this country, from 9.9 to 9.2 per cent. That means 40,000 fewer people are unemployed.

Again, there is a mistake in the member's suggestion that those on welfare are not counted. This is a sample survey. It includes people who are on welfare. It includes people who are on UI. It includes people who are on neither. It is a full sample so it gives us a clear picture of what has happened to unemployment. That clear picture shows that in one province, which is headed by the single New Democrat government in this country, there is marked progress in reducing unemployment.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the opposition for bringing forth a motion that at least parenthetically deals with small business. This House has not had much of an opportunity under the aegis of opposition days to debate small business and recognize the importance that entrepreneurs play in the life of our country and the creation of jobs in Canada.

Eighty-three per cent of all jobs created in Canada since 1984 have been created by small business.

I guess the opposition does not use its days for this because the NDP and the Liberals are generally not too interested in the private sector. They are more interested in the public sector.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: So I do commend my hon. friend on the Liberal side for bringing forward this motion. It dwells primarily on macro-economic matters, on the high dollar and on interest rates. I would like to say a word about that before giving a more systematic recital of what has been happening in terms of government leadership for small business in Canada.

There is an alternative to what we are doing as a government. The clearest alternative is to do what this motion suggests. This motion suggests that we devalue the dollar to, let's say, 81 cents and let interest rates rise. That is the alternative.

There was a real-world alternative when that happened. That was in 1981. The dollar was worth 81 cents. The hon. member does not like me reminding the House of this, but this is reality. This actually happened. I had mortgages on my homes. Everyone in this House probably had debts they had to pay.

In 1981 exactly what this motion asks happened, interest rates were allowed to go up. Ten years ago today interest rates were 20 per cent. They also want the dollar to go down to 81 cents. That also existed 10 years ago.

What happened 10 years ago? Over 360,000 manufacturing jobs were lost during the period from 1981 to 1982, over twice as many as we have suffered in this recent recession. Second, there was a haemorrhage of spending which has saddled us with a debt which will take us decades to eliminate.

That is the alternative and that is what this motion is asking us to return to. I do not think that any Canadians sitting here in the gallery or watching this debate want to return to 1981-82. The motion invites us to do that.

Let me go from there and start talking about small business more specifically. Let me begin with a little story. I was invited to speak to the 500 fastest growing companies in the United States. Before I spoke there was a breakfast speaker. He was an evangelical speaker who was talking about the loneliness of being an entrepreneur in the United States.

In his speech he developed the theme of how lonely it is to be an entrepreneur, and indeed it is in all countries. In the American context it seemed especially true. He said: "You know, when business is bad, when competition is getting better, you are finding that you can't survive as well from week to week. It looks like you are not bringing so much home to your family as you would like each week. When you tell your spouse that things are going from bad to worse, that you have moved from the fast lane to the oncoming lane", as he called it. He went on to develop this theme of loneliness for the entrepreneur. He said: "We entrepreneurs sleep like babies. We wake up every three hours and cry". He developed this theme of loneliness.

I sat there as a Canadian minister. I thought that maybe in the United States entrepreneurs are completely lonely. In any country those who invest their resources and take risks ultimately are responsible. However we in Canada have done a number of things to help the entrepreneur and make him or her less lonely, especially in the regions of this country. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor mentioned the regional imbalances in Canada. We have put in place a number of programs to make entrepreneurs, especially in disadvantaged regions, less lonely and to help them.

We have done it with a different philosophy than that which preceded us. What preceded us was an indiscriminate throwing of money at everything, from painting churches to building lemonade stands to Lord knows what. The Trudeau government, through a bunch of programs—PIP, ZIP and DIP and all these different programs—indiscriminately threw money at businesses whether they needed it or not.

We have tried to bring a Conservative philosophy to the promotion of small business. We have said that we will continue with our programs through the regional agencies to help agencies help entrepreneurs. We will continue with our very powerfully effective program for natives. Over 1,000 small businesses have been created on and off reserves through our programs. However we will do it differently than the Liberals did it, and certainly the NDP has done it when it has been able to govern a province.

The different way is this. We will give loans but we will not give outright grants. At $100,000 or below we still have some outright grants. Above that figure, we help businesses through loans. We also suggest when making loans that there be substantial equity participation by the owners. As a result, we have a series of programs with a Conservative philosophy which have helped bring dynamism to the regions of this country which have not experienced it before.

Madam Speaker, Canadian small businesses do not want any hand-holding, not by the federal government or any other level of government. That is why the business community has said quite clearly: Stop intervening on the market and stop giving subsidies or grants to business. That is exactly what we have done, Madam Speaker.

At the behest of the Leader of the Government in the House, and ever since the Finance Minister's Budget was brought down, we have practically eliminated subsidies and grants, introducing repayable loans instead.That is what we have done. We now have programs that provide an incentive for entrepreneurs to modernize and start new companies, but we also ask entrepreneurs to invest. That is our philosophy.

[English]

Let me just go through some of the programs we are now putting into the marketplace to help the entrepreneur in this uniquely Conservative way. I just came back from northern Ontario, where I was for the last two days. We have a program in northern Ontario called FEDNOR. It was initiated in 1987. Over 436 small businesses have been helped right across northern Ontario. This program is sprinkled right from one end of northern Ontario to the other, from Kenora all the way over to Kirkland Lake.

These projects that we have approved have been very successful. We have had almost no failures, even in the past year when the economy has turned down. The dollars spent through FEDNOR are $36 million, but it has levered two or three times more money than that from the private sector and as of yesterday we announced that 3,002 jobs have been created or maintained as a result of FEDNOR in northern Ontario. I am very proud of that program.

We do not hear enough about northern Ontario here in this House, but northern Ontario is unique in Canada in the sense that it has a tremendous tradition of hard working people, people who quite frankly moonlight, who often have one or two or three jobs and work hard. It is a region of Canada where three cultures get along very well: the French speaking culture, the English speaking culture and the native culture. It has an ethic of working hard. This program helps to continue that.

Yesterday, at the Northern Ontario Business Awards meeting, I was struck by the fact that the award winners were all high-tech companies, high-tech operations moving into northern Ontario.

I was in Scarborough two weeks ago and some company presidents were saying that they were getting letters from American governors asking them to take a look at Tennessee or take a look at Nebraska and saying: "Come on down here because real estate is so much cheaper". Let me tell the House that real estate is not only cheaper in northern Ontario than it is in Nebraska or Tennessee, but we have a hard working work force, we have a tremendous educational system supporting it, and one of the best transportation systems in the world.

Northern Ontario has seen a remarkable turnaround. It is a checkerboard. There are black patches of real problems in northern Ontario, but there are some wonderful success stories too and FEDNOR is helping with that.

Another federal program, of course, is the Small Business Loans Act. It started in 1961 under the Diefenbaker government, which is typical of a Conservative government. What we want to do is put in place a kind of small business assistance scheme that does not give money away, but simply helps guarantee loans. It has provided almost $8 billion in assistance.

If you started in Toronto, for example, right at the lake and looked at small businesses right along Yonge Street, you would probably go all the way to Richmond Hill with $8 billion worth of businesses. That is what this program has done and its term loan assistance up to $100,000. Most of the loans go into construction, communications, retail, manufacturing, wholesale and so on.

I have to say that as minister of small businesses I have been unhappy with the performance of this act though in the past year. The banks are not telling people about it, the banks are not using it, and it has to be changed and approved. It has had a tremendous history for 30 years, but it is now at the stage where the banks are not using it. I am not only meeting with them, but with the new financial institutions reform I had the responsibility to help put together we are going to be having unlimited commercial lending by trust companies, by insurance companies and by credit unions. They will be in play now and we have go to put an SBLA together that encourages them to use it.

Something that banks do not like, which I would like to ask the House for advice on, is software; the banks will give you a loan if you have assets, bricks and mortar backing it up; but if you ask for a loan for software so that you can improve your handling of accounts payable or anything like that, the banks are often very wary of doing that. Perhaps the SBLA could move into that field and help there. We are looking at that.

Another federal government program, one which I am particularly proud of and it gets almost no attention here, is the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Program. Actually all members of the House have been quite co-operative on this because they want to see this succeed. We have had over 1,000 native businesses started or maintained as a result of this program. We have had over 4,000 jobs created or maintained through this program.

One of the best kept secrets in Canada is that the native population in Canada—I am talking Inuit, Métis, status and non-status—is becoming more entrepreneurial. They want to be wealth producing. This program, to which I made some important changes two years ago, allows some joint ventures with non-natives. It also allows consulting help so that they can pull together good business plans. I am very proud of this program. It has done very well.

Something that this program has created as well is something called aboriginal capital corporations. We would fund a native group in the amount of $5 million and would say: "You put this in the bank and it earns interest. You lend it out. You have your own board of directors. You get paid back, and just keep recycling the money year after year after year". We have 31 aboriginal capital corporations that are working very well. The last time I looked their failure rate, their arrears rate, is no higher than the Royal Bank's. It is a very good success story.

The third program I did want to mention to which the federal government is very dedicated is this whole series of services through the Federal Business Development Bank. The Federal Business Development Bank is not exactly a bank of last resort, but it is there when you go to your banker and the banker says "no, I don't think I can deal with it; I want you to go to the Federal Business Development Bank".

I think we have 77 branches of this bank now across Canada, specializing in the smaller towns and in the outlying areas. That is really where its focus is because often the big banks do not deal with that area very well. It has done well. It has also moved into consulting in a major way; the whole CASE program, giving small business seminars, giving advice on how to start and maintain a business. But more important it is moving into something called venture capital.

I think we all know that most small businesses today do not need any more debt on their balance sheets; what they need is some subordinated data and some equity, and the vencap program is an attempt to see if we can get some mezzanine financing, some subordinated debt to help the various businesses. That program is new and I look forward to discussing it with members in committee. But it is something that I kind of like to publicize because not enough people know about it.

Then of course we have the programs through our regional development agencies, the Western Diversification and Atlantic Canada. All of these programs are out there where we are helping small business.

In addition to that, since I have been minister, I do want to remind the House of a number of things that we have done. We have established a National Entrepreneurship Development Institute. This is an important institute, to pull together people who care about entrepreneurship in this country. They are people who often do not talk to each other. They are university professors, they are public servants who work in provincial governments, and also for municipal governments, they are teachers, people who teach entrepreneurship in high schools. We pull them together, hold important conferences, material is developed, and we now have a program developed for teaching entrepreneurship in high schools.

So that in grade 10 or grade 11 there is now a module being put together complete with videos where young people can think, "what would it be like to become a chairman Mills and own my own business? What would it be like? How would I go about doing it?" This entrepreneurship program is spreading right across the country.

Do you know what I find, Madam Speaker? This program, through some other programs where we have assisted young people, has moved so-called government towns—and I think of Regina, I think of Charlottetown which I always thought of as primarily government towns and Ottawa, primarily a government town—into a very thriving entrepreneurial culture. The biggest junior achievement in Canada, I think, is in Regina, of all places. Charlottetown has the second biggest. Twenty years ago 50 per cent of Ottawa was the Government of Canada and today only 27 per cent of the economy of Ottawa is the Government of Canada. The rest is private enterprise and other things.

So we are getting a much more entrepreneurial Canada. We are trying to help that through NEDI, also through the business opportunities system which is something that I cannot explain in the House right now but it is something that we pay for as a government. We encourage small businesses to come in; we will tell them where their markets are; we will tell them where customers are, not only in Canada but around the world. And then again, we are trying very hard to get the small business community in Canada to think of exporting.

I do not think we are as great an exporting country as we should be. I know we are the fifth biggest exporter, or whatever we are, but usually that is big stuff like wheat and automobiles. Our small businesses are not very export oriented. We are trying to change that. The NEDS program have had over 150 missions already to the United States and will literally take you by the hand. Let us say you are a small textile manufacturer, or let's say you are a small machine shop and you want to expand. We will introduce you to 13 customers in Toledo, Ohio if that is where you want to find them, and we will show you how to do customs and bring you home. This program, has worked very well. Also NEXUS, which is oriented for southern United States does the same; and then Going Global, which is broader, takes us into Europe and the Pacific Rim.

We have student business counselling as well. We have the CASE counselling and we have the Canadian Jobs Strategy, and so on and so on.

But over all, Madam Speaker, no political party has the total answer for helping small business.

What every political party owes the people of Canada is a recognition that this is where the jobs are being created. I spoke to the Empire Club three weeks ago and I said the following with the Premier of Ontario in mind.

I said: "Premier Rae, I read a statement from you the other day where you said that those who care passionately about social justice and those who care about the creation of wealth are both important. You cannot have the one without the other." Those are good words. "However, a thriving small business community is essential if we are ever going to pay for all the social programs. I invite the NDP in Ontario to start to address itself to the creation of entrepreneurs because that is where the jobs have been created, that is where the jobs will be created and we, as a federal government, stand to help not only in Ontario but right across the country".

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I cannot help but raise a couple of issues that the minister mentioned.

Before saying that, I want to congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. The motion is timely in view of Small Business Week that we will be concentrating on. I think there is a difference of opinion whether it will be next week or the week after, considering some of the notices that I have had. However, I do think it is timely that we debate it, because small businesses in Canada are definitely suffering and are definitely losing each day to the perils of the conditions that exist today.

The minister in his speech referred back to 1982. I just happen to have the submission of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business to the committee studying bankruptcy dated September 11, 1991.

I want to read into the record what they thought when they were giving a submission in the context of this debate. I read: "The 1980s provided a roller coaster of economic conditions for business in Canada. The country experienced a recession in 1982, the likes of which had not been seen for many years."

I add on that note, a recession that was international. Continuing on that: "Recovery from that recession was uneven with some regions of the country taking years to climb out of the abyss. More recently, the current recession has been even more severe and recovery experts agree will be much slower and more painful than in 1982. Businesses are reeling from a myriad of pressures, high interest rates, high inflation, structural adjustment, tax increases, the GST, the recession, constitutional uncertainty and most recently Public Service labour disputes. The latest survey of small business expectations shows that small business views the worst of the recession is over but is extremely cautious regarding future investment in employment."

Those are conditions that exist today because of this government. They went on to say: "Beyond the dramatic effects of the economy, independent business is telling us and the minister"—I hope he is listening—"that they are taxed to death. Tax reform has amounted to a cruel hoax for small business who have witnessed the total tax take and compliance costs imposed by governments at all levels continue to escalate."

They went on to say: "In a poll of CFIB members taken between January and July of 1991, 73 per cent indicated that the total tax burden,"—I heard it all summer—"is a significant problem for their business. Seventy per cent point to government regulation and paper burden as significant."

I ask the minister: How do you get off criticizing others 10 years ago when people are saying it is now that there are high taxes, high interest rates, high Canadian dollars and we are not able to produce and export our products? I had a company the other day, the Tin Mine in Yarmouth contact me. The president wrote to me and said it was not the workers. They were doing a good job so do not tell me they had lost their competitiveness in the labour force. It was because of the tin market, the price in the world tin market, and that is dealt by a world council, and "the high Canadian dollar" that they had to close.

I ask the minister how he could put blame anywhere else but on his own government policies which I have just enumerated.

Mr. Hockin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the intervention and the questions and I am very happy to answer them.

First of all I have to remind the hon. member that in 1987 the federal government brought in corporate tax reform. One of the reasons we brought it in as a lead-up to the free trade agreement with the United States was that we wanted to make sure that our corporate tax structure was not too much out of line with our neighbours. So we reduced corporate taxes. This was for big corporations—fought, by the way, by the NDP and the Liberals—but we reduced corporate taxes.

In the province of Ontario, six months later, the Peterson Liberal government filled up the tax room that we had cut.

Yes, it was a cruel hoax, Madam Speaker, it was a cruel hoax because we cut the taxes and the provincial Liberals filled up the room left with more taxes.

Second, the individual corporate tax rate for small businesses in Canada at the corporate level is the lowest in the industrialized world. It is 12.8 per cent. That is the effective tax rate when you have a profit of $200,000 or less in Canada. You are in the best federal tax position of any country in the world. We have maintained that and we continue to do that.

Third, when you take a look at the over-all tax burden of business, and I agree with the hon. member that small business has had it up to here with taxes. They have had enough of taxes. But look where the taxes come from.

If you would see the survey on our border communities, most retailers find that 52 per cent of their tax burden is municipal. It is municipal taxes. When you have American governors write you a letter and invite you to establish your plant in their state, they are usually talking about some municipal tax break.

Municipal taxes are a major part of this. Provincial taxes as I have just explained—and by the way it was amazing when the provincial governments of Liberal stripe moved in and increased corporate taxes nobody over there complained. Now they stand up and complain about taxes.

Then there is the GST. The GST is a very interesting tax because it replaces the manufacturing sales tax. The manufactured—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: —see, they are going to shout so I cannot complete this answer.

The manufacturing sales tax was 13 per cent. We removed that and brought in the GST at 7 per cent which, in effect, is zero per cent on businesses because when you pay the GST as a business you get it all back at the end of the month. Therefore the effective rate is zero. So we removed a 13 per cent manufacturing sales tax and put in its place not a 7 per cent tax, but a zero per cent tax after the input tax credit. That is what we have done to decrease the burden on small business.

I agree with Mr. Bulloch that the burden of tax on small business is heavy but the federal government has been decreasing it, not increasing it. It is the other levels of government that have to answer to him.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I would first like to say to the minister that I think that is one of the most constructive speeches that I have heard a minister make in response to an opposition motion and I for one want to congratulate him on it.

I also think that some of the programs that he listed are important innovative programs which his government has put in place.

I want to make a brief comment with respect to his final parting shot about the Ontario New Democratic Party because I think we would both agree that the government of Ontario has taken important steps in the last two or three months to really reach out to the business community, to establish dialogue with the them and to try to move back from actions which were seen as provocations, including the move to establish publicly–owned auto insurance.

However I want to ask a question if I could as well as make these laudatory comments which I am sure will leave the minister in shock. Is the minister and his government prepared to do what has been so important to the small business community in the United States and establish a regime of small business set asides with respect to government purchases?

As the minister knows, these set asides are exempt even under the free trade deal on the United States side. Surely we should establish similar set asides for our small business community so that they do not operate at a disadvantage with the U.S. small businesses on their side of the border.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is one minute left for the hon. minister.

Mr. Hockin: I am sorry about that, Madam Speaker, because I would like to respond at some length.

It is an interesting proposal. It is true that you get a better shot at government contracts in the United States if you are a small business or if you are a minority. They have minority set asides also.

I am wondering whether we, in Canada, should not do the same. The only problem is we want to be competitive. If we burden government with more expensive goods and services because we are not taking the lowest bidder, then we are less competitive and taxes go up.

We are going to look at that. There is something in what the hon. member says. I know regional agencies have tried to make sure that we get small businesses reflected in government contracts. We have tried it through the defence department as well. We will look at it, but there is this other side, which is if you burden the federal government's full purchasing mechanism with the inefficient bidder rather than the lowest bidder, it could be that taxes will probably have to go up to pay for it. I do not know whether we want to do that.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I merely want to indicate that my colleagues would like to avail themselves of the opportunity to share the 20–minute time slots for the rest of the day into two equal 10–minute slots so that more members can be accommodated on this important topic.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I would first want to commend the minister for speaking on this motion and on a number of points that he has made.

I was disappointed however that he should in fact resort to some pettiness when he suggested that the Liberals were not interested in the private sector. That kind of commentary is not at all necessary. Look at the Liberal governments in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Quebec and at previous Liberal governments. There was a significant interest.

His reference as well to the setting up of lemonade stands in order to create employment really does not become a minister of the Crown. His comment too about throwing away money is somewhat verging on the irresponsible.

I would like to mention as well that my colleague from the NDP was rather cute about some of his comments when he referred to the Liberals' old policies not producing results. There is nothing "old" about our policies. In fact, I would be quite prepared to compare our Liberal policies in Ontario with the current social democrats' policies today to see who would win greater favour with the business sector. I find that unbecoming, and I think that is one of the reasons why we have difficulties in this particular House.

Would the member care to repeat his comment so that I could respond to it, or is he going to stoop to the kind of pettiness that we have just heard too?

Mr. Dorin: I'm waiting my turn.

Mr. Duhamel: Good, good.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is Friday afternoon. We have an important debate. It does not have to get acrimonious. I will recognize members one after the other. If heckling starts, it sometimes goes further than all of us had expected it to go and nothing good is done for the people of Canada. I would really appreciate it if we could spend this afternoon in a fruitful, friendly manner.

Mr. Duhamel: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

We recognize that about 80 per cent of the jobs created between 1978 and 1987 were created by small and medium-sized business. We find that it is a very dynamic sector for the country and creates jobs for Canadians. We also recognize that small and medium-sized businesses contribute to the quality of life in Canada, and I think that is often forgotten. Unfortunately, there is sometimes this negative attitude, this idea that business is insensitive to people, to the environment, etc.Of course, some businesses are not as sensitive as they should be, but in general, there are still people, men and women, who make an extremely important contribution to our quality of life in Canada.

I would also mention that I recently conducted a survey of small and medium-sized businesses in my riding.

• (1300)

I wanted to know from my own constituents, those men and women who run small and medium sized businesses, what they felt were government policies which were of assistance to them and which they felt were not terribly useful or in fact created certain barriers. I want to quote from that summary.

With respect to government as an aid to business, 6 per cent indicated that the export and trade shows were useful, that the local enterprise group was also of benefit to them, and that government grants—6 per cent again—could be particularly helpful depending upon how they were administered.

With regard to the government as a detriment to business, this is what was reported. The goods and services tax was felt by 54 per cent of the people to be a real impediment to their growth, to their vitality. They felt that the property and business taxes were not at all useful, that they were in fact detrimental in a significant kind of way. Many referred to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, 18 per cent, and there was a reference by 12 per cent of the respondents to the government requiring paperwork, a reference to interest rates, to unnecessary government regulations and to government competing with business. Some 9 per cent of the people felt that those got in the way of building the kind of climate, the kind of atmosphere, that could contribute to growth in their sector.

I want to bring to the attention of this House the following points. In a number of recent surveys here are some of the problems that have been identified by people in those sectors, in addition to the ones to which I referred, as to what lies in the way of future growth.

Small business confidence is low in this country at the present time. In 1991 it was pointed out that 78 per cent would probably see their businesses weakened as a result of what is happening; that many of those businesses, the large majority, were bracing for a deterioration of the business climate; that 55 per cent of the businesses would be spending less; that there would be cutbacks; and that those cutbacks would exceed new hirings.

There was an economic outlook survey undertaken showing that small and medium sized businesses have slid in terms of confidence since 1985. It is not the Liberal Party or the NDP Government of the Province of Ontario that says this. It is, I hope, an objective survey which suggests that all these results called into question the appropriateness of government policies. They refer of course to the high interest and high dollar policies of this government, including the many taxation increases, well over 30 since they have come into power, and to the goods and services tax.

Many people who own small businesses in my constituency have called me and talked to me, come to visit me and talked about cross-border shopping, how detrimental it is to their businesses. They referred to the high dollar and high interest policies. They know a great deal about them and how detrimental and how heartbreaking they can be.

Of course I have mentioned the goods and services tax. It is not only the notion of the tax. It is the paperwork. It is the additional infrastructure that they require in order to make it work.

I have not yet had a chance to talk about the bankruptcies that are on the increase. I would like to refer to a recent survey in Ontario where there were over 3,500 respondents. I think it points out to a number of real concerns that we should have as members, that over one-third of those people who responded are thinking of moving out of Ontario, either their whole operation or part of it.

That put into risk roughly 500,000 jobs. Some 63 per cent of those who responded in this particular survey indicated that they were going to decrease their hiring; 57 per cent had cut or intended to cut capital investments; and most of those who responded were thinking of going to the U.S. as an alternative. I find those trends, as well as the trends in terms of lack of confidence, lack of hope, rather disturbing.

What can be done? I think the motion points out that there is a need for more capital for certain businesses, particularly those which are getting started; that there is a need for less red tape; that we really have to be particularly sensitive to the increases in taxation because these men and women are directly affected by it; that there is a need for less paperwork; that we must remove unnecessary government regulations; and that the government must not be competing with the private sector when the private sector can develop that service at a reasonable cost to Canadians.

Those are things that can in fact be done. Some of those have been attempted by the government. In fact there have been successes in certain areas, but I would argue that much more needs to be done, particularly with respect to the cutting of the red tape, the paperwork and making more capital available.

I just want to point out, as I near the end of my address, that we as parliamentarians have a golden opportunity with Small Business Week coming up. We could point out that the small business sector is potentially a high growth area; that the small business sector is creating a number of interesting, challenging jobs for Canadians and if properly supported could do a lot more; that small business is indeed extremely rewarding because it brings a personal sense of satisfaction; and that small business contributes to innovations in our society and that is extremely important. We should also be pointing out that small business is really rather resilient when there are economic downturns.

I am particularly pleased to know that there is increased participation by women in small business; that technological change has accelerated and being integrated; and that there is a recognition that skilled people are an extremely precious commodity.

I have one final point. Small business is becoming increasingly integrated into the global economy. I see that as very positive.

[Translation]

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that we will soon have a wonderful opportunity to celebrate small and medium-sized business, during the week of the 20th to 26th.

[English]

Entrepreneurship really is a very precious resource, a renewable resource, and we should celebrate that.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for participating in this debate today. I would like to get his opinion on something quite specific.

The minister responsible for entrepreneurship and tourism in this country spoke earlier. I too want to commend him for what I felt was a solid address on the state of affairs of entrepreneurship in this country.

One of the things that he did mention in his speech was the programs and services available to small business to help entrepreneurs. For example, he mentioned the Small Businesses Loans Act which is an insurance policy for bankers who give loans up to $100,000 for small business.

My experience with the bank managers I have talked to is that nine out of ten do not even know that that policy exists. My own brother is a bank manager with the Royal Bank. I asked him about it and he did not know anything about it. In fact his supervisor did not know about it. This was about a year ago. I was quite amazed.

The second thing is that the Federal Business Development Bank has a training program or assistance program, a small enterprise program where it takes semi-retired or retired executives to help small business work out business plans, et cetera. It has a match making exercise where it matches the investor with the entrepreneur who is looking for help.

My question to my colleague is: Does he not think that the communications support from the minister's department probably needs added strength so that rather than hiding these services under a bushel basket and only making them available to larger corporations that can afford government relations people and lobbyists the Government of Canada should communicate these policies, especially since our entrepreneurs, the 900,000 of them, are in such desperate need in the country today?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his question. Yes, he raises an extremely important point. As I indicated, and as he and other members have as well, there are some laudable programs out there, but one of the unfortunate realities is that those programs are not reaching many of those 900,000 entrepreneurs to whom he has referred. That is unfortunate because there have been literally millions of dollars spent to promote those, yet probably the majority of people do not know anything about them.

When I met with the business people to whom I referred previously, business people from my constituency, they indicated that it was extremely difficult to get information from government. They felt that there were a lot of programs out there that could in fact have assisted them, but it was virtually impossible to get that information.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): It is very important to note, Mr. Speaker, that in the House today we are discussing something which is very important, the backbone of Canada, the backbone of the Canadian economy. When we look at both sides of the House we see that the Liberals on this side are very interested. When we look at the other side we can only count a handful of members, maybe two or three at the most.

It is very important that we realize that our country's economy depends on the small business.

I had the opportunity to visit my colleague's great city and great province out west. I saw there that entrepreneurship, the little engine that we call small businesses is, working. My question to my colleague is: In his province has the GST and that way that this government has brought it about hurt? Yes or no.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. Yes, it has.

I have received calls. I have received visits. I even circulated a survey. I note my colleague has just joined us. I want to make sure that he understands this. I circulated a survey to the business people in my constituency asking them which programs were a help to them; which programs from government, I wanted to be fair; and which programs were not of assistance. The one that received the largest negative response was in fact the goods and services tax. Not only were they annoyed at the tax but really the implementation of it, the red tape, the government bureaucracy, the inconsistencies, the contradictions. They felt it was a massive negative blow they had to accept which did not help them at all. In fact it pushed them back.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my colleague, the member for Broadview—Greenwood, for bringing forth this motion today.

It goes without saying that the small business person in Canada has since the inception of our country provided the great bulk of jobs for our Canadian citizens.

Today in this debate, if I may, I want to deal with three aspects of the problems which this government has created by its monetary and fiscal policies. I want to deal with a topic that another colleague raised just before, the effect of the GST on small businesses and on consumers.

Second, I would like to address the debacle of bankruptcies to small businesses in this country.

Third, because I am the critic for youth in the shadow cabinet of the Liberal Party I want to discuss the effect of the clawback clause on child benefits as it comes under the scope of the buying power of the people of Canada.

First, the goods and services tax. We ask ourselves, why was sales tax reform necessary? For many years, corporations have been asking the government to reduce their taxes. So this Conservative government, with a 7 per cent GST, will remove about $4.6 billion in sales taxes from corporations and transfer those taxes directly to average Canadians. Under the GST, virtually all Canadians will pay more taxes and corporations will pay less. That is a given; that is a fact.

For people here in this House and in the gallery today and those watching us on television, I am sure all of us are aware that you and I and all of us pay federal sales taxes today. Starting in January 1991, you paid a lot more federal sales tax with the GST. Canadians pay about $700 a year in federal taxes today. With the GST, Canadian families on average will be paying $400 a year more under the GST than they had been paying before.

Most purchases of goods and services will be taxed by the new GST from here on in and consumers will have to pay federal sales taxes on purchases of many items for which they have not directly paid federal sales tax before.

The question was asked before, does the GST hurt people in Winnipeg? The answer was very forthcoming. Yes, it will affect people all over Canada and it will hurt Canadians. Many economists predict that the GST will push Canada into a further economic recession instead of having us fight our way out. Canadians face higher prices, higher inflation and higher interest rates in this year with the introduction of the GST.

It also means, Mr. Speaker, lost jobs. The Liberal Party had a task force on the effect of the GST on the economy and it went right across Canada getting facts and figures. We have concluded that the GST will mean more jobs—for bureaucrats. It will not mean more jobs for Canadians. The member for Willowdale—

An hon. member: Tax policing.

Mr. Parent: Yes, we have those, these tax police; 3,500 new people will be getting jobs to police the rest of Canadians who have been paying their taxes all along.

I was referring to the study brought out by the hon. member for Willowdale. He said that in excess of 225,000 jobs were lost in our country directly because of the GST. We were told at one point that if there were any surplus moneys collected through the GST, these moneys would be used to attack the deficit.

How will the GST affect the deficit? First Mr. Wilson, who was then the Minister of Finance, told us that the GST would be revenue neutral, meaning that it would have no impact on the deficit one way or the other.

Next he told us that the GST was an integral part of the Conservative's deficit reduction plan. Well you cannot have it both ways. Then Mr. Wilson's budget showed that the GST and its rebates to corporations in 1991 would increase the deficit for the first two years. How will the GST affect the deficit then? It depends which Michael Wilson story you choose to believe.

I choose to believe the story that says that the corporations will be benefiting a great deal more than the average Canadians. The small businesses of our country are the ones that are going to be paying the real tab.

The tax is charged on a multitude of goods and services, but here are just a few, Mr. Speaker, which are now taxed but that were not taxed before. These are such things as hair cuts, funeral services—now we are even going after dead people—taxi rides—how difficult it is to add that 7 per cent unless it is worked right into the price—lottery tickets—which for some people are so entertaining in an otherwise dismal week—and stamps to mail our letters as we speak to each other as Canadians.

They are even taxing books, which students must have if they are going to learn. So we have a tax on education. We are taking money out of the pockets of students who have to work all summer just to get enough money to return to school in September. Then it is not enough because they have to get loans, they have to borrow money. That makes it ever so much more difficult.

As the hon. member before me has said, we pay a lot of lip service to the fact that the youth of our country are our most valued possessions and are where we should be investing our money, to help them along. How do you say that in one breath and in the next breath tax the very tools that students need to develop their thinking powers. This is a great mistake. It sends out the signal that this government has other priorities than the youth of the nation.

Finally there was one letter I received some time ago. It was written, actually printed, in very poor English. It was from an eight-year old in my riding who asked if even cookies would be taxed with the GST. I had to tell that student, that young child, that yes, even cookies were going to be taxed.

The GST will hurt modest income families. A recent study by economic analysts at Global Economics Ltd. revealed that even after families received the refundable GST credit more than half of all families with incomes less than $30,000 will be worse off or no better off under the GST than they were before. Fully 46 per cent of all families earning less than $30,000 will be worse off than they were before.

An average income Canadian family with children will pay $684 more in tax every year because of the GST. Is this fair? Is the kind of Canada we want to have one where the people who can afford it least are the ones who are taxed the most?

On top of this unfairness the government has not fully indexed the refundable GST credits which are available to modest income families nor the income threshold at which families can qualify for the credits.

I submit that over time inflation will erode the value of the credits and each year fewer and fewer low income families will qualify to receive the benefits.

I point out that half of all seniors will pay more tax under the GST. Global Economics Ltd. estimates that half of all seniors will pay more tax as a result of the GST even after receiving their refundable GST credits.

In this House I and many of my colleagues have presented petitions to this government asking it to rescind the GST or at least to change those portions of the GST which would affect those people least able to pay. We submitted over 600,000 signatures to this House to no avail.

The GST means higher prices. The government admits that the GST will raise prices and increase inflation. The government itself predicts that prices will increase by 1.25 per cent on average and other economists predict that prices will rise by much more than that.

Sadly no one believes, or very few people believe, the government's claim that prices of goods will decrease with the introduction of the GST. I challenge anyone in this House, or anyone listening to my words today, to give me any proof that prices have decreased anywhere in Canada on any items. Send it to me. If there are decreases I for one am not aware of them.

It has been said that some prices will go up a little and some prices will go up a lot. How will you know if you are being treated fairly?

I had so much more to say. In one inquiry I received from Mr. John Pastirik he asked how we were going to police this, how we were going to keep these prices down. My colleague points out that we have 3,500 police. They have not been very effective.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would ask for the co-operation of members of the House. When members are splitting the time, it somehow always seems that the period of 20 and 10 is much longer than it should be. This is why I had to interrupt the hon. member.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I heard the member for Broadview—Greenwood, from the Liberal Party, say that his brother, who is a bank manager, does not know that the Government of Canada has a special program for small entrepreneurs. Maybe the member for Broadview—Greenwood is a better member of Parliament than his brother is a bank manager. It seems to me that it is almost impossible for somebody who has that kind of job to not know that this program exists.

I want to ask the member if he recalls—he was not here as I recall in 1987, he was newly elected in the 1988 election—that when the committee of the House of Commons discussed the free trade agreement and the GST, specifically the GST, the majority of those who appeared said that they were against the manufacturers' sales tax. They said: "Please take off that tax. It is not good for us. It does not help". But they said at the same time: "Please exempt me, tax somebody else". Ninety-nine per cent said no and 99 per cent asked to be exempt.

I am wondering how the member would have responded to that kind of behaviour if he had been in the place of the government at that time.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, I would make a couple of observations. First, I thank her for saying that I am a new member of the House. In fact I am of the class of 1974 and we have been around quite some time.

Mrs. Bourgault: There is nothing wrong with that class.

Mr. Parent: The second thing she brought up was the free trade deal. The record will show that I spoke very forcefully against the free trade deal. I was opposed to it all the way, as were my colleagues on this side of the House.

When you make the statement that everyone who appeared before your committee for the implementation of the GST was in favour of the GST and then everyone wanted to be—

Mrs. Bourgault: I did not say that.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member said that 99 per cent of the people thought that the GST would be a good idea and by the same token 99 per cent wanted to be exempt. I believe that is the gist of what the hon. member was saying.

It would seem to me that if 99 per cent of Canadians want to be exempt from the tax that means that only 1 per cent wanted to be covered by the tax. I do not know how this government came to the conclusion that this was a good thing for Canadians when most if not all of us were opposed to it.

The people most in favour of this were the big business people who have been well taken care of by this government, but the average Canadian has been forgotten.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by commending my colleague from Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold for a very passionate speech focusing on the GST and how the government's taxation policy has undermined the small business sector across the country.

I would like to ask the member, since he comes from a part of Ontario seriously affected by the cross-border shopping phenomenon, how the taxation policy, namely the GST, has contributed to the fact that we have so many consumers thinking of the bottom line, legitimately so, on the mass exodus that is the phenomenon of cross-border shopping?

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, the hon. member, my colleague and chairman of our caucus, hit the nail right on the head.

The GST has driven people in my riding across the border. Perhaps this government is correct. As I have pointed out, the GST is creating a great many more jobs for the bureaucrats and now the Americans in Buffalo.

The people who are losing the jobs are Canadians. Our small business people are going out of business because they cannot compete with the burden of these taxes which have been put on their shoulders. We are not only losing our consumers but we are losing the businesses and jobs. That is a direct result of the GST being imposed.

Cross-border shopping is just another phenomenon. I believe it is because the consumers of Canada are rebelling against these taxes imposed by this government because they are unfair and fall on those people who can least afford it.

Like the hon. member, I can well understand that Canadians in my area, as well as in other areas close to the border, are trying to stretch their dollar as far as they can to take care of their families who have been put into jeopardy by the monetary and fiscal policies of this government.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in this debate. I hope I can add something to it here today.

I would like to try to directly address the question involved in this motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. The hon. member will be recognized as soon as this business has been looked after.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—SMALL BUSINESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mills (p. 3627).

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, now that we have that important piece of business out of the way, I will try to continue.

What I want to try to address today is this question of the value of the Canadian dollar. We are hearing from a variety of people out there almost like a kind of tribal chant with drums beating about high dollar, high dollar, high dollar. They are talking about a dollar that in terms of the United States dollar is about 88 cents compared to the U.S. at the moment. In fact what we should be seeking instead of an 88-cent dollar is a 90-cent dollar, a 95-cent dollar, a $1-dollar, a $1.50-dollar or a $2-dollar. That is the direction we should be trying to go; not the other way, which some members and some people are suggesting.

If it were true that an 80-cent dollar would be better than 88 cents, why not a 70-cent dollar or a 50-cent dollar or a 25-cent dollar, or how about a 1-cent dollar? Would that not be wonderful, a 1-cent dollar? It would mean that everybody would have lots of them, but the problem would be that you could not buy anything.

I just returned awhile ago from the Soviet Union. When I walked around there were a few things that people have to sell but not many. There are very few, but for those few things that they have available to sell and if they sense you are a foreigner, they ask you for hard currency. That is the word they use, hard currency; not rubles but hard currency because they do not want rubles.

Why do they not want rubles? The average wage in the Soviet Union for a government workers is about 350 to 400 rubles per month. The current exchange rate that you can convert them for is about 35 rubles to the dollar. This means in real terms that they are getting about $10 U.S.-Canadian per month wages, and they are only getting 35 to 1 because that is artificially being set even now by the Soviet government. The real rate, some suggest, would be closer to 60 to 1 so they would be earning about $5 Canadian per month.

Why do they not want rubles? The reason they do not want them is because there are lots of them. The government over there has printed them over time and they have become worthless.

Is the answer to economic problems driving your dollar down by printing money? After all is said and done, that is what we are talking about here. It is done in a slightly different way these days by the Bank of Canada, how it operates and how it actually puts money into the system. If people are not aware of that, I would suggest members may want to go over to the Bank of Canada, as I did awhile back, and take them through it, or I would even by glad to sit down with them and tell them about it.

In any event, at the end of the day what we are talking about here is printing more money or not printing more money, plain and simple. That is it: to print or not to print. When we say that we should put the dollar lower, drive the dollar down, the way you do that is you print more money so that there are more dollars. That is what drives the dollar down, but the more you drive it down, the less value it has when you go to buy something.

If we think historically about the countries that have done well in the post-war period economically, most of us would probably think of countries like Japan and Germany. If we think about the value of their currencies, what comes to mind? Low value currencies, worthless money? No. High value currencies, hard currencies, strong yen, strong Deutschmarks. Why is it that the Japanese have all the money to invest? Why is it that the Japanese can come over here and they can buy with their yen, convert into Canadian dollars and make all this investment? It is because they have value. They have created value relative to the Canadian economy and relative to the Canadian dollar.

What happens when that investment flows into Canada, whether it is in the form of debt or whether it is in the form of equity investment? Naturally it has the effect of raising the value of the Canadian dollar because it is being traded at that time. All of that investment, that job creating investment, is raising the value of the Canadian dollar.

Why is it coming in? It is because by and large around the world Canada is being seen as a place to invest. When your dollar is going down and people are taking money out, there is a lack of confidence. A high dollar is a sign of confidence.

A few years back, if we can remember, previous ministers of finance including our own at one point were running around the world seeking emergency lines of credit to try and prop up the Canadian dollar. Why? It was because there was a lack of confidence at the time, for whatever reason.

That is not happening right now. What is happening is not only have we not been borrowing any, at least at the federal level, we have been paying them off. We have been buying up foreign currency which in fact helps keep the dollar down. Our foreign reserves, in the neighbourhood of $20 billion or so, I believe are probably at historic levels. We have probably never had such high foreign currency reserves. Why the Bank of Canada on behalf of the Government of Canada has been buying it is to try and actually hold the dollar down.

All the evidence does not support the facts, the rhetoric that is going on. What it does support is that there is an element of confidence.

I would predict—and I cannot guarantee this, of course—that if we were able to reduce the uncertainty, the one major uncertainty in this country right now which is the constitutional question, if we were able to resolve that satisfactorily, I would suggest to you that would increase the confidence in this country to an even higher degree, to the point that we would probably reach par or even better with the American dollar. People would say: "There is a stable country. There is a good place to invest. That is where we will put our money". Those are investments, those are jobs.

That is the way you get jobs, not by printing more money. Printing money is for losers. The question is: Why do we want to join Argentina, the Soviet Union and countries like that in terms of economics? What we want to do is join the winners' circle: Japan and Germany.

That is the group we want to be with. Not the losers, the winners. They want to be with the losers. This tribal chanting: print more money, print more money, print more money, because at the end of the day that is what it says. No matter what kind of code you use and how you disguise it, that is what it is. Print more money is not an answer. It has been tried before by many governments, many times, and it is being tried today by many governments all over the world. Not to my knowledge at any point was it ever successful.

That is why in Germany, after they learned their lesson in the thirties because everyone had wheelbarrows full of money but could not buy anything, they put in their constitution the requirement or the goal of the bank, the Deutsch Bank in Germany, for zero inflation. They say currency stability or whatever words they use that would translate.

Hard currency has been behind the success stories of the economic power houses today. That is the club and the circle we are trying to join, not the losers' club.

The question is then: Why do we have this difficulty right now, vis-à-vis the United States? I think someone can answer it better than I can. I would like to quote from testimony before the finance committee earlier this week. The gentleman was Mr. Lloyd Atkinson, chief economist of the Bank of Montreal, who said: "Second, there is no question that bringing down the value of the Canadian dollar from its current level of 88 to 80 would have a beneficial impact initially and it may even have a somewhat permanent impact on our exporters, but it would not fundamentally solve what I consider to be the bigger problem".

Let us look at the past five years. This is the key, just looking at five years alone. These are numbers reported in Canada. They have also been reported by the Bureau of Labour Statistics in the U.S. so it takes account of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar. We have seen unit labour costs in Canada's manufacturing up almost 48 per cent and unit labour costs in U.S. manufacturing down three-tenths. In just five years we have lost in comparison with the United States in terms of unit labour costs 48 per cent. That is our problem, not the dollar. The dollar can go up and down, but by and large at the end of the day what you want are dollars that will buy you something in the rest of the world or that you can invest in the rest of the world; that will purchase you something, not a bunch of worthless paper which some would seek now to suggest is the answer to our problems.

The question then becomes for us: What would properly be the result if we were somehow to suggest that this high dollar could be changed or how it would have an impact on interest rates? I will try to make that connection. I am not quite sure how much time I have left or whether I will be able to make it.

The more and better currency stability that we have, the greater confidence there is in the Canadian dollar and the less people will be willing to take or expect for it or demand for it in terms of lending you money. The reason for that is there will be confidence that they are going to get real money back. They are not going to see their money lost through inflation or money that has just been printed. They want to get real money back.

That is what brings interest rates down. That is why they have come down about 500 basis points, about 5 points over the past year. It has been money flowing into Canada that does push the dollar up. As I have explained, that is not necessarily a bad thing. That is an impact.

Mr. Mills: What about our exports?

Mr. Dorin: That does push the dollar up. It is not necessarily a bad thing. There will be a question period. I will be glad to answer the question.

What it does is it brings interest rates down. If that money were not flowing in, interest rates would be even higher than they are. You cannot have one without the other. You cannot suck and blow at the same time. You cannot bring interest rates down unless you are prepared and want to see an increase in value or at least a stable value of the dollar.

The suggestion that somehow we should just print a more money, that that will take the dollar down, yes, it will. Will it take interest rates now? No, it will not.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question. I want to congratulate him.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: I notice that opposition members stand up and ask other opposition members questions. It is nice for me on a Friday afternoon to have this opportunity myself. I am just going to take advantage of it.

What the hon. member is trying to do is something that is very difficult, which is to explain monetary policy.

President Kennedy once said he never knew the difference between monetary and fiscal policy. Often I feel that the people across the aisle do not know the difference either.

In his explanation he made a very important point. Let me just ask him, if we unilaterally lowered the dollar from 88 cents to 80 cents tomorrow and held to it for a whole year, would that mean that we would have to adjust our interest rates to pay for this diminished dollar that the person who borrowed our money would get back at the end of the year?

Mr. Dorin: It would mean a number of things. It would mean that people who had borrowed in foreign currency, such as Ontario Hydro for example, would have to pay many more dollars to enable them to repay the interest and the principal on their loan. Ontario Hydro would have to pay many more Canadian dollars and somehow raise it by raising prices for hydro in Ontario in order to make those payments.

That would be one of the impacts.

This debate originated earlier this week from some statements made by Mr. Tom Courchesne, a noted economist. Mr. Courchesne is not entirely wrong on this question. He suggested pegging our dollar to the United States at 80 per cent. Mr. Atkinson explained this quite well, maybe better than I, and maybe I should quote from him. This is the gentleman I quoted from earlier.

Let us put it in the context of what Tom Courchesne was talking about. He was talking more or less about the irrevocable fixing of the Canadian dollar to the U.S. dollar at approximately 80 cents. First and foremost if we do that then we are essentially relegating the Bank of Canada to a role as the 13th federal reserve district, led by Mr. Allan Greenspan. We will not make our decisions in Canada. We will accept whatever Mr. Greenspan and the federal reserve do.

So we become a 13th part of the United States, a 13th federal reservist. That is what Mr. Courchesne is essentially suggesting, for those who wish to read about it.

He goes on to say that because it would have one role and one role only, namely to fix the exchange rate and whatever rates of inflation or interest rates came along with it, we would have our currency tied to the U.S. and would get whatever inflation or interest rates that brought us.

The question is do we want to run our own show here in Canada? Or do we want to accept Mr. Courchesne's suggestion that we relegate our responsibility in terms of monetary policy to the federal reserve in the United States?

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to ask the member who just spoke a question. However, I would first like to clear up one of the myths that seem to exist. Liberals have not advocated printing money. Liberals have suggested that the difference in interest rates between the U.S. and Canada has been as high as 6 per cent and that is not producing better business circumstances here when there is such a large gap between them. That gap should be reduced, which would drop our dollar which is over inflated because of the interest rate policy that is being carried out.

I have a document here printed in The Toronto Star yesterday in which the member for Halton—Peel, a past minister from the Toronto area, and the member for Mississauga South, clearly say that this government's high dollar policy is an extreme problem and that there is a tremendous internal battle in the Tory caucus.

Could you justify what you just said and leave out half your Tory members such as the one for Mississauga South, who led the finance committee across this country, and other members who have been grossly outspoken about finances in this country and are now saying that your policy is wrong?

Mr. Dorin: Madam Speaker, what it means is that I am going to have to take those members and sit down with them and tell them just what I told the rest of the House here today.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest explaining the joys and values of the high dollar because clearly the agricultural community in this country has suffered tremendously over the past several years.

It is estimated that the high dollar cost Canadian farmers something like $426 million a year in the value of their crops, which are mostly exported and sold in international markets in American dollars.

The great concern this year is the $2 wheat and the fact that the government cut government support programs last year by 40 per cent, $1.3 billion. That is carried right over. That shortfall last year was carried over into this year.

Yesterday the government came through with some support. We do not know exactly when it will be paid. Perhaps next March or April. We have seen the response, especially in southern Alberta where we saw 40 kilometres of tractors, combines and trucks on the highway just a few days ago.

That same farm protest group from Wardner in southern Alberta, the hon. member's own province, has issued a press release today taking the government to task not only for cutting their support programs last year by some $1.3 billion and stonewalling this year on emergency assistance. It also called into question the very figures the Minister of Agriculture used yesterday in his press conference.

It pointed out that payments made in April, six months from now, will not help those producers. Many of them will be irreparably destroyed. They will lose their property and so on. The group is so frustrated that it is calling on farmers to withhold their grain deliveries.

One of the organizers, Bob Grbavac, said to me today: "If the Prime Minister wants to give away wheat to Russia, he is going to have to crawl over their bodies". They are frustrated and disgusted with the way the government has handled their support programs at a time when world prices have dropped to the lowest level since the 1930s.

Mr. Dorin: Madam Speaker, I could perhaps explain this question in the way it was explained by a farmer from western Canada earlier this week on television.

He said that about 20 years ago his phone bill was $4 a month and it took one or two bushels of wheat to pay for it. These days his phone bill is about $99 a month and it takes 25 or however many bushels of wheat to pay for it.

Rather than two bushels a wheat to pay his phone bill it now takes 25 bushels of wheat. We have a situation where there is a lot of wheat around that for various reasons people know well, which I will not bother to explain, nobody is prepared to pay much for.

That means that while he has wheat, maybe as much or more than he had before, he cannot buy anything with it, if he wants to buy other things or real goods.

If we want to draw an analogy, it means that if we print a lot more money when we go to buy oranges or anything we might want to buy from the rest of the world we will not be able to get as much for those same dollars.

We can sell all the wheat we want if we are prepared to take rubles for it because there are lots of them in the Soviet Union. It showed us the way.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I would like to pick up and perhaps get the debate back on track after a professorial speech urging a $2-dollar.

I think the motion put forth by the Liberal Party, namely the critic for entrepreneurship, the member for Broadview—Greenwood, is a very important one. It is also a very timely one as this country goes through its difficulties.

In terms of the motion there are four aspects to the undermining of the small business network across this country. They are the question of the interest rates, the level of the Canadian dollar, the reduction of the paper burden, and the fact that there is very little financial or other assistance available for the small business sector.

It is timely because while this government purports to be a friend to business, the real situation is that if it is a friend to business it is clearly only to big business.

I would like to draw this debate a little closer to home, to metropolitan Toronto. Indeed, we all talk about it. It is true that the small business sector is the engine of economic wealth, prosperity and jobs.

In the metropolitan Toronto area there was a survey done by the Toronto Board of Trade. It looked at all the various employers. It concluded that the 500 largest employers, plus all three levels of government, plus all levels of our social service agencies, account for 40 per cent of all the jobs created in metropolitan Toronto. I am sure that within that component, we have a good slice of what we can consider small business.

To take these figures at their worth it means that in metropolitan Toronto, close to 60 per cent, if not more, of the jobs created and being created, are done by small business people. But the picture of metropolitan Toronto in that small business sector, despite the speeches before us by the other side, is a grim one indeed. It is not that we like to preach and pass on bad news, but we are of the mind that unless we recognize the failures in the system, unless we recognize the problems, and unless we recognize the hurt and frustration felt in metropolitan Toronto and across the country, we will not be able to get the policy, the program, or the solution that will stop the bleeding as it has been for the last little while.

The government this morning stood up and cheered the unemployment levels, but metropolitan Toronto is still in double digit unemployment. Over 200,000 are searching for work, and as of this morning, there were 6,000 fewer people in the labour force. That meant that either 6,000 people left metropolitan Toronto or that 6,000 people have given up looking for employment.

Since 1989, over 75,000 jobs have left the city of metropolitan Toronto; over half, 47,000 to be specific, in the small business manufacturing sector. Unemployment in the building trades is over 60 per cent. I talked to a construction contractor yesterday from my riding who had 300 employees last year. That has been reduced to a payroll of 50 individuals. He has building contracts in of all places, Ottawa, because of a shortage and the lack of activity in metropolitan Toronto.

The movement out of metropolitan Toronto, either to other parts of the country or particularly south of the border, is rampant. The Federation of Independent Business commissioned a study of their own membership and found that 36 per cent of small businesses would be seriously looking at moving out of Toronto, with most of them looking to the United States.

Bankruptcies are another way of measuring the pulse of small business. In the month of August there were 100 additional businesses, small businesses in Toronto that went belly up, bringing to a total over the last year of 900 further bankrupt businesses, enterprises, call them what you will, employers in metropolitan Toronto. And to make matters worse, we also have a provincial New Democratic government that is poisoning that atmosphere further, and aggravating the situation and escalating the number of people and companies that are moving out of metropolitan Toronto.

When I said that this government purports to be a friend of business, it is not a friend of small businesses or of medium-sized firms. If you look at each of the Conservative's financial blueprints in their budgets, they talk in great rhetoric about the small business sector, the small business family-created company. Yet, if you flip through any one of the pages in the federal budget, there is nothing there to encourage the type of activity that my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood spelled out in his motion today. There is nothing to spur on the ideas from going from an idea in someone's mind to creating economic wealth on the streets of Toronto, no financial assistance.

We read about the large multinational corporations getting financial assistance from this government, companies that have received hundreds of millions of dollars in taxpayers' moneys and then all of a sudden decide one day that they are going to move the shop south of the border. Yet small businesses that are looking to buy new machinery and are looking for approval cannot get the time of day from this government. That is the frustration that this motion speaks to.

The government then talks to us about foreign investment, but there too we have to dissect what foreign investment means under a Conservative regime. For me foreign investment equals foreign takeovers. Of all the foreign investment, 100 per cent that has been approved, the bulk is in the form of foreign takeovers. I do not think over the long run that that is going to help the economy. Why? Because the decisions will be taken south of the border and Canada will gradually lose the ability of making its own decisions for its own reasons, for its own people and for its own advantages.

The de Havilland company is a perfect example now that de Havilland is in foreign hands. Not only because there are some 4,300 jobs at stake at de Havilland, but economists estimate that for every job at de Havilland there are four other jobs in the province of Ontario and across the country. How many small business entrepreneurs are feeding de Havilland? How many suppliers rely on de Havilland? Yet, if the decision on the future of de Havilland is taken by Boeing, an American conglomerate, then that is not only going to affect the livelihood of de Havilland but it is going to have a multiplier effect on the lives, futures and careers of other individuals and other enterprises in the province.

The other factor, when I speak to small business individuals in my riding, is that they get very little help when they are competing for international contracts. They run into West German and Japanese companies that have the backing of their respective governments. Our small businesses do not.

What about research and development? When we talk about the creation of the new ideas, doing business differently and being on the leading edge of today's technology, why are we not spending the R and D money that our competitors in the global village are spending?

We had the member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold talk about GST and taxation. Small businesses are feeling over-regulated and overtaxed. The bottom line is driving them south of the border. There are more businesses that are wondering why they are in business, because at the end of the month they do not have too much to show for it.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are signalling that my time is up. It is my hope that this government listens to the motion that we are presenting today. It is not a motion crafted to try to take up the time of the day until four o'clock but to speak of the real need to take care of the big business friends in this country and to get behind the small business network. That is the foundation and the pillar of job creation in this country, a pillar that unfortunately is coming apart at the seams.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from York West for portraying so vividly and in such a short span of time the importance of small business to this country and the dilemma in which small business now finds itself.

I just wondered if he was familiar with a recent report that was issued yesterday from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business in which it portrayed the sagging interest in a free trade deal. Back in 1987 there was some support from small business for going into a Canada-U.S. trade deal. There is a much reduced interest by Canadian small business people in going into a trilateral deal with the Canada, U.S. and Mexico bloc. The emphasis was placed, particularly in the article that I read, on anything that had to do with agriculture in this country, whether it be at the manufacturing level, the processing level or the distribution level. There was very limited support for the free trade bloc of Canada, U.S. and Mexico.

I wonder if my hon. friend from York West would like to comment on that scenario: limited interest back in 1987 but even less interest in that now. What experiences does he think they have had that would lessen this interest in the free trade deal being broadened any broader than it is right now?

Mr. Marchi: I would like to thank my friend from Leeds—Grenville who I think raises a very interesting concern.

He started off the argument by saying that during the free trade debate of the last election there was limited enthusiasm from the small business sector. He is quite correct on that because most of the cheerleaders, as we recall, were the big business corporations, the multinational corporations, the corporations that funded the free trade campaign as third party advertisers, and I hope the Lortie commission comes to grips with.

I think there is no doubt that not only the small business sector but Canadians in general, unfortunately, after free trade had been approved are certainly sceptical about the results of the free trade discussions and about amplifying it and going into it in a North American context. In the last election we split the anti-free trade vote, I suppose, with our friends of the New Democratic Party. But in every poll since the election the number of people who think that the free trade pact was a good one has been reduced. There is a very good reason for that. It is not built by political speeches or by rhetoric. It is formulated based on the experiences that Canadians are losing more as opposed to winning more from this free trade pact.

Consider a small business person from Toronto who is forced to go to Buffalo because they do not have the taxes that are imposed in Canada, the rents in Buffalo are cheaper than they are in the city of Toronto, the wages are lower in the States than they are in the city of Toronto, they get a three-year tax holiday from the city and the regional government in the United States. Compare that to here.

When they begin to see that as a reality they begin to compare the experience of how it would be to locate in Mexico where products will be built and then shipped back into this country. Given the labour laws and the labour wages, it obviously puts the fear of God into the small business person in this country. Not only is the situation bad today, but he or she sees the potential for it being aggravated.

The small business network is not of the mind to expand the free trade agreement but rather to revisit the existing agreement between the Americans and Canadians and say: "Look, let us clean up those areas where clearly the Americans are winning and the Canadians are losing".

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have been in the House since 10.15 this morning, listening to Liberal members congratulating each other and airing their views on the economy. That is all very well, but they do not have the government's responsibility to make decisions and run the country in very difficult times.

As I listen, I can imagine Canadian voters sitting in front of their television screens, eagerly following the debate this afternoon, and the people in the gallery who have a keen interest in these proceedings as well, and I imagine they are reacting the same way I am and saying to themselves: Fine, the Liberals are against the Goods and Services Tax, against free trade with the United States, against the government's Budget, and in fact against everything this government has done. On the other hand, they are asking the government for more money for farmers, for the refugees who are a specialty of the Immigration critic—I have often heard him talk about the refugee situation, immigration, and so forth—more assistance for fishermen and increased assistance for families.

They want us to ensure there won't be any taxes for truckers, because they have problems, and that I agree, with the Americans. They are indignant about cross-border shopping. I think we should start a campaign to enhance Canadian nationalism and ask Canadians to buy Canadian, because we have the social services Americans do not have. Of course the system costs more. Mr. Speaker, I really wonder what would happen if the government were not committed to reducing the deficit and thus enhancing Canada's position internationally. I wonder what the Liberals would do. I don't know whether the hon. member would care to respond. This is probably more a comment than a question.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, our party is not alone in its fight against free trade and the GST. The Canadian people are against this government's programs. It is no accident that the government is down to 15 per cent in the polls, in this country. This is not something that was dreamt up by the Liberals, it's reality, the opinion of people who don't like this government's policies any more than they like its programs. We are working for Canadians, and they want an alternative. Well, we are ready for an election. We have programs. We have alternatives to offer. When my hon. friend moves to the other side of the House, she will get plenty of answers to her questions.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, one only has to walk down the streets in small communities in this country to see the devastation of small business. I see store closings, I see empty stores, I hear of people being laid off. In my riding yesterday, I heard that one of the major farm equipment dealers was putting his entire staff on shared work programs. I have a major tire dealer who has written and told me that a staff of 16 is now down to 3. I am seeing this type of thing, either tremendous reduction in the labour force or closures of businesses or empty stores. That tells us the plight of small business.

We do not have to go beyond that to know small businesses' problems. I think that the debate this afternoon is to zero in on what are the causes and then what are the remedies. It is very important, if we are to examine the problem from causes to solutions, to really look at what small business is telling us. If we were to look at the positions they put forward, we would quickly understand some of the difficulty they experience every day.

First of all, let me point out that small business is the basis of business in this country, the generator of jobs. Three out of four new jobs which have been created in the past 10 years in Canada have been created within small business. We know that the way small business goes in Ontario or British Columbia or in the maritimes is the way the country goes. Small business is attempting to tell us where some of the myths about how much money is being made by those who own small businesses, and that really is a myth. I am not really sure that everyone realizes that 61 per cent of the self-employed small business entrepreneurs in this country earn less than $27,000 a year. In the general population, it is 54 per cent. Small business owners, entrepreneurs in the low categories earn less money than the general population.

In the $27,000 to $40,000 income bracket, while 22 per cent of our country's population falls in that bracket, those people in small business to fall in that bracket are only 16 per cent. Fewer small business entrepreneurs earn from $27,000 to $40,000 than the average in the country.

When we go to the higher figures, it is again very much against small business. Incomes of owners of small business is much less than the average income in this country yet they generate the majority of jobs in this country.

Why are those incomes less? We have talked about taxes. We have talked about interest rates. We talked about input costs to business. Very clearly it has to be understood that before the GST was put in place, the average Canadian small business was paying in the neighbourhood of 34 per cent taxation, while its counterpart in the U.S.A. is paying in the area of 29.5 per cent.

The GST has pummelled much of that small business just by extra cost. At the same time, the GST has created a perception of over-taxation to everyone who walks into a store.

We take the 8 per cent provincial tax in Ontario, add the GST on top of it and in my riding, people say: "We are driving away business in droves." When you buy a product and you go up and pay for it, at the same time, you have to pay 15 per cent more in taxes. American tourists who are very abundant in southwestern Ontario do not come nearly as much. When they see those tax increases, they walk away very rapidly.

That is one of the major problems that small business is facing; the perception that taxes are extremely high and the reality that in fact they are really high.

Second, I think if we look at the phenomenon that has been created in the last five years but certainly far more in the last couple of years since the GST has been introduced, that is cross-border shopping, we certainly realize that in areas where we are near the border, we receive monthly or weekly circulations from communities across the border. They send to each one of the residents in Essex County, Windsor, Chatham, Kent County brochures telling them where you can get deals, what kind of buys you can make. They are really hard hitting sales items that are brought in from the States to our communities.

I do not blame people for going across the border and shopping for those values. I do think that we have to look very carefully at what we as the Canadian government, provincial government as well as business can do to prevent that from continuing.

I know that if we do not take an aggressive position to deal with the cross-border shopping issue rather than look away from it, we are going to be in dire trouble.

I would like to read a quote from the mayor of Windsor, John Millison:

> Cross-border shopping is part of a tax revolt across Canada. I don't think Ottawa understands or realizes it. Ottawa still thinks it's just a new fringe group here and there.

Cross-border shopping is destroying many, many small retail businesses in our country. It is taking the tax dollar away from our federal, provincial and municipal governments. As a result, I think we have to act very rapidly to alter that.

I do believe we must start looking at taxation, interest rates and perceptions of high taxes. We realize from store closings, we realize the farm community and the automotive industry in my area have lost tremendous jobs, and there are fewer shoppers and a lot less dollars to be spent in small business. They are under a great squeeze. Unless we take actions that have been suggested by the Canadian independent businessman's group, unless we take actions as we have heard from businessmen across this country to change perceptions to help small business and to encourage business in this country, we are going to be in dire trouble in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I know you have a great deal of concern about small business and what is happening. I hope I do not hear another member of Parliament saying it is a frivolous debate this afternoon. It certainly is not frivolous. It is a deep concern we all have. It is a concern that this government must address.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the speeches of a number of members today. I was very impressed particularly with the speech of the hon. member for Essex—Kent who has just spoken. He is very knowledgeable. Unfortunately, I guess he is knowledgeable in the area of cross-border shopping. The reason why he is unfortunately so knowledgeable is because like me, his constituency has been a victim of that terrible situation that we have facing us in this country now.

The government across the way likes to pretend that the GST has had no influence on cross-border shopping. I received a letter which I have in front of me, not from a constituent but from a lady who writes from Pierrefonds, Quebec. She states: "After listening to the Minister of Revenue state in the House of Commons that the GST has had no effect on the increase in cross-border shopping, I think you should draw to his attention the statement in the enclosed American newspaper clippings".

The newspaper clippings that this lady has sent me are from Plattsburg, New York, a newspaper called The Press Republican. I have another one here from Lake Placid and another one again from The Press Republic of Plattsburg, New York, from a different day. Here is one that I want to bring to your attention. This article signed by Meg Denison talks of the following. It is entitled "Canadian shoppers flock to New England". Here is what it says in one paragraph: "Higher taxes in Canada also are sending more Canadians over the border to northern New England. A controversial 7 per cent general services tax was enacted earlier this year, plus Quebec levies a 7 per cent provincial tax on the goods and services". It goes on to describe all those problems with cross-border shopping.

I want to ask my colleague: How is it that his constituents and mine know that the GST is a major cause of cross-border shopping, that American business is taking advantage of it or is aware of it, that American journalists' writings are aware of it, that Canadians generally are aware of this problem, but that the Conservatives across the way have not discovered it yet?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for a very deep based thoughtful question. This question is one that is being brought about by advertising, by newspaper articles, by all kinds of information coming forward.

I have an article here that was printed in the Detroit Free Press which tells how high the Canadian taxes are in comparison to American taxes, which encourages businesses to go from southwestern Ontario into the United States, which really suggests to American shoppers not to come to southwestern Ontario.

Ernst Young has done a report, a very careful report, about cross-border shopping. In it they suggest there are three levels of declaration of people coming across the border. Level one is the verbal declaration of someone who comes across the border with less than $100 worth of goods. That has increased since 1987 by 285 per cent. They also suggest that written declarations of people returning to Canada with $300 worth of goods have increased 325 per cent. Finally the number of people who fill out forms and pay taxes coming across the border in the last few years has increased 500 per cent. They outline all of the reasons for cross-border shopping and make it very clear that taxation is a primary motivator. As well, gasoline taxation in Canada: people going across the border to fill up their cars. Liquor: people going across the border to buy liquor.

Those taxes are increased by this government every time a budget comes along. We should not deal with just GST. We should look at the gasoline tax, the liquor taxes and all other taxes that have been imposed on Canadians which have driven them out of our border communities into the States.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I would just like to ask my hon. friend about provincial taxes under the Liberal government of Premier David Peterson. He increased 28 different taxes on the business community while he was premier. He brought in a special tire tax. He brought in the special garbage tax. He brought in a special increase in the corporate tax. Now the NDP government there refuses to collect the provincial sales tax on tourists bringing things back into Canada.

An hon. member: In what riding did David Peterson run?

Mr. Hockin: David Peterson was the provincial member of Parliament from my riding and he lost by a huge margin. I have to tell you that the people of London care about these issues too.

The reason I am mentioning this is that there were many taxes brought in by the provincial Liberal government in the province of Ontario. Is the hon. member suggesting that they should be cut or done away with?

Mr. Pickard: I would like to thank the minister for his question.

The federal Liberal Party is not responsible for provincial government decisions, but I might point out that it is very clear that the Peterson government did increase taxes dramatically and there was strong reaction to that government. We all know that, but I must point out to the minister as well that the Peterson government showed a great deal more wisdom than the Tory government, because it balanced the budget. It did not run an extra $30 billion in debt. Your government not only increased taxes, added the GST, did all the horrendous things we are talking about by doubling taxes virtually over a short period of time, but it also ran a $30 billion debt year by year by year for every year that it has been elected.

You talk about fiscal responsibility. I might point out very clearly in the policies that this government has adopted it came in with a $180 billion debt and it has now brought up to the $400 billion level. When we consider high taxes, certainly that is one problem, but I think not only have you brought about high taxes. You have also raised our debt higher and higher and higher so that we are having difficulty functioning in this country. I would say that it is a crime the Tory government has done that.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to commend the hon. member opposite for raising this particular motion today because I think it gives us the time to talk about the economy, talk about what is going on in this country, and refer to some of the things in the motion. Maybe I will get to that a little later on.

I noticed in listening to him, and I did listen, that he was talking about tax reform and some other things. The Constitution came up in his discussions in the debate. He reflected something that I am hearing in my riding also, that people are kind of sick and tired hearing about the Constitution. There are other things to get on with. We have got this economy to get on with.

I think the economy is a very major part of our constitutional process and the constitutional proposal. I think it is very incumbent upon all of us to include that in our discussions.

If our economy is not good, if our economy is going down, if our barriers to trade and all the things that we talk about are there, it is going to be very difficult to get unanimity, certainly to get consensus, in a country that is feeling the pressure and not having the ability to move on into other directions. I think those other directions are very important.

I want, as does the member, to feel good about this country. I think the people of Canada want to feel good about this country. In order for them to do that, small businesses, large businesses, employers and employees must feel good about what they are doing. They must feel that they are contributing not only to the constitutional process but to the economic development and improvement of this country. I think that is a good start.

Another aspect of the member's motion and what he talked about was his book on a single tax. I have read that book. It took me a long time to get through it, because I put it at the side of my bed and I kept falling asleep every time I read it. I do not think that was because of the content from the hon. member, but maybe it was the fact that we do not get to bed too early around this place sometimes. He has some good concepts in there and some concepts worth while pursuing in certain areas. Basically I like the idea of it. I do not mind saying that publicly as I have said to him personally. The concept is good. There are some things about it that caused me some difficulty as I am sure they did him. When we look at it he made changes in it and even refers to that in the book.

I think what the member is saying is that he is trying to be constructive and provide constructive alternatives, and I like that. I think that is very commendable. It is not like the lead speaker from the third party in this place who was talking earlier today and blaming the federal government for unemployment statistics. Where they are bad it is the federal government's fault; where they are good it is the provincial government's bonus. They are doing a great job because they happen to be up in one area. It is the NDP provincial government that gets the credit. I think that kind of debate is not constructive.

One thing the member raised in his speech was increasing the budget for tourism. I can recognize that. Tourism is very important. We have talked about that. It is important to people in my riding of York—Simcoe whom he is aware of. They have got a problem. There is no question. When you quadruple the budget—I think that was the number he used—those tax dollars have to come from somewhere because they are tax dollars from the citizens who live in my riding, as well as the citizens in Broadview—Greenwood.

The member talked about environmental technology, that we have to put a push on there, that governments should be pushing that and getting financially involved in that area. That may be so, but I know a company in my riding called Engine Control Systems that is now world-wide. It has now developed a system of purifying exhaust from buses, that kind of diesel-type production, dropping the levels of pollution that comes out of these vehicles. It is going ahead. It now has an international contract. It is working with the United States, Mexico and a few other countries. I am very proud of that company. In fact it won the achievement award last year. It was the first time ever it was given out in the environmental field by the Government of Canada. I am very proud of the company and I see the work that it is doing. It did that without government intervention, that word that scares me and I think it scares the member opposite.

Then we talked about the banks. Yes, I think there is concern about the banks not lending money to small business, even though there are programs there that the federal government has endorsed over the years to help. I do not think they are being as co-operative as I would like and certainly as the business people in my community would like. I agree with the member on that.

If I take those three or four things that we have talked about, the part that concerns me is that that means more government intervention. That means more government daily involvement in business. That means more bureaucracy, more tax dollars and, quite frankly, poorer run businesses in my view because I do not know of a situation where I can compare a business that is run by government and one that is run by private enterprise. If I compare those two businesses, I do not know one that I would say is more efficiently run by government regardless of the level of government. I think back to a few years ago when I was a member of municipal council in my home town of Newmarket. We got into this very same debate, not on the scale we are talking about here, but we were talking about concessions in arenas and who should deliver them. The municipality controlled those concessions for a while and it cost us a pile of money at the end of the year. We had bidders in private enterprise saying that they wanted to come in and do that. They were prepared to do that and they did it more efficiently. They made money.

That is what private enterprise is all about. It does not want government involvement. It wants to get government out of it. I think it makes a lot of sense in that way.

One thing I have heard about is what the Government of Canada is doing for small business, the tax situation and tax initiatives, and there have been lots of them. We can talk about the capital gains exemptions introduced for small business and the pension fund initiatives. We can talk about increased RRSP contribution limits. We can talk about the relaxation of ownership limits. All these kinds of things are very important, even the reduction of the federal corporate tax rate.

Lots of things have been put in place with regard to helping small business. I think those things have to be addressed and I think they should be talked of in a positive light because there are opportunities. I think it is a great opportunity for small businesses today and if we can get them thinking that way I think that will help, those 900,000 companies. Maybe we can make it into a million or 1.2 million companies. Let us make them solid. Let us give them the opportunity to be successful.

I am sorry our friends from over there are not here, but I do not consider profit a dirty word. I do not consider it a bad word. It is what makes this country click. It is what makes our economy click. It creates jobs, jobs. They did not feel it was important to talk about the economy of this country and small business, so they did not feel it was important to come today.

One of the points the member mentioned was the paper burden on small business. I do not think too many of us would argue about the amounts of paper, the paper that certainly crosses our desks. I know the amount of paper that crossed our desks when we were in a different life, before we became elected.

You look at it and you ask what the government has done. The government has done a number of things and the list goes on and on. In fact I have a list here of 20, 30, or 40 of them, whatever it is. I could not even get through them all. I wanted to bring to the fore a few of them because I think they are important. The government has met with small business people and asked what it could do to make the system smoother, to make it easier, to make it easier for business to show a profit. That is what it is all about.

There were changes that were made to the Patent Act. That was one of the ones that was very important.

Another one which I think is very important and is going to help Canadian business and employees of Canadian business is the reform to the Bankruptcy Act. That is something that has been banged around and bashed around in this place and in many places for years and years. There obviously had to be changes made to that, simplifying the information burden requirements for both debtors and creditors. That makes a lot of sense to business people. They can understand that.

There have been all kinds of other things. One of the most interesting ones that I came across was something that I did not know about and I am sure members opposite did not know about it: the forms review within Canada Employment and Immigration. It was undertaken for the development, printing and use of all new and revised forms in employment and immigration.

There were 10,500,000 forms declared redundant and were rejected, 10,500,000 forms floating around this country affecting small business through employment and immigration. There was selective elimination and standardization, and now there are 3,000 official forms. There were 10,000 eliminated and we are now using 3,000 forms, which sounds like an awful lot to me but is one heck of a lot less than what has been out there and what we have been used to. I think that is a major step in the right direction.

Turning to statistic gathering, I know Statistics Canada has an important role to play in this country.

We look at the information quite often and in fact it is quoted in this place quite often. There have been a number of steps taken to assist small business, such as lengthy questionnaires being replaced by short forms. Most of the retailers, I think the figure is 85 per cent of the small retailers, no longer have to fill in annual questionnaires. Their results are taken from the tax records. The information is already in the system. It is just a case of getting it from somewhere else.

That seems to make more sense. The list goes on, but I do not want to bore you with all the details. However, it would be worth while for those people interested in this particular topic to talk to the ministers of finance, revenue and small business and get a copy of the list of changes in these areas.

The other point that has come up quite often, and I think we are rehashing an old debate but it has been brought up quite regularly, concerns the goods and services tax which replaced the manufacturers' sales tax.

I had, as did everyone else, an awful lot of people say to me that they were against the goods and service tax. I said in a public meeting that I was against the goods and services tax too. I am also against income tax, business tax, property tax, and all the other taxes. However, I happen to like the benefits they provide whether at the local municipal level, the provincial level or the federal level.

Somewhere along the line we have to pay bills. If we want these services we have to pay for them. I think the hon. member in putting this motion was suggesting that we try to have something that was fairer and more equitable, and I agree with that. I think we have to focus in that direction.

Those members talking about the goods and services tax must recognize that it replaced a tax that virtually all sides of this House agreed had to go. The manufacturers' sales tax had to go. It was bad. Talk about loopholes. I think there were something like 22,000 special deals in one act affecting 750,000 people. The numbers were astonishing. That did not make a lot of sense to a lot of people.

The question became what to do about the difference in revenue. If you eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax that is fine. Eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax and where do you get the $15 billion or $18 billion that tax generated on an annual basis? Do you add it to the deficit? I do not think too many people would agree to add it to the deficit. I know that none of the people in my area would agree to add 20 per cent to 25 per cent to their personal income tax. I do not think there would be too many in my area willing to do that.

The question became where to get the revenue from? Because we have to get the revenue I have heard that maybe we could tax the very wealthy in our community, in our society. That is probably fair. I do not argue with that if we can eliminate those loopholes. I think most of the loopholes have been eliminated. Certainly people are telling me that over the last five, six or seven years most of them have been eliminated. It is getting harder for an accountant now to find these loopholes.

Maybe what we are doing is reducing the work force of accountants because they are not finding the loopholes and do not have the ability to buck the system we are trying to make fair.

There was a lot of discussion with small business pertaining to the goods and services tax. When it was first proposed there was no question it was going to be a major burden, financially. It was going to be a major burden of paperwork, reporting and all the other things that go with it. However after discussions with small business those changes were made. There are still going to be changes made.

Here is a tax that is less than a year old. I expect that fairly soon we will see some other changes pertaining to the goods and services tax to make it more efficient, to make it more equitable, and to make it easier for businesses to comply.

The GST registration form, which I think we all thought would be page after page after page, has been reduced to one page. That seems to make a lot of sense to me. I do not have business people complaining to me now. Sure, they complained the first month or the first three months when we first put it in, but they understand it now. Their system is working.

The filing frequency was changed to make it easier for the smaller businesses so they did not have to file as often. It varied with their system to make it easier for them.

Another question small business raised was: What can we do to make it easier for the very small business, the largest group of our small business community? We brought in a quick method system, which was endorsed by the small business community, has been complied with by the small business community, and seems to be working pretty well. This quick method of filing, a two or three liner, is now done by 600,000 small businesses. They have the information. They know what their gross sales are and they know what their gross expenses are. They just add and subtract and multiply the difference.

I think the Government of Canada has been very responsive. I am not suggesting for a minute that all the answers are there, that it is a simplified tax system, that there are not difficulties for small business. However, I am one of those people who feel good about small business in Canada. I am one of those people who are optimistic for the opportunities that small business has in Canada. If we talk about some of the positive things, some of the things that can happen and the opportunities, I think business in Canada will respond. I think business understands the difficulty the federal government is facing with regard to the Constitution and all the ramifications of that. I know that the people in my community want to be successful; they want to make profits. If they do that, that is good for Canada. That is good for everyone.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will make a short comment because I know we are trying to put as many people forward today as possible in this very important debate.

First of all, I want to congratulate the member for York—Simcoe who has always taken a very constructive and creative approach on the floor of this House of Commons.

I wanted to clear up two points. First, I was not suggesting when I spoke earlier today that I did not have a concern about the Constitution of this country and the effect that it will have, if properly concluded, on unity and ultimately the economy of this country. The point I was trying to make—and we are partly accomplishing it today—was that there are thousands and thousands of entrepreneurs and people out there who would like to see us spend more time in this House on of the micro-economic problems facing us, some of the specifics. I just wanted to clear up that point.

The one question he did ask in his speech was if we did not have a GST and were to take a more radical approach to comprehensive tax reform, where would we get the revenue that we would no longer have from a phased out manufacturers' sales tax? I would suggest to the hon. member that simplicity and fairness in a tax system will dramatically increase the productivity in this nation.

That productivity will do two things. It will create better products at better prices, which will also attract foreign investment. That will obviously place downward pressure on interest rates. That will mean that our borrowings for the Treasury will be less and that our unemployment insurance draw on the Treasury will be billions of dollars less because we will have dramatically fewer unemployed people.

I do have confidence in entrepreneurship and specifically small business in this country. However, we have to take a leap of faith in the small business communities of this country, especially when there are so many of them. We took a leap of faith with the free trade agreement, and I think that if we took a leap of faith with comprehensive tax reform the increased productivity would show dramatic results.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have a very quick question. I used to live in the riding of my hon. friend from York—Simcoe and I am aware of his success as a small businessperson, so when he speaks on this subject I listen very carefully.

He wanted to spare this House some details on what the government has done to reduce the paper burden.

• (1500)

I do not think he should feel he has to spare us the details on this at all. I would like to hear just a few more examples of what the government has been doing to reduce the paper burden for the small business community in Canada.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was a good question.

I will try to go through some of these as quickly as I can. I want to mention to the member for Broadview—Greenwood that I was not inferring that he was not concerned about the Constitution. If my words came out that way, I apologize. Certainly, that was not the intention.

I agree with him completely on simplicity and fairness. That is what I was referring to in some of the other things that I was talking about.

Some of those special arrangements to make it easier for small business, the Work Place Hazardous Materials Information System, the establishment of uniform national information requirements for product suppliers means that small businesses are not faced with labour requirements that differ between provinces. It is a simple little factor, but it makes it easier.

Records of employment: Steps have been taken to implement a simplified mechanism to reduce the paper burden of employers with regard to the unemployment insurance program. Small business co-ordinators have been set up within the CEC.

With regard to domestic workers which a lot of small business people seem to be involved in when they are bringing foreign live-ins to help them in that area, there has been a streamlined administrative procedure that facilitated the processing of requests from employers concerning domestic worker movement.

That seems to make it a lot easier. There have been a number of things under Industry, Science and Technology to help small business reduce the paperwork. A native entrepreneur program has been done. There has been the development of a four page statement of intent form, which is designed to make an initial determination of eligibility for the program.

They no longer have to complete the whole application. They can find out basically by initial letter, saying what their intentions are and how they expect to set the program up. That seems to make a lot of sense to me.

There has been a customs automated data exchange system set up. That is going to help the importers and exporters. That seems to make a lot of sense when you look at it.

The number of types of bonded transactions, there used to be 26 of these. I am not too familiar with that kind of thing, but that brings it down to one.

When you look at the export situation and the statistics that go back and forth between Canada and the United States, the two countries were bringing their own statistics. When one country would do it, the other country would not use theirs.

I think that has eliminated somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200,000 documents every month just by having that type of an agreement with the U.S. There have been a lot of things, whether it be product certification, special import measures, automated customs tariff or simplified income tax guide. These are all the things that have presently been done or are certainly very close to being completed.

I think the federal government has been very supportive. There is probably still lots of room to manoeuvre and lots of steps to take, but we are getting there.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I hoped to have a little longer intervention, but I wanted to at least congratulate the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on the motion that he has put before the House today.

In the years that I have been a member of Parliament, I cannot remember the kind of overt concern there is with the economy. I have never seen people less confident in this country that we will survive. It is not just the government's monetary policy, which has been absolutely Draconian for the last three or four years where we have seen the highest interest rate in real terms in history.

Interest rates have gone down since last spring, but clearly the year before and the year before that, we were looking at 13, 14 and 15 per cent interest rates when the inflation rate was only 3 or 4 per cent, giving a real interest rate of some 8 or 9 per cent. Even when we were at the very high world interest rates in the 1980s, our real interest rates were not any higher than that, and that was an international situation whereas this is brought on by the government.

That combined with a dollar that is over-valued by everybody's estimate has totally jangled the entire business community as to whether it will survive. We see plants closing day after day, moving to the United States. So the member for Broadview—Greenwood must be congratulated for a wonderful motion, a motion which descriptively sets out the concerns that every Canadian has in big business, in small business, right across the land.

Mr. Cole: I do not think there was a question there for me. I think the member was being laudatory and I congratulate him for that.

I do want to comment on one thing. He did not say the same words that are usually used in this House, this made-in-Canada recession, and I find it hard to believe that this made-in-Canada recession affected the United States, affected England, affected Europe, affected all these other countries.

I think it is being a little silly.

We have a world-wide recession and we must accept that fact. Canada is going to come out of it. The Canadian economy is going to boom and small businesses are going to be successful.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I cannot rise to the eloquence of my hon. colleague from Algoma in commending the member for Broadview—Greenwood on his motion, but I too would like to say that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has once again with this motion demonstrated the great contribution that he is making to this place with his ideas, his vision, his energy, his enthusiasm and concern for Canadians. Today it is small businessmen.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Dennis for Prime Minister.

An hon. member: How's that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): We are on a serious subject, Mr. Speaker, and it is difficult to fully comprehend the damage which this government has inflicted on Canadians. No where is this damage more pronounced than in my native Atlantic Canada. We all know the causes of this common distress, the high dollar, the high interest rates, cross-border shopping, the GST, and the most revealing sign of all, almost a million and a half Canadians currently without jobs.

The common denominator is a government whose policies reflect a profound lack of concern for the plight of ordinary Canadians.

Last spring I had the opportunity to co-ordinate the Atlantic portion of the national Liberal task force on the recession and the Canadian economy. My colleagues and I held a total of seven hearings in all four Atlantic provinces. We heard from nearly 100 witnesses, each with their own story to tell, each different, but each with certain common elements.

In New Brunswick we heard from the Chaleurs Regional Development Commission which struck a very familiar note. It argued that federal monetary policies addressed the upper Canadian economy. The present system impacts negatively on Atlantic Canada and offsets any benefits that may accrue to the region through interest buy-down programs since the programs only cover manufacturing and select service sector companies.

Also the paper burden and minimum standards discourage many from applying.

Current federal assistance programs should consider assisting companies to reduce their interest on their operating loans if Ottawa is to continue with a single monetary policy from sea to sea.

What does this have to do with the motion currently before the House, Mr. Speaker? Everything. The motion presented by the hon. member, my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, is timely and well considered. It touches on exactly what our task force heard throughout its travels. It runs to the heart of the crisis which currently befalls Canada's small businesses, business owners and workers, high interest rates, the high dollar, the crushing paper burden which suppresses the entrepreneurial spirit so essential to innovation and success in business, and the need for better funding programs which serve to encourage, not discourage, local small businesses.

The Chaleurs Regional Development Council's primary responsibility is to help small business get off the ground and succeed. That is why our task force was so interested in listening to their comments. What we heard from the council was merely typical of what Canadians in all parts of Canada know to be true.

It is small business which creates the jobs that employ so many Canadians. It is small business which injects so much money into local economies and drives the economic engines of so many small and medium sized towns throughout Canada. It is small business which is suffering most as a result of this government's fiscal and monetary policies.

The government will as usual claim that it has done everything it can for small business. Let me quote an editorial from the Halifax Chronicle Herald which appeared on June 17 of this year:

> A new study by the Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce aims to restore some respect for the region by showing its businesses are getting a bum rap. Some of its findings are compelling. For example, when 1,033 Atlantic businesses were surveyed for the Chamber by Omnifacts Research Limited in March, only a third reported getting financial assistance from government. Only a third of those got help from a federal department or agency. One in nine firms hardly makes Atlantic Canada a hospital ward.

The editorial goes on to say:

> A sensible conclusion is that if Ottawa wants to make a difference in the region, it might worry less about the one in nine firms seeking aid and pay more attention to the one in two which believe they have something to sell at a competitive price.

It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that this editorial appeared under the headline "Getting some respect". That is all small business wants from this government, some respect.

The survey to which this editorial refers was a comprehensive survey performed by Omnifacts Research based in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. Over 1,000 businesses across the four Atlantic provinces were contacted between March 14 and April 9 of this year. The results were quite astonishing.

In terms of government support for entrepreneurs, more than half of the businesses contacted found the level of support to be inadequate in such crucial areas as providing access to skilled labour, direct financial assistance; counselling and guidance, access to science and technology; and information on marketing opportunities.

I was particularly struck by the report's conclusion, however. The findings concluded that businesses in Atlantic Canada "are not looking as much for government help in the traditional forms, i.e. grants and local spending, but are seeking assistance and support of becoming more competitive and self-supporting". The report's conclusion goes on to say that the business community in Atlantic Canada "is recognizing the fundamental changes taking place in the economy, and the growing importance that must be placed on such areas as entrepreneurship, training, technological innovation and broader markets".

It is this, that the motion of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood addresses so succinctly and effectively today. The motion is a strong reflection of the understanding that he has of what businessmen in his riding are currently facing.

It is in these areas where the government has failed our businessmen and women and our entrepreneurs. Not only has it failed them, this government has succeeded in stacking the odds against them. There is no better example of this than the government's implementation of the goods and services tax.

The GST has created havoc for small businessmen. It is difficult to know where to begin in describing it. Let us first begin with the administrative nightmare caused by the increased paper flow. Let us look at the start-up costs imposed on Canadian taxpayers of some $900 million. Let us look at the inflationary jolt which the GST has prompted.

The effect of the GST has been profound and devastating on Canada's small business people. Nowhere has this impact been more pronounced than in the field of cross-border shopping. Canadians are in the midst of a tax revolt and are flocking across the border to purchase cheaper goods in the United States. Canada's small business people have been severely hurt as a result.

The facts speak for themselves. The incidence of one-day trips to the United States by Canadians has increased from 25.9 million in 1986 to 51.8 million in 1990, double the amount. Cross-border shopping has increased by 100 per cent in the last four years and by 20 per cent in the last year alone. This has meant an estimated loss in retail sales of $2.3 billion annually for the Canadian towns and cities near the U.S. border. How can small business people compete, let alone survive?

You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that this year's major league baseball all-star game was played on July 9 in Toronto at the SkyDome. Many Canadians felt an immense amount of pride that Toronto received such media attention in the United States. Of course there was a down side to all this media exposure. One report appeared on ABC World News Tonight where more Americans get their news than from any other news source. This one report showed some American tourists in a Toronto shop shaking their heads in disbelief at the high prices. They wondered aloud how Canadian consumers could get by. It is a wonder they do get by given what this government has done to the economy.

Canada may only just be emerging from a recession brought on primarily by this government's policies. I say may because this is by no means certain. Traditionally when an economy enters a period of recovery after a recession, the corresponding growth is export led. This is not the case this time. Our trade surplus is woefully inadequate, as low as it has been for many years. Quite frankly, there is one reason for this; the high Canadian dollar which many have suggested is a result of some secret deal between our government and the U.S. administration following the free trade negotiations. That certainly has been an allegation of at least one former minister of this government.

For every cent which the Canadian dollar raises against the American dollar, Canada loses some $1.3 billion in exports. Is it any wonder that our supposed recovery from this recession has not been export led? Is it any wonder that we still have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed? Is it any wonder that our entrepreneurs and our small business people are suffering?

What I admire most about the motion before the House is that it draws attention to the important role which small business plays here in Canada. It acknowledges that "the innovations and jobs created by Canadian entrepreneurs constitute the best hope for the Canadian economy and society". I am sure there is nobody in this House who would disagree with that proposition. Surely the government must agree. Surely the government recognizes the integral importance of small business to free enterprise in this country.

I would therefore challenge this government to respond to the second portion of this motion which states that the government must take immediate steps to reduce interest rates, lower the level of the Canadian dollar, reduce the paper burden on small business, and make available more funding and loan guarantees for early stage companies.

At the moment the government is doing exactly the opposite. It is crushing out the entrepreneurial spirit. It is forcing small businesses into bankruptcy with its high dollar and high interest rate policies and, with its taxation policies, is driving Canadian consumers to shop across the border.

It is time that the government reversed these policies and started treating small business with a little respect. It should start realizing the importance that entrepreneurs and small businesses have in economic recovery and start supporting those small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who moved the motion before the House today. The hon. member has a lot of ideas, and this motion gives us a chance to speak directly to the problem facing this country.

For the benefit of those watching us, the motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the innovations and jobs created by Canadian entrepreneurs constitute the best hope for the Canadian economy and society and that, therefore, the government must take immediate steps to reduce interest rates, to lower the level of the Canadian dollar, to reduce the paper burden on small businesses, and make available more funding and loan guarantees for early-stage companies.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood understands the problem perfectly. Not that I had any doubts. However, I don't consider myself an expert, especially since even experts make mistakes. In any case, before discussing economics, I preferred to consult the grass roots, the people who are confronted daily with the problems of small business.

Mr. Speaker, I discussed this motion with a researcher at the Conseil du patronat du Québec. As you know, the CPQ is a provincial agency in Quebec that represents small business. It has thousands of members in the small business community. They discuss the issues, they do research and they have any number of meetings with people every month to help them be competitive in the business world. What the researcher at the CPQ told me was more or less what the hon. member says in his motion, namely that small businesses are stuck with an overvalued dollar, that taxes are too high and above all, there is too much paper burden and red tape.

The CPQ explained—and I already knew this through my personal experience in small business—that Canadian banks belong to one of the most stable banking systems in the world. Canadian banks do not go bankrupt the way they do in the United States, where people lost all their savings because their banking system is not as sound as ours. On the other hand, we have to pay for this stability. Unfortunately, Canadian banks are reluctant to take risks. Real entrepreneurs who want to go to the market face banks that require endorsers as soon as the slightest risk is involved. Our listeners in Quebec know how difficult it is to persuade bank and credit union managers to lend risk capital. This is a very important factor.

It is true our Canadian banks are reliable, but they lent money to Third World countries, and most of those loans have been written off. The banks took risks in Third World countries, countries that seemed to be developing, and they lost hundreds of millions of dollars. I would not dream of giving the banks advice, Mr. Speaker, but I think they should realize that the risk concept is a given in a competitive society like ours, especially under a capitalist system. And even if the banks know there will be losses at the end of the year, it would be worthwhile to consider the concept because it would help small business.

Mr. Speaker, small businesses are a very important part of the economy, as the hon. member from Toronto and other members mentioned earlier. Seventy-five per cent of all jobs in the manufacturing sector in this country were created by small business—75 per cent. That gives you some idea of the strength and energy of small business and how important it is for the government to give them the help they need, and I will get back to this in a few moments.

Big international corporations, take for instance General Motors, have received grants worth more than $200 million to save 2,000 jobs. There is no doubt that the economic situation has a tremendous impact.

But imagine what hundreds of millions of dollars could do for small business, what it could do for the economy in each region. As you know, small business helps regional development—

An hon. member: It helps national unity too.

Mr. Assad: Yes, it helps unite the country, as the hon. member said. Mr. Speaker, not only does small business create 75 per cent of the jobs and help regional development, but without it, regional development would be impossible and small municipalities across Canada would have trouble surviving.

This is just one more reason why the government should consider this question and revise all the rules that existed in the past. I heard some ideas put forward in the House by the government, the NDP and by our own party. All these ideas contain some useful elements, but I think we have to take a radical position. We have to say: Listen, we are convinced, and we need only look at the evidence of the past few years, especially the last ten or fifteen, that small business is the most important motor of our economy. Once we have set aside all the rules we had in the past, we can advance with leaps and bounds. We will take radical steps to ensure that small business gets all the help it needs to develop.

Mr. Speaker, there are solutions, and this was in consultation with the CPQ. First, it is necessary to have loans to promote small business. No handouts, no grants. Small business wants the government to make available or guarantee loans so it can get started. This is one of the most important aspects of developing small business, in other words, ensuring funds are available.

Of course, we don't expect the government or the banks to give small business a blank cheque. There is a certain process, as the CPQ explained, and I understand that. Second, know the market, which is only common sense; third, know your product, and then know the best ways to market it. There are experts in this area so the expertise is there. Of course there is also the question of economic feasibility.

As for the criteria, if small business, if entrepreneurs and beginning entrepreneurs meet these four criteria—and there might be others, of course—but if they can meet these four criteria, they will be prepared to face the competition. They will be productive and competitive. But if they don't get a chance —You cannot make something out of nothing. They need this help. I think that was one of the elements emphasized by the CPQ.

Mr. Speaker, let's not forget training. This is a key element. Without training, you will not get anywhere. There is a debate taking place in France at this very moment, which I am following very closely, and I say this for the benefit of our listeners. The French Minister of Education has realized that training has become extremely important in a highly competitive world where the word productivity is sacred. The French Education Minister said that unfortunately, the French are not like the Germans. As you know, the Germans have a great tradition in their country of apprenticeship schools, technical schools and trade schools. They are the best in this respect.

So the French are starting to realize how important this is and that they also need technical schools and training schools and apprenticeship systems. They have to find industries that are willing to make a major contribution to training. In Germany, industries set the curriculum because they pay for these technical schools, to a considerable extent. Now that is a sensible idea we could use here in Canada. You wouldn't think we had relations with Germany! If the French with their reputation for being inventive and innovative, a reputation they have had for centuries, feel they must look to the German experience which has been extremely positive, we in Canada could also benefit by using this approach to train our labour force.

When we have that kind of training, when governments realize the importance of involving small business, I am sure the banks will sit up and take notice, that risk taking will become a normal thing for entrepreneurs in the small business community and that job creation will be enhanced for the greater benefit of all Canadians.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, since I know him well. He was my provincial counterpart before the most recent federal election. Now that he sits as a federal MP, he is in a position to know that the federal government and the province of Quebec have programs to help small business.

I would like to tell the hon. member about an experience that happened in my riding with the Thundercraft firm. This company was a gem. It made pleasure boats and the city of Lachute and surroundings were very proud of it. The federal government gave a grant as well as a loan. The IDC, the Caisses populaires savings fund and the bank did also. But there was an internal management problem and you know that when that happens, people and workers say: "You should not subsidize a company that way, because due to mismanagement, it is shutting down and it is our money that you are investing in businesses that are going broke."

I would like the hon. member to tell me what restructuring plan he would like. We should be careful, should we not, because our constituents often tell us—as he should know, we live in the same region—that if this company or business is unable after all to manage on its own—

I am telling him about another school of thought of many people who do not want the government to intervene in small business; they want small businesses to get by on their own, without government involvement. How do you reconcile these two points of view, one that wants intervention and the other that does not?

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I took careful note of the comments made by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau. I said that small and medium-sized business want less paperwork and administration. That is true as far as it goes, but I see the government as a catalyst in this area. I am not suggesting more paperwork or criteria to meet; I am just suggesting that the government act as a catalyst and invest money. You know that capital is extremely important in developing small and medium-sized businesses; they need funds. They are not asking for gifts, just for help such as loan guarantees, for example.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richardson) Resuming debate. There are a number of members who wish to get on before the designated hour. It is an important debate so I think we will resume debate with the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to also participate in this very important debate. I congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood in Toronto, which is also my home town, for giving this House the opportunity to discuss a very important issue, small business.

Why is small business an important issue? It is an issue of survivorship, it is an issue of livelihood. Well over 60 per cent of the Canadian economy is made up of small business. Do you think the government of the day is listening? No, it is not. There are close to a million businesses in Canada. Over 60 per cent of them employ less than six employees. We hear on a daily basis of plant closures. We hear of over 300,000 jobs being lost. How many times do we really hear about the tragedy, the devastation of a small business closing in a small Canadian town? That does not make headlines. That is not discussed in this House. We have our party and the government across the way, and we argue over the figures.

If we were to really discuss the figures, if we were to really look at the plant closures and the travesty that this government has wrought on our Canadian people, that figure can jump through the roof.

The need for discussion on small business in this place is not a luxury but a must. We must discuss and explore ways and means to enhance small business throughout Canada. However, the government of the day, the Tory government, has completely failed small businesses. Small businesses are crying out for support, crying out for leadership. The Tory government, however, slaps them with high interest rates, compounded by a Canadian-made recession, the GST, taxes are just killing them.

The government daily claims that times today are better than in 1981-82. In 1981-82 I, too, was a small businessman and I still have friends who are small businessmen. I can assure you that times today are much tougher than in 1981–82. The government daily states that we had more closures in 1981–82. Well, those figures are misleading.

In the first three months of this year, there were 3,540 businesses bankrupt, up 39 per cent from the first three months of 1990. What does this government answer? Is there relief in sight for the small businessman? Is this government going to reach out to the small business community and say: "We are going to work with you hand in hand". No. There is no assistance, there is no leadership for the small businessman.

This government wants to lead us down the garden path. In 1988 this government said: "I have the answer for you; I have got the solution that is going to take Canada into the twenty-first century." And what was that answer? 1-800-M-U-L-R-O-N-E-Y, Canada for Sale.

What does the government of the day want to do today? Ah, hold on. I hear the phone ringing. I hear the phone, through the Prime Minister. "George Bush? Aha, we have got a deal for you. Do we have a deal for you, Canadians." And the deal is free trade with Mexico.

Is the government going to take it to the people of the day? Is the government going to ask the people? Absolutely not. What does it want to do? If it wants to fast-track it. It wants to fast-track it so fast and it wants to put it on the table before the general election.

I ask the government: Why don't you put it to a general election? They know clearly that if they go to the election as far as free trade with Mexico is concerned, they will be turfed out. That is another blow to the Canadian small businessman.

Let us examine for a couple of minutes the free trade with Mexico. Do we need to get into it? Must we get into it? The Prime Minister says: "Look at the European experience. Look what they have done. If we get in here we will have $6 billion or $7 billion more". I can tell the government of the day that the European experience is working. Is free trade with the United States working? Is free trade with Mexico going to work? No. The reason for the failure—and I see members across nodding their heads in agreement—is that if a country in Europe wants to join the European Common Market it is put on a waiting list, on a trial basis for eight to ten years. It is told: "Bring your economy up to par with the rest of us, bring your infrastructure up to par with the rest of us, and then we will consider you". When it becomes a full-fledged member its people are not restricted from travelling from country to country to seek work. Are we allowed to travel to the United States to seek work? No, we are not. Can we travel into the United States to participate in major contracts? No, we cannot. Yet that is how it is in the European Common Market.

If we compare apple and oranges, which we are doing, and try to say that this is an apple and this is an orange and they look alike, it will not work because they do not. The European experience has clearly demonstrated that it will work. When in the 1970s and 1980s the Prime Minister of the Liberal government of the day was saying: "let us reach out to the European community and become partners with them, let us reach out and work with them", nobody was listening. The Prime Minister of today has the answer: "Let us go down to the States". It is a sellout.

Wages in Mexico are 85 cents an hour. The people of Mexico have to work 56 to 58 hours per week. Some 400,000 people a year in Mexico join the unemployment roles. The president of Mexico said: "If you do not join with us we are going to release all these people to come up north". Frankly I do not care about his people. I care about my children. I care about the future of Canadian children. Do we need to place our people at the same level as the Mexicans? Do we need to expose our children to the environmental hazards that the children of Mexico are facing?

I want to discuss one particular item. In Mexico there are containers that contain different liquids and fluids. After they are finished with them at the factory, people take them home and use them as basins for drinking water. They can be hazardous yet the children drink from them. Do we need to lower our standard of living to that if we are to assist Mexico? If we are to become participating partners in trade with Mexico, why do we not give Mexico the opportunity to improve its standard of living? When it is at par with us then we join. I do not mind competing and I am sure no Canadian is afraid of hard work and competition. However, I do not like to engage in a competition with both my hands and feet tied behind my back. That is not fair competition.

I want to close with two thoughts. First, I want to congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for giving us the opportunity to discuss small businesses. Second, I see the minister across and I want to say to him that the engine that drives Canada, that drives the Canadian economy, is something called small business.

I have been a small businessman and I know what it is like when the banker calls you and says: "I am calling in your loan". I know what it is like when you have to pay your taxes at the end of the month. I know what it is like in January and February when your sales drop about 20 per cent compared to the other months, and you cannot make ends meet. If we do not reach out to the small businesses, work with them and support them we will not succeed and our bankruptcy rates will increase.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, clearly this debate today is one of the most important because of the importance of the small business sector of our economy in providing jobs. It has emerged as the key employer during the past several years of the recession.

I am pleased that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism is here in the House today. He has had a special responsibility during the last year and a half in my constituency as the minister designated by the Deputy Prime Minister to assist in the massive transition taking place in the community of Elliot Lake, Ontario.

They are expecting over the next three or four years to lose all the mining jobs, which 18 months ago totalled 4,000. There have been lay-offs involving 2,400. There will be another 1,000 next spring and another 600 in 1996.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses has been extremely helpful and of much assistance in his concern for that community, especially in matters relating to the proposed community college for northern Ontario francophones. He has come on side and has been very supportive of the community. We are very appreciative of that. I believe that the Small Business Incentive Program under FEDNOR has been very beneficial.

I want to mention simply that I think FEDNOR is our major instrument for northern Ontario regional development. I believe that when restructuring that organization next year the minister should be given more powers. He should have the powers to move, to restructure our industry.

We have a pulp and paper industry which is in very serious difficulty. Whether it is this minister or the future minister, he really needs to have the department behind him. He has to have the support of the Government of Canada for the restructuring of that industry, just as in 1982 and 1983.

Similarly I believe he needs to have powers with regard to making federal-provincial agreements for tourism and other sectors. I hope as the minister moves to reorganize FEDNOR to meet the challenges of the 1990s he will accept some of the recommendations which have been coming forward from members throughout northern Ontario on both sides of the aisle.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the member has caucus meetings as we do in the Conservative Party. Without telling me any secrets from the deliberations of his caucus, could he tell what would happen if the Liberals were forming the government today? I hope no Liberal government will ever form the government. We know what the Liberal government did when it was in power.

The question I would ask the member is whether he will back any suggestion by his colleagues to tear up the free trade agreement. Yes or no.

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, we have caucus meetings and we discuss things. We do not say my way or no way like they do in their caucus meetings. They go there, stand up and salute. In our caucus meetings we discuss and listen to each other.

The question that was put was: Will we look at the free trade agreements? Do we need to participate in free trade with Mexico?

We know very well, first hand, what free trade with the United States did. We know very well, first hand, what free trade with Mexico will do. Do we need to participate? Do we need to look at it? We do not want any part of it. We do not even want to see it.

As far as the existing agreement is concerned, my constituents in Scarborough—Agincourt are telling me: "Tear it up".

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the Chair for accommodating so many speakers in this very important debate this afternoon.

I also want to offer my congratulations to my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. His commitment to small business is unrivalled. He has worked tenaciously on this issue and has brought it to the floor today. I congratulate him for that. We are all beneficiaries of his outstanding efforts.

Small business is a mighty force in our economy. It is all around us, it is pervasive and extremely important. We have heard that so many times today. I was thinking that you do not need a lot of data and a lot of statistics to get some sense of the presence of small business. I was thinking of the small businesses just around my riding office on Portage Avenue in Winnipeg. Just in the block where my office is located there is a dry cleaning shop, a funeral home, a couple of restaurants, a grocery store, a printing shop, a dress shop, a travel agency, a florist and a lock service, a company that replaces and repairs locks which you find on your doors. It gives you a sense of how important small business is in our lives. I give my full support to this motion prepared by my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, a motion which calls on the government to take immediate steps to reduce interest rates, to lower the level of the Canadian dollar, to reduce the paper burden on small businesses and make available more funding and loan guarantees for early stage companies.

I think that is a very appropriate and timely motion.

Madam Speaker, I want to give you some sense, a profile, of small business in my home province of Manitoba. In 1988, the last year for which we have figures, there were 36,171 firms with paid employees in my province. Ninety-two per cent of those firms were small businesses with 50 employees or less. Small firms accounted for one-third of the employees of those 36,000 companies.

Madam Speaker, I want to give you another figure which underlines the importance of small business in this country and especially in my province of Manitoba. In the 10-year period ending 1988, 60,000 new private sector jobs were created, 84 per cent of which were created by small businesses with 50 employees or less.

Not only that, 57 per cent of those 60,000 new jobs were created by companies with five employees or less. It gives you some idea of how important small business is in my province.

Measure that against the performance of big corporations. Big firms in my province with 500 or more workers actually had a net loss of 400 jobs in that very same period, that 10-year period ending in 1988.

Small business is very important and it will measure up against any business in this country. In fact, I am glad that the minister responsible for small business pointed that out earlier today in his speech.

The reason we are having this debate today is because small business is hurting. It is bleeding and it needs our attention. It especially needs the attention of this government. Small business is battered by high taxes, high interest rates and the high dollar.

Let us take high taxes, for example. The GST has created an additional burden on small business. It came at a terrible time when the economy was in recession and remains in recession. It has created a lot of chaos for small business and it has especially created a lot of paperwork.

Let me talk about paperwork for a moment. I have a figure here which I came across the other day which astounds me. I think this comes from the CFIB, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It says that small firms have to spend up to 15 times the effort on government regulations compared to their larger business counterparts. That is a terrible burden to put on small business.

I said earlier that small businesses were being battered by high interest rates. I am disappointed in the government spokesman when it comes to the matter of high interest rates because the government seems to be preoccupied with interest rates that were in place 10 years ago, 11 years ago.

There was a terrible problem with high interest rates 10 years ago. Nobody denies that. The government of today must face its responsibilities which are those high interest rates of the moment, not 10 years ago. I wish it would forget about its preoccupation with high interest rates of 10 years ago. That will not solve today's problems.

The high dollar is worrisome. It is a serious problem because it makes it so much more difficult for our businesses to export, particularly to the United States.

There was an analysis done by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business as it relates to Manitoba. It is an analysis that I want to read into the record. It goes just like this:

> Our analysis clearly shows that the tax structure in Manitoba is unfair for small businesses. Although the total tax burden is similar for small and large firms, small firms pay a higher proportion of taxes unrelated to profits—a circumstance that greatly restricts their room to manoeuvre. Tax structures are designed for large firms even though 98 per cent of firms in Canada have less than 50 employees. As a major source of industrial innovation, economic development, and job creation, Manitoba small businesses play a key role in the economy. They account for over three-quarters of the net new jobs created in this province and are the life-blood of many communities.

I wanted to read that analysis into the record because it tells us something about the situation faced by small business in the province of Manitoba.

The other matter I wanted to mention is attributed to a survey done by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It was a survey that was done a number of months ago. This is troublesome and worrisome because it indicated that the business community, particularly the small business community, lacked confidence in the future. They are pessimistic. They worry about this government's policies, and they are concerned mainly because of some of the things that I have already mentioned, high interest rates, high dollar, the GST, for example. They are concerned about those matters.

Let me mention one thing about the GST and how perhaps the government can do a better job in how this tax is administered. There is an airline company located in my riding. It had an airplane engine waiting for it at the border just south of Winnipeg. The GST on that airplane engine was $25,000. That is a lot of money to a small business.

At the very time that Revenue Canada, or its excise department, was asking for $25,000 on this airplane engine, this small company located in my riding already had a $60,000 credit on its account with Revenue Canada. So they called Revenue Canada and said: "You want $25,000 on this airplane engine but you already, in effect, owe us $60,000. How would you like to just sort of juggle the books or juggle the figures so that we do not have to pay the $25,000. After all, you owe us $60,000". They would not do it. I think that is something Revenue Canada could address because it would make it easier for small business.

Again, I want to congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. I think this is a very important motion. It is something all of us should support because business is vital to the economy of Canada.

• (1600)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the member for Broadview—Greenwood on a job very well done. He certainly had the interest of small business in his mind when he introduced this motion.

There is one segment I would like to bring to the attention of my colleague from Winnipeg. It is the question of outreach, the training and retraining when it comes to small business.

In my riding, for example, many businessmen and women in a large number of small businesses and the service sector, whether they are restaurants or retail industries and so on, would love to get their hands on some sort of a retraining program where they could have access to some training courses or training facilities.

I would like to have my colleague comment on the question of training when it comes to small business. In his view, would this not be a good thing for the government to look at in conjunction with the provincial government, some outreach programs that help small business to get training?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thirty seconds for the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I will recognize the time limit.

Yes, I think it is a very good idea put forward by my colleague from Ottawa. I have heard that from small business, that it wants help with respect to training its workers, particularly at a time when the federal government is cutting back on job training and many of the school divisions in our province are also cutting back. It is troublesome.

What the government can do in that regard would be very helpful.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now consider Private Members' Business in the order listed in today's Order Paper.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should enter into an agreement with the government of Nova Scotia, targeting federal and provincial moneys for the subsidization of CN freight rates in order to allow freight transportation rates in the port of Halifax to compete with those in the port of Montreal and maintain valuable traffic in the port of Halifax.

She said: Madam Speaker, before I begin my statement, I just want to say that, in anticipation, my hon. friend for the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who will be the second speaker from my party in this, will be bringing a friendly amendment to delete the words "with those in the port of Montreal". I say this so we will know that from the beginning. It was a misprint.

Mr. Speaker—Oh, Madam Speaker. I apologize. Je suis désolée.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that I do not take it as a sexist remark. Ever since the day when the hon. member for Don Valley West, who was then in the chair, was called Madam Speaker, I have not taken offence.

The hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Absolument, Madam Speaker.

In the summer of 1749, Edward Cornwallis led a tiny flotilla of wooden ships into a sheltered bay on the east coast of North America. Cornwallis and his men were awe struck at the depth and width of the finely sheltered harbour, the thickly wooded shore and an inner basin completely protected from the wild north Atlantic.

It is written that the harbour was so abundant with fish that a bucket could be lowered into the water and returned brimming with cod, mackerel and herring.

Cornwallis wrote in his log that all the officers and men agree that the harbour is the finest they have ever seen.

For the last two centuries, the fortunes of the city that Cornwallis founded, Halifax, have ebbed and flowed with the tides of history. Possessing the finest deep water harbour in North America, Haligonians have been secure in the knowledge that as their port prospered so would they.

After two world wars, and the most devastating man-made explosion before Hiroshima, we have survived. In 1991, however, that heritage is threatened. Our port is ill and it may be terminally ill. It is ill because of the lethargy of this government and the near-sightedness of this government. The harbour is emptying of ships, the piers and jetties are vacant, the cranes lie dormant. Recently the ports two largest customers, Hapag-Lloyd and ACL announced that they would be moving most of their business to a rival port. In economic terms the cost is $20 million. In human terms, 90 stevedores will lose their jobs. Soon Evergreen container lines will leave, along with the ships of the K-Line.

Why? A combination of exorbitant rail rates by the CN monopoly, an oppressive tax structure, an unfair subsidization of rival ports have created an atmosphere hostile to the port of Halifax. One example is CN's refusal to initiate double-stack rail service between Montreal and Halifax as competitors had in other areas until only three weeks ago when CN through the financial contribution of the provincial government of Nova Scotia finally signed a deal. It was the provincial government that made the step, not the federal government.

The port of Halifax currently employs 6,000 people directly or indirectly. That employment is at the centre of the economic community that is Halifax. The city and indeed the entire region revolves around the goods and services that enter or exit through our port and 6,000 direct jobs.

Further, the activity that surrounds the port is $315 million in personal income, $356 million in revenues and $87 million in direct taxation to this government. Consequently, by pointedly ignoring the port the government does itself damage.

Last year, 2,084 vessels entered the port, 791 carrying containers. Statistics indicate that Halifax is chief among Canadian ports in moving Canadian containers.

What about the other myriad of cargo bound for international destinations? That cargo is being shipped through ports that are being supported by governments that have their eye on the 21st century and the best example I can offer is the port of New York which receives tremendous support from the federal government of the United States.

Then we have the condition of the railways. Any discussion of the port depends on the condition of the infrastructure surrounding it. The infrastructure in Halifax is crumbling because CN has allowed the transportation world to pass them buy. One industry expert recently stated that the ships were not leaving because of the port itself but because of the railway.

U.S. railways pay 8 cents per litre in fuel taxes. By comparison CN Rail pays 9.1 cents per litre. Why? Because this government refuses to follow the lead of the provincial government in Nova Scotia and give the railway a tax break.

Canadian railways currently pay 11 times the amount of fuel taxes that their U.S. competitors do. Further, Canadian railways carry the burden of sales tax that is 4.8 per cent higher than U.S. railways. On domestic goods the disadvantage is at 11.8 per cent on all movement of goods.

CN Rail is at a further disadvantage in terms of depreciation rates in the U.S. A railway in the United States can write off any rail related asset within seven years. In Canada after seven years a railway such as CN will only be able to write off 38 per cent of a railway car, 49 per cent of a locomotive and 23 per cent of a track investment. Therefore, in the United States a railway such as the Delaware and Hudson—the infamous D&H belonging largely to Canadian Pacific, Canadian Pacific which does get federal government help—rolls 90 per cent of its freight over 50 per cent of its track, while CN rolls 90 per cent of its freight over one-third of its track. The result of this policy is that CN Rail has a lot of unused track lying around which it cannot afford to keep up.

What Halifax really needs is quite simply a well integrated route transportation system. Why then was it left solely to the province of Nova Scotia to institute double-stack rail systems? Why must the premier of Nova Scotia go hat in hand to Evergreen, an Italian container line, to beg them to stay with the port of Halifax?

This government has stacked the deck against us in Nova Scotia, even against a government its own stripe, even against its own colleagues. The tax burden, among other things, must be lifted immediately. For example, total sales tax paid by CN in 1989 was nearly $92 million, $55 million of which was paid federally and would not have been levied in the United States. When we are in competition directly with the port of New York, this means a great deal and the great deal it means is hurtful to the port of Halifax.

A recent report, the Brooks Report by the Centre for International Business Studies at Dalhousie University cited inequalities in industrial support for ports, operating differences and fiscal policies of this government as the root cause of the decline of the port of Halifax, not over-capacity on the north Atlantic as we have heard over and over again ad nauseam.

The report was also unequivocal in its praise of Halifax as a competitor. The port of Halifax boasts the lowest price per TEU slot, TEU being the technical name for a container, the best number of moves per gang hour, second best in the highest number of TEUs moved, and the best pilotage charges.

It is not as though the port was asking the government for an unfair subsidy. Rather we wish to level the field between ourselves and our competitors. I spoke twice before today about our competition with the port of New York. Let me emphasize the kind of subsidy that the port of New York gets. Just in the past two years, the port of New York received $350 million from the government of the United States to upgrade its facilities. At the same time New York harbour, which needs to be dredged, which Halifax harbour does not, receives free dredging on an annual basis from the American corps of engineers. We have not even been able to find out how much money this means in lieu of grant.

Halifax on the other hand does not get a dime from this government that preaches competitiveness. That is what we want. We want the opportunity to be competitive.

If Halifax could be on an equal footing with New York, we know we could show how our port is superior to that port and how we could move the goods better and faster.

On May 29 I rose in this House to ask the government if it would recommit programs to the port and at least to recognize that the situation was critical. At that time the focus of the discussion was this government's termination of the At and East rail subsidy. I asked this government, if every region of Canada is important will the Minister of Transport explain why the government has failed to intervene and failed to undertake the necessary assistance to create a truly level playing field for the port of Halifax.

Again on September 19 I rose in the House to ask the government why it would not release a Ports Canada study concerning the competitiveness of the port of Halifax. We wanted to know what the bad news was, and we still do. We still have not been told.

The Prime Minister stood up and told me that he had had meaningful discussions with the premier, but again no details.

On September 25 again a question, and again I was told that I would hear something very soon.

Madam Speaker, very soon has come and gone. The people of Halifax, the people of Nova Scotia, the people of an entire region cannot afford to wait. We need answers. We need programs, and we need them now.

I propose that this government treat the port of Halifax with the same attitude that every other seafaring nation treats its most valuable asset, with understanding and a healthy proactive attitude. Give us a chance to compete. That is all we ask for, that chance.

We believe that we have the best natural harbour in the world—and it is not just that we believe it, it is a fact. Others state it. Internationally it is recognized as the best natural harbour in the world, and we want the government to let us prove it.

The National Transportation Act must be amended to allow CN Rail to depreciate its obsolete equipment. That would be one major step in the right direction.

The federal government should follow the province of Nova Scotia in alleviating the fuel excise tax on transportation of goods from Halifax to Montreal. Canadian railways are taxed, as I said before, at a rate 11 times higher than the American competitors and I add again that the main American rail competitor that hurts Halifax is D&H and it is owned—how many times have I said it, how many times will I say it—by Canadian Pacific which receives a great deal of help from this federal government. If we are going to compete, then this must not be allowed to continue.

Section 157 of the National Transportation Act must be amended to allow the railway to depreciate their equipment within seven years. Statistics show that CN Rail currently moves almost all of its freight over only a small percentage of its track. Such an amendment will allow CN Rail to spend more money on the lowering of rail rates and instituting new procedures such as providing intermodal facilities.

The federal government must allow entities such as Ports Canada to become the master of the land they operate. In the United States, an organization such as the Port Authority of New York can charge tolls from the bridges and tunnels that surround it. The money is then poured back into the operation in order to lower costs to customers. Ports in Canada have to be in charge of their own destinies.

There is another cancellation that concerns us and that is the cancellation of the At and East subsidy. I have spoken on that more times than I or I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary would care to remember. Actually the program was designed to prevent American ports such as New York and Buffalo from walking all over us. It was not just another handout to the Atlantic provinces. The problem is, Madam Speaker, that the American ports are currently walking all over us.

We need the grain that the At and East subsidy brought to Halifax move through our port. The elimination of that section of the Railway Act has already closed the grain elevator at Saint John, it has reduced the grain elevator in Halifax by almost two-thirds of its capacity with a commensurate loss of jobs. How long will the historic grain elevator at the edge of Halifax harbour remain open? We do not know the answer to that question and we are almost afraid to ask.

Taxes on the operating profits of the railway should be formulated to encourage the upgrading of rolling stock, road beds, terminal facilities and new technology. If the government refuses to put CN on an equal footing with the Americans, then could it not devise some form of tax credit system on the vital export traffic that CN carries? The amount of the credit could be calculated on the percentage of total volume of the import-export traffic.

Madam Speaker, most important is that all the concerned interests—the federal government, the provincial government, the port of Halifax, the city of Halifax, and the various sectors of the business community—must meet together to formulate an immediate plan of action. It has to be done and it has to be done soon. The economy of one of our oldest and most historic cities depends upon it. The spin-off from this port is of vital importance to an entire province and a great deal of the port economy is vital to an entire region.

Madam Speaker, I have spoken and will continue to speak on this issue as long as I have a voice and a place in this House. I therefore ask that this motion be accepted.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing the subject again to the House.

I know that the hon. member has a sincere concern for the port of Halifax. But in the commercial world in which the port of Halifax competes, it is more helpful to convince business to use your services because of your assets than to hold up potential problems at every opportunity. But I am not here to stifle criticism. Every person and every business, every port and, yes, even every government can learn from criticism. They can learn from the voice that presents options, that presents solutions.

Madam Speaker, I want to set before the House today some of the facts about the port of Halifax and about the action taken at all levels to counter some of the threats facing the port today.

After the recession in 1981-82, containerized traffic through Halifax was 183,000, 20-foot equivalent units. Through solid management, marketing efforts and a stable partnership with our railways, the traffic at the port of Halifax grew at a faster rate than the economy. In 1990, traffic reached a level of 447,000, 22-foot equivalent units, or two and a half times the level of 1983.

The fact that the traffic more than doubled in six or seven years is worth mentioning and is to the credit of the port of Halifax and to its workers.

The port of Halifax handles a variety of products.

• (1620)

Container traffic accounted for less than 25 per cent of the port's total tonnage in 1990. Increases in the amounts of roll-on roll-off cargo, miscellaneous general cargo and bulk traffic helped Halifax set record total tonnages for the fifth consecutive year.

The port's cargo handling capabilities continue to be expanded to meet demand, and state of the art container handling equipment has been installed. The port and its terminal operators provide a high level of productivity and fast vessel turnaround times for their customers.

The natural advantages of the port of Halifax, its location, the solid management, the support of railway companies and all the conditions that contributed to the growth of Halifax, continue to exist.

We also have to face the challenges for the future. The world recession has negatively affected many sectors and traffic losses are painful wherever they occur. On the other hand, international trade remains a vital sector for growth of the Canadian economy and traffic on the North Atlantic may soon pick up again.

The development of a strong trading bloc in Europe, and efforts to introduce a greater reliance on market forces in eastern Europe may produce new opportunities for ports such as Halifax. Co-ordination of marketing efforts, maintenance of a partnership with railways and quality of the infrastructure should allow solid performances in the future. Co-operative efforts are particularly important today. Ports do not simply provide the termination of one handling activity and the commencement of another.

Ports today are a key element of an intermodal approach made possible by container technology. Canadian ports face stiff competition from our neighbours to the south.

It is a reality that many Canadian shippers are using American ports for a variety of reasons. For a trading nation such as Canada, this freedom of commerce has always been beneficial since it allows the use of more flexible alternatives and full benefits of advantages of certain routes. Such routing flexibility sometimes presents problems since competition is more acute. This is the case now.

With the recession and development of American land bridges, eastern American ports are facing more competition from west coast ports and, in turn, are trying to maintain their traffic base through competition with Canadian ports.

In order to compete with the U.S. ports, Canadian ports must offer efficient, effective services, particularly on inland movements. In the container world of the 1990s, this invariably means double stack railway cars.

Last month the port and the province of Nova Scotia announced an agreement with CN which would see provincial funding of up to $11.1 million made available for the lease and purchase of double stack rail cars. The plan eventually calls for the implementation of 80 of the so-called "5-packs" to operate in assigned service between Halifax and central Canada.

The operating savings to be derived from the use of these cars should afford rate reductions on the CN rail movement, addressing in this co-operative and positive manner what I know has been a major concern.

While double stack rail cars are not the sole answer to the port of Halifax's container problems, they do represent an opportunity for one of the major intermodal elements to obtain savings in operating costs.

The recent announcement by the Hon. Donald Cameron, premier of Nova Scotia, regarding direct provincial assistance to the port of Halifax is a particularly welcome manifestation of the collaborative spirit that is needed to help this port in its present difficulties.

In addition to the commitment to fund the double stack rail cars, the province has also announced the setting up of a task force under the Hon. Gerald Regan to inquire into ways to assist the competitiveness of the port of Halifax.

I would also like to point out that the province of Nova Scotia has consistently assisted the movement of rail cargo through the province in that it remains the only province which assesses no excise tax on locomotive fuel, an element that has been consistently identified with contributing to the cost burden of the railways in other provinces.

For its part, the port has made several tariff concessions aimed at improving its attractiveness to foreign ocean lines while at the same time remaining competitive with U.S. east coast ports. Among these, the port has capped its berthage charges and offered a wharfage discount incentive on all traffic originating or destined for the U.S.A., a market in which the port is anxious to expand its market share.

At the same time, the port has instituted a maximum limit to the number of times a liner operation must pay harbour dues, a measure certain to be of interest to those lines which call repetitively at the port. Finally, certain other port tariffs have been frozen for two years.

The city of Halifax too has come to the assistance of the port. This year CERES and HALTERM will each have their taxes trimmed significantly. For three more years they will pay taxes of 1.5 per cent to 3 per cent of revenue, based on the volume of traffic. HALTERM president Brian Doherty is quoted as saying that the tax cut and the deal by Canadian National and the provincial government to introduce double stacking rail service, which is estimated to lower rail costs by 20 per cent, should restore competitiveness with New York and her other competitors.

There remains, however, other tax problems. The Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission identified railway fuel taxes as a major problem. U.S. carriers pay a meagre .3 per cent of revenues in fuel taxes, one-eleventh of the level in Canada. The port is also party to an exciting new initiative employing the latest in modern transportation communications technology: electronic data interchange, otherwise known as EDI.

EDI is a computer-to-computer exchange of business documents resulting in lower costs and improvements in efficiency and service for all participants in the transport chain.

EDI Port Atlantic is an organization of port users and service providers committed to the development and promoting of EDI at the port of Halifax. The demonstrated benefits resulting from EDI include: one, the significant reduction of administrative costs by eliminating the need for paper documentation; two, the reduction of errors and duplication of work; three, the provision of more accurate and efficient means to book, track, pay for and clear cargo. EDI also provides for easier instantaneous access to more accurate cargo information, and it reduces delays and speeds up the through movement of cargo.

The port of Halifax EDI project is said to be the most advanced of its kind in Canada and one of the most comprehensive port EDI systems in North America. It is expected to be fully operational by 1992.

What I hope I have made clear here is that it is important that everyone works together in searching for new solutions to our problems. Nobody in Canada is interested in seeing the loss of important jobs, and it is surely possible to work together to develop new approaches that will help find solutions to improved productivity and to remain competitive.

The province and partners such as the Halifax–Dartmouth Port Development Commission are doing this. In a market system this is how the key decisions are made. The government can be a facilitator, but fundamentally the various partners have to get together and it may be possible to develop new alliances for marketing or for services.

It may be necessary to reinforce our alliance with shipping lines serving the port. The current adjustments, decisions and discussions do not yet include any easy or final answers to the challenges facing the port. But certainly it is not subsidies, artificially low rates or a tax against the key partners that will produce a solution.

There are positive signs of an early return to prosperity and the port of Halifax will remain a vital element in the support of Canadian and North American trade.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of the motion in the name of the member for Halifax, just as I was pleased to argue for its inclusion as a votable item before the House management committee when we made the last round of selections.

I do so because the member has offered one of the solutions that is necessary to be considered for the survival of not just the port of Halifax, but the port of Vancouver, and in a lot of ways of all of our other ports in this country.

I think we all recognize that there has been a major shift, both bilaterally between Canada and the United States, thanks to deregulation, and internationally because of the growing dominance of the Pacific Rim markets. In fact what has happened is in the United States there is a greater tendency now for the west coast ports to capture much of the traffic and send it to the Pacific Rim, therefore setting up the east coast U.S. ports having to look at Canada as a possible source of new markets. In fact, they have been doing that very effectively with subsidies by states. With the low tax regimes, with the low fuel tax regimes, they are able to out-compete Canadian rail, and therefore Canadian harbours.

One specific example: It costs in terms of fuel taxes alone both federal and provincial $10,000 for a train to go from Toronto to Vancouver. The equivalent distance in the United States is $1,000. I think we have to recognize that situation, just as we have to recognize the depreciation amounts in terms of the capital, as well as other costs are different between Canada and the United States. While we always want to say we have to set our own scenario here in Canada, we have to recognize that a port in Halifax that is competing with a port in New York, whether it is New York City or New York state, has to compete against that port.

They, as a company—if you like to call the port a company—can only do so much to reduce their costs whether it is through efficiencies, volume, changes in labour relations or any of the other variables that are available to them until it is necessary for the governments involved provincially and federally to assist them.

The members opposite would like to refer to any kind of public assistance as a subsidy. I like to think of it as an investment.

If we look at the investment provided to Atlantic Canada by the At and East rates up until the time this government eliminated them, we would see that the treasury of Canada and the treasury of Nova Scotia got much more money back because of the literally thousands of people who had employment because of that investment.

As the member for Halifax just described it, one elevator has been closed completely. Another one is downscaled considerably, throwing many, many people directly and indirectly out of work.

If I look at the motion before us calling for a federal–provincial program to subsidize the CN freight rates, I see that as an investment in stability. I see it as an investment in the long-term future of the port of Halifax and also in the long-term future of CN Rail between Montreal and the port of Halifax.

Madam Speaker, I do not think I need to remind you and I certainly do not need to remind those people who have knowledge about transportation that there is a real danger. If we do not find a solution, whether it is this one or others, we may not have rail transportation, freight transportation between Montreal and the port of Halifax.

We are already seeing the line up to Cape Breton being sold or at least a desire to be sold. That was something that I predicted when the Conservative government decided to eliminate passenger services from that line. We said that the next thing will be the elimination of the tracks, and the government through CN is now taking that first step.

That has had an impact on the port of Halifax, on the community of Halifax, the passenger rail reduction because people are no longer going there to do their business, to do their medical. They are staying home.

We have to recognize there is competition, but we have to recognize that we have the ability to provide some solutions. Ensuring low freight rates on the CN line will ensure that the container traffic which right now is railed from Montreal to Halifax will continue, that it will not be diverted either by an American-owned railroad or—dare I say it—by a Canadian-owned railroad from Montreal to somewhere in New York state.

If that does happen, that will also put in jeopardy the domestic container trade that is centred in the Halifax service area within Atlantic Canada. If the major container ships are no longer calling at Halifax or if they are only calling to do a bit of a top-up, they are probably not going to call that often.

This means that the domestic industry, the little bit that exists in Atlantic Canada, will also be in jeopardy. What does it mean for the Canadian economy if we allow this diversion to occur? It affects our balance of payments, it affects taxation and it affects employment because all those benefits are found south of the border.

It also affects our ability to have a secure source of supply from east to west where we have control as opposed to having to rely on the whims of either the United States government or the port in the United States or the railroad in the United States. What happens if that container ship is first filled up with American cargo and there are American preference laws that we have to deal with? That means our containers of Canadian products will be left sitting on the docks in New York waiting for another ship. We lose our ability to market effectively because we cannot guarantee when those products will reach their destination.

I would urge the House to support this motion, the concept of which is to find a solution to a very real crisis. It is not a new crisis because in June 1990 the Standing Committee on Transport heard from the Halifax–Dartmouth Port Development Commission about the danger. Then, in December 1990, that same commission submitted a brief to the Minister of Finance, I assume as part of the pre-budget work, stating its case in a very effective and detailed manner. But there has been no action.

The provincial assistance does not include federal money. There has been no assistance to do the double stacking. There has been no indication that the government is looking at the federal fuel tax rates, no indication that it is trying to encourage other provinces to reduce fuel taxes on rail.

This government has failed, even though publicly and privately the people of Halifax have made their case through the development commission. It is time this Houses seizes this issue and accepts the motion of the member for Halifax to send a signal to the government that it is time for action to ensure the long-term survival of the port of Halifax.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate this afternoon. You no doubt know that my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, has been working for a long time to improve the lot of her constituents who work in the Port of Halifax. And of course, my colleague from Dartmouth has also raised this issue in the House many times.

Voters in both these ridings and in many other regions are concerned about the future of this port.

[English]

It is not only in Halifax where people are worried about conditions. It is indeed the same, although perhaps not as severe, for other ports as well.

I do not want to take up much of the time of the House this afternoon. I however want to make a minor amendment, I will call it a friendly amendment, to the bill. Its purpose is to remove some of the words from the bill.

My colleague from Halifax initially raised this in her remarks earlier today. The amendment, which I will propose in a few minutes, will essentially remove the reference to the port of Montreal from the bill. Obviously the greatest threat at the present time for the port of Halifax is the port of New York and other ports along the Atlantic seaboard. More and more it is becoming obvious that the threat to that port is on the American side. That same threat is going to threaten other ports unless we are vigilant in our efforts to save the port of Halifax. It will eventually threaten other ports. Indeed the port of Montreal is not immune to competition from those ports south of the border. I know that some of our colleagues across the way like to talk a lot about competition. I see my good friend from Duvernay and he is a big fan of competition. I know because we sometimes tease each other about such issues.

Mr. Della Noce: I prefer competition not coalition.

Mr. Boudria: Competition not coalition he says. A good expression indeed. But the competition in transport and transport infrastructure is a rather difficult expression in any case, because the terms are used in various ways depending on who is speaking them. Of course when one talks about transportation and artificial rates of anything, I always return to the Canadian Western Grain Transportation Act and how it is an alleged subsidy to transport grain, or at least the Americans say it is. When we tell them: "Well don't you dredge the Mississippi River to carry goods down that river," they say: "Oh no, that is not the same, that is for national defence."

I cannot help but grin every time I hear them say that because, of course, it is used for transportation of commercial goods just as our rail lines are used for transportation of commercial goods. Indeed, south of the border, the massive construction some years ago of the interstate transportation system for motor vehicles was totally subsidized. Roads are government owned as they should be.

Nevertheless all subsidies in the area of transportation are a controversial subject and one which is difficult to evaluate at any time. The fact remains that jurisdictions on both sides of the border must maintain their transportation infrastructure in order to ensure the security of their respective nations and in order to be able to transport, quickly and efficiently, goods to markets and to protect the jobs of their citizens.

Madam Speaker, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting the following words:

—with those in the port of Montreal—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will, for the moment, take the amendment under advisement and we will resume debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, I think everything has been said. If everyone agrees, I am prepared to skip my turn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will ask the House to give me a few moments to consider this amendment.

The amendment moved by the hon. member seems in good order. Since no other members are rising in debate, I will first put the question on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is now on the main motion, as amended.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost, on division.

Motion negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There will be no objection to my calling it five o'clock.

It being 5 p.m, pursuant to Standing Order 29(2), this House stands adjourned until Monday, October 21, 1991, at 11 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 4.43 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBER FOR EDMONTON NORTH

Mr. Speaker: I would like to take a moment to make a brief statement.

[English]

I am sure that all hon. members would join with me in welcoming back our colleague who has successfully gone through the rigours of some medical infirmities. I think you can see that the hon. member for Edmonton North is back with us in full vigour again.

I want to say to our colleague that we are very, very pleased to see him back with us. We are so very pleased that he is back in good health.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1110)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to thank all those members who wrote such wonderful letters, particularly the Speaker, and for all the wonderful fruit I received at the Royal Ottawa Rehab. Every one of you who did all those wonderful little things for me, when I get a chance to have Question Period I will see that you are recognized, at least for a supplementary. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES FOUNDATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic) moved that Bill C-282, an act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation be now read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee A.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to rise today in the House to speak to my private member's bill which is basically the result of all the work done by First Nations' educators and language specialists.

Before I proceed I would like to share with the members of this House, as well as the Canadian public, the true essence of what aboriginal people are all about in an educational, social and cultural sense; that is, the gift of language we were given by our ancestors from generation to generation, indeed for hundreds and even thousands of years since these are oral traditions.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Dene-North Slavey.]

Mr. Speaker, I just gave a brief introduction about aboriginal languages in one of the aboriginal languages. It is an Athabascan language. It is the Slavey language and it is North Slavey because I am of the North Slavey tribe, if you will.

I indicated to the people across this country that in Canada we have 53 aboriginal languages. The Dene language is one of those. Basically, many of those 53 languages were oral traditions, they were not written. How is it that today, in this institution, a European based institution, you can have a politician who still speaks this language, who can get up within the system of government and speak this language, in 1991?

I said it is a gift from one generation to the other. I learned my language from my elders. I indicated to the people across Canada that we have much to be grateful for, because our ancestors who came before us built this country. When my ancestors were building my part of the country and Canada as a whole, they did it speaking their own languages and living their own ways.

We are not who we are without our languages and our culture. When we talk about the inherent right to self-government and about building a government for ourselves, not to be contrary but to do something for ourselves that no one else has been able to do, the rudiments of that has to be our languages and our culture. That is the way it has to be.

We are not doing this to confront people. We are doing it to help ourselves and to establish something we are proud of and have been proud of for years. That is why I indicated to my people that for generations to come this gift of language has to be given to our children and our children's children. When you think about all of the things we have to consider that challenge us, like mass media, we have a lot of uphill climbing to do to save our languages.

We need help from everyone in Canada. Basically what I said was that we should be proud of our languages and proud of who we are. We should be grateful to our ancestors for having given us this gift. I most certainly am, Mr. Speaker. I think I am a better person and I am more myself. I am proud of who I am and proud to speak out as an individual because I have the gift of language. I have the gift of knowing who I am. Before I can go anywhere else and assimilate myself into some one else's culture, I know who I am. There is a tremendous amount of strength in that. That is what my people need.

My people need to rebuild their communities, their families, their identity, their culture, and if they already have that, then we need to share that. Canada, I say to you, you have to look at the context within which Canadian history has been written. You have to understand that we have to de-mythicize the idea that this is just a linguistically dual country. That is not so. Officially, because of the laws of the white man that may be so and we respect that because that is your way. However, I can tell you that the mythology has to end. In the greatest document of this country and the supreme law of this country, aboriginal people say: You have to recognize and entrench the cultural and linguistic rights of aboriginal people.

This is not saying we do not agree with the laws that exist. This is saying it is an act of respect and dignity, an act to recognize that the aboriginal people, the first people of this country are equal and have an inherent right to speak their languages and to protect them and to preserve them.

Hence, for years before I was a politician I was involved at the grass roots in the struggle to save our aboriginal languages. In the area of teaching, when I went as a young person to Fort Franklin all the curriculum and all the material for basically unilingual aboriginal students were in a foreign culture and foreign language. I took the initiative as a young person to let those people know that their cultures, their genealogies, their histories, were important by incorporating those myself into the curriculum.

Years later I taught non-aboriginal people aboriginal languages during the evening because I think it is important that the rest of Canada recognizes and is proud of the fact that we have a country in which we are not just linguistically dual but multilingual and that we are not afraid to be competitive as many of the European countries are.

We are stuck on the whole issue of bilingualism when other competitive countries speak basically two, three or maybe four languages, and many people who are experts in the field of interpretation speak up to six or eight languages. There is no debate about that.

Basically the point of this bill is to say to Canada: "Be proud of your First Nations citizens. Be proud of your languages and recognize that if we are to take a step forward toward a renewed Canada we have to recognize the 53 aboriginal languages". We have a lot to be proud of, but we have a lot to be concerned about.

This bill is a small step in a thousand steps in a long march to some kind of victory for linguistic justice for aboriginal people. When we think about this bill, an act to establish an aboriginal languages foundation, it has some history. It was the First Nations that proposed over the years—and I worked on a policy committee with them in 1986 before I was elected—to establish an aboriginal language policy. I have some feeling for it, but I also have some understanding of the expertise of the people who forged this particular policy.

This bill has tremendous support. I want to give members of this House some information about the purpose of this private member's bill. Its purpose is to establish a foundation to facilitate the acquisition, the retention and the use of aboriginal languages that contribute to Canada's aboriginal heritage by promoting the learning of aboriginal languages and their benefit to aboriginal people and the rest of Canadians and by developing programs to improve the quality of aboriginal language instruction. Many times I have heard non-aboriginal people say that they would really like to learn an aboriginal language but that the programs were not available.

The foundation would assist in the production and dissemination of Canadian oriented materials related to the study of aboriginal languages. We are very scarce on resources in this area. It is very difficult for aboriginal people to teach their children the cultural relevance of their societies in terms of schooling—and the amount of time spent in school is a major part of any child's day—because we are still lacking resource material.

There are many things happening across this country, and I have been to different parts of this country. The area I come from, the Northwest Territories, has schools that are developing material and a language program within the education system. As well the department of culture and communications is producing materials. It has just produced a huge Slavey dictionary. A gift I was so proud to receive was a Mohawk dictionary from Mr. Ralph Brant, regional director from the Atlantic who is a Mohawk himself.

It is astounding to know the number of words and the things they mean. If we want to relate that similarly to the Dene Slavey dictionary, it is not a one-year project. This is a project that has gone one for years and years.

There is the whole issue of curriculum material. In many of the areas in Saskatchewan there are people who are working on similar projects. In B.C. the Yinka-Dene Language Institute just hosted a huge conference last month which had 1,500 people registered. The delegates there supported the idea of this aboriginal language foundation.

The chief said that the language is the heart and the minds of our people. I think many of the elders feel that way about our languages. There are few things that can be taken away from aboriginal persons that will leave them empty and void.

If I might, I would just like to read a bit from the report of the standing committee on aboriginal literacy and empowerment. We used an appropriate title: You took my talk. In it we have what is called the song of the Eskasoni, a poem by Rita Joe entitled I lost my talk and I quote:

I lost my talk
The talk you took away,
When I was a little girl at Shubenacadie School.
You snatched it away.
I speak like you
I think like you
I create like you
The scrambled ballad about my word.
Two ways I talk
Both ways I say
Your way is more powerful.
So, gently I offer my hand and ask,
Let me find my talk
So I can teach you about me.

There are many other things this aboriginal language foundation will do.

It will assist in the development of standards for the learning of aboriginal languages. It will conduct research into all aspects of aboriginal language. It will establish links between the foundations, universities, colleges and persons interested in the work of the foundation. It will ensure the perpetuation, revitalization, growth and protection of aboriginal languages. It will respond to the needs of each community which is in the best position for determining what is needed to ensure the survival and functional use of its languages. It will provide the funding required to enable communities to develop and control the process and activities needed to promote their languages and will undertake any other activities in furtherance of its purpose.

When one has spoken to aboriginal peoples, especially elders, one will know that they come from oral traditions. We learn our languages not from sitting down and writing about them as subjects, but from human experience.

When I was growing up in the bush, on the land with my parents and my grandmother who was a story teller, my grandmother who was the medicine woman, a healer a traditionalist and a spiritualist, we were taught the art of our language basically through her story telling skills.

You will note that we have problems reading speeches because we were taught by speech much in the way that our great story tellers told stories. Many times it is very difficult for us to come into formal sessions and relate specifically to an issue and to get to the bottom line when we relate human experiences to our languages. The derivatives of our words, how our words are made, how are names are given, are very specific to what we experience.

Let me give a couple of examples. For years I grew up with children, adults and elders whom I only knew by their Indian names. Later on in years I learned their Christian names. I went to places like Dehdeljo where I grew up, which I never really thought about as Sucker Creek.

I went to K'etsiniline, which is Birch Lake or Birch Creek—I never really knew it by that name; I still have problems with it—and Tulit'a, which is Fort Norman, where I was born. These are the names that I grew up with. My mentality was within the context of my language. I had much difficulty as a student learning English. I am not doing too badly now. Actually it is coming along. Over the years in university I had a great deal of difficulty making that transference.

The spoken word in my language is everything. The handshake was everything in the treaties. It was an act of dignity and respect that said we have a deal and this is what we agreed to. That is our world view. When we think about our whole language issue we think about the people we revere, our heroes. I think about some of the people from my ancestry whom for years I have heard about. What about a great hunter by the name of Nihtoo? Nihtoo in my language means thunder passed. What greatness is there on the earth and the land, the crispness, the newness, the immensity of this great, powerful, bristling feeling that you feel when you say Nihtoo. That is a name for a man who is a great hunter and a great leader. This is one of the people whom I come from.

What about the baby boy born in the moose-skin boat because his mother was with child and the water was so swift they could not bring him to land? When they arrived at the town the people came from the shore to the boat and brought the baby to land. That is what his name his. His name is Tahti, which means brought to land. There is greatness in that name. There is relevance in that name.

For every society and every culture we have names that mean something to us. There are many more names. There are Cree names, Algonquin names. Today as we sit here the parallel process will be kicked off in Maniwaki. The children and the elders will be able to speak about the importance of their languages and cultures. I think that is appropriate and that is right. I think everyone should have the opportunity to say how important it is that we make an effort to protect the first languages of this country.

I am very proud to have presented this bill. I only wish that this bill could have become a votable motion. I think we should support it becoming a votable bill.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the House I too would like to say welcome back, Sir.

I will start with the official language my hon. colleague spoke.

We missed you and we love you.

I am pleased to be taking part in debate on the hon. member's bill calling for the establishment of an aboriginal languages foundation. Certainly every member of this House appreciates the necessity of resolving aboriginal issues, and that includes measures to preserve and enrich the aboriginal languages.

When I consider the struggle of Canada's aboriginal people I have nothing but praise for the tremendous job they have done in retaining and promoting their languages. More than at any time in our history Canadians are conscious of the need to address aboriginal concerns including the need to ensure cultural survival through indigenous languages. This concern is much more than a romantic one.

My hon. friend will recall that a year ago when fiscal restraint made cuts in native programs necessary the commitment to aboriginal languages remained. We still have the native social and cultural development program which has a funding base of $1 million. The program gives priority to projects that support the retention of aboriginal languages.

More recently, in August, the Secretary of State signed an $18 million three-year agreement with the Government of the Northwest Territories to assist in preserving and protecting aboriginal languages in the territories.

At the signing the Secretary of State said, and I am quoting him here: "The survival and revitalization of aboriginal languages are integral to aboriginal people's sense of identity and continuation of their cultures. This agreement is an expression of the federal government's commitment to address issues of importance to aboriginal people and the special place they have in contemporary Canadian life".

For aboriginal languages, the agreement will give aboriginal people the kind of support they need to preserve and revive their languages as living, working languages in the home, the school and the community.

The survival and revitalization of aboriginal languages are integral to aboriginal people's sense of identity and continuation of their cultures. This agreement is an expression of the federal government's commitment to address issues of importance to aboriginal people and the special place they have in contemporary Canadian life.

Besides the agreement with the Government of the Northwest Territories, the Department of the Secretary of State has a five-year $4.25 million agreement ending in fiscal year 1992-93 with the Yukon government to ensure the revitalization and growth of eight aboriginal languages.

As well, the department provides support through initiatives of the $11.28 million Northern Native Broadcast Access Program. It serves northern aboriginal communities by producing radio and television programs in indigenous languages.

Speaking about Yukon, my colleague should listen to me because I am sure she is very interested in this issue. I was in Yukon last Saturday, two days ago, launching and promoting a book for the francophones of Yukon who live with all the native people there. This program is totally financed in co-operation with Yukon Territory and the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I attended the launch, on Saturday, of this book written by francophones who work with natives in Whitehorse, Yukon. It is entitled Garden on the Roof and, in French, Un jardin sur le toit. This shows the importance of languages for this government. Mr. Speaker, as we know, 50 per cent of the costs of official languages are met by the federal government. However, I was a pleasantly surprised to learn that in the Yukon it is different: the government share is 80 per cent. This goes to show this government's commitment which, I would say, is exceptional!

Mr. Speaker, this book, Garden on the Roof, is about francophones in the Yukon. It was written by René Larouche and Cécile Girard, both of whom care greatly for languages. To preserve the French language in that area is quite a feat! Mr. Speaker, I was amazed by the number of people who speak French in the Yukon. One would say that, in terms of percentage, they beat any city or province outside of Quebec and I would be the first one to bet on it. I encourage everyone to read this great book about the life of White people living with American Indians in the Yukon and the preservation of languages, particularly their native language, which I believe is a priority in this bill today.

[English]

This government is sincerely committed to preserving and enriching aboriginal languages. That commitment is very much in line with our commitment to work toward self-government for aboriginal people, a recommendation essential to discussions now taking place across the country on the renewal of the Canadian federation.

There is also the very real task of improving literacy, a most serious undertaking for aboriginal people.

When the level of literacy is low not only aboriginal people suffer personal hardship, but first nations and all Canadians are deprived of their full contribution to the economic and social life of Canada.

The federal government recognized this pressing matter a number of years ago. In the late 1980s when we held consultations in several aboriginal communities we found that no single approach to improving literacy satisfied everyone. Each community had its own needs and recommendations.

One of the results of the nation-wide consultation was the establishment of a National Literacy Secretariat within the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. I think my hon. colleagues will agree that the secretariat does a commendable job to improve the over-all level of literacy for members of the aboriginal community.

To expand on that a bit, the National Literacy Secretariat supported a number of projects directed specifically to the needs of aboriginal people. For example, in Labrador the secretariat assists the Newfoundland Community College in establishing a literacy program for Labrador Inuit. The program gives basic instruction of the Inuktitut language and is a good example of an initiative addressing a local need.

The government has been supportive of other projects as well. They are programs such as the national literacy strategy for Métis and non-status Indians. With support from the Secretary of State, the project was developed by the Métis National Council and the Gabriel Dumont Institute of Native Studies and Applied Research.

As well, the National Literacy Secretariat, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Saskatchewan Indian Institute of Technologies have worked in partnership to develop the national literacy action plan that can be used in Indian communities right across Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the short time that I have on this very important private member's bill we are debating in the House today.

Hopefully there may be discussions. As important an issue as this is, I think we should certainly try to make some arrangements to try to extend some debate if we can and allow members to speak to Bill C-282, this private member's bill. It is a very important bill that would help establish an aboriginal languages foundation in Canada.

I want to thank the member for Kamloops, our House leader who has certainly been having discussions on this proposed legislation, and the member for Comox—Alberni, the Indian affairs critic who has spent a considerable amount of time on this particular issue, among others.

We support the bill. It is a very important proposal, one that would help promote and protect aboriginal languages in Canada. It is very important for anyone who represents a constituency riding that has a large number of First Nations people in it, as my own constituency does. We must recognize just how important language is to our native people and for the development of proposals for self-government during the ongoing constitutional discussions.

It is very important because it makes up their history, their role and involvement in their life, and their participation in Canada today.

Consider that in our nation there are some 53 aboriginal languages in Canada, 50 of them endangered and some which are virtually extinct. I could not think of a more important thing for us to do in the whole question of language policy than to do whatever we can to ensure that we try to promote those languages that have formed the history of Indian peoples in Canada and the development of our country.

I would just like to read into the record the comments from the Assembly of First Nations that has obviously made some policy on this matter. I think it is important to put them into the record. I am quoting here from its declaration on aboriginal languages.

> Aboriginal language is an asset to one's own education, formal and informal. Aboriginal language contributes to greater pride in the history and culture of the community, greater involvement and interest of parents in the education of their children and greater respect for elders.
> Language is the principal means by which culture is accumulated, shared and transmitted from generation to generation. The key to identity and retention of culture is one's ancestral language.

I congratulate the member for Western Arctic on having worked very hard on this over the past couple of years. She visited Prince George in my riding and spoke to many different groups about this proposal. I know it has a great deal of support out there, as we say, and I hope it has the same degree of support in this House.

It is not asking for a lot. It is the proverbial one step forward, a small step forward, to try to assist with the promotion of aboriginal languages.

The bill will do a number of things including, as I mentioned earlier, the promotion of aboriginal languages and the importance of promoting that same message to all Canadians. Second, the bill will improve the quality of aboriginal language information and material. That is very important because efforts have been made by many groups in my area. I will come to that in a minute, but an example is the Yinka-Dene Language Institute which is based in Vanderhoof in my riding.

Many groups have been struggling as hard as they can to put the promotional and written materials together so that they can promote aboriginal languages. That is often difficult to do, and I certainly would think that a foundation as proposed by this bill would go a long way in assisting with the development of professional standards, of printing standards, and what have you.

It is important as well to ensure that we develop Canadian material on this. It is my understanding that there is considerable work done in the United States and other countries on aboriginal languages. I think we have a great deal more to do already in Canada, and I think this foundation would go some distance in doing it.

I mentioned earlier in my comments that the Yinka-Dene Language Institute in my riding was very relevant to the debate we are having on this bill right now. I mentioned the Yinka-Dene Language Institute which was started up in 1988. My first official duty as a newly elected member of Parliament was to go to Vanderhoof and attend the graduation ceremony of some of the elders who were being taught how to teach their language. It was a wonderful way to start off my term in office as the MP for the area. It is an honour, I think for all of us, when we have an opportunity to meet the elders, in particular, to listen to them and to hear their wise words.

I would go so far as to say: "Let us clear out the other place and put some of the elders in there. We would probably get a lot more help by putting some of the elders in the Senate than we do now from the current pack of people who are in there.

The Yinka-Dene Language Institute, which has gone some distance in preparing the resource materials that are necessary, used modern technology such as laser disks and other high-tech materials to promote and get out the information and language they have.

I should mention as well the very important contributions to the Yinka-Dene Language Institute by the Carrier-Sekani Tribal Council; the college in the area, the College of New Caledonia; various school districts; and the soon to be finished University of British Columbia in Prince George. I think it is very important that aboriginal languages, and the teaching and learning of those languages, will play an important role in the university courses and faculties.

In conclusion I want to say that our party supports this bill. The member for Kamloops has spent some time discussing this matter with the member who has proposed it. I know there have been discussions, and I hope that we can take a look at a couple of steps that might move this bill ahead.

We are certainly prepared to consider unanimous consent to allow this to be a votable bill. Second, I think we should give some opportunity to other members in this House who I know are very anxious to speak on this. We are limited by the rules of the House which we follow, but there are are many members who would like to speak on this matter. They would like to speak about the importance of aboriginal languages not just to Canada but, most important for many of us, what it means to the people in our ridings whom we represent.

I thank the member and congratulate her for the initiative she has taken on this very important bill. I thank all aboriginal groups outside this Chamber that I know have spent considerable time discussing this bill, writing letters and lobbying to try to move the issue forward. I hope government members in particular will hear our speeches today, hear our pleas, and support some initiatives to carry this forward.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I too welcome you back after a month and a half absence due to your operations.

With too many of the 52 languages of the aboriginal peoples of Canada eroded or lost, any serious attempt to reinvigorate their languages must be worth while. I salute the member for Western Arctic on the bill, as I believe most members in the House today do as well.

Linguistic relativity emphasizes the unique role of language in relation to culture. Language is recognized as a means far more than mere communication. It is a vehicle of cultural transmission. For some renowned scholars like Benjamin Whorf language even shapes thought and emotion, determining the perception of reality. Although not identical the concepts of language and culture are inseparable. To put it more plainly, I am told by my colleague that there are numerous official languages in the Northwest Territories. That is why I understand there is excellent language harmony in the north. They can have unilingual MLAs and unilingual jurors. This growing recognition of all languages in the north is working well.

There are nine official languages in the European community. The chief quoted by my colleague has said: "Language is the heart of our culture".

You will recall, Sir, being from Edmonton, that children sent to residential schools returned home often unable to communicate with their parents and grandparents because of the loss of their aboriginal language skills and the almost total disorientation of their cultural value system. The educational system of those days did much more than to exert strong pressure on aboriginal children. Again, Sir, I remind you that our aboriginal peoples came to Canada at least 13,000 years ago. The residential schools fostered an intergenerational culture gap in aboriginal communities. Many young people have suffered from the in between feeling of not being able to fit in either their home communities or communities elsewhere.

Aboriginal peoples resented what was being done to them and tried to resist as best they could the efforts to damage their way of life. They still do and continue to do so, in Ovide Mercredi's words, "to break the psychology of domination from the two founders of the nation".

The cultural resurgence and the defence of territory are but two overt expressions of native self-determination. Other forms of resistance have included economic and political action, the reinterpretation of historical events, the formation of intertribal and interdenominational networks, and so on.

Since 1867 and earlier, aboriginal groups have actively sought recognition of their inherent right to self-government. This right was exercised thousands of years before Europeans arrived on this continent. Many believe it has never been extinguished. Certainly my party does. Claims that political structures were unknown to native people prior to contact with Europeans ignore the fact that most First Nations had complex forms of government that go back centuries. In fact, aboriginal self-government is now supported in principle by most Canadians., happily, who believe that recognizing the role of aboriginal peoples in Confederation is very important for national pride.

Canadians have a chance to demonstrate to the world that the old notions of European dominance are gone. In our country we see federalism as a way of protecting the identity of minorities. Federalism is practised throughout the world in large measure to provide and respect the identity of minority regions and peoples.

The encouragement of cultural development assists in preserving and strengthening aboriginal peoples integrity. A stronger sense of cultural worth would promote aboriginal self-sufficiency as one of the proclaimed goals of our country. Dependency on the other hand tends to alienate aboriginal peoples and all peoples from their traditional identity and prevents the retention of some features of traditional culture. Only with the maintenance of a distinct identity can our aboriginal peoples have the chance, as was indicated earlier by the member for the Western Arctic, of altering the wider conditions of social and economic dependency which so characterized much of their lives now.

To this end it seems to me that the importance of language retention far exceeds the magnitude of retention of other features of traditional culture. Language retention contributes to the maintenance of the boundary between the aboriginal peoples and others. As a mode of communication, it is a system of meaningful signs that represent and influence the concept of the world.

According to one critic, language retention is the cultural characteristic that best reflects current and continued cultural cohesion. It is perhaps the most distinctly ethnic activity.

I am fast running out of time and I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to be talking when this bill stands in danger of being talked out. Let me quote from the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation which asserted: "No single feature of southern culture was as profound in its effects on the Inuit way of life as television. It destroyed old habits and social behaviours. It imported new values and attitudes. It became an alternative way of life, particularly for the young".

There is an urgent need for more not less funding for native aboriginal media and aboriginal languages so that they can continue to reach aboriginal communities to provide material dealing with contemporary issues as well as traditional cultures, particularly so that they can develop children's content.

If no action is taken such as proposed here, linguists and anthropologists will mourn the passing of aboriginal languages and in consequence, aboriginal cultures. It is largely up to the aboriginal peoples themselves to decide whether it is in their interest to allow their languages to fade into disuse or to revive them. If they choose the latter, they will deserve the support of all Canadians.

I would close by again indicating my strongly felt support for the bill now before the House and I hope that as was indicated by a previous member that despite what is presently likely to happen from the government side that this bill in fact will be enacted by this Parliament very soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, before I start my speech, perhaps I may say how happy we are that you have recovered and are now back in the chair.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-282, an Act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation.

At the hearings on national unity held by the Spicer Commission, Canadians clearly indicated their desire to see aboriginal issues given priority status.

When the government's constitutional proposals were tabled in September, Prime Minister Mulroney said the following: "Of the various communities whose rights need and deserve protection, the aboriginal peoples of Canada have, in my judgment, a very important claim on our attention".

Similarly, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs told national representatives of the First Nations that constitutional reform would be impossible without a change in status for aboriginal peoples, and that any constitutional accord would require their approval.

• (1200)

In the same vein, the government has proposed the entrenchment of a constitutional process to address aboriginal matters and proposes to include a general justicial right to aboriginal self-government within the Canadian federation.

Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that considering the impressive contribution of aboriginal culture to the development of Canada, we have a duty to recognize in the Constitution the rights of the first people of this country.

There are 53 aboriginal languages in Canada, most of which are, to varying degrees, threatened with extinction. As a government we have a major role to play in preventing this from happening.

Last year, the Prime Minister announced Canada's commitment on four fronts: speedy settlement of land claims; improving the economic and social situation on the reserves; reform of the Indian Act; and adopting measures to respond to the concerns of aboriginal people in today's society.

Creating a royal commission on aboriginal peoples is probably one of the most promising measures in this respect. The commission will examine a broad range of issues, including economic, social and cultural aspects. In this connection, the subject of aboriginal languages is of course extremely important.

Mr. Speaker, preserving and promoting aboriginal languages is a priority for this government. At a time when we are intent on Shaping Canada's future together, we become increasingly aware of the immense contribution made by aboriginal people to the culture of this country through their art, tradition and language.

That is why in August, the Government of Canada signed—

[English]

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is an important one. There are many parliamentarians wishing to speak on it. I hope, with unanimous consent of the House, we could now extend the hour for Private Members' Business until one o'clock to permit a greater and a fuller debate on this important legislation.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that this is a most important matter. Recognizing the nature of the government business for later today is business I believe we can move through expeditiously, we would not be in a sense reducing the government's opportunity to move legislation.

I would like to say yes, Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats would like to see it extended for an hour with the assumption that the usual rotation would occur to enable speakers for the various parties to participate.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I am in full agreement that we should continue the debate. This is a very important, fundamental issue, not just for us as members but for all of this country that is embroiled in many of the controversial issues that hit on languages. I really feel it is important for people in this House who have something to say about this bill, and about languages in any way that they wish to portray those ideas or those concerns they have, to be able to do so within the time that will be allotted by unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to extend the hour until one o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, we agree to extend it for one hour, but I must have some guarantee that this bill will not be votable and will not go to committee under the order of 19.96(1).

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, it would be asking me to breach my ethics as a human being and as a good Canadian citizen to flap my gums for no use in this House on a bill that I think is fundamental to the well-being of 53 aboriginal linguistic groups. It is a heinous thing for this individual across the way to ask us to do. It is an insult to the Canadian public and taxpayers' moneys to waste that kind of time in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I really believe that the House is now considering two matters. We have in fact considered the first of those matters which was to extend by unanimous consent by an hour's time the debate on Bill C-282.

The second matter that has just been raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs is, in his terms, seeking a guarantee that the bill would not be votable. That is a guarantee that no one would give because that is entirely a matter for this Parliament of Canada. If the full hour that we have now agreed should be further allocated for this bill is not consumed by speeches of members, then within that hour the question could be put, the bill could be voted on and referred to committee.

I do not think it is within the capacity of anyone to provide what the member has asked for.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It can be done only by unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure we observe the Standing Orders. If I am not mistaken, according to Standing Order 96(1), if a member speaks for one hour, in other words, if there is unanimous consent to speak for one hour, that's fine, but afterwards, if we want to go on to something else, we again need unanimous consent to be able to change the Standing Orders. Am I correct?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is right.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I used to be parliamentary secretary to the House leader on the government side.

The member cannot ask you to give an interpretation as he is asking. We will deal with the first issue which we have already decided, and if within the hour if there are no more speakers, then something might arise.

Until that occasion arises, it is a hypothetical question. I would submit that we are now into the next hour of debate for all members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will ask the House for unanimous consent to debate until one o'clock. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for tabling this motion and my colleagues for giving their approval so that I can continue this important debate.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, in August the Government of Canada signed an agreement with the Government of the Northwest Territories to ensure the survival and preservation of aboriginal languages in the North. This agreement includes funding totalling $18 million, spread over three years.

The agreement follows another agreement signed six years ago, in April 1985, which included financial assistance totalling $16 million. The first agreement signed with the Northwest Territories in April 1985 produced some very definite and noteworthy results.

A study carried out in November 1990 showed that the various projects initiated as result of this funding had greatly stimulated interest in teaching and learning native aboriginal languages. The process has also promoted research and development in this area and enhanced the availability of services in aboriginal languages.

The study also mentioned that the agreement signed by the government and the Northwest Territories was a factor in the territorial government's decision to grant official status to six aboriginal languages, on the same level as English and French. In April 1990, the territorial government amended its Official Languages Act to include legal protection for aboriginal languages.

This initiative is noteworthy, since it reflects the present government's efforts to preserve aboriginal languages and culture. The government is firmly convinced that the survival of the North's languages is essential for the future quality of life of the Territories and its inhabitants.

A similar agreement was also signed by the Government of Yukon to ensure the survival and development of eight official languages, including six aboriginal languages officially recognized by this territory. Funding totalling $4.25 million will be provided over a period of five years. Mr. Speaker, these agreements reflect the extent of the government's commitment to aboriginal issues. This is not a matter of pretty speeches or empty promises. These are concrete, ambitious projects that have a tangible impact on the lives of aboriginal people.

Native languages are thus valued and therefore more respected. This has the positive effect of encouraging their use at home, in school and in the community.

Furthermore, the Department of the Secretary of State has also given concrete support to the federal government's firm commitment to preserve aboriginal languages by giving priority to language projects as part of the Native Social and Cultural Development Program.

This program, and especially its language preservation component, were evaluated in 1988. Interviews in native communities showed that the projects put forward under this program revived their feeling of belonging and improved the relations of native people with their fellow citizens. The investigation showed that language preservation projects encouraged the development of native culture.

The Department of the Secretary of State provides additional support for initiatives in this field through the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program, which serves native communities in northern regions with broadcasts in aboriginal languages.

Other departments are also making great efforts to encourage the preservation and use of aboriginal languages. I am thinking here especially of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship which in the 1988–89 fiscal year co-sponsored 45 literacy projects to meet native people's needs specifically.

One of the projects involved Labrador Community College setting up a literacy program for the Inuit in Labrador. This program provided basic training in Inuktitut and was an outstanding example of a local solution to a local problem.

The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs spends large sums so that native people can receive primary and secondary school education in their own language.

The government's intentions and actions on aboriginal languages need no longer be demonstrated. The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, we all know the size of the deficit, or rather the debt, and the burden it imposes on the Canadian economy. Of course, each one of us must do our part and every new project must be thoroughly evaluated before receiving funds.

In Shaping Canada's Future Together, the government defines its position on this country's native people as follows: "It is unacceptable that Canada's first peoples, who were here for thousands of years before the arrival of European settlers, should find themselves, centuries later, among the most socially and economically disadvantaged citizens in Canada. Canada's first peoples, who were self-governing before the arrival of the settlers, want nothing more than the means to regain control of their own destiny within Canada."

It is unnecessary to point out the considerable importance of preserving aboriginal languages for the future of the First Nations.

In this spirit, we believe that the concept of the Foundation and the objectives of Bill C-282 should be supported, taking into account the restrictions to which we are all subject.

In this matter as in others, we are cooperating with the native peoples of Canada so that they can take control of their destiny, contribute to the prosperity of the country and fully benefit from it themselves as well. Diversity makes our nation rich and unity makes it strong.

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it is always a privilege to speak in the House of Commons and to share ideas with my colleagues, my fellow parliamentarians.

The bill which we have under consideration now, the private member's bill of the member for Western Arctic, is an act to establish the aboriginal languages foundation. I would like to say briefly that the purpose of this bill in establishing the aboriginal languages foundation is to address a fundamentally important and historically overlooked need in this country.

Clause 4 of this bill sets out the purposes of the foundation and I think it is important just to highlight some of those. The purpose of the foundation is to facilitate throughout Canada the acquisition, retention and use of aboriginal languages that contribute to our country's aboriginal heritage. Some of the ways that this would be done would be by promoting through public education and discussion the learning of aboriginal languages and their benefit to aboriginal peoples of Canada, by providing the public with information about aboriginal language resources, and by developing programs to improve the quality of aboriginal language instruction. All of this would ensure the perpetuation, the revitalization, the growth and the protection of aboriginal languages.

The bill goes on for another 20 clauses to outline the fashion in which the foundation would work, its powers and its practices. It is very clear that Bill C-282, which was introduced here on September 20 of this year, represents a great deal of work. Clearly a lot of thought has gone into this legislation.

In noting that I would like especially to pay tribute to the MP who has introduced this bill, the member for Western Arctic. All of us who come here as MPs represent two constituencies: our own electoral district and then a broader national constituency made up of the people who share a common concern. All of us have special interests, concerns, goals or issues spreading right across the country that we try to deal with. Certainly the member for Western Arctic, the member for Wetaskiwin and other members in this House carry a very heavy responsibility in that second constituency, representing here the interests and diverse needs of Canada's aboriginal peoples.

My sister and her husband, Victoria and Douglas Billingsly, reside in the hon. member's constituency at Inuvik, and I know for a fact that even though the member is busy with this broad national issue she is also providing very constructive and positive service to her constituents. I wanted to take that moment to express from one parliamentarian to another recognition of the dual role that all of us play. In this case it has been performed in a way to give us this very interesting and timely Bill C-282.

At its core this bill is dealing with culture and with language. We do not have to think back very far in Canadian history, indeed only to the sixties, to a royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. We certainly know that the notion of biculturalism was buried in the sixties as Canada came to embrace the concept of multiculturalism, a concept that is now entrenched in the Canadian Constitution.

What about multilingualism? I remember speaking one time with the member for Provencher, Manitoba, and he explained that his father, Mr. Epp, spoke five languages, none of them among the official languages of Canada.

The member for Western Arctic referred to people in Europe speaking two or perhaps three languages. My own wife Corinne, coming from the Netherlands, speaks five languages currently and has working knowledge of two others. This is in fact the whole story of our country. It is a country of many languages, all of them important, all of them deserving to be respected. While sometimes we might despair that we are living in a country that is a land of babble, we must also recognize that we are living in a country that places extraordinarily high value on freedom of expression.

We long considered free of expression to be one of our natural rights and now additionally it is one of our entrenched rights in the Canadian Constitution. I meet a lot of people who are coming here these days from eastern Europe and Ukraine. I ask them what surprises them most about Canada. There are a lot of surprising and interesting answers, but consistently one of the answer is their surprise at discovering in Canada the vibrancy of the Ukrainian culture and the living language spoken by the one million Canadians of Ukrainian descent.

Bearing that in mind, let us think back again to that same royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. As a university student I remember reading that there was descent written to that royal commission report by Jaroslav Bohdan Rudnyckji. He said that at a time when the Ukrainian language was being suppressed in its own native country through Russification, it was very important in Canada that that language be given every opportunity to thrive, because this was one place in the world where it had great opportunity to grow.

If that was true—and I believe that it was—with respect to the Ukrainian language in Canada, how much truer, how much more important it is with respect to the languages that were first spoken by the people living here even before those of European extraction settled in these lands of the Indians.

Earlier languages, as the member for Western Arctic and other members from Edmonton and elsewhere have mentioned, are numerous in this country. Many of them were only passed on as an oral tradition.

Four years ago I read an article about a Canadian who had travelled throughout this country in the twenties, recording a number of these aboriginal languages and the particular dialects. I say "recording" and we wonder how someone could go around with a tape recorder in the twenties. It was not a tape recorder as we know it now. These were being recorded in meetings with native Canadians and the recording was done on wax cylinders.

The men, women and children who spoke those languages in this country in the twenties and thirties are now gone and the languages they spoke are now gone. The only record we have are these aging and deteriorating wax cylinders on which their almost ghost-like voices can be heard speaking yet another lost aboriginal language of Canada.

There is so much that could be said on this, yet for me that image says it all. That is why I am supporting this bill, why I congratulate the member for bringing it into the House of Commons, and why I express my hope with respect to procedure that we will find it within our wit here to support having this bill go to committee where it can be more fully discussed and brought into the public statutes of our country.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely delighted to participate today in the debate on Bill C-282, an act to establish the aboriginal languages foundation, introduced by the hon. member for Western Arctic. I want to join with all of my colleagues in saying that we appreciate this initiative.

It is an initiative that has been under way now for some time and has the enthusiastic endorsement of First Nations peoples. I believe we ought to go even further than what we are doing to day in terms of simply extending the debate time. We should actually work to make it a votable piece of legislation. I cannot imagine anyone saying that this is not something that is of sufficient importance that should not be voted on, moved through and become law. However, we can deal with that at the appropriate moment.

I want to make it very clear that as far as we in the New Democratic Party are concerned, we would like to see this bill not only debated but voted upon and become a reality.

I suppose the reason for that is obvious. We have heard today some very eloquent speeches in support of this initiative by the hon. member for Western Arctic. I join with my colleagues in supporting those comments. This is an initiative that would promote aboriginal languages, that would improve the quality of language instruction, that would develop resource materials through research, provide additional language materials for use in various curricula and an opportunity to enhance linkages with colleges, universities and other institutes in the promotion of aboriginal languages.

Other aspects of this legislation, Mr. Speaker, obviously make the bill one we would all endorse enthusiastically. I first became knowledgeable about the need for this foundation some years ago when the Shuswap Tribal Council, on their own initiative, agreed to take the matter of cultural revitalization very seriously. Part of that building process was to save the Shuswap language and to take immediate steps so that more and more people, particularly younger people, would be introduced to the language, learn and become fluent in it.

It is interesting these days to attend various gatherings of the Shuswap people and hear the Shuswap language being used in communication, sometimes simply as a formal introduction, but more and more being used by individuals, particularly younger people, in their every day communication. Indeed, this is encouraging. I think we all appreciate that a culture without a language simply does not exist.

Language itself is the fundamental life-blood of the development of any culture. I suppose parts of our very darkest history in Canada were those periods where the aboriginal languages were almost beaten out of young people attending the various schools. They were forbidden to use their original languages in school and were made to feel as second rate or third rate citizens if they used the languages of their parents and of their ancestors.

Thank goodness that period is behind us and now we are seeing, as we have seen in the Shuswap nation, important steps being taken to develop a curriculum and new reading materials, new experience-oriented educational opportunities to once again enable, particularly young people, to feel proud of their aboriginal heritage.

Perhaps one of the aspects of this bill will also be to promote public awareness of native languages. It is a frightening prospect when you recognize that of the 53 aboriginal language groups existing in the country, only three are considered to be safe in terms of their ability to continue indefinitely into the future. Fifty languages are at risk. If those languages are at risk then it also means that those cultures are at risk. So simply the understanding of non-aboriginal people as to the importance of this particular initiative is a critical part of this particular bill.

I appreciate the hon. member's motive for doing this and the work that she and many of her colleagues, aboriginal people in this House, have made to bring this light to the public consciousness generally.

I want to acknowledge the leadership role played by a number of individuals in my own constituency, and I refer specifically to people like Chief Manny Jules, Ron Ignace, Nathan Matthew. I suppose it is not fair to name just a few when there are so many people that have been involved on a very personal level in the development of curriculum and the local native languages and the various dialects.

I think it is important that we acknowledge the work being done by so many people across the country to enhance the status of aboriginal languages generally.

I suppose it now becomes evident and obvious to everyone the need for a foundation. That is why I think it is important that we put our collective minds together to see how we can advance this particular bill simply beyond the debate stage. The comments I have heard today from literally all sides of the House would indicate strong support by all of those who have spoken, and I believe that those who have spoken on behalf of their various caucuses are doing just that; that no caucus would say there is not a need for this foundation, that we have taken large steps over the years in terms of support for bilingualism and biculturalism and more recently in recent decades multiculturalism.

But this, of course, goes far beyond that in acknowledging those people who have been in this part of the world for tens of thousands of years. I cannot think of a better year to do that, when we are hearing and reading in the media so much about the role of Christopher Columbus and the discovery of America, when in fact we acknowledge the fact that tens of thousands of people had lived here for tens of thousands of years before Christopher Columbus even thought about setting sail for some place unknown west of Europe.

Again, if there is a moment in history that would require us to act it is now. The need is evident. The bill before us is a thoughtful initiative and identifies all of the necessary steps that ought to be taken immediately. For that reason I want to say that we should all work to ensure that this becomes a votable piece of legislation and soon becomes a bill that this Parliament will pass so that we can actually see not only a debate around the necessity of such a foundation, but the initiative coming to reality and seeing the foundation itself struck as soon as possible.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-82, an act to establish the aboriginal languages foundation. I want to compliment my colleague from Western Arctic for continuing to advance the cause of this particular part of aboriginal culture in this country.

This bill, for me, is not just about language, it is about the value system in this country. Since 1971, when the Multicultural Act was proclaimed in this House, we have continued to talk about the fact that no culture is less than or greater than another culture. But it seems to me, as we have advanced that debate, we have not given the time or the focus to our founding peoples, to our first peoples, to our first nations.

I see in my own riding that in particular the Greek community has access to all of the cultural or the heritage language programs that they need and require. I see that in the Italian and the Chinese communities. We too have an urban native Indian council in our community and they do not share in that opportunity which the other cultures have. Somehow we overlook the fact that in our major urban centres we also have communities from the north. Some of our native peoples live in urban areas and in my opinion they are always sort of shunted to the side. It is only recently, as the country has begun to develop a focus on environmental issues that we as a nation have become more receptive to our native peoples. When we travel in airplanes in the north, we don't just hear French and English, we will also hear native languages on the airplanes, see it in the brochures, when we go into hotels, when we go into the north. We will see that that community naturally is sensitized to the needs of our native peoples. We who live in the major urban areas do not seem to have that kind of sensitivity.

This bill is really a test of that fundamental issue which is before all of us as parliamentarians, and I think our colleague for Etobicoke—Lakeshore alluded to it in his remarks earlier. There are many times, and it should be all the time really, when we must have a trust factor when we talk about issues in this House. This issue is really an issue of trust. We are constantly tested in this House as to what kind of actions increase the trust factor and what kinds of actions diminish it. When we talk about an issue like this today, it is a test for all Canadians, not just our First Nations, in front of all peoples as to what the level of our trust is.

We can talk about being sensitive to the needs of our aboriginal peoples, but now we have an opportunity to put those words into action. As many speakers have said earlier, language is the heart of a culture. If we are going to preserve, promote and support our aboriginal culture then what better way than to show in this House today support for this aboriginal language foundation.

It is obvious to most Canadians today that Canada, as a nation, is being judged internationally by the way we treat our native peoples. If we believe that language is at the heart of the way we treat native peoples, and when we see how many of the various languages in the aboriginal community are on the verge of being extinct, and we have a very special opportunity to prevent those languages from going into extinction, it is incumbent on all of us, not just those members who live in the north, but those of us who live, as the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore said earlier, in urban areas, to speak to this issue as well and make sure that our aboriginal peoples get the same treatment as all the other cultures that have been given special treatment over the years in this country.

It is plainly logical to me that if we can have radio stations, newspapers and special heritage language courses, it seems fundamental and logical that we set a national foundation for our aboriginal peoples which will look after the rights and concerns of all of aboriginal peoples when it comes to their basic language.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to the private member's legislation which is before the House this morning.

I would like to join with other members of the House, Mr. Speaker, who have welcomed you back after your brief illness and time in which you were in the hospital. You know that you carry the goodwill of every member of this House and that we are all delighted to see you back. We look forward to the joyous personality and good humour that you bring not only to the Chair but to the entire House of Commons. So we do welcome you with those few words of greeting and hope that you will be completely recovered and back on the job in the months and years ahead.

The aboriginal languages foundation bill, which is sponsored by the hon. member for Western Arctic, is a very important bill. I thought that she spoke especially eloquently and especially sensitively to the whole question of language and culture.

It is especially fragile in the case of aboriginal languages because as she said these were languages used historically and many still are. They do not always have the written component to the language. If it is lost, it is lost completely. I think that is the value of this particular piece of legislation through which we are trying not only to promote aboriginal languages and preserve them, as the foundation would have as one of its major purposes, but also to develop the languages and to develop teaching materials to ensure those languages can be preserved. There are a very few actually in a state in which they probably can be preserved.

I know there was a person working on a special commission in the Secretary of State's department just two or three years ago. She suggested to me that there are probably only 15 or 20 which can actually be maintained or have a written component to maintain themselves easily.

The hon. member for Western Arctic is really to be commended for bringing forward this bill this morning. It would establish an aboriginal languages foundation which would have as its several components the retention and promotion of aboriginal languages through public discussion, the learning of aboriginal languages, and the benefits to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. It proposes as well providing the public with information about aboriginal languages and resources. It proposes developing programs to improve the quality of aboriginal language instruction. It suggests that this foundation would have as one of its purposes a program to assist in the production and dissemination of Canadian oriented materials related to the study of aboriginal languages and to assist in establishing standards for those languages of an aboriginal nature. It also would conduct research. If a language is not written and the language is often maintained only by the elders, it is not as if we can immediately promote it and develop it without a considerable amount of research being carried out.

It also proposes the establishing of scholarly and professional links among the foundation, universities, colleges and other organizations, and persons interested in the foundation's work. It is proposed that there be a major new aboriginal college, for instance, a national college at the Algoma University College in Sault Ste. Marie. If that college is fully developed and established, this foundation could be an important national agency which could assist it in ways of promotion, development and research or could just assist that new college at the Algoma University College.

I guess my overriding interest in this topic this morning is not only that we have some 13 Indian bands in the Algoma federal riding stretching from Batchawana on the Lake Superior shore down to Killarney near Georgian Bay and involving some half dozen Indian bands on Manitoulin Island, but as well another half dozen or so along the north shore. The North Shore Tribal Council involves all those bands along the north shore of Lake Huron.

I think we are especially fortunate in our area in that we have in Manitoulin the Ojibway Cultural Foundation which has been doing many of the things that this new national foundation would do. It promotes the use and development of educational programs and educational materials for the Ojibway language. It assists in all kinds of programs in the aboriginal community for art, culture and language.

We are very fortunate in that the bands throughout the Algoma–Manitoulin area have banded together to establish the Ojibway Cultural Foundation and provided their encouragement and their support. It has been especially useful in teaching the aboriginal languages of our area and promoting the whole linguistics, art and culture.

As the hon. member for Western Arctic said, if you take away the language you almost take away the soul of the aboriginal people. If you cannot speak, if you cannot articulate, if you do not have pride in your culture, in your heritage and in the way that people express themselves or think about their elders, their ancestors or their whole culture, if you lose the ability to articulate that and speak, you really lose the whole being for those communities and those individuals.

I hope that the government will not talk out this foundation or vote it down. I hope it will allow the bill to go the to standing committee. In that way it will be able to see the value in establishing this foundation.

I would say the Ojibway Cultural Foundation has a really outstanding director, Mary–Lou Fox, who has been the director there for many years. She is a very talented, excellent person who single–handedly kept that organization going. She has kept the band councils of the area working with her and has kept them advised. She has an advisory board and a board of directors.

We are one of the few areas in the country with several hundred bands that has that kind of foundation. A national foundation would not only provide support and back–up for local regional aboriginal and cultural foundations but would assist in establishing new ones in areas where the population is too small to have the kind of organization as we have in the Ojibway Cultural Foundation and West Bay Reserve in Manitoulin Island.

The key here is that we want to see this foundation established. It is really late in the game. We should have done this some time ago, but clearly doing it now can mean that some of those objectives can be reached, the objectives of conducting research, establishing relationships with universities and colleges of higher learning, perpetuating and revitalizing growth and protection of aboriginal languages, responding to the needs of aboriginal communities, and providing the funding required to enable communities to have those aboriginal languages and cultures preserved.

I do not want to spend a lot of time but just to indicate my support. I want to compliment the hon. member for Western Arctic in bringing forward this bill. Obviously she has done a great deal of work on Bill C–282 respecting the aboriginal languages foundation. It certainly has a great deal to offer in perpetuating, maintaining and promoting aboriginal languages and aboriginal culture in this country. It really promotes and recognizes a way for the House of Commons and Senate hopefully to express our commitment to the aboriginal peoples, the First Nations of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in congratulating you and welcoming you back in your House. We are extremely happy to see you back in such a great shape. You bring some sort of personal warmth to this place and it gives me pleasure to mention this.

Mr. Speaker, it is with both humility and great pride that I take part in this debate on Bill C–282 put forward by our colleague from Western Arctic.

Mr. Speaker, many members, in fact most of us have read this bill and it is obvious that we each want to speak in support of it.

When you look at its purpose, this bill does the Parliament of Canada, as well as this social reality of our beautiful country, great credit. It talks about promotion, providing information, developing programs, assisting in the production, with each new item reinforcing and providing new ways of making Canada what it is, different from any other country and of course from our neighbour to the south.

As President of the Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship, I also have the duty and the pleasure to look at this matter and participate in the debate. Mr. Speaker, as some members pointed out, this bill deals with the very fabric of our nation. Parliament and its members are asked to consider, work on and pass a bill which ensures that every Canadian citizen has the pleasure and privilege of reverting to his or her mother tongue and thus rediscover, if they were lost or not as lively as they could be, his or her roots and integrity.

The mother tongue, Mr. Speaker, is not only a symbol. It is also a social reality, but even more so a psychological reality. The child starts learning on his mother's lap how to grow up into an adult, to develop, to grow richer with a full scale of values and these, of course, will be transmitted through language.

I think that the mother tongue is the noblest symbol and reflection of our lives in our society. Language is associated to the first cries, the first laughs and words of a child, as he or she starts to develop, to relate with their environment, their country. The loss of this language would necessarily mean the loss of part of their roots and it could take them several years of efforts to regain that sense of belonging, of wholeness fundamental to any nation.

For a number of weeks now, Mr. Speaker, I have been wondering about a couple of concepts. The first one is the concept of national unity which I relate to the concern for and the concept of national identity.

And I wonder whether we can find several national identities through this same unity. I found an article by Claude Lévi-Strauss and Didier Eribon in last January's issue of L'Actualité, and I would like to tell you about it.

Lévi-Strauss wrote: "It is better that cultures remain diverse or that they renew themselves through diversity. However, one must be willing to pay the price: namely, that cultures linked to a particular lifestyle or value system must protect their distinctive characteristics; such a situation is healthy, and not at all, as some would have us believe, pathological. Each culture evolves through a process of give and take with other cultures. However, each culture must offer some resistance; otherwise, it would soon have nothing of its own to give in return."

Mr. Speaker, Lévi-Strauss is not just anybody— my colleague is laughing at that and that makes me relax a bit because these issues concern me very deeply. As I was saying, Lévi-Strauss is not just anybody: He is certainly a first-class author.

Following what I was reading, I wrote that, for a number of years now, this question of unity, this question of identity, is a source of concern within organizations and businesses. And, without going back too far, it is interesting to note that the second industrial revolution prepared industry to have to deal with the problem. Companies were growing and expanding and the craftsman was forced more and more to fit into a larger entity and risked losing his identity. Pretty soon after this second revolution, there came this author, Fayol, and this philosophy of the Protestant ethic, that emphasized unity of command and organizational unity. Therefore, the individual, caught in this organization's tentacles, would often wonder whether he was losing his identity.

Then came McLuhan and other authors from sociology and psychology. They examined this issue with a much more scientific approach, so that in the 1950s William White came out with a book and a theory called "The Organization Man". White told us that workers suppressed their identity. The greater the proliferation of organizations, the more important it is for the individual to find reference points and deep roots. Mr. Speaker, as you know, it is through language, the mother tongue, that a culture can regain its roots and be reborn. That is why, as committee chairman, and also because our minister, who is responsible for multiculturalism, allocates money, but more importantly, implements a philosophy to protect all these cultural assets.

Mr. Speaker, I understand my time is up.

[English]

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that we are running out of time. Because of the importance of this bill to all Canadians and to the country, I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House to refer it to committee, to make it a votable bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise in support of the bill. Coming from a city riding and being very active in the debates of last year when we proposed and passed a bill setting up a Heritage Language Foundation, it seems this bill is a logical extension of the philosophy that was expounded by a bill only last year.

In the context of a multicultural society which recognizes that only through language can culture and traditions be maintained and engendered and can a sense of history and belonging in this country come about, this bill makes much sense.

It also makes enormous sense in the context of the constitutional debates that have been generated over the course of this last month wherein all parties acknowledged the fact that we should underscore the importance of aboriginal self-determination. We can only ensure that self-determination has meaning if we acknowledge that people have a right to a sense of being that is expressed through a language medium and recognizes their own particular traditions, history and philosophy of life in the context of Canadian society.

I believe this bill addresses that, and I urge all members to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from Legislative Committee F.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before we get into putting the motions, let me indicate that there are seven motions set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are acceptable. They will be debated together but voted upon separately.

Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk and Motions Nos. 5, 6, and 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North cause the Chair some procedural difficulties in that they appear to direct the government to remit some or all of the moneys collected as a result of this increased tax to the support of various groups or causes: tobacco growers, hospitals or public health programs related to tobacco consumption.

Neither Bill C-10 nor the ways and means motion upon which it is based has addressed the question of how the collected moneys could be dispensed.

In my view these motions attempt to go beyond what was envisaged by the bill given second reading by the House. Therefore, in accordance with Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 698(1), I must declare Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7 out of order as they are beyond the scope of the bill.

I shall now put Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the House.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your ruling my Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 out of order on procedural grounds. However, I would just like to remind the Speaker that the purpose of my amendments is precisely to earmark the funds for health promotion and health protection.

I wonder, as I feel there is a sense of support from across the floor, if I can have unanimous consent to have Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 put forward and debated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-10 be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 23 to 25 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) 0.001 cent per cigarette;

(b) 0.001 cent per tobacco stick; and

(c) 0.001 cent per gram of loose tobacco."

That Bill C-10 be amended in clause 5 by striking out lines 5 to 12 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"1. Cigarettes, $0,10889 for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package.

2. Tobacco sticks, $0.001 per stick.

3. Manufactured tobacco, including snuff, but not including cigars, cigarettes and tobacco sticks, $15.215 per kilogram.

4. Cigars, 40.001 per cent."

That Bill C-10 be amended in clause 8 by striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"4. Cigars, $9.190 per thousand.

5. Canadian raw leaf tobacco, when sold for consumption, $0.978 per kilogram actual mass.

6. Tobacco sticks, $0.001 per thousand."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my strong objections to Bill C-10 and to propose amendments which I feel will help alleviate the adverse impact this bill will have not only on consumers of tobacco products, but also on producers of that product, tobacco farmers.

I want to make sure that this government fulfils the commitment to farmers that it has made time and time again in this House, to return some of this taxation to the producers in order to help alleviate the adverse impacts of increases on their industry.

In going through my amendments, Motion Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are essentially the same. They essentially reduce the amount of tax on tobacco products. I was unable to put in a motion to withdraw this tax totally because that motion would have been ruled out of order by yourself, Mr. Speaker, as was my Motion No. 4 which dealt with giving the returns of this taxation to tobacco farmers.

Let us be clear about this bill. This government has attempted to cloud the issue and to cover up the real intent of this bill. This bill is nothing but another tax grab by this government. This is not a health bill. The government certainly has the right and the responsibility to show its view on smoking and to alert Canadians to the potential health risks of smoking. This is not what is at issue here.

What is at issue here is the use of the tax system to impose an incredible burden on Canadians who supposedly, after considering these warnings, have exercised their ultimate right to choose. What is at issue here is the government's refusal to fulfil promises to assist tobacco farmers in their time of need and to help those who want to leave the industry, and to help those wishing to remain to find new markets for their product.

Why does this government always feel that the solution to its problem is always through taxation, to tax people into submission? It has a deficit problem. It is spending too much, more than it is taking in. So what has to be done? This government's solution is to tax people, tax the little guy. Taxation is not the answer and it is surely not the answer in this case.

If the government is so concerned about stopping young people from smoking as it claims, why is it not implementing a program like the one in the United States. Students starting in the first year of schooling are educated about smoking and are actually offered certificates for completion of this non-smoking program. It seems to me that if it wanted to stop young people from smoking this would be a viable program to implement. Unfortunately the government has not done that. Instead it has gone the taxation route.

In a recent article Hubert Laframboise, a former deputy minister at Health and Welfare, said that this U.S. program would give students: "a continuous bombardment as to the ills and dangers of smoking and would be a nucleus of a smoke-free society". He said that this would be a beneficial way to stop smoking among young people. Again, instead, the taxation government over there decides to tax people to death.

I welcome any government's concern for the health of Canadians, but I think its concern should not only be limited to those matters which just fatten its own coffers.

This bill proposes a 3 per cent increase in the federal excise tax on cigarettes and, by its own estimates, it will increase the government's coffers by some $1.4 billion.

The real intent of this bill is to increase revenue. It is not for the health of Canadians. It aims to do nothing more than to take money from the pockets of ordinary Canadians. It is a regressive tax, an unfair tax, and it is an unnecessary tax.

Tobacco farmers have been equally exploited by this government. With the latest tax increase it will take $4 billion a year in tobacco taxes from the sweat and labour of our tobacco farmers. What part of this $4 billion is it planning on giving back to the industry this year? Absolutely nothing.

Tobacco farmers have endured yet another year of uncertainty and hardship. While the past crop year has been a relatively good one and quota prices seem to have stabilized a bit, there is no getting away from the fact that the long-term outlook for tobacco is not a positive one.

The decline in the demand for tobacco brought about by growing health concerns, government anti-smoking legislation and those ever increasing taxes applied to tobacco sales, has left tobacco producers in dire straits. They have been left to look for compensation, alternative markets and alternative crops.

We hear time and time again from the government side: "Why do they not find alternative crops?" I am sure most of them would like to. They would like to find an alternative crop that would make them a living, but unfortunately in these hard times for Canadian farmers tobacco farmers are no different. Their soil is not any better than the rest. They are not going to find some magical crop to take over for tobacco.

There is no question that both governments, federal and provincial, have been unfair to tobacco farmers. In many ways I believe it is the uncertainty that is hardest to take. Decisions on tax increases and compensation have been arbitrary. In fact they have been contradictory. There has been stalling. There has been a lack of real analysis and comprehensive planning for the future of our tobacco growing industry.

The result of this lack of government strategy is uncertainty, financial suffering, political cynicism and human tragedy. The tobacco farmers in my area are in no short supply of these afflictions. My communities are probably the greatest victims of a government's lack of responsibility for taxation policy. Even the slightest additional levy on one cigarette means a loss of thousands of dollars in my communities of Haldimand—Norfolk.

Last March this government stopped accepting applications for the REDUX program designed to help tobacco farmers exit the program. Now some 600 farmers in our area are on the list. Will the federal government take some of the $4 billion it alone gets out of the industry and put it back in to help compensate farmers for that? None this year went to that end.

The tobacco farmer with 18 acres produces about 45,000 pounds of dried production, of which the farmer's gross revenue before cost is $66,000. What the government takes is $4.5 billion. That is 68 times what the farmer gets for his own product. The farmer then has to go and pay for the cost of producing that product. Per package the farmer's revenue is $0.073. The provincial government receives $2.31. The federal government receives $2.04. That is a tax of $4.35 alone in Ontario and the farmer gets 7.3 cents.

Since 1984, 900 farmers have abandoned the tobacco area leaving about 1,200 attempting to hang on. The transition has been very large and it has been very rapid. Nowhere has this rapid transition and displacement been felt more strongly than in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk and in the neighbouring riding of Elgin.

Traditionally it has been one of the largest tobacco growing regions in the country. I am glad the member for Elgin is here to support me today. Many farmers have lost their farms. Some have struggled to start anew with a different crop, buying different tools and equipment, learning a new crop, and usually taking a loss for the first few years; but there are only so many farmers who can find a new crop without flooding the market, and very few have actually succeeded.

Farmers are a vital part of the economy of Haldimand—Norfolk and of Canada. When the people of Haldimand—Norfolk suffer indeed the people of Canada suffer. The small businesses where the farmer used to buy his products suffer. The students who work on the tobacco farms suffer, and they need that money to continue their education. In fact, all Canadians suffer when farming suffers. After collecting billions of dollars each year from the labours of these hard-working farmers, the Canadian government is putting them in a situation where they cannot leave the tobacco industry without losing their farms or without losing their retirement pensions.

Even when this government had in the past allocated money to these programs the funding was woefully inadequate. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, if you are aware that these farms are these farmers' retirement pensions and because of the slash in quota price, because of the inflictions of taxation policy, these farmers in the end are going to end up with nothing. What Canadian can go through life and suffer through trying to produce a legal product and suffer as much as tobacco farmers do.

For every $300 it collected from tobacco the government gave less than $1 back to farmers who produced the product and who have lost their livelihood. Now this government contents itself with stalling tactics, with the continuation of these nickel and dime programs. The Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board has worked long and hard to receive just treatment for the tobacco farmers from the federal government. They have asked the government countless times to end the ad hoc piecemeal approach to tobacco compensation and yet now when the entire state of tobacco is uncertain, this government even refuses to give the board any indication what compensation farmers leaving the industry will receive this year.

Imagine the uncertainty and the stress this lack of government compassion is causing the stricken farmers this very minute. These farmers want nothing more than to be treated fairly.

A group of these farmers have formed together. They have formed together to sue the federal and provincial governments for their increases in taxation over the last years. What did the governments do? They challenged these farmers' rights in the court. They challenged the rights in the court because they felt they had the ultimate time, that they had the ultimate responsibility to be able to defend what compensation these farmers would receive. Quite frankly Canadian farmers and indeed tobacco farmers are upset with this government because of the taxation policies and are willing to show this government next time around why they are upset with them.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss at report stage Bill C-10. First of all I would like to indicate that I share a number of the concerns of my hon. colleague who has just spoken of the concern and plight of those in the tobacco production business. The tobacco farmers themselves obviously have not been treated fairly and not been given adequate support in order to move into other agricultural ventures. But that is something that we have before us, the challenge to deal with in the future, but today we are discussing the pricing of tobacco which I think is, I suppose one can say, indirectly related, but certainly not very directly related and a whole other matter.

I must say that I support Bill C-10 in these areas because I think it is fair to say that tobacco is the only legal consumer product that actually kills people when it is used as intended. This is rather astonishing when you consider that if people actually followed the intended use of this legal product they would have a very good chance of dying prematurely. As well, they would have a good opportunity of seeing to the premature death of those who sit around them as they smoke because we all know the implications of second-hand smoke.

We are dealing with a substance that is a killer substance. If there are steps that can be taken as members of Parliament to encourage people to reduce the consumption of this particular substance or perhaps not to use it at all, I think that is in the best interests not only of those individuals but of our society generally.

I must say that Canada leads the world in tobacco control. It is regarded around the world as a leader in controlling this substance and our success in reducing tobacco consumption in this country over the past few years actually testifies to the strength of this comprehensive approach. In the three year period, between 1989 and 1991, tobacco consumption in Canada has dropped over 20 per cent. It was during the same period that Canada passed two landmark pieces of tobacco control legislation, the Tobacco Products Control Act and the Non-smokers' Health Act, imposed significant tobacco tax increases in two separate budgets, 2 cents per cigarette in 1989 and 3 cents per cigarette in 1991.

Consumption in 1991 alone, largely owing to the substantial tax increases in the 1991 federal and provincial budgets, is expected to drop by approximately 10 per cent.

When you consider, Mr. Speaker, that there has been much research done on the precise relationship between the price and demand for tobacco products, we know now without any question that for every 10 per cent increase in price consumption will drop by 4 per cent. Because young people are more price sensitive, the impact of a price increase on their consumption of tobacco is even more pronounced. For every 10 per cent increase in price, consumption by young people and teens will drop 14 per cent.

I am going to add a few figures, but they are actually quite astounding. The tax increase of 3 cents per cigarette introduced in the 1991 federal budget means that cigarette prices increased by approximately 18 per cent at the retail level. This price increase will result in a decline in consumption of between 7 and 11 per cent or in other words, 450,000 to 700,000 fewer smokers.

According to the World Health Organization, between one–quarter and one–third of all smokers will die from their tobacco use. Therefore, 450,000 to 700,000 fewer smokers means between 112,000 and 230,000 fewer tobacco caused deaths. No other single tobacco control measure could mean so many lives saved.

It is estimated that consumption among young people will drop a dramatic 25 per cent. Of course, the greatest success to be achieved by any tobacco control program is to prevent people from becoming addicted in the very first place. This one measure is expected to stop at least 30,000 young people, age 19 and under, from joining the tobacco market. Many thousands more will quit smoking.

In total this budget change will result in approximately 100,000 fewer teenaged smokers in our country. Because virtually all new users of tobacco products are minors, reducing smoking participation rates among teenagers will, if sustained, result in a substantial decline in the adult smoking population in future decades.

I want to also use this opportunity to refer to a private member's bill that I introduced a few weeks ago that would increase the penalty to those retailers who sell tobacco products to very young children. At the moment, Mr. Speaker, if you are a retailer and you sell tobacco products to a 10 year old, you will be levied a fine of $10 if found guilty. This might have made sense 50 years ago, but in a modern day sense to be fined $10 is hardly something that is going to encourage people to uphold the law.

My private member's bill substantially increases those penalties to what I would term as rather unscrupulous or certainly unthoughtful retailers. A recent study in my own community found that when this particular group who were concerned about young people smoking below the legal age of 16 sent 10, 12 and 13 year olds into a variety of business outlets asking to purchase cigarettes, in most cases the retailers quite wilfully sold a package of cigarettes to a 12 year old. Obviously, a 12 year old is not someone that is 16. At those ages it is pretty obvious. For that reason I think it betrays a rather lackadaisical attitude at least that some people still have in terms of this particular problem, that as I said earlier while legal and used as intended will actually kill you or the likelihood is certainly there.

Although actually I do not normally support government legislation, I find myself in support of this. I only hope that there is a chance that you would consider your ruling, but I suppose you will not, on the hon. member for Winnipeg North's amendment that would permit the taxes to be directed to health programs. I think this is a useful initiative. It is a targeting of tax dollars to something we would all support. However, technically I understand the reason for your ruling and unfortunately we will not be able to deal with this. Perhaps we could find some other way of introducing this measure at a later date, but I commend the hon. member for this initiative in this particularly critical area.

It would be easy to go on at some length about the horrors of tobacco smoking and the concerns it causes, to say nothing of the incredible costs it imposes on society because of the strain it puts on our health care system. Those speeches have all been made and I think my comments today certainly sum up my feeling on this, and it is that we should not support these amendments that are being put forward by my humble colleague, but support the general intent of this legislation.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank both my colleagues for their comments. As those who are sitting here in the House today and those watching the proceedings on television will see, there are definitely two opinions on the piece of legislation we have before us.

I would be very surprised if these amendments to this legislation had the backing of the Liberal caucus because I know many in the caucus, especially the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who has great concern in this area, support this type of activity but would, as his amendments indicated, like to see moneys earmarked for specific reasons from the moneys raised by the increase in taxes.

My colleague from Kamloops laid out some very important statistics, facts and figures that we are concerned about. As a matter of fact, if you look at the projections of moneys to be received from the taxation of cigarettes, we have allowed over the five-year plan for that to gradually go down. We believe that cigarette smoking will continue to decrease.

Our major concern in the health end of things are the numbers of young people who start smoking. The hon. member referred to the retailer selling to youths, and so on. He has a very good point there, there is no question about that. We are finding that especially young female teenagers are taking up the habit. They have probably been the growth industry for the cigarette manufacturers, and of course we are concerned about it. Those in the know, not the government but those outside government, tell us that these proposals in Bill C-10 will prevent 100,000 teenagers from starting to smoke. If that is the case, then the bill has in fact been very helpful.

The colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk whose amendments we are discussing today made some points and I understand his concerns. He represents tobacco farmers here in the House of Commons.

Many tobacco farmers have left the business. There has been some help for them. There has not been a refusal, as he said in his speech, to help the tobacco farmers this year. We are waiting for the Ontario government to co-operate with a program to help the tobacco farmers because it taxes as well and it has the responsibility of sharing to help tobacco farmers. We are waiting for it and he knows that. Those facts were given to him in committee and I was a little shocked when I heard his speech today because he slightly misrepresented the facts as they were presented to him, and I felt badly about that.

As far as educational programs in our schools are concerned, curriculum, of course, is the responsibility of provinces. The ministry of health in the federal government has a number of excellent publications regarding health care and the problem with cigarette smoking. They are widely distributed in schools. I know there are programs there to encourage young people to stop smoking.

The motions that my friend from Haldimand—Norfolk has proposed today, just so that people understand the magnitude of them, would reduce the taxation on a carton of cigarettes by almost $6. Four-tenths of one cent would be the increase in the taxation and not the $6 per carton the bill purports to do. That is inconsistent with the vote of this House to adopt the ways and means motion and the approval in principle given to the bill by the House of Commons at second reading.

All groups that appeared before committee, people from the field of health, the cancer institute and so on and so forth, support this bill. There is no question about it.

He said that the return to the tobacco farmers is small compared to the end price of the product, and there is no question about that. Grain farmers could probably say the same thing with some of the products they produce, although tobacco farmers' returns compared to what other farmers are finding in returns these days are substantially more than $6,000 more to the farmer. That is the average right now and is of great concern to those of us in this country.

I understand his concerns for the farmers. We share those with him, but we believe that this is a very important bill for the health of the country and to raise revenues. We do not shy away from that. Bills have to be paid.

My friend from the New Democratic Party discussed today some very accurate statistics on the health aspects of cigarette smoking. They cost a tremendous amount of money in health care to which all levels of government contribute. Therefore we have to fund that care.

It is estimated that 30,000 Canadians die each year from the result of cigarette smoking. Anyone who has lung diseases and breathing disorders—not being a medical practitioner I cannot put all the names to them but emphysema and so on—knows full well the health care costs attributed to this. We as a federal government have to pay a good share of those health costs.

All these matters come into play. I would urge that we defeat Motions 1 to 3 in the name of my colleague and friend from Haldimand—Norfolk and that we proceed to third reading as soon as possible on this particular piece of legislation.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join this debate and support Bill C-10 as an effective tobacco taxation measure.

The health community and I think Canadians generally support the use of fiscal policy as an important component in the comprehensive strategy to reduce tobacco use.

Because of the direct link between the price of tobacco products and their level of consumption, tobacco tax increases are a highly effective health promotion measure. I know that from personal experience. I quit smoking when the price of cigarettes went up to 50 cents a pack and that is a few years ago, as anybody who has attempted to buy a package of cigarettes knows. It is a highly effective health promotion measure.

There is a direct link between price and consumption. As a number of people have pointed out, the young people are most price sensitive. The impact of a price increase on their consumption of tobacco is even more pronounced. That is, for every 10 per cent increase in price consumption will drop by 4 per cent. Hurray, I do not want young people to start smoking and those who have already started smoking, I want them to stop. If we have to tax cigarettes out of existence then I think that is what we should do.

As other people in the House have said the major market is young women. That is another tragedy. It is young women who become pregnant and then pass on the smoke to their infants which causes more health problems. It is a snowball effect.

No other single tobacco control measure could mean as much as a tax increase. No other measure would mean that so many lives could be saved. It is estimated that increasing tobacco taxation will cause young people to stop smoking at a rate of 25 per cent. That is terrific. I cannot understand why there are some members of the Liberal caucus who want to amend this legislation and encourage the use of tobacco.

Tobacco farmers do need support. They need support to get out of the product and to get into new crops that will promote the health of Canadians.

Critics also argue that a substantial tax increase represents an unjust infringement on the rights of smokers to consume a legal product. My colleague, the member for Kamloops, has pointed out that tobacco is the only legal consumer product that kills when used exactly as intended.

Once again I know from personal experience that this is true. My closest friend died 10 years ago from lung cancer, leaving three young children. She had tried to quit smoking a number of times. The smoking finally got to her and she died. Her children are now the same age as my children. They are teenagers, but those teenagers have grown up without the benefit of a wonderful woman as their mother.

There is no freedom from addiction. There is no freedom from the cardiac unit or the cancer ward. The cost to society from tobacco caused deaths and disabilities is billions of dollars every year. That does not even take into account the extraordinary cost and the lost contribution to society of the more than 35,000 Canadians who die tobacco caused deaths every year. These numbers are mind numbing: 35,000 Canadians die from tobacco caused deaths every year.

The government is to be congratulated. I would like to underline the word "congratulated". I am not accustomed to congratulating this government. It should be congratulated for understanding the important role fiscal policy plays in the comprehensive strategy to reduce tobacco use.

In the three-year period, 1989 through 1991, tobacco consumption in Canada has dropped over 20 per cent.

Once again I have a personal story. My 73-year old mother has just quit smoking. I applaud her courage in doing that at this very late stage in her life. It is not just her life, but the lives of all of us who care about her, who care about her health and want her to live many, many more years. The price of tobacco products was a partial reason for her decision to quit.

In 1991 alone consumption, largely owing to the substantial tax increases in the 1991 federal and provincial budget, is expected to drop by approximately 10 per cent. There is a direct linkage between health care costs and tobacco costs.

As a member of the New Democratic Party, the same party that is now forming the government in British Columbia where health care costs are going through the roof, any instrument we may use at the federal and provincial level to reduce health care costs and to pass along the kind of revenues that provinces need to look after the health of their citizens should be applauded. I think we in this House should applaud the government's role in using fiscal policy as an instrument for tobacco use and pass Bill C-10.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first question is on Motion No. 1. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 2. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 3. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government Whip and the opposition Whip to defer the division until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until three o'clock p.m. later this day, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions during the interval when the bells were ringing. I think you would find unanimous consent simply to suspend the sitting until two o'clock. Then the division would take place shortly after Question Period later this afternoon. That would serve the House best.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 1.48 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, Small Business Week starts today. Small businesses make a major contribution to the Canadian economy. In fact, in his last Budget, the Minister of Finance called small businesses the motor of Canada's economy. However, as a result of the Tory government's unsound economic policies, Mr. Speaker, the motor is not running smoothly. Small businesses are suffering as a result of the GST and the government's monetary policies.

Since the Tory government came to power, there has been a record number of bankruptcies and lay-offs in this country. In Montreal the situation is catastrophic. Since March 1990, Montreal has lost more than 17,000 jobs in the clothing industry, more than 14,000 in the hotel industry, and the list is endless. Mr. Speaker, to improve the health of small businesses in this country, we need a Liberal government.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, at noon today three very important international organizations, the World Conservation Union, the United Nations Environment Program, and the World Wide Fund for Nature, released a very important report called Caring for the Earth, a strategy for sustainable living.

This report says: "Humanity must live within the caring capacity of the earth or we deny the human future". This new book is both an analysis and a plan of action, if you like a user's guide to caring for the earth.

Caring for the Earth defines two basic requirements: to keep human activities within the earth's caring capacity and to redress the imbalances in security and opportunity between the richer and the poorer parts of the world. It is addressed in direct language to politicians, executives, business people, and citizens.

In order to achieve this, it states clearly that a global alliance is essential for success. This would involve strengthening international law, helping lower income countries, turning around the north-south financial flows, and strengthening international commitment and capacity to achieve sustainability.

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that later this afternoon you will host a reception acknowledging the importance of this publication. I urge all members to support it and to read it earnestly.

MEN AGAINST VIOLENCE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the organizers of this weekend's national conference on male violence, and to urge all men to support the very worth-while proposals coming from this gathering.

Men make up only 48 per cent of our population, yet we are responsible for 90 per cent of the violence. For too long now we have denied this problem, keeping silent and pretending it was a woman's problem if she was beaten. It is our problem and we are the perpetrators of the violence. We must work hard to stop it.

The conference produced some very tactical proposals. They include men's organizations, lobbying on behalf of women's shelters, a national pornography boycott and changes in our schools' curriculum to eliminate sexism and stereotyping.

The women of this country live in fear of male violence. In a country such as ours, we cannot and must not allow this to continue. Now is the time for men to speak out against this violence, and to do their part to make it stop.

BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTION

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday British Columbians elected the highest percentage of women ever to any Canadian legislature or Parliament, 26 per cent.

It is the first time in Canadian history that more than one quarter of a legislature is made up of women members, even though women are more than half the population.

We are looking forward to better days in British Columbia. We finally have a chance to establish firm roots of equality for women. Thirty-one per cent of the governing New Democratic Party caucus are women. It is a government of women and men committed to full social, legal and economic equality for women.

We are sweeping the country, and it is about time.

HOUSING

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in these financially strapped times, we need creative thinking if young people are going to be able to afford to buy homes.

The Canadian Real Estate Association has been working diligently to come up with just such creative solutions. It proposed a plan where first time home buyers could have their registered retirement savings plan assume an equity share in their home.

Similar to the treatment of common stock held in an RRSP, the RRSP owned portion of the capital appreciation of the house would be taxable. Many young families may be willing to forgo the capital gains exemption on the share of their home owned by the RRSP in return for earlier home ownership and greater equity in the property.

The Real Estate Association has developed this proposal with input from industry members, financial institutions, consumers and government. I urge the Minister of Finance and his officials to give this proposal serious consideration.

Young families who are looking to buy their first home need this type of support.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, nations around the world are still deeply concerned at the internationally peace threatening conflict which is taking place in Yugoslavia.

Not only are we witnessing the horrible destruction of property and human life in Yugoslavia, but many fear that the racial tensions expressed there will spill over into other countries in the area.

Across this country, concerned Canadians are rallying to demonstrate for a peaceful resolution to the Yugoslavian conflict. In London Ontario alone, 400 demonstrated for peace in Yugoslavia this past weekend.

The Prime Minister has said that the UN must play a role. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that the international community must act, that we must induce Yugoslav parties to honour a cease–fire.

An embargo was suggested. Canada must not wait. It must lead the way and continually act until peace in Yugoslavia is achieved.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention an article published in Paris Match in October 1991, which is about violence, children and firearms in America.

According to the article, it is the new American disease, the biggest epidemic since AIDS. It is spreading in schools, classrooms and playgrounds. Not a single large city in the United States has been spared. According to the FBI, 2,162 children and teenagers were killed by gunshots last year, an average of six children per day. In a subway station in Greenwich Village, two 14 year–olds shot a high school student in the back to get her gold chain. In the Bronx, a 9–year old practises shooting from the window of his apartment and narrowly misses a woman in the apartment across the street. Every day, statistics show the extent of the massacre. Firearms have recently become the main cause of death among young people.

Mr. Speaker, I hope these few sentences will make people think, especially those who, naively or otherwise, favour the complete absence of gun control in this country.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, if we are to say that language is about understanding one another, then today in this House the aboriginal people of Canada have been totally misunderstood and unappreciated.

The government authorities on the other side have deemed that the bill to establish an aboriginal languages foundation would be dropped from the Order Paper and not have unanimous consent to make it a votable bill.

It is serious when we realize that languages with fewer than 10 speakers in Canada are on the verge of extinction. Those with 10 to 100 speakers are extremely endangered. Out of the 53 aboriginal languages, only three languages have more than 5,000 speakers.

Could these people have not found it in their hearts to do the right thing and not to be confronted further on the constitutional end on this very vital issue?

CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, Canadians deserve to have all of the facts about where their country is going, so I rise today to condemn statements made in a newspaper ad this past weekend by the Canadian Labour Congress and Action Canada. The ad said this government has a high interest rate policy. That is wrong. Today's prime rate of 9 per cent is the lowest in years.

The ad blamed free trade for the loss of 300,000 jobs. Wrong again. A continent-wide recession, a natural but regrettable economic cycle was largely to blame.

The ad said this government is not interested in advancing women in the work place. Absolutely wrong. The creation of permanent, full-time jobs for women has been a priority and an accomplishment.

This is the worst kind of political advocacy advertising. It seeks to distort the facts and foster confrontation which makes Canada uncompetitive.

Finally, I am curious as to why this ad uses American spelling instead of Canadian. Has the CLC been using Bob Rae's American advertising agency?

ABBY HOFFMAN

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the government moved Abby Hoffman from her position as Director General of Sport Canada. She now has a senior planning position with Health and Welfare.

In her career so far, Abigail Hoffman has made an outstanding contribution to sport in Canada. She had a great career in track and field for Canada, qualifying three times for the Olympic finals in the 800 metres.

More important, in the last 10 years as Director General of Sport in Canada, she has shown leadership and a commitment to equality of access to sport, a commitment to excellence in sport to a strong professional administration of sport, and to a strong federal leadership in sport.

I hope this move by the government does not signal a lack of commitment by the government to these important achievements by Abby Hoffman. We congratulate her on her achievements so far and look to even greater things in the future.

NATIONAL HOMEMAKER/HOME SUPPORT WORKER WEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South West): Mr. Speaker, Home Support Canada has declared this week of October 20 to 27, 1991, National Homemaker/Home Support Worker Week.

During this time, Canadians will have an opportunity to participate in numerous activities meant to increase public awareness of the homemaker and/or home support workers role in making Canada a caring nation.

These workers all across Canada provide a variety of services in their homes to people who truly need them; teaching young parents in crisis the necessary skills effectively to operate a home or providing assistance to persons living with AIDS. Those are just two examples of the many services they provide.

The value of home support services to seniors, persons with disabilities and families in crisis really cannot be ignored. One study found that 72 per cent of Canadians over the age of 85 have disabilities while 40 per cent of those between 65 and 84 also are considered to have disabilities. Seventy-two per cent of all persons with disabilities require assistance in their households to help with their chores and meal preparation.

Home support staff and volunteers are to be congratulated for their contribution and commitment to a better way of life.

MEN AGAINST VIOLENCE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise in this House today to applaud a group of men who sponsored and held a conference this past weekend here in the nation's capital on violence, Men against Violence. It is heartening to see that these men are taking an active role in combating that problem which has darkened all our lives.

Indeed, we are approaching the anniversary of that day two years ago when a man with a gun murdered 14 women in cold blood because they were women.

Last week in a place called Killeen, Texas, another man with another gun walked in to a diner and 15 minutes later he and 22 other people were dead. Today the death toll has risen to 25. Fifteen of these victims were women.

The men at the conference this weekend undertook to help change in a fundamental way the attitudes that some of their brothers have about women. These attitudes have resulted in 40 per cent of the people in society committing 90 per cent of the violence against the rest.

The conference proposals included a commitment from those in attendance to lobby others to stop sexism, stereotyping and violence directed at women and children of all ages. Those at the conference believe that the participation of men is crucial to stopping male violence.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this House will join with me in congratulating the participants of this weekend's conference and also to join them in ending the silence.

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, while gathering information to support the application of Colchester county to attract a proposed facility for federally sentenced women, we have determined some disturbing disparities which have a very negative impact on the economy of rural and small town Nova Scotia.

There are 13,000 federal employees in Nova Scotia and 10,000 of these are in the Halifax–Dartmouth area. Although Halifax–Dartmouth has only 33 per cent of the population, it has over 75 per cent of the federal government jobs. This inequity is completely out of all proportion and every effort should be made to decentralize this employment around the province.

An excellent start would be for the Solicitor General to announce that the facility for federally sentenced women would be located in Colchester county. With 70 per cent of the inmates coming from rural areas, Colchester provides an excellent location and a positive community atmosphere to reinforce women as they move back into society.

Not only is Colchester the very best place for the facility, it will begin to correct the disparity in federal government jobs in Nova Scotia.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, this week we celebrate National Science and Technology Week. The importance of science and technology cannot be underestimated, as these fields will be Canada's passport into the next decade.

This government sponsors many excellent programs in the field of education. One which comes to mind is the Canada scholarships. This program offers a wonderful opportunity for 2,500 outstanding men and women for undergraduate studies in science and engineering.

Encouraging students to venture into the fields of science and engineering is an insurance policy for all Canadians. Mr. Speaker, four of the recipients of this year's scholarships are from the riding of Wild Rose. I am proud today to congratulate all the recipients. Diligence has its rewards.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a week ago today the Nobel committee in Norway announced that it was awarding the Nobel Peace Prize to Aung San Suu Kyi, Myanmar or Burma's opposition leader. While many of us who have supported the struggle of the people of Burma for democracy and justice rejoiced at this news, it is highly probable that Ms. Suu Kyi herself is unaware that she is the recipient of this prestigious award.

Ms. Suu Kyi has been under house arrest for two years now, following a bloody crackdown by the military government against the opposition movement in Burma. Despite her detention, she successfully led her party to an overwhelming victory in national elections in May, 1990.

The Nobel committee praised Ms. Suu Kyi for her non-violent struggle for democracy and human rights and for one of the most extraordinary examples of civil courage in Asia in recent decades. It is such courage that must motivate the policies on human rights of the Government of Canada.

I call on the Prime Minister to take a leadership role in condemning the systemic, gross and continuous violations of human rights in Myanmar. I am sure all members of the House would join in congratulating Aung San Suu Kyi for her courage and leadership.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to welcome the Prime Minister back from his meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. I would like to say that we appreciated his speeches on human rights, but according to Amnesty International, the Iranian government has jailed hundreds of opponents to the present regime. Torture is common in that country. While the Prime Minister was making his pretty speeches in Zimbabwe, the Minister for International Trade was in Tehran last month, to extend a one billion dollar line of credit to the Iranian government, which has been condemned by Amnesty International.

• (1420)

How can the Prime Minister reconcile what he said about human rights at the Commonwealth Conference with the one billion dollar line of credit extended to the government in Tehran?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well there are distinctions to be made in international finance and direct aid to developing countries. For instance, despite the problem we have always had with certain major actions by the Chinese government, we still have trade relations with China. We are trying to sell wheat from the Canadian West, as we have been for the past 25 or 30 years, so there are some important distinctions to be made.

As far as protecting human rights is concerned, I announced the Government of Canada's policy in Africa last week, and I think it is a policy that stands on its own merits. It is the Canadian government's policy, and it is one that we intend to defend regularly, not just at Commonwealth meetings but also at the Francophone Summit and throughout the world.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as he has just said in French, the Prime Minister is just back from the Commonwealth Conference in Zimbabwe where he talked a lot about human rights.

Yet at the very moment he was making these speeches about human rights, his government was busy sending back to Iran a woman who had been beaten 35 times with a steel cable because she was not wearing a veil. I want to ask the Prime Minister where is the government's so-called commitment to human rights?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first let me say to the hon. member and to members in this House that the question he raises is a very serious and delicate one indeed.

He knows, as do all members, that the Privacy Act prevents me from going into detail—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: It prevents me from going into the details of this case.

I can advise the House however that the individual in question has had the benefit of the most generous refugee determination system in the world. This person has also sought intervention on the part of the minister on human and compassionate grounds.

With the information I have at this time concerning this case, I have indicated that I was not in a position to intervene. I am looking at the details of this case, as are my officials as we speak here, and when I have fully assessed all aspects of that claim I will be able to make a final determination. Contrary to certain media reports that person is not scheduled for deportation today.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I sometimes have a little difficulty in figuring out what this government thinks a refugee is. Last spring ministers were busy with the red carpet treatment from Ottawa to Vancouver for Al-Mashat and here is a lady who received 35 lashes with a steel cable. The minister says that he needs more information. It is in the file, Mr. Speaker.

I want to know from this government when it will do the right thing and not send that lady back to hell, but give her refugee status in Canada right away.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I guess, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member chooses to play on the repulsive side of what has taken place in the country of that person. It is easy to lose sight of the forest for the trees.

I have told the hon. member that I was looking at the case as we speak, that I was going to assess all of it and then make a decision. That decision has to be made within the framework of the Immigration Act. We have to look at the interest of Canada in making that decision also.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The same minister will know that he has had several days to review an extremely extensive file on this woman.

In fact, his officials and his government took the position that even though this woman was taken from a private party, arrested, publicly flogged 35 times, and spent a month in hospital as a result of the flogging, according to affidavits which he has in his possession, the Canadian government has taken the position that this degradation was and I quote "not exceedingly harsh considering that she has not suffered permanent physical damage". The minister will note that is a direct quote from the file.

Is it the minister's position that women who are whipped with wire cables will only be allowed to stay in Canada if they have permanent scars from the whipping?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just quoted the refugee determination board. She attributes that to the Government of Canada. She should stand up, apologize to Canadians and say that that decision was made by the refugee determination board. It was not the decision of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: You know better than that.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this woman was thrown in the Hamilton jail last Wednesday night because this minister upheld the decision which he is now trying to dissociate himself from. The final decision lies in the hands of this minister.

I asked him last week if he would please reconsider and I ask him once again. Will he exercise his judgment and tell this woman and hundreds of others like her that they do not have to return to Iran after they have been publicly flogged and hospitalized to the extent that this woman was tortured by the Government of Iran? Will he tell her today as she sits under arrest by his officials now in Toronto?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member suggesting to this House that every time a citizen, not of Canada but of a foreign country, comes to Canada and seeks to be landed, because in his or her own country there is a law that that person does not like—and that it happens we also in Canada find repulsive—does that mean that just because of—

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to tell the House is that the decision to be made in this case has to take into account all of the factors. This is what I am doing.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I would first like to tell the Prime Minister that the policy of tying economic aid to human rights is laudable. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he can now go further and act. Will he announce today that any aid from Canada, any economic support and any economic treaty will depend directly on respect for human rights?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in general, people seem to support the Canadian position that I articulated at the Commonwealth meeting—in particular, a statement by the Hon. Ed Broadbent, if I am not mistaken. One of the results is found in the Commonwealth communiqué today, which reads as follows:

[English]

"—having reaffirmed the principles to which the Commonwealth is committed—the protection and promotion of the fundamental political values of the Commonwealth, democracy, democratic processes and institutions which reflect national circumstances, et cetera; fundamental human rights including equal rights and opportunities for all citizens regardless of race, colour, creed or political belief; equality for women, so that they may exercise their full and equal rights".

What we were trying to do in the Commonwealth was to signal, as an important donor nation to the Commonwealth and elsewhere, that Canada, this government and its Parliament, will be guided in these decisions in future more and more by considerations of the manner in which these countries treat their own citizens; that human rights is a question of fundamental importance. It cannot be set aside. It is one that Canada is going to try and incorporate more and more with its allies and friends around the world into the general thrust of assistance to countries that seek to develop democracy in their own countries.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the members of the Commonwealth did not totally get on board with the Prime Minister. As I said earlier in my first question, it is a laudable goal, I believe, to attach economic aid to human rights development.

I want to ask the Prime Minister a question in the leadership role that he is taking on this issue. We are now in the process of negotiating a trade deal with Mexico, a country that an Amnesty International delegation visited last year, interviewed dozens of people and said, and I quote: "These people had suffered or witnessed human rights violations, harassment, illegal detention, ill treatment, arbitrary killings, extrajudicial executions, disappearances and torture".

Given the leadership that the Prime Minister has said he is prepared to take on human rights, will he withdraw from the trade deal discussions with Mexico?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since 1987 the cabinet meets to consider the question of human rights in regard to foreign policy decisions, particularly in regard to the question of the distribution of aid and assistance. Canada in this regard is the second highest granting nation of the G-7 countries and ranks with the top in the world. So our contributions in real dollars are not insignificant. We can have an impact if we do this in co-operation with friends and allies around the world.

It is generally acknowledged that President Salinas has made remarkable strides not only in modernizing his economy but in dealing with human rights abuses.

Mr. Barrett: Nonsense. Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Mulroney: I had the occasion two or three weeks ago at Stanford University to discuss this question with him and I am encouraged by his commitment to the elimination of human rights abuses which have taken place and his commitment to substantial improvements in the future.

Amnesty International makes an important contribution around the world and this is one of the factors that the Government of Canada considers when it makes its determination on aid at the end of every given year. With regard to the comments by my hon. friend from British Columbia about President Salinas, these I repudiate because President Salinas is widely recognized as a leader who is doing a great deal both to modernize his country and to respect human rights in all of its activities.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to say that we are in support of human rights, but it is another thing to take the kind of direct action on behalf of Canadians that will demonstrate that we care about human rights in these countries.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that I am aware of the measures that the Mexican government has taken, but still international bodies such as America's Watch say: "The volume and severity of reported abuses in Mexico remains unchanged".

The Prime Minister said just this month that: "nothing in international relations is more important than respect for individual freedoms and human rights". I agree. Will the Prime Minister withdraw from the talks with Mexico on the basis that it is violating those very human rights he wishes to champion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, for the simple reason that I do not accept the premise of my hon. friend. I do not question her sincerity, but I do not accept the premise.

What we are trying to do with the North American free trade agreement is to take a developing country and, through the combination of trade, principally trade but also some aid mostly of a technological and a technical nature, to raise the living standards of the poorest of Mexicans.

My hon. friend from the NDP says: "To lower ours." That is a socialist view, that you help poor people by lowering the revenues of the wealthy countries. That is exactly false. This government and this Parliament believes that the way you assist the poor is by opening your markets, by trading more liberally with them so that you raise the wealth and the individual well-being of individual Mexicans without impoverishing Canadians.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. More than 25,000 households in Montreal now depend on food banks every month, an increase of 23 per cent since last year. Sid Stevens, director of Sun Youth, would like to see joint action by the three levels of government, at the highest level, and the food banks to discuss ways to end this situation. Will the Prime Minister undertake to initiate such a meeting as soon as possible?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that everything must be done to try to eliminate the need for food banks wherever they are in this country, although in our present circumstances, they are extremely useful for the people who call on them.

I think that the hon. member knows that last week, in cooperation with the Government of Quebec, we made an important announcement concerning Canadair. But I also said then that I intended very soon to meet with ministers of the Quebec government and representatives of the city of Montreal, and the meeting is scheduled, to coordinate the action that the federal government is taking and continues to take in Montreal.

I think that on the whole we agree that federal action, which is recognized in Quebec as ongoing in recent years, should continue so that the kind of problems to which my colleague refers can be avoided, and I fully agree with him.

[English]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sid Stevens, Sun Youth's director, has extended a personal invitation to the Prime Minister to visit Sun Youth to talk about the lack of jobs, affordable housing and day care, which have made food banks the fastest growing industry in Canada.

I would ask the Prime Minister to visit Sun Youth to see for himself how serious the situation has become.

Will the Prime Minister reply promptly to this invitation and will he initiate a meeting between the three levels of government and the directors of food banks to obtain their perspective on how to put food banks out of business?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the observation. I agree with his assessment of Sid Stevens and Sun Youth and the very good work that they do in Montreal. There are similar institutions that exist elsewhere.

We have an immediate problem and it is not an insignificant one.

I will be happy to look at the suggestion of my hon. friend. I think that all the donors and even the executive director and his colleagues would agree that while there is this important short term and immediate problem, the longer haul solution must be to continue the lowering of interest rates and to bring inflation down, as it came down last Friday to the lowest point that it has been since 1970, and to develop an economic recovery plan with low inflation, high investment and declining unemployment based on lower interest rates which comes about because of international investor confidence.

That is what we are in the process of doing. The results are encouraging, but I will acknowledge that my friend's suggestion is an interesting one, one that I will look at and report back to him.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the right hon. Prime Minister on the same subject.

In metropolitan Toronto, food bank use has grown by 44 per cent. Yet, public donations have gone up by only 21 per cent, and $16 million worth of donated food will be distributed this year alone.

Why has the Prime Minister refused to visit the Daily Bread Food Bank to which he was invited in Toronto, the largest food bank in Canada, to see for himself where 2 million Canadians will get their food this year? What solutions does he have for the elimination of food banks in Canada, which are becoming permanent institutions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend again, no doubt with some consultation with my friend from Saint-Henri—Westmount, asks the larger question: What are we going to do to eliminate the food banks?

The year-over-year rate of inflation was 5.4 per cent in September, down from—

Mr. Keyes: Answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: The Liberals ask a question, and when you begin to give a serious answer, they start to heckle. They do not want an answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Our friends refuse to acknowledge it, but the fact of the matter is that—as I have indicated this may not appeal to a government that 10 years ago today had a prime rate of 22.75 per cent—it is down to 8.5 per cent today. Inflation was 12.9 per cent and it appears now it will be annualizing next year in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent.

Economic growth—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park will put his question, please.

An hon. member: He did.

Mr. Mulroney: They raise a question of poverty. When we try to deal with the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is the policies and the uncaring attitude of this government over the last seven years that have driven this country to a food bank economy.

The burden of feeding Canada's most vulnerable people has been refused by this government and has been dumped on to charitable organizations. Will the Prime Minister do something positive to help the poor and the needy by removing the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan today?

Mr. Andre: Do you want us to raise taxes or increase the deficit?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the number of low income Canadians declined by 1 million over the 1984-89 period.

As a result of changing the personal tax system, 850,000 low income Canadians, including 245,000 seniors, had their income tax reduced to zero. In 1991, $2.4 billion will be paid out to 8.6 million low and middle income tax filers as a result of the GST tax credit. The child tax credit was increased by almost 50 per cent since 1986.

In co-operation with the creation of 1.4 million new permanent jobs in Canada, a low inflation rate and high investment figures is the way that we must go to eliminate poverty in Canada. It cannot be done artificially. It cannot be done like the Liberals tried to do it, by printing or borrowing money. It must be done by sustained economic growth, by adherence to firm and reasonable fiscal policies that inspire confidence and growth. That is what is taking place and that is what we are going to do.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, in my hand I have two documents published by Amnesty International. One is dated September 1991. Both of these documents refer to human rights violations by way of torture in Mexico. The recent document in September of this year categorically states that the moves by the President of Mexico have been a failure and human rights violations by torture have continued to this date. This document gives chapter and verse September this year.

The Prime Minister said and I quote: "Nothing in international relations is more important than respect for individual freedoms and human rights". How does the Prime Minister avoid the accusation of hypocrisy in continuing to sit with Mexico while these—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. There are a lot of ways to use words that have been held to be unparliamentary and that was another way of doing it. I know that the hon. member would want to put his question without an accusation that is unparliamentary.

Mr. Barrett: All right, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister, will he convey to the President of Mexico his newfound standards of human rights behaviour and apply it to his sitting at the table with Mexico as he gives lectures to other countries in the world?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is going to have to make up his mind. His leader has just complimented the government for the position we have taken and my hon. friend seems to be in a disagreement with it.

Mr. Barrett: Why not apply it to Mexico.

Mr. Mulroney: Make up your mind. Do you support the government on this or don't you?

Mr. Barrett: Why are you being a hypocrite?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has put a question and the right hon. Prime Minister is answering it. I give the floor to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to ascertain who is really speaking for the NDP on this important matter. I have articulated a position on behalf of the Government of Canada that is one we think is appropriate and helpful.

I know my hon. friend has really got a bee in his bonnet about Mexico. He really does not like Mexico and he really does not like Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca will put his second question.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, does the statement made by the Prime Minister regarding human rights recently uttered by him at the Commonwealth apply to Canada's relationships with Mexico?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not have with Mexico the kinds of relationships to which my hon. friend referred on the declaration of—

An hon. member: A $700 million line of credit.

An hon. member: When were you against selling wheat to the Soviet Union?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I have already indicated that I have had conversations with the President of Mexico. There is general recognition that President Salinas is doing some pretty impressive things in regard both to modernizing his country and improving the human rights situation. I think he should be encouraged for that.

If we take my hon. friend at face value today on the floor of the House of Commons, the implication of what he has said means that we would terminate all our activity to sell wheat to the Soviet Union today, that we would terminate our billion dollar contract and lines of credit with China because of human rights violations there. In other words, Canada would cease to exist on a commercial basis.

Mr. Barrett: Why are you being a hypocrite?

Mr. Mulroney: The only hypocrite here, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Willowdale.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the Tory economic record of which the Prime Minister spoke so glowingly, last month Canada lost 24,000 jobs in its retail sector. At the same time as this happened cross-border shopping has sky-rocketed. It is up a staggering 58 per cent and many communities are being devastated.

• (1450)

Will the Minister of Finance at least admit what every Canadian shopper knows; that his high tax, high dollar policies are hurting Canada and are helping the United States.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am sure the hon. member would be happy to note that 65,000 new jobs were created last month which brought the unemployment rate down from 10.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent. I think that is really a step in the right direction.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, interest rates are going down, not going up. Interest rates are at the lowest level they have been in 13 years. The Gross Domestic Product is growing, it is not receding. The composite leading indexes are trending in the right direction. The merchandise trade is going up, not going down. The unemployment rate, as I said, is going down, not going up. Housing starts are up, not down.

With respect to the retail sales to which the hon. member referred, he is talking about August figures which were affected to a large extent by a drop of 6.1 per cent in motor vehicle sales. However, the September figures show there has been an increase in motor vehicle sales by 11.4 per cent so that is stale-dated information.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and particularly Canada's unemployed are not impressed with this government's economic record. All is not rosy. For example, Statistics Canada just reported that retail sales fell 1.3 per cent, the biggest drop this year.

The minister's high dollar, high tax policies are driving Canadian shoppers, Canadian jobs and Canadian hopes south of the border. Will this government act today to stop this self-inflicted haemorrhaging that is hurting Canada so badly?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated in answer to the hon. member's question that the retail sales figures for August were lower because of the decline in automobile sales of some 6.1 per cent. In September we have shown a very important increase of 11.4 per cent in motor vehicle sales so that the data which the hon. member is referring to is really stale-dated.

I should also draw to his attention the fact that the merchandise trade balance rose $8.1 billion at an annual rate to $13.5 billion in August. That would not signal to me that we are losing trade but that we are gaining trade.

In other words the trade figures are going in the right direction, just as the employment figures, just as the interest rate figures, just as the inflation figures. That is the key to sustainable development, sustainable growth at low interest rates and with price stability.

MONTREAL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for health. According to reports last Friday, the minister finally recognized that 600,000 people now live below the poverty line in Montreal and he said that new measures were urgently needed to halt the area's economic decline and to promote high-growth sectors.

Coincidentally, Mr. Speaker, these are the same words found in our opposition resolution of June 4.

Nevertheless, I want to ask the minister what specific new measures does he have in mind for Montreal? What in fact is he proposing for us in that city?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am sorry but I do not read opposition resolutions.

Second, what I said last week is that I am in touch with the government of Quebec to look at the possibility of having discussions about industrial development in Montreal, tourism, and of course, forestry for all provinces. We have always admitted that there were problems in Montreal and we continue to say that. We put forward, in collaboration with the minister responsible for Montreal, a program for southwest Montreal and east Montreal which worked very well. I think that people in Montreal know that we are trying to do what should be done.

However, I believe we need collaboration with the province of Quebec. It is what we do. We need leadership; it is what we are trying to give. We believe we are coping with the problem. It is a big problem. It is a 20-year old problem. Unfortunately, he should have looked at them when he was in power, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, according to officials in Montreal, there are now 15,000 homeless people living in the streets of that city, many of whom are untrained, unemployed young people. Is the minister prepared, in his discussions with Quebec, to develop not only an economic plan for Montreal but also a social plan to help those people?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, two things: First, we co-operate with the City of Montreal as we do with all the provinces, and in this instance, with the Province of Quebec, on the sharing of social services in Quebec. Second, I think that the best way to help those people, as the hon. member knows very well, is first and foremost to try to find jobs for them.

I think that the hon. member will agree with me, particularly as regards Canadair, where the number of jobs has risen from 4,500 to 8,200 since we privatized this company. That is still the best way to create job opportunities for Montrealers and to cope with the social problems to which my hon. colleague refers.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week the Nobel committee awarded the Nobel Peace Prize to the courageous Myanmar leader, Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi, who has been under house arrest for over two years at the hands of the brutal regime there.

Given the Prime Minister's stated commitment to human rights, I want to ask him to apply that in two concrete ways. First, will he take action to ensure that the Government of Canada, which is an 80 per cent shareholder in Petro-Canada International, stops all involvement in Myanmar. Second, will he ensure that the Minister of Agriculture, who will be visiting China later this week, will urge China in the strongest possible terms to stop its sales of arms to the repressive regime in Myanmar.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second point, that has already been attended to. In fact, prior to coming down, I made arrangements to speak with the Minister of Agriculture, who is in Japan en route to China, on precisely some of the matters raised by my hon. friend and a few other things.

With regard to Petro-Canada International, I would have to take a look at his suggestion. I think we have already wound that up. I may be wrong but I will check into that. My colleagues say that is correct, that it has already been wound up, and so we could not use that vehicle. It has already been done.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister indicated earlier during Question Period that cabinet has met on a number of occasions to consider human rights considerations in granting aid and financial assistance.

I wonder if the Prime Minister would now explain how he can defend the granting by his government of a $1 billion line of credit to Iran, a country which has revolutionary guards flogging with metal cables women who refuse to wear a veil and which, according to Amnesty International is responsible for very serious violations of human rights with torture, detentions and executions?

I want to ask the Prime Minister, will he now practice what he preaches to other Commonwealth leaders and ensure that this $1 billion line of credit to Iran is not proceeded with. Will he show genuine respect for human rights, for the people of Iran?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not trying in any way to be coy, but I ask my hon. friend to remember that the statement I made is in regard to the aid giving and granting capacity of Canada in regard to the international community. That is what it was limited to.

Canada has commercial relations, ongoing trade relations with many countries, even though we, from time to time, have serious disagreements with them about policies that they have at home. In 1989 there was the situation with China, by way of illustration. Do I take as a corollary of my hon. friend's suggestion that we terminate all financing of grain purchases by China from western Canada. Do we terminate it today, because we have very serious disagreements with human rights questions in the Soviet Union?

For example, in the Ukraine, prior to a few months ago, do we terminate commercial arrangements there?

Mr. Robinson: What about Iran?

• (1500)

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is now making a distinction between the Soviet Union, China and Iran. With regard to the case that was raised today by my hon. friend, I do not have to tell my hon. friend how offensive and repulsive and repugnant this kind of attitude or development is. The minister has already indicated that he is going to review this case very carefully in light of this. With regard to China, where we have had disagreements, with regard to the Soviet Union and other countries including Iran, we maintain commercial relations.

This is something we may want to review here in the House of Commons, but it remains a distinct and ongoing policy of the Government of Canada and has been for 50 years.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Recent German proposals to transform existing agricultural subsidies into direct income support for European farmers may pave the way for a breakthrough in the current Uruguay round negotiations, but they will raise serious questions about the future of Canada's supply management system under the GATT.

Does the government guarantee to preserve Canada's supply management system, whatever the pressures in the Uruguay round, to change existing practices?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the position the Germans seem to be taking with respect to de-coupling agriculture support from production would lead to the conclusion that the hon. member has suggested.

The position of Canada has been very clear. It has been a position that has been developed in very close consultation with the agricultural community and with provincial governments. That has been stated over and over again, and restated by the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of State for Agriculture, and Canada's position with respect to our over-all position at the GATT negotiations remains the same. That is specifically referring to article XI. We are advocating not only the clarification but the strengthening of article XI and we have a fair amount of support within the GATT community to support that position.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, the massive grain subsidies in Europe and in the United States have seriously eroded the income of Canadian grain farmers. Does the government believe that it can win reductions in such grain subsidies and at the same time withstand European and American pressures to change Canada's supply management practices? Is that what the minister is saying?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the European community chooses to de-couple its agricultural support from that of production, and in other words provide income assistance rather than tying the subsidies and the incentives to production, then we will be on a pretty equal playing field. That is precisely what we have been attempting to do through the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account. These programs are not directly coupled to production, but they provide a measure of income assistance to the agricultural community. I might say that there is $1.5 billion that is going to be flowing to the agricultural community between now and Christmas, and another $1.1 billion after Christmas, in addition to the $800 million that was announced just the other day. That works out to about $40 an acre net in the hands of the agricultural community. I think that is pretty generous. I also think that it is done in a way that would—

RAIL BARRIERS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Again, I am asking for rail barriers at the rail crossing at Stewiacke, Nova Scotia. This crossing has resulted in 13 deaths and injuries over the years. For decades people have been demanding the barriers. The barrier gates were recommended by the Canadian Transport Commission 15 years ago. They still are not there.

In September the minister indicated he might have a favourable answer shortly. Does he have that favourable answer?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I congratulate the member for his concern about this important problem. I want to assure him that I, too, am very concerned. I am awaiting from my officials the report that I mentioned to him earlier. As soon as I have it, I will be in contact with the member.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He would be aware that his fisheries aid package is getting some pretty rough reviews, particularly from the many people in Lawn and Melrose in Newfoundland and Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, who do not meet the terms and condition of the package.

The minister has also said publicly that the amounts may not be adequate. I wonder if the minister would now undertake to end the misery for those thousands of people, make some adequate funding available for the program, and redraft the program so that it can be available in time rather than in five to eight weeks from now for the people it is suppose to help. Would he redraft it and make it available now so that it can end some of that misery for them?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this is a $39 million program which together with the $18 million ice compensation program is the largest amount of money ever put into a catch failure or emergency situation in Atlantic Canada.

There are not thousands of people who cannot get on job creation programs. They are about to start. I checked with my colleague's department before coming into the House. Money is being transferred to the Newfoundland offices so the program can begin immediately. Liberal MPs can stop their rumour mongering and suggesting that there is no money there. They do a disservice to those people who are anxious about this.

It has been suggested in the House and on the radio that there is not sufficient money. I am advising the House now that money is being transferred down. There is more than adequate money.

With respect to whether or not a person qualifies, the rules are generous and anyone who can show a reasonable connection to the fishery or to being a plant worker is going to be assisted, or my name is not John Carnell Crosbie.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Petru Marculescu, Romanian Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which relates to comments made by the Minister of Health during Question Period. The minister may not read opposition motions, but he doesn't have to brag about it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, but that is not a question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMENTS

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on two points. The first one is that I wish to withdraw the accusation I made about the Prime Minister, and I hope the House accepts my apology.

THE LATE REVEREND SANDY NICHOLSON

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on some sad news about the death of a former member of this House, a pioneer of the CCF Party, the Reverend Sandy Nicholson.

Reverend Nicholson served in this House for four terms. He was a Christian Socialist. He was United Church minister who left the pulpit in furthering his view of the cause of social justice.

Reverend Nicholson was the founder of one of the first co-op farming institutions in Saskatchewan. Along with an early Jewish community in Saskatchewan known as Eden Bridge, Reverend Nicholson started a parallel co-op farming institution in that province.

Reverend Nicholson was incredibly noted for his sense of humour, his tremendous capacity for kindness and being a tough bulldog of a fighter, but most of all he is best remembered for the fact that he as the minister of health in the province of Saskatchewan introduced the first socialized medical care plan in North America, against the struggle of political opposition from all the other political parties.

Today all those parties now support this socialist program. If not, you can rip up your medicare cards. Nonetheless, I want to say that his passing after 91 full years of life is a day with a touch of sadness but also with a touch of joy as he was truly a Canadian hero.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we in this party wish to associate ourselves with the words already said about the late Sandy Nicholson.

For most of the 1940s and the 1950s Sandy Nicholson was a distinguished member of this House and a respected voice on behalf of the less fortunate in our society. Even after serving four terms in the House of Commons, Sandy Nicholson had yet to make his most notable contribution to Canadian public life and to the Canadian public policy process.

In 1960 he entered the Saskatchewan cabinet and sponsored the legislation that brought into being Canada's first medicare plan. In less than 10 years after this beginning medicare has become a national institution. What a crowning touch for a political career. Sandy Nicholson lived a long and very productive life.

We on this side of the House extend our condolences to his children, his grandchildren and his great-grandchildren.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of members of the government side of the House I am pleased to rise as well to pay tribute to Reverend Sandy Nicholson.

Sandy Nicholson ran in this Parliament and existed as a member of this House, as has already been said, roughly from the year 1940 through to 1957. He was successful in some four elections to the House of Commons and, as has already been mentioned, has made a tremendous contribution to the life of Canadians.

He was particularly noted for his concern for people who suffered poverty and for his active work not only in his province of Saskatchewan, but throughout the country as well.

I understand that he is survived by three children, nine grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. On behalf of members of Parliament on all sides of this House, we express to them our sorrow. Our thanks to them for having shared him with the Canadian public and the Canadian people.

Also we would like to say that he has had a tremendous impact on the country. He has had a tremendous influence on what has happened in this nation. I am sure that his friends like Stanley Knowles, who was very active in participating with Mr. Nicholson, can say with all of us that he will be missed. We are thankful for his contribution and we express to his family our sincere sympathies on his passing.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia who are concerned about the support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

They urge the Government of Canada to maintain full funding to enable them to fulfil their mandate adequately.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another unrelated matter, Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present a petition on behalf of residents from Little Fort, McClure, Kamloops, Clearwater, Barriere and Darfield, British Columbia.

They are concerned about a proposal to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount in an effort to divert water into the San Diego, California area. This plan is presently with a company on the Vancouver stock exchange.

They are asking that the Government of Canada state categorically that it will not permit freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States and state simply that Canadian rivers are not for sale.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present to the House a petition from the First Nations of Canada on the issues of aboriginal languages, linguistic equality and the justice they hope to achieve.

First, the petitioners ask for the recognition of the 53 distinct, living and vital aboriginal languages, representing 11 linguistic families.

Furthermore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of the First Nations and aboriginal peoples in Canada by taking immediate steps to recognize the right to use, preserve and enhance aboriginal languages in the Constitution of Canada.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Joutel, Vassan, Val-d'Or and Amos, concerning preventive withdrawal. Your petitioners request that perventive withdrawal for pregnant women be made a desirable and necesary option for women in the workplace. Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider, during the review of the Canada Labour Code, the deficiencies of this legislation and recognize the need to include clauses on the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have another petition which concerns firearms. Your petitioners are from Cap-aux-Meules and the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, and they respectfully submit that access to firearms is a critical factor in cases of homicide, accidents and suicide. Many types of weapons readily available in Canada are not needed for legitimate purposes such as hunting and competitive shooting, and your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation that would prohibit possession of firearms by any person with a criminal record.

[English]

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present two petitions today: one of 119 signatures and one of 145 signatures.

They relate to the present government's policy on wage freezes in the Public Service. Again the petitioners humbly pray that this House will ask the Conservative federal government not to take away the collective bargaining rights of workers across Canada, threaten them with job losses and contracting out, interfere with conciliation and arbitration and legislate employees back to work as it has been doing on numerous occasions.

The petitioners also humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

DIVORCE ACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition to this House on behalf of several Albertans that has been certified correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The family is the cornerstone of our society. The responsibility toward family members extends beyond one generation. My grandparents contributed much to my development. My life and many others were enriched by the relationship with our grandparents and yet not all children have that opportunity. At present there is no provision in the Divorce Act or in any other federal legislation to provide a right for grandparents to have access to their grandchildren.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Divorce Act of Canada to include the following provision: that in no case may the father or mother, without serious cause, place obstacles to personal relations between a child and his grandparents.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, many Canadians are concerned about the growing crime in Canada and feel in danger. Canada has always been a peaceful country but there has been an increase in crime.

I have a petition from residents of Kamloops and other parts of British Columbia, and residents of my own riding in Port Moody—Coquitlam in which they pray that the government considers giving proper funding to the RCMP, a Canadian institution, so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia, and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity and a strong force to prevent this growing crime in Canada.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order under petitions. As you are aware, the government is required to respond to petitions that are tabled in this House.

I have before me a response dated September 16, 1991, petition No. 3430255, regarding petitions relating to the back-on-track campaign for Via Rail.

The answer that the government continues to give this House is the answer prepared three years ago for a different kind of petition related to Via Rail, calling on the government not to decimate it.

I would ask the Chair to review the appropriateness of government recycling answers that really do not relate to the petitions being tabled in this House.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member drawing this to my attention and I can assure him that we will check into the information he has laid before the House and do everything possible to make sure that his constituents and others receive a proper response to their petitions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 6 and 120.

[Text]

SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON TRANSLATION IN CANADA

Question No. 6—Mr. Bellemare:

1. With respect to the Summit Conference on Translation in Canada which was cancelled on March 8, 1991, (a) how much money was spent prior to its cancellation (b) what was the cost of cancelling the conference (c) are there any financial credits being held should this conference be reconvened later in 1991 and, if so, in each case, under which accounts will it be funded?

2. Was there an outside source of funding for this conference, and if so, what was the share for (i) government (ii) outside source?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada):

1. a) $106,844.83*

b) $25,370.33

c) No financial credits are being held in 1991–1992.

2. No. The only other credits were to come from registration fees.

* This amount includes all the material related to the themes of the Summit Conference. This product can be used in connection with activities similar to the round tables which had been planned for the Summit Conference—for example, at the next symposium of the Canadian Association of Schools of Translators and at the conferences of the professional translation associations.

 This amount includes the cancellation fees for blocks of hotel rooms, cancellation of the management contract for the exhibitors' hall and the cancellation fees for the rooms in the conference Centre.

Question No. 120—Mr. Dionne:

Has the Minister of Supply and Services made renovations or improvements to his House of Commons office and, if so, in each case (a) who received the contract (b) what was the nature of the contract (c) what was the total cost?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services has not made any renovations or improvements to the Minister's office at the House of Commons.

This answer is consistent with the reply to Order Paper Question No. 469 answered on March 27, 1991.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Jake Epp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, this bill contains the legislative amendments to implement the increases in the excise tax and duties on tobacco products and the taxation of inventories of these products that were announced in the February 26, 1991, budget.

These tax measures will reinforce the government's national strategy to reduce tobacco use, a comprehensive plan designed to encourage smokers to quit and discourage other Canadians, particularly young people, from taking up smoking.

This national plan includes a wide range of initiatives in such areas as the placing of bans or restrictions on smoking in work places and common carriers under federal jurisdiction, the introduction of prominent health warnings on tobacco product packages, and health promotion and community support activities.

As part of the comprehensive strategy, we have also implemented programs to assist tobacco growers who wish to diversify or leave the industry altogether. These programs have played an important role in the orderly downsizing of the tobacco industry.

I might add, as a former smoker who decided to quit when cigarettes became $1 a pack back in 1979, which relatively speaking is not long ago, I can attest to the cost of the product in forcing one to quit smoking. This has a great deal to do with that.

Madam Speaker, this strategy has proved itself most effective in inducing Canadians to cut down on their smoking. Since 1986, sales in Canada of cigarettes and fine-cut tobacco have dropped by more than 20 percent. It is expected that use of tobacco products will drop again this year and next year, as a result of the tax increases under this bill.

[English]

The increases in the taxes on tobacco products include a 3 cent per cigarette or $6 per carton increase in the excise tax on cigarettes and a proportional increase in the excise levies on other tobacco products. As well, tobacco sticks will now be taxed on a per unit basis and the excise tax and duties set to equalize those in fine cut tobacco for roll-your-own cigarettes. These changes all were effective on February 27, 1991.

The bill also ensures that the tobacco tax increases are applied in a consistent manner at different trade levels by applying the excise tax increases proposed in the budget to the tobacco inventories held by wholesalers and retailers at the time the new rate takes effect. However, to simplify compliance for small and medium-sized retailers, the tax on tobacco inventories did not apply to the first 1,000 cartons on hand in the retail outlets at the beginning of February 27, 1991.

Together the changes in the taxation of tobacco will raise an estimated $1.4 billion in the 1992-92 fiscal year, declining to $980 million by the 1994-95 fiscal year. These additional revenues will make an important contribution toward restoring fiscal stability in this country.

I might point out that it is an area in which we are projecting declining revenues over the next few years because we expect that it will have a very great effect on tobacco use in this country, especially with young people. It is estimated, not by the government but by those in the health care field that this tax will prevent an additional 100,000 young people from starting to smoke. Personally, I hope the figure is much higher, that it prevents all young people from starting to smoke.

It was a mistake that I made as a youth and one that I know had I not quit would have damaged my health because that had already started. They say there is nothing worse than a reformed anything because once reformed they love to preach. This is one already in which, although I try not to be obnoxious in my preaching, I do advise all young people never to start and those who have started to try and quit. I know how tough it is to quit because I have gone through that.

My colleague from Winnipeg North has suggested that by way of amendments we earmark where the revenue goes, how we channel the revenue. Those amendments were ruled out of order, and rightfully so. Some of the initiatives were assistance to tobacco producers, health promotion and education, as well as care for people with smoking-related illnesses.

The government has already implemented a successful strategy. I say successful because we know that tobacco consumption has dropped rather dramatically in the last few years.

Furthermore, while the government has earmarked taxes such as the goods and services tax, which by legislation will go to service the debt and eventually start paying back the debt, it is just in exceptional circumstances that we do that because the earmarking of tax revenues constrains the government's flexibility in responding to changing needs. Particularly over time, earmarking can easily result in the over or underfunding of the selected areas and, of course, we would not want to see that.

As well, a number of amendments were proposed that would have effectively rolled back the substantial tax increases contained in the bill. While the House did not adopt any of these motions, hon. members may rest assured that I have noted all their comments and will take them into account when we are considering further tax changes.

In conclusion, this is an important bill. It will raise substantial revenues which will serve to reinforce the government's plan for economic recovery, a plan designed to help achieve a strong and prosperous Canada, and it is also a key element to the government's strategy to reduce the consumption of tobacco in Canada and protect Canadians, particularly young Canadians, from the very serious health hazards of smoking.

I encourage members of the House to give swift passage to this bill so that it may become law and we can get on with some other matters that are facing the House today.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak again on Bill C-10, an act to amend the excise tax.

When I spoke on this bill about four months ago during second reading, I indicated the importance of this bill. It is a bill to protect the health of Canadians, of smokers that they may quit smoking, and of those who have yet to learn to smoke not to start the habit.

Since four months ago when I spoke on second reading of this bill an estimated 12,800 Canadians have died from causes related to smoking. They have died from lung cancer, obstructive lung diseases, heart diseases and, shamefully, some of the victims were infants born too weak to survive.

The newborns perished because of the tobacco chemicals that crept from the body of the mother into the body of the child while still in the mother's womb.

I am sure all Canadians, as I am, are sickened by this waste of human life. If taxes will stop some of the harm, some of the travesty of human life, then I believe in the taxes being increased on tobacco and I therefore support this bill.

But taxes without amendments specifically tailored for health and the general well-being of Canadians naturally give me some concern. I feel they represent a callousness and insincerity on the part of this government. It will not go one step further and assure Canadians that this bill is truly a bill to help stop smoking and prevent the non-smokers from starting the habit.

Hence, I see that this bill only constitutes a partial solution, a partial component, to the over-all strategy. But I support it as well because I still believe that we can persuade the government, perhaps through some other mechanisms such as writing to ministers, to earmark more funds for health.

The minister in his presentation of the bill indicated that he was against earmarking. If I may quote him, he says: "The earmarking of tax revenues constrains the government's flexibility to respond to changing needs", and that over time earmarking can easily result in the over and underfunding of selected areas.

• (1600)

That is not a valid argument to not support earmarking. In the document produced by the Canadian Tax Foundation Charging for Public Services; A New Look At an Old Idea, there is a beautiful paragraph about earmarking. I would mention the strong argument, the two principal arguments, why we can earmark funds such as this revenue for specific programs.

The first argument that has been proposed in favour of earmarking funds, and I quote: "it provides a means in certain circumstances of implementing the benefit principle, which in turn is appealing on both equity, and especially efficiency, grounds".

I ask this government, why does it refuse to sustain the benefit principle? Why will it decline to earmark funds when it is known that by earmarking funds we can increase the efficiency of the delivery of programs and the expenditure of these revenues for targeted programs?

The second argument concerns why earmarking funds is essential and important, and I quote: "It may induce the public to support new or increased taxes on which they otherwise could not agree by linking the taxes with an expansion of some government activity which they desire".

In a real sense then, if we earmark funds we are trying to say we provide that needed link between tax revenues and government expenditures on programs. On that basis I think the argument of the government that it would not like to earmark the funds is not tenable. Canadians will see that.

One more thing, Madam Speaker. When I spoke on this bill four months ago, we realized the many benefits that would accrue when we passed this bill, despite the limitation, despite the absence of earmarking that I indicated. In fact, I believe that effective tobacco taxation is a progressive health policy for a variety of reasons. As has been indicated already, for every 10 per cent increase in price, consumption will drop by 4 per cent, particularly among price-sensitive young people where the impact of a price increase on their consumption of tobacco is even more pronounced. Hence, we can expect a drop in consumption among children and teenagers of some 14 per cent for every 10 per cent increase in price.

We have heard already, and I will not belabour the point, of the many deaths that have happened from smoking. I would like the House and all colleagues to support this bill.

I would also like to seize this opportunity to put on the record the many associations that support this bill so that Canadians may know them: The Canadian Association of Hospital Auxiliaries, the Canadian Association of Occupational Therapists, the Canadian Association of Pathologists, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Chiropractic Association, the Canadian Council of Cardiovascular Nurses, the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, the Canadian Dental Association, the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation, the Canadian Hospital Association, the Canadian Lung Association, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Nurses Association, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Canadian Physiotherapy Association, the Canadian Public Health Association, the Canadian Society of Respiratory Therapists, the Canadian Teachers Federation, the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, the Non-Smokers' Rights Association, Physicians for a Smoke-Free Canada, the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, The Canadian Association of Optometrists, the College of Family Physicians of Canada and The United Church of Canada.

These are among the many supporters of increased taxation on cigarettes so that we can stop smoking in this country.

I may note that there are only two or three organizations that are opposed to this bill. One is the Tobacco Manufacturer's Council and the other one is an organization that is supported by the Tobacco Manufacturer's Council.

You can see that the vast, vast majority of Canadians support this bill.

I would also like to put on the record a letter from the chairman of the Health and Public Policy Committee of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, Dr. David Sackett, dated July 16 of this year, to all the ministers of health in all the provinces and territories.

> Canada has begun to make progress in decreasing the toll of disability and untimely death from cigarette smoking. The tobacco companies are engaging in a campaign to discredit this progress through the smoking packet write-in campaign. We are writing to you to indicate the need for more, not less vigour in the effort to reduce the death and disability toll from cigarette smoking. We therefore call upon you to ignore the efforts of the cigarette companies who benefit from this toll of human suffering, and to continue to support increasing efforts toward the discouragement of cigarette smoking in Canada.

My only regret this afternoon as I debate this bill is that the three amendments that I proposed and I thought would be given an opportunity for debate were ruled out of order on procedural grounds but not on the merit of my proposals.

For the benefit of those who have not seen my amendments, let me read again the thrust of my amendments. My first amendment would allow for the earmarking of funds for the prevention or treatment of illnesses related to tobacco use.

Why would the government refuse to give consent to such an amendment to be debated?

The second amendment is to earmark funds to inform the general public of the risk for human health involved in tobacco use. Again, why did we not give consent to this so that it can be fully debated in the House and thereby test the will of Parliament?

My last amendment would have been to earmark funds to help people who wish to overcome their tobacco addiction.

Smoking truly is very addictive. An addiction to tobacco is one of the strongest known, comparable only to the death grip of heroin and alcohol. I would have wished that we could have earmarked funds for cessation programs for smokers. I believe with $1.4 billion being received alone through this tax that there is no excuse not to help the people suffering the tax burden the most, the smokers.

I would like the government to help them quit instead of only milking their addiction for revenues.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that I hope all members of the House would support this bill, notwithstanding its limitations, and I further hope that the government, although we were unable to debate the amendments, would take the substance of those amendments into consideration and institute health programs to address those very issues and concerns that I hope the government equally believes are important. I hope it would support them with added funds, including the preservation of our health care system.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I rise today on a question of privilege. Last Thursday I received a copy of a letter from Mr. Maurice Ruel, director general of the oil and gas branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to Mr. Daniel Dubeau, vice-president, Environment, Hydro Quebec.

This is quoting from the English translation. I only received this today which explains why I am rising today. I had received the original text on Thursday but had to wait for the translation before I could fully understand the import of this statement.

In the letter, he states:

> I would suggest that Hydro-Québec acknowledge receipt of Mr Knowles' letter—

Mr. Knowles is the clerk of the Standing Committee of Energy, Mines and Resources:

> I would suggest that Hydro-Québec acknowledge receipt of Mr. Knowles' letter, telling him that you support in principle the presentation made by the Canadian Electrical Association to this committee in "Environmental Challenges Facing the Electric Utility Industry" and therefore you do not see the need for Hydro-Québec to take part in its hearings.

I consider it to be a completely unacceptable and unwarranted interference in the proceedings of Parliament for an official in the department to be instructing a witness not to attend and to take part in our hearings.

In this regard, I would appreciate it very much if the Chair would recognize that this is a prima facie case for the existence of a question of privilege and that it therefore accepts my motion that the matter be placed before the appropriate committee of the House, the House management committee.

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, as vice-chairman of the same committee that the member who raises the question of privilege belongs to, I would add a few words on the same subject, if you allow me.

In the same letter that he just referred to, Mr. Ruel wrote in French: "I would suggest that Hydro-Québec acknowledge receipt of Mr. Knowles' letter, telling him that you support in principle the presentation made by the Canadian Electrical Association to this committee in 'Environmental Challenges Facing the Electric Utility Industry' and therefore you do not see the need for Hydro-Québec to take part in its hearings."

As my friend just told you, Madam Speaker, officials at the Department of Energy, like all public servants, work for all the people of Canada and for members of Parliament, in that we work together, and I say that as a former federal civil servant. The minister is now in the House and perhaps he agrees with my colleague and me on this point and he may also wish to say something on this subject. I find it hard to understand how a deputy minister or a director general of a federal department can in fact write such a letter telling Hydro-Québec to ignore our committee's hearings. In short, I wish to support the motion moved by my chairman. I hope that we can at least obtain a decision on this question which I think is quite important.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I too want to associate myself with the points being made by my hon. colleague.

It is a most serious matter. He has succinctly stated the case in the spirit of parliamentary reform in making the committees of the House of Commons effective in terms of doing a thorough analysis of issues and submitting reports and recommendations. I think the point raised by my hon. friend is most important. I want to lend my enthusiastic support to the points that he has made and encourage the Chair to look favourably upon this request.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to the chairman of the standing committee as well as the two members of the parties opposite. I cannot address my comments to the larger issue which I think the House leader of the NDP referred to, namely what will be or what might be the role under parliamentary reform of federal public servants in terms of information that they can give, not necessarily to standing committees, and also advice that they might be seeking or advice they might want to give in terms of other jurisdictions.

For instance, there has been a case just recently of a Canadian official being asked to give evidence in the United States on quite another matter. This is a debate which is appropriate for the House and for House Leaders, so I cannot address that.

What I can address is specifically what the chairman of the standing committee and the two members specifically referred to. This morning officials in my department brought to my attention the letter that had been sent by an official in my department, namely the director general, to Mr. Daniel Dubeau of Hydro Quebec who had received, or Hydro Quebec received, a request to appear before the standing committee. That is the work of the standing committee. It is an independent parliamentary standing committee of which a minister cannot nor should have the ability to direct who appears before it and so I do not do that.

I have checked with the department. It is not a letter that I either had authorized or was aware of, but I fully understand parliamentary responsibility and cabinet responsibility. I take the responsibility of the work within my department.

I apologize not only to the chairman of the committee but also other committee members. This is not the manner in which we should proceed. There has been another letter trying to correct which in my mind was a mistake. In fact, Madam Speaker, I know the two members have read from the letters but cannot table them. If it helps the House for me to table those letters, I would be willing to do so. Hopefully this issue can be corrected in that way.

The larger issue of what is the role of officials both federal and others relating to parliamentary standing committees I think has to be taken up by appropriate members of the House who have responsibilities for their parties in respect to House business.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I deeply appreciate the comments made by the minister. If there is unanimous consent, could we have all those letters on the Table right now?

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has offered to table the letters. I am sure that there would be consent and it would be appreciated.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, just to clarify for the House, I am willing to table all letters that are in my possession. We have gone into the files. The letters that I am tabling, including questions and answers that came from the committee as well, are all in this file. I hope that that file is complete. To my knowledge this afternoon, it is complete.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank the hon. minister for his comments. I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast and the hon. member for Kamloops said in the House.

I can certainly understand the reaction of the hon. chairman of the Standing Committee to the incident that he related to us. In any case, it is a matter that should have been brought up before the committee in the first place, before being brought up in the House. It could aslo have been brought to the attention of the House in a committee report. Since the hon. minister was with us and apologized on his behalf and on behalf of his department and the official involved, I think that, for now, the matter is resolved. I want to thank all those who took part.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Gatineau—La Liévre, Agriculture; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Trade; the hon. member for York West, de Havilland; the hon. member for London East, Housing; the hon. member for Davenport, Illicit Drugs.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to say that I am happy to have an opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-10, a bill that essentially sees an increase in taxes on tobacco products.

I want to begin by first of all saying that I very seldom find myself agreeing with initiatives that the government has taken over the last little while, but this is one where I find myself in complete agreement. It is appropriate that we use fiscal policy in an effort to introduce a comprehensive strategy to reduce the use of tobacco.

I want to begin my comments by simply stating that tobacco, as far as I am aware, is the only legal consumer product that actually kills people when used exactly as it is intended to be used. In other words, if you smoke, there is a very good chance that you will end your life prematurely. You will have an influence on ending the lives of other people prematurely as well as a result of the second hand use of tobacco. As a matter of fact, I think the statistics would indicate that in an average year, 35,000 deaths occur in Canada directly related to the use of tobacco, to say nothing of all of those folks who find themselves spending time in cancer clinics, in cardiac wards, suffering from emphysema and other related illnesses.

Again, I think the statistics of second hand smoke indicate very clearly that smoking is something that we ought to encourage people to eliminate and certainly to reduce.

However, before getting into the subject matter itself, I want to simply say that we ought not to lose sight of the fact that 1,200 growers are involved in the tobacco industry as farmers. While we are taking steps here in Parliament in a variety of ways to encourage people not to consume tobacco, the reality is that it is a legal product and there are 1,200 families involved in its production, to say nothing of another few thousand involved in the production and sales of tobacco who depend on the industry for their livelihood. There is not one in this House of Commons who would not support increased activity, increased financial support to encourage those growers to get out of the tobacco growing business and into something else that would be more acceptable to Canadian society generally.

We have made positive steps in this direction over the last number of years, but we have a lot to go.

It is interesting when you look at the price of a package of cigarettes today, and they cost about $5 or $6, depending on where you buy them, and yet the actual farmer only receives about 7 cents of that. It can be seen in terms of the amount of money consumed in taxes and in other costs throughout the system in terms of production and marketing of tobacco, 7 cents going to the farmer means that there is certainly a great deal being generated to society to say nothing of taxes.

The minister earlier indicated an interesting trend, that the government is actually projecting a decline in revenue over the next number of years as a result of this initiative. A lot of people are of the opinion that we simply keep jacking up the taxes on the price of tobacco to gain additional revenue. Well, to a point that does work.

I think we have reached the point now where the taxes and costs are so high that it is actually having an effect on the number of people smoking or beginning to smoke, so that the use is falling off and consequently the long-term revenue to government will actually decline. I think that in terms of a financial viewpoint it is probably bad news but over all we have to welcome the trend that fewer and fewer people are involved with smoking tobacco.

I might say in my constituency a lot of people chew tobacco. I tried it once, got sick and did not try it any more. Baseball players and cowboys it seems still find that to be an interesting way to consume tobacco.

I want to point out some very encouraging statistics. Let us also acknowledge the fact that Canada is a world leader in tobacco control. This Parliament has passed the Tobacco Products Control Act and the Non-smokers' Health Act which have had significant impact in seeing Canadians set aside their packs of cigarettes or their pipes or cigars or chewing tobacco and move away from that habit. In the three year period between 1989 and 1991 tobacco consumption in Canada dropped over 20 per cent. What is encouraging is the drop with young people.

Statistically we know that there is a very clear relationship between the price of a commodity and the demand for the commodity. It is fair to say that statistics and studies have proven that for every 10 per cent increase in price of tobacco, consumption will drop by 14 per cent. It is even more when you consider young people because they are very price sensitive. They are not as addicted, if you like, as older folks and they have less disposable income. For every 10 per cent increase in price of consumption by young people—I mean by that children and teens—the consumption does not drop 4 per cent, it actually drops 14 per cent.

We can see that this most recent round of price increases on a package of cigarettes will be encouraging younger people not to smoke even more.

We know that the tax increase of 3 cents per cigarette introduced in the 1991 federal budget means that cigarette prices increased by approximately 18 per cent at the retail level.

Let me just as an aside say something about the retail level. As a result of a recent study that was completed in my constituency of Kamloops and I suspect duplicated in other areas, I am just not aware of the various studies, people were puzzled by the seemingly ease with which young people, and I mean very young people, could purchase cigarettes.

It is illegal to sell cigarettes to someone under the age of 16. However, when you look at the act that was passed, which must have been 100 years ago, it said that if you are caught as a retailer selling cigarettes to children, you will be fined, get this, $10. Hardly a punitive sum. If you are caught twice, you get fined $25. The third time is really heavy, you get a $100 fine. Obviously what this means is that people will just ignore this and sell to children. Some retailers do not. They recognize the law for what it is, for a good reason and refuse to sell.

A study was done in Kamloops. One of the local organizations concerned about the increased amount of smoking by young people, particularly young girls, sent children to the various stores, 14, 12, 11 and 10 year olds, and found that it really did not matter if you were 10, 12 or 14, a retailer sold you cigarettes. I think we all appreciate that if someone 10 years old comes in asking for a package of Rothman's, they are obviously not 16 and the retailer ought not to be selling it to them.

I have introduced a Private Members' Bill for those thoughtless retailers who sell cigarettes to children. If they are caught, the first offence would be a fine not exceeding $1,000; the second offence, $2,000; and the third offence, $5,000. Hopefully this will encourage people to simply obey the law if you are selling cigarettes to people, and particularly young people.

It is interesting that the price increase of the 1990–91 federal budget will result in a decline in consumption of between 7 per cent and 11 per cent or, in other words, 450,000 to 700,000 fewer smokers. According to the World Health Organization, between one-quarter and one-third of all smokers will die from their tobacco use. Therefore, we can extrapolate that 112,000 to 230,000 fewer tobacco caused deaths will occur as a result of these tax increases in the 1990–91 federal budget.

That is encouraging. No other single tobacco control measure could mean so many lives saved. It is estimated that consumption among young people will drop a dramatic 25 per cent as a result of this increase. The greatest success to be achieved by any tobacco control program is to prevent people from becoming addicted in the first place. This one measure is expected to stop at least 30,000 young people under the age of 19 from joining the tobacco market and many thousands more will quit smoking on top of that. In total, the assumption is that the budget increase in tobacco taxes will result in approximately 100,000 fewer teenage smokers.

That is great news. Any step that will result in 100,000 teenagers not starting to smoke has to be a welcomed initiative. I was pleased to see in the voting earlier today on this matter that it had the overwhelming support of the members of the House.

I want to refer to one rather disturbing fact that has become known in the last little while and that is the fact that the tobacco marketers are aiming at young women as a target market. It has worked because if you look to see where the increase in smoking is occurring, it is among young women. I would like to think that we will take steps as a Parliament to encourage all people, particularly young people and young women, to reconsider what they are doing, acknowledging the fact that tobacco will kill you or result certainly in a premature death.

I want to say that my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North had an interesting suggestion in his amendments. He tries to suggest that some of these increased tax revenues should go toward an educational program and to treating smokers and encouraging those who are considering smoking not to.

I noticed that the government when it collected the GST targeted some excess revenue there toward deficit reduction which in a sense is a bogus plan but, in that same kind of thinking, not the bogus part but the serious part, we should be suggesting that some of these additional revenues should go into a massive campaign to encourage young people not to smoke and not to begin smoking, which will likely result in some form of addiction.

I must say that I find it troubling to attend sporting events and often find that they are endorsed by cigarette manufacturers. Encouraging young athletes and so on to get involved in sporting activities and having to resort to the tobacco companies endorsing those athletic or sporting activities is a little odd in logic and is something that we need to consider in the future.

I want to simply add to my comments by suggesting that when people say "look at the price of tobacco products", if we actually look what happened in our country between 1950 and 1980 and just adjusting for inflation, we find that the real price of tobacco actually fell and that tobacco is actually cheaper to obtain in terms of a typical wage earner in the country now than it was years ago in spite of what appears to be an incredibly high cost for a package of tobacco. In terms of what these additional taxes have done, they have not even kept up to the rate of inflation.

In closing, I simply want to say that the fact that so much cross-border shopping is resulting now in illegal cigarettes from the United States coming to Canada is a reflection that the United States really has not appreciated this problem as we have in Canada. In the United States taxes on cigarettes account for about 27 per cent of the retail price.

In Canada it is closer to 67 per cent of the retail price. What we are saying is that while we have passed legislation in this Parliament to preclude smoking in federal precincts and taken steps to encourage people not to smoke, the United States has not done the same.

It is a sad fact that people find themselves going across the border to pick up cheaper priced cigarettes. It is inferior tobacco, as we all know, and inferior cigarettes. It does indicate the challenge that is before us.

In closing, I want to say that we support this legislation. We support the fact that it has proven successful in terms of increased taxing and taxes on cigarettes have resulted in a decline in use. However, let us also acknowledge that as the industry winds down, and hopefully will continue to wind down and save a lot of peoples' lives in the process, we simply cannot ignore the tobacco producers.

While we change our laws and our positioning on this particular commodity, they are in a sense the innocent bystanders. We have to acknowledge that fact and introduce clear programs that will help them in their transition to other forms of agriculture or other economic activities.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of my colleague from Kamloops on this very important issue.

There are four points that I would like to make as observations, and I am wondering if he might comment on them.

The first is that the government is taking something in the order of $60 million out of this. I got my figure confused, but it is a large amount of money. It is only part of the solution to this. There needs to be additional action taken by the government.

It has been said that in the reform of health care, probably the most critical thing that has to be done in this place and the provincial legislatures across Canada is to address driving, smoking and alcohol in the reform of the health care system because of the lifestyle problems that are created in health care. This is one of the critical ones.

The House of Commons, through the office of the Speaker, could provide a very effective model across this country. I know the House provides opportunities for staff and members to participate in quit-smoking programs, but there is no rigorous attempt to sell that program. There is no attempt to assess the size of the problem, to follow up and to catch those who fall off after the initial investment is made.

The Government of Canada pays for it, but it does not do it effectively. It could be very effective. I do not think I have ever met a smoker who does not want to quit smoking.

The second thing is the government has put forward a proposal to end the partisanship nature of the House of Commons, and I could not think of a better issue than this one. I think my colleague will agree.

I have talked to many members on the government side, in the Liberal caucus and in our own caucus who want to see something positive and constructive done to bring this issue forward and to reduce smoking.

I would think that this is the kind of a situation that the committee could continue on. There needs to be a ban, as my colleague has said, on export and import of this product.

It could quickly cut down a great amount of infringement of the intent of the law if that were to happen, both exporting the product to Third World countries and allowing the imported product to beat the prohibitive nature of the cost here.

The last thing is the conversion cost for farmers and the production and distribution cycle. Those people are the innocent victims of it. The money taken in by that tax, and I know the government is reluctant to do this, should be specifically targeted into the smoking area. It should provide assistance so farmers can convert to other products and so manufacturers can orderly scale down operations and exit the business and so that workers can be relocated and retrained.

The four points are, in summary, as follows: The House of Commons should be a model of an organization that really attacks the problem of smoking by helping people to get off it, following it up and for those who want out, help them out.

As for the constitutional move to make this place non-partisan, we all agree on what should be done and I think we should move forward as a group to end this as much as we can. Export and import, get on with targeting the conversion costs.

Mr. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to those very thoughtful interventions by my hon. colleague.

While the House of Commons has taken a number of steps to encourage members and people that are employed on Parliament Hill not to smoke, with I think relative success, although we still find long line-ups outside the doorways with people squeezing in that last cigarette before they start or slipping out for a quick one, particularly during the winter months, which looks a little odd, but we still have some work to do and there is still much that could be done.

I remember the days when we used to have all of those ash trays out behind the curtains and everybody would be out there smoking. Now you do not find anybody out there smoking at least, and no ash trays. I think we have made tremendous progress and ought to continue to work for, as my colleague says, setting a model for what can be accomplished if we set our minds to it.

Also, the acknowledgement of my hon. friend that there is a tremendous cost associated with our health care system when you consider all of the people suffering from some aspect of smoke-related illnesses. The cost is horrendous. Therefore, it would really be an investment of significant proportions to encourage, particularly young people not to smoke. We acknowledge the fact that if you can keep a young person from smoking up until age 18 you have probably won the battle, that very few people are addicted after the age of 18. Therein lies the challenge in our school programs. I think we would all agree that really we have only touched the surface, that not a great deal has been done.

Madam Speaker, when you look at a package of cigarettes these days and see about half the pack covered with a sign saying "smoking is injurious to your health; smoking causes cancer; if you are pregnant don't smoke", and so on, you would think that people would get the clue that this is not a good idea. As my hon. friend has indicated, I think most people have. But the facts are that it is an addiction and how you rid yourself of this addiction obviously requires a major effort, and that while progress is being made much more ought to be done.

I want to thank my hon. colleague for his intervention, and particularly again his reference to the fact that transitional funds must be provided for the growers in the business. We must also re-think our export of tobacco products, particularly to the developing world. One reads with a great deal of disappointment that the major marketing now of tobacco products is into the poorest parts of the world, into the parts of the world where, since one is having difficulty selling them in Canada, that a major initiative is being taken to sell cigarette products in the developing countries. This is something we should not be encouraging, and as a matter of fact should be taking steps to eliminate.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I do not wish to belabour the point because we agree absolutely. But another suggestion is that it is ironic; in the House of Commons it is not just a matter of prohibiting people from smoking in offices, which is observed or not observed, but the House spends thousands and thousands of dollars on programs. If a member of Parliament or a staff member wishes to sign up for a non-smoking program the House will pay for it and that is a very positive move.

Unfortunately the health officials in the administration of the House do not attempt to size up the size of the problem. They do not attempt to target it or promote it. The second thing they do not do is that if somebody takes that program there is absolutely no follow-up. People here have suggested they do not have the resources to do that. But, in fact, there is a school of nursing at the University of Ottawa, in Algonquin College, where students could—probably as part of their project—do an assessment. I discussed this previously with a number of folks who thought that they would be quite prepared as a project in health care to come in here, do an assessment and do a follow-up.

But what I am arguing about is that we could set an example here. The second thing is that the House leader, in speaking to his other colleagues, might be able to approach the Speaker and ask if something slightly more energetic could be done to begin to set the model on the Hill. I know the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is a solid supporter of the kinds of activity that go in his report on health care and it is well known that the lifestyle types of things are important.

So right within the House things can be done. I would also like to say that he did not comment on the non-partisan nature of the desire of the government to move into areas where members of Parliament do agree. I am wondering about the possibility of House leaders sitting down for a discussion on what might be added to the health care committee to see whether or not the government may want to target some of these tax dollars to education programs, to conversion programs, and to really make this thing work. The government's initiative in using the stick is fine, but additionally there needs to be more on the carrot that would encourage people to get off the habit.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I am taking part in this debate today as a non-smoker. I am very proud to say that none of my children smoke either, but yet I am the first to recognize that perhaps through continuing research, partially funded by the Government of Canada, the Canadian tobacco industry has one of the best products of any country in the world. They have lower tar and nicotine content than most other countries of the world. Consequently the Canadian product itself is not only of higher quality but it is much safer.

We only have about 1,200 growers left and yet in 1988-1989 fiscal year those farmers contributed $2.097 billion in tax revenues to various levels of government in this country.

What we are seeing in this bill is another tax grab that is going to drive Canadians into more cross-border shopping to pick up cigarettes at about half the price. Of course, while they are over there they will buy other products that are cheaper because the retail sector does not take as big a mark-up and because there are not as many levels between the growers and the retail outlet. They will also fill up with gasoline, again made far more expensive by the levels of taxes in this country. This is hurting the cross-border communities in a very dramatic way.

The minister spoke earlier today about a national plan to reduce smoking. He said that the strategy would be effective to reduce this but I have to ask the question how much of this revenue has been missed not only due to the cross-border shopping but also due to the illicit trade that we are reading more and more about as time goes on. I believe that the increased taxes have had an adverse effect not only on government revenues but maintaining a desire for the people to obtain their tobacco needs in the U.S.

A few months ago the minister of energy, and I hope he will come back in, made a comment on a comparable product, and I would be very remiss if I did not touch on it now that he has mentioned it.

Tobacco has been described here today in the House as a legal killer. I have to suggest there is another substance used in Canada at the present time that is an insidious neurotoxic substance which is certainly banned in some other countries but is still being used here in Canada.

He looked at tobacco being labelled as a killer. I suggest that the octane enhancer currently used in gasolines in Canada, MMT, which is methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, is nearly as bad as the product it replaced which is tetra-ethyl lead. I have documents that suggest that while we are flailing away at the tobacco industry to protect the lives of Canadian people, the sad part is that other ingredients used in our gasoline is particularly harmful to the health of infants and children. They are the most vulnerable victims of this substance, yet tobacco products are not used by these young people or children whose immune systems are not yet in place.

I would like to cite from the June issue of the Canadian Medical Journal, where it points out that among infants 10 to 14 months of age in low-income families in Montreal, 24.3 per cent had iron deficiency anaemia.

Then we look at some research done by Michael and Judy Ashner at Albany Medical College, in Albany, New York. They found that in laboratory animals that have iron deficiencies the uptake of manganese accelerates dramatically.

This happens in laboratory animals and of course the laboratory work is done to assess the impact of these substances on humans. Then does it also follow that many of these infants in Canada whose blood brain barriers are not yet in place and who do not have the mechanisms to excrete this substance may also be at risk.

Therefore, I suggest that we have a double standard here. We are aiming to eliminate smoking by imposing high taxes on the smokers, yet we are continuing to allow the use of the substance MMT containing manganese in our automotive fuels. We are allowing MN3 to come out of the exhaust systems of cars that causes pollution and the MN3 is taken into the respiratory systems and accumulates in the bodies, not only of children who are the most susceptible, but also other Canadians. It is taken in through the respiratory system and it accumulates and attacks the cells at the base of the brain.

There is another double standard here. Tobacco is produced here in Canada, and as I indicated earlier, it has the lowest chemical content, nicotine content, of any nation in the world. But we allow the importation of a product into Canada that is not even manufactured here that places the health of our children and adults at risk.

I have to say that I am amazed that this government can bring in a tax measure such as this on the pretext of trying to force Canadians to quit smoking and at the same time allowing the continuous use of an insidious neurotoxic substance in gasolines that over a period of time may have an adverse impact on the health of our children if continued exposure is allowed to exist.

I want to be very clear on this matter. This is taken in and accumulates in the body over a long period of time and the outcome of this will not be known for years to come, long after these infants have grown up.

I should also put on the record that this material has been banned in the United States since 1978.

Therefore, if this government is seriously maintaining that increased tobacco taxes are a health measure, then I ask them to move immediately to ban MMT from gasolines in Canada.

The medical evidence continues to accumulate. The substance I speak about, MMT, has to be dealt with very quickly if we are going to protect the lives and health of our nation's children.

As I look across the country and see the alternatives for those engaged in agriculture continuing to diminish, I have to ask this government to stop and examine where it is going and to make sure that those farmers who do wish to take advantage of the REDUX program are given an opportunity through continued funding to get into other areas of production that is acceptable to society and will not affect the health of this nation.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex for his intervention earlier in this House today when he voted against this bill on behalf of his tobacco farmers. He was willing to stand up for them on this, as he has stood up for farmers across this country, not only when he was Minister of Agriculture but since then when he has led this party in the debate in the House of Commons regarding the GATT and the effects on our supply managed commodities.

I spoke earlier in the day on this bill. Madam Speaker, I want to let you know that I will not be repeating what I was saying earlier. What I want to point out to this House before we wind up the debate is the impact this legislation has on our farming communities, especially the farming communities in my area of Haldimand—Norfolk.

When a government puts on a tax such as this, a burdensome tax that in my belief and in the belief of many people throughout Canada is something that is just a tax grab, unfortunately the impact of that on people in their day to day lives does not seem to come up as often as we might want to expect.

What I have here are some letters from some of my constituents outlining the impacts that this taxation and excessive taxation have on their lives as tobacco farmers. I want to read from a few of these because I think it is important that the House understands, that this government understands, the impacts that some of the decisions have on common people.

I will not reveal any names, but I want to read this letter which outlines the real impact that the taxation has on this one farm family. It states: "My husband and I purchased the farm in 1974 for $140,000 with rights to 37 acres. We had good crops every year and slowly built up our farm from our profits. We bought other rights. All this was possible because of the money we made from our crops. Unfortunately, in 1981 my husband passed away. I was 38 years old with four children. I did not want to sell the farm because I was considering my children's future. When my husband passed away we owed $30,000 because of the blue mould program".

This is just one of the problems, the blue mould problem, faced by tobacco farmers, a disease affecting their crop. These are problems that Canadians in a day to day life do not understand that farmers face. Canadians on a day to day basis look out and see either a sunny day or a rainy day. They feel either they can go down to the beach or cannot go down to the beach.

Unfortunately, for the farmer it depends on what the day is like, whether he is going to have a proper crop and whether he can actually survive. If we do not get the amount of sun, if we do not get the amount of rain as required, not only in tobacco but other crops, it makes it difficult for farmers just to get by.

The letter states further: "In 1986 I grew 20 acres of tobacco with my children with an operating loan from the bank. The farm at that time was valued at $850,000. Now it is valued at $125,000".

Just over a few short years the value of that farm fell. What Canadian business person could go on after a business such as that loses the value that it did? This person is directly relating that to excessive taxation.

She goes on to say: "I have had a hard time making my living off of $350 a week. I am writing you this letter to make you realize how hard life is after I have sold my quota. Sometimes I feel like I'm going to have a nervous breakdown.

Even my children are suffering. They are nervous because they see all my hardships and problems. Last year, my 19-year old son underwent terrible surgery for a bleeding ulcer and the specialist says he could not understand how such a young person could get a bleeding ulcer. Without surgery, my son would have died".

The letter goes on to say that the doctor felt that this was a direct result of the stress that had been created within that family because of the troubles that it was having in the farming sector.

Another one I have here is from another family regarding the question of whether the decisions made by the government with regard to excessive taxation have actually been constitutional. He feels that they are against the Charter of Rights. He says: "What happened to the Charter of Rights which Canada and the government are supposed to adhere to? Our life as Canadians has definitely been a tremendous struggle. We have been put out of business, not treated as equals to our tobacco neighbours who were lucky enough to be able to wait one day or six months longer than us and therefore get three times the money".

This person is talking about the group of tobacco farmers, a little over 100, who got out before the REDUX program actually came in.

As I am talking about REDUX, I really want to take to task the Minister of State for Finance when he questioned me today on whether I was, I suppose he challenged me, misleading the House on the question of REDUX.

The fact of the matter is that there is no money now in the hands of the farmers for REDUX. The government says that I should know that it is planning to give money for REDUX. The planning or possible promises have been broken by this government in the past as they have by a number of governments.

Tobacco farmers are not satisfied with the promise from the Minister of State for Finance that there is going to be a solution. I know he is having problems now. He is correct when he says that the NDP provincial government is balking on funding.

An hon. member: They are worse than the Tories.

Mr. Speller: I cannot judge that yet, because I have not really been in long enough.

It has given a commitment because Bob Rae did give a commitment during the election campaign that he would fairly compensate farmers. Unfortunately, this has not come to task yet, but I hope that within the short term the provincial government will get involved in this REDUX program if there is funding from the government. I hope too that it will be able to provide some answers for our tobacco farmers.

As I said before, promises have been broken. Also, governments have gone on their own in programs to assist farmers and to assist other industries without provincial involvement.

I would call upon the government and the minister of state because he knows he has the power to do this on his own. If the provincial government goes back on its word to help compensate tobacco farmers, I would expect that the federal government here would go along on it. I would hope that my hon. friends on the government side from tobacco producing areas would be making that point to the government.

To continue on, this gentleman says: "We purchased over 123 acres for 179,000 pounds of quota for our farm in 1984 for $600,000. Within four years, our acreage went from 45 acres to 20 acres."

That answers the question for the people who say: Why can tobacco farmers not get into other forms of farming? You cannot farm anything in Canada on 20 acres or 45 acres and make any sort of living.

There are areas in which tobacco farmers have moved, some of the areas are peanuts, melons and a whole wide range of products. Basically, a lot of the markets for those products have already been taken up elsewhere in Canada.

There has been a lot of success by farmers helped by programs by the government such as AEI, Alternative Initiative Programs, and also other government funding to help them move in. There have been some success stories. I am not saying there have not been.

Unfortunately, now it has cancelled that program.

It has cancelled the Alternative Enterprise Initiative and the government has not given any indication at all that it plans to bring that initiative back.

Again, we have had promises. We have had the Minister of Finance, the former Minister of Agriculture, come right through my riding, the riding of Elgin and Oxford, and make a commitment prior to the last election that he would help the tobacco industry. Unfortunately, in my mind and in the mind of most tobacco farmers, they do not feel that that help has been forthcoming.

I mentioned earlier in the day a group of over 1,000 farmers who banded together and who have put a suit forward to sue the federal and provincial governments for what they say is excessive taxation. They say they have been damaged by this and are asking recourse from both the federal and Ontario provincial governments.

Unfortunately, both governments decided at that time that they would challenge this court decision. Unfortunately for them and fortunately for tobacco farmers, they lost out on that challenge. The judge decided that yes, the tobacco farmers did have a right to sue the government on that fact and that is going on now.

This is a letter from the president of that group of tobacco farmers. It is a fair compensation group. He writes that there is no rationale, no sense of impact and no provision for compensation for those affected by this and previous excesses in government taxation. The only clue we have is a statement from the Minister of Finance on budget day, February 26, 1991, that the huge tax increase was intended to reduce tobacco use and if that tax produced a net revenue decline it was the kind of revenue erosion he would be pleased to accommodate. It says, as stated by the finance minister, it is a tax increase to reduce consumption of tobacco which will result in the item not being purchased and no tax being paid. He says this is illogical. There is no regard for personal liberty. Of about one-third of adult Canadians who enjoy tobacco, a legal product, it has ignored their millions of protests.

There have been millions of protests. These protests have gone in to the Prime Minister in those little cards that you might have seen in your package of tobacco. Those cards were addressed to the Prime Minister. They called upon the Prime Minister to stop his excessive taxing of tobacco products.

There were well over 3 million to 4 million of these tax cards that went in to the Prime Minister's office. I am sure the Prime Minister would not have read them all, but I hope that he would have at least looked at a few of them to get a sense of the outrage smoking Canadians have to excessive taxation. I am saying excessive taxation because I am sure that a majority of these smokers would be willing to pay fair taxation on their tobacco products. I have no doubt about that.

Look at the situation in the United States. I am sure the Americans have the same concern for their health as does the Canadian government. They feel that some form of taxation on their tobacco products is enough to help deal with the adverse health effects that they find in their country due to smoking. They have nowhere near the amount of taxation on their tobacco products that we do. It leads one to believe that somewhere along the line there is something wrong, that one government is going wrong somewhere if it feels that taxation does stop smoking and stops these adverse impacts on its economy and on our economy.

I would suggest that it is the Canadian government that has gone way overboard. It knows it has gone overboard and the only reason it is continuing to increase taxation on tobacco product is in order to get revenue in a way that most Canadians would not notice. Only one-quarter of all Canadians, six and a half million or so, smoke. I feel that it is this government's intention to continue to increase this taxation and continue to get its revenues in the future from this increased taxation.

I want to finish there because I have said most of what I really wanted to say on this matter this morning. However I want to leave you with one thought. I feel this government, through this taxation policy and through other policies, is driving Canadian agriculture south of the border because if we do not grow tobacco it is going to be grown anyway and people will continue to smoke.

This government is not going to stop other markets from smoking, other countries in the world. Essentially we will lose the business. Canadians will continue to smoke but they will just get their cigarettes from south of the border. That is just another industry that this government, provincial governments and other Canadian governments have been forcing south of the border.

I thank you for the time, Madam Speaker, and I think that is all on this side from those who were going to speak.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would put a question to the hon. member. I listened very carefully the very convincing arguments of both the member for Sarnia—Lambton and the member for Haldimand—Norfolk on behalf of their constituents. The plight of those who are tobacco farmers is certainly not missed. Quite a number of them find themselves in tragic circumstances.

I intend no partisan comment here but I am confused. I would think the House favours attempting to reduce or idealistically eliminate the use of tobacco. The government has argued that one of the quickest and most efficient ways of doing it is by increasing the tax to make the cost prohibitive. The argument on the other side of the House is that, yes, we agree with the objectives of the bill, but if it is anything other than a cash grab give us a signal. Let us give relief to suffering tobacco farmers who find themselves in this predicament through no fault of their own. Let us put some of that tax grab money, until it is used in some fashion that signals good intent, into helping people get off the product. Let us help farmers. Let us help workers trapped innocently in the production thing. Let us help people get off it in whatever way we can: time off work and compensation for the cost of the programs.

There are two messages that seem to be coming in the defence of the tobacco farmer. First, they grow a very fine product. I think that signal sends out a mixed message that maybe this House and the two speakers did not intend. I recall the comments of the Philip Morris company marketing executive who when speaking to a sales group said: "Look, let's understand one thing. We sell a drug. We are not selling tobacco or we are not selling smoking. That is just one method by which this drug is administered and it is a very powerful drug". To make an argument, I think it could easily be misunderstood by the population to say that we make the best drug available.

If I understand the will of the House, it is that we want to do something clearly for the tobacco farmers to ease this enormous burden that came upon them, without the problem that I think both of the previous speakers have articulated very clearly. But the second thing is that we want some of that cash tax grab put into relieving the burden in a committed way, and arguments have been made that that should be cost shared by Ontario. The health care system will be the beneficiary. Canadians will be the beneficiary.

I wonder if the comment on the fact that Canadians make the best tobacco should be clarified that it should not be allowed to continue on that basis. As for the other argument that somehow the additives to gasoline were a serious health problem, that is acknowledged. There is no contest on it. The health minister basically said in one of his reports that lifestyle changes had to be made. It was the surest way to change the health care system. Motor vehicles, tobacco and alcohol were causing tremendous lifestyle drains.

To make an argument that we should not move on tobacco unless we move on the motor vehicles seems again to be moving us away from the critical point that this House basically backs what the government has done. The government, in a show of good faith, should reciprocate by clearly and strongly addressing the problems those farmers face, that the workers in the production and distribution face, and that Canadians face trying to get off tobacco.

I wonder if that might be clarified by the previous speaker.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for North Island—Powell River for his question. I listened intently. It was a little bit confusing near the end. I was not really quite sure whether you were asking if I supported the banning of tobacco totally as an illegal drug and thereby there should be compensation for farmers once it was banned. I believe you will find that most tobacco farmers would be just as happy if the product was banned altogether and they were compensated for doing that.

In terms of what my hon. friend for Lambton—Middlesex said earlier, the point he was trying to make was that the government was being—and I do not want to put words in his mouth—somewhat hypocritical by claiming on the one hand to be doing something for the health of Canadians by taxing a legal product and on the other hand doing nothing to ban the use of MMT as an additive. I would agree with him. I believe these are areas that the government should continue to look at.

The point being made by my hon. friend for Lambton—Middlesex is that there are a number of these products used within Canada. In the last few days he said that during the free trade debate there was a promise by this government that there would be a level playing field, that Canadian farmers would be able to use certain products that American farmers were able to use.

The practice in Canada is that we ban products, one of which is MMT. We ban other pesticides and other herbicides in Canada and say we cannot have them on our products. Then we import them from other countries including the United States.

The point my hon. friend for Lambton—Middlesex has been trying to make is that we should have a level playing field and that Canadian farmers should have the same access to these products as do Americans. It is hypocritical of the government to claim on the one hand to be doing something for the health of Canadians by overtaxing tobacco and on the other hand doing nothing to ban the use of MMT which, as he says, is a real danger especially to the health of young Canadians.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is truly convoluted and a little difficult to follow, but I think from the careful explanation of the previous speaker that both he and the member for Lambton—Middlesex do in fact support the initiatives of the government that would lead to a reduction in the use of tobacco in Canada. They make a very strong argument that farmers should be compensated. I guess by extension others should be compensated as well for losses through the support of this House of the government's initiative to increase taxes on tobacco.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure that I follow the hon. member. I guess my point is that this government has been unfairly taxing tobacco products in Canada.

An hon. member: It is unfairly taxing everybody.

Mr. Speller: "It is unfairly taxing everybody", as my hon. friend says. This is nothing but another tax grab by the government, and Canadians are really fed up with paying such high taxes. This is nothing more than a tax grab. Canadians will let this government know at the end of things, in the next election, what they feel about these high undue taxes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I think that you would have the unanimous consent of this House to call it six o'clock.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for us to call it 6 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, in the very brief time I have tonight I would like to raise on the adjournment motion a question that I put to the government, in particular to the minister of trade, on June 10, 1991. It was on a very important issue of concern to the country and in particular to my home province of British Columbia and my riding including the Prince George and northern interior area of the province. It was in regard to the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding.

I guess it is a good example of how the world does change. At that time the issue that was very important to us was the thousands of jobs that were being lost in the forest industry basically because this government, along with the former Social Credit government in British Columbia, signed an agreement essentially with the Americans that allowed the imposition of a tariff on softwood lumber products from Canada into the United States.

At the time my question was put to the government to see what it was doing to tell Washington, D.C. that Canada wanted to manage its forests on its own.

Subsequent to that the government moved on September 3, 1991 to terminate the softwood lumber agreement with the U.S., which at the time I applauded with some reservations. Of course the reservations were such that it had taken some time and many thousands of jobs had been lost in the meantime.

In going in to some new negotiations, what assurances could the government give us that it would stand firm and would not sign another deal like it did in the later part of 1986?

That is essentially the stage we are at now. To whoever is going to respond on the government side, I think there are two points I would especially like to hear tonight. The first is an assurance that the government can give, in having the ongoing discussions on this issue with Washington, D.C., that it will not cave in like it did under the previous provincial government and this government. Second, I would like some detail on the assurances the Minister of International Trade provided to me by way of letter that any Canadian forest producers would be protected, watched out for or taken care of in light of any threats of retaliation from the United States.

That is what I would like to hear from the government tonight. It is a very important issue for lumber producers across Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the Canada—United States softwood lumber memorandum of understanding (MOU) was negotiated to avoid the imposition of countervailing duties on exports of Canadian softwood lumber to the United States. The softwood lumber MOU was intended, first, to end a bitter and highly politicized bilateral trade dispute over Canadian lumber exports to the United States, and second, to provide time for Canadian provinces to implement planned changes in provincial forest policies, which included increases in stumpage and other charges to the Canadian industry.

Madam Speaker, conditions have changed significantly since the MOU was signed. A large portion of Canada's softwood lumber exports to the United States are no longer subject to the export charge. The charge has been replaced entirely in British Columbia and partially in Quebec, and the Atlantic provinces are exempt. In all, changes in the application of the MOU's provisions have served to reduce export charge collections for Canada to roughly $40 million from a level of $400 million in 1987, the first year of the MOU.

Madam Speaker, market conditions have also changed since the MOU was signed in 1986. Canada's share of the U.S. market has fallen from a peak of 32.8 per cent in 1985 to 26.8 per cent in 1990, its lowest level in 13 years. The increase in the value of the Canadian dollar, combined with increased log costs to the Canadian industry, have significantly enhanced the competitiveness of U.S. producers compared to Canadian producers.

The memorandum of understanding has therefore served its purpose, and Canada exercised its right to terminate the agreement on October 4. Canada—United States softwood lumber trade can now be put back on a normal basis, subject to the rules of the Free Trade Agreement and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Madam Speaker, in response to domestic pressure, the U.S. Administration has decided to launch a new countervailing duty case against softwood lumber from Canada and has also imposed an interim border measure requiring importers to post bonds on shipments of lumber from those producers that were subject to the export charge.

The government has objected strongly to this U.S. action and is seeking the immediate establishment of a GATT panel which will be asked to rule on whether the price which a government charges for the right to cut timber is a countervailable subsidy and whether the Section 301 bonding requirement is consistent with U.S. obligations under the GATT.

There is no basis, Madam Speaker, for a countervailing duty investigation. There is no subisdy to Canadian lumber producers. The government will be working closely with the Canadian industry and the provinces in mounting the best possible defence in fighting these allegations of subsidy.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion, Canada is in a better position to fight the U.S. countervail action than we were in 1986. In addition to the changes in provincial stumpage policies and market conditions, Canada now has access to binding dispute-settlement provisions.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have the four minutes or so available to me to discuss a question that I posed to the government benches on October 4 and 5. It is in regard to the government's lacklustre commitment, or failure to endorse in strong language, the continuation of the success story that has marked the de Havilland Corporation of metropolitan Toronto.

We on this side of the House have tried to convince the government of a number of realities. The first is that de Havilland happens to be the flag ship for our Canadian aerospace industry. It also happens to be the largest single industrial employer in metropolitan Toronto. There are currently some 4,900 workers directly employed at de Havilland, despite the fact that Boeing has announced that starting January 1,300 of these individuals would be laid off. The other important factor is that for every direct job at de Havilland there is approximately four created in the small business sector which feeds in both contracts and supplies in terms of aerospace parts for de Havilland Corporation.

De Havilland is very crucial economically to metropolitan Toronto and indeed to the province of Ontario and to the country so far as employment in contracts across Canada, including the province of Quebec, in very significant measure, but also the aspect of a federal government being able to promote a national aerospace industry like any other country of the western world.

In response to our questions the minister of industry actually suggested that the ball is in the provincial court. If there is an initiative for assistance and promotion it ought to come from the provincial governments. We find on this side of the House that that is a complete abdication of any national responsibility to support and sustain our aerospace industry.

We have already gone down the path of the Avro Arrow. We know what that did to the industry back then in terms of employment, in terms of research and development, in terms of morale. What we want to avoid is a repeat of history under the same Tory administration in 1991.

What we on this side of the House have been seeking is a clear, unequivocal assurance, not of passing the political buck to the provinces or the municipalities but clearly to say to the people of Canada that the federal government will endeavour to continue to support de Havilland. If no private interests come together to assist de Havilland, then this federal government must certainly carry out its responsibilities to the fullest to ensure that jobs, that research and that technology related to the aerospace industry remains in Canada for Canadians.

I am looking forward to the answer from the government benches this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by pointing out that the aerospace industry in Canada is a highly significant component of Canada's industrial base employing 64,000 and generating $8 billion in sales, of which $6 billion is exports.

[English]

Canada's aerospace industry has performed better than other companies throughout the world even if it has been performing in a highly competitive environment. The reason is that the aerospace industry in Canada counts on sales of about 30 per cent to the military while it is not the case in other countries throughout the world.

[Translation]

This government recognizes the aerospace industry not only for its economic benefits but also as an engine for technology development with spin-off benefits for other domestic industries. To this end, Industry Science and Technology Canada has for years supported, and continues to support, the R&D activities of the industry through cost-sharing in the range of 30 per cent to 50 per cent, which is generally repayable through royalties.

[English]

De Havilland in its early years after privatization achieved considerable market recognition and success with the Dash 8 product line. Now there are 286 Dash 8 aircraft operating world-wide as compared to 20 in early 1986. I fly in one every week coming and going to my riding.

De Havilland received support from Industry, Science and Technology to develop and enhance the Dash 8 product line which improved the technical attributes and attractiveness of the product.

Boeing decided to sell its interest in the company in 1990 and shortly thereafter the economic recession and dramatic downturn in airline travel resulted in a severe slump in demand for commuter aircraft. The effect of the slump was a weakening of de Havilland's order book which may necessitate production rate cutbacks as we know involving employee reductions. We are confident that with the upturn in the economy de Havilland will regain its place as a high technology company and as a dynamic enterprise that will continue to provide a major economic impact in the Toronto area and also on the Canadian industry scene.

We feel confident that de Havilland can bounce back and the government is prepared and committed to support any moves that are made in order to maintain de Havilland as a effective and strong company.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, a few weeks ago, on September 24, I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question on joint plans for the Canadian dairy producers. I got an answer from the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. It was far from satisfactory anyway.

Basically, the problem is that dairy producers in Quebec have decided that it is extremely important that production costs be included in the formula according to which the actual production costs of 70 per cent of the most productive farmers be used as a basis or basic criterion applied to all Quebec dairy producers.

There seems to be a concern within the Quebec farmers union, and rightly so, since the advisory committee has learned through the office of the Minister of Agriculture that the rate of $43 per hundred weight of milk was going to drop by about 5 per cent.

In other words, our farm producers, particularly our dairy producers, are under pressure because of this drop in the hundredweight price. At present, a farmer with 35 to 45 dairy cows earns around $26,000 a year. This is not much, as you know. In fact, that is barely more than minimum wage if you factor in all their hours of work.

What are the Quebec farmers and dairy producers most concerned about? They are concerned about the pressures exerted, and this must be pointed out, by the Agriculture Department to take into account the US dairy production, the world cheese price and maybe other factors, so that the price of milk in Canada may drop by 5 per cent. You cannot operate that way. We have a supply management system which has proven very beneficial. Quotas are valuable because we have a fair and equitable system to maintain milk prices, and dairy producers who abused the system were penalized, as we know.

That is why basically our farmers are worried about these negotiations, and rightfully so. When we look at dairy production in Canada since we know that 48 per cent of it comes from Quebec, its 13,500 producers, they have every reason to be concerned. This sector of the agri-food industry is very important for us. Madam Speaker, I would like to reassure them through the hon. parliamentary secretary, if he could deal with the criteria applicable to dairy production.

[English]

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to respond to the concerns the hon. member has just raised.

In particular, with regard to the pricing of milk, about two and a half or three years ago there was a dairy task force that was established by the then Minister of Agriculture, the present Minister of Finance, to try to make sure that we keep a very competitive up-to-date dairy industry in this country. Whether it was in Quebec or any other province, it would not matter, it would make sure that it is a competitive industry across this nation.

Our consumers and the people of Canada have become very used to a good quality, wholesome product which we expect and should expect. They have met that standard. They have met the challenge of doing that. They have provided very, very good products to us.

Pricing of the product has been taken over through a recommendation by the task force. The government does not set the prices for that milk as I understand it today, if I understand the member's question properly.

I know this past summer the pricing of milk was changed from a different way of measuring the fat content or the skim milk part of the product to a different system. If there has been any reduction it would be because of the different way of pricing but fair, I believe, right across the country.

The most important thing is the negotiations we believe that are taking place at the GATT because this is where article XI allows us to control imports of dairy products into this country, and poultry products as well. This is very important to us, and we are vigorously supporting article XI. We have support from other nations around the world, but that is a very strong and important element to the continuation of our supply managed sector.

Our position has not changed since it was developed and has remained steadfast. We hope that with that and with all the stakeholders being involved we will give the dairy producers the confidence they need to continue the fine work they have been doing.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, in September I had asked the minister of housing, and the parliamentary secretary got up and answered, my simple question: When is the government going to introduce its 5 per cent down payment for new home buyers?

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has had a proposal before this government that would reduce that insurable limit of a home's value to 95 per cent. Currently we have a minimum of 10 per cent down payment which is required for a mortgage. The proposal that the government has been studying, and has before it, is one that would call for a 5 per cent down payment. It is supported by everyone from the Canadian Real Estate Association, Canadian Home Builders, to the potential new home buyer. Everyone is supporting this proposal except this government.

I think the federal government has failed to understand the importance of what the recession has done to the housing sector. Hundreds of thousands of construction workers have been laid off and construction companies have even gone bankrupt. Surplus inventories in new houses will ensure that the new work will be slow in coming and the supply of materials and workers will shrink continually as the recession lingers and consumer confidence remains low.

A 5 per cent down payment is a tried and true mechanism that will encourage housing construction and the 95 per cent NHA insured mortgages were the benchmark financing mechanism between 1960 and 1982.

A study by CMHC indicates that a 5 per cent down payment would open up the housing market to some 200,000 families. About 10,000 to 15,000 this year alone would be able to take advantage of this new proposal. Studies have also indicated that in the current economic environment the lower down payment would result in only marginal and easily manageable risk to the mortgage insurance fund managed by CMHC.

In other words, there would be no cost to the treasury.

The recent stability of housing prices and the decline in interest rates make it an ideal time to introduce the 5 per cent down payment program. Currently the over-supply of housing, high unemployment in the industry, the stabilizing of high house prices, decrease in interest rates, the fact that it will not cost this government treasury any money, and the 5 per cent down payment should provide a stimulus to the housing sector which is so badly needed.

The government in its answer to my question in September said that simply lower interest rates would be enough to bring the buyers back into the market. That simply is not going to be enough. The housing industry now is faced with an interesting dilemma. Consumers are waiting for this announcement. The word has been out that the government will announce it soon and therefore there has been a hesitancy on the part of home buyers to want to purchase that home. The government needs to answer the industry's claim that the time has come for this 5 per cent down payment and it can finally announce this program so that it can get on with putting people back to work, putting people in new homes, and essentially getting people off the unemployment roles.

I would again urge and ask this government if it is prepared to announce today the initiation of the 5 per cent down payment for first time home buyers.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question concerning the creation of housing construction jobs through the introduction of a 5 per cent down payment for first time home buyers.

We have to recognize that today's generation of homeowners often remembers the level of down payment as the single most important obstacle it had to overcome when it purchased its first home.

Many of those who became homeowners in the 1960s and 1970s would not have been able to purchase a home had they been required to provide a down payment of more than 5 per cent.

Ninety-five per cent of the NHA-insured mortgages were the benchmark financing technique from 1960 to 1982.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is looking at a variety of ways to help Canadians everywhere access home ownership. One possibility is by once again offering a government-backed mortgage insurance for down payments as low as 5 per cent.

CMHC officials estimate that reducing down payments to 5 per cent would allow up to 200,000 Canadian renters with a reasonable opportunity for home ownership. Of these, there could be some 10,000 potential first-time home buyers in the first year.

The support of the Canadian Home Builders Association and its affiliates for 95 per cent NHA mortgage insurance is very much appreciated. CMHC recognizes that the home building industry is a vital factor in the Canadian economy providing jobs for many skilled tradespeople.

CMHC is encouraged to note that on a national basis housing starts are expected to rise 21 per cent to 178,000 units in 1992.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation wants to help first-time home buyers weigh all their options and make sound decisions. Ninety-five per cent mortgage financing is certainly one of the options being considered.

We will be pleased to advise this House and the hon. member as soon as a decision has been reached on this important matter.

ILLICIT DRUGS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, today in The Toronto Star a report was published on the preoccupation in the mind of municipal voters in metro Toronto. From that study, we learn that the most important problem in the mind of municipal electors on metropolitan Toronto is crime, law and order to an astonishing degree where it peaks in the city of Scarborough, and to a very close second, I believe, in the city of Toronto.

Evidently we have here a preoccupation that is deeply felt in the heart of every neighbourhood across the city.

This brings me then to the issue of illicit drugs and the anti-drug enforcement which in the past five weeks I have raised in this House by way of a Standing Order and then by way of a question of the Solicitor General who sought to give me quite an encouraging answer on September 24. At that time, to my question as to whether the federal government would refund or return a share of the funds seized by the RCMP in drug arrests, the answer by the Solicitor General was that he knew that this bond had been made previously by various police officials and mayors across the country and that he, having acknowledged that this is a valid point, would look into this matter. I am quoting here from page 2636 of Hansard:

> —we are looking at the possibility of returning funds spent on investigations to the various jurisdictions.

The Solicitor General went on to comment on the fact that the National Drug Strategy announced by the Prime Minister is a five year preoccupation which expires in 1992. While we appreciate the complexity and the difficulty of this issue, even the best friends of the Prime Minister could not claim that this National Drug Strategy has been a resounding success. In the last four years the issue has deteriorated and, as shown in this survey conducted by The Toronto Star, it is now so deeply felt that it tops the polls, so to say, in metro Toronto. I suspect that this is not an isolated occurrence. In conclusion, I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether she could tell us when the minister will make a decision on this request made by politicians of all parties in this House, I presume, and also by mayors and reeves across the country on returning a portion of the funds that accrue from certain RCMP initiatives to which the various police forces have contributed as well in the course of their investigations and seizures and the like. Also does the government have a specific plan in mind to strengthen the national drug strategy which, at the present time, seems to be rather weakly implemented when it comes to the regional and the local level.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the hon. member for Davenport for his particular interest in public safety. He is, of course, concerned about an article expressing the concerns of the people of Toronto, but I think every memberof this House would agree that these concerns are shared by all Canadians.

A number of police forces, particularly in Metro Toronto, have been calling for the return of a portion of the assets forfeited as a result of their investigations. It is suggested that these forfeited funds could be used to enhance their drug demand reduction activities through education, and prevention.

The Solicitor General fully supports the balance of supply and demand reduction efforts by the police. Police forces across Canada have done an exceptional job in this respect, and I am confident that they will continue to do so. I am also aware that many departments are feeling the effects of fiscal restraint. They must do more with less. To their credit, by working smarter, police forces have met this challenge well.

Proceeds of crime investigations can be costly. The recovery of forfeited proceeds is certainly one possible way to finance these complex and time-consuming investigations. However, careful consideration must be given to the question of whether asset sharing can be implemented without jeopardizing the impartial administration of the criminal justice system and the delivery of policing services in particular. This issue is being reviewed by the Department of Justice.

In the interim, as a partner in Canada's Drug Strategy, the Ministry of the Solicitor General will continue to work with police departments across Canada to reduce supply and demand for drugs. Federal dollars will continue to be used to assist police at all levels through contributions to research and development.

Specifically in the area of proceeds of crime legislation introduced under the Strategy, the Ministry of the Solicitor General, in consultation with the RCMP, is exploring ways to facilitate co-operation in anti-drug profiteering law enforcement. The ultimate goal of these efforts is to address the difficulties created by the time and labour intensive nature of proceeds investigations and to encourage the participation of all police forces.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House now is deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

SMALL BUSINESS

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see your smiling face again in this House.

As it is Small Business Week in Canada I am very pleased to have the honour of presenting to this House the government's third annual report on the state of small business in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all hon. members share my strong admiration for the men and women who own and operate small and medium-sized businesses in Canada. The report I am tabling today is entitled From Best Practices to Competitiveness and it profiles these entrepreneurs and highlights many of the practices they have used to be successful.

The Government of Canada is committed to programs and policies which support the growth of the small business sector. I invite all hon. members to study the report I am tabling today in order to enhance their understanding of small business practices. I urge everyone to join me in congratulating the enormous accomplishments of small businesses in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FINANCE

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Finance in connection with the Bank Act, Bill C-19, that is reported to this House with amendments.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-315, an act to amend the Criminal Code (evidence concerning sexual activity).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, the simple explanation of this bill that I have introduced in the House of Commons is to restore the sections of the Criminal Code commonly known as the rape shield law.

Let me make this brief remark. This is my response to the outcry from women across Canada on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada invalidating the rape shield law. This bill would allow us to use our constitutional power to reinstate the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code.

May I make one more comment, Mr. Speaker, and it is this. The women responsible for the "Take Back the Night" crusade offer a simple guide, yes means yes and no means no. It is a national shame that some of the judges in the Supreme Court of Canada do not recognize the social value of that simple rule. If we really intend to stop violence against women let us restore the rape shield law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Crosby moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Routine Proceedings

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-316, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act (age of entitlement, suspension of allowance and review committee).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, this bill addresses a couple of major concerns relating to MPs' pensions. If passed, this bill would hold back pension payouts until the age of 60. Also it would prohibit future retired MPs from drawing both their parliamentary pension and a federal salary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Harvard moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by people in Dubuisson, Val-d'Or, Vassan, Ottawa, Aylmer and Orleans who respectfully submit to the government that the rules concerning compensation for pregnant women do not reflect all the requirements of their working conditions. The possibility of preventive withdrawal for pregnant women is a desirable and necessry option for working women.

For these reasons, they humbly ask Parliament, when it reviews the Canada Labour Code, to seriously consider the deficiencies in it and recognize the need to include in the Code clauses for the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay, Mr. Speaker.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, concerning firearms. The petitioners are from Monkland, Cornwall, Summerstown and St. Andrews, Ontario and say that the accessibility of firearms is a key factor in homicides, accidents and suicides. Many types of weapons are easily available in Canada but not necessary for legitimate purposes like hunting and competitive shooting. They ask Parliament to legislate now to forbid anyone with a criminal record to own a firearm.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 57 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 57 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

That this House take note of the Prime Minister's recently stated commitment to the principle of linking government aid to respect for human rights and, in light of documented violations of human rights in countries such as Mexico, China, Zaire, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya and others which currently receive Canadian financial support, that this House urge the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada–United States–Mexico free trade negotiations and to review immediately all international support programs to ensure that they meet the aid criteria as announced by the Prime Minister.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who will be focusing in particular on the situation in Mexico and the implications of human rights in Mexico on the North American free trade deal.

As I said, we welcome the words and declarations of the Prime Minister during the past week at Commonwealth meetings both in Gabon and in Zimbabwe when he said "that Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of freedom, that nothing in international relations is more important than respect for individual freedoms and human rights," and when the Prime Minister said here in Canada that "human rights form a very important component of foreign policy for Canada".

There is a huge gap between reality and rhetoric when it comes to this important principle. I would remind the House that it was four years ago that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, chaired by William Winegard, the member for Guelph, strongly recommended to the government in its unanimous report that in fact Canada should link clearly and explicitly its policy on human rights with its policy on aid.

In 1988 the government indicated that it was prepared to implement that particular principle. The excellent report of the standing committee in 1987 called for a comprehensive set of guiding principles for a CIDA policy unit to identify human rights abusers and to advise on trends in each recipient country, for annual reports to be made public by this unit and sent for review to parliamentary committees and for a clear linkage between development and arms control. As the Canadian Council on International Co-operation has pointed out this must be a transparent and open process.

What has happened in those four years since the Prime Minister suddenly discovered the importance of human rights in international financial transactions? Just today the Canadian Council on Churches and the Interchurch Fund for International Development are releasing a major report on Canada's record on foreign aid. That report is a scathing indictment of the policies of the Conservative government on aid.

They say that CIDA is moving further and further away from the real development issues that face the poorest countries. They say that CIDA has moved to a single neo-conservative development strategy, that CIDA's present course is a betrayal of its best contributions of the past. They point out that Canada has not come close to reaching our 1970 target of .7 per cent of GNP. In fact in real terms we have cut back on foreign aid, that our aid budget ranks tenth among the 12 largest donors when it comes to social spending, when it comes to spending on real human needs, and that we have not moved nearly far enough on the question of tied aid.

This government has said that they intend to implement human rights considerations when it comes to aid and once again we welcome that. But it is also important that in looking at other financial assistance and financial transactions that similar human rights considerations must apply.

When we are talking, for example, about lines of credit to other countries surely we have to look at human rights considerations in those circumstances as well. Perhaps the most glaring example is Iran and the fact that our government is prepared to extend a $1 billion line of credit to the government of Iran at the same time that the United Nations Human Rights Commission has found that there are a significant number of executions, repression of human rights, gross violation of the rights of women and children, that the officially announced executions for the first seven months of 1991 were three times greater than the total for the same period in 1990, that there is widespread public flogging of women, that a woman was just recently flogged 35 times with a metal cable by the revolutionary guards and is now being ordered back by the Canadian government to Iran.

This is the government to which this country is extending a $1 billion line of credit. It is shameful and obviously sheer hypocrisy when it comes to preaching human rights in international financial terms.

We can look as well at the situation in Kuwait where we just extended a $500 million line of credit, despite the fact that Middle East Watch, a very respected human rights group, has found that murder, torture, arbitrary detention and unlawful deportation have been the tools of a campaign of vengeance against Palestinians and others in Kuwait.

Where are the human rights considerations in extending lines of credit to Kuwait and to Iran? Surely we must look at the question of extension of lines of credit at this very sensitive point in Middle East peace negotiations to Israel as well when human rights concerns have been expressed with respect to the conditions in the occupied territory and when Israel insists on additional settlements in the occupied territories.

We must recognize that this standard cannot simply apply to ODA. It must apply as well to lines of credit.

Who does Iran buy its weapons from? One of its chief weapons suppliers is China. China is one of the chief weapons suppliers to Burma or to Myanmar which is ruled by a 19-member military junta described by Amnesty International as guilty of systematic torture and routine murder. It is a country in which state sanctioned brutality is a nation-wide phenomena.

China is responsible for selling arms to Burma, to Iran and other countries. As far as Canada is concerned, it is business as usual with China, despite the fact that Amnesty has documented that hundreds of thousands of people in China, including prisoners of conscience, are arbitrarily and in some cases illegally detained under the country's blatantly unfair system of administrative detention.

We know that in the wake of the Tiananmen Square massacre the police rounded up leaders of the pro-democracy movement and that as many as several thousand have been detained. The trials have been held behind closed doors, despite the call by Canada and other countries to open up those trials, to ensure that international observers can be present.

We recognize, of course, the progress that China has made in feeding its people despite tremendous adversity and in housing its people. Surely, Canada cannot remain silent on these abuses of human rights.

I note as well that Canada nominated China to the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, to an executive position there, as rapporteur despite the fact that we recognize China is a refugee producing country.

I could go down the list of other countries which are major recipients of Canada's foreign aid. Indonesia has been involved in the brutal suppression of the people of East Timor for some 15 years, with numerous killings, oppression, abuses of human rights. There has been the ruthless suppression of the rights of the people of East Timor, and yet Canada is actively involved in a financial sense in that country as well.

Kenya, where President Daniel arap Moi has suggested that he wants to hunt down like rats, those who have the audacity to oppose his dictatorial regime in that country. Kenya, a country in which prisoners of conscience have been held without charge or trial. In a number of cases, Canada provides $30 million a year to Kenya.

It is the same thing in Rwanda, dictatorship. Canada has subsidized the dictatorial regime in Rwanda, while the Prime Minister talks about respect for human rights. There is hypocrisy and a double standard, Mr. Speaker. Such double standards are quite unacceptable!

The same thing happens in Zaire. Canada gave a grant of some $70 million to the repressive Mobutu government in Zaire. Where are the human rights standards, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

Is the Prime Minister in fact a born again convert to this concept of linking human rights with financial aid as part of his campaign to become the Secretary General of the United Nations? We do not know.

We know he has tremendous support from his Conservative colleagues, but we have to ask ourselves: Why is there this last minute conversion to the principles of linking human rights with financial aid and financial support? Why is that? Why are they not practising what they preach? Why are they not practising what they preach in Central America, in Guatemala and in El Salvador where the Central America monitoring group has documented very clearly the fact that we have bilateral government to government aid relations with those countries which are obviously guilty of profound human rights abuses? They are guilty of denial of rights to their own people.

We know as well about the concerns about the impact of structural adjustment policies in our aid as well.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let us talk for a moment about the status of women. The Prime Minister in his speech in Harare, Zimbabwe, spoke about the importance of the Commonwealth setting the pace in ensuring the equality of women in all sectors of society. Yet Canada is selling 1,117 light armed vehicles to the fundamentalist regime in Saudi Arabia, a regime which has been denounced for its torture and ill treatment of detainees, a regime in which women are denied basic political and social rights.

Quite clearly there is a profound double standard in this government's approach to human rights. The Prime Minister, when he is outside the country, when he is in Zimbabwe, speaks about the importance of linkage of human rights and aid. We support that linkage. We have supported it since we joined in supporting the 1987 report. However, in closing, the time has come, Mr. Speaker, to match words to action. It is time to ensure that human rights are taken seriously by this government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very interesting survey of the violators of human rights with whom Canada has trade and aid relations.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he can comment further on the trade side of it since there is far more money involved both ways in trade. He has referred to tied aid, but I would like him to explain what the percentage is of Canada's ODA aid which is tied and what that tie means, not only for the profit of Canadians, but sometimes to the disadvantage of the country supposedly being aided.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the hon. member because it does point out another glaring inconsistency in this government's policies with respect to aid.

The fact is that the government declared its commitment in 1988 to untying at least one-third of government aid, and that still leaves a very high proportion of tied aid. Yet that target is far from being met by this government.

Instead, we have a situation in which only 5 per cent of the aid which is accorded by Canada to needy countries goes to meet basic human priorities such as family planning, clean water, primary education and primary health care. In fact, the United Nations human development report of 1990 was very critical of the very, very small proportion of Canadian aid which is going to serve basic human needs. The OECD was critical of what it referred to as a significant decline in Canadian aid, and the United Nations in its human development report pointed out that much of Canadian aid was in fact misdirected.

I want to take this opportunity as well, Mr. Speaker, just to note that nine of the ten top recipients in the Commonwealth of Canadian aid—and I am not even speaking here of trade, but I am speaking specifically of aid—routinely held political prisoners in detention without trial, according to Amnesty International last year, and more than one-half of them tolerated torture and extrajudicial executions.

Yes, it is important to talk about aid, but we also need to have a trade policy, a policy with respect to lines of credit that reflect that commitment to fundamental human rights. It is not good enough to say we will extend lines of credit for hundreds of millions of dollars in Mexico, in Kuwait, in Iran when what that does is allow the governments of those countries to spend even more money on the military.

Pakistan, for example, spends three times as much money on the military as it does on basic human needs. It is time that Canada recognize that our country simply cannot allow it to be business as usual in these circumstances. We must stop, for example, welcoming with open arms Nicolai Ceausescu to this country. Some people have short memories. In 1985, he was welcomed with open arms. We have to promote business, we have to promote trade.

It is time we stopped this hypocrisy and recognize that Canada must have one human rights policy.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, on a personal note I want to say how pleased I am to see the chair being occupied by our Deputy Speaker who was unfortunately ill for some time but has now returned to this Chamber.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: Under the calmness of the Deputy Speaker's chairpersonship I will make my comments to impress the House about the importance of this particular debate.

I will take just a couple of moments to congratulate my colleague, the member for Burnaby who has outlined clearly a continuation of a debate that took place in this House relative to the gulf war.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, the high statements made by the former minister of external affairs about ending the arms race, and the pious statements made some months ago in this House by the Prime Minister and the former minister of external affairs that we have to control the international arms race.

My colleague has outlined in his speech how we are contributing to the continuation of the international arms race, and the high sounding, high-falutin speeches of the Prime Minister and the former minister of external affairs turned out to be hollow and empty. It came as a shock and disappointment to me as a nouveau member of this Chamber, but what comes as even more of a shock to me is the repetition of the same kind of transparent statements taking place regarding the defence of human rights while at the same time acting differently as government. The same parallels exist: statements about actions on this way but actions taking place in reality in an another way.

I relate this whole debate to the question of our sitting at the table with the nations of Mexico and the United States. The issues of human rights, labour rights and environmental rights relative to the free trade discussions among the United States, Mexico and Canada were raised in the U.S. Congress and the U.S. Senate.

Last May I had the opportunity of appearing before a budget task force committee outlining my party's concern about the human rights aspects as well as the economic aspects.

President Bush was so concerned about the opposition in Congress and in the United States Senate that he was forced to set up a parallel study in the United States relative to the environmental issues, the labour issues and the human rights issues.

If this government is to be believed to be sincere, how can it sit at the table with the Government of Mexico, knowing in advance the catalogue of violence, torture and frankly murders that taken place in Mexico, catalogued by Amnesty International, and at the same time make pious statements about human rights relative to economic matters?

I want to refer to a recent column in The Winnipeg Free Press. It is not known as a social democratic organ or outlet. I want to quote just the first few paragraphs of a column written by Frances Russell. She says:

> Like most giant corporations the Ford Motor Company has moved to the maquiladoras, the Mexican free trade zone along the U.S. border.
> In 1987, the employees at Ford's Cuatilan plant earned $2.35 an hour, a generous salary compared to the average maquiladora manufacturing wage of 98 cents an hour.
> Suddenly, Ford shut down the plant, laying off all of its employees.
> Three months later, the company's doors reopened, but this time, the employees were offered only $8 a day. Their benefits and vacations were cut in half.

Workers demonstrated, which is their right in any civilized country. The consequence of that demonstration was that a blood bath followed. She continues:

> Thugs attached to the Mexico's government labour organization, the CTM, stormed the plant, killing one person, shooting nine more and sending an additional 40 to hospital.
> Subsequently, Ford president Harold Polling denied all knowledge of the incident to the United Auto Workers.

There is a catalogue outside Amnesty International of over 80 trade union activists who were murdered or who disappeared in Mexico over the last 36 months. We should contrast that statement to the response to the questions made by the then Minister for International Trade, now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in front of a committee just last year. Last October the Minister for International Affairs assured the external affairs and international trade committee that when it came to the North American free trade agreement "Canada is always prepared to take a high moral plane". The plane left the ground without any facts. The high moral plane is ignoring the violation of labour rights, human rights and, as a matter of fact, organized thuggery under the approval of the Government of Mexico. Again I say it is documented.

• (1040)

Why is Canada at the table with the Prime Minister of this country making such statements as: "Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of freedom". It is a very bad taste in the mouth to have to repeat these words in light of what is going on in Mexico.

With deep disappointment I have to refer to the divisions inside the Liberal Party regarding this matter. I hate to bring this up again, but since the loss of the previous leader of the Liberal Party the Liberal Party is now back on the fence on this very important issue.

I quote from the October 16, 1991 issue of The Globe and Mail or The Globe and Flail as it is commonly known, where the hon. member for Willowdale, the Liberal industrial critic, said: "Canada needs to be involved in continental trade negotiations to protect our national interests. By participating Canada can renegotiate the Canada–U.S. pact". What a pile of nonsense. The fact is that this House, regardless of party, should stand and say that Canada as a nation will not sit at the table to negotiate a brand new trade agreement with one of the major violators of human rights.

How can the Canadian government and the Official Opposition suggest that these talks go on while violation after violation after violation of human rights is catalogued in Mexico? I quote the Prime Minister again: "Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of freedom".

I want to continue to quote the former minister of trade: "We should support the trade union organizations and shorter working hours". That is not what is happening in Mexico, and he was referring to Mexico. He said: "Workmen's compensation and all these things we have here in Canada, we want to see elsewhere. But I do not think unilaterally we can impose them on Mexico. Those are domestic matters for them to decide".

What position are we dealing with here? The Prime Minister lecturing other countries on human rights or the former minister of trade saying that we will not interfere in the internal matters of another country, particularly when those matters are so devastating to human beings and labour organizations.

You cannot have it both ways, regardless of the interpretation of the motivations of the Prime Minister. Should he indeed be seeking another job? The polls advise that would be the best and most prudent advice he could take. Nonetheless, one cannot have the idea of saying one thing about human rights here to promote one agenda, while at the same time another minister is saying: "We will not interfere with the internal matters of another country".

If I could say the word "hypocrisy", I would say it. But I know it is not parliamentary so I will not say it. Should it come from my mouth, I would withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Having said that, I want to say that this place is being measured by Canadians from coast to coast. It is being measured on the basis of seeing whether or not we really mean what we say in this Chamber, or as each week slips by do we say one thing and then something else? This conflicting statement between the minister and the Prime Minister is obvious.

The motto of this government is: "If we are going to give you money, we will tell you that you must behave yourself. But if we are going to make money out of you, we do not care what the hell you do". That is the blunt double standard that exists and I for one do not want any part of that. I beg the Liberal Party to end its confusion about this matter.

My last comment is: when I asked in committee that the all-party committee travel to Mexico to verify these matters as they were presented to the committee, with the support of the Liberal member from Winnipeg, that request was turned down by the committee. No one from the parliamentary committee has stepped a foot in Mexico to report back to this House about what is going on there before we continue these negotiations, no one. Blindly the committee was kept here in a cubby-hole downstairs, a comfortable cubby-hole nonetheless, with no access whatsoever to talk to Mexicans in the trade union movement or Mexicans in the religious community about what is really going on. The agenda is dictated by money, money, money.

That is not morality. That is the word that I cannot use and I will not use it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate the member from Burnaby for having the initiative to advance this debate on the floor of the House of Commons today. This very debate took place in my riding last Saturday morning. It started at 7.30 at the Albion restaurant on Queen Street. We never ended it, so I am happy that we are continuing it here today.

I do have a very specific question for the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. About three years ago I had the opportunity of spending a couple of weeks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. This is a country where human rights violations are quite public and quite dramatic. Hands are cut off and heads are cut off in a public forum when people are caught. Whether it is stealing or molesting women, one knows of the severe examples in Saudi Arabia. This was pretty shocking to me. I did not think that this kind of thing continued today. At the same time I discovered that through Bell Canada over the previous 10 years we basically set up its entire telephone network system. There were close to 40,000 Canadian jobs involved in putting this telephone infrastructure in place. Billions and billions of dollars went into manufacturing in every part of this country.

I am not supporting human rights violations but I want to be quite specific in my question. Do I understand the member correctly? Is he saying that that contract should have just been refused or turned down? If so, I would like to include that we just finished going through a Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto where our premier basically opened the Saudi Arabia exhibit and encouraged further trade ties to this same country where there is human rights oppression. I just need a bit of assistance on how dramatic he is proposing we should be.

Mr. Barrett: I have always been impressed with that member's thoughtful and profound observations and questions. It is a very serious problem. Of course we need to expand our trade and a high moral plane is a desirable goal. We have to face reality on the basis of issue by issue. However, I would like to point out that obvious violations demand action by a government.

Let me give some historical examples. During 1940, before the United States came into direct conflict with Nazi Germany and our Commonwealth was struggling to maintain its freedom, behind the united effort of all political parties in the Commonwealth it was discovered that the Texaco Oil Company was selling airplane fuel, high octane fuel through Spain to Nazi Germany. There was an international outcry and the United States government under then President Roosevelt tried to take an initiative to stop those sales, but the overwhelming sense was business as usual.

On reflection, had a moral stand been taken against that kind of activity in 1940, the Luftwaffe would have been handicapped earlier than the devastation of the Battle of Britain. These are documented facts.

What do you do? You make a decision on morality. What we are calling for in this imperfect world is an attempt to review every single one of these deals and potential deals on the basis of some sense of morality. We are not perfect human beings.

In the early 1970s I was confronted with a similar situation in trade with South Africa. As a government in British Columbia we unilaterally cancelled all importation of liquor products and wine in the B.C. liquor stores and made that our statement in any other contract with South Africa.

It cost us a tax politically and it cost us a tax financially, but we made that decision on a moral ground. On the same basis I am asking that as human beings we sit down with industry, with the Canadian people and ask: Is the high price for this deal in terms of moral standards greater than the economic benefits?

I do not know. I do not have a formula, but when I am given obvious information such as what exists in Mexico, it seems to me that there is no economic benefit from us backing away from the table and saying: Look, we will sit at the table with you when you clean up your act. Even the President of the United States has been forced to set up parallel investigations in response to Congress and the Senate.

This Chamber in a sense is no different from the Congress and the Senate in dealing with these moral problems. What frightens me and frankly angers me, with no evil intent implied to other human beings, is that we cannot even get it straight from the government of the day where it stands.

On the one hand the Prime Minister lectures countries in Africa and on the other hand the former trade minister says: "We will not interfere". That is puzzling. It is not fair. It is not right. It is not decent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise to take part in this debate because it is a very serious one as the member for Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out.

It is serious first of all because victims of human rights abuses around the world want us to have a consistent policy that is sensitive to their needs. Their hope depends on it. Their lives depend on it. They are looking to Canada to have a consistent foreign policy, aid policy and human rights policy that will continue their hope.

Second, Canada's reputation is on the line on this issue. Over the years, regardless of which government was in office, Canada has established a reputation for being concerned about human rights issues around the world. Therefore this is a very serious motion.

I note with particular interest that the Prime Minister who has now generated this debate by his statements did not make his statement about human rights abuses here in Ottawa, in the House of Commons or in the parliamentary press gallery. He said it in the presence of the leaders of the world, where we are concerned about human rights issues.

I notice that the member for Burnaby said that the Prime Minister is a recent convert to human rights issues. This gadfly from Burnaby, who has taken a new interest in this subject since he has been appointed to this position, has had a very convenient lapse of memory.

The Prime Minister raised human rights issues seven years ago when he was in Korea where there is a right wing regime. He has gone to what would be called left wing regimes and raised human rights issues there. I want this member to know that the Prime Minister has been consistent wherever he has gone in raising human rights issues, regardless of the kind of regime that was in office. He is not a recent convert. He has done it consistently. It was the Prime Minister's initiative that raised the whole matter of embargoes on South Africa.

It is just not true, as the member for Burnaby has said, that the Prime Minister is a recent convert and has suddenly discovered the issue of human rights. If we want to do justice to this debate the first thing we have to do is be honest, accurate, factual and non-partisan if he is really interested in it. While the motion is a very serious one, I am not too sure that it can be taken seriously because of the way it has been put.

The member for Burnaby has conveniently referred to one excerpt of the Winegard report of 1987 regarding Canada's foreign aid policy. I happened to sit on that committee, as did his colleague from Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands, the former member Jim Manly. Now I notice with particular interest that in chapter 3, entitled Linking Aid and Human Rights, the committee recommends that verifiable reports of violations, not ideology or strategic interest, be the basis for unfavourable assessments of human rights observance.

With that in mind let us turn to the motion which the member has put forward. He says in part:

> —in the light of documented violations of human rights in countries such as Mexico, China, Zaire, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya and others which currently receive Canadian financial support, that this House urge the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico free trade negotiations—

We know that New Democratic Party members are opposed to the North American free trade agreement. They were opposed to the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement. That is an ideological position that they have taken. They are entitled to it, but why is it that they have taken an ideological position on free trade with Mexico? Why do they now want to inject human rights issues into that area?

I noticed with particular interest the good question put forward by my friend from Broadview—Greenwood regarding trade with Saudi Arabia. But the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca never did answer his question. The question very simply put is: Should Bell Canada install a telephone system in Saudi Arabia, a regime which is guilty of human rights abuses according to Canadian standards? It is a very simple question. Should the premier of Ontario open the Saudi Arabian pavilion at the Canadian National Exhibition?

After agreeing that there are human rights issues in that country, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca again took the high road in saying: "the Nazi regime in Germany, pre-war and during the war, got fuel from Texaco". Somehow there was a little bit of a non sequitur there, a little bit of a lapse. He never did come around to answering whether or not the premier of Ontario, of the same party of the member who put the motion forward, should have opened the Saudi Arabian pavilion at the CNE.

It is well and good to take a gadfly approach to human rights in aid and trade but surely we cannot afford to do that. Why should we, according to this motion, list the human rights abuses in Mexico, China, Zaire, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya and others and because of human rights abuses in Zaire cut off NAFTA? It seems to me that there is an ideological position which they have taken and now they want to superimpose human rights issues on that ideological position.

The second problem I have with the motion is that it is very erratic. New Democratic Party members want to take the high road on this issue, but they are very selective in their concern about human rights issues.

I was in Nicaragua some years ago leading a parliamentary delegation with the Interparliamentary Union. The member for Trinity—Spadina was with us and General Ortega was in command at the time in Nicaragua. He thought he had come to a kind of socialist heaven. I recognize that the Somoza regime had filled the penitentiary behind the hotel where we stayed with political prisoners. It was an oppressive regime.

• (1100)

But when General Ortega came in and took over he emptied that prison and simply refilled it with political prisoners of his choosing, people that he felt should be in prison. When mothers of missing persons wanted to take part in a parade, they were prevented from taking part because that would highlight the human rights abuses in Nicaragua. But all the time that those human rights abuses were taking place in Nicaragua, members of the New Democratic Party and the former member for New Westminster, Pauline Jewett, kept saying that we had to increase aid. The member for Trinity—Spadina kept saying that we had to increase aid to Nicaragua. The former member for New Westminster kept asking why Canada did not open an embassy in Nicaragua to show good faith in the people of Nicaragua, to strengthen the administration and give them hope.

It strikes me that the members of that party have been strangely silent about the needs of the Nicaraguan people ever since there has been an election in that country.

If the member for Burnaby had included in his reference to the Winegard report the statement that verifiable reports of violations, not ideology or strategic interest, be the basis for unfavourable assessment of human rights observers, I think the motion would have been a little bit more believable.

We always need, in all of our programs, the opportunities for direct scrutiny to make sure that our motives, our operations and our principles are always square. We need that.

In that spirit I welcome the debate because Canada does have to re-evaluate its position. But I am surprised that when the member put forward the motion and made his speech and the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca talked about all the discrepancies that he saw they did not take time to notice the response of CIDA to the Winegard report that the member for Burnaby—Kingsway made. They never mentioned it.

In the introduction of that report we read that the government intends to ensure among other things that Canadian development assistance does not lend legitimacy to repressive regimes, that victims of human rights violations are not doubly penalized by being deprived of needed help in addition to being deprived of their fundamental rights, that there be a constructive approach to human rights rather than a punitive one, and that development assistance appropriately targeted can contribute substantially to the cause of both development and human rights.

In short those are some of the items that CIDA has responded to in that report. It goes on to say that when countries show progress toward a marked improvement in their respect for human rights, Canada will reflect this progress in its decisions about funding.

I could go on. There are several pages to the response by CIDA to this report, but suffice it to say that when it comes to overseas assistance, development assistance and human rights assistance, Canada cannot afford a gadfly approach. We need a systematic, studied, co-operative approach with other countries of like mind to make sure that our policies support our goals of human rights, not the repressive regimes but the people who need support.

I want to indicate some of the things Canada has done in working toward a human rights approach in a systematic way.

First of all, let me point out that we have to look at opportunities wherever they are and that no situation is hopeless. Canada must identify the prospects which best offer hope for change. We have to look for those opportunities. They are not necessarily what we read in the newspapers. Through all our contacts, through NGOs, through our embassies and through our consular officials we must look for those kinds of opportunities.

The Canadian practice is this: to speak out against abuses in an appropriate way and in an appropriate setting so that our message does not create the opposite effect from that sought and that we may avoid the ending impression of self-righteousness. No one's record is impeccable when it comes to human rights.

I see the member from Comox taking notes. I want to remind him of something he certainly does not remember because he was not there at the time: there was a day when Mennonites were excluded from Canada by law, prohibited from entry into Canada. It so happens that in today's world Mennonites are held in high esteem when it comes to monitoring human rights and development assistance. Between the years 1919 and 1922 by law of the Government of Canada Mennonites were prohibited from entering into Canada.

Canada's history is not impeccable. We have not always been right and we have to avoid any kind of self-righteousness on this cause.

Second, we must focus on the real problems of implementing human right's standards and strengthening the multilateral network of instruments and technical assistance. I say this in juxtaposition to a gadfly approach. It is easy enough to get up in the House of Commons and enumerate—God knows there are plenty of opportunities—human rights abuses all around the world, all too many of them. If we are going to be a responsible administration, we have to work in a multilateral network of instruments and technical assistance and work together with other countries to make sure that we have a consistent policy.

Third, we have to co-operate for pragmatic changes. In discussions with new democracies we stress that we want to work with them as allies and partners to improve the situation in their region and to sustain reforms in their countries.

Fourth, we want to make sure that we have a long-term perspective. Human rights are partly a question of attitudes and changing attitudes takes time. Although sometimes changes can be spectacular, for example in South Africa and in eastern Europe, on a long-term basis we are progressing stage by stage.

Tailoring an appropriate Canadian policy response is the most difficult and sensitive part of human rights as a foreign policy issue. What we are seeking to do, in essence, is to take the policy instruments at our disposal and apply them in our relations with other states in such a way as to encourage or induce them into implementing internationally agreed standards of human rights.

The President of Mexico spoke in this Chamber not too long ago. I ask members to reflect on that speech. I ask them to ask themselves this question: Would it help the downtrodden, the poorest of the poor in Mexico, in Indonesia or in Saudi Arabia to quarantine Canada from every country in the world where there has been some human rights abuses? Should we quarantine and isolate Canada from the rest of the Third World, whether it be Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua or Zaire? Should we isolate ourselves totally until they meet our total criteria of human rights righteousness?

Again the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca never did come to grips with the reality that exists in the world, that there is no such thing as a perfect world. We have to live in concert with other nations.

I would like the members of that party to explain to the House how they reconcile their desire on the one hand to have harmonious international relations with all countries of the world, a kind of world of détente and peace, and at the same time isolate ourselves from that world. How do you bring together those two clashing concepts? They have never reconciled that. On the one hand they want us to trade, to get along with everyone and to give development assistance to everyone. On the other hand they want us to isolate ourselves from everyone.

There are objectives that Canada has developed over the years, regardless of what government was in office, that we have to maintain. Throughout the course of this debate members from this side—the member for Halifax West, the member for Edmonton Northwest, the member for Kitchener, the member for Louis-Hébert and the member for Don Valley West—are going to take separate entities of this motion and are going to deal with them fully.

I hope that this party will begin to try to reconcile where it really stands on human rights issues, whether it wants to see Canada isolated from the rest of the world or it wants Canada to participate and share with the rest of the world some of the ideals that are part and parcel of our heritage.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I first want to raise a point. It might be considered in some quarters as picayune but in fact the hon. member for Comox—Alberni was not taking notes today. He is returning from a massive victory in Saskatchewan. That of course was not a fabrication but it did resemble some of the elements of the speech that I think I would like to deal with in my comments.

The comments about Nicaragua I feel are grossly unfair. Nicaragua is involved in an enormous war, bankrolled, organized and executed by the United States, the Prime Minister's good ally. In the situation where we became involved in a war in Iraq, the member is surprised that there were actions taken in Nicaragua to deal with Contras who were at war with the government in Nicaragua and killing peasants and whatnot.

When we became involved in a war in Iraq, which the government supported, CSIS was around visiting Arab Canadians, intimidating them. It was a very questionable kind of activity. It comes very close to home when times of tensions go up.

Second, the Government of Canada helped the United States basically starve the regime in Nicaragua. It has to be remembered in the final analysis that in Nicaragua the government democratically changed. When Violeta Chamorro was elected there was no question of the government in a fair and democratic election standing down while the next government took it. The end of the Contra war certainly changed the circumstances in Nicaragua. This government did have a hand in starving that regime out of existence with the United States.

Another point I would like the member to address if he has a minute is our bilateral aid to El Salvador. Seventy thousand people died in probably one of the most repressive regimes that North America has seen in many years. I would recall to his memory the murder of the American church women, the murder of the U.S. land reform workers, the murder of many democratic political leaders such as Hector Oqueli and Mario Zamora, the murder of the Jesuit administrators of the University of Central America. It went on and on and on.

Because the United States insisted on bankrolling that filthy little regime with an abysmal record of human rights, this government and indeed the previous government under Pierre Elliott Trudeau also insisted on bankrolling it through bilateral aid. It dignified that regime because Canada felt that it was worthy of providing bilateral aid. It was an eyesore and a tremendous embarrassment to forward thinking people in this country.

Maybe on the question of Mexico we can prevent some of those if we in fact take a stand now that we will not go to the table with a regime whose human rights record is not in any way acceptable in this country. Rather than ripping the resolution apart, the hon. member might find some common cause with people on this side of the House.

I am sure the Liberal Party will support this motion that human rights are a priority. We agree with what the Prime Minister said. Possibly, the member for Surrey—White Rock might be able to find that it is time that Canada did take a stand. Let us put El Salvador behind us. Let us put some of the other gross abuses behind us also. We have a chance to really influence this one, to influence the United States to join common cause with us to change the human rights record of the regime in Mexico and encourage it to emulate the kinds of things that are happening here and in the United States.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer several of these questions. There are a number of questions in this.

First of all, the fact that the United States bankrolled the demise of the Contras to bring about the end of the Ortega regime may well be true. I have no sympathy or truck with the kinds of regimes that are oppressive, whether they be right or left wing. If the truth were known, I think that when the war was over some of the Contras probably sold some of their weapons to the guerrillas operating in El Salvador. There was no moral compass guiding these people. Nobody would defend that. Does that somehow justify the oppression brought in by Ortega that had nothing to do with the United States, like the filling of the prison.

It was painfully evident in Nicaragua that the regime was maintained through the barrel of a gun. Every block had its committee for the defence of the revolution. It was a systematic, oppressive regime. In spite of that, Canada maintained aid to Nicaragua all during those years. That is where our foreign policy differed very much from that of the United States. We continued aid to Nicaragua during those years.

I was with the member for Spadina when we toured some of those projects in Nicaragua and I am sure he remembers that very well. Canada's aid continued during those days. That does not justify what General Ortega did.

Second, the member says that during the gulf war, CSIS "intimidated Arab Canadians". I take some exception to that. That is not true. That is not accurate. Canadians were asked to answer voluntarily any questions that CSIS would put to them. They were not intimidated.

If this member has evidence to the contrary, I would like him to stand in his place and give evidence to the fact that CSIS intimidated Arab Canadians. If this debate is going to have any value at all, it has to be accurate. It is unworthy of this member to make accusations like that without any kind of verification.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. There was a very interesting, detailed program on CBC, the Images program the other night. The transcript of that would be very useful to the member, in which there is documented evidence and direct testimony of people who were harassed and with whom that operation of voluntary access was not an acceptable process. There is a very good transcript of that and I refer the hon. member to it.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I really would not say that a program on the CBC qualifies as direct evidence on something like this. I would invite him to bring it to committee, to raise it there and do it in a proper way.

I know that the member has been in El Salvador. He talks about the El Salvadoran regime. I had a constituent who maintained he saw the member in the Camino Royal Hotel in San Salvador meeting with guerrilla leaders. I know he has been there and has visited that regime. There again it bothers me that some of this debate gets ideological rather than fixing squarely on human rights.

With regard to Mexico I have a question to ask him. We have a deplorable gap between the rich and the poor in Mexico. All of us agree. We know that is true. Mexico now has an opportunity to move into at least the industrial age if not the information age. It can do that through NAFTA. I will concede that there are very likely some very bad abuses like the ones the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca mentioned. There could be those. We have an opportunity to help the working class, the working poor in Mexico to rise from the position they are in now. Does he want to forgo that opportunity and keep them in Third World status?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments have now expired.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have one more correction to the hon. member's speech. At no time did I meet with a guerrilla leader. He might be thinking of the right hon. member for Yellowhead with whom I met in the Camino Royal Hotel.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to participate in debate on the motion that was presented by the opposition today.

My colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway has spoken to the motion. I would like to say that at the conclusion of my remarks today I would like to present an amendment to the motion on the floor today.

I would like to begin my remarks by saying that if the Prime Minister goes beyond the rhetoric of his words to actually substantive changes in our foreign policies with regard to the linking of human rights to aid, I know that many people in this country will be delighted and would thank him for the new directions that he is proposing.

It is not as if the government has not proposed a strict linkage of human rights to aid in the past. Unfortunately that linkage has not been seen. In fact, if the Prime Minister does not follow through his rhetoric with substantive changes to our policies then he will be subject to the charge of hypocrisy.

I would like to start by just reiterating what exactly it is that the Prime Minister has said. I quote from a newspaper article of last week where he says: "If you are asking me if Canada will shy away from tying its aid policies, we will not shy away at all". He goes on to say that human rights form a very important component of foreign policy for Canada. If that is so, then human rights in relation to foreign policy go beyond just aid and must also include trade and immigration issues.

He goes on to say that if we go to a specific policy of linking aid to human rights there is a risk of being accused of a colonial mentality dictating morality. Nonetheless, more and more Canadians are preoccupied by human rights in aid recipient countries. I believe that he is right in saying that, and I would support that as an issue. Human rights is a serious concern to many, many Canadians.

The motion before us today, however, refers in one instance specifically to the fact that the NDP is urging the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada–United States–Mexico free trade negotiations. Certainly the case of Mexico, I would say, is not clear. I think it is a difficult issue for us to address with regard to its human rights record. As well I would say that the human rights issues with regard to Mexico are not the only difficulties we encounter in the trilateral trade talks that are now taking place.

However, Amnesty International has outlined in its recent report which it published on September 18 very gross human rights abuses that have taken place in Mexico. It details those abuses very specifically saying, and I quote: "Torture is reported almost daily in Mexico and despite the seriousness of the problem the Mexican authorities are doing little to put an effective stop to torture and ill treatment", the world–wide human rights organization said.

Yet we have to contrast that with a fact that I have taken from an article in a Mexico City newspaper dated September 19 which states: "Mexico's attorney general announced Wednesday his office would thoroughly investigate each allegation of torture in an extremely critical report released this week by Amnesty International. Attorney General Morales admitted that torture was still a problem in Mexico but said it was not condoned and was no longer widespread. Amnesty International will say that that is not so, but on the other hand Morales' acceptance of the Amnesty report represented a break from the recent past".

There are some indications that Mexico is indeed trying to deal with its human rights abuse issues. To corroborate that there was an article in The Gazette of October 20 which speaks to the case of a Norma Corona Sapien in Mexico, a Mexican woman who was murdered in May 1990. She was a human rights activist. She was apparently murdered by government security forces. The article outlines the fact that in Mexico they have now arrested a Gonzales Traveno.

We admit that it took an awfully long time for the Mexican authorities to get around to arresting anybody in this case, but I think it is important to acknowledge that they have pursued the case and have said that they will continue to pursue human rights abuse cases. Certainly this man who has been arrested is a high profile person in the security forces. The linkage there is very serious, one that we cannot underestimate and must watch. I would say that it is extremely important to look at that linkage, but we also must be very aware of improvements when they do take place and press constantly for greater improvements.

We are concerned about not only tying human rights issues to aid but also to trade. In today's newspapers there is one comment that I think bears recognition. A Toronto Star editorial today said: "While Mulroney's message deserves support, his methods also deserve close scrutiny. Will Canada throw its weight around when it has nothing to lose, such as with Haiti's enfeebled economy? What about the substantial aid allocated to Asian countries with dynamic economies such as China and Indonesia, which are known human rights abusers but hold the promise of profitable trade links? Moreover, will human rights abuses serve as a convenient excuse for continuing cutbacks in Canada's foreign aid budget, or will aid cancelled for human rights abuses be rechannelled to more deserving recipients?"

The latter suggestion is certainly what I would support, but I think that editorial expresses a lot of the concerns that we would have over what the Prime Minister is saying and what we will watch with regard to his own statements but more particularly his government's policies over the coming days, weeks and months.

Yesterday in the House of Commons the Prime Minister was questioned about his appearance last week before the Commonwealth Conference, linking human rights issues to aid and the importance of doing so. He was also questioned about giving a $1 billion line of credit the previous week to Iran, the worst human rights abuser in the world. Yesterday he defended his government's policy, saying there is a big difference between linking human rights to foreign aid and tying it to business deals.

In light of his having said that, I would ask why this government pursued so well its policies with regard to South Africa, which indeed did have an impact, and why did we cut back for an interim period, and I question very much having stopped this, our trade and assistance policies to China after the massacre we all witnessed in Tiananmen Square.

Surely this government does recognize that more than aid can be impacted by human rights consideration and that human rights considerations with regard to trade are very important and cannot be neglected.

Before in this debate today we have referred to the Winegard report, a report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade that was presented in May 1987 in which it was stated as one of the recommendations that human rights criteria must be developed coherently as part of over-all Canadian foreign policy and that these be applied in a universal, consistent and transparent manner.

My colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway quoted a report put out yesterday by, among others, the Canadian Council of Churches. I found his comments with regard to that report a little bit off topic. In fact the Canadian Council of Churches has had some very relevant things to say about Canadian policy, viz-à-viz human rights. They were a witness before the standing committee in 1987 and this is one of their comments at that time. I quote:

> An attempt should be made to channel all existing and new aid projects through a policy filter to determine whether they contribute positively to the observance of human rights, or whether instead they foster human rights violations.

In response to the Winegard report, the government did put out its own foreign aid policy paper called Sharing our Future. In that policy paper, the government very specifically makes reference to human rights considerations and states:

> In countries where violations of human rights are systematic, gross and continuous, and where it cannot be ensured that Canadian assistance reaches the people for whom it is intended, government-to-government bilateral aid will be reduced or denied.

I think the report that came out yesterday criticizing the aid policies of CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency, looked at some very specific issues. Basically it was put out because there are so many people who feel that CIDA has failed to live up to its policy statements and are urging it to get back on track or update their policy statement and improve it. To that end because it was felt by members in this House that in the instance of human rights and its linkages to our aid policies, our government was not pursuing its stated policy, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of the Disabled last year looked at human rights issues and put out a report entitled Human Rights Considerations and Coherence in Canada's Foreign Policies. Once again I can quote the Canadian Council of Churches which came before that committee as a witness. It said at that time, and this relates beyond the aid issue to that of trade:

> The use of economic pressure to advance respect for human rights requires careful assessment of the specific circumstances of particular country situations in the light of human rights standards and of the likelihood that economic sanctions will be effective in either persuading or empowering a particular government to respect the rights of its people.
> Our experience is that in situations where torture and disappearances are commonplace, even the most enlightened investor can be drawn into situations where the enterprise undermines the rights of victims or may even strengthen the capacity of the violator regime to maintain its grip on the country. In situations where human rights violations are extreme, it is essential that government lend neither active nor passive support to private sector economic activity. The government needs to withhold the use of public funds in support of trade with such regimes.

To that end, and how the government does not come up to the mark with regard to that statement, we can look at what we did in relation to Myanmar or Burma, as it was called. My colleague for Winnipeg North Centre raised the issue several times in this House last year, questioning why this government continued to permit Petro-Canada to be involved in a $22 million oil drilling contract in Myanmar. When we questioned the government on this, we quoted the Petro-Canada chairman, Mr. Bill Hopper, who appeared before the House of Commons committee in 1986. He said: "The controlling interest is clearly with the shareholder," in this case being the Government of Canada, "and she can order me to do what the government wishes me to do by Order in Council any time she wishes."

So it was a government decision to suggest that the human rights abuses which are very gross in Myanmar or Burma were not a consideration in providing continual economic assistance from not just the government but private enterprise here in Canada as well. It is a serious problem that must be addressed.

There are many examples where Canada has not lived up to the rhetoric of the Prime Minister's words of last weekend and my colleague has outlined some of these cases. Kenya is a country that will not permit multi-party democracy at this time and the opposition that is there is oppressed and persecuted. In that country our contribution in government-to-government assistance disbursements rose from $27 billion in 1987 to $127 billion in 1989-90. Zaire has received additional funds. Government-to-government assistance has gone on and has been implemented in the last few years with such human rights abusing countries as Guatemala and El Salvador. Rwanda was mentioned. The list goes on and on. As well, we have the Guyanan situation.

I would like to just quote a concern that has been expressed by a Guyanan source. It stated: "Without wishing to overstate the case, the unequivocal stand in favour of democracy which characterized Canadian policy over the years seems to have given way to a more ambiguous public posture which may relate to the overriding commitment by Canada to the success of a structural adjustment program in the construction of which it has played such a critical role. Canada's concerns for democracy and human rights should be manifest in its development program."

We have lots of examples of where Canada has definitely not shown a concern about human rights, neither in relation to its aid policies nor its trade policies and I would also say its immigration policies. The Amnesty International report of 1991 certainly outlines many of the facts of that issue.

Canada's aid record must be improved in terms of human rights considerations. Its trade policies must be reviewed as well and to that end, Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to put an amendment to the motion. I would like to take the motion as it is written and delete—well, perhaps I should read the motion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure the Table has a copy so if the hon. member would like to—

Mrs. Stewart: Should I read the motion as I would amend it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, please.

Mrs. Stewart: It is as follows:

That this House take note of the Prime Minister's recently stated commitment to the principle of linking government aid to respect for human rights and, in light of documented violations of human rights in countries such as Mexico, China, Zaire, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya, and others, which currently receive Canadian financial support, that this House review immediately all international support programs to ensure that they meet the aid criteria as announced by the Prime Minister and that the government implement procedures which will guarantee coherency, transparency, and accountability in relation to human rights considerations and all Canadian foreign affairs policies, including aid, trade, and immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I have a copy? While I am looking at it again there will be questions or comments. The hon. member for Halifax West.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to comment on the presentation by the hon. member that she was prepared to recognize the need for balance in determining what human rights situations might indicate a need to withdraw or modify assistance. What I would like to present to her is the fact that in the previous debate members of the New Democratic Party in an exchange commented on trade relationships and the indication was that if there was any violation of human rights within a country with which Canada or Canadians traded that trade should be immediately stopped until those human rights violations are terminated.

What this would contemplate is a whole lot of rule-making on how Canadian businesses conduct their affairs internationally. It would involve parliamentary intervention, governmental intervention, and so on.

I thought that the member was striking a much greater balance in terms of adjudicating these situations. I wonder if she might comment on that and indicate whether she and the Liberal Party are in favour of a myriad of regulations of Canadian activity internationally in order to link that kind of trading activity to human rights violations in the recipient country.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly respond to that question.

I think that the issue of transparency in our government's foreign policy decisions in relation to both aid and trade is the important concern. Transparency and accountability are mentioned in my amendment to this motion because there has to be balance. It is not a black and white situation. I think that we have to look openly and publicly in this country at the human rights records of all of the countries with which we deal and there are ways that through trade, even though a country is a human rights abuser, we can encourage them to refrain from their human rights abuses.

I think, however, that it is through public debate on these issues that we can come to a consensus as to just what the correct balance is in relation to our policies where we link human rights to not just aid but trade and immigration issues.

So many people across Canada are very concerned about human rights abuses, not just at home but particularly internationally where the abuses are so gross and extreme. They have been calling for many years for more transparency with regard to how the government makes its decisions. Right now these decisions are made in cabinet. Not all government members understand how these decisions are arrived at. Certainly many of the decisions that are made such as extending the $1 billion line of credit to Iran through the Export Development Corporation two weeks ago affronts many Canadians. When we look at what the Government of Iran is doing, there is not just human rights abuse. That country is spending the majority of its budget on military expenditures this year. I understand it is to the tune of $17 billion. The Government of Iran is building up its military with that money. We have also said that we are in support of arms control, yet we stand by and watch the worst offender continue human rights abuse. Its spends the majority of its budget building up its military and we extend them a $1 billion line of credit.

It flies in the face of the integrity of the Canadian people. It is our tax dollars that are being used. We want to understand why the government could ever make such a decision. Our automatic response is to deplore that kind of decision when we have no understanding of how the decision was made.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, the member made reference to the situation in Iran. I would just like the member to set her mind back a few years to when Canada did terminate diplomatic relations with Iran. The same kind of abuses took place then and the same kind of inappropriate activity in terms of individuals within Iran and in terms of policies within Iran. Canada had no method of dealing or responding in any way to those abuses.

If we terminate all relationships then we have no opportunity at all to exercise any influence over changes in Iran. While I am not commenting on any individual cases, I hope the member appreciates and understands that these are not always finite and can always easily be decided.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, in relation to that, what the member says has to be put into the mix of consideration of how and when to provide assistance. If we contrast the situation of Iran to what our policy was vis-à-vis South Africa and China after Tiananmen Square, one cannot understand the government's position with regard to Iran.

We understand as Canadians that the government presumably has based its decision on the fact that Iran is an oil rich country and perhaps Canada can benefit. We do not want human rights related decisions made on the basis of how a recipient country can influence our well-being. We want to make our decisions on the basis of principle and how we can encourage those countries that are human rights abusers to improve their record.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the member's amendment is quite a surprise. The Mexican free trade deal will probably affect Canada even more significantly than the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement. It promises to devastate the economy of Canada. It points out that Mexico lacks an environmental policy and a social policy including health care. It is rife with political corruption.

My hon. colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca quoted a number of extrajudicial executions and abuses of human rights. There are no fair labour practices in Mexico. It is something that only a right wing administration in this country or the United States would tolerate. Yet the Liberal Party has put forward an amendment that would cut out the most glaring example of something Canada should not be doing in a trade policy. I am absolutely astounded that this member of the Liberal Party and the Liberal caucus would join with the Conservatives on this item and support a trade arrangement with Mexico. I think that amendment removes one of the key focuses of this entire debate.

This debate on human rights started when the Prime Minister, whose government is just rife with contradictions about its human rights policy, went to Africa. He was already aware while in Africa that his name was going to be put forward as a nominee for Secretary-General of the United Nations. I and millions of other Canadians hope that does not happen so that he does not have the opportunity to do to the world literally what he has done to Canada. The hypocrisy is the real serious problem. The hypocrisy of the Liberal Party in removing this Mexican trade agreement is absolutely disgusting.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I do want to respond to what my colleague has just said. What I have omitted specifically from the motion are the words: "urge the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico Free Trade negotiations". This is not to say that we in this party do not hold many of the concerns that were expressed by this member about a trade relationship with Mexico: environment, social considerations, human rights considerations. We also feel that we must be at the table participating in the negotiations just in fact to put forward the very issues that he expresses and try to address those issues.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before the hon. member asks a short question, I have no problem with the amendment.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier when I directed a question to the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I welcome this debate today. I think it really should be a debate where we try to develop some comprehensive ideas.

I am a little bit concerned that we may be perceived as trying to be the lily white country of the world. We in this country have a human rights problem that has to be re-examined. I refer specifically to the way we treat our native people. It was just a year and a bit ago when our human rights activities in this country were being written about in every paper in the world.

First of all it is the old expression that people in glass houses should not throw stones. We have to be very careful that we are not coming across as a country or a nation of hypocrites.

My question for my colleague is: Does she not share the view of most of us in this House that in the process of having this debate today about human rights violations around the world we also want to examine and reflect on human rights concerns within our own nation?

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, certainly it has been expressed here that no nation is perfect in its human rights policies and Canada certainly fits within that category. We have many people in this country who, for example, do not feel that they receive equal treatment in this country.

We still have multicultural problems in this country, minority groups who feel that they do not experience full human rights in this country.

Our aboriginal people have had to go before the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva which is a disgrace to our nation. They felt that they had to go to that forum in order to have their rights considerations heard.

Personally I have a big concern about the poor in this country, particularly children who at this time do not have the advantage of the basic rights of decent housing, clothing and food.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. It is a rare opportunity to look at Canada's record on human rights, foreign aid and international investment.

I would like to begin by quoting the Prime Minister: "Nothing in international relations is more important than respect for individual freedom and human rights". That was in his speech to the members of the Commonwealth just last week. A second quote: "Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of freedom". That was in his speech also at the same Commonwealth conference in the opening session. As I only have 10 minutes I am going to focus today on one country to give our viewers some idea of how what he said in Harare measures with what is actually happening.

I refer first of all to an Amnesty International report that was presented before the United Nations special committee on decolonization on August 7 of this year. This report is on East Timor and I wish to quote passages. Some of them are rather difficult reading.

Talking about East Timor: "It is a pattern of short-term detention, torture and ill treatment of suspected political opponents described in previous reports that has accelerated in the past year. In Amnesty's view it appears to be part of a systemic strategy to silence real or suspected political opponents".

It goes on to say: "Many of those detained have reportedly been tortured or ill treated in custody. The forms of ill treatment and torture alleged include beatings with iron bars, batons, fists and lengths of cable and bamboo; burning with lighted cigarettes; sexual molestation and rape; slashing with razor blades; food deprivation; immersion for long periods in fetid water; death threats and electrocution".

"In view of the clear evidence that suspected political opponents of Indonesian rule in East Timor have been systematically ill treated and tortured while under interrogation, Amnesty International has concluded that the safety of all those detained for questioning, however briefly, by members of the security forces must be considered at risk".

That report should be put next to an article from the Free Press by John Sorenson entitled "Canadian Role in Indonesia Opportunistic".

The history of East Timor is a sorry history. On December 7, 1975 Indonesia invaded that small island and subsequently annexed it. In the last 15 years, hundreds of thousands of Timorees have been slaughtered by Indonesian troops.

At the time of the invasion, Canada was one of the largest foreign investors in Indonesia. As such, Canada at that time under a Liberal government had an opportunity to exert some influence. However it did not. It had an opportunity to halt the genocide in East Timor but Canada did not.

Instead our ambassador at the time advised that Canada recognize the takeover as a fait accompli. This type of response fits with in a recent statement by the current minister of external affairs when she said that Canada considers, in response to a question from my colleague from Trinity—Spadina on September 18, that Indonesian sovereignty over East Timor is a fact, recognizing there has never been any history of independence, self-determination or self-government in that territory.

The ignorance displayed in that response is monumental.

The ambassador at the time also pointed out that if Canada recognized the annexation as a fait accompli, greater benefits to Canada, Canadian companies, and improved trading relations would result. In fact this proved to be astute judgment. The benefits to Canada which resulted from the decision not to criticize the Indonesian government are not as insubstantial and continue to accrue. Currently over 300 Canadian companies do business in Indonesia, which has been seen as an investor's paradise.

The Indonesian government has established this paradise by ignoring civil liberties, banning all unions, keeping the wages of most workers below one U.S. dollar a day, strictly controlling the media and maintaining an extensive security force.

Two-thirds of the population are undernourished and Indonesia's poor make up the cheapest labour force in Asia. A strict anti-subversive law and the activity of police death squads ensure that few protests are in paradise.

Canada has invested over $1 billion in Indonesia, with most of that money going to huge mining and smelting operations run by Inco, but also in manufacturing, oil, gas and financial services.

Since the invasion of East Timor, Canadian aid dollars have continued to flow through Indonesia. Indonesia is the third largest recipient of Canadian foreign aid dollars. This is the largest non-Commonwealth recipient of such assistance. Several Canadian universities have established lucrative, multi-million dollar contracts with CIDA and the Indonesian government to supply technical expertise. Put that record next to the Amnesty International report and we see the kind of thing we are talking about, the hypocrisy of not just this government but previous governments in dealing with this very important issue.

We have options. The New Democrats have options. As an opposition party we believe it is our responsibility not just to criticize bad legislation but to put forth alternatives, and that is where I want to end today. The idea of linking Canadian aid with the monitoring of human rights is not new. In 1987 the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade put forth an excellent report on overseas development assistance entitled "For Whose Benefit". It recommended linking development and human rights and called for a number of recommendations.

The NDP believes human rights and development can best be linked by increasing the quality of Canadian aid. For example, CIDA should increase funding through non-governmental channels. Credible NGOs and international NGOs are better able to direct Canadian funds to meet human priority needs. The most basic human rights are food and shelter. A 1990 UN development report shows Canada gives only 5 cents out of each aid dollar to meet human priority needs like family planning, clean water, primary education and primary health care.

If the Prime Minister is sincere about linking our development assistance to human rights, he must respond to the regret recently expressed by the OECD at the significant decline in Canadian aid and to the UN suggestion that much of this aid is misdirected.

In conclusion, I want to point out the kind of sorry history Canada has had on human rights and foreign aid and investment. It is not a recent occurrence; it is a long-standing occurrence. Consider what one international banker expressed to me when I was in New York on an external affairs trip examining international debt: "We don't care how our bills are paid as long as they are paid. We don't care about human rights abuses as long as our bills are paid". For Canada and for Canadians generally that is not an acceptable approach. We have to link human rights abuses with international aid. I urge the government not to repeat the sorry history of empty rhetoric but to put real substance behind the Prime Minister's statement and to turn around Canada's record on international investment and aid.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my comment and question will be brief so that others can participate in this period.

I would like to compliment the member on the thrust of her speech. I naturally did not agree with all of her criticism of the previous government, not because I was a part of it but because we did have a much more aggressive campaign when it came to linking our aid to human rights. I believe Mr. Trudeau was a lot more aggressive.

I agree with her idea about direct funding to non-governmental organizations, but I have a problem with her motion. When 70 per cent of the manufacturing jobs in this country are linked to countries where there is some kind of human rights violation, is she suggesting that we just cease that relationship completely with those countries?

I ask that question because I used to work with an organization entitled Magna International which makes auto parts. Currently it is doing work in Mexico on behalf of Volkswagen. It has a formula there where the people work on a percentage of the profit. They get their cash but they also get an equity participation formula.

I recently talked to a couple of priests who work in a mission near the plant. They think it is a rather constructive and positive approach to trying to improve the lot of the labourer in Mexico who now in most instances only gets a flat dollar a day for his or her work.

If that experiment, if that relationship were not taking place in Mexico then the social standard of the Mexicans would continue to stay in a non-growth, non-improved position.

I would like to ask the member specifically if she is advocating an absolute cessation of our relationship with these countries where human rights violations exist.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians have to decide whether or not they wish to put human rights before profits. That is the question. I think most Canadians would agree that that is a crucial decision and a decision that I do not think most Canadians would have any difficulty in making.

I think that the government, the Liberal and Progressive Conservative approach is to believe and have confidence in the trickle down theory. As the Amnesty International report has demonstrated, the human rights abuses in East Timor have worsened in the past year. The trickle down theory did not work then and it is not working now.

We have a clear position. Human rights do come before profits.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to speak on this motion. The particular point of the motion, including the particular point that would be removed by the Liberal amendment, is to ask the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada, United States and Mexico free trade negotiations.

Because of the principle of tying aid to human rights which the Prime Minister has announced and which has been discussed in this House and was the subject of a unanimous report in this House, it is proposed that we discontinue negotiating this trade treaty with the United States and Mexico. It goes on to say "review immediately all international support programs" and so on.

The main point of the motion is not to review support programs. That goes on all the time. The Liberal amendment which cuts out the Mexico part says "review". Of course as far as the review part is concerned it is like motherhood. The Liberals always review things and this House reviews things. So there is no problem about saying "review". The question is whether to discontinue locking ourselves into a trade deal with Mexico which would limit Canada's sovereignty in certain important respects to the benefit of the corporations and government in Mexico.

As for the NDP's position on this, I would point out that earlier this year the NDP government in Ontario did withdraw the entry placed by the previous Liberal government in ARMX, the arms bazaar that was to be held earlier this year but was cancelled. The NDP government decided not to participate in that violation of Canada's stated policy of reducing the arms trade.

However, I want to acknowledge that there is no monopoly of human rights violations by any government, party, country, religion or social or political philosophy. Whichever one I belong to, I am involved in some of these human rights violations. I would rather first of all go back to what I think is the root of the problem.

There have been several centuries of conquests, massacres and thefts by the countries of the North Atlantic. Western Europe and North America, primarily western Europe, thus are the inheritors. Because of those centuries and the trade relations which after World War II nominally replaced relations of direct political rule over the colonies of Latin America, Africa, Asia and so on, the North Atlantic community is now economically dependent through its trade empires on the oppressive governments in these countries which we sometimes call the south or contemptuously call the Third World, mostly former European or U.S. colonies with Canada, of course, as a sort of minor partner not directly oppressing but engaging in trade relations based on the oppression.

For example, I regret Canada's participation in reneging on the regulation offered to Chinese students who chose to stay in Canada after the Tiananmen massacre. They were promised in a regulation from this government that they would be facilitated in bringing their spouses to join them in Canada. About 200 who made that application while that regulation was in effect have been denied the very thing that the Canadian government promised them. They are told they may have to wait three years now, three more years after these two years, to bring their spouses here. This, I presume, is because of Canada's interest in selling more telecommunications and other goods to China regardless of the fact that our protests about human rights have not been answered.

My own protests in person when I had the privilege of participating in a delegation a year ago in China were not answered. My letters to the Chinese representatives here have not been answered in any substance. There has been a piece of paper but it did not respond to my questions, and I believe the same is true for all others who tried. Yet, the Canadian government is in such a rush to sell these telecommunications, whether it is to China or Saudi Arabia or to Mexico, without insisting on some performance, perhaps not absolute perfection of course, in the matter of human rights, some openness of trials, some evidence of prosecution of police and other government agents who are found to have participated in this kind of oppression.

If the Ontario government comments on that, I want to know what the Ontario government is saying. I think the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is a reasonable one which should be answered. I think we should not unqualifiably endorse money making trade relations. Seventy per cent of our manufacturing jobs depend on selling to oppressive governments in ways that do not help the people but only increase the power of the oppressive government. I think we can find other things for our people to make because God knows, and I speak advisedly, there is plenty of need among Canadians as consumers if they could get the wages to buy the products that Canadian factories are making. We do not have to sell everything abroad in competition with the United States.

I was embarrassed about six or seven years ago when, following Amnesty International and its information from its London research section, I phoned the High Commissioner of Singapore to complain that a certain member of Parliament of the opposition party had been held for years without charge in prison. I was told it was done according to law. I rashly said: "I think that is a bad law". He said: "That is the law that the British left us".

Now I find when dealing with countries, such as those in Africa that have been mentioned that there is a heritage of oppressive British laws. The law of detention without charge is used in Britain even now against its first and oldest colony, Ireland.

I object strongly to Canada rushing into a treaty with Mexico. This is not just a trade arrangement where we are going to buy this or sell this. This is to be a permanent treaty with a country which has not recovered from the effects of the Spanish Conquest, the intervention of the United States and other western European or North American countries in recent history. It is struggling to be independent but it is still a dictatorship in many serious ways.

In recent years they have been forcing hundreds of thousands of peasants off their land to replace their subsistence agriculture with cash crops. They are exported to the profit of American multinationals and suit the taste of affluent Americans and Canadians. The peasants are crowding into the slums, lowering the wages, notwithstanding the new factories that are built there. Between 5 million and 10 million children under the age of 15 are obliged to work in those factories by poverty to prevent the starvation of themselves and their families.

Trade unionists and over 100 members of the main opposition party have been murdered with impunity. This is the country with which Canada wants to link not just for trade. Canadian workers will be obliged to compete with workers who are not allowed to have free trade unions. Mexican investors will have national rights in Canada to treat Canadians as they treat their fellow Mexican workers. Refugee claimants, including legitimate claimants in Canada, may be contrary to UN law reform through Mexico to the country from which they fled oppression. There is a deal under way in which Canada will seek to use Mexico as the dumping ground for refugee claimants from Latin America under our so-called safe Third World clause.

Therefore, I strongly urge this House to support the motion as originally presented to discontinue our treaty negotiations with Mexico. We must insist that Mexico first of all carry out the promises which are being violated right to this summer, violated by assassinations with impunity. We first of all must demand that they clean up that act before we place our Canadian workers into direct competition with the intimidated workers of Mexico.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very carefully to the comments of the socialist party. I have finally become frustrated because I cannot believe the pious hypocrisy that I am hearing. There is no doubt that there is not a person in this House that would stand up and argue in favour of human rights abuses. That is ridiculous. That is like arguing in favour of war. We are all in favour of peace.

I am going to enlighten the socialist party and let them know that we cannot send Columbus back. Five hundred years ago he came here. That cannot be changed. We cannot judge the actions of 15th century people with 20th century thinking. That is unfair.

• (1220)

I want to know what the policy of the NDP is. I do not want sanctimonious claptrap. I ask three very specific questions: Will the New Democratic Party, if it is the government of this country, sever diplomatic ties with countries that perpetrate human rights abuses? Yes or no. Will it sever all trade links with countries that perpetrate human rights abuses? Yes or no. Will that include refusing to sell wheat harvested in Saskatchewan to China, which we know is a country with human rights abuses? If so, what does the hon. member suggest that the farmers of Saskatchewan grow if they cannot sell wheat to those countries? What are they going to do? Are we going to bar Canadians from travelling to countries with human rights abuses? Because, if so, what are you going to do with your former leader who I am informed enjoyed vacationing in Cuba year after year? Let's not have some hypocrisy, let's have some answers.

Mr. Heap: The hon. member for Scarborough West has painted an extreme picture of blacks and whites, which he and his party of course never deal with. They only deal with vaguely different situations of grey.

Mr. Wappel: Just answer: What are you going to do when you are in government?

Mr. Heap: What I said in my speech, if the hon. member had bothered to listen, was that I do not claim that any party has the monopoly on human rights abuse. All governments, and that includes governments affiliated with my own party, have been participant in them since World War II, the period with which I am a little more familiar than the earlier periods.

In answer to his questions particularly, I would say that we should follow the example of Canada's Conservative and Liberal governments in cases such as South Africa where there is apartheid, a very extreme, explicit and persistent violation of human rights. We should use degrees. We agreed with the committee's report four years ago that there are degrees of violations and degrees should be used in opposition to these violations. I myself was willing to travel to China with the delegation which included a member of the hon. member's caucus and two from the government caucus, in part to find out whether we could get answers on human rights violations. I have written a memo which I circulated and I have said that we did not get answers to those questions.

What I am saying is that I do not disagree with reviewing, as the hon. member's colleague very reasonably asked, our trade relationships and our travel relationships. I have not questioned those. I agree with their party that they should be reviewed. What I am saying is that we are being asked to give up some of Canada's sovereignty in a permanent relationship to a country that has been called by one of the presidential candidates in Peru "the perfect dictatorship". He was not a socialist of any stripe whatsoever; he was a good conservative. He called it the perfect dictatorship.

I am saying that in an extreme case like that we should not necessarily discontinue any and all trade, but we should question some of our trade deals like communications. They only help the government against the people. We should back off from locking ourselves into a permanent treaty with them.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by addressing what I consider to be the pith and substance of the motion that has been presented by the New Democratic Party. By its own declaration it is underlining what is called the clear link between financial aid and human rights. The member for Burnaby—Kingsway made it clear that it was trying to establish this linkage in the course of his presentation.

But what members of the New Democratic Party and perhaps other members neglect is that there is also an equally clear and strong linkage between foreign aid and the relief of poverty and economic oppression. We also have to consider, in terms of economic aid internationally, not only the status of the nation but the status of the people within that nation.

I will not use that word "hypocrisy", but it might be pointed out that there is a contradiction in the position of New Democratic Party members who constantly focus attention on the plight of individuals, particularly those in a state of poverty, that they should throw this out and simply concentrate on the form of government and the administration of that government in those countries and neglect altogether for the purpose of focusing attention on those kinds of generic human rights violations the plight of the people in the country.

I have always said that the whole basis of social programs is the economic ability to carry them out. The real threat to social programs in this country and any other country is a bankrupt national Treasury. If we reviewed all the nations of the world, it would be found that human rights violations on an individual basis are most evident in countries where there is a bankrupt national Treasury, where the assets of the nation are not being particularly applied.

I want to take up the theme introduced by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, in which he referred to the gap between the reality and the rhetoric in relation to international aid and Canada's role in providing assistance to other countries and people in other countries. I believe that the exponents of rhetoric are the members of the New Democratic Party. The purveyors of the reality include the Prime Minister and his government.

Let me take that as the theme of my remarks. If we are going to look for human rights violations across the world, we do not have to look very far. Indeed, as some members have rightly pointed out, we can start with our own country and our treatment of aboriginal people, our own history in the human rights field. We still have a lot of work to do.

Let me hasten to add, if any members of the New Democratic Party are listening, as was said by a civil rights leader in the United States: "I can talk the talk because I walked the walk".

I was involved in Nova Scotia as a legislative draftsman in the formulation of human rights legislation. I was involved as the person who established the legal aid program in Nova Scotia in the direct application of civil rights to individuals in those situations.

When we are talking about the kind of international concerns that exist today, I do not think we really need to look at Canada because all Canadians are the beneficiaries of a very strong human rights tradition, enforced in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Therefore, we are not talking about the kinds of instances which we would regard in Canada as violations of civil and human rights. We are talking about much more serious situations.

Just the other day while reading the national press, I came across reports of two violations which would shock humanity. One came from the Republic of India, the largest unit within the Commonwealth of nations, where the practice of selling women as child brides is widespread.

The case that was pointed up that caused national and international tension was that of a young 10-year old female person who was apprehended on an international flight to Saudi Arabia. That resulted from virtual bride shopping within the rural villages of India and produced the situation in which a 10-year old girl was sold by her father to a resident of Saudi Arabia. That resident was taking the child back when the apprehension took place and has resulted in international concern being focused on this situation. The point is that it was readily admitted by Indian officials that the practice is widespread. They do not know if it can be stopped because it has roots in so-called religious traditions and other ethnic traditions and is not regarded by many people as being particularly wrong.

If we look at Brazil, there are seven million children on the streets of Brazil with no assistance whatsoever and no programs to deal with the problem from the Government of Brazil. Why? It is because the Government of Brazil does not have the economic ability to solve those kinds of problems.

Therefore anybody who would divorce economics of a country from a human rights situation is automatically going to deal in rhetoric and not in reality. I accuse the members of the New Democratic Party of utilizing that mask to create wrong impressions in this House of Commons and with the people of Canada. The rhetoric starts when you try to separate the economy from the status of the people, in terms of human rights.

We have had a long tradition in Canada of trying to keep open doors with other countries and not close off the opportunity to help those nations improve their situations for the benefit of the people.

The Peoples Republic of China is mentioned in the resolution itself and there is a suggestion that we should cut off our relationship. Canada took a proud place in the international community because it was Canada that encouraged and fostered continued relations with the Peoples Republic of China. It was Lester B. Pearson and Prime Minister Trudeau who allowed China to re-enter the international field in the hopes that that would result in improvement for the people of China and for improvement not only in their human rights but in their day-to-day lives.

Whether that has been successful, I will leave it to others to judge. Nobody, as I recall, has heaped criticism on Canada for keeping that door open, for not closing it off because of public square executions that were taking place in China long before Tiananmen Square.

If we tamper with the kind of principle that has developed over the years then we are entering the field of rhetoric and backing away from the realities of the international situation.

Take a little example like Czechoslovakia. I happened to be in Czechoslovakia with a parliamentary delegation at the time the repression was still in force. I was proud to be there because Canada has, over the years, accepted refugees from Czechoslovakia. We have criticized the administration. The member from Toronto was there with me so he remembers all of this.

We gave aid and comfort to the dissidents in Czechoslovakia. We did not say: "Stay away from Czechoslovakia. They are repressing freedoms there". We went to Czechoslovakia. Now we have President Havel, one of those dissidents just a few short years ago, governing the country. While the problems in Czechoslovakia were never like those in Brazil, India or many of the other countries that we mentioned in this debate, they were nonetheless problems of deprivation of human rights. We did not cut off the relationship. We hung in there with the then dissidents of Czechoslovakia. They are governing the country today.

The NDP has no monopoly on human rights concerns. It is the concern of every Canadian. It is a matter of how we interpret or implement those concerns. But it will not work to close off and suggest as they do in this resolution, as the member for Trinity—Spadina has said: "Cut it off right away. Are there human rights violations? Cut off aid and cut off trade". It will not work and I think most members of this House of Commons realize it will not work.

I hope most Canadians also realize that that approach will not work. We say: "What is the NDP up to in this motion? Is it really trying to get at human rights violations? Is it really trying to help the situation in oppressed nations across the world?" It is simply bringing forward a political ploy. I will make the case that I think that it is. This is simply a political ploy.

What the NDP is doing is trying to attack the initiative made by the Prime Minister of Canada before the Commonwealth of Nations. It is trying to say: "This Prime Minister of Canada is not really interested in human rights".

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing the Prime Minister of Canada is interested in that is individual human rights. He has a long record of that. He has said on many occasions: "We are all God's children. We are all entitled to the same treatment under the law in our nations wherever those nations would be".

He has always had that as a guiding light. There is no question where he stands on that. But, if the people of Canada knew that, they might change their attitude a little bit. The NDP wants to get in there and make sure that, notwithstanding the Prime Minister of Canada stood up in the Commonwealth and advocated a new view of human rights within the Commonwealth, the people of Canada will say: "He did not really mean that".

I have to ask you, Mr. Speaker: Why did he bother to go down that road if he really did not mean it? He did not get any real support within the Commonwealth. He knew that. He knew that there were violators of human rights right before him. He knew they were sponsors of one-party policies in the political sense. He knew what was happening, and yet he said that. He said it because he thought it had to be said and, as in the case of South Africa, if he did not say it probably nobody else would.

I want to stress that if that is the purpose of the motion it will not work. Nobody is going to believe that the Prime Minister of Canada is not and will not continue to be an advocate of human rights for Canadians and for peoples of all countries.

A second point that I think they might be getting at is that the old bogey free trade has ruined Canada.

This morning, on our national public broadcasting network, a professor from the University of Regina whose name I wrote down, Gerald Sperling, said that we all know that as a result of the free trade agreement one million Canadians are unemployed. I guess CBC does not censor anybody that goes on its stations from the University of Regina because that is an outlandish statement.

Let me put it this way: if one million Canadians would be employed, if we had not had the free trade agreement, then we would have an unemployment rate of maybe 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent, the lowest in the industrial world by many per cent.

I do not object to criticism of the free trade agreement. I do not object to re-examinations and reconsiderations. But when a university professor makes the claim that one million Canadians are unemployed because of the free trade agreement one realizes he is not participating in a factual analysis. He is just expounding his own economic ideology, and that is all the New Democratic Party is doing in this resolution. I am glad to see the Liberals are not fooled by it. They are only advocating their own ideology: Close Canada, put up the barriers.

Has anybody spoken of individuals, of the workers in Mexico? Has anybody in the New Democratic Party asked if the workers of Mexico want a free trade agreement with the United States and with Canada? I know what they will say. They will say that our Canadian Labour Congress went down there and met with their labour congress and came back with the idea that they do not want it. They want us to fight it.

But what about the people who are going to be employed who are not now employed? What about the people who hopefully will eventually get some of the benefits over the years and over the decades? Let us think about them. If the workers of Mexico are not going to benefit from any kind of free trade agreement, either with the United States of America or with Canada, then we should look at it and say that we should not go through with it because it will promote economic oppression in Mexico. It will promote deprivation of human rights. If we think that, that is the action we should take and I would agree with it.

But should we simply turn down any opportunity for better international trade because it is not consistent with one's own ideology or with one's own concept of how Canada should function? Should this be masked as a protection of human rights of individuals? This is the ultimate concern. The NDP is not here advancing its ideology. It is here protecting workers in Mexico, do you believe that, Mr. Speaker? Does anybody believe that the New Democratic Party is here in this House of Commons advocating the rights of Mexican workers as opposed to its own ideology? I do not believe it. I hope the people of Canada do not believe it either.

The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca mentioned that awful word "hypocrisy" and I cannot mention it as he cannot mention it, but I think if you look at the dictionary definition you will find out what it is all about.

It is easy to be negative, and I understand and appreciate that. I can get up and tear the New Democratic Party apart. I have been doing it for years. I hope to continue to do it for years. The biggest threat to Canada is the New Democratic Party because it does not tell the truth. It deals entirely in rhetoric and ideology. It does not face facts. It does not face the realities. It makes it difficult for those who do. That is the problem. The NDP makes it impossible to deal with economic problems in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia and economic problems in northern Ontario, because it always says there is a simple solution, just as it says there is a simple solution to international trade.

"Stop it, stop it, stop it, if there is violation of human rights. Never mind, let the chips fall where they may". It does not work that way, and I cannot believe that given the intelligence and background of all the people in the New Democratic Party there is not somebody in that group who does not realize it. I hope and pray they will come forward.

This leads me to a point I wanted to mention. Those who are really interested in stopping violations of human rights in other nations through the instrument of withdrawal of external aid and trade to that nation should be looking for a competent monitoring body. What one would be looking for is a competent monitoring body, an officer within Canada who would say: Look, there is a situation developing in any nation with which we are trading or are providing external aid that involves human rights violations and we should respond to that. Does anybody mention that?

The Prime Minister of Canada established by statute, by act of this body in 1988, the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development. That centre is charged with the responsibility world-wide of monitoring human rights violations and trying to encourage better human rights practices and so on. We know who heads the centre. It is the Hon. Ed Broadbent who sat right there with those same people.

If members of the New Democratic Party were really concerned with what was happening in a particular place, Iran or whatever, and that we should exercise some influence over that situation as the Government of Canada by threatening to withdraw external aid or minimize trade relations, I would have thought they would call up Ed Broadbent and say: "Ed, get over there and find out what is going on. Bring us back a report. We will present the report to Parliament. It will be documented and every Conservative member and Liberal member will have to respond to the facts as presented".

We cannot respond to this rhetoric. We cannot respond to claims that the ideology of one place is different from ours, and if we want them to adopt our ideology then we have to put this pressure on them. One cannot respond to that kind of situation. One can only respond to facts, and one can only respond to facts that are so blatant and so obvious and so clear that they demand a response. We cannot respond to the practice in India of trading in child brides. We cannot withdraw our relationships with the Republic of India for those kinds of reasons. I think every member knows that.

Mr. Speaker, you say I have two minutes so I want to end on a positive note. I mentioned the monitoring. There are so many other things we could be directing our mind to. As I mentioned, bankrupt national treasuries are often behind human rights violations. Sometimes they do not have an adequate tax system. They do not tax the rich to help the poor in so many apparently deprived nations. We can help with that.

What we want to talk about is a positive approach. We want to talk about a long-term program. We cannot cut things off immediately if something goes wrong.

A second point beyond the long term is that we have to be concerned with a nation on a broad base. I have already indicated that. We just cannot focus on one item. We have to look at the welfare of the people, as well as at the status of the government. We should look for co-operation of the government and try to obtain it.

A positive approach and a positive foreign program have to have their roots in reality. I hope when I sit down that I will leave the NDP with that message. Let us talk about reality. We are politicians. We recognize rhetoric. Maybe its members do not recognize rhetoric out in the streets of Canada, but they certainly recognize it in this Chamber and should not use it.

As I said, they can take a message from the Prime Minister because the Prime Minister has stated the principle of good governance in relation to international and external aid, good governance within the recipient country. If they have good governance then everything will flow from that, including human rights.

What we have to do and what we have been trying to do is to assist those governments so that there will be good governance in the country, so that there will be a taxation system, an educational system, a health system and a social security system. When we have all those systems in place then, in my belief we have human rights established and we can deal with human rights like we now deal with them in Canada. I do not think too many nations around the world, 160 nations, have reached that plateau and it is our responsibility to help them.

I would like to say one more remark about trade because NDP members would have us think that we can reach out and stop an international nickel company from trading with a foreign nation that violates human rights without affecting workers in northern Ontario. What do they say about that? Would the member for Trinity—Spadina cut off trade and unemploy workers in northern Ontario? Yes, he would. He said: "Why?" It is because the member from British Columbia said we have to stand on principle. My principle is employment for Canadians, not cutting them off because of some suspected violation.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to comment on the remarks of the hon. member. I think they were a bit overzealous in terms of criticism of the NDP, which they always are, and I enjoy his speeches.

I would first say that I congratulate the Prime Minister on the remarks he made as every other member of the caucus does. The Prime Minister stood in Africa and said he was not prepared to provide aid or trade to nations with track records in human rights which do not warrant that. We applauded him. There is no doubt about it. But what we caution and what this motion cautions is that it is only empty rhetoric if there is no action. It is called into serious question along with Canada's credibility if there is not action. This motion proposes action.

It is ironic that the debate has centred on the Mexican trade agreement. We thought that our colleagues in the Liberal Party would support that. It is there and it is prominent. First it is an erosion of Canadian sovereignty, and it clearly is. It is going to compromise the Canadian economy.

An enormous number of Canadians are opposed to it. When we look at the motion to delete, that aspect of the motion, the trade agreement with Mexico is going to harm the economy of Canada. It is going to support a nation with no acceptable policy on the environment, no acceptable social policy, political corruption and extrajudicial execution of hundreds of trade unionists and members of the political opposition. That is what the Liberal motion supports. There is also a lack of any fair labour standards in that country. We are saying as Canadians that is the first and most critical thing facing this nation on the human rights issue and we can do something about it. We can say that we will not go to the table with that nation until its judicial system and its government's commitment to human rights matches this country's or shows significant progress.

The member for Nova Scotia stood up and said that we could not or should not do anything. The United States did something in response to its citizens' concerns. Certainly there are enough citizens' concerns in this country about the performance of the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party that we could start a parallel process here. We could start a committee here in the House to look at the human rights record of Mexico and make suggestions to them about killing trade unionists and opposition political members. We could do that. We could set up a parallel process with a committee to look at the environment standards, the social policy and the lack of fair labour practices in Mexico.

We are asking for some fairness. I applaud the Prime Minister for his statements but for all our sakes do not make it empty rhetoric. Let us take some action. Let us take the focal point. I plead with the Liberals to withdraw this wrong-headed amendment where they say they are prepared to sit with the government at the Mexican trade talks. This is absolutely wrong. Let us start the parallel process in this House of Commons with our committees the way the Americans did.

Again, my last and parting remark: I applaud the Prime Minister and those statements. Those were worthy statements of which Canadians can be proud but they must be followed by action. Give us some action that we can be proud of.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, what is permeating this debate are those two fruitful words advanced by the member from Burnaby at the outset of the debate, that is rhetoric and reality.

I think that anyone who listens to this debate will recognize what is rhetoric and what is reality, because the old bogey of the free trade agreement is being brought before the House of Commons again. It is the ideological position of the New Democratic Party that is divorced from the realities of the world situation, divorced from the realities of trade and divorced from the reality that trade creates employment in Canada and that people in Canada are dependent for employment on selling our products abroad. The members of the New Democratic Party do not want to face up to those hard facts and keep them in mind when they are dealing with their ideological positions. I applaud the Liberal Party. There is some hope that sensible people in this country will get together and try to find sensible solutions to the real problems of our national economy and unemployment. If that involves exploring a trade agreement with Mexico and if that involves exploring, and I underline the words any trading arrangements with any country, then that is what we should do.

If down the line we find out that there are militating factors in relation to human rights, unstable government, and unfair demands then we can make our decision based on those facts, but we do not get the facts unless we examine the situation.

Let me ask the NDP in return: What are the other possibilities to a North American trading bloc? I am from Nova Scotia. They have virtually shut down a segment of our important fishing industry, the sealing, because people in Europe did not think we should be doing such a thing. They thought we should be getting our fur coats in some way other than the destruction of seals. That is how much Europeans care about employment in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. They will just shut it down if it suits their fancy.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Halifax West who has been in the Conservative caucus for several years and knows the Prime Minister well what he expects the Prime Minister's follow-up will be to his declarations at the Commonwealth. In terms of specific concrete actions, what can we expect from the Prime Minister on this?

Specifically could the member share with this House what positions the government has been taking in the opening rounds of the Canada–Mexico–U.S. trade talks with respect to the human rights positions of the Mexican government and the linkage between those two issues at those talks? Could he share, from his perspective, what his government has been doing to advance these causes in this forum?

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member probably knows well that I am not privy to the negotiations between Canada and Mexico with respect to trade or quite frankly with any other matter. I can tell him that the Prime Minister has underlined time and time again the situation in Mexico.

I think the difference lies in the fact that the Prime Minister sees some hope for improvement through trading relations and the creation of wealth in Mexico. He believes that there is the possibility of substantial improvement in the welfare of the Mexican workers both with respect to day-to-day living and human rights.

I also offer to the member the fact that over a period of time the Prime Minister has underlined the linkage between aid, trade and human rights. I do not need any better evidence than the establishment of the centre that is now headed by Mr. Broadbent. That is tangible evidence that the Government of Canada under the Prime Minister has funded an organization with a duty and responsibility to monitor human rights legislation, report on it publicly and make recommendations with respect to it.

In relation to the Commonwealth, I think it is well expressed in an article by Ross Howard in Toronto's The Globe and Mail where the comment was made that with the 50-nation bloc all that was achieved was one small Canadian made candle in the dark in relation to human rights. I think the Prime Minister has made it clear that it was not a great impact on the Commonwealth leaders at the conference, but it did make a start. If we thought it was one small candle in the darkness of human rights, the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth said that the statement on human rights was a beacon of guidance on the issue of human rights.

Whatever we think, whatever the NDP thinks of the efforts made by the Prime Minister, they were cast as the beacon of guidance for the future by others.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am delighted to stand here in the House today to debate the important motion that is before us. While I support the purpose of this motion to bring before the House the issue of linking government aid to respect for human rights, I cannot support its basic premise which is to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada–United States–Mexico free trade negotiations. It is for these reasons that I can quite readily support the amendment as put forward by my colleague, the member for Northumberland.

I want to address the issue of linkage shortly. First, I would like to say why Canada should be involved in the negotiations surrounding this North American Free Trade Agreement.

Canadian interests, by putting them forth while we can still make a difference, are of great importance. On a practical note, this means jobs. We must not forget that by being at the table we can also influence other factors such as extending the agreement to include other partners from the hemisphere to create a western hemispheric agreement.

The more partners involved, the better is the counterbalance to the power of the United States, the greater the market potential for Canadian products, and the faster we can help developing countries in this hemisphere create the wealth they need to provide decent lives for their people.

By participating at the table we can lobby to ensure that comprehensive adjustment programs are devised to protect Canadian workers from the possible adverse affects of this deal. We can also ensure the protection of Canada's existing social, cultural and regional development programs.

We can, through involvement in the negotiations, encompass other issues such as the environment. My personal favourite of course is human rights. I would much rather be sitting at the table now than crying over spilt milk later.

With respect to the phrasing of this motion today, we are not talking about aid in this particular case with Mexico. Nor are we talking about investing per se. We are talking about a trade deal and we are talking about participating at a table where negotiations are under way on an agreement that will have a profound effect on Canada, Mexico, the U.S. and indeed the world.

I think this motion, although it does have good elements to be sure, is mixing apples and oranges by insisting upon the withdrawal of Canada from these negotiations.

We can ensure through our participation that environmental standards in each of the countries involved continue to be or in some cases are made to be stringent. There is concern that the inevitable harmonization of environmental standards could bring it all down to the lowest common denominator.

I for one do not want Canada's environmental standards to be brought down to the level which exists in Mexico. Remember, this proposed agreement is still in the stage of negotiations. We can better deal with all of these issues including Mexico's human rights record while at the table. If we are not at the table we cannot have any influence.

One thing that is lacking in making this deal is the open consultation with the Canadian public. We in the Liberal opposition have been calling for such consultation so that the Canadian public could have a say in such a profound deal. This process could and should involve the debate on human rights.

Presently our clout with Mexico is limited in terms of affecting its human rights record through a linkage with aid. Canadian aid to Mexico is limited. We sent close to $2 million through the Industrial Co-operation Program in 1990-91, as well as $350,000 for local initiatives. That is a total of $2.5 million.

Earlier this summer I along with my caucus colleagues sponsored a symposium on international human rights which involved Canada's non-governmental organizations, intellectuals, church and human rights groups.

We had discussions specifically about the linkage of human rights to Canadian aid and trade. These front line people agree in principle with the Prime Minister's recently stated commitment to the tentative linkage in light of documented violations of human rights in various countries. However they believe that the government is not practising what it preaches. The Prime Minister told this House yesterday that his cabinet has been discussing linkage policy since 1987.

We have the government document from the same year called "Sharing Our Future". Yet as the Canadian human rights community points out, human rights records in recipient countries are not reflected in project approval.

Participants at our conference agreed overwhelmingly that there should be uniform criteria for rendering decisions with respect to how and if Canada should provide and conduct trade with certain countries, specifically those with questionable human rights records. That is why I have no trouble at all supporting the amendment of the member for Northumberland. I would like to reread that amendment:

> That the government implement procedures which will guarantee coherency, transparency and accountability in relation to human rights considerations in all Canadian foreign affairs policies, including aid, trade and immigration.

It was felt that foreign aid was a tool which could be used in a relevant manner in bettering human rights records in certain countries. Participants at our symposium believe that there is no question that violations of human rights are more severe in developing nations. Governments of these nations are so busy trying to eke out a method of survival that they have little time to worry about basic human rights.

Instead, they must deal with the social unrest caused by abject poverty, the social upheaval caused by policies of the governments of developing countries which as they struggle to improve their trade balance and a desperate effort to improve their balance of payments to international lending institutions multilaterally and donor countries bilaterally have a direct relationship to the massive move toward urbanization which leads to a further burden of populations in urban areas already ill-equipped to handle rampant over-population.

While this is not meant to excuse Mexico or any other government from the mistreatment of any individual or group, it does provide a relative description of the situation in Mexico.

Perhaps, as the symposium participants pointed out, an improved trade balance will have a direct and dramatic effect on Mexico's human rights record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I hate to interrupt the hon. member. She will have 12 minutes remaining after Question Period today, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE MONARCHY

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are delighted that their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will visit Canada.

The monarchy has made a contribution to Canada's distinctness in North America and has played a key role in stabilizing Canadian society. It should not be neglected in our current constitutional debate.

The Crown has protected Canadians from the expansionary and assimilationist United States and has protected minorities in Canada, a prime example being the Quebec Act of 1774.

The Crown permitted and encouraged the development of representative institutions to serve Canadians whose ancestors have come from all corners of the world and has acted as a court of last appeal for all.

I do not suggest that we return to our past, but I do urge Canadians to appreciate and perhaps be guided by our heritage. For over 200 years, the monarchy has given Canadians common purpose.

Today, as we search to redefine that purpose, we must not forget the legacy and role of the constitutional monarchy.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in my province of Prince Edward Island there is close to 3,000 farming establishments. Almost 25 per cent of those farmers are dairy farmers.

I join with them today in calling on this government to maintain its commitment to supply management in this country. It must not waiver on any of the fundamental aspects of this system. Import restrictions, price adequacy and production discipline must be maintained if our dairy, poultry and egg farmers are to stay in business.

The livelihoods of many farmers depend on this. The welfare of their families is at stake. I dare say, there are many rural communities that would be hard pressed to survive if this government buckles at these GATT negotiations.

We must not trade away one of the most sophisticated marketing systems in the world. We must not diminish a system that has ensured ample quantities of high quality food to Canadian consumers at reasonable prices.

I call on this government to stand up for the farmers of this country.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, this year's theme for Small Business Week, from October 20 to October 26, is about entrepreneurships as a national resource.

The purpose of Small Business Week is to emphasize the contribution made by small businesses to the economy and give entrepreneurs an opportunity to meet, exchange information and learn how to improve their business management skills.

Owners of small businesses have injected about $64 billion into the Canadian economy in the form of wages and have created two million jobs during the past ten years.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the substantial contribution of small business to the economy in the riding of Drummond, where leadership and entrepreneurship are second nature.

Thanks to the involvement, know how, creativity and co-operation of its business community, Drummondville was named Quebec's industrial city of the year by the association of Quebec manufacturers. The purpose of government's Economic Renewal Program is to create a favourable climate for small business, and thanks to the Free Trade Agreement, Canadian entrepreneurs can take advantage of new business opportunities.

HAITI

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, Haiti is a country that has just come through decades of oppression under the cruel dictatorship of the Duvalier families and continues today to experience the cruelties of the vicious Tontons Macoutes and now the illegal government forces.

A year ago Haitians had the privilege of being able to democratically elect their own leader but as we know have just experienced the cruel withdrawal of that leader from power. Canada, with the OAS, has publicly supported the return of the democratically elected President Aristide to power in Haiti. The people of Haiti are hour by hour, day by day, threatened by the Haitian military. They demand the return of President Aristide. They need our help.

What is Canada is doing today to guarantee the return of President Aristide? Haitians who have been able to clandestinely make contact with the outside world speak of the murder, terror and persecution of those not in power in Haiti. Will this government assure us today that the trade embargoes against Haiti will be increased immediately to pressure a speedy return of Aristide to Haiti and that we will support his return with an international monitoring team.

NATIONAL INFECTION CONTROL WEEK

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, October 21 to 25 has been designated as National Infection Control Week. The Community and Hospital Infection Control Association, known as CHICA-Canada, in conjunction with local health care facilities and community agencies will be promoting infection control and the role of the infection control practitioner.

A few patients acquire infections as a result of hospitalization. These are known as nosocomial infections, but for those who do become infected there can be a prolonged hospitalization stay and chronic health care problems.

Economically nosocomial infections may cost Canadians as much as $1 billion annually in terms of cost of treatment and loss of work due to a prolonged hospital stay. Many of these infections are preventable.

Throughout this week health care facilities across Canada will again be conducting special Infection Control Week activities to raise our awareness.

ELK

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the politics of green have caught up with the Government of Alberta and sadly Canada's wildlife is the victim.

Alberta wildlife officers are now under order to kill all wild elk that come in contact with elk held at tuberculosis stricken game farms across the province. This bizarre shoot-to-kill policy is supposed to halt the flow of TB from the game farms into the wild populations. What a policy. Protect the sick by killing the healthy.

The image of Alberta government sharpshooters surrounding the 26 quarantined Alberta game farms to slaughter Canada's proud wild elk population is truly sickening. Warnings of the spread of disease from the penned elk have been on the desks of federal and provincial ministers for many months. Who knows whether tuberculosis or other domestic diseases have not already been transmitted from the disease ridden stock under quarantine? In the greedy rush for the big bucks the Getty government has placed at risk elk and other ungulates of western Canada.

What's next? The slaughter of the elk in Banff and other national parks to protect the profits of a handful of greedy breeders raising wild animals for slaughter and body parts?

ABORIGINAL PEOPLE

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, an advertisement in the New York Times describes Quebec as the worst possible place for aboriginal people on the North American continent. In response to those lies, I have some statistics from Statistics Canada. Indians are over-represented in the prison population across Canada, except in Quebec, where they are under-represented. Quebec has fewer Indian families living below the poverty line, and the gap between aboriginal people and the rest of the population is smaller in Quebec. Ninety-one per cent of aboriginal people in Quebec speak their own language, while in Ontario only 50 per cent do so. Quebec also has the lowest suicide rate among aboriginal people. In Quebec, the number of homes without central heating, among aboriginal people, is much lower than in the rest of Canada. Canadian politicians should stop this hypocrisy, and aboriginal leaders should tell the truth instead of letting themselves be used by the federalists against Quebec.

• (1410)

Let us hope that the new government in Saskatchewan will be able to improve the situation of aboriginal people in a province that was headed by an NDP government for a long time and that has the sad distinction of having the worst record for the way it treats aboriginal people.

NATIONAL INFECTION CONTROL WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, like the member for Oxford, I am pleased to inform members that this week, October 21 to 25, has been dedicated National Infection Control Week in recognition of the many health care workers who have worked to assure the application of effective infection control measures to prevent the transmission of infectious diseases in health care agencies and community-based institutions.

The purpose of this week is to focus public and professional attention on the seriousness of hospital acquired and community infections and on the measures that can be taken to reduce them.

I am particularly proud to applaud the efforts of the Community and Hospital Infection Control Association for their efforts in sponsoring and organizing this week across Canada.

ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, economic union has proved beneficial for Canadians, but we should not take it for granted. We cannot maintain or improve our situation by marking time while the rest of the world marches on. We must constantly work on developing our prosperity by improving our competitive position on international markets.

If we achieve our ultimate goal, which is to reduce the national debt, we will contribute to our future prosperity. However, every level of government and every sector of our economy can and must do more to meet the challenges that will face us in the future.

No more status quo. We must make a concerted effort to ensure that our economic union leads to productive growth and creates jobs.

Mr. Speaker, we must reduce barriers to the exchange of goods, services, people and capital within this country. We must eliminate overlap and duplication in government services, so as to provide for maximum efficiency and effectiveness.

Mr. Speaker, these are major challenges that cannot be met without the participation of each and everyone of us.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the minister of immigration announced on October 4, 1991 that the refugee backlog clearance program would be completed by December 1992 and within "its original budget of $179 million". There are at least two things wrong with this announcement.

First, when announced in December 1988 the deadline for completing the backlog was September 1991. Now we are told by the present minister that this date has not been met and that in fact cases within the backlog and in particular in Ontario, where most cases are, will not be completed until December 1992. This is a difference of 15 months.

This may not seem like a long time for the minister but for the tens of thousands of refugee claimants trapped in the backlog it is like a decade.

Tune in tomorrow when I will discuss the second major error.

MEMBER FOR SHEFFORD

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this government recently distributed to all Canadian households a brochure entitled "A Personal Message to All Canadians—An Invitation to Help Build A new Canada".

Several days later, on the floor of the House of Commons, the hon. member for Shefford criticized this message and launched some cheap shots at the principal originators of this important document, the Prime Minister and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, the Hon. Joe Clark.

A Granby daily, La voix de l'Est, in an editorial under the headline "Joe Clark was right, whatever Jean Lapierre says", said that Mr. Clark was to be commended for his message to Canadians and especially to Quebecers.

Subsequently, editorial writer Valère Audy, who has known Mr. Lapierre for some time, severely criticized the attitude taken by the hon. member for Shefford. Mr. Audy writes: "The M.P. for Shefford can keep this up if he wishes, but except for a few people who are prepared to laugh at his jokes, his audience is dwindling rapidly. In other words, Mr. Lapierre, when you make fun of others, there comes a time when the joke is on you!"

DOMINION TEXTILE FIBERWORLD PLANT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to inform the House today that Dominion Textile's Fiberworld plant, located in Hawkesbury, in my riding, has closed its doors. Mr. Speaker, 86 hard-working constituents will swell the overflowing ranks of job seekers.

Two years ago, imported carpets accounted for only 10 per cent of our market; today this share has risen to 35 per cent. Fiberworld is thus unable to compete with the Americans. Our Canadian dollar, which was worth 75 cents U.S. less than two years ago, now trades at 88.7 cents. Fiberworld is no longer competitive with its American counterpart. The most outrageous part is that Canada will now import carpet canvas from an American subsidiary of Dominion Textile called Waynetex. The government must devalue our overvalued currency. I also reiterate the appeal for the federal government to set up an economic development program for eastern Ontario.

MINING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw to the attention of the House the dismal condition of our country's mining industry. In many communities all across Canada mines have been closed, workers have been laid off, and entire towns and surrounding areas have suffered. We all recognize there is a life cycle to a mine. But many jobs in communities can be saved by positive action.

I call upon the government to establish a national mining reserve fund, a special fund created by a percentage of mining revenue. This fund would be used to assist mining communities prior to any possible closure. Moneys obtained could be used to further exploration that may uncover new resources which would extend the life of a mining operation. The fund could also be used to build infrastructure that would attract businesses to mining communities, and money could be used to help laid off workers.

A national mining reserve fund would be an ideal vehicle to provide more stability for mining companies, mining communities and miners. The ad hoc approach of the past must be replaced. The federal government needs to be involved in an ongoing process to assist mining in Canada and to provide more security for those living in mining communities.

NATIONAL HOMEMAKER AND HOME SUPPORT WORKER WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, October 20 to 27 National Homemaker and Home Support Worker Week will be celebrated across the country. This will be a time to recognize the outstanding work done by home support agencies. Congratulations to our government for supporting Home Support Canada, the organization representing such agencies.

Home care helps people to remain independent and allows them to receive any necessary care in their own homes. Continued support funds research into such significant areas as services to persons with AIDS and persons with Alzheimer's.

Home care provides a multitude of invaluable services such as snow shovelling, meal preparation and child care. So let us take the week to commend the homemakers in our communities for their important contributions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The name of the Prime Minister is now on an official list of names under consideration by the Security Council for the job of Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I can understand some Tories being very happy about that. But this has very serious implications for the Prime Minister and his government and for the international reputation of Canada.

Canadians have the right to know this: Does the Prime Minister want to be Secretary-General of the United Nations? If not—

Mr. Speaker: I do have to remind the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, who is a very experienced parliamentarian, that that seems to me a personal question and I think it is out of order.

Mr. Chrétien: It is a serious question and we want to know—

Mr. Speaker: I did not suggest it was not a serious one. I think it is a personal one and I think it is out of order.

• (1420)

Mr. Chrétien: We want to know why, if he does not want to be the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Prime Minister let his name be put on such a list.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not put my name on any list, but I would tell my hon. friend that he should not lose any sleep over this.

The thing that I look forward to perhaps most in the world is meeting him in an election campaign in 1993.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have to tell the Prime Minister that I am delighted. There are millions of Canadians who are disappointed because he is not leaving. One Canadian is very happy, and that is me.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I was afraid he would chicken out and I am happy that he did not. Now we can come back and ask the Prime Minister this, if he does not intend to go there.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister subscribe to the proposition of his finance minister, who said yesterday that 1.5 million unemployed was the normal level in Canada and that he could do nothing to change the situation. Now that the Prime Minister says that he wants to take care of problems in Canada, instead of going around the world distributing his C.V. to everyone, will he soon present policies to put people back to work in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the Government of Canada could do nothing.

The Government of Canada is doing everything to get Canada's economic and fiscal house in order. The fundamentals are right. Every think tank and objective organization in Canada and throughout the world recognizes that we are on the right track in containing inflation, bringing inflation down, regulating inflationary expectations, bringing about price stability and bringing about durable growth.

I think even the hon. Leader of the Opposition recognizes that there is restructuring and adjustment that must take place in the Canadian economy. That will provide a little more lead time in terms of being translated into jobs.

The fact of the matter is we should accept these serious challenges as a challenge. It is going to require not only governments, but it is going to require business, labour and everyone working together in co-operation to improve our competitiveness and our productivity so that we can take advantage of the opportunities in a globalized world.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the members on the other side are disappointed that the Prime Minister is not leaving—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: —and disappointed too by the answer of the Minister of Finance.

The minister is asking for more time. We have been in a recession for almost two years. It is the longest recession we ever had in Canada.

We want to know from him when he will do the right thing and put the workers of Canada back into jobs so that there will be money for the fishermen and the farmers in Canada. We are fed up with hearing statistics that mean nothing for them.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statements of the hon. Leader of the Opposition are categorically false.

This has not been the longest recession. As a matter of fact, the recession which he was very familiar with lasted 16 months. This one lasted 12 months. We have recovered one quarter earlier than that which was expected.

Interest rates are down. They are the lowest they have been in 13 years. They are continuing to go down and not go up. Inflation is going down and not going up. We have one of the lowest inflation fates on record. Unemployment is going down. It is not going up. The trade balance is going up. It is not going down. All the indicators are pointed in the right direction and that will be translated into jobs.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Canada's prolonged unemployment crisis, a crisis the Minister of Finance acknowledges, is having a catastrophic effect on young Canadians. Canada's youth has to live with the harsh reality of a national unemployment rate of 17 per cent and in some regions of 25 per cent.

What immediate action will the minister take to solve this extremely serious crisis facing young Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, young Canadians are looking at their future and their current situation and are asking their governments at all levels not to do as the previous government did and try to throw money at a problem by bankrupting the country. That is what the youth are saying.

We have in place under the Canadian Jobs Strategy initiatives throughout Canada that require cash disbursements by our department of over $3 billion a year.

If the hon. member is not aware of the multitude of programs in place in every province, I would be more than pleased to give him time after Question Period and brief him.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister.

I gather from the minister's response that 17 per cent youth unemployment is indeed part of the jobs, jobs, jobs strategy he is talking about.

At a time when this government is talking about prosperity through competitiveness and while our global competitors are busy training, educating and offering employment opportunities for their youth, can Canada as a nation really afford to have 400,000 young people standing in the unemployment lines of this nation? Is this the new way to global competitiveness?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it takes some gall for a Liberal to stand up in this House and complain about the youth and about unemployed Canadians being out there without help. We tried to pass Bill C-21 and I remember the Grits opposing that bill, where we activated $800 million more to train Canadians in order to be ready for the global economy that he does not understand.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, that spontaneous outburst from my caucus obviously was out of respect for the premier elect of Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow. We are happy to see that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government continues to talk about economic recovery and by the government's standards, perhaps it is a recovery. But hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have no work do not see this recovery. We have thousands of farmers who are no longer farming. Thousands of fishermen are no longer fishing. Factories lay idle and empty while unemployment and welfare offices are full.

Today we hear that the finance minister has said that it will be two years before he can see these people back working.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if it is this government's policy to do nothing for the 1.5 million unemployed in this country, and say that there is a recovery. There is no recovery. There is just more unemployment.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just to advise the hon. member, last month 65,000 new jobs were created and the unemployment rate went down, from 10.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent. I think that is going in the right direction.

The Gross Domestic Product is increasing. Housing starts are on the increase. As I said, the key to job creation is bringing interest rates down. Interest rates have come down by well over 500 basis points, or 5.5 percentage points. That is creating and stimulating new investment and new opportunities for job creation. I might say that interest rate is the lowest rate in 13 years. Inflation is going down and prices are coming down, which adds to our ability to compete more effectively internationally.

The merchandise trade balance is up. Housing starts are up. Business confidence is up. As I indicated to other hon. members, there is a certain degree of lag time before that is translated into jobs.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. A million and a half people are jobless and that is reality for many Canadians. Often children live in poverty because their parents lack work. When the Minister of Finance is faced with this reality, he says that he can do nothing for two years because price stability must be maintained. I want to reassure the Prime Minister that price stability will be maintained. His fiscal policies have knocked consumers out. Will the Prime Minister finnally tell his minister to implement a job creation program?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance already indicated that nearly 75,000 new jobs were created, that interest rates were going down, that inflation was down and that everything was in place for quite a solid, lasting economic recovery. The real gross domestic product increased 0.2 per cent in July, the real production of goods increased, the volume of exports rose 3.5 per cent in July, housing starts jumped 6.9 per cent in September, 75,000 new jobs were created since the recovery began, including 37,000 in the manufacturing sector alone, and unemployment fell 0.4 per cent in a month. Although it is not a miracle, I think that the Leader of the New Democratic Party should admit that the policies advocated and pursued by the Minister of Finance are in the national interest and producing real gains for all Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Clearly what is happening with the fiscal policies of this government is that we are continuing to see more people unemployed. We had a debate two weeks ago on the prices in the farming industry. Everywhere you look, people are seeking jobs. That is the criteria this government should be looking at.

The Atlantic premiers are meeting because they have been told that they can expect $160 million less in transfer payments. As the Prime Minister well knows, that reduction would have a devastating effect on the people of the Atlantic who have suffered very badly from the decline in the fisheries and other economic factors primarily created by this government.

In the past, the federal government has had a supplementary expenditure for transfer payments. I want to ask the Prime Minister, if the premiers of the Atlantic provinces request this, in order to address the very serious problems they have, will his government consider their request.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. That is a completely hypothetical question. The minister may want to deal with it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party that there is nothing unusual here. The equalization program is enshrined in legislation and there is a formula that is enshrined within that legislation. These adjustments occur at least two times a year. This normal adjustment process has occurred over the last number of years. As a matter of fact, in the last two years there have been incremental increases as a result of the new economic and financial data coming in.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should readjust the figures and contravene the legislation? If that were to happen, then the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which under this review are going to get more money, would be getting less money.

I think what the hon. member has to recognize is that we are governed here by a legislative measure. I should advise her as well that the issue of equalization and the whole issue of fiscal transfers is under review by the federal and provincial governments. If there are any inconsistencies or problems with the existing program, we will review that and hopefully provide the necessary corrective action in the next bit of legislative that will come down the pipe.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister of Canada and it is in regard to the future of de Havilland.

Given that the European consortium will not pursue majority ownership any longer, and that without a new arrangement Boeing can possibly close and wind down its operations in Downsview, when will the federal government, rather than passing the buck continuously to the provincial government, act in the national interest and commit itself strongly and immediately to saving the thousands of jobs at stake at de Havilland, which only happens to be the leading aerospace manufacturer in our country and the single largest industrial employer in all of metropolitan Toronto.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are very much aware of the position of de Havilland and its importance to the economy of metropolitan Toronto, of Ontario and indeed of all of Canada.

We have been working with the province of Ontario, with the Boeing company and with ANA. We have made representations to the European Community. We have been very much involved in trying to find ways to allow this company to continue in a successful way.

I would caution the hon. member from drawing too hard and fast conclusions from things that he reads in the media. These discussions are continuing and I would hope would have some successful conclusion.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Canadian taxpayers have invested nearly $1 billion in the Augmenter and STOL wing technologies, making de Havilland the world leader.

However, in the United States Lockheed needs this technology in order to rebuild its C-130 Hercules aircraft and Boeing needs this technology in order to build military transports.

Will the minister tell us what guarantees he has that these technologies will not be stolen from Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a fairly complex question. If he had given me notice I would be able to give him a specific answer. But if he wants to provide me with the information that is behind that question I would be happy to get him a specific answer.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister seemed personally touched by the case of the Iranian woman who was being held under house arrest by his government following her torture in Iran.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, having had a chance to review the case, he is now willing to personally take up her case and ensure that she and her family will not be sent back to Iran where she faces torture and her family faces a threat to life and limb?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without at all commenting on the premise of the hon. member's question, which I really ask myself what the purpose of it is, I can advise the House that, as I indicated yesterday I have completed my review of this case and all the aspects of it.

Some information which was not before the Refugee Determination Board having been brought to my attention I have, following representations on the part of colleagues and members of this House, indicated and directed to officials of my department to process this family for admission to Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I for one am very happy that this happened and I am sorry that the issue had to be brought up on the floor of the House of Commons.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, personally intervened with the minister last week to bring to his attention the new information.

I want to ask my question now of the Prime Minister. Given that this particular case has been resolved in a positive way, and for that I thank the government, will the Prime Minister advise the Immigration Appeal Board that in future similar cases involving flogging will be dealt with in a positive manner so that no other woman will face the possibility that this woman faced?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I noted and took care to note that the decision that I have made to process this family for admission to Canada is based on information I have received.

The immigration refugee board, to which the hon. member refers, is an independent board set up by this Parliament. It operates without political intervention. Surely she is not suggesting that this minister or this government intervene in an independent process.

As for her larger issue, I do not think that it would be proper for me at this time to speculate on decisions which the board has to make. If the Liberal Party wants to suggest an amendment to the Immigration Act on the definition of what is a convention refugee let them do that.

• (1440)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, we too welcome the decision of the minister on humanitarian grounds to allow this family to remain in Canada.

I want to ask a question of the Prime Minister which touches directly, however, on the situation of human rights in Iran. Yesterday when I asked the Prime Minister about the extension of a $1 billion line of credit to Iran, the Prime Minister said that his human rights policy only applied to the extension of aid.

I want to remind the Prime Minister that the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, now the Minister for Constitutional Affairs, said in a letter last year: "The Export Development Corporation takes direction from the Government of Canada on matters relating to human rights abuses. The government can direct the EDC not to support exports to a certain country because of that country's human rights record".

In view of the clear contradiction between the Prime Minister's statement yesterday and the minister's letter, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he stands by the earlier assurance that the EDC will take direction on human rights and, if so, will this government stop this $1 billion line of credit to Iran, a country which flogs, tortures, detains, and executes its own citizens.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to draw a distinction for the hon. member between aid and EDC credit. EDC credit is made on commercial terms in the case of the arrangements with Iran. It is not aid. In no way is it considered to be aid.

We have on a number of occasions expressed our concerns to the Iranian authorities about their treatment of individuals. I did it personally when I was in Iran about a month ago. The Secretary of State for External Affairs did it when the deputy foreign minister for Iran was here earlier this year. This concern is something we have kept in front of the authorities in Iran and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister states that these considerations are based solely on commercial factors, yet his colleague the former Secretary of State for External Affairs said that human rights considerations should be a part of EDC financing.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. For 30 years, the American government has imposed a total embargo on Cuba, including food and medicine. At this session of the United Nations General Assembly, many countries will propose the elimination of this destructive embargo.

Given the policies of the Canadian government, which never imposed such an embargo and which supports the admission of Cuba to the OAS, will Canada support a resolution asking the United States to lift this embargo against Cuba?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is not a specific question to which I can give a precise answer, but I believe the position of the Government of Canada in dealing with Cuba has been quite clear. In dealing with Cuba, we have taken a different position from that of the United States in our relationships with Cuba and I think that the concerns that have been expressed by the hon. member have been reflected in the policies carried out by the Government of Canada.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the four premiers from the Atlantic provinces are meeting on Wednesday to discuss an attack by this government on the equalization payments to the four Atlantic provinces. They are not meeting, as the Minister of Finance would have us believe, to have a tea party.

Does the Minister of Finance realize that the equalization payments to the three maritime provinces for this year are practically the same as they were last year, according to his department, and the equalization payments to the province of Newfoundland are actually less this year than they were last year.

How can this government be so cruel as to now suggest a further $116 million cut? Why this Atlantic attack?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I advise the hon. member that equalization payments are not being slashed. They are being increased by $250 million to $8.3 billion. Unless the hon. member wants me to unilaterally change the formula, there is nothing I can do about it. This formula is enshrined in legislation. It is implemented on the basis of financial and economic data that flows in and these adjustments are made on a regular basis.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the utilization payments to the four Atlantic provinces are being cut. Not only are they being cut, but the Atlantic provinces have been asked, and they are doing it, to pay back equalization money that they received years ago because of an audit done by the Department of Finance in March 1990.

I ask the Minister of Finance: How can the government of Canada forgive loans to foreign banks and to foreign countries while demanding money back in equalization payments from the four Atlantic provinces? Why this double whammy to eastern Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in 1988–89 when this same adjustment was implemented, the adjustment ended up in an additional $1 billion directed to the provinces from the federal government. Does the hon. member want us to cancel that too?

For 1989–90, after the review was taken, as a result of the regular review based upon the formula and using the financial and economic data that flows in, there was an increase of $720 million. Does he want me to collect that back from the provinces?

You cannot have your cake and eat it. A formula is in place and it has to be honoured.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the fisheries aid package and it is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who yesterday accused members of Parliament of rumour-mongering that the package was inadequate.

Since that statement, I have received over 100 telephone calls in my offices from people who are very angry and very distressed by that statement. They are reaffirming that there is not enough money, there are not enough programs and the ones that are there are coming on stream too late to be worth while.

I am going to ask the minister again to consult with his job creation colleague and tell us why he cannot put more teeth in this program.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, all I can do is repeat to this House and to hon. members that we have in this program sufficient funds for the volume of people who have been identified. Assessments however, and this may explain perhaps his number of phone calls, are taking longer than we expected given the numbers involved. That is a reality out there.

We have begun the job of identifying specific amounts of money and negotiating contracts. This is being done as we speak. As the minister said yesterday, all people who qualify will be able to take advantage of that special program.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not listening. If you boil that $57 million package down, it works out to somewhere in the vicinity of $25 million for job creation. That is for 10,000 people. The Fishermens Union suggested $100 million might be more appropriate. In the minister's own figures that works out to $2,500 per person.

The minister may consider that as more than adequate. He may even consider it generous, as he said yesterday. Certainly the Newfoundlanders and the Atlantic Canadians who are receiving at that end do not consider it adequate, neither do I nor my colleagues. It simply is not good enough.

I want to ask the minister one more time: When will he get serious and come clean with Newfoundlanders and tell them how he is going to provide a reasonable solution to this devastating and demoralizing problem?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are not Liberals, we cannot predict the future. However, it is estimated that 4,300 fishermen and 6,000 plant workers have been unable to acquire sufficient weeks of insured earnings to qualify for UI. It is this money that the hon. member refers to which will create some 45,600 job weeks of work for those people.

Maybe we could raise taxes and or increase the deficit to give more, but I think that this package will help the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador.

ARCTIC NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

President Bush has now recommended to Congress that the largest unspoiled wilderness in the United States be opened for the development of gas and oil. These lands are known as the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Since the drilling would take place in Alaska on the coastal calving grounds of the porcupine caribou herd, a decision posing a direct threat to the 200,000 caribou that spend most of their life cycle in Canada, will the Prime Minister contact President Bush and express the deeply-held Canadian view that we support wilderness designation for the 1002 lands.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this issue has been ongoing for a certain number of years. In fact, the Government of Canada has been making representations to different representatives in the United States Congress and with the administration on this issue. In fact, we have been working in close co-operation with the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and with native people on this issue.

Last week, no later than Thursday, there was some positive developments when the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee I understand voted 12 to 4 in favour of designating that area as an Arctic national wildlife refuge, as a wilderness. That is a positive development. We intend to pursue this issue very vigorously.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the more important vote on this issue is going to take place on the floor of the whole Senate later this week, and even the members of the Senate there are encouraging Canada's Prime Minister to get in touch with President Bush if Canada is serious about drilling not proceeding on the 1002 lands.

I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of the Environment. Earlier today the all-party Standing Committee on Environment passed a resolution calling on the Prime Minister to call President Bush. All parties in this House for many years have unanimously held the view that there should be wilderness designation for the 1002 lands.

Since the minister has offered to lead an all-party delegation to Washington to talk to the Congress in the next short period of time about this, will the Minister of the Environment at least rise today and call upon his Prime Minister to call President Bush as this is a key executive decision-making ingredient to protect Canada's porcupine caribou herd?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has made a series of representations on this very important issue to the American government at the executive level. No later than the week of September 16, for example, our embassy in Washington was instrumental in putting together a lobbying effort on this very specific issue. We have been very active at every level and we intend to pursue this issue, to be very vigilant, and to do anything in our power to ensure that this area be designated a wilderness area.

RAIL SERVICES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. For several months, Via executives in their ivory tower in Montreal have been trying everything to abolish rail service in Abitibi and Champlain, with the complicity of CN President Ron Lawless.

Is the Minister of Transport prepared to make a decision this year on the future of rail services in remote regions, including Senneterre and Amos in Abitibi and Parent in Champlain County?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that both the President of Via and the Minister of Transport are concerned about this issue of rail services to remote regions. We are concluding a study on the costs of maintaining these centres and should be able to make a decision in a few weeks.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the Canadian dollar reached 88.77 cents, its highest level in 13 years. Since every cent increase in the value of the dollar costs nearly $1.3 billion in exports, can the minister tell us why he is pursuing policies that are disastrous for the Canadian economy and guarantee very high unemployment?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in the House before, the Government of Canada does not have a set target for the value of the dollar, nor does it have a range, nor does the Bank of Canada have a range or target for the valuation of the dollar. It is essentially set in the marketplace, and based upon a whole number of factors, including the capital flows, the need for capital, the need for capital to invest in meeting fiscal deficits, with respect also to inflation and the economic fortunes.

I should indicate to the hon. member that notwithstanding the value of the dollar which he suggests is too high, the trade figures indicate that Canadian companies are competing. Our merchandise trade balance is increasing, particularly our trade balance with the United States, which again demonstrates the effectiveness of the free trade agreement.

As was pointed out in The Financial Post this morning, Canada cannot devalue its way to prosperity.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister.

The government has added to the problem of high unemployment in the forestry sector with its high dollar policy. In that sector every one cent increase in the dollar translates into a loss of $100 million in exports.

What new and specific measures will the minister implement to assist the forestry sector in regaining its competitive edge and when can the forestry sector expect relief from this devastating high dollar policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true that there are very serious competitive pressures in the marketplace, not only from the current value of the dollar.

I remind the hon. member that for the last 40 years, the average value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the American dollar was 92.6 cents. So, in historical terms it is not high. I know that it is high relative to recent trends, but the fact of the matter is that the value of the dollar does reflect a certain strength and stability in the Canadian economy and it provides the way in which we can continue to get the fundamentals right, that is bringing inflationary pressures down, bringing interest rates down. That will increase the opportunity to compete more effectively, bring down the cost of living and bring down prices.

POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Canada Assistance Plan was established over two decades ago by a Liberal government to help Canada's poor maintain an adequate standard of living. Parliament defined "adequate" to mean that all Canadians should have food, shelter and clothing.

Given the number of Canadians who go to food banks every day, how does this minister define adequate for these people?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that what we do in terms of the Canada Assistance Plan is done with the provinces and in conjunction with the capacity that the provinces have to put money in the system. I think there is a billion dollars put in by us and by the provinces into the system. By and large the system works well, but it has to work within the capacity we have to create the resources.

If my friend would would like me to say that we are ready to put in $1 billion, $2 billion or $3 billion more, I have to say that we do not have those resources.

As the Minister of Finance has said, we are trying to improve the economy to have the capacity to put in more and more.

I would say that if we can do more for poor people and for those in need in terms of services, we will do it. The member will agree that the resources have to be there. Maybe his party created the plan, but it created the deficit and the debt that came with the plan.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, several colleagues stood up and asked questions about food banks across this country. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are fond of responding that national economic policies are helping Canada's poor. In Winnipeg we now have 36,000 people looking for jobs, and several thousand aboriginal youth who can no longer find jobs or training. We have thousands of people using the food banks to the point where they are no longer able to feed people each month. These macro policies are not working.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what specific plans he can present to the people of Winnipeg to help provide for them in the future.

• (1500)

This government has done nothing but take away things such as the Core Area Initiative and needs federal government intervention.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what we said yesterday about Montreal and Toronto is true for Winnipeg.

With all the help that foods banks provide, I believe everybody in the House and in the country would like to do without them.

Second, he knows too that in order to be reasonable we have to provide as much as we can to have an economy which will produce jobs and let people work. We were talking about young people before. Now we are talking about everybody in the country.

The first move to deal with that is to give people the capacity to work. As simple as it is, when you work, you do not normally need food banks.

LESLIE JAMES BENNETT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Very seldom in the lives of those of us who have been elected to office do we have an opportunity to correct an injustice of the past. I am putting my question to the minister in that light.

I think the time has come to correct an injustice. Leslie James Bennett was forced to resign as deputy chief of the RCMP, counterespionage section in 1972. He was accused of being a mole for the KGB and has proved to be totally innocent. His pension today is $4,500 a year and he is living in exile in Australia.

Will the minister review the file of Mr. Bennett with a view to a full exoneration and a reinstatement with full pension rights?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend who makes the point that when we have an opportunity to correct unfortunate cases from the past we should do so.

My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. I have taken the opportunity to review the file with my staff and I find myself in a position of referring to the answer given to one of my predecessors in this House, the Hon. Francis Fox on November 24, 1977.

"Mr. Bennett left the RCMP on a medical discharge and in spite of rumours to the contrary, he was not paid off and nor ordered to get out of the country." I have nothing more to add at this point.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I believe the middle income earners have gradually been burdened with an unfair proportion of total personal income taxes. Will the minister be reviewing this problem with the idea of reducing tax rates or perhaps eliminating the surtax which was brought in in 1985 and now generates over $1.5 billion in taxes.

Clearly such a measure could give our sluggish economy a boost and help alleviate the unfair tax burden on middle income Canadians.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the hon. member's question, but I think that he would be the first to acknowledge the tremendous overhang of debt that Canadians face. The cost of servicing that debt consumes about $43 billion annually and takes 35 cents out of every taxpayer's dollar that we collect. It really restricts our ability to bring about any tax cuts.

What we are endeavouring to do, as the hon. member I know is aware and supportive of, is the ongoing attempt to reduce the deficit, bring our fiscal house in order, bring down interest rates and bring down an inflation rate.

The fact that we have brought interest rates down by over 5 per cent has translated into reductions of payments on a monthly basis on $100,000 mortgage. It reduces monthly payments by roughly $320 per month. I think that is a good break for middle income people.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have a single question. My question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister on April 6, 1984 in commenting on the then suggested appointment of the Minister of Finance of the day to the OECD as Secretary-General said: "Canadians have had it up to here with the hypocrisy of people who inflict unemployment on Canadians and then go off to cushy jobs".

My question is straightforward. Does the Prime Minister consider being Secretary-General of the United Nations a cushy job?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that question is in order.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of a parliamentary delegation from the United Kingdom Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association led by the Hon. Robert Boscawen, M.C., Member of Parliament.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson and the amendment of Mrs. Stewart (p. 3782).

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate and to add some thoughts to this whole question of human rights and Canada's aid policy and to respond to the concerns of the hon. member opposite.

There are few development issues quite as complex or as sensitive as this one. It is an issue for which there are no easy answers, no fast solutions and no quick fixes. It is a matter that at times calls for delicacy and careful diplomacy. At other times more forceful measures are required.

I believe that Canada's policy on human rights and aid reflects a balanced and judicious approach, one that emphasizes progress rather than postering and one that is concerned first of all with helping to promote human rights through the development process.

Promoting human rights with development assistance is part and parcel of Canada's over-all foreign policy goal of encouraging greater—

The Deputy Speaker: Allow me to interrupt the hon. member for a minute. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I think I will make his life and my life a lot easier once we get a little bit more quiet in this House.

Would it be possible for conversations that are held behind the curtains to be held in the lobby? We cannot hear anybody in this House except people who should not be heard. That goes for both sides of the House. The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest.

• (1510)

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, our approach emphasizes support for the victims of human rights abuses while maintaining pressure on oppressive governments where required. This means that we do take human rights records into account in determining the nature and size of our aid programs in the developing world.

This does not mean that we automatically terminate assistance to the countries that do not have spotless records. We do not expect miracles. We do look for trends that indicate improving or worsening human rights situations.

It is true that in some cases assistance may be reduced or denied where systematic gross or continuous violations of human rights occur.

We do not think it wise or fair to punish the victims of oppression doubly by withholding much needed development assistance. Instead we look for the best means of delivering our aid to the people who really need it.

In many cases that means channelling our aid through non-governmental organizations or community and grassroots organizations, through the very groups that work with the poor, the disadvantaged and often with those bearing the full brunt of human rights abuses.

We work through them because very often they are in the best position to ensure that our aid reaches those in need. I could refer to the example just five years ago where, with the toppling of the Marcos regime in the Philippines, there was a re-evaluation of our aid program which up to that point had been delivered by non-governmental organizations. I will have something to say about that shortly.

This seems to me to be a far more reasoned and, I would argue, far more compassionate response. To cut off all aid without looking for alternative means of reaching the poor seems to me to be ill considered, counterproductive and harmful.

There are many ways to reflect this concern for human rights and democracy in our aid program. For example, personnel within the Canadian International Development Agency are trained on human rights issues. Our government has established the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development headed by the Hon. Edward Broadbent to support research and provide guidance on this issue.

Canada has always been a forceful advocate of human rights in the international arena, in the UN, as well as within the Commonwealth and La Francophonie. Canada is continuing to move forward on the issue. We are refining our policy and exploring new avenues that broaden our conception of human rights to encompass the notion of democratic development. We are doing this because we recognize that development, democracy and human rights are closely linked and interdependent.

Development does not depend simply on economic and technical co-operation. It ultimately depends as well on economic and political pluralism, on grassroots participation. In a word it depends on democracy.

Democratic systems with their emphasis on free and open participation in the political and economic life of society and their respect for human rights are clearly best suited to creating an environment where human potential can be developed and put to full and productive use. For that reason CIDA is continuing to develop its thinking and activities on the theme of democratization and human rights.

Although CIDA's policy essentially remains that defined in the releases Sharing Our Future and To Benefit a Better World, the mechanisms for its implementation are rapidly changing. This enables Canada to maintain its position as a leader in defending human rights and democratic development.

We must show imagination. We must do much more to encourage and help our partners gradually to lay the foundations for a truly democratic society: elements such as an independent judiciary, freedom of the press, opinion and association, the establishment of the rule of law, a multi-party system and so on.

Even so lasting democracy cannot simply be built on a legal or institutional framework. For democracy to flourish and prosper many other elements are needed including a pluralistic and participatory society where a wide variety of organizations, institutions and enterprises are all free to express their views and pursue their interests. There must be a democratic culture that accepts compromise, the free exchange of ideas and the peaceful settlement of political competition.

There must be good governance because the legitimacy of a democratic process depends to a large extent on fair, open, competent and honest public administration.

Finally there must be progress toward economic and social development so that citizens have the means and ability to participate in the civic and political life of their societies.

There is a whole range of constructive activities that can be undertaken to build the foundations for democracy around the world. Let me now turn to some of those activities. Some are very direct, for example providing assistance to electoral processes. In the past two years Canada has been involved in electoral competitions in Namibia, Nicaragua, Benin and Malaysia.

Our association and assistance have taken many forms ranging from the provision of ballot boxes, paper and ink, to providing training for polling officers, electoral observers, jurists and legislators. In the case of Namibia, we sent election observers as well as 100 RCMP officers to help ensure stability during that country's difficult transition to democracy.

Strengthening the institutions of government or international organizations is also important. As I have noted, we have created here in Canada the International Institution for Human Rights and Democratic Development as a new mechanism to further promote human rights and democratic concerns. We have carried this institution strengthening over into the international arena where we have put forward a number of proposals that would build respect for human rights and democracy right into the framework of a number of multilateral institutions.

For example, the Prime Minister recently announced that at the coming November summit of La Francophonie, he intended to propose the creation of a secretariat to support democratization within that organization's Agence de co-opération culturelle et technique. Canada has also suggested that a human rights information unit be established within La Francophonie. Similar initiatives are also planned for the Commonwealth and the Organization of American States has adopted Canada's proposal to create a unit for democratic development within its secretariat.

Within our aid program we have made decisions on aid funding that directly reflect our commitment to support the democratic and social stability that makes democracy possible. For example, Canada decided in 1986 to establish a major bilateral program in the Philippines in support of President Aquino's re-establishment of a democratic government in that country. In this case the program was subsequently developed very specifically to include two major components, one focusing on community development and the balance directed to broader economic support for central government needs. Our increased support is a clear sign of our commitment to help the people and the Government of the Philippines as they promote democratic development.

I had the great good fortune to have had a hand in this operation. In May 1986 I led on behalf of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was governor of the Asian Development Bank, our delegation to the annual meeting of that bank. Shortly after I agreed to do so, there was the election of February 1986 in which the Marcos regime was defeated and President Aquino succeeded in part through people power. I was asked then by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister for External Relations to extend my visit in the Philippines and visit the areas where our aid was being delivered by non-governmental organizations, the Asissi Foundation and many others.

I spent 10 days travelling the country, visiting Cebu and Negros provinces and had an opportunity to meet not only government leaders, who were the fresh new leaders of democracy, such as Governor Daniel Lacson of Negros Occidental, but also church leaders, community development leaders and co-operative leaders.

Because the co-operative movement in the Philippines is doing very well and is very strong, the Bayawan Fisheries Co-operative in Negros Oriental is succeeding largely due to our efforts. Not only was there economic success but there was also success leading towards democratization and freedom of economic action.

While I am on the topic, I should also mention the great value of mission administered funds which are available at the discretion of our local ambassador. The example that I saw was the remarkable infusion of a very small number of dollars into a convenience store on the edge of Smokey Mountain.

Now Madam Speaker perhaps you have visited Smokey Mountain. It is a heap of garbage as tall as Parliament Hill. There are approximately 6,000 to 10,000 individuals living off that heap of garbage, ferreting around for valuables that can be sold and in some cases searching for discarded food.

Those people are the poorest of the poor in the Philippines. What happened there was that those living in that area had no store to go to not even a convenience store or any grocery store nearby. The nearest one was two or three miles away and it was run by the loan sharks. These poor people were in hock to the loan sharks.

What happened was that our mission administered fund under the direction of our then ambassador, Hon. Russ Davidson, offered something in the way of $150 Canadian in terms of capital to capitalize a convenience store on the edge of Smokey Mountain. That freed not only the people from the loan sharks but freed up a beginning of a market economy for those very poor people.

I had an opportunity to see some follow-up to the five-point program which I was able to recommend to President Aquino and our government. I saw it consummated when I met the other day with Mr. Robert Dowling, a resident of Alberta and a former minister of tourism in the Alberta provincial government. He was on his way under the auspices of CESO, the Canadian Executive Service Overseas to Negros Occidental to advise Governor Lacson and the government of that province on developing a tourism industry in what is a very, very desirable tourist destination.

You see that our aid projects and programs themselves contribute in a very fundamental way to building the foundations of democracy throughout the developing world.

For example, the programs we support in the field of human resource development are essential parts of our strategy to support human rights and democratic development. Literacy and education are basic to forming the human capabilities that are most crucial to democratic life.

Human resource development, as the sponsor of today's debate knows, is a priority of side's work and programs like these account for a significant portion of Canada's development co-operation. Moreover women in development, another priority of side's work, makes a crucial contribution in this area. The programs Canada supports here help women throughout the Third World develop the personal capacity and the collective means to participate in the economic and political life of their societies.

CIDA has had a women in development policy since 1984. All of its bilateral projects must be evaluated for their impact on women. It also supports a wide range of projects that are especially designed to benefit women whether by providing them with credit to establish private enterprises or through support for groups that defend the most basic rights of women.

For example, we provide support to the Asia-Pacific Forum on Women and the Forum on Women, Law and Development, which is working to promote greater respect for women's rights.

Support for NGOs and community development organizations is also fundamental. Here again Canada is a leader, challenging a larger share of its aid through NGOs than any other major aid agency. NGOs connect individuals to the political process and are often in the front lines in defending citizens against abusive governments.

Just as importantly they serve as schools for democracy, teaching their members the value of free expression, compromise and civic life, all crucial qualities that can be carried over into the wider political arena.

In short they build the foundations for a culture of democracy that allows free and open systems to take root and flourish. Often NGO programming makes a very direct contribution to democratization. CIDA's program in the Philippines is a very good example. The government of that country has made it clear that it views NGOs as an important force for development and for democracy. I think one of the reasons for that is that President Aquino herself had a background in working for NGOs. Its mid-term development plan for 1987 to 1992 set out a policy for what it called "people powered development" which encouraged NGOs to promote the welfare of the nation.

CIDA has responded with a number of programs to help NGOs and co-operatives that are involved in poverty alleviation and community development. One of the goals of this programming has been to reinforce the capabilities of NGOs to influence the Philippine government policy on poverty alleviation issues, as well as providing them with direct input into the planning and orientation of the CIDA program.

Similarly Canadian NGOs are very active in the community level throughout Indonesia where they are playing an important role in empowering people to take charge of their lives.

Clearly there are a lot of positive things that the aid program can do to promote democracy, but if we are to encourage greater respect for human rights and democracy we need judgment, patience and understanding. That is why we have opted for a constructive rather than a punitive approach to human rights. We need these qualities because democracies and respect for human rights are not created overnight nor is the path to democracy direct, continuous and free of trouble. We must exercise careful judgment in responding to tentative initiatives or setbacks for democracy. To act hastily and terminate aid may simply nip democracy in the bud.

We must recognize that many factors go into creating and nurturing democracy. If development is essential for democracy, and I believe it is, then we must expect that the state of democracy throughout the developing world will to some extent reflect the differing levels of social and economic progress.

If we do not take these factors into account we may end up punishing the poor and therefore less open countries in favour of the wealthier nations. This in effect would amount to punishing those who are already the worst off.

Moreover we must always remember that our system of democracy is not perfect and may not be suitable for every society. Our democracies are not perfect nor are they the final immutable product of all human striving. We must therefore be prepared to accept that other countries will adopt other systems of democratic rule that reflect very much their own history and culture. We cannot impose carbon copies of our systems on to other societies.

It will require patience, understanding and careful nurturing if democracy is to take root throughout the world. Nonetheless I believe that however bleak the situation is in many countries the prospects for democracy have never been better. A vast wave of democracy is surging around the world sweeping aside decades old military regimes and one-party states. In its wake are a host of fledgling democracies and literally thousands of popular organizations that together give expression to a collective desire for greater freedom and self-reliance.

Canada is supporting that movement, but we are not doing it through empty gestures or moralistic and indulgent rhetoric. We are supporting democracy and human rights through a balanced and pragmatic mix of programs, policies and diplomacy. Our approach places a premium on helping those who need help the most. It is a positive and a practical approach and in an imperfect world the one that works best of all.

Years from now the 1990s may well be recorded by future historians as the decade of democratization. We can help in this process but only by making hard choices and difficult decisions. Our government is making those decisions. I believe that if Canada continues along its present course, future generations of Canadians will be able to look back with pride on the record of this government and this country and our collective contribution to human rights and democracy.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate and I have followed the Prime Minister's remarks, particularly those made in the context of the Commonwealth.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister took the opportunity to discuss human rights on a broader basis rather than just simply linking it to development with other members of the Commonwealth, particularly with countries like India where there is a widespread abuse of human rights in the Punjab.

Amnesty International has said in a report that serious human rights violations in the Punjab have persisted under three governments. They have set the stage for the widespread abuse by passing the grossly unfair 1987 Terrorist and Disruptive Activities Act and letting extreme violations like torture and killings go unpunished. Suspected government opponents are routinely tortured in police stations and detention centres. Hundreds of Sikhs are killed in fake shoot-outs staged by police called "encounters". Well over 10,000 Sikhs are being held in the state without any chance of getting a trial under laws which members of the UN Human Rights Committee recently called disturbing and completely unacceptable.

Amnesty International said people are often picked up by police, tortured or disappear on the slightest suspicion that they have ties with the armed Sikh secessionist groups.

The New Democratic Party and I condemn this type of abuse of human rights in the Punjab. We are wondering whether the Prime Minister raised it with the Prime Minister of India at the Commonwealth Conference. I note that the Prime Minister of India was the first member of the Commonwealth to dissociate himself with the linkage of aid and human rights when the Prime Minister raised it.

I would like to ask the member if he feels that the appropriate venue, as I feel it is, for the Prime Minister to raise these matters is the Commonwealth. Does he not feel that he should have spoken out on all types of violations of human rights, not just linking it to aid?

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. It is a pertinent question since the Prime Minister has just returned from the Commonwealth Conference.

I do not believe that the Prime Minister confined his observations on human rights to the linkage with aid, nor has he historically over the past seven years. One will find when one examines this country's record in its dealings with South Africa, for example, that it is a very rigorous approach. It has been a graduated approach and only with the movement toward democratization that has occurred recently in South Africa has consideration been given by Commonwealth members, with a great deal of leadership from Canada, to the relaxation of some of the so-called people sanctions.

There are 25 countries in the Commonwealth that have declined to subscribe to a code of human rights behaviour. I do not know if India is one of those.

I listened with care to the comments the hon. member made about the situation in Punjab. I am aware of a number of the situations he describes.

I am afraid I do not know whether the Prime Minister in his bilateral meeting with the Prime Minister of India did discuss these instances, but I will undertake to relay the hon. member's question to the Prime Minister. It may be a question he may wish to put to the Prime Minister on some occasion.

I believe that the Prime Minister sincerely and very profoundly has human rights as a personal cause and that he does not see it within the narrow confines, although the very important confines, of linkage to aid.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the member opposite and his speech on aid and trade.

Recently the Prime Minister announced a review of all international support programs to ensure that they meet the aid criteria. It is still unclear to us on this side of the House what exactly the policy of the government is with respect to the linkage question. We in opposition, in fact all Canadians, have been asking for clarification on this point.

At a recent symposium here in Ottawa, NGOs put forth recommendations for a clearly defined criteria in determining aid and trade linkage issues. In other words, coherency. They agreed that there should be transparency in the development of foreign policies so that all Canadians could have input and that the government could be held accountable for its decisions.

I think we are curious, for instance, as to why Canada treats Myanmar, China and Indonesia one way and South Africa and Haiti in another. Those at the symposium expressed repeated frustration over the lack of consistency and transparency with the government in terms of the foreign policy development. They would like the government to live up to its own rhetoric on its behalf. If there is going to be a policy, it has to make sure that the policy is even right across the board.

These NGOs suggested strongly that the government take a holistic approach to its own foreign policy to involve in the process the NGOs.

I know the previous speaker mentioned that there was a good relationship between the NGOs and the government, as well as church organizations and human rights groups. These people wish to be involved and in fact do not believe that they are presently involved to an adequate extent.

They say consultation, consistency and conviction has got to be more prevalent with regard to the government's approach. I guess I would like the previous speaker to respond to whether Canada is isolating itself from some countries as opposed to others, or are we being more free with our policies with some countries? I have mentioned a couple of them with regard to high economic growth.

Take a country like Haiti where we do not seem to be dealing economically. I am wondering if he could comment with regard to the government's appropriate action and a rational approach to developing a foreign policy.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the questions of the hon. member opposite.

With regard to coherency, transparency and input from NGOs into our aid policy, I do not think there are any countries that have a better relationship between their aid policy and the formulators thereof under non-governmental organizations.

There may be times when the input is not followed to the letter, but consultation is constant. It is thorough and cordial, and it will continue that way.

The hon. member referred to Myanmar and Indonesia as two examples by implication where Canadian aid is continuing in the face of repressive regimes. There is no doubt that the regime in Myanmar is repressive.

Perhaps the hon. member did not hear the Prime Minister's response in Question Period yesterday when he confirmed that the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation program in Myanmar has been terminated for the very reason of the human rights abuses in that country.

In addition, I did refer in my speech to Indonesia and a number of programs whose purpose is in power and that in itself is, I think, salutary. Indonesia is not nearly as repressive a regime as Myanmar, God forbid. It is not a pluralist party state and the military is intimately involved in the administration of the government.

With reference to Haiti, I believe if the hon. member checks she will find that there are a number of NGO funded programs aided by CIDA within Haiti. A number of them are properly targeted.

I take her point about a holistic approach and I believe that that is exactly the kind of approach that is being followed.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the motion proposed by our colleague from the New Democratic Party would have Canada terminate immediately its assistance to some countries which are listed in the resolution.

I have a copy only of a draft resolution in front of me and I think that draft perhaps indicates the difficulty in this type of approach to foreign aid and trade. More specifically, the listing that was proposed by our colleagues from the New Democratic Party have been changed.

They cited among the other countries Gabon as a violator of human rights. Then Gabon was crossed out and Zaire was added. I do not offer that comment facetiously but rather as an indication of the difficulties in determining what I think is a misdirected exercise those countries which by some criterion are less than admirable practitioners of human rights and those which are not. I suppose all of us could be tempted to identify from our own particular points of view those countries that we think are violators and those countries that are not, but it always seems to me that in this sort of discussion that our energies would be better directed in two ways. One would be to attempt to promote the international criterion widely accepted, globally accepted if that were possible, but widely accepted criteria for human rights. Then you have a measure, then you have something that you can say: "Well, Indonesia and Iran do not measure up, but some other countries do".

The second thing that I think the energy should be directed toward in this sort of exercise is to ask ourselves this, and I say this quite seriously to our colleague in the New Democratic Party. Our international institutions are based essentially on a 19th century idea of the sovereignty of nation states. The United Nations is founded on the principle that the collectivity of the United Nations cannot intervene in the sovereign affairs of a nation state.

Yet, the sources of conflict today are increasingly at the sub-national level. They are within nations rather than between nations.

To what extent are we reshaping, modifying and improving our international institutions, and I speak not only of the United Nations family, but of a variety, a galaxy of international institutions. To what degree are we asking ourselves how those institutions can be improved so as to deal more effectively with sub-national disputes and by implication to deal with the questions of human rights, because almost invariably ethnic divisions within a nation state, or what I have called sub-national disputes, involve human rights problems?

I would urge my friends from the New Democratic Party, when they are considering this sort of an initiative, to ask themselves whether their time and energy would not be better directed to considering how Canada could contribute to a strengthening on the one hand of international criteria of what constitutes human rights, and on the other hand, to consider how our international institutions might be improved so as to enable them to deal more effectively with that growing source of international dispute, that is the ethnic and sub-national difficulties that we see in many countries of the world.

The second part of this resolution before us today urges the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico free trade negotiations in light of documented violations of human rights in Mexico.

Let us leave aside the question of what degree there are violations of human rights in Mexico, but let us think for a moment about the broader question. Is it likely that Canada will be able to contribute to the improvement of human rights in countries which, in our view, may violate human rights by terminating aid and trade with them? Do we think that is an effective sanction against their practices? Does history suggest—most recently I suppose in the case of Iraq and the gulf war—that economic sanctions of the sort envisaged here are the most effective way to bring about internal change in a country and to enhance the human rights in that country?

I think you will be able to infer that I have some real misgivings about this approach to our international relations.

I do not deny for a moment, and I cede to no one in my wish to see the evaluation of human rights be a feature of international relations, but whether those human rights are advanced by terminating aid and, as this resolutions says, terminating immediately Canadian participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico free trade negotiations, it seems to me an entirely different question.

Let me deal for a few minutes with the question of the negotiations with the United States and Mexico with a North American free trade area. In calling for the immediate termination of the negotiations, it strikes me that the New Democratic Party is once again setting itself on a course of protectionism. It is setting itself on that familiar and timid course of trade policy which is to attempt to develop autarky in Canada presumably and eschew the opportunities to develop greater trade relations elsewhere in the world.

Certainly for our part on this side of the House we seek to give further substance to Canada's long-standing commitment to freer trade, and I mean that in a broad, global sense, and to deny the sort of protectionism that seems to me implicit in the resolution that is before us today.

My party on this side of the House has urged co-operation among labour, business and government in Canada as a means of achieving a united front in the face of global competitive challenges. I have to regret that the government of the day does not seem capable of making any progress in bringing forward its ideas on how to enhance Canada's international competitiveness but, leaving that aside, in promoting our interests in multilateral free trade we have argued on this side of the House that the factors extending beyond the more traditional definitions of trade policy, such as environmental protection, labour standards and human rights concerns should also receive recognition.

We have certainly emphasized that continuing consultations with Parliament and with the people of Canada have to be prominent features of trade policy, again a commitment that this government seems incapable of giving substance to.

The talks involving Canada, Mexico and the United States were in effect triggered by the United States and Mexico. They were not a Canadian priority. By no stretch of the imagination could they be seen as a Canadian priority, but certainly once the two other countries in North America had embarked upon such discussions, it would have been impracticable for Canada to stay out of those negotiations.

The question however remains of how the government of the day has chosen to commit itself to those discussions. I deplore that in entering the negotiations the government has at no time set forward in a clear and cogent manner the reasons why it followed the U.S. initiative, the Mexican initiative, to attempt to create a North American Free Trade Agreement.

The Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade—its distinguished chairman is with us today and I say this is an all-party report—noted and I quote: "We were frankly amazed by the lack of detailed economic analysis of the cost and benefits of a North American free trade area".

Exactly so, we have not had from the government any clear indication of what it is that it is pursuing in the negotiations, what Canadian goals it is trying to achieve, what Canadian values it is attempting to express in those negotiations. Myriad questions remain unanswered about the trade negotiations with Mexico and the United States.

• (1550)

Has the government embarked upon the talks with the goal of enhancing Canadian export opportunities in a growing market? Is that a quite clearly defined goal, the principal goal or the only goal? Is the government attempting to, on the other hand, multilateralize Canada's bilateral trading relationship with the United States? Does it see the continental relationship which it helped to create as rather restrictive and now embraces the Mexico opportunity to, as I said, multilateralize Canada's bilateral trading relationship with the United States?

Did the government, when it announced its intention to participate, regard the possible formation of a North American free trade area as an insurance against a possible failure of the Uruguay round of the GATT? That is something we should know in a few weeks time.

Did it base itself on a more negative or at least the passive belief that Canada, having entered into a free trade agreement with the United States, had no choice but to participate? I think the answer is probably yes. That remains the government's basic position.

At the negotiating table have we embarked upon policy initiatives to attempt to protect our vested interests in the existing Canada–U.S. trade agreement, or does the government see this negotiation with Mexico as an opportunity to reopen some of the issues which have been a matter of concern and debate within our country?

Specifically on the question of subsidies, does the government see the Mexican talks as offering an opportunity to ensure not only guaranteed access to the U.S. and Mexican markets but a commitment from both those governments to limit, reduce or eliminate subsidies, an area which has not yet been tackled in the bilateral agreement with the United States?

The government's failure, it seems to me, to articulate its position clearly in these talks has contributed to the sort of resolution that we get today which, as I suggested earlier, seems to me to be an example of muddled thinking but one which, at the least, can be justified to some degree by the fact that the government has never been clear on what exactly it is attempting to do within the proposed trilateral agreement.

At the same time that the government has failed to offer Canadians a clear explanation of its policy initiative. We have not had any indication from the government that it is prepared to undertake the adjustment assistance which is a necessary corollary of both the bilateral free trade agreement with the United States and the proposed trilateral agreement involving Mexico.

Any comprehensive adjustment assistance program for Canadians who are affected by these two trade agreements should, in my view, recognize the uneven impact on Canadians of moving toward freer trade.

I would cede to no one in my advocacy of multilateral free trade. I doubt very much that the government has fulfilled any of the requirements with regard to adjustment assistance that would make such an opening an effective opportunity for all Canadians.

Let me say that on our part, our approach to the Mexican talks has been predicated on a number of principles. We would seek, if we were directly involved in the negotiations ourselves, the following points.

We think that the agreement should be a truly comprehensive trilateral agreement which would both further multilateralize our trading relations and mitigate, to put it at its least, the unsatisfactory bilateral nature of the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Second would be the negotiation of trilateral provisions so as to ensure that Canada is not asked to cede more than Mexico is prepared to contemplate.

Third would be an agreement which could be extended to Canada's trading partners elsewhere in the western hemisphere and potentially to Europe and to the Pacific region.

Fourth, we believe that an essential part of any approach to liberalized trade must be a comprehensive adjustment program for Canadian labour and for Canadian industry to be undertaken prior to the conclusion of the agreement.

Fifth, we would seek commitment from the government to uphold Canada's social, cultural, and regional development programs and an explicit statement of Canada's minimal position prior to the upcoming subsidies negotiations.

Sixth and finally, we would look for provisions in a trilateral agreement for the protection of environmental and social standards including labour.

That represents our approach to the current Mexico–Canada–U.S. trade talks, but I want to turn to a moment in conclusion to a somewhat wider issue concerning how we trade with the world, an opportunity that I want to develop a little as a result of the initiative taken today by the New Democratic Party.

Members of the House will remember that my party opposed the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement in 1988, not simply because of flaws in the agreement itself—and there were certainly a number of those—but more fundamentally because of the threat such a bilateral agreement can pose to Canadian independence. By entering into a bilateral free trade agreement with the Unites States to the relative exclusion of the rest of the world, Canada in our view would become further dependent on the U.S. market while diminishing its historic counterbalances overseas.

This, in short, was the road to continentalism and away from internationalism, a road which in my view a strong, independent Canada travelled at its peril.

The central question is how Canada can reduce its dependency on the United States within the context of the existing bilateral free trade agreement. Is there a way for Canada to avoid on the one hand continentalism and on the other a retrograde slide into protectionism as represented as I said just a moment ago by the approach adopted by the New Democratic Party?

What we have suggested is that the most effective and certainly the boldest way of achieving such a goal is to continue to expand Canada's open trading relations beyond the United States and beyond the continent. That is to say Canada should seek to become the first truly global outward oriented trading economy in North America.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from Etobicoke North and his comments with respect to this opposition motion by the New Democratic Party and the points he made

I might add that I am also a little confused by this New Democratic statement today. One would wonder why it would not have included in its list of countries that have violated human rights a country that should stand foremost in our minds today: Iraq.

The hon. member who posed this motion missed Iraq and Romania with the dictatorial regimes that they once had. You would think they would come at the top of the list because all of us in this Chamber and around the world did not have any difficulty noticing what those individual leaders and regimes did to the very fragile part of the economy and ecology of those countries, as well as what they did to human dignity.

The same member who proposed this motion recently asked that special consideration be given to Iraq and yet by this motion supports the Prime Minister in opposing aid to any country that has great human rights violations. If that is not the greatest contradiction of policy that I have heard in the last little while, it really poses some very difficult questions for me to understand what the point of view is of the New Democratic Party.

I will not comment on the fact that I cannot ask a question directly of the member, but to the previous speaker who had some difficulty with it. Regarding tremendous violations, and one that we are so familiar with which happened so recently, does he believe that we should not rethink the situation as we have done with South Africa because of a human rights violations and the lack of democracy?

There are a lot of other countries listed here that clearly have dictatorial regimes, very evidently very hard on any individuals who oppose them. Should this government or other governments not consider some aid sanctions under those circumstances? Would he not agree that unless some very severe situations should turn around in those countries and regimes we should demonstrate publicly, openly and in this House some restrictions of aid? I did not say total trade, but I talked about aid. I would like him to comment on that.

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, my colleague from the government side of the House has asked, as it were, for a comment on the policies of the New Democratic Party. I would only say to him that they are like the peace of God: they passeth all understanding.

On the substance of his question as to whether there are instances where Canada should pursue unilateral economic sanctions, there may be. I would hope that in every instance before contemplating such a step we would consult with our friends in the OECD and in the United Nations on such matters and attempt to evolve, as we did successfully in the case of Iraq, a system of economic sanctions that might, if given more time, have been more effective. That question is somewhat academic now.

It does not undermine the fact that the consultations and co-operative effort are, I think, a better way to go in almost any instance than to pursue a wholly unilateral approach. I think one gets into this terribly difficult question of arbitrarily deciding who is good and who is bad, who is reprehensible and who is to be rewarded. I think that sort of approach is more effective if it is carried out on a multilateral basis.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could ask the hon. member for Etobicoke North some questions about his comments on trade policy generally. He used his intervention in this debate to discuss some of the issues on trade and particularly his attitude toward a free trade agreement with Mexico.

I take it, and I hope I am correct in this, that he is the spokesperson for his party on issues of international trade and therefore his comments on the issue of the free trade agreement and discussions with Mexico are an authoritative statement of his party's position. I just want to be sure that I understood the general drift of his remarks.

As I understood it, he sees no problem whatever with Canada entering into a free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico, but what he had instead were some—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brewin: We hear the other wing of the Liberal Party apparently objecting to this characterization of things. I will rely on the member for Etobicoke North to explain himself rather than his erstwhile friends to my far right.

As I understood his position, he essentially agrees in principle, if I may put it that way, with a free trade agreement.

He would have us participate in the discussions. His concerns are rather that the government is, if I can put it in the vernacular, screwing up the idea rather than with the idea in itself. I think I should explain to him that our party's position is very clear and unequivocal. We do not favour a free trade agreement with Mexico and we are strongly opposed to participation in those negotiations.

I would like to hear him just clearly put on record so there can be no misunderstanding his party's position with respect to the free trade agreement discussions with Mexico.

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, I would refer the hon. member for Victoria to the sixth report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade dated December 12, 1990 where the position of the Official Opposition is set forward quite clearly and in some detail.

My hon. friend spoke about my erstwhile friends to the right. They are not erstwhile friends. I am proud to say they are present friends and they will be future friends, so I would not accept for a moment that they are erstwhile.

Indeed, I would also recommend to the hon. member for Victoria who seems to take an interest in these matters that on this complex question we eschew the simplistic and protectionist approach of the New Democratic Party. It is in no way our policy to attempt to circle the wagons and not equip Canada to compete effectively with the challenges of a global marketplace.

If the hon. member does not know, then I think he should know that the very same questions which are being posed to Canadians by the negotiations with Mexico and indeed to a substantial degree by the agreement with the United States, flawed though I think it is, are the same questions in essence that will be posed to Canadians in the years ahead by the growing economies of Asia, by the resurgence of Europe 1992.

These are the same questions of how Canadians compete. How can they compete better? How can they equip themselves to compete? These are questions which lamentably this government has not addressed. It has not addressed them. It is a signal failure of their whole approach to free trade with the United States and now negotiations with Mexico, but which for my part, our party is committed to.

When we form the next government, I can assure the hon. member for Victoria that we shall commit ourselves to a program of assistance which will ensure that every Canadian benefits equitably and fully from the advantages of a freer global trading economy.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the motion tabled in the House this morning by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, a motion that to my mind needs considerable clarification.

I would like to start by extending my warmest congratulations to the Prime Minister on his vigorous and impressive statement on human rights during the recent Commonwealth Conference of heads of government held in Harare. It was a splendid opportunity to announce Canada's carefully considered position on human rights issues and their impact on the process of determining Canadian channels and levels of assistance.

First of all, issues as important as human rights cannot and must not be avoided just because they are delicate matters and may lead to disagreement between governments.

Second, the profound and sustained commitment of our fellow Canadians to respect for these fundamental rights was reflected in the past few days, more clearly than ever before, in the past few days in the various media that shape and reflect public opinion. This positive reaction to the Canadian government's initiative makes it incumbent upon us to persevere in our efforts to improve our record, to strengthen our commitment and to intensify our dialogue. We have learned, from history and experience, that the advancement of respect for human rights and establishing democratic institutions based on participation by the people went hand in hand with economic development. We are also aware that in many countries, the tradition of respect for the law is a fragile one.

However, that is where we must start, either to discourage corruption, to ensure a harmonious change of government, to safeguard the yield on production and investment, or for a host of other reasons.

It was the fragile nature of respect for these fundamental rights that inspired the government to found the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, located in Montreal. The purpose of this centre is to foster a broader understanding for the need for reforms that make respect for human rights an integral part of the day-to-day concerns of societies, their institutions or agencies and their respective governments.

It is not an easy task. We have seen a tendency among certain countries to co-operate with their neighbours in hiding from the international community the extent of human rights violations committed in their respective territories. However, such strategies, used by countries who vote as a block to cover up the real situation, are doomed.

Canada will continue to use its influence on a bilateral level and join countries that uphold the same principles, in order to exert pressure that will not be limited to mere reprimands of a moral nature.

Nevertheless, we are glad to see that national and international institutions have created a number of mechanisms that embody our respect for human rights. Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, much remains to be done because we must improve these mechanisms and define new kinds of rights.

We must be aware of the various dimensions of human rights and today's and tomorrow's imperatives, because world peace and security are based on respect for these rights, and economic and social development will not be viable without that respect.

For instance, in many societies, women have traditionally been disadvantaged. That is why the defence of women's rights has always been an urgent priority for Canada. Our country is generally recognized in the international community as a leader in this important field. Thus integrating women in development is a priority of the Canadian official development assistance strategy.

On another level, Canada was one of the first donor countries to be concerned about the fate of the most vulnerable groups in the application of structural adjustment policies by developing countries.

CIDA is now busy working with its partners in developing countries on economic reform and structural adjustment policies that will considerably improve rather than worsen the condition of the weakest social groups, especially women and children.

This work is even more important since the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Convention on the Rights of the Child. We know the leading role that Canada played at the World Summit for Children in New York last year, under the co-chairmanship of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Our country is an ardent defender of children in the international community.

We committed about $350 million through CIDA last year to initiatives that directly or indirectly benefit children in developing countries, in such fields as health, education, the environment, improving the role of women in development or in other key areas like food aid or AIDS prevention.

Support for child vaccination programs is a large part of Canada's aid for health in developing countries. You will recall that in 1985, the Prime Minister of Canada launched the first phase of the Canadian international immunization program. Nineteen national organizations and six international agencies took part in it.

Under this program, Canada committed a total of $43 million over five years. This international effort helped save the lives of over 8 million children in the world. We recently began the second phase of this worldwide immunization program which will extend vaccination coverage for the most dangerous childhood diseases. These major commitments will contribute significantly to the improvement of opportunity and living conditions for the world's children. Is the right to life, Madam Speaker, not the first human right?

In these times of profound and rapid changes, in this world where peoples freed from the colonial yoke found their most legitimate aspirations reflected in the precepts of the United Nations Charter, we must think collectively on what must be done to prevent a setback in hopes for progress in respect for human dignity.

In 1987, when we published the Canadian official development assistance strategy in Sharing Our Future, the Government of Canada undertook to tie its international development policies to respect for human rights. We set up a system on which to base our assessments and judgments. These appraisals are essential because every situation is difficult and comparisons are quite misleading.

In countries where human rights are systematically violated and where there is no guarantee that Canadian aid reaches its destination, the channels and levels of government-to-government assistance are reconsidered. Aid is then concentrated on our development partners who work directly at the grass roots, like non-governmental organizations that can transmit this aid directly to the poor in needy regions.

In the case of Zaire, Madam Speaker, mentioned in the motion by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, CIDA's aid program is targeted mainly at rural areas. It is delivered on the basis of partnership, thus meeting constraints and operational difficulties. Much of the cooperation program is now inoperative since many cooperants were evacuated from Kinshasa, Butembo and Goma.

Of the 71 Canadians, including dependants, in Zaire as part of the bilateral cooperation program, 61 were evacuated, Madam Speaker. The ten remaining provide a minimum essential service.

For the time being, we aim to provide the essential in emergency humanitarian assistance through the Red Cross or other religious or charitable organizations represented in Kinshasa.

It must be understood, Madam Speaker, that any money sent by CIDA never goes to the government itself. Only discussions are held between governments to establish the country's needs and the money is then paid to the agencies that do the work.

The people of Zaire, already among the poorest in the world, were hard hit by the events of September, which will lead to more misery with the destruction of many businesses and factories that provided employment and with the havoc in the food supply system.

Madam Speaker, withdrawing aid would amount to penalizing these disadvantaged groups twice for a political situation for which they are not responsible. Although it wishes to ensure that Canadian development aid does not contribute to the legitimacy of repressive regimes, the government must also ensure that victims of human rights violations are not doubly penalized by being deprived of the aid they need, in addition to being deprived of their most fundamental rights.

If a constructive instead of a punitive approach is taken to the issue of human rights, development assistance, if granted with discernment, can contribute very substantially not only to development but also to the cause of human rights. In fact, that is one of the points the Prime Minister made in his statement at the Commonwealth Conference.

Incidentally, Madam Speaker, perhaps I may remind honourable members that the next Sommet de la Francophonie will be held in Paris instead of Zaire, because Canada wanted to protest against the abuses committed by the present regime. In fact, at the Chaillot Summit, our Prime Minister intends to suggest setting up a unit for human rights and democracy within the Francophonie, whose mission would be to prepare elections, observe the electoral process and train staff. Five elections of this kind will take place next year, and Canada is determined to support the process.

Developing an appropriate Canadian response is the most difficult and delicate aspect of promoting human rights as part of our foreign policy. In our relations with other countries, we use the mechanisms at our disposal to encourage or persuade these countries to apply internationally accepted standards.

We must understand, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister, that our aid program complements other mechanisms used by the government to implement its foreign policy, such as the expression of criticism through multilateral agencies for the protection of human rights, and putting restrictions on official relations, trade and sales of military and other equipment.

Promoting human rights and democracy can be supported in a host of ways. CIDA is actively involved in developing ways to support this process through NGOs, involved in education, health, technical assistance and other areas. We also support the activities of regional and multilateral agencies such as the Organization of American States, the Commonwealth and the Francophonie.

There are a variety of positive approaches and it is the duty of us all to support as best we can the worthy efforts of the grass-roots in developing countries. It is also our responsibility to support the government in its efforts to convince the international community to consolidate the economic development and human rights agendas. This way, not only do we promote justice, but at the same time we give human societies a greater chance of enjoying real economic and social development.

The Canadian foreign policy continues to be based upon the promotion and protection of human rights and basic freedoms. Both at the bilateral and multilateral level, Canada has worked very hard and with dedication to promote the implementation of international standards regarding these rights.

It was clear from the Prime Minister's statements in Harare that this government is firmly determined to see these factors fully integrated in Canadian foreign relations and that development assistance programs reaffirm human dignity.

Madam Speaker, I fully support this approach and, in closing, I would like to remind you that on December 1st we will be celebrating the 43d anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which states, and I quote:

> Recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I listened intently to the hon. member's comments and I know of her deep concern for humanitarian aid, whether it is in our own country or internationally, and so I welcomed her comments. But she ended by referring to the remarks made by our Prime Minister in Harare. Of course, every time our Prime Minister speaks when he is out of the country he just adds to the confusion.

Canadians, especially the NGOs and the receiving countries, do not know where they stand as far as aid and trade with Canada.

I was pleased that yesterday the Prime Minister, in response to questions from the opposition, did at least clarify the difference between providing, as he called it, aid versus commercial transactions, aid giving and granting capacity of Canada in regard to the international community. That is what it is limited to. He tried to clarify his remarks by referring to aid versus commercial transactions and trade.

I would like to ask the member what her interpretation would be of the Prime Minister's remarks in regard to the plight of the children in Iraq.

Last week we had a delegation make representations to members of Parliament about the plight of the children in Iraq who had to be operated on literally in the streets during the war. They showed us videos of a child's hand being cut off, of other children being affected by the bombs and the shrapnel still in their bodies. Because of the sanctions, they do not have the hospital equipment, the bandages and the medicine to operate on these children. One hospital was shown as not having any windows. They cannot operate on these children because the dust will blow through the windows and there will be infection and these children will die.

There is an international appeal right now to help the children of Iraq. The Speaker received an invitation from a committee of the European Parliament to send a Canadian parliamentary delegation to see for ourselves what these children are facing and how we as Canadians can help.

Taking into account the Prime Minister's remarks when he was out of the country and yesterday during Question Period, what is her interpretation? Would her party be in full support to help the children of Iraq or, because of the human rights violations in Iraq, we would not help these children in Iraq?

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I would like to return the favour to the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, who is also very concerned by development and anything that goes on in this world.

His question concerning those children suffering in Irak touches me very deeply, as a mother and as a former teacher. One cannot be insensitive when one hears about children suffering in some part of the world. On the other hand, madam Speaker, if Saddam Hussein, the president of Iraq wants to make amend, if he shows good faith—and we will soon know the outcome of the mission that went to Iraq—and if he does not continue to build an arsenal of nuclear, bacteriological and chemical weapons, I imagine that the countries of the world will show compassion and might lift the embargo if, in the first place, good will is shown on the part of Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, it is interesting. I think the House has indicated its support of the Prime Minister's statement in tying, aid, trade and human rights together.

This party is asking that it take concrete action so that it is not hollow rhetoric, that in fact it gives meaning to the government's program. That is what our resolution tried to do today. It lists a number of actions that would be supportable by many sides of the House.

It also points out that Mexico is a major violator of human rights. In addition to that, we are being asked by this government and the United States to join in a negotiation to a treaty in which Canadian sovereignty would be reduced in this treaty and which our standards for social programs, health care and labour rights would be reduced, and generally our economy would be reduced. We are being asked to join in this.

Our motion today asks that that negotiation be discontinued because of Mexico's human rights violations. More than 100 members of the opposition party have been killed; hundreds of trade unionists killed.

The Liberal Party today opted out of that and said: "No, we support that and we want to continue those negotiations".

Through you, Madam Speaker, may I ask the previous member if she supports that initiative of the Liberal Party to continue those negotiations with Mexico in light of the human rights violations there. Does she support the fact that the Liberal Party wants to continue those negotiations in light of those human rights violations toward a Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade agreement.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind the hon. member for the New Democratic Party that the government's approach to human rights is intended to be positive and constructive, not punitive. Canadian aid must not aid and abet repressive regimes.

I happen to know that the New Democratic Party objected to free trade with the United States, and now that we are discussing free trade with Mexico, it is objecting again.

The hon. member claims that Canada's sovereignty will be diminished by free trade with Canada and Mexico. I don't think Canada's sovereignty is affected by the Free Trade Agreement.

Regarding the intent of our policies at External Affairs on human rights violations, the government has made it clear it does not want to be punitive. Madam Speaker, if we isolate ourselves and refuse to talk to other countries, how can we exert a positive influence and be able to change things?

I want to make it clear to my colleague in the New Democratic Party that I support the Free Trade Agreement with Canada, United States and Mexico, as I did when this extremely important issue was before the House. Today, Madam Speaker, the economies of our various countries are so intertwined that we suffer the consequences of a decision made halfway around the world.

Madam Speaker, it is important for Canadian businesses to have a big market, to be able to invest and to have access to markets that are much larger and more substantial that our own.

Today, our industries seem to be adjusting to the situation, and we will see that the agreement will be a very beneficial one for Canada. Personally, I was not aware there were human rights violations in Mexico or that they were as substantial as the hon. member claimed. I will be glad to check this, but I think that if we maintain economic ties, it is a way to be able subsequently to exert some kind of influence and be in a position to protect the people of these countries, since they suffer most as a result of these human rights violations.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have to say just by way of opening that the hypocrisy of the government on this issue is absolutely breathtaking.

We have just listened to the minister go on with this long explanation about how devoted the government is to human rights in other countries and to progressive policies in official development assistance when this minister has presided over the persistent dismantling of the programs that this country has supported for years and years and years, the increasing commercialization for Canadian benefit of official development assistance and the complete ignoring of reports from this House of Commons committees on the issue of human rights development.

In 1987 the Standing Committee on External Affairs produced a report "For Whose Benefit". That was the name of the report. It recommended a human rights unit be established in the Policy Branch of CIDA to co-ordinate human rights policy with External Affairs, that CIDA develop an appropriate human rights country classifications system and that an annual ODA human rights review be tabled in Parliament.

What has happened over the last four years? Zilch. Nothing has happened. The minister has been completely negligent in the way in which he has responded to the report of the standing committee with respect to human rights.

She has presided equally over a change of programs to favour business; the merging of the Special Programs Branch with the Business Co-operations Branch, severe cutbacks of assistance and aid to reputable NGOs, non-governmental organizations such as CUSO, Crossroads and Canada World Youth.

The minister has no business standing up in this House and proclaiming the government's virtue with respect to human rights. This government has set this country's reputation back over the last eight years.

The Prime Minister said in his remarks in Harare that Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of freedom. He said: "We shall increasingly be channelling our development assistance to those countries which so respect the fundamental rights and freedoms". Yet in Mexico, 5 million to 10 million children under the age of 14 are working in Middle Ages conditions.

This government sits down at the table with that government and negotiates a free trade agreement, the result of which will be that Canadian workers will be asked to compete with those who are working under primitive working conditions with no rights whatsoever. The ultimate long-term effect will be to take from Canadian workers the rights that they presently enjoy. That will be the equalization effect of a free trade agreement with Mexico that is permitted to continue to violate the basic rights of human beings under the UN charter.

There is only one approach to trade agreements with Mexico and with other countries in the world. It is to say as a precondition there must be an agreement to have a social charter with that country ensuring that employment rights, human rights, environmental rights are maintained and developed in those countries to a standard that meets international standards, standards to which Canada can adhere. Only at that point can Canada consider free trade agreements with those countries. Only then will Canadian workers be protected from the impact of an attempt to compete with those who suffer as they do in Mexico.

The motion before the House calls on the House to take note of the Prime Minister's recent statements and calls on the government to discontinue immediately the current negotiations with Mexico and to review all international support programs to ensure they meet the eight criteria announced by the Prime Minister.

Any discussion of this motion has to begin with an analysis of the extent of the problem involving human rights violations around the world. First of all, it should be seen that generally there is a rise in violations around the world.

Second, every country on the globe, including Canada, is guilty at one level or another of significant human rights violations. In our case, we see the condition on reserves across Canada and the treatment of our native people. We had the example even in this House a couple of weeks ago of a government driving through legislation forcing its employees back to work, counter to the provisions in my respectful submission of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which requires all Canadians to have equality and respect of the law, including, I submit, the law giving employees in Canada the right to free collective bargaining and the right to strike, except in exceptional circumstances.

Third, it is necessary to note that problems with human rights violations do not simply involve people languishing in far-flung jails. The violations occur in a myriad of ways, and the violations of human rights that are occurring around the world are not merely the product of foreign feuds or tinpot dictators in local countries with which we have no connection. The reality is that we in the west are co-conspirators in the violation of human rights that is occurring increasingly in every corner of the globe. We export the means of repression and violation. Now the methodology of torture, as documented by Amnesty International, has taken on even more horrific tones in the latter part of this century.

There is documentation suggesting that the U.S. government, for example, has trained those who use the most modern methods of torture against their own citizens, torture which is becoming more deadly and more efficient.

The violations of human rights that are occurring around the globe are often generally in the interests of the countries of the west, including Canada, and we along with the United States, which has been particularly active and aggressive in this, have in fact encouraged regimes which are repressive, maintained regimes which are oppressive and actively supported them.

We have often given indirect assistance through our propping up of multinational corporations and our use of the products of multinational corporations, our integration in the international economic system, while we stand by and watch those same corporations locally sustain repressive regimes.

We see the expansion of the U.S. military all around the world. We see it from our part of the world particularly in the Pacific, and the dumping of toxic wastes in other countries, the use of other countries essentially as U.S. military bases.

Finally, we have supported consistently policies which bring Third World countries into environmental, economic and social degradation, all of which is as significant a violation of human rights as a violation of the individual right to security of person. The UN human rights charter itself has sustained the proposition that social, economic and environmental rights are equally a matter of concern as are other human rights. Our government, as demonstrated by its persistent refusal to respond to every urging to change its policies in respect of development assistance, is a co-conspirator in the deprivation of human rights around the world. We see the practical effect on Canadians of these policies because as human rights sink around the world, as people are deprived of their employment rights, the rights to organize, the rights to bargain, the right to reasonable working conditions, the right to strike around the world, as these rights are deprived of people they put other countries in an intense competitive position vis-à-vis Canada.

How are we going to change it? First, we must change the international economic social environmental policies and structures. Second, we have to change Canadian official development assistance policies as outlined, for example, by Canadian churches in a submission today, as outlined in the resolution before the House and as outlined by the Standing Committee on External Affairs. We have to deal with the worst cases and those worst cases have been outlined: Iraq and Iran, China over Tibet, Indonesia over East Timor, Kenya and South Africa over its violations through the use of RENAMO in Mozambique. We have to support the agencies of the United Nations and the Commonwealth that are seeking to deal with human rights violations.

We must support Amnesty International and other similar organizations, and we must not participate in free trade negotiations with Mexico which will lead to the violation of rights of the people in those countries and the violation of rights of Canadians.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, once again I want to say what a positive thing it is that we have had this debate here today, but I want to go back to the member for Halifax about his comments this morning when we have to separate, and understand the difference between rhetoric and reality.

Earlier today I asked the member from Spadina, if he realized that about 70 per cent of our manufacturing jobs in this country were related to exports that involve countries that in some way, shape or form were involved in human rights violations, and the member for Spadina was quite direct. He would just say: "Listen, we would cut off all of those contracts".

Does the member for Victoria share that view? Everyone in this House is supportive of the fact that we develop plans and approaches to eliminate human rights violations. Even the New Democratic Party earlier today complimented the Prime Minister on his initiative of recent days. I think we have to give him the benefit of the doubt that his words are absolutely sincere and he will back them up with action.

I want to ask the member what he will say to the Canadian Labour Congress, Premier Rae, Premier Harcourt and Premier Romanow who are involved in the national economy of this country and who are concerned about jobs and agricultural exports. I just do not see it as black and white as the member for Spadina. I would like to hear what the member for Victoria says.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I, too, agree that of course it is not a matter of black and white. As I said in my speech, all countries including Canada violate human rights in one fashion or another and no one is perfect and no country is perfect.

It should be understood that there are choices that we make as a country. Our official development assistance for example is limited. We would like to see more of it, but it is limited and we are forced to make choices. For example, we had before the external affairs committee people from Mozambique who are pleading for money. The government just recently agreed to give $1 million extra aid, but that country needs far more if it is going to stand on its feet and it is going to survive and the people in that country are going to survive. We are providing assistance to South Africa, to Namibia, countries which have the potential for doing the right thing, programs which are very good.

• (1650)

With those potentials, why then is the government providing Export Development Corporation assistance to Mexico with the human rights record that it has? How come Petro-Canada is entering into agreements with Burma? How come Canada is giving a $500 million line of credit to Kuwait after the treatment that that country metes out to Palestinians? How come Canada is entering into agreements to provide military equipment to Saudi Arabia, given the record of that country in respect of the rights of women? How come Canada is giving $30 million of foreign aid to Kenya when Kenya is financing RENAMO in Mozambique? How come Canada is supporting Iran, Rwanda, China, Zaire, Indonesia? We have choices and we should make those choices, as the Prime Minister says.

The Prime Minister was quite correct and the Prime Minister I am sure if he comes to the vote on this, if it should get to a vote, will have to vote in favour of this motion because this motion puts into words the sentiment that the Prime Minister offered in Harare. What we would like to see is the government put action behind the words of the Prime Minister in southern Africa.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Has the period for questions and comments elapsed?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There was only, as the hon. member knows, five minutes of questions and comments as the hon. member's colleagues are sharing their 20 minute period. There was only five minutes and that five minute period had expired, so we are resuming debate.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise today to join in this debate and perhaps attempt to move from the general that has exercised the attention of the House for some considerable time today and bring it down to one specific. Before doing so I would like to briefly review the terms of the motion which urges the House to "take note of the Prime Minister's recently stated commitment to the principle of linking government aid to respect for human rights" and then urges the government "to review immediately all international support programs to ensure that they meet the aid criteria as announced by the Prime Minister".

An excellent suggestion. The one instance I would like to offer where justice cries that this be done, one of many as my hon. colleague noted, but a very important one, is in the sad country of Burma, now subject to renaming by its despotic military rulers as Myanmar. Consistency demands that the fine words of the Prime Minister be matched with equitable actions by the government.

In this instance those equitable actions require that the government vote its 80.5 per cent share in Petro-Canada to compel the company to cease its commercial activities in Burma. The reason for this is simple. The outlaw regime currently governing Burma has committed among the worst human rights atrocities to be found in that unhappy corner of the world and cannot any longer be permitted to escape the censure of enlightened world opinion.

This is not a debatable point. Amnesty International in its 1991 report notes and I quote: "More than 350 prisoners of conscience and possible prisoners of conscience were known to be among thousands of people believed held for political reasons. Many were detained without charge or trial but others were sentenced after unfair trials by military tribunals. Torture and ill treatment of prisoners were reportedly common".

The same report continues elsewhere: "By the end of 1990 the actual number of people held for political reasons was thought to be in the thousands".

This is to say nothing of the routine torture that some of those prisoners undergo.

It is, for example, for her brave resistance to the despotic regime that Madam Aung San Suu Kyi has been awarded this year's Nobel Peace Prize for her, as the citation says, non-violent struggle for democracy and human rights within Burma against the military government now ruling.

The Canadian government, to its credit, acknowledges its concerns for human rights in Burma. The then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the right hon. member for Yellowhead, issued a news release on October 5, 1990 expressing the government's grave concern that members of the National League for Democracy continued to be detained by the interim government. That is a direct quote from his news release, which went on to call for the release of all political prisoners.

The Canadian government acknowledged the seriousness of the situation as well when it instructed the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation, the international development arm of the Petro-Canada Crown corporation, to withdraw from its oil exploration assistance activities in Burma. This withdrawal took place even before at least some of the PCIAC activities were taken over by CIDA after the February 1991 budget.

However, and this is the situation that compels me to speak today, Petro-Canada, which has been Canada's flagship energy company now subject to privatization and now being sold to private investors, is still active in Burma and the Canadian government is doing nothing about it.

Let me quote from the June 18, 1991 Petro-Canada prospectus. Page 19 states: "Since 1988 Petro-Canada has substantially increased its international exploration activities, particularly in areas such as Myanmar", that is Burma. "In Myanmar Petro-Canada operates one offshore block in which it has a 70 per cent interest and participates in another in which it has a 30 per cent interest. In 1990 more than 620 miles, which is to say 1,000 kilometres, of seismic data were gathered and drilling is planned for both blocks in 1991".

Page 36 of the same prospectus reads: "In each of the countries in which Petro-Canada is active the petroleum exploration and production rights held by the company are issued by the central government in that country either directly or through its national oil company. After according Petro-Canada a percentage of production to cover its exploration, development and operating costs, the agreements generally provide for sharing the balance of production between Petro-Canada and the government or national oil company".

What that means is that Petro-Canada, our company, is aiding the military dictatorship of Burma in the development of those resources.

There is more. I quote from the Edmonton Journal of May 25, 1990, an article from the Canadian Press datelined Calgary: "'Petro-Canada paid $6 million in cash to the military dictatorship of Burma for the right to mount a drilling program there', the Crown corporation said Wednesday. Petro-Canada spokesman Sheilah O'Brien said Wednesday the national oil corporation turned its cash over to Burmese authorities as a 'signing bonus.' The payment, which goes to Burma's military regime was required to close a deal for rights to prospect for oil and natural gas on a concession or land area".

That is blood money. That is blood money being paid by what was our national oil company. More recently it has been revealed that Petro-Canada is training in its Calgary office the son of the managing director of the state owned Myanmar Oil Corporation as part of its technology transfer program.

We cannot stress enough that Canada's involvement through Petro-Canada brings great comfort to the Burmese military regime. I quote from the Bangkok Post of November 9, 1989: "At a time when many donors have adopted a wait and see attitude, Canada has continued its assistance to the economic and social development of Myanmar. Rear Admiral Wong Wom Kym said in Rangoon, 'A friend in need is a friend indeed'".

Is it not delightful to have Canada known as a friend indeed of the military dictators of Burma? There was a time before the government's privatization move when it would have been easy to instruct the Crown corporation to get out of Burma. As section 89(1) of the Financial Administration Act had it, and I quote: "The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the appropriate minister, give a directive to any parent Crown corporation if the Governor in Council is of the opinion that it is in the public interest to do so".

The thing to bear in mind is that it is still possible to do so even after privatization for, as is noted in the prospectus again of June 18, 1991: "The Government of Canada has stated that it will deal with its common shares as an investor and not as a manager, and that it does not intend to exercise the right to vote at meetings of shareholders although it reserves the right to do so".

The Crown has reserved the right to vote those shares. Therefore in the interest of making real the policy about which the Prime Minister has spoken it must vote those shares. It must vote those shares to cause Petro-Canada to cease its activity in Burma until such time as the legitimate democratic governance of that country is restored.

In pursuit of such a policy almost a year ago on November 22, 1990, I wrote to William Hopper, chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada. I quote from my letter: "I urge you to take the admittedly difficult step of winding down and thereafter suspending all of Petro-Canada's activities in Burma", now known by some as Myanmar, "as quickly as possibly. I further urge you to ensure the suspension of activity prevails until such time as democracy is restored to that unhappy land".

Mr. Hopper kindly replied on December 6, stating in part that were the company to follow that advice "we would, however, have sacrificed a long-term investment opportunity in response to what we hope will be a short-term political problem". It is more than a short-term political problem. It is a tragedy and a crime.

Also on that same day I wrote to the energy minister, the hon. member for Provencher, and to the then minister of external affairs, the right hon. member for Yellowhead, urging them to "convince your cabinet colleagues to vote the government's shares in Petro-Canada in such a way as to effect the company's withdrawal from all operations in Burma". Although I did not receive a reply from the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, I did receive a reply from the minister of energy in which he noted: "It would be contrary to the policy we have been following since 1984 and to the present course of privatization for the government to vote its shares in this point".

We have a new policy enunciated by the Prime Minister. I must conclude I would do so by urging them to follow that policy and forget the previous one.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to underscore that the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister is not a new policy. It has been in existence as long as this government has been in office and, in part, when the previous government was in office. I note that the New Democratic Party has been playing a giant game of human rights hopscotch around the world, picking and choosing those regimes it wants to talk about and, among other things, the member for Victoria said that Mozambique ought to be getting more aid.

I would ask him: Does he know clearly what the human rights record is of Mozambique? Has Mozambique now passed the test for human rights in order to get more aid? If he knows, if he really knows, does he approve of the human rights record of Mozambique? While I am asking questions like that, since it changed the motion and crossed out the word "Gabon" in the motion and added "Zaire", why rather than adding Zaire did it not add Cuba?

Cuba is not the most stellar example of democratic institutions. The caucus of the New Democratic Party ought to understand it very well. Enough of its members take their Christmas vacations in Cuba. They should come back informed. Why would they not talk about Cuba as being a country that ought to have its aid cut back because of its human rights abuses?

To take the point that the member for Edmonton East has just made regarding Burma, he would have the public understand that there has been no change in aid allocations regardless of regime. I want to outline for him that countries that saw Canadian assistance increase or resume for good human rights performance, improved democratic practices, or better governments are Benin in 1991 following democratic elections, Haiti in 1990 following President Aristide's election, the Philippines in 1986 following President Aquino's democratic election, and Uruguay in 1985 following President Sanguinetti's democratic election.

Some countries saw Canadian assistance decrease or cut off entirely because of human rights abuses or non-democratic practices: Haiti in 1991 in response to the coup—I hope members from the NDP caucus can remember that far back—China in 1989 as a result of the Tiananmen Square massacre, Myanmar in 1988 in response to the forceful repression and I will have more to add to that, and in 1987 in response to a coup bilateral aid was suspended as a result of the apartheid policy of the government in Fiji now. Assistance was suspended after an execution in Berchina Faso and resumed in 1991.

Members of the New Democratic Party would believe that once aid is in place it stays regardless of the regime. That is not true. The aid has been cut off, suspended in Burma. They should not mislead the Canadian public by letting it believe that aid has gone on in unrelenting consistency during this regime.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, very briefly, the reason I did not deal with any of the instances raised by the hon. member is that I had but 10 minutes to speak and it took 10 minutes to go through and deal reasonably with the matter of Petro-Canada's activities in Burma. It is a fact that the federal government could vote its shares in Petro-Canada and cause Petro-Canada to withdraw from Burma.

It is a fact that as long as the federal government does not do that Petro-Canada remains active in Burma and that gives direct aid and comfort to the military dictatorship in Burma. That is the matter I chose to deal with.

Just very briefly dealing with the question of Mozambique, if the hon. member wishes to imply that the human rights record of the Government of Mozambique is not spotless, I will agree with him. Compared to the abuses of the South Africa financed, so-called Renamo movement operating in Mozambique routinely, for example, decapitating people at whim, I would say that the real human rights abuses, the most dangerous and persistent human rights abuses in Mozambique, come not from its government but from the puppets of South Africa.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate today on the motion brought before us by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

In this motion the hon. member makes the remarkable contention that the human rights situation in Mexico is so deplorable that we must suspend our trade negotiations with that country and the United States. By making this claim, he has clearly decided to overlook the substantial progress Mexico has made in the human rights field. Beyond that, he has chosen to scorn the potential contained within a North American free trade agreement to build a better society in Mexico, a society better able to provide and protect the freedoms of its citizens.

I will return shortly to the important improvements that Mexico has made in its human rights record, but I would like to begin by talking briefly about the ways in which a closer economic association between Mexico and its two northern neighbours will contribute to the strengthening of political, legal and human rights.

Like governments everywhere in the last decade, Mexico has been part of the movement to throw off the shackles of government control and create a new economy in which market signals play a much more important role. The government of President Carlos Salinas has embarked on a major program of privatization and deregulation that will create a more flexible economy better able to meet the needs of its citizens.

One of the inevitable results of this process is the removal from the close, continuous and suffocating control by government of so many aspects of daily economic life. Economic power in Mexico is being wrested from the hands of bureaucrats and is being returned to the marketplace where it belongs. As economic power is being distributed to more hands, so is political power.

It is no coincidence that in all the world's most advanced economies, in all the G-7 countries including our own, democratic institutions hold sway.

When free economic actors with diverse interests pursue their various objectives, a free political dialogue is the inevitable result. The ambitious program of the Salinas government to return power to the market is a force for pluralism, a force for greater political freedom.

This trend in Mexico will be reinforced by the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement. The agreement will help release at all levels of Mexican society even more entrepreneurial energies than those already put into play by domestic reforms. That will solidify the foundation of political reform but, beyond that, the trilateral agreement will also bring about a closer association among the people of the three countries.

There is no better way to strengthen human values than through the close and continuous exchange of ideas. Ideas are transmitted in many ways, and they are often transmitted through the marketplace.

As the three countries learn more and more about each other, their people will increasingly make comparisons among themselves and draw conclusions about their way of life. There is no greater force for political freedom and respect for human rights than in the power of example.

In a North America where the people have come to know each other better, few will care to be seen as lacking the appropriate regard for human rights. Looking ahead, it seems inevitable that a closer economic association with Canada and the U.S. would have positive effects on Mexico's social and political institutions.

Free trade will generate a multiplicity of connections, institutional linkages, contacts and influences that will have a considerable impact on all levels of society, both theirs and ours. No doubt this will be a long-term process, but Mexico is moving in the right direction, away from the elitist and economic disparity toward a more open, fairer system.

Human rights regarding social, labour and environmental matters stand particularly to benefit. Historically Canada has encouraged all countries to be more open economically and politically in their relations with the international system.

Looking at Mexico in particular, free trade could offer the material incentives for achieving this goal. A prosperous Mexico joined with North American markets and technology would act as a positive element in the geopolitical dynamic of North American and the hemisphere at large.

Although the view from outside a country's borders is frequently incomplete or misinformed, no government is comfortable with international criticism of its domestic policies. In this regard, Mexican President Carlos Salinas has been deeply concerned about his own country's reputation of the political and human rights front since the inauguration of his administration in 1988.

He has realized that the trilateral negotiations have focused extraordinary attention on political developments in Mexico and he has been energetic in pursuing political reform.

I would like to remind the hon. members that President Salinas has publicly recognized on successive occasions that human rights violations in Mexico do pose a problem. To address the problem, however, President Salinas appointed a human rights commission in early June 1990 mandated to investigate and report on alleged human rights abuses.

The commission is headed by a Supreme Court judge with 11 prominent Mexicans. Since its establishment the commission has issued two reports, both demonstrating the commission's independence through the criticism of long-standing government practices.

Canada is encouraged by these developments which mark clear progress toward improving the promotion and protection of human rights in Mexico. Other initiatives undertaken by the Mexican government include a major reform of the civil code in 1990 to prohibit admission in court of evidence obtained through torture.

These initiatives of the Mexican government point to an improvement in Mexico's human rights record. In the estimation of Canadian observers and Mexican activists, Mexico continues to move in the right direction. However, much remains to be done and Canada will continue to maintain close interest in this important question.

I can assure that Canada will continue to maintain our very constructive dialogue with Mexico on the human rights issue. I am pleased to inform my colleagues in the House that the deputy minister to the Mexican attorney general will visit Ottawa and Quebec next week for discussions on these very questions. Over-all then, Mexico's record is improving, albeit not overnight. As these positive trends continue there is no justification whatsoever for not continuing participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico free trade negotiations, as the motion before the House states. As Canadians observe the increasing globalization of issues, we are reminded once again that acting alone we can contribute only marginally to resolving the problems confronting us in the Americas and elsewhere. We must work together. That is why Canada became a member of the Organization of American States where we can work together with our hemispheric colleagues to address such pressing issues as human rights, democratic development, the environment, drugs and arms control.

As a full and active member of OAS, Canada is committed to the promotion and defence of human rights in the hemisphere, consistent with provisions of the OAS charter. To cite one example, the OAS unit for promotion of democracy, a Canadian initiative supported by Mexico and all other OAS members, has contributed to democratic development and political rights in the hemisphere through election monitoring missions. The current difficult situation in Haiti will further test the unit's capacity to protect human rights in the hemisphere.

I have spoken about the benefits of closer economic association generally and the progress Mexico has made on the human rights front. Let me focus now on the North American free trade negotiations specifically. We cannot overlook the importance of Canadian participation in these negotiations. Canada decided to participate in the North American free trade negotiations because it is in the national interest to do so. Only by being at the negotiating table can we improve and secure greater access for Canadian goods and services and ensure that Canadian interests and concerns are properly and fully addressed. Moreover, only by participating in the negotiations can we ensure that Canadian companies share the same access as U.S. companies to all North American markets, thereby promoting job-creating investment at home here in Canada.

Madam Speaker, Canada's broad objectives in the NAFTA negotiations are; first, a barrier-free access to Mexico for Canadian goods and services, while developing tariff phase-out provisions and safeguard mechanisms which reflect Canadian import sensitivities; second, improved access to the U.S. market in such areas as financial services and government procurement; third, improved conditions under which Canadian businesses can make strategic alliances within North America to better compete with the Pacific Rim and the European communities; fourth, ensuring that Canada remains an attractive site for foreign and domestic investment; and fifth, the establishment of a fair and expeditious dispute settlement mechanism such as that which has served Canadian interests so well in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mexico is prepared to work with Canada to achieve a balanced comprehensive agreement in the interests of all three countries. This openness to substantial change is remarkable. It augers well for a positive change more generally throughout Mexican society. After decades of running a closed economy, Mexico saw the economic well-being that other countries had benefited from as a result of lower tariff and non-tariff barriers.

Since 1986 the average Mexican customs tariff has decreased from over 25 per cent to around 10 per cent and maximum rates have reduced from 100 per cent to 50 per cent. Import licences and border restrictions have also been radically reduced; moreover, the government of President Salinas has instituted sweeping tax reforms, thereby eliminating tax loopholes, promoting a regime of better enforcement and a broader tax base, and as a consequence increasing tax revenues dramatically. Mexico has also significantly liberalized its treatment of foreign and private investment capital, especially as a result of new regulations approved in 1989.

A dynamic and determined Mexican administration is transforming the country into a modern, prosperous and globally competitive player in world markets. Indeed, the president of the World Bank has described Mexico's reforms as "one of the most ambitious, courageous and determined programs of economic reform and institutional change recently undertaken in any country".

Mexico is a country that is rejuvenating itself in creating the kind of vigorous economy that will benefit itself and its trading partners. There is no doubt that Mexico's reforms are working. The indicators of new-found economic buoyancy are numerous. Mexico's gross national product for example is expected to rise by 4.5 per cent to 5 per cent this year, up from 3.9 per cent in each year of 1990 and 1989 and much lower figures during the height of the debt crisis. These are remarkable figures when much of the world economy was experiencing slow down or recession.

It is also important to stress that Mexico has successfully dealt with its debt load. Its indebtedness is no longer an obstacle to business looking for new opportunities. Mexico's economic reform minded leadership has firmly taken matters in hand and is creating an economy with which Canadians can most certainly do business.

Canadian companies have the chance to market not only goods but needed services as well and very important in Mexico's push for productivity is the development of human resources. Canadian firms that offer products and services that help in the development of human resources are well received in Mexico. The fuller integration of Mexico into the North American economy should also provide greater stability for Mexico's economic, trade, monetary and fiscal reforms already undertaken to date.

Throughout increased trade and economic expansion Mexico hopes to continue to improve working conditions and living standards. Trade and economic growth will also generate more resources for the Mexican government to enforce existing laws. What many people do not realize is that Mexico's extensive labour legislation is protective of workers' rights. The problem lies in the fact that the government simply does not have the resources necessary to properly enforce these regulations.

With the prosperity that increased trade will bring that will change for the better. A successful NAFTA will be of benefit for workers and business. In all three countries the primary purpose of negotiating such a deal is to increase trade. One-third of Canadian workers have jobs that are dependent on trade.

Increased trade creates jobs, increased trade creates prosperity for the country and for its workers, the same as is true in Mexico.

Free trade improves the economic and social conditions of our trading partners, but in the process of doing so, our partners become better customers and we become more competitive suppliers. This is the power of liberalized trade. By bringing down barriers in the North American economy, we can create more opportunities for still more Canadian business.

It is this promise of helping to build a more competitive Canadian economy that sustains us in our determination to win a balanced North American free trade agreement that will be beneficial to all three countries. It is precisely for this purpose that Canada is pursuing NAFTA negotiations. The NAFTA will make all three countries more prosperous through free trade. Prosperity in turn brings greater business openness and freedom for the whole population which can only encourage greater social change.

It is not by turning our backs on Mexico that Mexican society can continue to evolve positively. An inward looking closed society in Mexico is in no one's interest. We must work with Mexico actively seeking closer co-operation. This will encourage greater familiarity with the social attitudes and norms of fully democratic societies in its own way. This is what the North American free trade agreement is all about.

In closing, I say change and growth through co-operation. Only narrow minded isolationists want us to proceed otherwise.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, as quoted in The Ottawa Citizen on September 18 of this year Amnesty International basically said it takes a strong stomach to read the report entitled "Mexico torture with impunity". It documents one horrendous case of abuse after another, most involving Mexico's federal judicial police. People are kicked, beaten, pushed into water tanks, given electric shocks, burned with cigarettes, subject to mock executions. Some are nearly asphyxiated by tying plastic bags over their heads. Others are forced into bowls of excrement. Toe nails are ripped out. Mineral waters are forced into them. It just goes on and on and on. Children are subjected to this, as are women and teenagers. It is very difficult, in the face of about 100 members of the political opposition killed, hundreds of trade unionists killed, to suggest that Mexico has any commitment to a reform program and that any success even to that is small.

But that is not what concerns me about the debate today. I listened with care to the presentation by the speaker. The one thing that you can count on is the Conservative government. It will tell you what it believes. The previous speaker said: "I believe the Mexican-Canadian-American free trade agreement is a good deal and we will go ahead in spite of this documented information and hopefully it will get better."

The party on my other side, the Liberal Party, moves around this country saying: "This is no good and we should not support this kind of trade agreement until conditions are laid down." This motion is the statement of the NDP and it is one you can count on. I am so critically disappointed with the Liberal Party for amending the motion before us to eliminate stopping the negotiation of a trade agreement with Mexico, that in fact it matches their other presentation. I am sure the speaker from the Conservative Party will agree because he watched, with me, in this House as the Liberal Party said: "We do not accept an attack or a war by Canada on Iraq", and then turned around and voted in absolutely the opposite direction.

The Liberal Party stands up and says that it supports choice on the abortion issue for women in Canada and yet turns around and half the party votes the other way.

We have a critical situation here today. The Prime Minister's statement was correct, absolutely correct and supportable. We are asking for some action. A reasonable action is to discontinue these negotiations until Mexico gives us a firm commitment that they will turn it around and then, by all means. What we get is a situation today where the Liberals back right away from that and take the opposite tack where they are prepared to involve themselves without condition of human rights and without protection for Canada in—

I know they are upset—and I am sure the previous speaker would agree—but the absolute contradiction in their position is just untenable. The Liberals now come out in support of that Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade agreement in spite of its shortcomings and harm to Canada, in spite of the human rights violations in that country.

I would like to reiterate once again that the Prime Minister's statement on human rights is supportable. It needs action to confirm and give meaning to that statement. I admire the party of the previous speaker in that they stand up and at least say exactly what they mean. I think we say exactly what we mean, but I am just sorely disappointed that the Liberals will not give a solid indication to the Canadian people. They have turned around and basically supported the approach of the Conservative government and are saying another thing to the electorate.

Mr. Attewell: Madam Speaker, again we have just witnessed what has been referred to as the black and white policy of the NDP.

I was quite impressed with my colleague from Surrey—White Rock—South Langley who made two or three good points awhile ago, one of them being that the policy the Prime Minister talked about is not brand new. It has been going on for many years, indeed by the former Liberal government as well.

My colleague cited several very specific examples that our government certainly has been helping to monitor, where specific decisions were made to either cut off aid or reduce it and, in other cases, increase it. However, to think that we should turn our backs on a country like Mexico which under Salinas has very definitely made some progress and is moving in the right direction is wrong. There are so many examples around the world, as the hon. member knows, in these situations where improvement was achieved did not happen in a day or a month or a year.

I have been chairman of the Soviet Jury Committee for Canada for almost five years now. When I think back to my first trip to the Soviet Union in 1986, only 914 Jews were allowed to leave that year. The world, including countries like Canada, had been criticizing the Soviet Union, as you know, directly and through the United Nations.

Thanks to Mr. Gorbachev and his leadership there are tremendous changes. I am just highlighting one specific example, but starting in 1987–88, the number of Jews allowed to leave jumped to 18,000. No one knows what last year's figures are. We think it is 250,000 people. There are many movements. Sometimes there are as many leaving in one day as had previously been allowed to leave in a whole year.

It is now on the road to a freer type society. It has decades to go before we could compare it to Canada. I subscribe to an incremental theory that leadership of the country is honestly trying to move in a democratic way and honestly trying to improve the human rights situation to drastically reduce the violations.

I think it is going to be encouraged to do more things like that if we are supportive of them. We should not back off totally but give credit where credit is due on these improvements.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I do not want to question what the hon. member says. We are all astounded and amazed by what has happened in this short period.

I would point out that the government under the Prime Minister in the G–7 meetings was unprepared to support the Soviet Union and said "it had a way to go even with aid to survive the winter". That is beginning to change because of the coup and other things, so it has moved forward.

I would point out that the Prime Minister was even unprepared at that point to give aid. Yet with what is a serious problem in Mexico, the Prime Minister is willing to integrate the economy of Canada with that country without any preconditions. I think the preconditions to negotiating an integration of our economy, with the result in changes in standards in this country and foregoing some of the sovereignty in this country, is a condition that makes profound commitments to the changes in human rights.

I certainly agree totally with what the previous speaker has said about the massive changes that have occurred. I would say that before we integrate with Mexico, it would be useful to get those commitments.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I think the hon. member is giving us a misleading comparison. The doubt that the Prime Minister and other leaders had about further aid to the Soviet Union at that time, in my understanding, had absolutely nothing to do with human rights.

We had just been party as many countries had to the CSCE, the human rights conference in Moscow. It was the first time ever, so I think he is linking two separate things together. It is perhaps a little misleading.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to address this very important issue today that was raised by the Canadian delegation at the recent Commonwealth Conference.

Let me first congratulate my members on the left who have met with some recent successes. Let me caution also that this debate—I will come back to it—shows what has been happening in the west of Canada.

It shows that the Canadian voters and the Canadian citizens are no longer happy with the status quo. They want their governments to start to act with some purpose. I suggest that what has been happening on the Canadian landscape which ties into this debate is that Canadians do not want to see the members of Parliament or the Government of Canada discuss issues like this.

They certainly want to see their elected members of government come up with some concrete productive ways to alleviate this terrible problem that confronts everyone on the world scene. Having talked about their successes, I also have some difficulty with their motion. "Linkage" seems to be the prevalent word. In our discussions we heard about linkage in the gulf war and linkage in other areas. What we see here in the motion that is before this House is a principle of linkage. That means that in this debate today we are discussing the principles of aid connected with those of human rights.

If we go further into the motion, we see that economic issues are tied with those affecting human rights in different countries in the world.

I think there was a quote made by the Prime Minister recently that Canadians will not subsidize repression and the stifling of democracies in the world.

I am going to come back to that if I can in my closing remarks. I am having a problem with the concept of linkage that is causing me some concern.

I am going to pose a question. Although I do not have the answer I hope that the members of this House will give it consideration and see what we are doing with respect to human rights in many countries in this world.

Let me say that in pressing for human rights to become a priority item on the agenda, the Canadian people can indeed be proud because they have certainly stood high among all nations in the world.

It is pleasant to be on this side of the House with the current government treading this path. I think we can find its germination in the path formerly laid down by a great Canadian, Lester B. Pearson, truly in the Liberal tradition.

It would be nice before the debate ends today if someone on the other side of the House would give that truly great Canadian the credit he deserves. I believe it was during his tenure as Prime Minister that we developed the Pearson image that made Canada a leader among nations of the world when it came to compassion, empathy and respect for those who were not quite as privileged as ourselves. To be imitated in this type of policy is the greatest form of flattery.

I would like to emphasize the high regard in which Canada is viewed by the developing countries and certainly this position must continue. Reforms such as those described at the Commonwealth Conference must not be shunted aside. The government must insist that flagrant violations of human rights not be rewarded by initiatives of trade and massive allotments of foreign aid by Canadians.

Democracies such as ours, the middle powers with no axes to grind have the opportunity and indeed the responsibility to provide a leading role in improving human rights around the world. We can do this in many ways. To this date Canada and all previous governments have done very well in regard to establishing Canada's reputation, not only as a peacekeeper in the world but as a benevolent and caring nation. But we must improve on that stance.

As an example, the decision of the present government to trade with China following the horrifying events in Tiananmen Square told the world that Canada would proceed with that regime as if nothing had happened.

We imported from China more than $1.2 billion in 1989 and that figure rose to $1.4 billion in 1990, an increase of over 18 per cent.

While this trade effort was being conducted, Amnesty International, an organization I think we all respect, said that at least 1,000 people were killed by security forces to suppress pro-democratic processes. Thousands more were beaten and tortured. Dozens of protesters have been sentenced to death after unfair trials and there were reports of secret executions. Persistent reports of torture and detainees in Tibet have also been obtained by Amnesty International.

• (1740)

I could go on and read descriptions of the very questionable human rights records of countries receiving bilateral aid from Canada. Bilateral aid simply means that money is given by this government or some of its agencies directly to other countries. The facilities we have available to us through the United Nations are not invoked.

Many of the countries which are the chief recipients of bilateral aid from Canada are indulging in human rights abuses of the most chilling sort.

Some of the most glaring examples of bilateral aid received by countries for the year 1989 are Bangladesh with almost $90 million in aid. We all know about the allegations of torture and criminal suspects in custody, of extrajudicial executions by incompetent villagers and government security forces. I have reiterated what happened in China at Tiananmen Square yet they were the recipients of almost $40 million in aid from Canada. I look at Jamaica receiving almost $30 million and you know the unrest that is in that country and the deprivation of its human rights. Pakistan, Indonesia and many others really deserve some scrutiny with respect to aid vis-à-vis human rights.

There is a question that has permeated my mind throughout the debate and it is a fundamental problem to which I really do not have the answer. I certainly would like to pose a question in the hope that as we go down this road we all start to give some consideration to a very important aspect.

We all know that regardless of the form of government, whether democratic, despotic, a benevolent or true dictatorship, all people in the world are controlled and every act of every government affects the people in that country and they do not have a great deal to say about it.

As an example I do not want to debate these issues here but we do know that the government of the day in Canada brought in the free trade agreement as soon as this House sat in 1988. This had a direct effect on almost everyone in this country. The free trade agreement whether it created jobs or lost jobs, had a definite effect on almost every Canadian particularly those in the manufacturing industry.

We will not say whether the imposition of the goods and services act was a good move —we on this side think it was not —but in any event we know that the actions of the government affected every person in this country with respect to a system of taxation.

If we go across to our friends in the United States we see that their involvement in the gulf war had a direct effect on every citizen in the United States with respect to how they conducted themselves.

What I am trying to point out is that every government by its actions affects on a day to day basis the people who live within that country who usually do not have a great deal to say about how or why it will affect their lives.

I think today of the people who live in underdeveloped countries and are denied human rights as I listen with intent to all of the very good debate within this House.

I think of the children of the world who really do not have any say—the children in Canada, children in the United States—in whether or how their country is going to be operated. They are at the whim of those that have control over them.

What are we doing when we link our economic aid? As I said at the outset, I am posing a question. What are we doing to these children when we link the economic aid with the human rights of their governments? The children in these under-developed areas do not have the right to dictate or to be involved in the system of government, yet they are the recipients of its actions.

I am appalled, and I am sure we all are in this House, when we look at the children throughout the world on television in some of the African countries, Bangladesh, Ethiopia, and even in Bulgaria. We see children with distorted eyes, protruding eyes, distended stomachs, lacking the fundamental medical care that they need in order to even just sustain life. You cannot even say these children go to bed at night hungry because they most likely do not have a bed to go to.

What right do these young people have with respect to human rights and the linkage of aid. This is the question that I pose.

What I propose is something I would like this House to consider. We know that as we consider all of the problems that exist throughout the world, perhaps the worst problems are what is happening to the children of the world.

We know that poverty and debt are the enemies. We know our development policy should be designed to benefit these children. We know we should be assisting increased productivity, and we know we should be increasing the incomes of these people in order that they can provide for the necessities of life.

I would like to be the author of this thought, but I cannot take credit for it. I have been doing some reading. It really generates from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister when he was speaking about what Canada could do with respect to feeding the world. The parliamentary secretary is a very successful farmer from Saskatchewan. He is a very knowledgeable person about agriculture. I discussed this with my colleague who was a former minister of agriculture and it seems that what we should be doing, rather than linking the problems that we face with aid and the rights of people within these countries, is designing a policy within our country that would alleviate the hunger of the children of the world.

When you look at Canada and try to find a national purpose for our country, it seems we lack a national purpose. What a great thrill and what a great challenge it would be if Canada truly becomes the bread basket of the world, and we take all of these children that are so deprived. Within this country we have great assets. We have three provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that can out-produce because of their technology, climate and the ability of its farmers to produce the best wheat in the world in great quantities., We have this facility within Canada.

We have unmatched facilities within this country to process this product, this grain, this food that we can grow in our western provinces. We have at our disposal without question through the port of Churchill, the port of Prince Rupert, the port of Vancouver, the port of Thunder Bay and the down river ports in Montreal the ability to ship this grain, this food, vital necessity of life to all countries in the world, those children of the world who are deprived of their fundamental human rights through no fault of their own. Canada has become the country that has taken on itself as its national purpose to be the bread basket of the world, feeding people in especially those areas that have no ability, no resources and no facilities to feed themselves.

How else could we extend human rights to every country in the world? How better would it be? What a feeling it would be of national purpose for Canadians to say: "We undertake this gigantic responsibility. We are going to do the very best we can".

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it may be the most basic challenge for all Canadians at this particular period of time in our lives to take this responsibility and say: "We are going to reach farther than any country has ever reached in order to provide a solution to this problem that is not going to go away unless we ourselves attempt to do it and we start by little bits and pieces".

I am satisfied in my mind we will emerge as a country that is well respected, looked upon throughout this world as not only one that had the empathy and the care to take up this important challenge, but the foremost country in the world with respect to guarding the human rights of those who could not guard themselves.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, intently, I may say even hanging on every word because of his poignant reminder to us all about the bottom line here and that is people, the plight of people all around this earth and particularly the children of this world and the difficulties that they are having.

I think it is very important as we near the end of this debate today that we not forget the victims of poverty, of disease, of oppression. I am very grateful to the member for bringing us around to considering those factors and considering the forgotten people of the earth.

Having said that, I know that the member has a very acute legal mind. I want to ask him to tune in that legal mind, if I may, by focusing on a problem that I have with the opposition motion put forward by our friend in the New Democratic Party, specifically using the word "linkage" which the hon. member began his speech with. I ask him to consider the terms of the motion and perhaps comment on the question that I pose.

The question is this: Does the hon. member find it logical that the opposition motion begins by taking note of the Prime Minister's comments that he is committed to the principle of linking government aid, and I stress government aid, to respect for human rights and says "and in light of documented violations of human rights in countries such as Mexico, China, Zaire", et cetera?

The motion reminds us of the Prime Minister's commitment to linking government aid to human rights and reminds us of certain alleged, in fact documented, violations of human rights in certain countries and then says: "We should stop negotiating with the countries of the United States and Mexico", not stop providing aid to Mexico, but stop negotiations with respect to an agreement that is not even in place. They are not saying: "Let's link government aid to human rights". They are saying "Let's link aid to negotiations", even speaking with another government, even discussing something with another government if there are documented instances of human rights violations. That is what they are saying. They are trying to bring in the free trade debate through the back door of human rights violations, on the backs of the very people who should be protected. I am wondering if my hon. friend considers this to be logical.

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Scarborough for the question with respect to my comments on the motion.

At the outset, I think I complimented my colleagues with respect to some successes and then discussed with them the difficulty I have with the motion that is before the House today.

In answering my friend, I do not have any difficulty with the concept, nor do I have any difficulty with the intent of what we are trying to accomplish in this respect. My part of the debate contained aid and feeding the children of this world through the concept of human rights, but I had some difficulty technically with understanding what the motion meant.

I said at the outset that I had difficulty with the word "linkage". I could not see how we could equate linkage in human rights with linkage in economic aid, especially if we consider that the very people we are trying to assist in human rights may not have the opportunity to help themselves in the country in which they live. Let me explain that a little further. I am talking about the underprivileged. There are degrees of privilege and underprivilege. I am talking about the underprivileged people, the older, the elderly, the seniors, in deprived countries. I am talking about the children, those who cannot help themselves within the system of government in which they live. They are truly the underprivileged of an underprivileged class.

That is my concern. If we link the economic aid and the economic principles with helping those of the underprivileged in the underprivileged countries, what have we really done? What have we accomplished? We have just imposed more of a hardship on those who can no longer stand any more hardship.

I can appreciate the question and I am answering it to the best of my ability. I just have difficulty technically with understanding the motion that is before the House, particularly as it forms a linkage. Second, I don't know how we got from human rights to an economic issue like the free trade agreement. It does not make sense.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, "Police torture still routine", Amnesty says in Mexico in September. I certainly understand the previous speaker's sympathy and support with it. "Mexico—Torture with Impunity" is the title of a report. It talks about Mexico's federal judicial police kicking, beating, pushing into water tanks, shocking, burning with cigarettes, subject to mock execution, asphyxiating with plastic bags—and on and on and on—toe nails ripped out. It asks: "Who are these victims?" These victims are political activists, people involved in land disputes, human rights activists, trade unionists, lawyers, and children, particularly homeless teenagers, children of poor urban families, young rural migrants from the Mexican interior. They tell of beatings, whippings, electric shocks, asphyxiations and sexual abuse.

It is not as if we were considering providing aid. We could provide aid, not bilateral aid to Mexico but we could provide it through the Red Cross and other agencies where it doesn't sanctify or in any way support that government.

What we are talking about the government doing here is involving Canada with an equal partner, somebody that we would want to partially integrate our economy with and take those kinds of chances. Quite frankly, by eliminating the phrase "that this House urge the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation with Canada, the United States and Mexico in a free trade negotiation", you have really sanctified the kind of activities that are going on. The majority of Canadians oppose this government because they do not accept what it is doing. They tell the truth. They stand up and say what they are—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time for questions and comments has expired. Resuming debate.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, there are only two minutes left. I have here a long speech about CIDA and its practices. Unfortunately, today we have managed not to talk very much about the aid programs of CIDA and the government because of the nature of the motion.

My hon. colleague from Scarborough puts his finger correctly on the dilemma that one faces when confronted with this motion. Let me, therefore, simply put on the record a couple of concerns about the motion itself.

It is, in my view, a shame that we do not have enough foreign policy debates. It is also my view that we did not have the debate today we should have had about how you make linkages between aid and human rights policies stick. That ought to be a subject that concerns us here. I know the members of the subcommittee of the human rights committee of the external affairs committee care about that a lot and such members as the hon. member for Trinity and others have devoted quite a lot of time to that.

Let me therefore, since time is short, simply express my frustration with the motion this way. Before we entered into any conversations about the possibility of extending the free trade agreement to Mexico, there were long discussions within the standing committee about what we should be doing about trying to improve our aid programs, about trying to make sure the long-standing Canadian concerns about human rights linkages were brought into that debate. People talked at length about how to use NGOs more than government and people criticized, quite properly, because there were legitimate criticisms about the direction that aid policy was flowing at the time and people quite properly came to our committee to complain that maybe the government was cutting back too much.

One of the questions that was put to members of the committee at the time, well that was discussed in the committee—this is before we talked about Mexico as a trade policy—was criticisms by the New Democratic Party that one of the precise things we should be doing was increasing the amount of aid being given to Mexico through the NGOs. In other words, that was the policy of the members of the New Democratic Party before we had a trade discussion and I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, they have shown their real view today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I wish to inform the House that the debate on the motion pursuant to Standing Order 81(7) is now over.

[English]

Before proceeding with Private Members' hour, I have this very short announcement that I would like to offer to the House.

On Friday, October 25, 1991 the House is scheduled to consider the second reading stage of Bill C-251, an act to amend the Department of Veterans Affairs Act.

The bill, which was introduced by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden on June 19, 1991 proposes to include merchant seamen as war veterans, thereby entitling them to all benefits that are presently enjoyed by armed forces veterans.

[Translation]

The Chair has some difficulties with this proposal, from a procedural point of view, in that it seems to infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown and to attempt to accomplish indirectly what the procedure precludes from doing directly regarding disbursements of public moneys.

[English]

As a courtesy to the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, I am giving notice now that the Chair would appreciate receiving the benefit of comments from hon. members on Friday at the start of Private Members' Business as to the procedural acceptability of proceeding with such a bill.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 2, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (ending development and exportation of prescribed items and substances) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we resume debate, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest has five minutes remaining.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, during the previous debate on C-204, I had given my full support for the nuclear energy industry within this country and I outlined some of the benefits to Canada. These benefits are needed for our security and diversity of energy supplies. Also, nuclear energy is very important for environmental protection and industrial development.

Many of the areas I outlined would be in Hansard, but I did not get a chance to speak with regard to the economics and the primary reason for the widespread adoption of nuclear power by major industrialized countries around the world and its ability to produce electricity at a lower cost. I know some people would argue this. If it is taken over a 30 to 40 year period, it is one of the reasons why major countries around the world are using an alternative energy such as the nuclear power.

Canada has a mixed picture and we are very fortunate to have different forms of energy to generate our electricity. We have oil, gas, coal, water and the nuclear area, as well as some of our renewable resources.

In Ontario and New Brunswick, nuclear power is economically preferred as the alternative whereas in some of the other regions such as Quebec and western Canada, we utilize more of the hydroelectric generation or fossil fuels.

As I mentioned earlier, AECL was created in 1952, and yes, there has been quite a bit of government appropriation to the company, but that sum includes costs of establishing and operating AECLs world class R and D laboratories, such as the one in Chalk River. It includes the cost and also interest of constructing, operating and subsequently decommissioning prototype power reactors in the heavy water plants.

These investments are substantially lower than those made in other countries. Canada has extremely good economic viability within the nuclear area.

I also want to say with regard to the disposal and repository for nuclear waste that an independent export group was formed in 1977 and carried out a study on the long-term disposal. It laid down the basis for the criteria for nuclear fuel and the waste management program. It has been the responsibility of AECL and Ontario together.

With regard to storage and transportation, Ontario Hydro looks after this responsibility for waste demobilization and the disposal concept comes under the control of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

All the Canadian nuclear power plants are setting aside a portion of the mill rate, in the area of 1 per cent, to cover the costs of spent fuel disposal, which will probably come many years from now.

Having been in Sweden, West Germany and France for some time studying the disposal of low and high level nuclear waste, there is a consensus being brought forward that the deep geological disposal on land is the best means to permanently isolate high level radioactive waste.

Countries with established nuclear power programs are at various stages of developing their disposal systems. Switzerland and Sweden have already completed extensive tests. In Canada we hope that next year some recommendations will be brought forward. These recommendations will have political discussion, input and debate. Where and when any disposal is made with regard to a certain location would come forth after political participation.

• (1810)

In conclusion, I just want to give my unequivocal support to the nuclear energy industry within Canada. We are not discussing nuclear weapons. We are discussing nuclear energy for the generation of electric power in Canada. It is an important investment for our country and I am just pleased that I had the opportunity to speak against Bill C-204.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, let me begin by congratulating the member for Winnipeg Transcona on his recent appointment on top of his other responsibilities as the New Democrat's nuclear energy critic. I know he brings to this position extensive knowledge, keen interest and a solid commitment which has already resulted in the introduction of the laudable bill we are discussing here today.

This bill, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act, seeks to end the development and export of nuclear substances, nuclear reactors and certain equipment and materials required to build nuclear reactors, starting on January 1, 1992 and lasting until December 31, 2041.

In the short time available today, the exceedingly short time available, I can only focus on one of the many reasons for supporting this bill to phase out nuclear energy in Canada. Madam Speaker, simply put, nuclear power is an economic failure. Canada cannot afford to keep pouring money down nuclear sinkholes, and what a lot of sinkholes there are.

For starters, nuclear power plants are extraordinarily expensive to build. Ontario's nuclear facility at Darlington, for example, was originally projected to cost under $4 billion. By last December, that projected cost had soared to $12.9 billion and, in February, 1991 that figure stood at a whopping $13.3 billion. That is a lot of money by any standard.

It also cost a lot to protect workers' health and safety at all stages of production, starting right back at the mining of the uranium ore. Nuclear proponents cavil at these safety costs. The Canadian Nuclear Association in its October 9, 1991 statement to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources claimed that new, stricter radiation exposure limits proposed for uranium mines could, and I quote, "render underground uranium mining unviable."

Since these new safety standards reflect current scientific consensus about the risks of radiation exposure workers could, I suppose, be excused for worrying that the CNA is taking the insupportable position that the industry can only remain viable if workers are put in danger.

As for other mining costs, one need only go to Elliot Lake to see that it also costs a lot to clean up after uranium mining operations.

Nuclear reactors themselves cost more than expected to operate, and this costs consumers money directly on their power bills. Double digit rate increases are expected in Ontario for the next two years.

Canada's nuclear reactors have not lived up to promises about their efficiency. Many suffer maddening complications from so-called premature aging, ranging from damaged fuel bundles to burst pressure tubes. Recent evidence suggests that Ontario Hydro predictions that its nuclear plants will average 75 per cent efficiency in the next decade are overly optimistic. In 1989, hydro's reactors ran at only 72 per cent efficiency and in 1990 these reactors produced a dismal 62 per cent of the power they would have produced if they had run all year at full efficiency.

As Ontario Hydro chairman Mark Ellison stated, and I quote from the July 29, 1991 Financial Post "Our nuclear system is not operating the way it was supposed to operate." Sad, is it not, Madam Speaker, but unfortunately and expensively, true.

What then about accidents? Well, nuclear accidents do occur and when they occur they are catastrophic. No one can forget the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and the devastating explosion at Chernobyl in 1986. Recently some Soviet scientists claimed that initially the extent of the devastation around Chernobyl was seriously underestimated. The most senior scientist at the Chernobyl station and the scientific director in charge of the 30 kilometre exclusion zone said in April, 1991 that the explosion killed up to 10,000 people.

He added that the government is currently providing medical care to an additional 300,000 people and that the Soviet Union has already spent nearly $20 billion trying to clean up after the accident.

Prominent Soviet scientist Yuri Koryakin estimated in the October 1990 issue of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Science publication Energy that the financial cost of the Chernobyl accident to his country alone could be over $400 billion by the year 2000. That is unforgiving, expensive technology.

Many CANDU proponents protest that such an accident could never happen here, but note: Just in case, the industry has protected itself from financial liability. In 1970, at the insistence of the industry, the federal government set a $75 million ceiling on the damage reactor operators would have to pay in the event of a serious nuclear accident.

Even if that operator were negligent, the irony is inescapable. Nuclear proponents loudly proclaim that nuclear power is safe, knowing full well that in the event of a serious accident, thanks to the federal government and the Canadian taxpayer, the nuclear industry is virtually off the hook.

As for the long-term disposal of nuclear wastes, no one knows how much that will cost because it has never been done. We do know that simply conducting research on how to manage these wastes has been expensive. In a speech to the conference of the Canadian Energy Research Institute given on behalf of energy minister Jake Epp on June 4, 1990, Conservative member of Parliament, Marie Gibeau, estimated that in the past decade alone, government funded Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has spent $400 million. That is $40 million a year on research into long-term disposal of radioactive fuel waste.

The campaign for nuclear phase-out hit the nail on the head in a recent leaflet stating: "The cost of nuclear waste disposal, including disposal of defunct reactors themselves, are among the least certain and potentially largest of all nuclear costs". The leaflet added: "No full size nuclear reactor anywhere in the world has yet been fully decommissioned".

Energy minister Jake Epp admitted in his September 1990 letter to my colleague, New Democratic environment critic, Jim Fulton, that: "Estimates of decommissioning costs of nuclear reactors vary widely", adding that the nine-mile point unit 1 reactor would cost: "about $100 million in 1990 dollars" to decommission.

I might be wrong, but I suspect Mr. Epp would come up with $100 million tomorrow for anyone who would guarantee the safe disposal of that reactor. Where does all this money come from, Madam Speaker? From Canadian taxpayers.

According to the April 1991 corporate plan and budget summary for Atomic Energy of Canada limited, the federal government has invested $4.5 billion in nuclear energy research and development over the past 40 years. That amounts to $110 million every year for 40 years.

The same AECL report reveals that more than half of the $303 million in expenditures in nuclear research and development planned by AECL for 1991-92 will be provided directly through parliamentary appropriation.

In 1995-96 alone, Canadian taxpayers are expected to fork over $197 million to AECL. Energy minister Jake Epp continues to champion a so-called market based energy economy even though after 40 years of generous government support, the nuclear industry still relies on tax dollars to stay afloat.

The government clearly has a responsibility to help create jobs and to spur the development of more environmentally benign energy sources in Canada. Unfortunately, the government grants large sums of money to nuclear and traditional fossil fuel sources, thereby stacking the financial deck against new cleaner options while slashing funding for these alternatives. The government then adds insult to injury by complaining that these alternatives cannot compete in the marketplace. In fact, since 1984 this government has cut its funding for energy alternatives and conservation by over 90 per cent. As a result the federal government will spend a mere $37 million this year on energy conservation and on wind, biomass, solar, all sources of alternate energy put together. That is less than the $38 million the government will give the Atomic Energy Control Board just to regulate the nuclear industry.

• (1820)

It is hardly surprising that many countries have decided to stop throwing money at their nuclear industries. The recent experience in Britain offers one very graphic measure of the industry's financial status. In its misguided zeal to privatize its state electric utility, the Thatcher government discovered to its chagrin that it simply could not sell its nuclear plants. Private investors judged them to be uneconomic.

As the London Observer said in an editorial on November 12, 1989: "Privatization has proved that nuclear power is hopelessly uneconomic and saddled with decommissioning costs that no private company could accept without huge guarantees from the government".

The paper added a number of intriguing comments. Let me close with a quote from The Economist, a Conservative magazine, August 31, 1991: "It is hard not to believe that if the cash thrown at nuclear power had been put into almost any other technology, even hamster-powered fly-wheels, it would eventually have produced something commercially viable".

It is time we stopped pouring money down the nuclear sink hole.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has any idea of the impact this bill could have on Canadians' health. Does he know how devastating it could be for thousands of Canadians who receive treatment involving diagnostic techniques or therapies that use radio-isotopes?

What role does nuclear energy play in medicine? Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona could tell me that, technically speaking, most radio-isotopes are not prescribed substances. Therefore they are not affected by this bill under which the Atomic Energy Control Board could not issue new licences for the possession of prescribed substances, which would exclude most radio-isotopes used in medicine.

Let me show how such a statement lacks objectivity. Under the Atomic Energy Control Act, "prescribed substances" designates uranium, thorium, plutonium, neptunium, deuterium, their derivatives and compounds, and other substances that the Commission can by regulation classify as sources of atomic energy or consider necessary for the production, application and use of atomic energy.

Most radio-isotopes used in the health field do not fit this category. You may wonder what role nuclear energy plays in medicine, Madam Speaker. The fact is that it takes nuclear reactors to produce many radio-isotopes; these are the same reactors that the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona would take out of service over the next 50 years under his bill. For those requiring treatment, Madam Speaker, 50 years might as well be forever.

Cobalt-60, for example, is an artificial, man-made isotope. It is obtained by replacing stainless steel bars in a CANDU reactor with cobalt-59 bars. Irradiated in the reactor for about a year, these bars absorb neutrons and are changed into cobalt-60. Cobalt-60 is then taken out of the reactor for various medical purposes, in particular radiation therapy equipment and irradiation sterilizers.

Madam Speaker, we shall see the applications of radio-isotopes in medicine.

It is a pity that the public is seldom interested in the beneficial effects of radiation. Nevertheless, use of this technology for therapy, diagnosis and research is very widespread these days. Much use is made of irradiation to improve the quality of products and safety in various industries.

When radio-isotopes are administered in fairly small quantities to a patient for diagnostic purposes, it is possible to measure the concentration of this radioactive substance and to monitor its distribution with special detectors. Medical products that use radiation help to diagnose and treat various illnesses, especially cancer.

In fact, cancer can be detected in its early stages by bringing a sample of blood into contact with a radioactive chemical that reveals the presence and size of tumour markers, or substances that indicate the presence of cancer cells. Radiation can efficiently destroy such cells.

Irradiation techniques are also used to sterilize surgical or medical equipment, as well as blood for transfusion to patients whose immune system is very weak, especially the newborn.

Radiation can be used to study diseases and the internal workings of the body, to preserve food, to control food-borne illnesses and to disinfect waste, in particular municipal sewage and medical waste.

Let us now look at Canada's abilities in nuclear medicine. At the present time, Madam Speaker, the world's largest supplier of cobalt-60, the radio-isotope most used as a source of energy for commercial irradiation or cancer treatment, is Nordion International Inc., a Canadian company.

Most of the cobalt-60 sold by Nordion is in fact produced by Ontario Hydro under contract in CANDU nuclear reactors. Nordion is also the main supplier of other types of radio-isotopes made in reactors; these radio-isotopes are used throughout the world, especially for diagnostic purposes.

Canadian industry is in the forefront of research in nuclear medicine and has greatly contributed to improving the health of all the world's people. Madam Speaker, every year, more than 500,000 patients in over 80 countries receive treatments based on nuclear technology developed in Canada. Thanks to radiotherapy, millions of lives have been prolonged around the world.

The Canadian cobalt 60 therapy unit is used world-wide. Over 1,400 units have been installed abroad, which represents over 75 per cent of the market. In Canada alone, Madam Speaker, physicians make over 12 million diagnostics yearly using radioisotopes produced in this country. It is estimated that this figure exceeds 300 million world-wide. I would also like to talk about other health-related uses of radioisotopes.

That being said, Madam Speaker, I might add that radioisotopes have other than medical health-related applications as well. For instance, nuclear research has resulted in the development of new high-yield species of plants with greater disease resistance. Other agricultural applications include measuring of the soil moisture content in various regions to evaluate its capacity to meet water needs of specific crops.

Radioisotopes allow us to see how crops absorb nutrients and therefore to improve fertilizers. Finally, radioisotopes are used to monitor the flow of contaminated waterways and make sure that drinking water intakes are safe.

Irradiation can also be used to reduce or eliminate infestations of insects that are harmful to cultures, animals and human beings. A lot of male insects are sterilized by exposing them to radiations. Once let loose, these insects mate with females, but they cannot reproduce themselves. That technique enables us to eliminate harmful species over a period of a few seasons, in a more ordinate fashion that is also less harmful to the environment.

One must not forget the food irradiation sector. As we all know, the food we eat could be infected with bacteria and could therefore be spoiled and make us sick. In extreme cases, this could even lead to death. For these reasons, the scientists in the government and the food processing industry work relentlessly to find appropriate techniques to preserve food stocks without diminishing the nutritional value. It is now believed that irradiation techniques will enable us to better preserve food, while at the same time reducing the number of diseases linked to its consumption. Therefore, the food preservation sector could play a very important role, in Canada as well as in Third World countries. Madam Speaker, all these new applications are essential to maintaining the quality of food stocks for Canadians as well as for the populations of other countries.

One of the numerous advantages of nuclear energy lies in the fact that nuclear reactions do not produce any combustion residue that could pollute our environment and undermine our health. Madam Speaker, by going nuclear, Hydro Ontario has, in only the last 20 years, avoided the release in the atmosphere of over 7 million tons of acid gases, half a billion ton of carbon dioxide and 12 tons of ashes. Be that as it may, the present government has clearly demonstrated that it promotes the development of hydro-production techniques using renewable energies, namely solar energy, wind power or tidal dower. Unfortunately, these forms of energy will not enable—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but her time is up.

[English]

On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I think it is unfortunate that in Private Members' Business we continue to get from government backbenchers these speeches that are prepared by the Department of Energy or some other hack in Atomic Energy of Canada.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the time limitation does not permit us to deal specifically with the response the member for Louis-Hébert made in her intervention. She certainly spoke the language of the nuclear industry. She delivered the well-known themes that have been over the years presented to us by the proponents of nuclear industry.

Her scientific basis is very shaky. As I said, it is unfortunate that we cannot deal point by point with the points she has elaborated, as if they were final, scientifically proven and correct.

The debate today is on ending the development and exportation of prescribed items and substances that come under the Atomic Energy Control Act.

It is an important thought that the member for Winnipeg Transcona has put on paper. It is something for which he ought to be congratulated because it makes a very important contribution not only to the knowledge of this House but also in raising the awareness about the fact that in this country we do not really have an energy strategy that looks at the short, the medium and the long-term.

Therefore, the member for Winnipeg Transcona ought to be congratulated and supported. I would ask colleagues who have spoken against this bill or intend to speak against this bill not to be afraid of sending this bill to committee for a very thorough analysis and examination.

Inevitably it will raise issues that are much broader than the question of bringing to a halt the development and exportation of certain prescribed items. Obviously the member for Winnipeg Transcona had a broader thought in mind and I think he is achieving that objective.

We have in the last hours actually launched in this Chamber something that this government has unfortunately failed to do, namely a debate on a national energy strategy. This is what we are actually doing. By voting or speaking against this bill we are really saying that Canada does not need a national energy strategy, that we should just ignore it and sweep it under the carpet and hope for the best. For that reason alone, were it only for that reason, we ought to support this bill and vigorously so.

It is ironic also that two months after the member for Winnipeg Transcona tabled his bill, the minister of energy and the Minister for International Trade would announce a loan of up to $315 million to Romania for the construction of the Cernavoda power station almost as if to provoke feelings in this field.

Without going again, because of time limitation, into the merits, I think it would have been more honest and more appropriate to describe this $315 million not as a loan but as an outright grant considering the economic difficulties that Romania is likely to encounter for a long time before being able even to look at debts with Canada.

Let me make the point that what we have here today is in a mini form, an integrated debate on the economy and the ecology, an integrated debate actually that brings the economy, the ecology and the energy all into focus. It should actually not be a debate in which we become polarized between two opposed factions, the enlightened on the one hand and the regressive on the other, and not knowing exactly who is where, but a debate that really brings together as a mainstream concern the public interest.

What is the public interest? It is really to address the question of the urgent necessity of discussing a long-term, medium-term and short-term energy policy. This is what the member for Winnipeg Transcona has achieved.

Therefore, for this reason it will be good to have a study of this bill in committee, I submit, and it would be a pity to be afraid of having this kind of study in committee. The difficulty that we face, and this has already been demonstrated by a number of interventions, is that the fate of nuclear power is being discussed in a policy vacuum. Since there is no national energy strategy for the next five years or longer we cannot really do it.

Imagine, even the champion of deregulation, namely the United States of America, has a national energy strategy that was determined after extensive public consultations. We do not.

This debate has to take place against the background of one major concern and that is the necessity of developing integrated policies that would aim at the reduction of the global climate threats which are the object of scientific elaborations in recent years. I would like to refer to the existence of a very impeccable source, a publication entitled "Energy for a Habitable World" which is published by the Interaction Council. This council is composed of former prime ministers and heads of states and can only be accused of having one vested interest and that is the best future for the world.

I am glad to report that the former Prime Minister of Canada, Pierre Elliot Trudeau, is a member of the Interaction Council. A national energy strategy would of course consist of several elements. Very briefly, it would deal with the fact, as a premise, that the global climate change is a reality and would therefore aim at developing policies to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005 as already discussed and concurred in Toronto at the Climate Conference of 1988.

• (1840)

Second, it would have a serious commitment at least for a long-term 50 per cent reduction by the year 2025. Certainly it would have a strategy that would end in the short-term to conservation and increases in the efficiency of energy users, namely on the demand side, and conservation and increases in the efficiency of production, namely on the supply side.

In the medium-term you would want to have a shift in the fossil fuel mix from coal and oil to natural gas, taking advantage of their different carbon contents and their impact of course on CO_2 emissions.

In the long term, Madam Speaker, you would want to see and I am sure we are heading in that direction a very powerful and important promotion and aggressive introduction of renewable sources of energy, renewable because they are the ones that are going to serve the purposes of humanity in the long term and that would be required on a large scale.

To do that of course we will need to make very early, now, at this stage, in this decade, a massive shift in our resources and in our research funds.

The strategy in these very sketchy aspects would have to be complemented by other initiatives. For instance you would have to bring back into the National Research Council the energy division which has been systematically dismantled since 1984 and give this division a task that would be commensurate to this particular challenge.

Finally, it is important that we also as a nation give leadership internationally to the development of certain agreements that are required for the control of emissions of all greenhouse gases and agree with other nations on a concerted action.

I would conclude by saying also that this debate allows us to raise the importance of harmonizing environmental objectives and concern with energy promises. Here you have an example where all of us I am sure have made speeches on sustainable development and have here an opportunity to practice what they have preached in their respective ridings, cities and the like.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to take part in this debate on the consequences of Bill C-204 on Canada's participation in the NPT and safeguards program.

This proposed amendment to the Atomic Energy Control Act would throw into jeopardy the long years of determined efforts and accomplishments that have established Canada as one of the world's leaders in the field of nuclear non-proliferation.

It is quite clear that Canada's international stature on this matter was achieved by our participation in a domestic nuclear power program which included the full infrastructure that is required to support the construction and operation of Candu nuclear power stations in three Canadian provinces.

Canada is the world leader in the production and export of uranium and, as a result, has been a major factor in determining the operating principles of trade in this commodity. Canada has also engaged in the export of nuclear reactors and has learned by experience of the hazards that may result from inadequate controls.

This bill would immediately curtail any further activity in these sectors and would certainly have a drastic neutralizing effect on our continued participation in the non-proliferation theatre. The reputation that Canada has attained by its steadfast and expert participation in the world's nuclear community would be thrown to the winds by this arbitrary and irresponsible severance from the continued development of nuclear power. It would preclude any meaningful international influence over the course to be followed in the peaceful application of nuclear power and its attendant immeasurable benefits to mankind.

I should like to draw to the attention of the members the great achievements in leadership that Canada has demonstrated in the field of nuclear non-proliferation, all of which would be put at a high risk by any ill-conceived, whimsical action such as this.

Canada's non-proliferation and safeguards policy has two objectives: (1) to promote the emergence of a more effective and comprehensive international non-proliferation regime; and, (2) to assure Canadians and the international community that our nuclear exports will not be used for any nuclear explosive purpose.

Canada's policy promotes attainment of the first objective by emphasizing the key role of the NPT, which is the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Second, by promoting reliance upon and improvements in the international Atomic Energy Agency safeguards system, by treating nuclear weapons and non-nuclear weapon states alike regarding Canadian nuclear exports and, finally, by working for new approaches covering the sensitive phases of the nuclear fuel cycle.

The second objective is served through the network of bilateral nuclear agreements that Canada has put into place with its nuclear partners. Those agreements provide assurance that Canada's nuclear exports are used solely for legitimate, peaceful nuclear energy production purposes.

At the same time, Canada, having formulated its non-proliferation and safeguard policy during the years after the Second World War until 1980, has recognized that it has gone as far as it can on its own in this field and that from this point on any further changes should be made on the basis of international agreement.

The Canadian objective is to persuade the international community to devise a more effective and comprehensive international non-proliferation regime in which Canada and other suppliers might subsume their national requirements.

Whatever else, the second half of the 20th century will come to be symbolized by the unlocking of power in the atom, which will be seen as one of the half dozen or so most significant developments. This power was first demonstrated close to the mid point of the century. There is no turning back the clock.

It is common knowledge that energy can be released from splitting atoms both suddenly in an explosion and gradually in a nuclear reactor that has mechanisms controlling the rate of the chain reaction.

The question that has preoccupied many governments and many individuals since nuclear energy was first shown to be viable is how to harness the energy in the atom while preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

A great deal has been written about nuclear proliferation and nuclear non-proliferation since the first detonation of a nuclear explosive device in 1945. The high point in the history of non-proliferation is, of course, the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons which was written in 1968 to 1970. The establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency in 1957 is also highly significant, especially since it is that international body that is responsible for onsite inspection and safeguard measures that assist the member states of the agency to demonstrate that no nuclear material is diverted to non-peaceful purposes from safeguarded nuclear facilities.

Besides these international efforts, many countries that supplied nuclear related materials have developed national policies of their own which apply to the export of such nuclear items.

The essential determinant of a proliferation is the degree of political incentive or disincentive which countries face. Thus, while diversion of nuclear items from the civilian nuclear fuel cycle is one possible technical route to the development of nuclear explosive devices, it is not the only nor the most efficient route.

A political decision to proliferate would be better served by installing facilities dedicated solely to that objective. Controls on the diversion of nuclear items from civilian facilities are necessary but it is clear that if a country has sufficient political incentive, such controls by themselves would not stop that country. Any industrialized country and many developing countries could develop a nuclear explosive capability if they so decided. A general political commitment by a country not to proliferate is therefore as important as the specific controls that prevent diversion.

• (1850)

Canada was one of three states that participated in the November 1945 agreed declaration on atomic energy. Throughout the years that followed Canada has played an active and significant role in efforts to define an international regime which would serve the twin principles set forth in the declaration. Canada participated both in the drafting of the International Atomic Energy Agency statute between April of 1955 and October of 1956 and in the preparatory commission appointed to make arrangements for the first sessions of the International Atomic Energy Agency's general conference and of its board of governors.

Canada has had continuous representation on the board of governors since the founding of the IAEA and has strongly supported the agency's efforts on nuclear safeguards. Canadian representatives were also involved in the negotiations of the treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.

Canada's uranium exports from 1945 until 1974 were carried out under a nuclear co-operation agreement which made the export subject to peaceful uses commitment and to acceptance by the importing country of bilateral verification measures by Canada, or increasingly through the International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards that they had put in place.

From 1945 through until 1965, Canada also exported uranium to the United States and to the United Kingdom for use in their nuclear weapons program. These export sales were carried out as part of Canada's defence relations with those two countries. That policy was ended in June, 1965 when former Prime Minister Pearson announced in the House of Commons that "as one part of its policy to promote the use of Canadian uranium for peaceful purposes, the government has decided that export permits will be granted or commitments to issue export permits will be given with respect to the sale of uranium covered by contracts entered into from now on, but only if the uranium is to be used for peaceful purposes. Before such sales to any destination are authorized, the Government of Canada will require an agreement with the government of the importing country to ensure with appropriate verification and control that uranium is to be used for peaceful purposes only".

So with the announcement of this policy all Canadian uranium exports became subject to the "peaceful uses" provision.

I can see that the Speaker is indicating that my time is almost up. I would conclude by saying that in the riding of Cambridge the firm of Babcock and Wilcox has been quite active in this particular industry and I know that the company and the workers at that particular company and the community of Cambridge would certainly want me to stand here today and oppose this legislation.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of this very worthy bill. I want to first commend the member for Winnipeg Transcona for bringing the bill forward.

I would like to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished member for Davenport who spoke earlier. Had there been more time available tonight, we would have had another contribution in support of the bill namely from the member for Broadview—Greenwood who would like to see the bill go to second reading so that we could have a thorough examination of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Blaikie: How about Winnipeg North?

Mr. Harvard: Yes, and I could say that the member for Winnipeg North also supports the bill.

This is an important debate for this is a very major issue and this is the place, the Parliament of Canada, where major issues of this kind should be debated.

I joined the debate for many reasons, one of which is out of respect for the many concerned citizens. The people who support a bill like this and who are concerned about the nuclear industry are not odd-balls. These are good people and responsible people. They have studied the issue very thoroughly. Their questions are pertinent and their concerns are valid.

At last count, about 170 organizations support nuclear phase-out. In my province there are six well-known organizations: the Concerned Citizens' Committee of Manitoba, Manitoba Uranium Action Coalition, Project Peacemakers, Veterans Against Nuclear Arms, Winnipeg Co-Ordinating Committee for Disarmament, and World Federalists, the Winnipeg chapter.

The words in the bill are quite sweeping. They call for a nuclear-free Canada, the cessation of all nuclear development and the phase-out of existing nuclear facilities at the end of their current life.

I would suggest that let us not focus entirely on the wording of the bill. Let us focus on the necessity of having a debate and a thorough examination of the nuclear industry in Canada. That is what I want from this particular exercise in Parliament.

To hear opponents of the bill tell it, any debate of this kind will bring the nuclear industry crashing down. Moreover, they would like us to believe that speaking in favour of a bill like this is akin to something unpatriotic. I say we should get serious because there is nothing further from the truth.

The nuclear industry is a huge industry in this country with thousands of employees. It has friends in very high places, starting with the federal government in Ottawa. It is anything but feeble and it can take care of itself. Let us have a debate because there is concern and that concern is growing.

In the 10 years ending in 1988 support for nuclear expansion dropped from 46 per cent of Canadians to only 16 per cent. A similar poll carried out by Decima in 1989 came up with a similar finding.

You might ask yourself the question: Is nuclear phase-out something far-fetched? I do not think it is. For example, there has been no new nuclear reactor in North America in the past 10 years. After Chernobyl, the Philippines closed its only plant. Several European countries—Sweden, Austria and Italy—have agreed to a nuclear phase-out and three plants have closed in Britain. Nuclear phase-out is something that is not far-fetched.

Relating to other concerns, things can go and have gone wrong with nuclear power plants around the world. We all know about Chernobyl in the Soviet Union. There, thousands of people died in the immediate area around the plant which was transformed for a long, long time; perhaps forever.

We all remember Three Mile Island right on this North American continent. We thank God that there has not been something even worse than Chernobyl. We always think about a horrible, horrible meltdown, something that does not happen. Let us hope it never does.

Nothing as serious as Chernobyl or Three Mile Island has occurred in Canada. Our Candu reactor has according to world standards a pretty good record so far, but it is not perfect. There was a rupture of a pressure tube at Pickering, Ontario about eight years ago, in 1983.

The fear of accidents is one thing, but there are other concerns as well. There is radioactive pollution. Some countries, not Canada, have reduced permissible levels of radiation exposure for both workers and the general public. Nuclear power is dirty. It is dirty. The problems relating to waste, how to get rid of bad waste, are nightmarish.

Let me point out that over 17,000 tonnes of nuclear fuel bundles are currently in storage at reactor sites in New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, 17,000 tonnes of nuclear fuel bundles.

Radioactive substances from nuclear reactors are among the most toxic materials known to mankind. Spent nuclear fuel cannot be handled by human hands. It remains toxic for hundreds of thousands of years.

These are real problems and we cannot wish them away. That is why I believe that a thorough examination by this House would be very much in order.

While we are at it, we could look at the whole question of economics as it relates to the nuclear industry. The question of economics has been touched on in previous speeches, but just let me raise the question.

Are taxpayers getting a good return on their dollars which have been sunk into the nuclear industry? Billions of dollars have been sunk by the public into the nuclear industry.

I think a review is in order. It has been promised in the past. It was promised, I believe, by a former Prime Minister in 1979. It was again promised in about 1984 and it was promised somewhat later, in the late 1980s. Those promises have not materialized in any review of the nuclear industry.

I say we should take this bill and send it to committee. Let us have a thorough review and let us address the concerns of very concerned Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was talking about the two major errors contained in the statement of the minister of immigration of October 4, 1991 regarding the refugee backlog clearance program.

The second error is that the backlog will not be completed within its original budget. The original budget as announced by the former minister when the program began was $100 million. Now it is $179 million and the minister pretends it is within budget.

The program for clearing the backlog is nothing more than smoke and mirrors. It is a cross between amnesty and administrative review pretending to be a program to ferret out bogus refugees. The program is neither on time nor on budget.

Refugee claimants whose lives have been on hold for as long as four years are now being told by this minister that they will have to wait an additional 15 months. Despite this, the minister said: "The program is meeting its objective to clear these claims in a fair and humanitarian manner".

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing fair or humanitarian about waiting up to five years to have one's claim heard.

DONOHUE MATANE

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, for some time now, and especially during Small Business Week, workers at Donohue Matane and their socio-economic partners in the Gaspé have been vigorously pursuing efforts to start operations again at their ultra modern plant and obtain the paper machine they need to upgrade the value of their natural resources.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke personally to the Prime Minister, and I know he is giving this matter special attention.

I therefore wish to take this opportunity to again invite the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade to continue their efforts to find a potential investor who will help meet the expectations of workers at the Matane pulp mill.

Mr. Prime Minister, the people of the Gaspé are counting on your support.

DEPO-PROVERA

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, we are once again seeing the attempt to misuse the cancer-treating drug depo-provera as a contraceptive.

The chief of the Baffin Regional Health Board in the Northwest Territories is quoted today as saying that depo-provera is being offered to northern Inuit women as a contraceptive despite having never been approved by the federal government for such use.

Indeed, the drug has been subject to an intense campaign by Canadian women and health groups to ensure that it is not used as a contraceptive because of well documented concerns about breast cancer, foetal abnormalities, and more than 20 side effects.

To his credit the former minister of health, Jake Epp, disallowed the use of the drug as a contraceptive because of concerns about the long-term safety of women. I call upon the current minister of health to review the drug approval process so that legal drugs cannot be misused and so that these Inuit women are not put at risk.

JUDO CLUB OF BOIS-DES-FILION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to pay tribute to the remarkable performance of nine members of the Judo Club of Bois-des-Filion, a municipality in my riding. Several days ago, they won seven medals, including two gold, at the International Judo Championship in Newark, New Jersey.

Both athletes and trainers have shown that with hard work and determination, and despite limited financial means, they were able to achieve the highest levels of excellence.

These young people are worthy representatives of the riding of Terrebonne, the town of Bois-des-Filion and this country, and we are all very proud of them. I urge them to keep up the good work, and I can assure them that we are all very proud of their performance and their success.

Once again, three cheers and congratulations! We are all very proud of you.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have received a petition signed by over 1,400 constituents concerning government initiatives to close or cut services at the postal outlets at Drake Pharmacy in Windsor Park in my constituency.

These cuts and closures have also been imposed on other facilities, for example, McCulluogh Drugs, Marion Grocery, and Metro Drugs. Over the years staff in the post offices in St. Boniface and Norwood have been reduced as well.

These cuts and closings are all in addition to the annoyance they have suffered with supermailboxes, astronomical increases in postal rates, including the GST on stamps and other services, inadequate postal service for certain regions of the constituency, for example River Park South and St. Vital.

This government is inconveniencing and really putting out all constituents, particularly business people, seniors, and handicapped residents.

When will this government have a fair, comprehensive and accessible postal service for all Canadians?

CO-OPERATIVE ASSEMBLY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, 180 residents in the Abitibi area will meet at the Château d'Amos on November 1 and 2 to identify mechanisms that apply the co-operative principle and are most likely to meet the needs of the community. They will do so within the framework of a regional seminar held by the co-operative assembly.

• (1410)

The general theme of this assembly will be how to achieve quality development together. Regional members of the co-operative movement and their socio-economic partners will have discussions on two of three subjects on the agenda: community development using the co-operative formula; co-operative education; and inter-co-operation.

According to Mr. Ferland Miron, president of the Seminar's Organizing Committee and director of the Serres coopératives de Guyenne, it was and is up to co-operators and their partners to work together to achieve quality development, because it is undeniably true that co-operatives can increase their contribution to the region's economic development and, by using their formula, promote development of individual potential.

ELIJAH SMITH

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute and to inform the House of the tragic death of one of the great leaders of the Yukon native community, Mr. Elijah Smith.

In 1973, it was Mr. Smith who travelled to Ottawa to begin Yukon land claims discussions. In Mr. Smith's hands was the document Together Today for our Children Tomorrow. It was a precedent setting paper and served as a model for future discussions between federal governments and aboriginal people.

Mr. Smith was a great man, one of those rare people who could unite others on the strength of his vision. His eloquence and activism on behalf of his people and his commitment to Canada and the democratic process were renown.

Mr. Smith so loved his country that he served in the Second World War and lost his Indian status as a result of doing so. But his love for his own people was no less. In the hope of bettering their lives, he founded the Yukon Native Brotherhood and was later instrumental in bringing together all of the aboriginal people in the Yukon.

With aboriginal and non-aboriginal people in the Yukon, Mr. Smith has been a true leader. He will be truly missed.

I want to say to Mr. Smith's family, and I am sure I echo the sentiments of all members of this House, that a great leader has been lost to us but that his memory will go on.

SISTER CLAIRE HASS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Pembroke, Ontario, a large host of Canadians from all walks of life gathered in St. Columbkille's Cathedral to celebrate the gift of the heroic life and death of Sister Claire Hass who was murdered last week while performing her dedicated missionary work in the Bahamas.

Sister Claire grew up within the peaceful, hardworking, farm community of Admaston township in the county of Renfrew. She entered the Grey Sisters Community in Pembroke, Ontario, in 1947 and began a long career of religious service; nursing and teaching included.

Her missionary work took place in many parts of the world. The most important aspect about Sister Claire was the fact that she was representative of that era in Canadian history which saw many very dedicated, idealistic and realistic young people go from the farmlands and the streets of our wonderful nation to serve their Maker by helping those who could not help themselves.

Her "halls of fame" were the streets of the poor and helpless, her classroom was her castle, her loving care wherever she was needed was her hospital. She practised her missionary work with conviction and purpose. Her life's work is an example for many Canadians to follow.

There is no doubt in the minds of those of us who knew her that Sister Claire Hass was welcomed into heaven with the words: "Well done thy good and faithful servant".

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, during Small Business Week, I would like to pay tribute to Canada's small businesses, especially those in the riding of Joliette which I have the honour to represent.

Small businesses are the engines of Canada's economy—no one can deny that. We realize they represent over 97 per cent of Canadian businesses and that their annual sales generate over $326 billion.

Joliette has many small businesses which, through hard work and determination, have managed to carve out a niche in a market that is becoming increasingly competitive, both nationally and internationally. Two examples are Les Ateliers d'usinage M.D.M. Inc. and Filochrome Inc., and there are many more.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's prosperity depends on the prosperity of small businesses. That is why since 1984, the federal government has been trying to create an economic climate that is favourable to small business growth and development.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST CODE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on this important week of UN speculation, let us have the first reading of the conflict of interest code to Canadians according to Brian.

Before leaving office, public office holders should not allow themselves to be influenced in the pursuit of their official duties and responsibilities by plans or offers of outside employment. Public office holders shall disclose in writing all firm offers of outside employment that could place the public office holder in a position of conflict of interest.

Finally, where a public office holder does not comply with the measures he is subject to, such appropriate measures as may be determined by the designated authority, including, where applicable, discharge or termination of employment.

Mr. Speaker, what does this have to do with certain job opportunities in downtown Manhattan by the riverside?

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for Science announced the names of 3,200 new Canada scholars for 1991–92. Thirteen of these scholars are from the federal riding of Peterborough. These 3,200 new Canada scholars are joining the ranks of more than 4,000 established Canada scholars who are already pursuing studies in mathematics, engineering and natural sciences.

Canada Scholarships are worth $2,000 annually and can be renewed up to three times for a total value of $8,000 to each student. A Canada Scholarship holds more than monetary rewards, it brings prestige, recognition and career opportunities to the recipients. The Canadian government has pledged $80 million to this scholarship program.

Today's Canada scholars are tomorrow's scientists and engineers. I would like to take this opportunity to extend congratulations to both new and continuing Canada scholars. I wish them every success in meeting the challenge of being a Canada scholar.

QUEBEC'S REPUTATION

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, over the last 30 years, Quebecers have built a society based on respect for others. They are proud of it. Today, they are disappointed, and for a good reason. During the Oka crisis, people in English Canada and abroad took the opportunity to tarnish Quebec's image. Now, in the Great Whale issue, people are doing all they can to demolish Quebec's reputation. The most shameful part of this story, Mr. Speaker, is that those who sit in government and pretend to defend Quebec's interests in Ottawa remain silent. Every time Quebec's reputation is threatened, they keep quiet. Is there connivance in all that, Mr. Speaker? I really wonder today!

SAGUENAY–ST. LAWRENCE MARINE PARK

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1990, the governments of Canada and Quebec concluded an agreement to create the Saguenay–St. Lawrence marine park in the medium term. They thus laid the foundation for what promises to become such a major experiment in environmental protection that it will be among the most important ecological initiatives in the world.

All interested persons and groups in the community, especially Mr. Corbin, president of the marine park coalition, ask both governments to stop their bureaucratic quarreling and to involve the community in this important development for all of eastern Canada.

As the coalition points out, the Saguenay–St. Lawrence marine park is neither federal nor provincial but belongs to present and future generations. To attain the environmental objectives that led to creating this park, officials must stop their useless jurisdictional disputes and personal bickering and let Parks Canada share its expertise and financial resources with Quebec and our region.

Let us put an end to these ivory tower frustrations.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House, the Prime Minister said that he was not seeking the position of United Nations Secretary General. Given that statement, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Has the government asked Yves Fortier, our ambassador to the United Nations, to withdraw the Prime Minister's name from the list of candidates for that position, or has Mr. Fortier been asked to become the chief organizer for the Prime Minister's election campaign in New York?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it would be very difficult to withdraw from something that you were not a party to or a a part of and so the answer is no.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I took the Prime Minister at his word when he said that he was not—and I repeat—that he was not a candidate for the job in New York. I believed him. Now, 24 hours later, the Deputy Prime Minister cannot tell me why the name of the Prime Minister has not been withdrawn from this list. The Prime Minister cannot have it both ways. Either he wants the job or he does not want the job.

• (1420)

I would like to know from the Deputy Prime Minister: What kind of instructions has the government given to Ambassador Fortier and the 1,200 Canadian diplomats abroad? Are they campaigning abroad, speaking for Canada or trying to find a golden parachute for the Prime Minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am really surprised—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: You are surprised.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised at the hon. Leader of the Opposition. First and foremost I think all Canadians should be honoured by the fact that the Prime Minister's name has been advanced for such a prestigious office.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Surely it is a reflection of the esteem and the regard with which he is held internationally, and surely it reflects the prominence and the importance of Canada in the leadership role and the activity it has been involved in since the United Nations started.

The fact of the matter is that the name was placed there by someone without the Prime Minister's consent. He has neither sought nor is seeking nor intends to seek such a position. As far as we are concerned, the matter is dead.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it would be very easy for the Prime Minister to do what Mr. Trudeau did in similar circumstances. He said he was not interested and he was not going to take the job.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a question. One and a half million people in Canada are looking for jobs today. In Sault Ste. Marie, 20,000 people have joined together to save Algoma Steel. They are in the gallery today and they have presented a very good document to the government, and the government does not want to listen to them.

My question is very straightforward: When will the Prime Minister stop promoting himself for a job abroad and start promoting Canada—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether that question was designed to promote his old friend Mr. Trudeau as a candidate. Obviously everyone knows that he is available doing nothing, but the phone never rang; his name does not appear on the list.

In so far as the Leader of the Opposition's reference to Algoma, the Minister for International Trade, myself and other ministers have met with representatives of the Algoma district expressing their concern about the future of Algoma. The Minister for International Trade is handling this file and is working very closely with all parties. We hope that there can be a positive solution found to this very serious difficulty.

I remind the hon. member that this government has already ploughed about $200 million plus into that facility, so we do have an interest in it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians have a right to know what the government's policy is with respect to the question of filling what will soon be vacant post of Secretary-General of the United Nations. Canada will have to decide whether Canada, among possibilities, is going to support the placement of the first woman Secretary-General of the United Nations, the first Secretary-General from the continent of Africa, or whether Canada is looking for a bailout, a parachute for an unpopular Prime Minister here at home.

We ask the Deputy Prime Minister: What instructions has the Government of Canada given to our ambassador at the UN, Yves Fortier, and to our ambassadors around the world? Have they been instructed to support the candidacy of the Prime Minister, or have they been given other instructions?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This is worse than Trudeau and Iran.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that Canada currently is not a member of the Security Council. The deliberations with respect to a replacement for the existing Secretary-General is a matter that is currently within the ambit of the Security Council.

At this stage, while it is deliberating, Canada does not have a direct influence or a direct say and will not until such time as the Security Council brings forth its recommendation.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is not unreasonable for members of Parliament, indeed for the people of Canada, to ask the question whether or not the Prime Minister of this country has allowed his name to stand as a candidate for Secretary-General of the United Nations. It is perfectly reasonable to expect a straight answer. We have not had one.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Has the Prime Minister allowed his name to stand? We know it has not been withdrawn. Has Canada given instructions to our diplomatic personnel? It is not believable that we would show a benign interest in this.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, he has not sought, is not seeking and will not seek the position.

Mr. Tobin: What instructions have been given?

Mr. Mazankowski: What instructions have been given? It does not require the consent of any individual for the name to be put forward for consideration.

Mr. Tobin: And we have no comment?

Mr. Mazankowski: At the appropriate time Canada will comment, but at this particular time the deliberations are currently before the Security Council. What is so strange about that, Mr. Speaker?

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I am sure that while there are many things the minister and I might disagree with we do agree on one thing, and that is that we want to see the unity of Canada preserved and enhanced. We want to see the confederation of this country improved.

I want to raise with the minister some very serious concerns. I understand, and I understand well the process, that the constitutional joint parliamentary committee is not the minister's responsibility as such, that it is separate.

However, I want to ask the minister a question because this is a very serious issue of process. There were other alternatives to a kind of process we might use for the Constitution. The minister and his government wanted to see a joint parliamentary committee. We agreed to participate.

I want to say to the minister that there are serious concerns within the committee about consultation, about organization and about notice being given in the various regions of this country so that people who want to participate can.

Because of the extraordinary importance of this issue, will the minister make inquiries to ensure that the committee is truly functioning in a non-partisan and an organized manner so that all Canadians can have their say?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally, if the Leader of the New Democratic Party thinks that I should make inquiries, I will. I guess I will start with her and ask her to state directly what it is that concerns her. If there is a problem that she states directly, I will then try to deal with it.

I would hope that perhaps in the process she could indicate to me who are the three official members of the New Democratic Party serving on the committee.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Yes, there are specific concerns if the minister would like me to raise them with him. There are concerns about the lack of notice for those members in provinces and territories who want to participate. We cannot have a participatory process if people do not know and cannot prepare for these. It is a very serious concern.

There are concerns about how contracts are being let in the committee, whether in fact those contracts are approved by the committee, and whether they are going through a proper process. There are concerns in the committee about whether in fact the committee is committed and the committee chair appointed by this government is committed—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. member for Yukon will realize that in asking questions about what is taking place in a committee there are some narrow constraints under our rules.

The hon. member for Yukon is expressing some concerns that may more properly be the object of a question to perhaps a committee chairperson. I think the matters the hon. member is raising go beyond what the minister could in fact answer because he would then be answering for the committee itself.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I could phrase the question very succintly.

Will the minister ensure that Canadians have proper notice of the consultation process that is going to take place? Will he ensure that the committee itself is working in the non-partisan fashion in which he intended the committee to work?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly do everything within my power to ensure that. It would be helpful, in the interests of maintaining the respect for that committee which I think all members of Parliament, with perhaps some exceptions want it to enjoy, if there are specific concerns the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has if she raised them with me directly, if they are mine to resolve, rather than waiting for Question Period in the House of Commons to do that.

She has my undertaking to do my best to maintain the effectiveness and the non-partisan nature of the committee.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the minister.

Again we share the minister's concern that this committee work fulfil the function it must do, if it is to have the confidence of the Canadian people.

One of the real concerns is that there have been a number of TV ads, information and 1-800 numbers at a fairly significant cost to the government. The committee is proposing to double the budget for advertising.

I want to ask the minister: What does he feel is an appropriate method of informing Canadians? Is it by doubling the budget of the committee—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon, as I said earlier, may very well have questions that ought to be put to a committee chairperson.

I am constrained by the rules, as we all are, and I think that question goes beyond what can be put to the minister under the circumstances.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Today the Community Action Team from Sault Ste. Marie met with the government to demand a commitment of support from the government to save thousands and thousands of jobs at Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie, because in eight days' time the court protection from foreclosure runs out for this company.

The plan to restructure this company involves a buyout by the employees which requires a special tax incentive.

I wonder why the Government of Canada is refusing to provide a special tax incentive to help these employees carry out a buyout program and save these thousands and thousands of jobs. Can the minister explain why they are refusing that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct one thing. I believe it was one of the previous speakers from the Liberal side who said that we did not care about this issue. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Members of our caucus met with the group from Algoma yesterday and today and had quite full discussions with them. We have agreed on the areas where we do have a direct involvement. One of them is in relation to tax treatment on a buyout. Other areas would include training or early retirement for older employees.

These are matters that are under consideration in an active way. Members of my department have been meeting actively with people in the community, people from the company, Mr. Gaudry, the union and other interested parties, all with a view to putting together what is the most appropriate response to a very difficult situation.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question for the minister involves the restructuring of Algoma.

In the business plan that the company put forward it suggested that some $46.8 million would be required for industrial and employee adjustment programs, as well as a bridging pension program for older workers, to allow them to retire with some dignity.

I want to ask the minister, in going before the court next week, if the government prepared to give its commitment that it will provide that $46.8 million to assist these older employees who are facing the loss of their jobs and their livelihood.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier response, there is a range of issues under consideration here. They are all linked. There are different responsibilities for the Dominion Foundries Company, Algoma itself, the banks, the union, the provincial government and the federal government. There is a wide range of responsibilities here.

As I indicated to my hon. friend in my previous answer, these proposals are all under consideration. As soon as there is a proposal to put forward that all are happy with then that is when we will have some very clear answers for him.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I want to ask the minister about major transfer payment cutbacks to the provinces and territories.

I would like to ask the minister about the reduction in growth of payments to the Northwest Territories by 9 per cent over the past six years.

How can the minister justify a reduction in transfer payments to the Northwest Territories by $110 million over five years when the majority of communities has a 50 per cent unemployment rate and the cost of living in some cases is 60 per cent higher than that of places like Edmonton?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to the equalization issue. As I indicated in the House yesterday, these adjustments do not come as a surprise to any of the administrations because it is part and parcel of the formula which is legislated.

These adjustments are made at least two times a year. Sometimes the adjustments are upward and sometimes they are downward. In this particular case there are some provinces, particularly in the Atlantic region, that will experience a reduction. Nova Scotia, for example, will experience an increase while Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be favoured with an increase as a result of this adjustment process.

That is part of a legislated program, and I am sure the hon. member would not want us to tamper with that on an ad hoc basis.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the minister's well camouflaged numbers do not deny the fact that a reduction in transfer dollars to the Northwest Territories means it is hopeless for northerners to have any economic security or even much needed infrastructure such as roads and airports.

In fact there is virtually no activity in the Beaufort Sea for oil and gas. There are crippling air costs because most of it is done by air travel. There are no mining incentives or tax deferral schemes.

My supplementary question to the minister would be: Will the minister undertake to ensure the newly elected Government of the Northwest Territories that his government will stop reducing opportunities for northerners by placing the burden of the federal deficit on the shoulders of northern Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while we have a serious fiscal problem, we certainly have not taken the issue of reducing the deficit solely on the backs of the provinces. For example, in 1984–84 transfers to the provinces totalled some $25.5 billion. In 1991–92 total transfers will equal $37 billion. That is a substantial increase.

In the area of equalization, in 1984–85 the transfers under equalization were $5.4 billion. This year it is $8.4 billion. EPF from $14.5 billion to $20.368 billion. The Canada Assistance Plan, in 1984–85 the transfers were $4 billion. In 1991–92 they are $6.3 billion.

• (1440)

It hardly suggests that there is a massive reduction in transfers to the provinces. I would interpret that as a massive increase in transfers to the provinces.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It concerns Algoma as well.

The community action team is in Ottawa today representing a cross section of the communities of Sault Ste. Marie and Wawa. The minister is very aware of the facts surrounding this situation and he is also very aware of the requests we have made.

They are in the area of bridge pensions, older worker adjustment package, the necessary tax credits for employee buy–out and necessary funding for retraining.

It is the eleventh hour, and I ask the minister to provide specifics in which area the government will participate to give some reassurance to the delegation here today and to the communities of Sault Ste. Marie and Wawa.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, members of our government and of our caucus have met with the community action team.

They had extensive meetings yesterday and today with them. They discussed the range of issues that my hon. friend has read out. As I indicated in my previous answer, these are complex issues that involve a number of players and the discussions that are under way right now involve what is the appropriate sharing of the burden of meeting the challenges of this very complex situation.

Those discussions are continuing. My department, the Department of Employment and Immigration and other departments are fully engaged in these discussions. I think it would be premature for me to indicate with any precision because it is very difficult to do so at this stage of the discussions when we do not have the final answers from all the players around the table.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Labour.

The minister is aware of the present difficulties that the Canadian steel industry is facing. In Sault Ste. Marie and in Wawa, the situation is critical. Employees have already made many sacrifices in order to save their company and allow their communities to survive.

I want to ask the minister whether he is prepared to share some of the burden and whether the Older Workers Adjustment Program will be made more flexible for this company so that displaced older workers can be dealt with fairly.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member and commend him for his concern.

As far as the labour department is concerned, the lay–offs that have taken place are being studied by a committee of the province of Ontario and the federal government.

A report will be made to the Department of Labour and to me. At that time the decision will be made.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In September of this year, this cash starved federal government found hundreds of millions of dollars to spend in a doomed attempt to save two Tory premiers. Yet this week the Mulroney government stunned the Atlantic provinces with a cut of over $170 million in badly needed equalization payments.

Will the Minister of Finance stand up today and guarantee that federal funding to the Atlantic provinces will be maintained at a level sufficient to ensure that national standards can be maintained in the delivery of health care and social services by these four provincial governments, yes or no?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that it will be maintained consistent with the legislation and the formula that has been established.

I only remind the hon. member that equalization payments to the provinces have risen from $5.4 billion in 1984–85 to $8.4 billion in 1991–92. That is a substantial increase.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Yesterday, the minister's press secretary said that "figures show the Atlantic economies are performing better than the other provinces".

Let us look at the facts. In Newfoundland, unemployment is 70 per cent above the national average. In Prince Edward Island, the per capita income is 32 per cent below the national average and in Nova Scotia, bankruptcies are at the highest rate in the country.

I ask the minister to stand and tell the tens of thousands of unemployed in the Atlantic region who are facing a winter on welfare, the students who cannot afford to pursue secondary education, or the sick waiting for hospital beds, whether he stands by these arrogant and objectionable statements made by his own department.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I don't want to deny the fact that there are serious economic difficulties that all Canadians are facing, and I certainly appreciate the hon. member's concern about that. at the same time I think there has to be clear recognition of the fact that the federal government recognizes that there are poorer provinces, and in an effort to equalize opportunities and equalize services, we provide equalization grants.

Just for the record so that the hon. member will understand, for 1991–92 the equalization on a per capita basis to the province of Newfoundland is $1,649 per person; for Prince Edward Island it is $1,531 per person; for Nova Scotia it is $1,050 per person; and for New Brunswick it is $1,201 on a per capita basis.

As I indicated the level of equalization grants to the provinces has increased by 60 per cent since we have been in office.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the past year the federal government has cut transfer payments to Atlantic Canada by $164 million. The government speaks of competitiveness but it slashes post-secondary education funding. Dalhousie University, St. Mary's University, Mount St. Vincent University, to name three, have students, faculty and administrations that are bleeding from a thousand government inflicted wounds.

I ask the Minister of Finance today to tell us that he will restore established programs funding to its usual levels on a percentage basis, not just with his funny numbers game.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I were to restore funding to the usual basis, it would go back to $5.4 billion. That would be the level that the hon. member would be referring to.

I repeat that total transfers to the provinces since we have come into office have increased from $25.6 billion to $37 billion in total transfers.

In terms of equalization, as I indicated earlier, the increase is from $5.4 billion to $8.4 billion, which is a 60 per cent increase.

It should be noted as well that today the Atlantic premiers in a press release said they decided not to ask Ottawa for more money to solve the financial crisis. They said they would concentrate on cutting costs and using their resources more effectively. That is what we are all being asked to do.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): A supplementary for the same minister, who now confirms that even the premiers down there have given up on him. He must know that that bafflegab doesn't pay university tuition fees and it does not shorten the wait for those who need elective surgery.

When is he going to beat some sense into his colleagues and call a halt now to this terrible pulverizing of health services, of post-secondary education, in Newfoundland and all across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House yesterday, you cannot have it both ways. In 1988-89, under the same equalization formula that is governed by statute, the provinces enjoyed an increase of $1 billion as a result of this adjustment process. In 1989-90 they enjoyed an increase of $720 million as a result of the application of the legislated formula and both the economic and financial statistics that flow from Statistics Canada.

The hon. member cannot have it both ways. All we are doing is applying the legislation that is there which enshrines the formula and enshrines the way in which these calculations are to be made.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Atomic Energy Control Board released its research report on the impact of tritium releases into the environment by the Pickering nuclear generating station.

We were relieved to read that there was no prevalent relationship between infant deaths and/or birth defects in tritium releases, which clearly refutes a previous study by a Mr. David McArthur. My question for the minister of energy is as follows: Since the study did indicate that there is a higher incidence of Down's syndrome among children in Pickering and Ajax than is prevalent throughout the province of Ontario, will the minister proceed to a follow-up study as recommended by the Johnson report and will he proceed to seek approval of the province of Ontario ministry of health so that that report can be conducted?

• (1450)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. He raises a very important issue relating to the health report. I am pleased also with the manner in which the report has been done.

With regard to Down's syndrome, these conclusions are less clear. In fact there are similar levels of Down's syndrome in a country in Ontario quite far removed from any nuclear reactor, namely Leeds—Grenville.

Along with my colleague, the minister of health and welfare, I am asking the AECB to look at other possibilities whereby we could either verify these numbers more accurately, more closely, or whether there should be any further studies relating to Down's syndrome. I will take that up with the AECB.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the same issue to the minister of energy.

I think the minister is overly relaxed about the fact that this study has found that there is an incidence of Down's syndrome 86 per cent higher than the provincial average in and around the Pickering plant. I would ask him to give assurances to the House at this time that there will be further studies, not only with respect to Pickering and the surrounding area but with respect to other nuclear facilities in the country where epidemiological studies need to be made, not only with respect to the kind that have been made in this report, but others.

It seems to me that that is a commitment that the government should make through the minister of energy or through the ministry of health, and will he make that commitment now?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the first point I want to mention to the hon. member is that he uses an 86 per cent figure and it is not in the report. It was in a press report. I think that when we are dealing with health figures, we should not raise alarms which are not justified.

I take his question seriously in respect to whether additional work should be done. We have looked in this report in terms of leukaemia. There were arguments a long time ago about leukaemia. We have highlighted the Down's syndrome issue. As I said to my hon. colleague before and I say to the member who just put the question that we will take a look at what other approaches we can use to try and verify other numbers that have been identified for any additional work. That undertaking has been given before and I give it gain.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister then would clearly reject the conclusion that AECB seems to come to in that information put out by its office of public information says that no further examination of possible links in this particular situation would seem warranted.

Would the minister reject this conclusion and make it absolutely clear to AECB that further studies in this regard are warranted and that the government will make sure that either AECB or, even better, some more independent body has the ability to do that kind of research?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member first of all should not downgrade the AECB. He has been anti-nuclear ever since he entered this House. Any time the AECB comes forward with a report and he thinks it helps his bias, he uses the AECB as a credible institution.

Then when the AECB comes forward with something else and he does not like it, then of course it is not credible. I say to the hon. member that I will follow the advice of the experts and not his biases.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the next few days the Canadian government will send a cabinet minister on a high level visit to China for the first time since the massacre at Tiananmen Square. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if this renewal of ministerial relations signifies that this government is no longer concerned with China's known abhorrent human rights record.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should not draw that conclusion. I think she knows she should not draw that conclusion.

We have taken a very sensitive view on exactly what is happening in China. The Minister of Agriculture is visiting there on a mission to see whether there are ways that we can promote agricultural exports to China, China being one of our largest customers over many, many years. We have indicated consistently since Tiananmen Square our concern about human rights problems within China. We have made it very clear that as we have changed our approach marginally during this period to allow certain types of exchanges, that should not be interpreted in any way as condoning any of the human rights abuses that have occurred in China.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): I have a supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. I have just returned from China. I raised specific issues on human rights violations with top level Chinese officials. We know the situation is still appalling and yet they skirted my questions.

Will the minister raise with the Chinese government specifically the issue of the continuing suppression of basic human rights through the restraints on freedom of expression and the thousands still held in forced labour camps?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it might have been very useful if what the hon. member just expressed here on the floor of the House had been expressed directly to me so that we could have had a discussion on that particular issue. The point that must be made here is that while we as a country have expressed our views on human rights in a very forceful way and made it clear in the implementation of our policies, we also need to have a view on how we trade with these countries as well because there are many jobs in western Canada that are based on trade in agriculture, and China is one of our best friends.

I say to the Liberal Party that you cannot have it both ways. On the one side it is saying: "We must do more for the farmers. We must provide a greater degree of support to the farmers" and then on the other hand: "We can't support agricultural trade with China". You cannot have it both ways.

ARMED FORCES

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question through you can be directed to either the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of National Defence. The question arises out of a news release that comes from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, signed by the national president of that organization, wherein it says, among other things: "Effective April 1 of this year an Armed Forces colonel received a salary increase of more than $2,000 on a base salary of $74,000 or an increase of 3 per cent".

My question is twofold: First, is this statement factual? Second, if so, do we have a double standard where enlisted personnel receive a wage freeze in 1991 and officers do not?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can reassure my friend that there is indeed no double standard. The Treasury Board directive of zero per cent wage policy applies to all ranks of the Canadian Armed Forces as it does to the Public Service, so that for this fiscal year colonels and generals will not receive pay increases, nor will they for this fiscal year be awarded either merit pay or bonuses.

EDUCATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Nationally speaking, 30 per cent of Canadian students do not finish high school, while in some regions this figure is 70 per cent. The Prime Minister keeps telling us that getting a good education is so important, and meanwhile his government is mercilessly slashing education and training budgets, which were cut by 7.6 per cent last year. My question is this: How can the government claim education is a priority, when it slashes the budget for this sector?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has spoken out as my hon. friend has observed on a number of occasions about some of the challenges that we are facing in the over-all learning system for our country. He has pointed out that the amount of money that is spent per capita on education is the second highest in the industrialized world, second only after Sweden.

I think the challenge that we face is not how much, but how we spend. Yesterday I announced that we would be releasing the prosperity through competitiveness papers and the lifelong learning process papers next Tuesday whereby we will be asking Canadians to express their views. My colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I will be encouraging a broad nation-wide consultation and discussion on these issues so that the questions the hon. member poses can be answered in the broadest possible way.

• (1500)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the same minister. The government has steadily cut education and training funds since it was first elected, according to a recent Statistics Canada study.

In my riding some school boards have complained about funding cuts of more than 50 per cent over the previous year for the START option, a principal component of the government's so-called stay in school initiative.

Why is the government's education strategy all show and no dough? Why the charade? Why does the government announce programs and then cut them shortly after?

Some hon. members: Resign.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the only charade taking place is the Liberal member standing up and telling Canadians through this House that we have cut money and transfers to education.

I invite the hon. member to look at the numbers. He will find that they have not actually decreased, they have increased since 1984. If $11 billion a year of taxpayers' money for training and education in Canada is nothing for the member from Restigouche, it means a lot for Canadians elsewhere.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The election of a new government in British Columbia is good news for the Fraser and Nechako Rivers. The new premier and his government are committed to a full and proper environmental assessment of Alcan's Kemano project.

I would like to ask the minister if he will drop his government's appeal of the court ruling ordering the government to follow its own guidelines and join with the province in a joint, proper review of this project.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first let me make it clear to the hon. member that we have had a number of court rulings in this area over the last few months, and only in the last few months. I think there has been at least five or six major court rulings, including Great Whale in Quebec.

The Government of Canada decided to enter into appeals in some of these instances because what we are dealing with are very fundamental questions of law, in some cases constitutional law, that are deserving the attention of higher courts.

That being the case and referring specifically to Kemano, the Government of Canada has not refused to enter into its responsibilities in respect to its environmental assessment review process. Quite the contrary, we are now initiating the first step of the process as provided for by the ruling.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, if that was correct, then the minister would ask the Minister of Justice to withdraw the appeal of the court ruling.

Given the minister's position, would he agree to meet at the earliest opportunity with the new minister of the environment of British Columbia to discuss how a proper joint review can be conducted?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to meet with the new minister of the environment for British Columbia as soon as possible, as soon as there is one. As far as I know, nobody has been named to that portfolio yet. Until somebody is in that job, it is hard to meet with them. Unless the NDP are on to something I do not know about.

That being the case, let me point out with respect that in the case of Kemano, the Government of Canada lodged an appeal but did not ask for a stay of execution of the first ruling. That is a very important nuance in the way we approach this issue. We did not ask to stop the process. We want the higher courts in these instances to give us a ruling, some indication of where we are at with very fundamental questions of law and constitutional law. We are now applying the first part of the process of ERP and intend to proceed with that.

THE LATE HERMAN BATTEN

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the House leader opposite. I seek consent from the House to express condolences on behalf of all members of Parliament to the Herman Batten family.

Herman Batten was a member of Parliament from 1953 to 1968 and passed away last night at the age of 82. Herman Batten was my predecessor in the riding of Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. In fact his constituency at one point, as other members who have been here longer than I will recall, included all of western, northwestern and southwestern Newfoundland.

He was re-elected six times and served as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. He will be remembered as the gentleman who was the chairman of the House of Commons flag committee and sought to maintain a modicum of order in what was a very emotional and divisive debate. Perhaps it reminds us somewhat of the debate that goes on in this country today. But he was able, through great patience, great sensitivity and great understanding to find consensus and to produce, as chairman of the flag committee, a new flag for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, he was a member of Parliament when you could not fly back to Ottawa in a couple of hours. He was a member of Parliament when you had to visit most of rural Newfoundland by boat. He was one who was held near and dear by his constituents. He served with great distinction and great compassion. He shall be remembered in the Liberal Party. He shall be remembered I know in this Parliament and, in particular, he will be remembered with a great deal of warmth and fondness by the people of western Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and my colleagues for this opportunity to express our appreciation for Herman Batten and our condolences to his family.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of members of the government to express to the Batten family and to the friends of Herman Batten our sorrow at hearing of his passing.

The hon. member who spoke just before me has mentioned many of the attributes and many of the contributions to our country of Mr. Batten and we know that the people Newfoundland were proud of him and proud of the work that he did.

I want to draw particular attention to his work as a committee chairman. That is a role that we in this House give a great deal of dignity and I, being a boy scout back in 1968, can remember some of the emotion that was generated with that particular debate.

Having served as a chairman in this House, I know that when you have a controversial issue, it is a great test of character to be able to go through an issue that is so difficult and so divisive and yet has to be addressed in terms of what is good for the country.

I want to conclude once again by saying that on behalf of members on this side of the House, we express to the family of Mr. Herman Batten and to his friends our sincere sorrow to hear of his passing.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I want to say how saddened we were when we heard of the passing of Herman Batten and our condolences go out to his family and his friends.

As others have indicated, he was known as a constituency man. He served the constituency well. He was a friend of everyone in the constituency. If my memory serves me, he was re-elected six times as a show of good faith by his constituents in the work he did on their behalf.

Also, those who knew him and those who read Hansard know of the role that he played in some very critical debates in the House of Commons. He was a man who was not afraid to speak up for his constituents and was not hesitant at all to speak on the critical issues of the day.

When we heard of the news of his passing we were very saddened and our thoughts and our condolences go out to his friends and his family.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise and say a word on the passing of Mr. Herman Batten, the former member for the old riding of Humber—St. George's, a good chunk of which is now part of the riding of Burin—St. George's which I have the honour to represent here.

In so doing, I pay tribute to a great Canadian, to a compassionate Newfoundlander and to an absolutely marvellous human being. He is remembered fondly and often by his constituents, indeed his name came up in a conversation just a few days ago in my riding.

• (1510)

As Deputy Speaker of this House he represented the institution with great dignity and great purpose and we salute him for that. He will be remembered by those who heard him speak from this Chamber and elsewhere for he had a very rich baritone voice and a very impressive intellect to match.

His family and his friends, who are legion, can be consoled in the sure knowledge that he lived a good, full life and touched the lives of many for the better because of his great integrity and compassion.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, as one who knew Herman Batten personally in this House, I would like to say a word about him today.

In Newfoundland he was known as a schoolmaster. He sat in the chair of this House and brought great dignity to that position. He had that great, deep voice that automatically communicated the fact that he meant business.

Whenever you met him on the street you would see him wearing the good old black hat that was so prominent in those days and in previous days. He looked like an educator. He was a professional person in every way. He had the ability to handle very difficult problems with ease because he was cool, he had a candour and one could tell that he dealt with many problems before coming to this House and he handled them here extremely well.

I remember Herman Batten as a fine gentleman, a very effective parliamentarian, a man with coolness and dignity in this Chamber. He was missed very much after he left here because he did do such a great job in the Chair.

I would like to take this opportunity to extend our condolences to his family, and to say to his constituents who knew him so well in those days that they had great wisdom in selecting him as their member of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of privilege and do so with a little trepidation. I am glad the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke spoke because he and I were here when the Hon. Mr. Batten was here and was Deputy Speaker. I cast no reflection on the fine comments made about Mr. Batten the individual.

Madam Speaker, I really do think that in this House of Commons we have to start to get criteria about the eulogies to members who have come, and other distinguished Canadians who have passed away, having served Canada.

Monday, for instance, we had freelanced here on a point of privilege the death of an outstanding Canadian, 91 years old, a Mr. Nicholson. He used to be a member of this House of Commons. I almost rose then, as I should have done, because in my experience here for a few years I have never heard so many tributes. We have become the house of eulogies rather than the House of Commons. I have written a letter to the Speaker. This is no reflection at all on all those we referred to, but when I hear some of the words, Madam Speaker, about how they are all sorely missed, after 10, 15, 20 or 30 years I really question how members can say that who never were here when the member we are talking about served in this House. It thus discounts and dilutes the tributes that have to be made on those occasions that used to be reserved for this period. But it should not be for every former comrade who has fallen by the wayside because of the natural reflection of time.

I really hope the Speaker takes this under consideration and can give some criteria to House leaders so that we all know. We did something the other day that I do not remember having done before. I may be out of tune, but certainly, Mr. Blackburn, when you go we will try to remember you.

An hon. member: Who was it the other day?

Mr. Nowlan: We had the Supreme Court Justice, Madam Speaker, a very fine Canadian. But now do we do it for every Federal Court judge? Do we do it for the Chief Justice of the provinces?

I think there are many little matters in this regard. Instead of diluting the tributes that used to be on the floor of the House, we should have criteria to make them worth while for those we try to remember in the best way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. He has been around this place for quite a few years and would be in a good position to make comments as to when a tribute should or should not be given to a former member of this House who has passed away.

The Chair will certainly take this into consideration. I think the committee as well could devise some types of rules which could be used. I thank the hon. member for his remarks.

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Environment pertaining to the Porcupine caribou herd calving grounds in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in the state of Alaska.

The United States administration has recommended to Congress that certain lands in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge be opened for petroleum exploration and development. This will affect the Porcupine caribou herd consisting of some 170,000 animals that live in the Arctic, the management of which is shared both by United States and Canada.

Our committee is opposed to petroleum exploration and development in the refuge, and we make three specific recommendations urging the federal government to use all available means to convince the U.S. Congress and the administration not to pursue any developments in this area, endangering both the herd and the people whose very lives depend upon it.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. McDermid moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed. Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INSPECTOR OF PENITENTIARIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-317, an act respecting the office of Inspector General of Penitentiaries.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, the short title of the bill is an act respecting the office of Inspector General of Penitentiaries.

The bill calls for the creation of the office of the Inspector General of Prisons or IGP who would be the inspector for all federal penitentiaries in Canada and who would make such inspections, examinations and inquiries as the inspector considers necessary.

The IGP would be an officer of the House of Commons and would be directly responsible to it in the same manner as is the Auditor General and unlike what is currently in the proposed Bill C-36 where the inspector would be responsible to the Solicitor General.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Blackburn (Brant) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

EDUCATION STANDARDS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-318, an act to establish national standards across Canada for education provided by the provinces.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for St. Boniface for seconding this bill. I want to thank him for his great assistance throughout this debate.

This is an attempt to bring national standards to some key areas of education. We do recognize that the constitutional right of the provinces would allow them to opt out if they choose to opt out and would allow them to participate if they choose to do so. The prime objective of this bill is to protect, promote and improve the quality of education in Canada in consultation with the provinces with national institutions, with teachers, with youth and student organizations, with the voluntary sector and with industry and the business community.

I want to thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank Jeanette Arsenault and Michael Clegg for great help in preparing this bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe you will find consent for the following motion relating to the Standing Committee on House Management. I move:

> That within its mandate related to broadcasting guidelines of committees as per Standing Order 119(2), the committee be authorized to travel to the legislative assemblies of Ontario and Quebec on October 28 to Toronto and on October 31 to Quebec City for 10 members to be accompanied by two staff members and the Director General of Parliamentary Operations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

JASPER AIRSTRIP

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a petition signed by residents in Jasper and other communities in Alberta and British Columbia urging the Department of the Environment to keep the Jasper airstrip open.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a petition on behalf of probably more than 100 residents of Edmonton with respect to a great woman, Marie Sklodowska Curie, that she might be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity. The signers of the petition believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized in our country.

The petitioners call on Canada Post to honour Madam Curie by the issuing of a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth on November 7, 1992. It is my pleasure to tender the petition.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. The first one is from residents of Val-d'Or, Joutel, Vassan, Quebec City, Montreal North, Sainte-Catherine and Saint-Émond, who respectfully submit to Parliament that the Canada Labour Code must respect the principle set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is therefore supposed to protect the rights of women; and that preventive withdrawal for pregnant women is a desirable and necessary option for women in the workplace. They call upon Parliament to recognize the need for including clauses in the Code concerning preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my second petition concerns firearms. It is from a group of petitioners who are residents of Ottawa, Gatineau and Gloucester. Whereas access to firearms is a critical factor in homicide, accidents and suicide; and whereas in Canada many kinds of weapons are readily available which are not needed for legitimate purposes such as hunting or competitive shooting, your petitioners ask Parliament to adopt legislation that will prohibit the possession of firearms by any person with a criminal record.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Barriére, Louis Creek, Kamloops and Darfield, British Columbia. They are concerned about a proposal to divert the North Thompson River at Valemount into the Columbia River channel, which will eventually move water from British Columbia to the San Diego, California area. That is part of the plan.

They are simply calling upon the Government of Canada not to permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted to the United States and to state categorically that our rivers are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present this petition on another matter on behalf of a number of the residents of Kamloops, B.C. who are concerned about the apparent increasing level of lawlessness as a result of RCMP cutbacks.

They say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in many cases is simply unable to provide the policing service that it ought to and would like to because of the funding cuts. They are simply asking the Government of Canada to ensure that proper funding is kept in place to ensure proper RCMP police protection.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DECORUM IN CHAMBER

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That this House recognize that it is the national forum for the consideration of issues and challenges facing all Canadians;

That this House recognizes that its Members were elected by the people of Canada to represent them in a manner which demands that individual Members respect one another and their democratic right to express differing opinions;

That Canadians have expressed alarm at the excessive partisanship and lack of decorum and civility too often in evidence in the House;

That this House recognize that disruptive behaviour and verbal interruptions, including abusive language, leads to a depreciated view of and respect for the institution of Parliament and its Members;

That the Members of this House share in the responsibility of eliminating the use of offensive language or gestures directed at other Members either during Question Period, debate or otherwise in the Chamber; and

That this House supports the Speaker's vigorous enforcement of Standing Order 16(2) and Standing Order 18; in particular those portions which require that when a Member is speaking no Member shall interrupt him or her except to raise a point of order and that no Member shall speak disrespectfully or use offensive words against either House or any Member thereof.

• (1530)

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion today had its genesis some months ago when the whole concern about the operation of the House, its effectiveness, efficiency and reputation became a matter of some public debate.

I have spoken on this issue for many months in the context of House reform and in seeking ways to improve the institution, make it more responsive and restore faith in it.

We had independent confirmation of the disrepute in which we were held in the Spicer report. It is interesting to recall that the Spicer report was a result of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. The issue before the forum was one of constitutional reform, one of the unity of this country. In pursuing its mandate the commission held public hearings literally everywhere in the country to ask people about their concerns about this country. With a rather disturbing frequency people raised the question of Parliament and how it carries on.

I would like to quote an anecdote from a group in Ontario on page 97 of the Spicer report: "Just terrible the way they carry on in Parliament, like unruly children, bad tempered brats, no control, quarrelling between parties. Why don't they get together and use their better ideas". As I said, this was not an isolated anecdote incident and it was repeated in many parts of the country by many groups. In the report's conclusions, the commission states on page 136 of the report: "We join with forum participants in deploring the mindless, and sometimes disgraceful, behaviour of members of both Houses in bringing the parliamentary system into disrepute. We agree with the forum's participants who have pointed out constantly to the fact that our system is too partisan and far too adversarial. In particular, we would urge a careful review of Question Period and how it is organized with an eye on the more productive Question Periods in other parliamentary systems".

If we are to fulfil our responsibilities as members of Parliament, we have to take that observation and those recommendations seriously. We must act to change that view of ourselves and this Chamber. Canadians from coast to coast are identifying this Chamber and our behaviour in it as part of the fundamental constitutional problems of this country.

Let us make it clear that this is not in itself an adversarial debate. I do not intend to engage in finger pointing and I am prepared to admit that I am as adversarial as others in this House. I am sure that other parties have gone through the record as I have. I am sure there are quotes the House leader of the Liberal Party would not like to be reminded of. I have some quotes that the House leader of the New Democratic Party would not like to be reminded of, and I am sure there are quotes that I would rather not be reminded of.

Some hon. members: Books.

Mr. Andre: I understand that. However, that does not change our responsibility as members of Parliament to address the concern which Canadians have stressed from coast to coast.

Some have suggested that the introduction of television in this House is the root of the problem. There is some merit to that suggestion. Television is first and foremost an entertainment media. Television finds conflict, theatrics, fighting, and the adversarial aspects of politics irresistible. That is not a conspiracy. Television reporters are not somehow bad. It is simply a fact of life. Television brings this institution into the living rooms of virtually every home in this country. Television is here to stay; the technology is here to stay. We have to recognize that and conduct ourselves accordingly.

I think the media can help by understanding that and understanding their responsibility. I am reminded of two incidents which I think make the point. In one instance a member of this House stood up and made the accusation that a member opposite was lying. The Speaker quite properly asked that the remark be withdrawn and the member did. However that night the clip of the member standing up theatrically declaring somebody opposite a liar was used on television.

A member of my staff telephoned the producer of that program and said that this was rather unfair since withdrawal was tantamount to it not being said. Television is supposed to be electronic Hansard and by running something that was withdrawn it in essence gave a false impression of what was happening here. That type of occurrence tends to create that type of activity because we are all human and are in politics because we desire and need to be exposed to the public. If television is going to cover antics such as breaking the rules then the temptation to do that is overwhelming.

In fairness, I must say that CTV examined the tape, examined what happened and said it agreed that it should not have done that. It is now CTV's policy that it will not run clips of statements that have been withdrawn.

Just the other day in the House a member said "hypocrite", a word that is not to be used in this House, and he withdrew it. However some of the print media ran that line. It was withdrawn, it was supposed not to have been said, but it was run.

We also telephoned that particular institution and drew its attention to what it was doing when it treated what our rules say is invalid in here as valid criticism. The institution had encouraged it and it should not be done. In that case we did not get a commitment to change policy but we did get an acknowledgement that there was a problem which needed to be addressed.

I repeat again that I do not suggest this is partisan, that one side is more sinful or sinless than the other. We are all partisans in an institution which we all respect. However sometimes in our partisan zeal we behave in ways which bring this institution into disrespect.

We have been speaking about the need for change for better behaviour, but I do not think we have demonstrated that desire through our behaviour and our words. We talk about the need to change but have not really demonstrated it as a body. There are rules in existence guiding decorum and offensive language, and I think it is time and appropriate to reassert the commitment of members of this House to these fundamental rules.

For instance, Standing Order 16(2) states specifically that when a member is speaking no member shall interrupt him or her except to raise a point of order. That Standing Order is honoured in the breach more than it is in practice. I venture to say it would be difficult to find a day in which someone on their feet, either asking a question or answering one in Question Period, is not being shouted at, heckled, and barracked from the opposite benches. That is contrary to the Standing Orders of this House.

If we do not believe those Standing Orders should be there perhaps we should take them out. However, I think we believe they should be there. Perhaps we should be asking ourselves to follow the Standing Orders and ask that they be enforced if we too often behave more like members of a mob than individual responsible members of Parliament.

Standing Order 18 says that no member shall speak disrespectfully or use offensive words against any other member. Of course we all know that is violated virtually every day in this institution, mainly in Question Period, but in debate as well.

They are pretty clear. We do not follow them. Maybe we should. The public out there is demanding that we do. Those are the Standing Orders. Beauchesne's, our procedural bible so to speak which lays out how we should engage in debate in Question Period, is again violated virtually on a daily basis. A rule respecting Oral Questions, citation 409, paragraph 7 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, says:

> A question must adhere to the proprieties of the House, in terms of inferences, imputing motives or casting aspersions upon persons within the House or out of it.

• (1540)

In other words, we should not impute motives or cast aspersions upon persons in this House. We do it all the time. Lest that just refer to the questioner, it says in terms of reply to Oral Questions, page 120, citation 408, paragraph 2.

> Answers to questions should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised and should not provoke debate.

I hesitate to say that a lot of the answers provoke heckling, barracking and debate. And that is true as well.

Maybe we should ask ourselves if Beauchesne is obsolete and from a day gone by. Perhaps nowadays it is appropriate to heckle, barrack, provoke debate, impute motives and do all of those things that precedents in this book say are inappropriate.

If they are still appropriate today, let us agree and collectively do what we can to condition ourselves. We must ask our presiding officer to bring us back into control when our emotions or better judgment gets out of control. It is something we should seriously ask.

Shouting across the floor, barracking and constantly interrupting members is not necessary. It does not aid understanding. It does not improve the quality of life of Canadians and it is contrary to the rules. If we obeyed the rules a greater calm would prevail, the atmosphere would be more conducive to speaking and listening to responsible and fair debate.

We do not need to shout, yell and barrack insults in order to carry out our responsibilities to govern the country, to be held accountable and to raise issues of concern to our constituents. This is what this debate is all about. Name calling or slurs are not appropriate and neither are they acceptable. Theatrical outbursts and actions denigrate this Chamber and, by extension, the people we are here to represent.

Ms. Clancy: Like storming the chair.

Mr. Andre: I am trying to keep this on the high road. The member for Halifax, speaking from her seat, talks about storming the chair.

Mr. Milliken: I knew you did not do it, Harvie.

Mr. Andre: The member for Kingston and the Islands will be able to tell his colleague that he saw the clip and knows that did not occur. There is continuous repetition of that slur. She is not the only one, I can assure you, who has used that over the years.

Mr. Mills: She did not refer to you.

Mr. Andre And there is the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood interrupting me from his seat as well. It is that sort of—

Mr. Mills: You are casting aspersions on her.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I think the interjections opposite probably make my point better than I could.

An hon. member: You are a phoney.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member withdraw. The hon. member is completely out of order. I would ask that he withdraw "you are a phoney", please.

An hon. member: I humbly withdraw my remarks. The cheap shots—

Mr. Speaker: I do not want a further argument about it. It was very clear and I have no other course than to ask the hon. member to withdraw. The hon. member has withdrawn.

The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: Perhaps it is not possible for us to put our partisanship aside, but I think we need to try. I again commend those of us in here who worry about these things to read some of the things that are said about this institution in the citizen's forum.

Mr. Riis: The government.

Mr. Andre: The House leader from the New Democratic Party is interrupting me.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In light of the comments made by my hon. friend and colleague, surely while we are listening to his interesting comments we are allowed to muse aloud.

There is no intention to heckle. There is no intention to interrupt. It is just that when I hear some of his comments, for example when he referred to the Spicer commission's reports and commentary on behaviour here, I was simply musing aloud. The Spicer commission had a lot to say about the Prime Minister as well.

I am not interrupting him. I am not causing difficulty. I am just musing aloud.

Surely to goodness we do not have to sit here in mute silence for every second of the day while we listen to someone like the government House leader speak.

Mr. Speaker: If you are asking my opinion you are treading into dangerous ground indeed.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I suppose we should put in here, then, musing aloud is allowed. I do not know.

Seriously I have been here for 19 years and I know some would say that is too long. I will anticipate the remarks on the other side. It becomes less and less of an honour to describe one's occupation as a member of Parliament, given the kinds of comments that one reads and hears about in terms of this institution.

Again I am not finger pointing in terms of the problems being over there as opposed to over here or any such thing. I am simply making an observation which I believe behoves us all to recognize that the public does not hold this institution in great esteem.

I think it is time that we recognize that. I think it would be appropriate for the House collectively, for all of us on all sides, to say: "Yes, there is a problem here".

We can for our partisan advantages say who is more the problem than the other side and so on and so forth. If we choose to do that, perhaps we can do that outside. Perhaps we can do that by way of a press release or out in the scrums. In here we can treat each other with respect and with the commitment that we believe equally that whatever our differences and views we are sincere in our views and we are here because we want to serve this country.

We are not here for the purpose of demeaning those whose views are different from ours or those on opposite sides of the House. It is the service of the country that motivates us all. We must recognize that we need to address the reputation of this institution.

We ask our presiding officer to recognize that we are weak. We fail. We let our emotions get out of hand and we call on him to be superior to the rest of us; not let his emotions get out of hand but to keep us under control and identify us publicly when we misbehave. That is a pretty significant penalty for the folks back home to see the Speaker identify the member for Calgary Centre or say the government House leader should not speak from his seat if he is not recognized. That is a significant penalty. But the Speaker cannot do it if we do not agree to it.

I am asking colleagues in this House to agree that we have a problem, that we are going to address it collectively, and that we are going to try to restore the reputation of this institution and make Canadians proud of us rather than embarrassed about us.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to designate tomorrow as an allotted day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DECORUM IN CHAMBER

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Andre (p. 3871).

• (1550)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to participate in this debate. I want to say a few things about how we got here today, for the record, so that Mr. Speaker will be fully aware of what has gone on and who has been informed about the substance of this particular motion.

I want to say to the government House leader that he is accurate in his intervention in that the subject matter itself has been discussed among House leaders, but certainly the motion itself has not been a subject matter for House leaders. This has been placed on the Order Paper and, I might underline, it is the right of the government House leader to do so.

Having said that, I have listened attentively to what the minister has said. I wish to quote the second paragraph of the motion. It states:

> That this House recognizes that its Members were elected by the people of Canada to represent them in a manner which demands that individual Members respect one another and their democratic right to express differing opinions.

How true that is, but the House leader opposite goes on to quote as his authority the comments and the conclusions of the Spicer commission. I want to be careful here because I do not want to misquote him. I think he said "independent confirmation of the disrepute of parliamentarians" and the citation that he used was Mr. Spicer and the commission which travelled the country.

I know that the hon. member opposite selected a few pages which had references with regard to Question Period. I want to quote for the hon. member opposite some of the words of a friend of mine, of members of the New Democratic Party, of that side, and perhaps even a dear friend of the Minister of Employment and Immigration at one time. He is one of the commissioners who was appointed by the Prime Minister to the Spicer commission, Richard Cashin. Here is what he said. I think this is worth noting. As many members know, he was a former member of this House and served with some degree of distinction in the deliberations of this House.

I am quoting from page 141 of that text. It states:

> From the outset there were those who expressed the hope that this process would do more than just solicit the views of Canadians. Unfortunately for a variety of reasons we were unable, as some commissioners would have liked, to deepen the dialogue.

He goes on:

> Public opinion must be respected for its complexity and we must recognize that people's views on subjects change with the information they have and the thoroughness of the debate.

He further states:

> The people who spoke to us expressed opinion on many matters. We have no way of knowing how their opinions on one matter were related to their opinions on other matters or what priority particular issues may have had in their thinking. Nor do we have any way of knowing how representative the opinions we hear may be of the opinions of all Canadians. This is because the process of participation was self-selective.

And I underline that. I put that on the record not to challenge the government House leader but to balance the views. The view that he is putting forward as I understand it—and I stand to be corrected—is that the operation of this House, and in particular Question Period, is despicable and is held in much disregard by Canadians. That is one view.

There is another view of a commissioner on the Spicer commission who says that the views which were put forward to the Spicer commission on many occasions were not challenged. There was no thoroughness of debate. There was no comprehensive dialogue going on between those participants and those that were making the presentations.

I would ask, did the Spicer commission make a distinction between opposition MPs asking questions and ministers responding to those questions? I have read the Spicer commission report and I did not see any distinction on that.

Is it possible, I ask the Chair, that Canadians who have watched our deliberations may not like the length of the hon. member's hair, may not like the way the hon. member poses his question, may not like the way the hon. member phrases a couple of words? Or could it be possible that Canadians are not very happy with the responses on free trade? They may not be happy with the responses they have received on the GST, or the vagueness of the answer, or on Constitutional matters, regional development, CBC cutbacks, or proliferation of taxes. Make no mistake about it, Canadians out there today are angry. They are angry at Parliament, at provincial institutions, because the economy of this country is in such bad shape that they want their legislators in Ottawa to take concrete, positive action and to date they have not seen that. They have not seen that in the last number of months.

Mr. Mills: Absolutely. Right on.

Mr. Dingwall: I think that must be said. My colleague makes reference to the TV networks. I think this is a point I share with the hon. member opposite. If there is a withdrawal made by an hon. member, it would be inappropriate for TV networks to carry the exact intervention without having the withdrawal stated as well.

The hon. member talks about breaches of certain Standing Orders of the House of Commons. Implicit in his argument, and I am not suggesting he has said this, is that there have been numerous breaches of the Standing Orders. I disagree. I think there have been breaches of the Standing Orders, there is no question. In a Chamber of 300 persons or so, yes, you are going to get breaches of the Standing Orders. But I have full confidence that the Chair is our arbitrator, is impartial and will draw to the attention of members in the House when those rules have been broken. I think all hon. members on all sides of the House would want to concur with that.

The government House leader has said that this Chamber is quite a theatre and that from time to time people may use language or expressions which may make the front pages of newspapers or clips on television. I have to tell the hon. member, and I say this to you, Mr. Speaker, because not only are we debating the pith and substance of the motion before us, we are also debating the spirit of the motion.

It has to be said that when I was elected to represent my constituents, with youth unemployment in excess of 17 per cent, adult unemployment in excess of 25 per cent and upwards to 40 per cent in parts of my constituency—and I see other members here who have similar concerns on all sides of this House—I was not asked to come to Parliament to stand in my place and say to the Prime Minister: Mr. Prime Minister, you are such a wonderful person, what are you going to do for Canada today?

I was not elected to do that. I am sorry. People have difficulty with that and I think the people that have the greatest difficulty with that are members on the government benches.

I say that with great sincerity. If we transcend the boundaries of proper wording, conduct and behaviour, it is obviously left to the Chair to bring us back to order. However, let us not portray ourselves as individuals who come here, stand in our place with hand on heart and say in monotone voice: "Well, you know, what can you do for Canada today? That is just not the way it is. Each member is different".

Many members on our side of the House have great fluency in the English language. That is something I do not have. A number of members have great fluency in the French language. That is something I do not have. However, I am duly elected and am a representative of my people, as all of these members are. Mr. Speaker, as the arbitrator in this great Chamber, you must acknowledge that as a fact of life of the process of democracy and representative government.

The motion before us today is in response to certain recent happenings in this House. I have been a member of this House for well over 10 years and have seen previous occasions where tempers have flared, behaviour was unbecoming, words were exchanged, withdrawals took place, et cetera. However, to suggest and imply that rules are being continuously broken every day, that no co-operation exists between opposition parties and that the government on various pieces of legislation is just not true.

Perhaps myself and the parliamentary secretary should be holding press conferences along with the House leader of New Democratic Party to tell them how we have co-operated on different measures. If you were listening to members opposite you would think that we co-operate on nothing, and that is not true. Mr. Speaker, you must know that and understand that notwithstanding the comments which may have been written in different newspapers and made by different individuals there is a fair amount of co-operation.

We as a party are not opposed to the thrust of this motion. There is a line of acceptable behaviour and in recent weeks it has been crossed by two government backbenchers, and there have been other incidents involving members from all political parties. We believe that we have to do something about it before the problem grows.

In light of these events in this Chamber we have to send a message to our electors that we are aware of the need for ameliorating our conduct and that we will act on it. No one disputes that we are expected to behave in a civil manner. Indeed our constituents expect it of us. However, they simultaneously expect us to defend their interest with passion and conviction.

If the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood comes into this House as a new member and stands on the floor of this House of Commons to make a case for a refugee or a small business person or an individual who is unemployed and does it with conviction, as he normally does, and with great flamboyance, so be it. No Speaker of this House should deny that member that particular right and no governing party should try to restrict a member in the expression of his or her views on that subject matter.

We would be remiss in our duty if we did not relay the fact that what goes on in this House is adversarial. It is an adversarial process. This is not a high school debate; it is an adversarial process. That is what we were sent here for, and we in the opposition are expected to do our best in holding the government accountable.

I know the government House leader agrees with me on this because he made this very point on June 13, 1980, and I quote from Hansard at page 2082:

> Given the nature of this Chamber where we face each other two sword lengths apart, if members shout order at us we will respond in kind. We will shout order back. If they refuse to answer questions or if they abuse the Question Period you can expect that we will respond in kind. That would be only natural. If we were to do anything else we would be failing in our responsibility as an opposition to keep the government in check.

The government House leader was politically correct in 1980, and I suggest that stands today on October 23, 1991. Although we have profound differences and struggle with each other in debate daily we should not cross the threshold to personal attacks. That is counter-productive to the work of this place. That is what makes Canadians unhappy and cynical with their elected officials.

That being said, we on this side of the House have a few questions and worries pertaining to the motion itself. The government wants the House to limit excessive partisanship. The question that then arises is: Who will define excessive partisanship? If the Chair is expected to it could result in the immediate loss of confidence in the Chair. The Chair would be in fact choosing a side or, as they say on the street, lining up with one of the parties.

I cannot stress enough the importance of the independence of the Chair. When a member of this Chamber wears the black robe of impartiality he or she is the only member of this House whose non-partisanship is required. The call on partisanship is not to be left to the Chair. As I have said that would leave the Chair open to accusations of partisanship itself.

I am concerned by another omission in this motion. That is the explicit wording of the deplored use of sexist and racial language. That is not only beyond the realm of heated debate turned personal but is the realm of uncivilized barbarism. The politics of hate is an enemy of this Chamber and all humanity and must be confronted and stopped.

Just because we are in this House does not make us immune to those traits of society which are unacceptable. First, we have to mend our own ways. Second, if we do cross that line between intense political struggle and abusive behaviour I have complete confidence, as does my party, in the Chair's ability to enforce the rules of this Chamber accordingly.

Despite what the government House leader thought in 1980, he often complains of raw partisanship on the floor of the House. I for one prefer to be shooting words across the floor than bullets across a square. I would rather be wrestling in inflammatory debate than be beaten to the ground by a billy stick. I would rather be face to face in this Chamber with hon. members opposite than face to face with a tank.

No one said that democracy was easy. However, the struggles here in this House are infinitely preferable to the alternatives. We have a great institution in this country, many say a model for modern democracies. Canadians should be proud of their political traditions. We have to work to clean up our act so that we never have to contemplate those alternatives.

The system may not always work to perfection and it may not present a pretty picture, but as Sir Winston Churchill once observed: "Democracy is the worst form of government except all of the others".

In conclusion, we as a party support the basic thrust of this motion. We believe sexism and racism should be specified. We believe our confidence in the ability of the present Speaker should be clearly expressed. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "offensive" and by substituting the following therefor:
> —including sexist or racist language or gestures directed at other members, either during Question Period, debate or otherwise in the Chamber; and
> That this House confirms its support for Standing Orders 16 and 18, and other Standing Orders and practices of this House regarding decorum and reaffirms its confidence in the Speaker's ability to enforce those rules and practices vigorously.

• (1610)

Mr. Speaker: Continuing debate, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to say at the outset as the amendment indicates that we too have full faith in the ability of the Speaker to manage the affairs of this House appropriately.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: We want to congratulate you on your excellent work, Mr. Speaker.

I want to begin my remarks by saying that I have listened carefully to the government House leader's comments and certainly do not question his motive. I believe that his intentions regarding this motion were indeed honourable and that he means well.

I must say that he has absolutely and totally missed the boat. If the government House leader really believes that changing a rule or two in the House of Commons is somehow going to transform this place into a corporate board room where everything is done very businesslike and with a very clear agenda with little partisan debate, he is dreaming in Technicolor.

Can you imagine politics in the House of Commons?

An hon. member: Talk about dull.

Mr. Riis: We have partisanship in the House of Commons. The House is set up with the government on the right-hand side of the Speaker and the opposition parties on the left-hand side of the Speaker. It is set up in such a way that it is a confrontational situation. It is little wonder that the debate in here is often very aggressive and very focused on critical comments directed at the government. So it should be.

With all due respect, and without questioning the motive behind this motion, I think the government House leader simply has failed to understand what it is that frustrates Canadians about this place.

I must say that from time to time the behaviour could be improved. Sometimes the antics can be inappropriate. It is with some sadness and regret in my heart that I recall incidences in the last few days of racist and sexist remarks and rude and crude gestures made by certain members on a certain side of the House, which we were all disgusted with. We found them to be completely inappropriate and were disappointed that no action was taken by the respective leaders of the parties. I was very proud of the fact that when this was taking place our leader made it very clear that she felt that it was a responsibility of the leadership in the caucus whether it is the leader, the House leader, or the Whip to ensure that the appropriate behaviour takes place. When that appropriate behaviour is transgressed and members are found to be behaving inappropriately action must be taken.

It is clear what action should be taken. People can be removed of their positions and others. It was a sad day in this House when some of the rudest comments made by members were passed over in a rather casual way by the leadership of the caucus.

I think we missed an opportunity at that point to ensure that we take this place seriously and do not condone that type of behaviour. Unfortunately it was a missed opportunity.

There is no question that there is an element of frustration in this House from time to time and it is reflected in the country. My hon. colleague quoted from the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future or the Spicer commission, and I noticed that his comments were very selective.

I want to ask the government House leader to turn to page 131 where it says:

> As a result many participants felt betrayed and bereft and are confused and angry. Part of this is due to their sense that traditional Canadian values are being usurped by anonymous market forces and that governments are doing nothing to deal with these. Governments are in part responsible for these fears which we believe come from misunderstandings that governments must clarify or continue to pay a heavy price for as will our country.

In other words what the people of Canada are saying is that this place is not responsive to their needs. When we found ourselves involved in a crisis such as the Desert Storm situation, there was no debate in the House of Commons reflecting the people of Canada as to the appropriate role that Canada should play. That was presumably made in secret by some group.

When the Oka crisis was upon us was there a debate in the House as the appropriate course of action? No. Again decisions were made on behalf of the country in secret. When it was decided to cut back on critical passenger rail service was there a debate in the House of Commons on the appropriateness of these measures? No. It was done in secret by the government.

I could go on and on identifying item after item why people of Canada have felt frustrated, why people of Canada have felt that this Parliament of theirs is irrelevant. There is not a better example than the goods and services tax. Here was a tax that was going to touch the lives of every single Canadian from small children to elderly citizens virtually every day of their lives.

When other governments imposed taxes, they took action when they heard from the people of the country in terms of their concern and their outrage. They responded with some sensitivity.

The United Kingdom in its wisdom at one time decided to impose a poll tax. The reaction was what one would predict. It was an extremely heavy reaction against that initiative. The government listened and the House of Commons and the House of Lords debated the issue and the government decided to back off from that tax. It listened to the people.

In Japan they imposed their version of the goods and services tax. There was a strong outcry and they said it was a wrong move and they backed off in part from this goods and services tax.

Have we heard a shred of sensitivity from the government in terms of what this GST is doing to our country and to the people of Canada? Unfortunately no.

I suspect that is why the people of Canada are so frustrated. That is why they say their politicians have betrayed them. What they mean is that the Government of Canada has betrayed them, the members of the government have betrayed them.

We have seen in recent days, indeed in recent weeks, that when people have been given the opportunity to show what they think of their governments they have changed their governments dramatically. In Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, to give you the most recent examples, they changed those governments when they had an opportunity because they felt they had been unreceptive.

• (1620)

I do not think the government House leader understands the problem if he thinks that by enforcing a couple of Standing Orders it will somehow magically change this place. Again I say I do not question his motives, but I do not think he understands the problem.

The problem has been the inability of this government to respond to the needs of the people of Canada. It has imposed upon them a corporate agenda that they find alien and reject, yet the government shows no sensitivity to the errors of its ways.

Another reason for the frustration in this House is the unprecedented use of closure or various forms of closure. The government has imposed forms of closure to muzzle members of Parliament and closed down debates at every stage of some bills, the GST and the free trade agreement being the most obvious.

In the annotated Standing Orders on page 22 they provide members of Parliament with a little history about the use of closure or the limiting of debate on issues. They say that one occurred in 1913 over the naval bill. Nothing much happened until 1956 during the pipeline debate. Again closure was used, but we have now seen closure as a regular event. Introduce a bill and, if it takes more than a day or two at a certain reading, the government just gives notice of closure. It has changed the Standing Orders to make it even easier and debate is then brought to an end. No wonder members of Parliament feel frustrated and at times perhaps lose their tempers.

I would now like to mention the committee system. Committees with the odd exception are almost a waste of time. Members of Parliament often work very hard, and time and time again the government simply ignores their recommendations and all the work that has been put into those committee meetings.

I want to say that if there is a behavioural problem in this House we have to accept responsibility. We do not have to blame you, Mr. Speaker, and that is what this motion does. This motion is sort of a subtle way of storming the chair. Granted we are not up there as we were—and I remember that day vividly—sitting right back there, Mr. Speaker. I remember the day and it was one of the saddest days of my life. Members roared up to the chair, banging and shaking their fists in the Speaker's face. I remember that day.

This in a way is another form of that. This motion says that you are not doing your job properly. I say that we do not accept that. We do not accept that.

If we are looking to place responsibility, whether it is an organization, a club, a firm or a business, the person at the helm sets a certain tone. If you have a good club, Mr. Speaker, you probably have a good club president; if you have a very effective firm, you probably have a good president of that firm; if you have some organization that is really doing its job well and accomplishing a great deal, it is likely because of the certain tone that president or that chairperson sets.

Who is it that sets the tone in this House? It is the Prime Minister. It is the Prime Minister. It is the government House leader. He sets the tone. He is the one during Question Period who decides whether to respond to questions or not, and therein lies a great deal of frustration.

Yesterday during Question Period a member referred to the news media saying that our Prime Minister was being considered for Secretary-General of the United Nations. In good faith the question was put to him: "Have you agreed to let your name stand for that position?" Did he respond then to a serious question, a question that was on the minds presumably of every Canadian? No. He skated around the issue, a little bit of theatrics, a little bit of fun back and forth with the Leader of the Opposition about how hopeful he was for an election coming up, and so on.

People watching that exchange would be frustrated and would ask: "Why doesn't the Prime Minister answer the question?" There is an element of frustration out there that is unbelievable against our Prime Minister. Going back to the Spicer report, the government House leader did not read it all or at least he did not quote it all. The last page of the Spicer report, page 168, concludes with the views of Canadians on the Prime Minister's leadership. Virtually 100 per cent of the letters and the phone calls were negative toward him. The graph on this page is almost unbelievable. One hundred per cent of the respondents had little or no faith in the Prime Minister. Therein lies one of the reasons for the frustration felt across the country and in this House because we are the people who represent that frustration.

My friend, the government House leader, says we should all behave here like gentlemen and indeed we do mostly.

Ms. Clancy: Excuse me.

Mr. Riis: Gentlepersons.

An hon. member: Excuse me.

Mr. Riis: Gentlepeople. When I go back to Kamloops and talk to my constituents they say: "Nelson, go down to the House of Commons" and I cannot repeat what they suggest I should do. They are not suggesting that I simply stand up here and act in a very quiet way, trying to be positive and compliment the government on all of its great initiatives and adding calmly to some suggestions. Oh, yes, they probably expect me to do that from time to time, but they suggest what I should do when I get down here and confront this Prime Minister and what I should do when I get into the House of Commons to raise issues of concern to the people of Kamloops. I could not do 98 per cent of the things they want me to do. That is how strongly they feel, how frustrated and how angry they feel, and it is reflected in this place.

I simply want to say as we address this motion that we can improve our behaviour and there are ways and means of doing that. I suggest that the most appropriate way is to take responsibility ourselves and expect ourselves to behave not necessarily in ways that are non-partisan because this is a partisan environment. We should not personalize our debates. I agree with my friend, the government House leader, when he says that we can hold strong views but we ought not to personalize our criticisms. We all agree with that but, for goodness sakes, let us not act here as though this is the corporate board room. Let us not act as though we all agree that what is going on here in terms of the various agendas and the various legislation is appropriate. There are a great deal of items the government introduces that we think are absolutely wrong. We oppose them and propose what we feel are good alternatives.

Partisanship is a reality and it should be. After all, we are elected and represent different political parties with different ideologies, platforms and philosophies. It would be a sad day if we all came in here and simply agreed with everything that the Prime Minister brought forward as the terms of an agenda.

As I say, we have to take responsibility ourselves and expect members of Parliament not to use sexist language, not to use racist language, and not to participate in obscene gestures. If that actually ever occurs again the leaders of the various caucuses should take responsibility and deal with those individuals. That is the way to deal with this. We should not ask you to enforce a particular Standing Order because we feel you do already. You make a judgment call. You are elected to serve all members of the House from all sides and are not here as a mouthpiece for the government. We feel that you do the job extremely well. As a matter of fact I have yet to recall a single media report to the contrary. There have always been very laudatory comments and statements made regarding the Speaker of this House.

I want simply to conclude by suggesting that with all due respect to my hon. colleague the government House leader I think he has missed the boat totally. He thinks that by suggesting that we change the rules a little somehow this is going to change deportment in this place. It reminds me of a school teacher suggesting that people wash their hands before they have their lunch. That is fine. It is probably a good idea, but you must want to do that and it must be part of your behaviour. You do not do it simply because your teacher tells you to.

In closing I want to acknowledge that while we support the amendment put forward by the Official Opposition I want to amend that.

• (1630)

I move:

That the amendment be amended by adding the following words after the word "Chamber":

That the party leaders, House leaders and Whips be responsible for the comportment of their caucuses,

And by adding the following words following the word "vigorously":

That this House express its continued support and appreciation to the Speaker for his excellent guidance of this Chamber.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in support of the sub-amendment tabled by the hon. member for Kamloops. First of all, I would like to join the hon. member and all members of this House in saying that we realize that the Chair has a difficult task but that we are absolutely confident that you, Mr. Speaker, in the performance of your duties, will rule fairly, and that you will strive to maintain the kind of order which I believe is essential in a House that functions properly. A Speaker must maintain order.

And now we have before us a motion about procedure which is, I would think, easy to understand and which is intended to set certain limits and impose certain rules and perhaps strenghten certain others, to make the House a more normal place and a place that from the public relations point of view is more acceptable to certain people. If we look at Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, Mr. Speaker, it is almost impossible to define specific rules on offensive accusations and sexist or other comments made by members here in this House, from time to time, something which I totally deplore.

From the procedural point of view, Mr. Speaker, it is not easy for the Chair to put in place some kind of disciplinary system that would prevent members from using such unparliamentary and reprehensible language. I agree that the Whips, the House leaders and party leaders have an obligation to enforce parliamentary discipline among members of their caucus.

What I wanted to say to the hon. member for Kamloops is that we have a problem as far as deportment is concerned. It was Charles De Gaulle who said, as several members mentioned today, that we are elected by universal suffrage. My reason for wanting to quote Charles De Gaulle is not to use what he said as an excuse, but I think it is quite true. De Gaulle said that universal suffrage is not selective but reflective. This House is a reflection of the Canadian people. And Canadians don't like the behaviour of certain members and they don't like sexist or vulgar remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether instead of using Beauchesne's and the list of expressions deemed unparliamentary that is sometimes used by the Chair, we could perhaps have an almost immediate decision in cases where a member uses abusive language, in order to deal strictly and severely with members who use language that I would call "inappropriate".

I would have a question for the hon. member for Kamloops. I have been here for 19 years. Televising the proceedings of the House and committees shows that members sometimes behave in strange ways when the TV camera is turned on them while a controversial political question, perhaps charged with partisanship, is being discussed.

I would ask him whether he does not agree that television has had an effect, I would say a dramatic effect, on debates in the House. Television has brought about changes that in my opinion have caused the climate in the House to deteriorate. In many cases, we have become TV performers. Some members have a strong oratorical tradition and are good speakers—they can steal the show. Others, like me, are not steeped in that oral tradition.

I ask the hon. member for Kamloops whether he thinks that our experience with television in this House should be repeated in the committees. Does he think that televising committee hearings will improve debate or will it just lead to more deplorable behaviour on the part of some members?

It is important, it is a current issue, Mr. Speaker, because it concerns our public image and I would not want us to begin or leave this debate today without paying particular attention to the possibility of televising committee debates.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my hon. colleague.

Television has certainly changed people's impressions and reflections of this institution. I do not know if I necessarily agree with him that television has changed behaviour in this House. He has the benefit of having been in the House before television and after television. I have not had that opportunity. I have only been here since television was introduced into the House. I have taken the opportunity read a lot of the old Hansards. When you read the old Hansards, you certainly get the impression that this was not necessarily a quiet Chamber, that debate was pretty tough actually from time to time.

I am not certain, based on the evidence that I have seen by looking at Hansard, that there has been a change. What has changed is that what happens here, as the government House leader has indicated, is to a certain extent in the living rooms, dens and bedrooms of Canadian homes from coast to coast to coast. I think that is the reality. People are actually watching this as it takes place today, when years ago they may have read an excerpt in some newspaper or some periodical or journal. That is a reality.

People who have spent a lot of time in this Chamber know that 99 per cent of the time spent here is very business-like. The exchanges are very positive. They are very respectful of different points of views. From time to time they get a little rambunctious. That probably only takes place half of 1 per cent of time, if that. That is, of course, what often gets the television coverage on the news that evening or the next day, therefore, to a certain extent people get the wrong impression. Also, people listen in on the debates.

I think back to that period when a lot of cabinet ministers were being accused of doing things and some had to resign. Again, all the people who were watching were reminded time and time again, day after day, about the misbehaviour of the cabinet ministers and how they had either been dipping into funds, inappropriately or not, were being charged with this offence or that offence, et cetera. I believe that has been part of the change.

I agree with my hon. friend that television has certainly had an impact on people's perception of the House of Commons. I do not know that it has changed our behaviour. I am not certain that we even appreciate or know that the cameras are on us as we speak here most of the time. It is to be expanded to committees, which I support. There are a lot of excellent committees and work that they do that people ought to be aware of.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have listened not only to the previous speaker, but to the two speakers who preceded him. I want to interject from my Olympus of being around here for 17 years going off and on that if we take the motion at face value that the hon. House leader for the Conservative Party has put forth, I want to go on record with you, Mr. Speaker, and with all members of this House to say that I wholeheartedly agree with the spirit of what he is proposing here today.

I think it is about time that we did grapple with this very important issue. Every speaker who has stood in this House so far has said, yes, there is room for improvement. One of the speakers went so far as to say that television is an entertainment medium. I would go further.

Television has become the most powerful tool for communication that we have ever devised. I believe that television is a good thing for this House. Yes, perhaps it has shown the worst aspects of what we do in here, but it has potential. It does have the potential to show us at our very best.

When we debate in here, we are the highest court of the land. I cannot imagine for example a lawyer appearing before a judge and having the lawyer and judge shout back and forth at one another. I know this is not a court of law. I know we are not just a debating society. But we are after all the spokespersons for all Canadians across this land. We must always remember that.

There is a basic difference between wit and boorishness. Yes, we should comment on what we have to say. Surely, we should attack each other's ideas. We should not be attacking each other.

Some of the speakers have said that they did not come here to be polite. I do not know if they used that word. They did come here and we have come here to be thoughtful spokespersons for the people whom we represent. We owe it to them, we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to this institution and we owe it to our country.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do want to participate in this debate. I want to begin by saying this. This is not a new subject for the House, but I think this is a new way of addressing it.

So often we get into this debate and this issue, but we do it in a way that puts us not so much by our nature but by the nature of the debate into a position of combating one another.

What I mean by that is when we normally talk about decorum or behaviour or attitudes or heckling or something that happens in this House of Commons, it is because we are responding to the issue of the moment. In other words, there is a point of order or a point of privilege because of language or behaviour or something that has happened in the institution and as a result we are here pro and con debating those issues. As a result of that, it is often done in a moment of passion rather than a moment of reasoned thought.

What I think is distinct is that what we are doing today is discussing an issue that is important to us as individual members, is important to the collective respect that this institution has and is important to the Canadian people.

I have been listening very carefully to the debate and the discussion that has gone on. I want to say two or three things. The first thing I want to say is I listened to the remarks of the New Democratic House leader. I have to say that I am disappointed in them. I am very disappointed in them in this sense. The hon. member as I listened to him, if I could digest his argument into my own words, stood up and said that the reason that we have vulgar language, racist language, sexist language or other offensive language in this House is because of the government.

My constituents do not believe that. My constituents have disagreed with me and some of the positions that I have taken on regular occasions. They also have said to me on a regular basis: "It is all of us. It is all of you. You are like a bunch of children". They may be angry with me over my position on an issue like the GST and they want to discuss it with me in the strongest possible terms, but they also understand and were very much offended by the kazoos and the hollering and the name calling that surrounded that debate.

In other words, they understand differences of opinion and respect that, but they do not expect nor do they respect name-calling and abusive and offensive language in our relationships and our debating with one another.

I am disappointed that this is the tack that the House leader for the New Democratic Party has chosen to take.

I want to touch momentarily on the remarks of the House leader of the Liberal Party. My hon. friend is a very effective debater. He makes his case well and presents his arguments in a very thoughtful, decisive and persuasive way. But there are two or three points I want to make about his remarks.

The first one is what he said concerning the third paragraph of the particular motion we are debating and I want to quote it into the record: "Canadians have expressed alarm at the excessive partisanship and lack of decorum and civility too often in evidence in the House".

His concern was that this motion is calling on the Speaker to determine what is an acceptable or non-acceptable level of partisanship. I want to disagree and say very categorically and clearly that that paragraph does not say that. It says it is a reminder to us as members of Parliament that Canadians have expressed alarm at our excessive partisanship. It does not call on the Speaker to determine acceptable or non-acceptable levels of partisanship. It says very clearly that we as members need to be conscious of our behaviour and to behave in such a way that is not excessive. I think the Canadian public is capable of deciding what is excessive and I think in fact they are doing that on a daily basis.

Second, I was listening very carefully to my friend's arguments. For a period in his remarks he seemed to imply to me, and I think to the people who are listening to the debate, that the absence of heckling, the absence of name-calling, the absence of aggressive or offensive language, is a monotone, is boredom. It is somehow namby-pamby.

That is not the case at all. The opposite of those very things that Canadians find offensive in this institution in our behaviour is very clear, well articulated, thoughtful debate. My friend from Welland Canal just said that very clearly in the words that he expressed to this House of Commons. People do not want us calling each other names because we disagree on an issue. They want us to debate the issue. They want us to as effectively and as clearly and as strongly as we can express the two sides of the issue.

I am sure as I listen to the House leader of the Liberal Party that he understands and in fact supports the need for all of us to examine our behaviour when we participate here in this House of Commons, but I wanted to make that distinction. I do not want it in any way left on the record, either directly or indirectly, that the opposite of heckling and abusive language is somehow namby-pamby behaviour. It is not. It is very distinct and it is very different.

Third, I want to say this. Looking at both the amendment and the subamendments that have been put forward on this particular motion, there seems to be a concern that the motion before us today is somehow in some way designed to be a reflection on the Speaker, or the Speaker's ability to maintain order and decorum in this House of Commons.

• (1650)

I think it is very important that I address that. The words that are in the motion are words that were chosen very carefully. If anyone looks carefully at the last paragraph, it says that this House supports the Speaker's vigorous enforcement of Standing Orders 16(2) and 18 particularly, and so on and so forth.

It is an expression of support for the Speaker to maintain order and decorum in the House as the Chair of this institution, as the chair of a committee, as the chair or leader of any kind of debate or issue, it is the role of the chair. We support that. We encourage that, and that is what we are trying to do in this motion.

The really operative parts of the motion, the most important elements that we have in front of us here today are the parts that say to us as members of Parliament: pay attention. What are we doing?

It is saying that Canadians have expressed alarm at our excessive behaviour. It says that this House recognizes disruptive behaviour and verbal interruptions including abusive language lead to a depreciated or a deprecated view and respect for the institution of Parliament and its members. In other words, the whole thrust of this motion is calling on us as individuals to reflect on our behaviour, on our language and on our attitudes.

I want to say this. I remember an experience I had when I was first elected in 1980. There is family at home, Ralph and Billie Good. Ralph and Billie have been like second parents to me. I have known them since the time of the cradle. I spent as much time at their kitchen table as I think I did my own parents. I grew up with them. Their son Ian is my best friend. We have been that way since we were born.

Something happened that I thought was very significant and I have never forgotten it. Shortly after I was elected in February 1980, in fact the first Saturday thereafter, Wendy and I went out to their place for dinner and the usual game of Rummoli. I say usual because we often did that on Saturday nights. That was something that Wendy and I did with Ralph and Billie. It was a time of fun. We had a great time together. We were friends, and we enjoyed that experience.

The first Saturday after I was elected, I had not even come down to Ottawa. I had not been sworn in yet. Albert Cooper was still Albert Cooper, a small town boy from Grimshaw. There was no change, but I went out to Ralph and Billie's that night and you know, Billy started bringing out the good china. She started putting the good china on the table. I said: "Whoa stop, Billie. I am still Albert. I have not changed. That date of February 18 has not made me any different. Please put the china away. I want what we have been eating on for the last five or ten years."

I tell you that story because I think it paints a picture of what Canadians expect and want of us. My friends Ralph and Billie, who have known me all these years, just because I had become elected to the House of Commons suddenly put me in a different category. It was not a category I was comfortable with. It was not a category that I wanted to be put in, but suddenly Ralph and Billie recognized that there was something different about me. There was something special about the job I had now obtained and what they wanted to do was to put me on a little bit of a pedestal.

My point is this. When we are called to the House of Commons to debate some very difficult issues, we are not called here to be street fighters. We are not called to be a bunch of children in a playground who get our way by bullying, pushing, shoving, screaming and calling people names. That is not what they want of us.

What Ralph and Billie want of me is to act in a way that brings dignity to myself, but reflects well on my friendship and relationship to them. They want to be proud of me. That does not mean I come in here and just let everything go on around me. They want me to fight hard for the Peace River riding, for my constituency. They want me to be aggressive, but they do not want me to be abusive in my language or to call someone a name just because I disagree with them.

What they want is for me to clearly and as best I can articulate the concerns of my constituency, but not in a way that destroys the dignity or in any way demeans my political opponents. They too have been elected as my friend has just said to the highest court in the land.

We are faced with a very serious reality in this country. There has been several references made to the Spicer commission. The Spicer commission was a lightening rod for a lot of feelings and attitudes in this country. It wasn't only the Spicer commission, I think every member of this House knows that when we go home to our ridings we are told regularly that people are sick and tired of us being childish. They are not sick and tired of us debating issues in an aggressive way, but they are sick and tired of our childish behaviour. They want us to clean it up.

My argument before this House is that we have to clean it up. We are living in a time when there is very much a diminishing of respect for the House of Commons and for those of us who are members of it. And yes, it is at times very much pointed at us as individuals but very often it is pointed at us as a collective group.

Canadians think that the problems we face in this country today are serious problems. They know they are serious because it affects them every day. When we come in here and diminish debate by turning it into an exercise of name calling, what we are really saying is: "I can't substantively put forward your position, so therefore what I am going to do is I am going to beat down the person who disagrees with me by calling him names". It is the kind of thing we did as children in playgrounds. Do you remember the expression: Sticks and stones may break my bones but names will never hurt me? The trouble is that we tend to forget that lesson. We come in here and exercise the same behaviour.

I do not believe this is a partisan question. I do not believe there is a distinction between government minister or backbencher or members of the opposition. We are all guilty of this behaviour at one time or another. I had better say this though, Mr. Speaker, there are exceptions. There are people who have managed through very long careers in this place to maintain their dignity and to not stoop to name calling. I am not one of them. I have been here 12 years and I have on several occasions lost my temper and called people names, said things that I have later regretted. But the truth is that it did nothing for the institution, it did nothing for the debate, it did nothing for me personally and it certainly did nothing for my constituents. But what it did do was to cheapen myself in terms of my own perception and certainly in the eyes of my colleagues.

The Canadian public are now saying to us that they want us to clean it up, they want us to come up out of that level of debate and come on to a higher plain, and they are demanding it because of a number of things. First, the problems we face in the country today are serious. They feel it. They know they are serious. Second, because of the television cameras, my people see what I do today. They do not read about it in the paper two or three weeks later. They know now what I have done and so they judge me instantly. As a result of that instant judgment they want an instant improvement in my behaviour.

There is a new reality. I do not think it is as a result of television cameras, but it is as a result of that new technology. People now have much more access to us as individuals and us as an institution than they had 10, 15 or 20 years ago. Today we arrive in their living rooms on a daily basis. It isn't what they can read, it's what they can actually see. It is not somebody describing our behaviour, it is them watching our behaviour. As a result of that, they do not blame it on anybody else but they put the blame where it belongs, which is right at my feet, and they are saying to us: Clean it up.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much time I have left. I did not notice when I started, but now I see that I have about two minutes. The motion before us is an important motion. It is not because the words are absolutely perfect. It is not because of how we end up deciding it. It is because it allows us as individuals to do two things. First, to examine our own behaviour, that is individually as well as collectively.

Second, it affords us an opportunity to say to the Canadian people who are watching the debate, who are interested in the subject and interested in this institution, that we as people involved and elected, as my friend says, to the highest court in the land, are listening to them. We are taking them seriously.

I think it is a very important debate. I think it is a very healthy debate. As I have said, it calls on all of us to come out of that lower plane of debate to rise to the occasion, to be articulate, to put forward our arguments as best we are capable, to make our colleagues, our family and our constituents proud of us. It is not because we manage to make it on the national news tonight by calling someone a name, but because we reflected a kind of dignity that sits well in this House and makes Canadians want to aspire to be members of Parliament.

My time is up. I do want to say this. The motion before us is important. I would encourage all members of the House to support it, not only in our votes because that is secondary, but much more in terms of our behaviour. We need to demonstrate to Canadians that I have dignity or I have respect for the dignity, the ability of my friends across the aisle. That is what my constituents want to hear from me. They want me to disagree with them, but they also want me to send a message to them that says that the people who are in this House are the people who have been picked by Canadians because they can represent their concerns in the finest traditions of this institution.

I appreciate the time I have had to participate in the debate. It is important and I look forward to the comments of other colleagues.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, under comments and questions. I appreciate this is a very difficult debate and we do not want it to get out of hand. I have great personal respect for the member who has just spoken. He and I and perhaps the member for Winnipeg North all need from time to time to be put on a pedestal, given that we share certain stature. I also know him to be a fine person.

Yet, I have to say that the direction of his comments or arguments, along with the government's line of attack or line of defence in this thing, I find, and I say this with the greatest respect, personally and truly offensive because I get no sense of understanding about the nature of the offence that was committed in this House with racist and sexist comments. That is the first point.

Second, there is no sense of collective responsibility on the part of either the Conservative Party or the government for its responsibilities here.

Let me say this first. All parties, all individuals have elements of racism and sexism within us. No party has the corner on virtue. What is a test from time to time is how we collectively respond when racism or sexism comes forth. I would like to think that we as a party have tried to deal with it in various ways, but I do not hear the government accepting responsibility for its response or reaction when these things occur.

There has been no reaction by the government to the individuals, what we have seen or the public has seen, to sexist or racist comments. In fact, they are defended, not in their particular, but the individuals are defended and are still in the same place. We see no initiatives coming from the Conservative Party or the government as government for dealing with these matters or any sense of understanding about the offence that has been committed. That takes me to the second part of my comment.

The member has equated racist and sexist remarks with name calling.

Name calling against an individual is to be deplored. We all share the understanding of the need to bring that under control in this and the member's arguments that that needs to be brought under control. However, racist or sexist remarks go far beyond bringing an individual into disrepute or damaging or wounding an individual or, in that sense, demeaning the whole institution by tactics of that kind. Racist and sexist comments bring a whole group in our community into disrepute and they bring groups in our community which are vulnerable into disrepute.

We see and know the impact of that vulnerability daily in the hurt that it does. So this institution, as Parliament, must respond far more effectively than it has to racist and sexist comments because we are supposed to be, as the member pointed out, the highest court in this land. If we do not get our act together, if we are not seen to deal swiftly and effectively with racist and sexist comments, if in fact the government fails to understand it and equates it with personal insults, fails to understand the damage and hurt it does throughout this whole land, then we are failing collectively as Parliament.

The government, by taking the response that it has to this, fails as government. That is not a partisan remark because, as I said at the outset, no party has a monopoly on either virtue or on sexism or racism, but it is how you respond. This government has brought itself down, I say, in the eyes of the people of Canada by its failure to respond to the remarks that have been made in this House.

I would ask the member if he would just simply at least accept, on behalf of the government, some responsibility for acting and indicate that he understands the distinction between racism and sexism on the one hand and mere name calling on the other, disreputable as that may be.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for, as I see it, two questions that I want to try and respond to.

The first question is the equation of sexist and racist comments with name calling. I am not sure that I can address that in the way that I want to. I am not sure I can express myself well enough to get across what I want to say.

I understand the hon. member's argument that there is a distinction between name calling and sexist and racist comments. I understand that. Another category is reflections on a person's faith. Those kinds of comments that lump people into groups and somehow demean those groups, I understand that. I guess my problem is, and it leads into the second question that he raised, and that is what about the government disciplining a couple of members, or what about the leadership of his party disciplining a member in their party and so on.

It really boils down, I think, to this, and that has been a difficult question for me. It is not one that I was able to, in my own mind, resolve quickly. We can handle this whole issue, as I see it, in largely two ways. There are various splinters of that, but I think there are two ways.

The first way is that we can define some hard and fast rules and then enforce them. The problem with that is that you then get into all sorts of legalities and all sorts of definitions. I am not sure that that works. I expressed to someone from his party just the other day when we had a discussion about this that we could go to a rule that would say that if somebody uses sexist, racist, you could list the Charter of Rights, any of those comments, and if we were to then say that that individual should be removed as a ministerial parliamentary secretary, a critic for an opposition party, what would of course happen because of the nature of this institution is everyone would be sitting around with their little hit squads waiting, and as soon as they had an opportunity they would jump. We would have had the case of yesterday of a member saying someone is a hypocrite, us demanding his resignation as critic of that party. It might work, but the danger is that it puts a legalistic solution that can never be complete and encompassing and replaces it with something that I think is more difficult but is actually in the long term the better, and that is the question of attitude. If we as individuals in this House respect one another with the dignity and an acceptance of their quality as individuals, if we can rise to the spirit of that, then we solve our problem

I think that is what personally I want to do and that is I think we as a House need to look at.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member's speech. I must tell you that first of all I have a tremendous respect for his words today. I have found over the three years that I have been in the House that his actions are consistent with his words. When I listen to him, I take everything that he says with sincerity.

I want to ask the hon. member a question. It is more along a communications line. Does he not think that part of the problem that we are having in this House stems from a frustration factor that we on this side of the House experience? When we get up each day on behalf of those in our society who are disadvantaged, and who expect us to ask specific questions, tough questions of the government in order to make the government accountable, and quite often because of the power of proper packaging, a government member—and I am not referring to the hon. member—or a minister on the front bench can stand up and give an answer to a very specific question which is nowhere close to the question being asked. What we have in this House is a government whose communication skills are superior, their packaging skills are sharp.

Quite often I have seen this government, day in and day out, manipulate the national media, buying their answers which were nowhere related to the question. I am not excusing our reaction when it becomes overly frustrated on specific questions that we ask on behalf of the disadvantaged in our country, whether they be unemployed or a business on the verge of going under. I am not questioning, we should never ever lose it. I lost it today in frustration, and I am sorry I lost it. The NDP member referred to collective responsibility. I believe that this government quite often uses the power of proper packaging as a diversion to answering specific questions that we as opposition members put forward. I would like the hon. member to address that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It would have to be a very short reply I would hope because you are over your time now, as far as questions and comments.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can get consent to answer the question, because I think it is a very thoughtful one.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: I will be brief. First of all in terms of the government's superior communication skills, I am very flattered by that. I would argue that the results we are seeing today bring into question that assertion. I wish we were as good as the hon. member says we are.

The hon. member raises a very good point. I want to answer it in a slightly different angle than he presented it. The hon. member raised the issue of a question by an opposition member and an evasive answer from a minister causing anger and frustration. Of course that is true. We can reverse that. We can turn it inside out depending on what our role or action is in the House at the moment.

Frustration and anger very much contribute to our behaviour in this House. That is why the whole question of decorum becomes so important as things begin to escalate, and we have all seen it. We start off with a good discussion and maybe a very good question and an evasive answer, or vice versa. Something starts to happen. The dynamics begin. Then we see the anger start to build and build and build. Pretty soon somebody is saying something they very much regret.

I have two points. First, if we start to treat each other with dignity and respect, which is what the Canadian people want us to do, we will diminish that. Second, anger, frustration and all those emotions that we feel do not justify us behaving in a way that is beneath the dignity Canadian people expect of us. I think that is what we have to get at.

There is no excuse. I could stand up and say some very abusive things because I am angry. That does not make it right. That is the fundamental question each of us has to look at.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is another gentleman who wants to ask a question, the hon. member for Oshawa. If it is a short, brief question, I will allow it.

I do not want any anger in this House today. I hope that the hon. member will be brief and the hon. deputy House leader will be able to resolve the problem.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I will make it a quick one because I appreciate the member and the sincerity with which he has made his statement today.

Can he explain to me why two members in the last two weeks have said something in here that we all think was wrong and none of us could do anything about it?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the reason is that we have had a long-standing tradition in this House that when a member rises in his or her place and apologizes and withdraws his or her remarks we accept the word of the hon. member. That has been the case for a long time. Nobody is saying that offensive behaviour is acceptable to the institution. I do not think any of us believe that. We all want to rise above that. We have a long tradition and it is one that requires of us some discipline and some self-censure.

When someone in the House does something we collectively consider offensive we have some very subtle ways of sending signals concerning what we think of that behaviour. Traditionally that is the way we have resolved it in the House.

We are having a debate today and I am sure the hon. member will participate. He may have some other solutions. That is the tradition we have lived by and the one we have practised thus far in our institution.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I will be very quick. How would this present motion solve the problem of the use of such language? Will it help prevent the use of such language?

Mr. Cooper: No, it will not. What it will do, and it is already doing it, is draw our attention individually and collectively the seriousness of the problem. Only we can solve it. That is what I think we have to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will now get back to debate with 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday morning, when I read the notice of the motion that we are discussing this afternoon, I was shocked that the government moved such a motion. That morning, I told our House leader that it was incredible that the government considered presenting such a motion.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to understand why the government presented such a motion, even today, even after the speech by the minister and his parliamentary secretary this afternoon.

[English]

This motion is unable, as the parliamentary secretary has just said, to deal with the problem of offensive language in this House. It simply draws attention to it. It urges the Speaker to enforce the Standing Orders of this place but is not an amendment to the Standing Orders. It does not place any additional power in the Chair. It does not propose any changes to the rules to make such conduct less likely.

I regret that the government has chosen to introduce a motion like this instead of dealing with the issue in a substantive way, for example, first raising it in the committee of which the parliamentary secretary is the chairman, the House management committee, and members on that committee coming up with some ideas as to how this issue might have been dealt with in a better way.

I must say that as a relatively new member in this place, having been here only three years, I was rather surprised that it was the government House leader who put this motion forward because I think it is fair to say, and I think members on all sides would agree, that he has been a very partisan and very aggressive member of this House. I agree, and I want it on the record, that he did not storm the chair. He invited me to his office to see the tape of that incident, and I was satisfied that it was he that was sitting in his seat at the time of the chair storming incident. Since my name is now constantly referred to as a witness to this event, I want to put it on the record that I agree he did not storm the chair in the famous alleged incident.

Having said that, he has been a very vigorous debater in this House over the years and has developed a certain reputation as such. To hear him mouthing the platitudes he did today about decorum in this House was quite amazing and I was somewhat astounded.

An hon. member: And losing it at the same time.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member is heckling. I want to make it clear that I enjoy heckling and I regard it as very much a part of parliamentary debate. All too often we are told that, as we have heard this afternoon from the parliamentary secretary and the government House leader, heckling somehow is evil. In every case that the word heckling was used by the parliamentary secretary, and I did not check the government House leader on this, he also talked about either name calling or offensive language. That is what he said. He said we do not want heckling and name calling or we do not want heckling and offensive language. There is a big difference between heckling and either name calling or offensive language.

There is no place in this House for name calling or offensive language. I quite agree with him. However, there is ample place in this House for heckling. Indeed it is a legitimate part of parliamentary debate and has been so as long as this institution has existed, that is for well over 900 years.

If we as parliamentarians are trying to protect ourselves from the sharp barbs and questions that come out of heckling in this Chamber then we are doing a disservice to ourselves and to our country. It forces us to realize that sometimes what we are saying is nonsense and sometimes it is not true. I am using parliamentary words to describe those statements. I am not allowed to use words that some people use on the streets of this country to describe some of the speeches in this place.

I know that some of my constituents use stronger language with me on the telephone and occasionally in a letter use words—

Mr. Blaikie: Speaking about your speeches?

Mr. Milliken: No. They are usually describing other hon. members' speeches, not my own. However, the words are there and I hear them on my telephone or in discussion. They are on the list of words in Beauchesne's that I cannot use in this place. I respect that, and I think most members respect that and try to use words like "nonsense" instead of others that might come to mind. Members will not use the word "lying" with respect to another but will suggest that perhaps the member is not telling the entire truth or is a stranger to the truth or use some other expression which may mean something similar but not the same thing.

Language in parliamentary debate and parlance is restricted by rules, many of which are very old. Some of the expressions that are prohibited are ones that no longer cause offence when they are used, but because they are on the list they cannot be used. There are others that are not on the list that could be.

We had today the example of the Speaker ruling out of order and asking one of my colleagues to withdraw a word which has previously been ruled to be parliamentary, not unparliamentary. Yet it was causing disorder in the House and the Speaker took steps and ruled it unparliamentary. Perhaps it will appear in the list of unparliamentary expressions in the next edition of Beauchesne's. I do not know.

Not too long ago I had the Speaker rule the expression windbag unparliamentary based on an 1879 precedent. There are words that ought not be used. I do not want to dwell on the question of words. What I want to do is deal with the principle.

I agree with the parliamentary secretary. I agree with the government House leader that offensive language of any kind has no place in this House. I agree that name calling, particularly of an offensive kind, particularly racist or sexist, is completely out of place. Indeed the incidents we witnessed in the last few weeks were completely unnecessary and most distasteful. I am sorry they happened, as I am sure is every other member of this House. They tend to bring the House into disrepute. They tend to cause Parliament to be regarded very badly by our fellow citizens. I regret that it happened.

What is the purpose of this motion other than to condemn that kind of conduct which I think all members condemn? Is the government proposing something new here today, or is it just having a debate for the purpose of purging ourselves after the recent incidents? I have not been able to figure out the motive because in the speeches of the parliamentary secretary and the government House leader there was no reference to the previous incidents except in questions. I am not sure why they raised it.

I would like to turn to Standing Order 16(2) which the motion says we support. The motion reads in part:

> —supports the Speaker's vigorous enforcement of Standing Order 16(2) and Standing Order 18;

Just for the members of the public who may not be familiar with what Standing Order 16(2) says I will read it:

> When a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between that Member and the Chair, nor interrupt him or her, except to raise a point of order.

On its face Standing Order 16(2) prohibits heckling. It has never been interpreted that way, Mr. Speaker, as you well know. I know that on occasion, Sir, you had to interrupt me in the course of one of my speeches because the heckling was so loud you could not hear my speech. You heard no objection from me about the heckling. I frankly was enjoying myself and it did not bother me that members were heckling me.

Indeed three weeks ago I was making a speech and the din was very loud. It was difficult for me to be heard. It was in Committee of the Whole. To say that I was offended or upset by the heckling would be incorrect. I was not. I do not think that the Canadian public was outraged. I certainly got no letters expressing shock or outrage from members of the public at the fact that I was being loudly heckled during the course of those remarks.

Standing Order 18 states:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof. No Member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

On occasion we have risen in this House to object to words being used by members concerning the other place or remarks made about His Excellency the Governor General. Those have been relatively rare. I must say that the remarks have occurred on both sides of the House.

I can remember when there was a Liberal majority in the other place the government House leader using very strong language to describe the conduct of the members of the other place. I objected on occasion to some of that language. I can recall that once there was a Conservative majority in the other place, after it was stacked for the GST bill, there were objections to some of the language used by members on this side of the House in describing the conduct of the other place because it was considered that the language might be disrespectful.

It was not rude or offensive. It described in colourful terms what was going on in the other place. I do not think that it was in any sense name calling, nor was it offensive language, but it was held to be contrary to Standing Order 18 because it was disrespectful.

• (1730)

I do not think there is any argument in any part of the House. I am surprised that the government has moved this motion to suggest that somehow these Standing Orders have not been enforced. They are enforced.

I suggest that what we need to do is make sure that the name calling and offensive language are excised as far as possible from our vocabularies.

I discussed this issue on a television interview in my riding shortly after the two incidents occurred in this House. I told one of my constituents that the members of this House are not paragons of virtue. None of us is in a position to throw stones.

The hon. member looks shocked. Perhaps he is and considers that I am. I do not know. I think it is fair to say that we are not paragons of virtue. As I said to this television interviewer in my view we represent the people who elect us here. We are part of those people. We are all the same.

Before our election we were citizens as they are. After the election we have become members of Parliament, but we are still citizens as they are. We have all their foibles and all their weaknesses, and we are at one with the people we represent in a host of ways that we cannot measure here.

One of the ways we can measure it is in our conduct and our behaviour. I suggest that we do behave very much as a group of any 300 Canadians would behave if they came into a room and started having a lively discussion about matters on which they have profound disagreement.

We have tried through our rules and practices to raise the level of the debate so that the language is perhaps different from what is used in the street. The fact of calling another hon. member by the name of his or her riding instead of by name, for example, tends to force us to avoid personal references in the way that another group might if it were brought together for this purpose.

That aside, we are ordinary Canadians. However, the standard and expectation is different because we are on television in this House and elected to serve in this place. We are expected to behave in a better way and it is a fair expectation.

I do not deny that it is a fair expectation and that is why when there are breaches of the rules, where there is name calling and offensive language, we run into difficulty. We are criticized and the place is brought into disrepute.

I agree with that criticism. It is a fair criticism and it is one that we have to answer for. To the extent that this debate may encourage us to raise our standards in this House, that is fine.

I want to turn to those standards because it has been suggested that this is a new phenomenon, that somehow things have changed in the last few weeks, the last year, the last three or four or five years. I do not know how long the government House leader has had these feelings, but obviously he did not feel pushed or moved enough to bring in such a motion in the last seven years that he has been in government. I am rather surprised that it has suddenly come on him today that we have to have this discussion.

As I say I do not know exactly why it was prompted, unless it is in response to these incidents.

What was the situation 20 or 30 years ago? I used to come and sit in the gallery when I was a teenager and watch the debates in this House. I can remember Mr. Diefenbaker was Leader of the Opposition at the time. In fact, he was Prime Minister when I was first here and Mr. Pearson was Leader of the Opposition.

Ms. Clancy: I did it too.

Mr. Milliken: I remember then that the debates were exceedingly lively in this Chamber. To suggest that somehow today they have changed is simply not the case.

I can recall Question Period when members used to bang their desks. The din was often so loud you could not hear anything but desk banging. You could not possibly hear a member trying to speak above the roar.

Many members lifted the wooden tops on their desks and banged them up and down rather than just pound them with their hands and I am sure you remember this, Mr. Speaker. The noise was fantastic. There was hooting and hollering and yelling.

To say that today it is noisier or different from then I suggest is simply not true. I think that the Chamber is relatively quiet in this day and age. I think it has changed a bit. I think it has changed for the better in that respect.

Also to suggest that somehow the language in debate was different I do not think is fair. I think the language at that time was very lively. I think the exchanges were very powerful. We did not hear criticism of Parliament back then. Indeed the public speaks about those days as the "good old days of Parliament" when we had real debaters like Mr. Diefenbaker. He was regarded as a great debater, and he was a great debater. He was a powerful speaker. He could keep the House in fits of laughter.

Ms. Clancy: Or fits of rage.

Mr. Milliken: "Or fits of rage", as the hon. member for Halifax suggests, and it is true.

I remember when Mr. Pickersgill was a member of this House. His speeches were a brilliant example of how to use heckling to full advantage. He would stand up with absolutely no message he wanted to impart and wait for heckles from the other side in order to make up his speech and run on the heckles. He had a great time. He made wonderful speeches that were endlessly entertaining and extremely useful, cogent contributions to the debates going on at the time. He was an excellent speaker.

The hon. member for Essex East as he then was, Mr. Paul Martin Senior, was another example of a great debater who could make a mountain out of a molehill. He could create arguments out of mere nothings and make the whole thing sound as though it was a learned discourse that would well suit any professorial lecture.

I appreciate the compliments of my hon. friends. In looking at this issue from any modern perspective, we have to consider that conduct in today's House of Commons has not changed. There may be a slip here and there from one day to another, but there are also improvements and perhaps those are not noted either. While there is always room for change I welcome the government's initiative from that perspective and agree that members of Parliament have to conduct themselves with decorum. The obligation is to refrain I submit from excesses of any kind but particularly of offensive, sexist, racist language or nasty name calling.

I also recognize that members can make a mistake and say the wrong thing. I think the fact that we are able to stand up, withdraw, apologize and forgive one another is a very important part of this Chamber. If we were to carry the grudge and not recognize that people say things when they should not—and we all do it at one time or another—it would be a vindictive and nasty place.

It is tough enough now when we have our disagreements about how we conduct public policy and how we run this country, but we will make it a lot tougher if we decide that we have to fight each other because someone has made a mistake. We have to be willing as the public would be willing if they were here, to forget and forgive when the time comes.

While I respect the intent of the motion, I am surprised that it is here. I hope that the government will look favourably on the amendment that has been moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for the reasons explained in his very capable speech. I look forward to following speeches in this debate and possibly speaking again on the main motion.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the member for Kingston and the Islands correctly, he is trying to make a point which I think was overlooked and deliberately so. Perhaps in the government motion we have before us there is a distinction to be made between different kinds of language. All of them in their own way contribute to what is perceived as the decorum problem in the House of Commons but not all of them are morally equal. A distinction is to be made between heckling done in good humour or a kind of informal argument which is going on off the record. This looks bad on TV partly because of the way we televise the House of Commons.

It may be a matter of personal insult which ought not to be practised but which is nevertheless a matter between individual members which can be dealt with in the traditional way of withdrawal and apology, etc. We can then get into what the government describes as abusive language.

The problem is that the government seems to think that all these things are abusive and wants to submerge within the over-all concept of abusive language what has really been the catalyst for this debate and for the concern that has been expressed in the last few weeks. That is the use of racist and sexist terms. I am glad to see that the amendments from both the Liberal Party and New Democratic Party try to address that.

• (1740)

In our judgment, and I want the member to comment on this, this is something which we ultimately cannot expect the House to deal with solely through the office of the Speaker. We need to be able to have accountability on the part of party leadership and caucus leadership for the behaviour of members in this regard, particularly when it comes to the use of racist and sexist language.

I would agree that this is not always easy to define. Certainly there is a difference between that kind of language which is offensive to entire groups of people, whether they be women, visible minorities or whatever, and language which is offensive to one person. This can be dealt with in that interpersonal level of withdrawal, apology, and forgiveness which the hon. member rightly points out is a very necessary element of living in the House of Commons.

If the good news of the gospel is the forgiveness of sins, certainly the House of Commons is a place which depends entirely on the forgiveness of sins for its day-to-day life. If we could not begin each day anew in some degree or another, indeed hourly, then we would not be able to function at all.

I invite the member to elaborate perhaps just a bit on what the government is up to in the sense of trying to submerge a larger issue which only its members have been found guilty of, so to speak, in a way of talking about the problem that assumes that we are all equal when it comes to this kind of abusive language. I would submit that we are not.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. member being a minister of the gospel is far better than I talking about the benefit of sin or the forgiveness of sin. I would not presume to match his eloquence on that particular subject.

However, his comments are very well taken. I regret one thing he said, and I was very careful to avoid this in my remarks, and that was the fact that the sexist and racist comments appear to come from just one side of the House. In the last few weeks that may be true, but I suspect that if one looks at the long haul this is not something unique to one side. I do not want to throw any stones in that regard and I do not think he does either. It really does not help the debate on that issue if we do that.

I agree with him that there is an attempt to draw the public's attention to the importance of this breach of our etiquette, our rules. I think it is a significant breach and one that perhaps needs to be dealt with in some other way. That is why I said at the opening of my remarks that I wished the government House leader had sent this matter to a committee instead and suggested that it be looked at. Frankly I think that is what should be done.

I know the Speaker has a committee that is looking at it and which I presume will come up with some kind of a report as a result of its discussions. This is an informal arrangement, but it could come to the committee on House management and be dealt with there to come up with a recommendation for a rule change.

I think I was stressing the importance throughout of the need for temperance in our dealings one with the other. While I am interested in his idea that parties have to take responsibility for the conduct of their members, I have concerns about that. I think in most cases members have to take that responsibility themselves. We as individuals have to discipline ourselves. It is not up to me to sit in my seat and wait for my House leader to turn around and tell me that I have to withdraw remarks. I think I should know when I have made a mistake and withdraw or do what is necessary to apologize to a member whom I may have offended by something I said.

I am not sure that I like the idea of shifting the responsibility to party leadership, because what does it do for independent members, for example, of this House? Does it mean that they have no restraints? I think that the restraints should be equal on every member regardless of his or her position in this House. I think the restraints ought to be imposed by the Speaker on the member or by the collective discipline of the House not by individual parties.

I do not feel that the standards should be different across the House. The standard should be the same for each one of us, and the obligation should be the same for each one.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the hon. member opposite from Kingston and the Islands.

I was glad toward the end of his dissertation he finally acknowledged the very facts of what is in the motion before us. We are talking about civility, the decorum of the House, abusive language, verbal interruptions, offensive language and gestures. I agree with him that good natured heckling is beneficial. I think it is beneficial for all of us, and I am glad that he brought that point out.

I think what the motion is trying to get at is that we as individuals—he has alluded to this—have to take responsibility for our own actions here. There have been times when I have not been proud of the actions of many of my good friends here on both sides of the House. I suspect sometimes that yours truly has got carried away as well sometimes.

I would like to ask the hon. member opposite whether or not he thinks there could be some changes made to the methods of televising the House of Commons. Originally it started out as an electronic Hansard, so it is very confined as to the rules and regulations that are given to the camera operator. It is very confined that it must only show either the Speaker or to whom the Speaker has given the floor.

Would there be a greater understanding by the Canadian public of what is happening if we were to alter those rules so that there was more fully televised coverage of what goes on here in the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this question. I was a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this Parliament and the committee made recommendations to this House for improving the broadcasting of debates of this House.

[English]

I regret that that report was not accepted. The report proposed various changes, over the shoulder shots for questioners so that the minister who the question was going to could be seen. It proposed wider angle shots of the House so that the public could see who was sitting where and might see the heckling take place. It proposed wider shots showing where the person speaking was standing in the House in relation to the other persons who were sitting in the Chamber.

All those recommendations were very sensible and I regret, as I say, that they were not adopted. I am not sure that the changes in television would alter the behaviour or demeanour of the House particularly one way or the other. It might improve it slightly, I do not know. I think it would be quite neutral, but I do feel that it would at least allow the public to realize that the heckling is an integral part of the debate and sometimes extremely worth while.

I see the hon. Minister of Supply and Services here. He loves heckling, and I enjoy his comments.

If the public could see that he was here and shouting things at me at various times, I do not think they would be offended. What the public must find very difficult is not being able to hear the comments that members make when a member is speaking because of our television system, not realizing that other comments are being made except to assume that perhaps they are unkind, nasty or name calling. They are not.

In my experience, name calling is exceedingly rare. I do not recall ever having been called an offensive name except a windbag. I have to admit I was not terribly offended. It was unparliamentary, I did not mind the hon. member calling me a windbag. As the hon. member said, it was a compliment.

An hon. member: It was an understatement.

Mr. Milliken: I think name calling is a rare event in this Chamber as all hon. members know, and I think it is unfortunate that when it does happen, it attracts such attention and makes it appear as though this is going on all the time. It is not. In my experience, it is exceedingly rare.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Associate Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, although I thought you might refer to me as the Minister responsible for the Status of Women for the benefit of this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I can do that, too: Also the Minister for the Status of Women.

Mrs. Collins: Really in this debate I am talking as a member of Parliament because I think this is the kind of debate where we are really talking all together about an issue that is important. I think it is important to have this debate.

Unlike my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, I guess I have been more concerned about this issue in the just over seven years since I have been a member of this House. There have been many, many times when I have sat on the back bench and cringed at the display of behaviour or language which I have seen in this House, and in many ways sort of felt powerless to do anything about it. Quite honestly, I felt very frustrated. So, I am glad we are having this debate. It is the first time that I am aware of in my seven years that we have even talked about the issue. A number of us have talked about it from all parties at different times and I think it is healthy for us as members of Parliament and for the public to be aware that we are concerned about our own behaviour and that we are looking at ways to improve the credibility of this House, and therefore would hope as individuals as well.

Today I want to talk a little bit about why I really think it is important to have this debate, and why it is important to have in this Chamber behaviour that is really representative of the best we can do. Also, I would comment on the issue of sexist language and why, as a woman—and I think other colleagues may share this—sexist language is so offensive to us. I have found in discussions with not only colleagues but sometimes other people don't really understand that. Obviously it cannot be a full discussion of this issue today but there will be other opportunities, but I just want to make a few comments in that area.

The resolution, broad as it is, and I know there are some amendments that we can discuss as well on it, really reflects on the ability of all the members of this House to perform the role that I think Canadians expect of us. We all know that our country is at a crossroads and the decisions that we will be making, whether on constitutional affairs or a wide variety of issues, will determine our future as a nation. Surely the choices that Canadians make about business issues, about the economy, about our education issues, our social values, will all have an enormous impact on our prosperity. The conduct and the attitudes of Canadians in an era of considerable upheaval and concern will set a stamp upon our ability to be able to continue to promote the kind of caring and compassionate society that I think we all take such pride in.

In my mind if ever in our recent history Canadians need leadership and need examples to follow and need models of responsibility and decency in the face of the very daunting challenges that we have before us, I think that time is now.

Ill-chosen words or provocative gestures, invectives or slurs or racist or sexist remarks are just going to muddy the whole area of thought and communication. These are times when very complex issues must be analysed in detail, and I would hope in a fair and rational approach. Canadians must be able to consider all options. These are times for clear thoughts to be expressed with civility and decorum and opposing positions obviously on those issues which exist must be voiced consistent with our democratic principles, but presented without bar room antics or invectives.

This House was created as a House to bring Canadians together. It has evolved in order to help Canadians express their aspirations and enable citizens to determine the course of events of their future. When our constituents elect us, no matter what party we represent, they entrust us with enormous responsibilities. They empower us to make choices on their behalf. In doing this they have set upon us a duty to conduct ourselves and our affairs in a way that would make our citizens proud of the high ideals that lie behind our democratic institutions, that are the very heart of our democracies. In may ways I feel that when we come here as elected persons representing Canadians, we do in some ways give up perhaps some of our freedoms because we have to behave in ways I think will ensure that Canadians can be proud of us. That applies not only in the House but in other instances as well.

This House has to represent solutions for the challenges that face us as Canadians and as members of Parliament. It should not be part of the problem. Unfortunately we have had instances in recent days where I think this House has indeed contributed to the problems that we face in society, and have not been part of the solutions.

Indeed we all know that Canadians have grown quite cynical about their elected representatives and often I find people will say that it is not you. They are not going to say it to your face but they will say it behind your back. There is this sense that somehow as a group we really do not seem to have the confidence of the public. At a time when I think that we have a very important duty to set a standard of service to the nation, Canadians all too often feel that this House is nothing but a forum for bickering and it is not very productive. That is the impression that they get. That is often conveyed to me when I go home.

At a time when Canadians are looking for leadership and vision, all too often they turn on their television sets to the parliamentary channel and they get something that relates more to invective or hostility. We have to be careful that we do not get so caught up in our lives here and we are used to it all. However, for the ordinary Canadian who turns on the parliamentary channel they are coming from a very different kind of perspective and we have to relate to their values, their way of thinking about us.

I know that all members of this House feel very passionately about the future of this country, about their own views. I think all members of this House are capable of great vision and compassionate understanding. I certainly have seen it at committee hearings. I have seen it in many of the meetings, the public hearings, I have been involved in, and in meetings I have had with colleagues in all parts of the House. There has been a lot of camaraderie and respect which often is not conveyed to the public who do not see those kinds of meetings and that kind of effort that often crosses party lines.

Therefore members of this House have to be adept in the use of language to express their hopes and their aspirations. By definition members of Parliament are supposed to be accomplished communicators. You have to be to some degree to even get to this place. We have all shared the experience of debating on the hustings and having to present our views and having to defend our views. That is part of our tradition. We have all had to stretch our ability with language to its limits in order to communicate our ideals and our visions to our constituents.

We should all be very familiar with appropriately chosen language which we use to rally people around us, our ideas, to invoke the complexity of our situations and to galvanize vision into action. Language sends very powerful signals. It also sends subtle signals and very often the subtleties or the nuance or the connotation are the most powerful tools of language.

The members I think on both sides of this House have an abiding respect for this institution and a great deal of personal experience with the power of language. Nowhere should it be more evident that the use of language in this House must be part of the solution of our ability to provide leadership. We cannot let it be part of the problem.

The problem has been, as we have seen, and we could speak of the problem from many different levels, some subtle, some overt, but as the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women and as a female member of this House, I am acutely aware of the subtle messages that our every-day language conveys. I know that often we have no intention of transmitting these messages but they are conveyed unwittingly. Nevertheless they are conveyed. We still often use sex-specific words for generic purposes using a term like "mankind" rather than "humanity". We often use a double standard when using words to describe situations that are substantially similar.

I have certainly heard a male colleague described as forthright while a woman colleague might be aggressive. There is a connotation that women are supposed to behave and are labelled differently when they express their views in similar ways. I am sure my colleague from across the House would agree with that.

When you use that kind of language it divides, it excludes and sends signals that may not be consciously noticed but nevertheless plays in the back of our minds and affects our attitudes.

I know that most members of this House are aware of the subtleties of gender based language and are doing what they can to apply words that unite and include rather than divide and exclude. After all, over half of our constituents are women. As elected members we owe it to ourselves as well as to our electorate to apply language that does not subtly or subconsciously exclude over one-half of our population.

The resolution before us does not just respond to the subtleties of language. In fact, if that was all we had to deal with, I do not think we would be having this debate. There are other issues that are far from being resolved.

It is when we use words that degrade. I guess I speak in this context of women and I feel particularly strongly about words that degrade women. We send signals that it is all right to degrade women. When we call a woman a name that we would never allow anyone to use to describe someone dear to us, we condone the very attitudes which, if you take the whole spectrum, ultimately leads to violence. We do not know what all those links are but we know there is a spectrum and it includes at one end the use of sexist language. It also implies that we condone attitudes that delegate women to unequal positions in our society. Surely that is not what this House is all about.

The debates in this House in the past few months have on occasion descended into the worst kind of gutter language. I have used that phrase to describe it to the media. It is language that does more than exclude and divide, it is language that tries to smash and destroy the respectability of the members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, some members of this House have been working together and talking about steps that we might take to make changes. The debate is obviously one part of that today but also some of the women members of this House have met together with the Speaker to discuss gender related issues on the Hill and specifically in this House. I hope that we are going to be able to continue that work.

I know that Mr. Speaker has been very helpful. He has taken a lead in this area as he has in the establishment of sexual harassment policies which have been developed for employees under his jurisdiction. I think that is very important as well.

I think those kinds of steps are good. There do need to be some changes. Earlier this day at the Association of Women Parliamentarians we discussed this issue. We brought forward some ideas that are still embryonic at this stage, discussing how the rules of this House might be changed to ensure that the penalties for the use of offensive language—we were talking specifically of sexist or racist language—might be changed.

There were real penalties, penalties that might, for example, include exclusion from the House, not just naming and going out the door but having the privileges for a period of time taken away, including even potentially a fine, the withdrawal of payment for that period of time. People would know we take these things seriously. We hope that we can, not just today but thereafter, look at this situation and see how we might be better able to send out the signals. It is preventive.

We want to prevent that kind of situation from occurring, and I think these measures are important. They indicate that we all share a responsibility for making this House a model for equality and decency in which Canadians can turn with pride.

I think in the issue of language and decorum, television was mentioned earlier. It is an important change. My hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands said that it was no different years ago. Maybe it was not but quite honestly I do not think that is good enough.

Many years ago when I worked for the Government of Ontario, I used to go into the Legislative Assembly to watch the debates. I would go in at night. I would be appalled by the behaviour and the language that went on in that Legislative Assembly during those years. There were not many women, of course, at that time at all.

I do not think we should just say that it has always been done this way, we can just carry on. In my mind with a new generation of politicians, with more women, with more people reflecting the mixed ethnic background of our country we have to come to grips with these issues. We have to convey to the Canadian public that we will establish high standards of leadership in this House.

Some people have asked how do we describe offensive language? I thought it might be helpful if I use one example. Interestingly enough the example from the Canadian Forces of our personal harassment policy provides a definition which I think in some respects might be applied to language too. It talks about personal harassment being unsolicited behaviour by an individual that is directed at or is offensive to another individual, that is based on personal characteristics, including for example race, religion, sex, physical characteristics or mannerisms and that a reasonable person ought to have known would be unwelcome.

All of us in this Chamber like to think of ourselves as reasonable persons. I hope that we will take this issue very seriously, that we will make the changes in our own rules, in our own behaviour so that we can provide an example for the Canadian public, that can provide decorum and conduct, that we can be models to the young people of this country and provide the leadership that will ensure that Canada can be proud of its Parliament and its parliamentary representation and that we can move on to the other issues which are so important to us of having a united, a caring, a prosperous Canada which we all wish for our future.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I must say I entirely approve of what the minister said about disciplinary measures. Expelling a member from the House for using the word "slut" or similar terms doesn't really change his life. I think that real disciplinary action, such as taking away all his rights and privileges for several days, would make him think. If your pocketbook is hit, it always makes you think twice, so I think this would be a very good idea.

In fact, the Association of Women Parliamentarians of Canada intends to go ahead with the resolution we intend to submit very shortly, and the gist of it, Mr. Speaker, is that you should have more authority. When something like this happens, you should have the authority to make a decision immediately and not have to wait until the member rises in the House and says "Yes, I withdraw". You should be able to decide then and there that this person has violated the Standing Orders of the House, that this individual should be expelled from the House and that the member's privileges should be taken away.

As the House leader mentioned at the beginning of this debate, to withdraw is not enough. Words are withdrawn, but that same evening they are aired on television. It really doesn't make sense, the way the system works now, and we need something else.

Mr. Speaker, I agree it is important to discuss this motion, but it is really incredible that it has come to this, that we have to discuss this kind of motion in Parliament today. In fact, I think it is demeaning.

When I first became a member of this House, I had been practising law for 13 years, and when people were asked who they trusted most in society, in Quebec, we came third. Judges came first, then doctors and then lawyers and notaries. Now I am here, I come last, and I feel insulted because one of the reasons is this matter of unparliamentary language. Of course, it isn't the only reason why we are discredited. Journalists often report what they see, and it isn't always nice. I don't think it is just our behaviour in the House but a number of other factors as well.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up. I will not be able to finish what I wanted to say, but I do think that we must change the Standing Orders of the House to allow you to implicate members directly, in other words, to impose your own disciplinary measures.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the minister who is responsible for the status of women and I appreciate very much many of the comments she made. I think that it is important to acknowledge that there are many times in the House of Commons when members, for a short period of time perhaps, take off their partisan cloaks or partisan hats and do work together. We have done that on issues of concern to women, issues of concern to individual women and issues of concern to women as a whole. We have done that through all parties represented in the House of Commons. That is always a very positive step and it does happen in the House of Commons.

It is important that we reiterate the difference between a lack of decorum, which is what this motion addresses, and racism, sexism, homophobic kinds of responses that we have all heard in the House of Commons. There is a difference. Racism and sexism attack a whole segment of our society, not simply me when a sexist remark is hurled to me in this House. It gives an indication of a member of Parliament's attitude towards all women in society and that is what must be recognized when we are discussing this.

The minister and I are both mothers, we are both parents, and I think we both recognize that when you are raising children, whether it is in your own home, whether you are a teacher in a classroom, whether you are a coach of a minor league sports team, that you impart to children the message that there are consequences for inappropriate behaviour. There must be consequences for inappropriate behaviour. What we have witnessed in the last few weeks is the fact that there have not been those consequences for behaviour that the vast majority of Canadians find offensive.

I want to ask the hon. minister if she will be working within her caucus to get support for the amendments that have been put forward to this government resolution and will she herself be supporting those amendments.

Mrs. Collins: I have not seen the wording of the amendments so far but I will certainly look at them. I agree with you, I would like to see something that will add greater definition about the consequences, whether it is offensive or abusive language, sexist, racist, behaviour or gestures. I think we have to look at the whole range of those activities.

If that necessitates changing the rules of the House, because obviously there has to be something that applies to all members whether they belong to a party or are independent, I think it has to be done that way. Each one of us, through our own caucuses deals with our situation, so we have to reflect on that within our caucuses as well.

It has never been clear, up to now it has been very fuzzy. As we said, the tradition was that you could just get up and apologize, and everybody thought that that was okay. Well, we are saying now that that is not okay, that is not good enough, because of the very messages that is sending out. I think that is the wrong message, that sometimes great parliamentary traditions need to be changed to recognize the new reality that we live in.

I am not sure if we have all the answers right now, but that is something that we need to work on. I do not see it as a partisan issue, I think it is an issue that, hopefully, all members can work on.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I think in the past few days Canadians have seen that there is a sickness called prejudice living in the halls of this institution and in the hearts of some members. I believe that most of the time it is kept well hidden, but more and more often it escapes, sullying the reputations of this institution as well as all of ourselves.

When one female member of Parliament is ridiculed because of her gender, this is ridicule against all women in this country. When one male member of Parliament is ridiculed because of his colour—he happens to be black—all visible minorities are maligned in this country. As the only other visible minority in this House, Mr. Speaker, I really feel vulnerable.

As I am speaking I must add that I have an accent when speaking English. I wonder if one day others may be tempted to ridicule me because of my accent.

Before the temptation occurs I would like to assure all members that I have no accent in my heart.

Mr. Speaker, I was to pose the same questions as the previous member. Would she support the amendments introduced by my House leader and the House leader of the New Democratic Party? Of course I realize that she did not have the opportunity to hear the proposed amendments, that was not her fault at all.

Therefore I would like to read the amendments because we can test the principles of an answer in answering questions if the question is posed and the answer is given at the moment. When a question is posed at two o'clock in the morning and you give an answer then you know it is an answer emanating from your heart.

Therefore I would like to read the essence of the amendment. It refers to "including sexist or racist language or gestures directed at other members either during Question Period, debate or otherwise in the Chamber". That is one fundamental essence of that amendment. Part of the New Democratic Party's amendment states that "the party leaders and House leaders will be responsible for the deportment of their caucuses".

Is the minister today prepared to tell the House, having heard the substance of those amendments, whether she believes in them and would support these amendments in a spirit of non-partisanship, as she claims? Having made a decision today will she bring that message to her cabinet and convince cabinet as well? That will be the real test of sincerity and the real test of non-partisanship.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, as I understand this motion it is a free vote and we are here as members of Parliament. The amendment that would specifically refer to sexist or racist language would be a good idea. The member might want to consider adding physical characteristics. The member mentioned that sometimes people are ridiculed here because of a physical characteristic or manner of speech and I find that extremely offensive. By ridiculing a person all other people like them will feel that same pain, and that seems very inappropriate. So there might be a few other examples that we might want to add.

Obviously our caucuses have to deal with this and I think that is a given. I would like to see—and I am not sure if it is possible to add to the motion at this point or if it is just going to be something we will discuss later on—that the rules of this House be studied and whatever wording created to address more appropriate responses by the Speaker to these kinds of inappropriate behaviours.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my remarks I want to compliment my colleagues: the hon. Minister responsible for the Status of Women, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby and the hon. member for Saint-Hubert. I am going to be speaking a little later about the Association of Women Parliamentarians and the sense of warmth we may all be feeling as women members of Parliament today after a particularly successful meeting.

As the seconder of the Liberal amendment I would like to absolutely assure you and the Speaker of the House and the other members who occupy that chair of my full confidence in each one of you, of my respect and admiration for the Speaker of the House, and of my knowledge that some of the behaviour that we have been subjected to in the last little while is not condoned by any one of you. Mr. Speaker, you do take every measure possible to combat and order such behaviour outside this Chamber. I also fully support the New Democratic Party's amendment, particularly its reaffirmation of our support for those who hold the Chair in this House.

When I listened to the remarks of the member for Kingston and the Islands it brought back a memory for me when he talked about coming to this Chamber as a child. As he and I are relatively the same age we may even have been here on the same day. I remember I came as a 10-year old when Mr. Diefenbaker was the Prime Minister. Unfortunately there were no Liberal MPs in the province of Nova Scotia so my mother and I were forced to go to friends in the Conservative Party to get tickets.

I remember sitting in that gallery and watching the House and being utterly fascinated, as only a 10-year old could be, and then being a little bit—no, a lot—appalled when I saw members on both sides of the House asleep. I recall one, and I do not remember which side of the House he was on, who even had a newspaper over his face and you could hear his snores in the gallery.

That has been arrested, not to say suppressed, by the advent of television in the House of Commons and we are glad of that. That kind of behaviour is not one that any one of us would appreciate or condone, but it is not nearly as offensive as that with which we have put up with in the last couple of months.

When I came to this House three years ago next month I remember saying in jest to some of my colleagues: "I feel as if I am locked up in a somewhat unruly boys' school". I meant it at the time, half in jest, wholly in earnest. Now the real downside of being locked up in a boys' school is coming to the fore and it is no longer a joke.

I support very strongly the words of the member for Kamloops who talked about this House setting the tone, in a way, for all Canadians, particularly with regard to the treatment of women, visible minorities, the physically challenged and so on. In other words, the treatment of all of us to all of us and in particular the treatment of those who deserve our best treatment.

There is a tradition in this House. We have heard about that tradition. We heard about it most eloquently from the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Winnipeg Transcona. When the minister, my colleague from New Westminister—Burnaby and my colleague from Saint-Hubert spoke we all agreed on one point. This tradition may have seen, at least in some part, its final days. It may be time to change this tradition to reflect what is happening in the 1990s and what we must have in the 20th century. It is sad in a sense. It is sad that we cannot maintain the British parliamentary tradition of apology and withdrawal and we will all forget it like gentlemen.

Contrary to the member for Kamloops I am not a gentleman and I am not sure I can always behave like a gentleman. I do however want to try to behave like a member of Parliament.

I am angry. I am more angry today than I have been for a long time. It has been a build up of anger over the last several months. It is not just me. Women across this country are angry. People of colour across this country are angry. They are not angry about the day-to-day interruptions. They are not angry about the normal "heckling" in this House. They are angry about sexist and racist language. They are angry about personal attacks and obscene gestures. Those kinds of behaviour are simply unacceptable. They have no place in this House and every one of us in this House knows it.

I am sorry. It is insufficient after having heard a sexist slur, a racist slur, or a personal attack to say an apology and a withdrawal and all is forgotten. It is not forgotten. It has festered with every one of us in this House. I suspect it has particularly festered with those of us who have over our careers had to deal with such remarks.

These comments go beyond the concept of adversarial debate. Believe me, and I imagine everyone does believe me, when I say I relish adversarial debate.

My colleague from Kingston and the Islands before talked about how he liked to be heckled. Me too. I enjoy it. In the normal course of debate I am disappointed if no one heckles me. I realize that if I was heckled today it would be pretty awful, given the subject matter because this is a very serious topic.

For example my very good friend, for whom I have great respect and admiration, the member for St. John's East, when we happen to show up in the Chamber on the same duty day we enjoy heckling each other. Over the past three years we have had some memorable, interesting and I hope fairly erudite exchanges. I can also say that neither I nor the member for St. John's East would have any problem with those exchanges being read from the pulpit of any religious institution in this land. There might be some things in the content of what I say that might bother certain religious institutions but there would be nothing in the form. This is something we all have to remember.

When we deal with the question of racism and sexism, when we deal with the problem of personal attacks, each one of us knows how much that diminishes us in the eyes of the public. Make no mistake about it, the person diminished the most is the attacker. It does not diminish the victim. Indeed it probably creates an atmosphere of sympathy for the victim. What it does in diminishing the attacker is say: "This is the kind of person who gets elected to the House of Commons".

It is not. This kind of behaviour, this kind of language comes from a very small minority. I cannot emphasize too much the fact that we have in the next little while a window of opportunity in this Chamber. That window of opportunity is for us to show, to lead as an example on a non-partisan basis, for the world at large to see that we take this extremely seriously and will in some form in the very near future come up with recommendations to show how seriously we take this.

The hon. minister mentioned the work of several other committees. One is the informal group advising the Speaker of the House on which she sits, as do I and several other members including the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. It is a fairly broad question we are looking at concerning behaviour and the treatment of women generally on the Hill. We are dealing with a number of things that we are concerned with through the good offices of the Speaker of the House.

I want to talk about this a little. Today we had a meeting of the Association of Women Parliamentarians of Canada. It is a group that for a long time a number of women in this House had worked to get off the ground. I refer particularly to the member for Vancouver East who had tried for quite a while with not a great deal of success. I want to compliment in particular the member for Saint-Hubert, who had some assistance from myself and the minister and the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. This organization came together last year. It has met. It is difficult for all of us. The women of Parliament lead very busy lives as everyone else knows, but we have managed to come together on a number of occasions and we have managed to find common ground. But today marked a watershed because the women of all four parties met, discussed this issue, and there was such a sense of mutual support, such a sense of purpose, and such a sense that we as a group must come forward to the rest of you, our male colleagues, and say the time has come to make some changes.

We talk about the tradition and, yes, traditions are to be revered and to be honoured when they are good traditions, when they are traditions whose life is still germane to both the life of this place and the life of the country.

But, some of the traditions are white male, patriarchal traditions which not only have little to do with the women who sit in this Chamber, but frankly they drive us crazy. Equally frankly, Mr. Speaker, they drive the women of the country crazy. And I think, Mr. Speaker, it is because they are crazy, and it is time to get rid of traditions whose time has passed. It is time to say that we take this seriously. It is time to say this will not be accepted in the Parliament of Canada. I accept and agree most strongly that the leader of each party and the individual caucuses have a role to play. I have no qualms about that and no qualms about knowing that my leader and my caucus, as I am sure the others, will support this, do support this, and do what is right.

But, Mr. Speaker, because of the confidence that each one of us has in you and your confrères who maintain the order and decorum in this Chamber, it is important that the rules of the Chamber reflect reality, reflect the new realities of both this Chamber and this country. Consequently I know that when we bring forward the changes that we are looking at that we will get support.

In the meantime I support most strongly, and I hope the rest of you will as well, the amendments put forward by the hon. opposition House leader, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party, the member for Kamloops.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker. We all know that. The time has come to act. Let us show the people of Canada that they have elected mature, caring, and compassionate people who also reflect the views of all their constituents.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague from Halifax for the comments she made here today. Certainly we all know that she takes a very active part in what she has just spoken about and I commend her for that.

I want to say that I believe this is a very healthy debate taking place in this House. Some people seem to think it should not have happened. Well, I tend to believe that it had to happen. I think that we have come to a situation that something had to give and whether it was the constitutional committees going cross the country, or whatever it was, it brought home to me that something is wrong here. Something is wrong in this great institution and I believe we have to make amendments and adjustments to that.

I know that over the last 20 years great advances have been made by women, by minorities, and things seem to be going along relatively well.

Somewhere along the line in recent times that seemed to come to a stop. There are groups and individuals who are saying things and doing things to make it less possible for these people to continue to become equal members of society. I think this is wrong.

I for one am not the greatest person watching out for what I say. I think my colleague from Halifax would be the first to recognize that, but I honestly believe that there is room for everybody in this House.

I am certainly one who agrees that things have to change and must change. I am not just talking about the sexist and racist language or gestures within this House, but I believe that other things have to change. We are the people in Canada who are setting an example for the rest of the country.

My God, Mr. Speaker, if we cannot do it, who can? Who do we expect to come to this great institution? As the member for Kingston and the Islands said: "It is 900 years old". I agree with him. As my colleague from Halifax has said: "I agree that heckling is part of life and public speaking". We go into our constituencies at election times. We go to halls with all of the other members from all the other parties and if you do not get heckled, then you are not in it. I agree this has to be.

When we see the sexist and racist language in this House, I am appalled by it. I say to my colleague from Halifax and I ask her this question. It is a fairly straightforward question. Why do you think these things are happening at this time in our life?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Hillsborough for his question.

I am a bit reticent because I do have a definite belief and a definite reason, but I also do not want to impute reason in people who are not here to defend themselves. I have said it before so I might as well say it here and put it on the record.

I believe that these comments are based in hate. I believe they are based in fear, in ignorance and I think that we see by history that when disadvantaged groups start to achieve a certain measure of representation and equality, some people who are particularly afraid of a loss of power react in a vicious manner. Unfortunately, I think that is the case.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I just want to raise one point. I appreciate my colleague's speech very much and I agree with her talking about traditions.

Often traditions are used to keep people in their place. I think it is going to be often heard that: "Oh, you cannot change. That is always the way it has been done". I guess as women at the leading edge, we do not accept that. We say that there has got to be a better way of doing things.

At our meeting earlier today at the Association of Women Parliamentarians, I thought it was also interesting that we had a representative of the Senate there. Perhaps we are not supposed to talk about the other place, but they indicated an interest in undertaking similar kinds of reforms. I also heard that from some male colleagues in the Senate. Perhaps the discussion we are having here will have application there as well.

There is another issue that we have talked about informally, and I just want to raise it here as well. How do we help people, our colleagues, become aware of what is offensive, whether sexist, racist or all kinds of language. Does she think it would be hopeful? I do not think you can do a dictionary. I do not think that is the approach. Is there information or some way that we can be sure that colleagues do in fact understand, that they do not get tripped up.

Sometimes there is a difference between the French and the English language of how words can be interpreted. I find there is often a generational gap. Some words that I think are offensive or sexist, much younger women do not have the same feelings about them. I am just wondering if my colleague would have some suggestions of how we get right down to the brass tacks, what we are going to do and can do.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. minister for her questions.

I think there are a couple of things.

• (1840)

In my position as critic for the Status of Women, which I have frequently said, I am not just your critic, Madam Minister, but I am also the critic for these things within my own caucus and I suspect my colleague from the New Democratic Party would agree with me that we have a sort of dual responsibility. One of the things, an is said in an old Nova Scotia phrase, is that you are going to catch more flies with honey in certain circumstances than you are with vinegar. You have to in getting these things across use a certain modicum of wit and you have to use a carrot and a stick approach.

I do not mean to sound patronizing to my male colleagues because many, many of them on all sides of the House are supportive and terrific and we would not survive in this unruly boy's school without them, but I do think that there needs to be, first of all, the absolute 100 per cent support of the caucus leadership. Second, I think that the recognition of the problem is the biggest thing we have here to deal with. Everyone who is an offender or who is a possible offender has to know what it is we are talking about, because some of them do not. They do not understand. It is not penetrating their consciousness.

A realization, a sensitization perhaps to the issues is what is necessary. How to do that, because I would not want my male colleagues in my own caucus or in any of the other caucuses to think that the women were suddenly going to herd them into a room and lecture them and rap them on the knuckles, although we might if we have to, but we have to bring this to the floor so that they understand as we understand.

We talk a great deal about language in this House in the sense of communication and the duality of this country and the importance of both languages, but there is another importance here that I think we have missed and that is that sometimes the language of men and women, be it French or be it English, is sometimes incomprehensible between one gender and the other. I think learning to bridge those gaps are what we have to do.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague for Halifax for her presentation.

I recognize this as an important topic. I am delighted it is being discussed. I recognize its importance as well. I am one of those who is trying to understand even better than I do.

As you well know, there have been a number of incidents. During the last month there have been two particular incidents that have been in fact embarrassing to the House and many of our constituents have called us. I am referring specifically to the incidents the member for Hamilton East a well as the member for Windsor—St. Clair.

I spoke out against both incidents as quickly as I could and I was surprised at how little visibility they got in spite of my attempt to explain what had happened and to in fact condemn what had happened and certainly not in a partisan way.

Basically I had three questions for my colleague. The first one is why did this happen? The member has already attempted to address that, in fact she has been rather insightful and helpful. How and what might we do in order to try to counteract some of those difficulties? There again, the member has addressed that as well.

The third point though, and very briefly, is that I was really quite surprised that some members defended that behaviour. I do not say that unkindly or in a partisan-like kind of way. I just could not believe what I heard. Why in the world would one defend that kind of behaviour when clearly virtually everyone believes that it was despicable and wrong and mean-spirited?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Halifax on a very short reply to that, but I would like to recognize the hon. member for Malpeque. I think she has a question for the hon. member.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I will be quite brief.

I think the answer is that when something like this happens people become defensive and understandably so. It is normal to be defensive in an indefensible position. A number of people, because this is a partisan place, because we are used to being partisan and, as I said, many of us relish in being partisan, I think seriously the people who perhaps reacted in an unacceptable manner by saying that a remark was provoked or by saying that so and so deserved it or so and so did this or so and so did that, were reacting because of the partisanship that I do not deny exists and that I think has to exist. I do not make as harsh a judgment against those people. I was angry at some of those responses. As I say I have been carrying this anger for a while, but I think it is because we all in a sense had our behaviour patterns and our nerves flicked raw by what happened. We are all so upset about it that some reactions were not the reactions that we would want. That is my belief. There could be another answer, but I think that is mine and I hope it is the right one.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to compliment the hon. member for Halifax on her very thoughtful speech here this afternoon and I want to go on record as supporting the amendments that have been put forth.

Since 1988 when I was elected I know that many of my constituents have spoken to me about the decorum in the House, the type of behaviour that they see on television. That of course includes the sexist, racist and rude comments that they see from time to time.

I certainly agree with them. To me it seems that this type of behaviour shows a total lack of respect for other members. I think being elected to this House to represent Canadians is a real privilege and I think this type of behaviour is below the dignity of this Chamber.

We have had a lot of publicity about recent developments in the House and I think it is certainly a new low of behaviour in the House of Commons at least since I was elected in November 1988.

I want to say that I am pleased we are discussing the issue today. I think it is an important and serious issue. It is one that we need to come to grips with and have to come to grips with if this Chamber is to get the respect of Canadians back again.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to put those comments on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is nothing further the hon. member would like to say. On debate, the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, let me start by saying that it is ironic that we would be having such a civil debate about the use of uncivil language in the House of Commons.

I have been here now for some 17 years. I recall when I sat in a seat somewhere near where the hon. member for Winnipeg North is sitting now. I remember the first occasion when I was not sure that I was going to be able to say what I was thinking and being rather frightened by it. I want you to know how frightened I am at this moment and it is because I might say what I am thinking.

This institution is in terrible disrespect and it has earned it. It has earned it not because the rules do not provide for members and how they ought to conduct themselves within the Chamber. Any member who thinks that somehow this is not one of the top issues on the minds of their constituents has not been off of this 15 acres called Parliament Hill in 20 years. Everywhere in the country people are angry at how this place is conducted from within.

What is so unfortunate about that is the other obvious fact from those of us who work here that for most of the time this place works very well. It works well in our debates for most of the time; it works well in committees and in our caucuses and in our specialized committee meetings. What does not work, what is not working and what is marinating this place in the poisonous atmosphere is the environment of Question Period.

We are having a lot of discussion in this particular debate today about sexist language and racist language. I submit to you that I do not think it is a coincidence that the examples held up took place in Question Period or right after. That one 45-minute period of the day has to be reviewed. Those books on the Table have to be opened more frequently. This Chamber has to start to pay attention to such things as the question of jurisdiction, of what ministers do you ask a question to and to make note that a question cannot be argumentative. It is in Beauchesne and Erskine May now.

I simply put to any member of the House: Name the day, name the member when you have not heard an argumentative question and compare this with other parliaments around the world. This is probably the most argumentative question place. Another rule that is in the books of this House is that a question is not to have a preamble. Often you have to hunt for the question in long preambles.

If I can go on to what I think is the most important one, it is against the rules today to impute motives. Yet ever so often, including in today's Question Period, the imputation of motives is there. That, Sir, poisons this place. It poisons this environment. It leads to results we do not want. It is Question Period where we need to focus a large part of our request for change so that the whole place can start to develop a sense of civility and respect for one another.

Like many other members I became glued to the television set on the Thanksgiving weekend past. It is about the third time in my life that I can remember when I was so fascinated by an event on television that I spent so much time watching. The other time was the Nixon hearings and more recently the situation in the gulf. This time it dealt with the ratification of Clarence Thomas, U.S. candidate to the Supreme Court of the United States. Without any capacity to judge who was right or wrong, Clarence Thomas or Rita Hill, of all of the messages and there are many, all worthy of developing speeches about racism and sexism and so on, the one that came out so absolutely clear was the utter destructive damage of the innuendo. One of those people is not telling the truth. No other fact can be drawn from that.

We are set up two sword lengths apart, established in a combative kind of a forum. The architectural design of the House does not lead to group decisions toward proper policy making as we are set up to be combative one with another. Innuendoes fly back and forth for 45 minutes that are destructive to people and destructive to this institution.

I am one who contends that the mood that is in Canada today, the negative mood that is so far below what this country so blessed with education, resources and opportunity deserves is there because most Canadians see this place as the mirror of themselves.

This is Canada. This Peace Tower is a symbol of Canada. The House of Commons is a symbol of Canada. When it conducts itself in ways unacceptable to all, then clearly Canadians are demeaned and belittled when their chief national institution is behaving in such a way.

We have to train ourselves to debate issues and not people. I believe we must do a much better job of re-examining the present rules we have for Question Period and make sure that they are obeyed. When it comes to the question of minorities, I guess I have only a few small examples of what it is like to be in that situation. The most dramatic example was either in 1960 or 1961 when I had the lifetime privilege of being in a forum in the Cow Palace in San Francisco with 22,000 persons, almost all of whom were black. Salted among that group were just a very few white persons to listen to an address by Martin Luther King.

I remember so clearly one part of Martin Luther King's speech when he said: "The white people ask us to wait just a little longer. We have already waited for 200 years, how much longer should we have to wait?" The whole audience rose and cheered. I was a bit like a non-Catholic in the Catholic church. I did not know whether to genuflect, sit down or stand. I did not know whether to cheer or not, I was white. I could not sit there because that would be smug.

All of a sudden I was in this dichotomy of a minority and not knowing what to do with one's sense of behaviour. Therefore most of that night I was in a three quarter crouch halfway up and halfway down trying to compromise. In my heart of hearts, I felt the cause that was being spoken for and was so supportive of the views being expressed by Mr. King.

I do not subscribe to that little adage that says: "There is so much bad in the best of us and so much good in the worst of us, that there is no need for any of us to complain about the rest of us". The truth of the matter is that this place must by the demand of Canadians revisit itself and then go and wash.

I submit that while there has been a focus today on the issues of sexist language and racial language, this House must demand that we return to those days of 15 years ago when Question Periods imposed that there would be no long preambles. It imposed that there would be no innuendo. It imposed that there would be no imputation of motives because when that takes place the environment is poisoned. The whole air of what we are about is destroyed and then we get into the personal attacks. Of course no one can excuse that and of course no one ought to be able to somehow rise and justify that it came out of the mood of the moment.

The tap root of this is that it is the mood of the moment that is causing us not to discipline ourselves.

I say that this is a matter for which I think we can go some significant distance in trying to bring about the kind of respect this institution so justly deserves and that Canadians expect. I assert that if we do not give them what they are looking for, they will keep changing their members of Parliament over and over again until they get what they want. Canadians will not accept a House of Commons that behaves the way this one is at the present time and has for the last few years.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a comment on the member's statement. I did not realize it before now but I guess Crowfoot must be a very left wing kind of place because the member and I agree totally on the matter.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, just a brief comment to indicate how I enjoyed the member's debate just delivered. It was a splendid speech. I am reminded of the editorial in a medical newsletter many, many years ago: "More reappraisal, less agonizing".

• (1900)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in reading the motion we have today I have to say that it is a motion with all the virtues and nobody can—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, no one could vote against such a motion, but I wonder if we will solve the problem. If the Government House Leader really wants to solve the problem of discipline and decorum facing us in this House, I wonder whether there would be another way to go about it. Does the hon. member who just spoke really believe that after a day of debate, which we have not yet finished, we can solve this problem? Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an opportunity some other day to speak on this motion. With my experience as whip, I would have something to say. With a day or two—I don't know how much time we will take to debate this motion—we can make great speeches, but what will it solve? By talking to one another— Just making a short speech to have us observe some decorum again would be too easy, Mr. Speaker.

You are indicating to me that it is seven o'clock.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we will just have to carry it on. It is seven o'clock.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INCOME TAX ACT

INCOME AVERAGING

The House resumed from Thursday, October 10, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to the order adopted on Thursday, October 10, 1991, the House will now proceed to the deferred division on Private Member's Motion M-81.

Call in the members.

[English]

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this is a vote on a private member's motion. We have started to develop the habit of voting by rows on either side of the House on both the positive and the negative side of the motion.

I think it would be appropriate if we were to do that, to stand in that fashion rather than in the fashion in which we stand on government legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement that the division be taken by rows?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is at this point that I should like to remind hon. members that the voting will begin with those members who are in favour of the motion in the rows to my right, to rise by row. Then would those members in rows to my left rise.

Later I will ask those members who are opposed to the motion in the rows to my right to rise and end with those members opposed to the motion in the rows to my left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I want to inform you that there have been some consultations across the floor of the House and I believe you will find unanimous consent to deal very expeditiously with all three readings of a Private Member's bill which has proceeded through the Senate, Bill S-3, an act to amend the the act of incorporation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada.

I would seek permission to briefly speak to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH IN CANADA

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved that Bill S-3, an act to amend the act of incorporation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is part of the understanding in the House that I will speak briefly on the bill and I am in a position to do so because the bill has proceeded through the Senate, was sent by the Senate to a committee, was spoken to by representatives of the church who have devoutly sought the amendments which are before the Chamber, which have complied with all of the requirements for amendment both internal to the proceedings of the church and corresponding with the requirements of this Parliament for the amending of legislation.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church is a Christian denomination well-known across Canada. It has been present in Canada for well over 100 years and was incorporated by an act of this Parliament. So amendments to its charter to bring it in keeping with modern times, in this case, to provide for a board of directors and to provide an expeditious procedure for establishing by-laws for regulating the affairs of the church are properly before us.

I would like only to add, on a personal note, the tremendous satisfaction that I feel in acting as a sponsor for this bill, an honour which I share with a former colleague in the other place, the late Senator David Croll, who was the sponsor of the bill in the Senate.

I have, therefore, the honour to present this bill and I thank my colleagues for agreeing to an expeditious procedure which is, however, justified in the light of the consideration by the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

EMPLOYMENT

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should extend certain provisions and benefits of the Older Workers Adjustment Program to include those many Canadians employed in the construction industry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise with regard to this private members' motion which has particular effects in the constituency I represent in this House, Cape Breton—East Richmond.

For quite some time, individuals involved in the construction industry have been calling for the active assistance and participation of the Government of Canada in order to become part and parcel of what is known in Canada as the Program for Older Workers Adjustment.

I wish to indicate to the House what the Older Workers Adjustment Program is all about and briefly to give a chronology of the things that have happened since 1984 and to submit my arguments in summation as to why I believe the Government of Canada in concert with the province of Nova Scotia should consummate an agreement on this important matter.

The Program for Older Workers Adjustment was designed to help long service older workers across the country who have no prospects for re-employment following major, permanent lay-offs. The program acknowledges the lengthy contribution of these men and women to the development of our country.

It should be noted that this is a federal-provincial partnership. The federal government is an active participant and not a mere bystander in this particular program. Its effective date was to take place with regard to lay-offs occurring on or after January 1, 1988, as being eligible for consideration.

The requirements for the older worker in order for him or her to be eligible for the program is that they must be between the ages of 55 and 64 and have been in the labour force for 15 out of the last 20 years with a minimum of 750 hours worked annually, have no alternative job opportunities, no prospects for re-employment through job training or mobility, are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants resident in Canada.

The construction association in Cape Breton, known as the Building Trades Council represents an umbrella group of the construction industry trade unions which numbers about 14 in total. For the record, I would like to share those with you: International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen; United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Labourers' International Union of Operating Engineers; International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades; United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing Steamfitting and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada; Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America; International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers; International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers; Millwrights and Machine Erectors; International Union of Elevator Constructors; International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers. Those are the 14 unions that come under the umbrella of the Building Trades Council.

I have had the pleasure in my term as a member of Parliament to interact with numerous individuals involved in the labour movement. However, it has been a fortunate experience for me to be able to deal with the Building Trades Council because of its presidents, Mr. Ed McNeil, Dan MacDonald and other individuals who have been associated with it over the years.

In 1984 the Conservative government was duly elected in the federal election and shortly thereafter in 1985 in a statement made by the Minister of Finance a sum of money was set aside, approximately $200 million, for a program for older workers' adjustment. Shortly thereafter this organization, in concert with myself, made representations to the Government of Canada and the province of Nova Scotia to make construction workers across the country part and parcel of this particular program. In particular I was advocating that those construction workers on the island of Cape Breton and in those particular unions become part and parcel of this plan.

Between 1985 and 1989 I have raised this issue repeatedly on the floor of the House of Commons, as my colleagues will attest to. I have asked the minister numerous questions. He has been forthcoming and said that there would be some dialogue and some negotiations between the two levels of government to see whether or not something could be consummated.

In 1990, just over a year ago, the Government of Nova Scotia indicated to the Building Trades Council that now, after almost five years of hard representations, it was coming to the view that perhaps it might be able to provide some assistance and agree to undertake with the federal government a program for older workers' adjustment in that province.

On October 11, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and Minister of State for Transport said: "We are not able to amend the current program for older workers immediately. Hopefully there may be some other measures that can be taken for construction workers in Cape Breton". That is where it died. Nothing concrete has been done by government representatives since it was first introduced in 1985.

Is there a need? In my district and in the adjoining districts there are approximately 4,500 individuals who are involved in the construction trades industry. Upwards of 85 per cent of those men and some women are unemployed with no prospect of retraining for meaningful jobs and no prospect for any type of employment in that particular province.

Think about it. You are 54 or 55 years of age, you have worked as a bricklayer, you have worked as a carpenter, you have worked as a labourer for 25 to 35 years, and you try to seek meaningful employment when the economy is at its knees and while 84 per cent of your colleagues are unemployed. What do you do? The hard reality is that there are no employment alternatives on the island of Cape Breton. There are no meaningful prospects of retraining for other employment. There are a good 500 to 600 individuals of those 4,500 who would be readily available and eligible for a program for older workers, yet the governments seem intent on not proceeding with that particular initiative.

There is a human face to this tragedy, a real human face. Lawyers like to talk about the Constitution and they like to talk about the provisions of discrimination, but there is no group in our society who are more discriminated against than the older worker. If you are 54 years of age and are a labourer or a bricklayer your prospects for meaningful employment with a company are basically nil, if the truth be known.

The building trades in my district put forward a number of questions to their membership. They asked whether these older workers can obtain enough work to qualify for a worth-while pension through their respective unions. The answer is no.

Can they keep up with the fast pace in the construction industry today as an older worker? The answer is no. Can they plan some easy times in the twilight of their lives? No. Can they qualify for the program for older workers adjustment? No. Can they retrain and have opportunities for other work? No.

Can they develop a "nobody wants me, nobody cares about me" attitude? Yes. Can they become reclusive? Yes. Can they develop physical and mental problems? Yes. Can they become suicidal? Yes. Can they increase medical costs to governments, both provincially and federally? Yes. Can their life-span be shortened? Yes. Can their cherished families be disrupted? Yes.

I know many of these individuals and they are good, solid, decent, dignified citizens who in their older years want to have the advantage of having a source of income in order to provide for their families and their loved ones, to live with a measure of dignity in terms of paying their mortgage and providing the necessities of life and the amenities you and I take for granted on a regular basis.

These are not crackpot individuals, incarcerated in jails, who have abused children or other individuals. They are the individuals who are involved in minor hockey and baseball. They are the ones who go out and raise money for the Cancer Society. They are the ones who volunteer their time at fire departments. They are the men and women who add meaning to the lives of others by visiting the sick and the elderly in hospitals. They are what I would call top quality Canadians and what they ask of their governments, both federal and provincial, is to be allowed to have a sense of dignity.

The provincial government took five years and the prospect of a provincial election to understand the seriousness of their request only to have the door slammed by the Minister of Labour in Ottawa. In fairness to the Minister of Labour he made himself available to meet with the Construction Building Trades Union and it representatives, but he slammed the door on them with the facetious, specious argument that construction workers cannot be included in the program for older workers' adjustment across the country because it would be too expensive.

The Government of Nova Scotia said clearly in a letter to the Minister of Labour that if it could not be done under the existing program it would amend the program under the terms of the legislation in order to have these individuals qualify. The Government of Canada slammed the door the third time.

• (1950)

I am not asking for $600 million to fund a project in a sensitive political area of this country. I am not seeking to bankroll a Crown corporation. What I am seeking on behalf of these men and these women in my district and through the island of Cape Breton is a sense of dignity for them and their families.

If the president of Petro-Canada, if the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation or the CBC or VIA Rail can get a fat-sized bonus, upwards to $80,000 in some instances, why can't you afford to pay $1,500 to $1,700 a month for a man or a woman who has contributed 30 years of their productive life to a community?

What is the problem? The problem as I see it is one of political will, of acknowledging, of supporting those men who have made a significant contribution. They are not lawyers, they are not doctors, they are not business people. But they are good solid citizens. Is it not high time that the Parliament of Canada acknowledged that?

Instead, what do we have? We have what I believe is an uncaring government. We have the likes of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would love to debate that minister on the rock in Cape Breton, or in his own constituency. He had the unmitigated gall to stand in the House earlier today and on previous days in the House of Commons and make reference to Bill C-21. These construction workers in Cape Breton were told by the Government of Canada "Go talk to Dingwall, go talk to MacLellan, go talk to LeBlanc, and, if we get Bill C-21 through there is probably $100 million or so to provide a cushy pension for you".

Bill C-21 went through, with my opposition Mr. Speaker, but there are no pensions, there is no program for older workers or adjustment for the construction worker in Cape Breton.

What a mean-spirited argument to put forward to people who are in desperate need.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time is somewhat limited, but I have to say to you and to members of this House that these are the kinds of issues that make Canadians very angry, when they see the President of Canada Post closing post offices and getting a bonus, terminating VIA Rail and getting a bonus, laying off people and getting a bonus. You work for 30 or 35 years of your life in a particular trade, contribute to your community, going to your church, contributing to your church, paying your taxes in order to educate your children, and what do you have? You have the parliamentary secretary over there talking about bingo. That is what he is talking about, bingo.

There is nothing wrong with bingo, Mr. Speaker, nothing wrong at all. That is the kind of attitude that those Canadians are confronted with by this government, and it is not fair. It is not fair. Is it any wonder the country is angry and mad, when those kinds of things can go on, when a bricklayer who may live in Glace Bay or a labourer who lives in Reserve or a painter who may live in Sydney, Nova Scotia, can not get the benefits of a program which was put down by the Government of Canada to assist those who are in real economic need.

I want to tell you again, Mr. Speaker, that it is not fair. It is not fair to those men, to their families or to the industry itself. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary would reflect on the desire to fulfil the need in his remarks and say to those individuals that "I will seriously review with the federal minister to open the door again and with the provincial minister in the province of Nova Scotia to open the door there in order to provide a pool of money and benefits for those who are involved in the construction industry".

Let us remember, 85 per cent of those individuals in the construction industry in that part of Nova Scotia are unemployed. Five hundred to 600 could avail themselves of that program today. The provincial government is on record as supporting them and wants to be a participant. It would even go so far as to amend the understanding between the federal and provincial governments in order to include them.

They are men and women who have contributed greatly to our society. There is no hope of retraining for other jobs because there are no other jobs. The need has clearly been demonstrated. If you do not believe me, Mr. Speaker, talk to your friends in the Upper House. The former premier of the province of Nova Scotia, a Tory premier, has even alluded to and concurred in the fact there is a real need there.

I ask the parliamentary secretary in good faith with great sincerity on behalf of those individuals, will he not now do the honourable thing and open the door, proceed with negotiations and consummate an agreement which will be effective in delivering a program for older workers adjustment to the construction workers in my district, in the island of Cape Breton and elsewhere in other provinces where they may want to be negotiated.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to the motion from the member from Nova Scotia. It proposes that the government extend certain provisions and benefits of the program for older workers adjustment to include Canadians employed in the construction industry.

I should mention from the outset that this program does treat the construction industry like all others.

The argument or debate that was carried forward by the previous speaker was a very emotional one. I am sure it is one that caught the attention of all the people back home and I guess that was what it was meant for. This is an emotional topic. There is not one of us in this House who would not want to see any particular program extended to take in all considerations, all groups of people.

The POWA, the adjustment program that we are speaking about, was brought in by this government, not the other side of the House. We brought it in because we recognize the problem. There is not a riding in this country that has not been affected by the lay-off of older workers. My riding is the same as yours, Mr. Speaker. I will tell you it is almost punishing for a member of Parliament to witness that in their own riding. Many of these workers cannot be retrained. They are beyond the point of being retrained.

As the member mentioned, you can see the disappearance of their livelihood, the disappearance of their whole life. We do not want to see that happen. We want to see this program continue.

The fact is that it is working very well. Can it work better? Obviously it can. At the end of the day it requires dollars to make this program work. The member mentioned the $200 million that was put into the program originally and it was put in by this government. It is a federal-provincial program. I think the member should have mentioned the percentages and how it plays out in terms of dollars. The federal government contributes 70 per cent of the cost of that program, and we do work in co-operation with the provinces, no question about it. If there is an individual need in a particular province and they want to bring it to our attention, we are more than willing to look at it and to work with them co-operatively to solve the problem.

I want to go through the criteria for the individuals who are on that program. I think it points out very, very clearly that we are sensitive to that problem as a government. To be eligible for benefits, workers from a designated lay-off, and it is very important that I use that term—Mr. Speaker, if I could have your attention for a minute. When the gentleman across the aisle spoke every one of us over here had the respect to listen. We did not shout, we did not try to scream him down, and I would expect the same courtesy to focus on the speakers on this side of the House.

The key words are "designated lay-off". With a designated lay-off for the workers to qualify they must be between the ages of 55 and 64 at the time of the lay-off. They must have worked a minimum of 750 hours per year for 15 years of the preceding 20 years. In addition, candidates must be Canadian citizens or landed immigrants and they must have no alternative job opportunities.

One of the things that is confusing the member opposite is the fact that he mentions construction workers. He is speaking about 4,000 to 4,500 construction workers. The real problem is unemployment itself. Now, he can blame the government for that and I guess we have got to take our share of responsibility. But out of that 4,500 workers—if you could give me just a minute.

Could I get unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to continue?

Mr. James: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is unanimous consent to carry on the full hour to 25 after? There are a number of speakers who want to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being eight o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-39, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Danis (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from people in Dubuisson, Malartic, Joutel, Sullivan and Val-d'Or, who respectfully submit that the Canada Labour Code must comply with the principles set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore must protect women's rights.

For these reasons, they ask Parliament, when it reviews the Canada Labour Code, to consider seriously the deficiencies in it and to recognize the need to include in the Code clauses concerning the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): I have a second petition, Madam Speaker, from people in Cornwall, St. Andrews and Summerstown, Ontario, concerning firearms. They say that the accessibility of firearms is a key factor in homicides, accidents and suicides. Many types of firearms that are easily available in Canada are not necessary for legitimate purposes like hunting and competitive shooting. They ask Parliament to legislate now to ban everyone with a criminal record from owning a firearm.

[English]

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, I am presenting a petition today on behalf of citizens of Canada who are deeply concerned about the situation in Yugoslavia.

They are aware of the representations made by the Government of Canada to the United Nations to intervene to cease the violence. They are outraged about the crimes of humanity that are evident there and they desire the independence of Croatia and Slovenia.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, for the residents of Barriére and Louis Creek, British Columbia. They point out their concerns regarding the announced intention to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, thereby directing water into the San Diego, California area.

They are asking the Government of Canada to state simply, once and for all, that our rivers in this country are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, the citizens of the city of Kamloops are concerned that the government has indicated plans presumably to curtail support for the RCMP at present levels.

They point out that these cuts would reduce and erode the service and effectiveness of police protection in their communities. They are asking the Government of Canada to restore and maintain proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for many communities across British Columbia and remain a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

RU-486

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present a petition to the House today which requests that this government address the issue of drug RU-486. The petitioners are concerned that this drug, which causes the abortion of human foetuses at an early stage of development, will be introduced into Canada.

The petitioners therefore call upon the Government of Canada to withhold approval of RU-486 and prevent the marketing and/or testing of this drug to ensure that it may not at some future date be used to induce abortions.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which has been circulated around Canada. The people who have signed this petition are in favour of the use of the port of Churchill.

From the province of Manitoba we have petitions from Brandon, Churchill, Rapid City, Cranberry, Portage and The Pas; from Saskatchewan we have petitions from Harris, Zealandia, Sturgis—including the mayor and council of that community—Norquay, Regina, North Battleford, Liberty, Imperial, Stalwart, Porcupine Plain, Tisdale, Biggar, Kamsack and Prince Albert; and from Ontario, Don Mills.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to make sure that the port of Churchill is used and that we recognize in the changing world situation that it provides a unique opportunity for the federal government to develop, expand and promote further the indisputable potential of Canada's only inland sea port.

Further they point out that there is a need for the federal government to act immediately to develop a strategy in order to utilize this important seaport to ship exports as well as grain.

Wherefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the House of Commons to direct the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to ensure that for the upcoming shipping season usage of the port of Churchill be maximized at the very least for 3 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipments through the port of Churchill and that the government act immediately to maintain, further develop and promote the port to handle exports in addition to grain.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present to this House today. Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present some petitions from public servants who, of course, express their great disappointment with the Conservative government's attitude in the dispute of recent weeks concerning public servants' salaries.

[English]

AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I have another petition which is signed by a number of farmers in the province of Ontario who want to make this government aware that they are very dissatisfied with the low levels of commodity, grain and oilseed prices in this country and that they are expecting some relief from the federal government. They want this assistance to be this year, not some decade in the future.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition from a number of Canadian residents in Toronto, Brampton, Scarborough and Downsview who are concerned with the continuing policy of this government to carry on low level flight training over Nitassinan, the land of the Innu people in Labrador and Quebec.

• (1020)

They ask this Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu and other aboriginal peoples of Canada in opposing the use of their lands anywhere in Canada for NATO and NORAD attack training and to demand that the Canadian government end all NATO and NORAD low level flight training in Canada and redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 36, I am pleased to table a petition in the House signed by residents of British Columbia regarding plans by Multinational Resources to dam the North Thompson river.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale. This is a particularly important issue for the residents of Valemount in my constituency.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Routine Proceedings

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 52 and pursuant to the notice which the Chair received earlier this morning and which it now has, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, that this House engage in an emergency debate on the escalating crisis in Yugoslavia.

Very briefly, Dubrovnik in the last 36 hours has come under heavy artillery rocket fire attack by the Yugoslav army and navy. The bombing has caused extensive damage to the centre of that city, the ancient medieval city known as the Pearl of the Adriatic. It marks the first destruction of that old city despite the fact that it was established in the 14th century, survived the Turkish expansion and two world wars. The attacks seem to be intensifying hourly, according to my information.

The old walled city has been recognized by UNESCO as a class o cultural monument of world international importance along with things like the pyramids. In a less vicious way the city has been under siege for the past 25 days. I understand there are presently over 65,000 civilians taking refuge within its walls. It has been under bombardment by land, air and sea, as I have said, for 36 hours. I would point out that the Yugoslav army became a signatory to international law in 1955, a law that requires the protection of cultural historic monuments of world importance and significance.

All this is happening 24 hours after the Yugoslav army general flatly rejected participation by the European community brokered peace plan. At the same time the army, as I understand it, condoned a mobilization of reservists in an all-out offensive on the democratic republic of Croatia.

In those indicated circumstances, especially given what has happened in the past 36 hours, I would ask that the Chair consider under Standing Order 52 the granting of an emergency debate.

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Speaker and I discussed this situation very seriously earlier this morning. We are very aware of the gravity of what is happening in Yugoslavia now. Nevertheless, we believe that it might be wise for all three parties to discuss this situation together and agree among themselves that the House should discuss this subject in the very near future. However, we do not consider it appropriate to interrupt the debate planned for today; this does not mean, though, that in the very near future, the Chair would not see fit to do so.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls) moved:

That this House condemn the government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces, thereby threatening the stability of health care and education, and further condemn the government for its destructive policies toward the fishery, the railway and the post office.

He said: Madam Speaker, today we will be asking the Chair to permit us to reduce the time of our speeches on this side of the House to 10 minutes each, followed by a 5-minute question and answer period. A lot of members on this side want to express their opinions and lay upon the table of the House the facts regarding transfer and equalization payments from the federal government to the four provincial governments in Atlantic Canada.

Our chairman of the Atlantic caucus, the hon. member for Dartmouth will in a few moments outline our main concerns with government policy. Later the hon. member for Burin—St. George's will outline as well the problems we are having with transfer payments, the fishery and other things of major concern to the province of Newfoundland.

One of our colleagues from New Brunswick will outline the substantial reduction in transfer payments. The news has quoted a $100 million reduction to the province of New Brunswick.

Another colleague from Prince Edward Island will be able to lay on the table of this House the most recent figures on transfer payments.

My colleague from Prince Edward Island will be able to show that there has been a substantial reduction in the equalization payments from the federal government to certain provincial governments in Atlantic Canada. This is according to figures from the federal Department of Finance that were given to members of Parliament just a couple of days ago. In other words, they are up-to-date figures for October of this year. We are requesting, Madam Speaker, that you recognize us for 10 minutes at a time so that we can present the case as strongly as possible to the Canadian people and to the Government of Canada that they need a major policy change.

The major point that I want to make in introducing the debate relates, as our motion says, to the destructive policies of the Government of Canada toward our major industries. One of my colleagues from Cape Breton Island will be speaking later in this debate and showing how the sale of the railway by the Government of Canada is threatening a forest products industry on Cape Breton Island located in Port Hawkesbury. He will present to the House the facts of the potential loss of hundreds and hundreds of jobs.

I have two pieces of paper in my hand. One is a news release by the Government of Canada issued two days ago and the other is a communication from the Soviet Union to a department of the federal government.

• (1030)

The press release that was issued just two days ago said that Canada has notified the Government of Japan of the approval of licences permitting seven Japanese vessels to fish a portion of Japan's international quota for blue fin tuna in Canadian division 3-0. Two days ago Canada notified the Government of Japan that seven of its fishing vessels can come inside our 200-mile zone this year and fish a portion of their international quota for tuna in competition with our Canadian fishermen.

Of course the reason why this was made in a news release was because it goes on to say that last year they allowed 16 vessels in from Japan. Then they go on in the news release and say that it was only five or six years ago that they allowed in 100 vessels. They brag about the fact that they are now allowing in only seven Japanese vessels. It is quite a statement to make because the quotas have not changed. You could allow in seven vessels 200-feet long and it is the same as 100 vessels 30-feet long.

The quotas for this year agreed to by the Canadian government stand at 1,300 tonnes to the U.S.A., 700 tonnes to Japan, and 550 tonnes to Canada for that fish stock. We are saying to our Canadian fishermen: "You cannot have any more licences. Your quota is frozen at 560 tonnes. You are not allowed to have any more licences but you can come and fish inside our 200-mile zone in 1992 while our fishery is in such disarray".

I went over the figures for before coming here today with the department. They showed that last year Japan not only caught its blue fin tuna inside our 200-mile zone but it caught unlimited amounts of albacore tuna, swordfish, big-eyed tuna, yellow fin tuna: unlimited quotas for big eye and yellow fin. We say to the Government of Canada: "Open your big eye. Forget your yellow fin and kick them out".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: The second piece of paper—I guess I am getting close to my limit—is a list of foreign nations. There are 12 and then there are others that have been given quotas by this government for 1992 all around the coasts of our Atlantic provinces.

There is not only tuna, but there is codfish, red fish, American plaice, yellowtail, witch, capelin and squid. As if that were not enough, every member of the Liberal Party in this House and I have a copy of the scientific advice because we asked for it. Our scientists and those of the U.S.S.R. and the Scandinavian countries sat down in a meeting in Halifax, Nova Scotia. They told the representatives of our government and every other government listed on this paper to stop it. They told them that for a zone called 3-M to continue the moratorium.

Do you know what the Government of Canada did? It did not continue a moratorium because it is a nursing ground for fish. It assigned quotas of 13,000 tonnes. It gave eight foreign nations 12,865 tonnes and Canada 100 tonnes off the coast of Canada.

What is wrong with the fishery? It is not the water, the ice, the cold water or the plankton. The fault is the Government of Canada. It is destroying our industries. It has reduced our equalization payments. It should be ashamed of itself. We hope it will listen to our arguments today and change its policies.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls for such an interesting display of facts. He has demonstrated the sadness of the situation by his presentation.

I also thank him for the overture to this orchestra this morning and afternoon which is going to be to come clean with Newfoundlanders, Atlantic Canadians and the Canadian public in this House. It will show what devastation and demoralization has been caused to Atlantic Canada by this government and its destructive policies.

We do amazing things when we are upset about policies. I will talk about the subject the hon. member mentioned. I know it is dear to his heart. The total allowable catch for fish in Atlantic Canada last year—

Mr. Mazankowski: TAC.

Mr. Mifflin: TAC. I appreciate the minister's intervention. I am amazed at his knowledge. I really am.

The total allowable catch was 190,000 tonnes last year. Foreign overfishing, not fishing but overfishing which is fishing that they are not supposed to be doing, accounted for 150,000 tonnes. That is almost equal to the amount of fish allowed to be caught off our own coastline.

I asked a question of the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I know that my colleague is very much associated with this. I would like to give him the answer I got and I would like him to comment on it.

The answer I got was: "The hon. member says we allow foreigners. The hon. member should come clean with Canadians". I should come clean with Canadians and tell them that no foreign trawlers are allowed within the 200-mile economic zone, except according to the rules of NAFO, and that is the reality. If that is the reality, how in the name of the Lord can we account for 150,000 tonnes of overfishing?

I would like the hon. member to comment on that.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is going to be laying his evidence on the table of this House later on in this debate today. He represents a riding in which fishermen have been arrested day after day. Some 22 vessels have been arrested recently. Most of them were from the hon. member's riding.

The minister of fisheries is behaving like Terminator II, going out there and grabbing every one of his fishing vessels in 3-O. The Spanish and those of every other foreign nation were left alone because they claimed they were not fishing and because the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to give permission before they are boarded but not before the Canadian vessels are boarded. Under the NAFO quotas the foreign nations receive 150,000 tonnes legally, licensed by the Canadian government. There is an additional 209,000 tonnes of Canada managed fish stock on the east coast of Canada last year that were assigned to foreign nations that were so-called in excess of Canada's needs. That adds up to 350,000 tonnes.

The hon. member is right about the northern cod stock, the 190,000 tonne quota. The foreigners were catching 150,000 tonnes outside of that. When you add up the total take of fish in all parts of eastern Canada the foreigners are legally able to take almost as much as the entire Canadian fishing industry.

I want to illustrate it by concluding with this and to tell the hon. member that a letter was sent from the Soviet Union to Canada. I have a copy of it. It is dated March 22, 1991 and says: "The Soviet side undertakes to consider the terms of an exchange with the Canadian side of part of 3NO cod quota for additional Canadian allocations".

The Soviet Union, given cod inside our 200-mile zone for this year, given cod by this government, writes to the Canadian government saying that perhaps they will give up some of it if they are given some other type of fish assigned by the Government of Canada.

Our fishermen are wondering if they have to get a foreign flag to fly on their boats in order to be able to fish off the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, it is not with a great deal of pleasure that I speak in this debate today. I believed when I first got elected here that the Government of Canada had a responsibility to govern all of the citizens of the country with fairness and equity in mind. It is becoming increasingly apparent, particularly over the last few days, that that sense of fairness, equality and duty are no longer there.

I would like to try to give some indication to the House and to those people who are watching exactly why we in the Atlantic, a vital part of this country, absolutely condemn and reject this government's economic policies. It has amounted to nothing short of an absolute assault and battery on each and every individual Canadian that is living in any region of this country outside of the have provinces, but most particularly those that live in the region of Atlantic Canada.

Back in 1988 when the government came into power it tried to cleanse its record of neglect in dealing with Atlantic Canadian economic issues. Just prior to that, in 1987, the Prime Minister made a major announcement saying that his government, as it was constitutionally bound to be, was in support of the principle of equalization, and the way that they were going to pursue their program of equalization was clearly going to be with a new program. I am going to quote the Prime Minister when he announced the $1.05 billion which was going to be the panacea for the economic ills of Atlantic Canada. He announced the creation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and he said: "We begin with new money, a new mission, and a new opportunity".

My, my, my, Madam Speaker, just a few years later how those words ring hollow.

The facts, which I am going to present, will show very clearly that this government and the statements of the Prime Minister back in 1987 have been absolutely contradicted by its actions.

The reason we are debating this today is that just a few days ago the provincial premiers in Atlantic Canada found that because of a quirk or a change or a formula that was kicking in in the equalization program, the amount of money they expected to get this current year would be diminished by over $170 million. It is not $170,000, but $170 million to Canada's poorest region, a place where there are only 2.2 million or 2.3 million people.

I want to make everyone aware of what equalization is. It is an unconditional—I want to underline that—an unconditional transfer to the provinces. What is it there for? It is there to ensure that the constitutional requirement that Canadians no matter where they live have a right to expect programs of a national standard are able to be maintained. That is what it is there for. In provinces like Newfoundland where the unemployment rate is 70 per cent above the national average; in Prince Edward Island where the per capita income is 32 per cent less than the national average, the government, the Minister of Finance's own press secretary two days ago came out and said: "It is $170 million in cuts, so what. We've got $170 million in cuts because the economies are performing so well in Atlantic Canada". What utter nonsense and what arrogance.

Tell that to the fisherman who is going to face a winter on welfare, if he can get welfare from nearly bankrupt municipalities in Atlantic Canada. Tell that to the people who are waiting for hospital beds in parts of Atlantic Canada because the provincial government's do not have the fiscal ability any more with the cuts that have taken place to provide quality health care of national standards. Tell that to the students who because of rising tuitions and no job opportunities in Atlantic Canada cannot pursue their post-secondary education.

This government has struck at the very heart of what this country is all about in its crazy attempt to impose its fiscal regime and straitjacket on all Canadians.

It was Liberal governments which put in these programs that believed in the principle of equality and fairness, that believed in equalization and sought and got it put right into our Constitution in 1982. It is part of our Constitution. It is not part of some other piece of legislation that can be easily amended or changed by a majority in this place. National standards are part of our Constitution.

Previous Liberal governments believed it was important to redistribute wealth not just through equalization but through a process called economic regional development agreements whereby the federal government became a partner in the poorest provinces in this country in putting forward programs in fisheries development, quality enhancement, not just welfare payments. Money was put into programs to ensure that our fisheries was more efficient. Money was put into our forestry for silviculture so that it truly was a renewable resource. Money was put into special manpower training and mineral development and mineral exploration agreements because it was a real attempt—which was starting to work—to make sure that those regions were have regions, not just regions that constantly were on their knees begging a benevolent Ontario for more money. That was the principle.

Between 1984 and 1989 there was $114 million worth of agreements. I am wrong, $1.144 billion worth of agreements that expired, in 1984 dollars. They provided tens of thousands of jobs in Atlantic Canada. What did this government do? Did it do the right thing? Did it go back in and renew those agreements? Maybe it did. It provided $272 million which would be the equivalent to probably about $150 million, 10 per cent, almost, which is a 90 per cent reduction in funding available for regional development agreements. That has caused us a crippling blow in Atlantic Canada.

In addition to that it came out with freezes on EPFs. That is transfers to the provinces for Established Programs Financing, programs in health care and programs in post-secondary education, which is a little different from equalization. These dollars are specifically to go to those provinces to ensure that the men, women and children who live in those provinces have programs of national standards in health care and programs of national standards in post-secondary education, a principle that this country was born on and that it developed on.

What does this government do? It walks in and it cuts. Boy did it cut. It cut to the quick. For example, in little Prince Edward Island the effect of the freeze on any increase in EPFs, means this to every one of you people out there in P.E.I. Sixteen million dollars less will come in for hospitals and health care in P.E.I. this year, $7 million less will come in for post-secondary education. My goodness, there are only 130,000 odd souls in Prince Edward Island. Have you any idea what the effect of these callous and cold cuts in EPF are having on the ability of provincial governments to deliver those services with national standards?

• (1050)

In Nova Scotia, $111 million less will be transferred through EPFs to support health care. In Newfoundland, there will be $29 million less for post-secondary education. Do you wonder why we are standing in this House today and saying that this government has gone absolutely against our very own Constitution here.

The government will tell you that regional disparity is not really a problem, that it has improved the relative standing of the Atlantic. I want to read this quickly: "In 1988, unemployment in Newfoundland was 53 per cent higher than the national average in 1982, but had increased to a level of 110 per cent higher as of 1988." That is a real measure of regional disparity. The regions in the Atlantic provinces are not closing the gap, the gap is getting bigger. Each time this government comes in with regressive, Draconian cuts, like it did yesterday or the day before, it gets worse.

I wish I had two days to speak on this, but I do not, I have about 30 seconds. I want to finish by quoting one thing here. I am quoting from the Constitution Act, Part III, Section 36 which is the mandate of the Government and the people of Canada. It states:

> (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;
> (b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and
> (c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that what this government has done with the series of cuts that it has undertaken over the last two years has been tantamount to violating the Constitution of this country. What it has done is ensure that there are two classes of Canadians, those that have and those that have not. Unfortunately those have not mostly reside in Atlantic Canada. We will have no more of it.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the speeches of the member from Gander—Grand Falls and, as well, the member for Dartmouth.

What they have shown is that this government's economic policies are bankrupt. It shows that we are selling out our natural resources to foreign countries. I think it is unacceptable for Canada. The government is not defending the rights of Canadians.

What the government is doing, like in the free trade agreement, is selling out without tough bargaining and I cannot accept that and Albertans cannot accept that either.

So I would like to congratulate both members for their speeches.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have not had the privilege of hearing all of the comments of my friends opposite. I have to say I was struck by the comments on the Constitution and what was unconstitutional and what was not, having just left the constitution committee meeting down the hall and not intending to enter into this.

I would like to draw two points to the House's attention. Last week in Bell Island in my constituency, I was attending a fund raising dinner sponsored by the Bell Island Economic Development Committee on behalf of the Wabana Boys and Girls Club. The guest speaker was the Hon. Clyde Wells. He is a man I have differed on many issues with, but a man that I have a considerable respect for, enhanced, if I may say, by his comments recently on the Constitution. I have to say that the man flabbergasted me, perhaps not for the first time, but I sat and listened to the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador talk about the fiscal position, the reduced expectations and the changes in transfer payments. However, the point that he was making to 100 people in that room was that the position of the Government of Canada was responsible and the only one that was acceptable under the conditions that we face.

I just throw that to the floor. I was as aghast as I know my friend from Grand Falls—Gander would be. I know he shares the view of the premier, as he does on many things.

I do want to say one thing, and I know the minister intends to talk about some of the things my friend from Dartmouth has said, particularly in terms of numbers and the cuts as opposed to reductions and increases.

I think it is essential to know that the commitment of this government, and I think the commitment of this House in the constitutional sense to regional disparity, is entrenched in the concept of equalization and the sharing of resources is absolutely essential.

I look forward to the discussion of that concept in the constitutional context, not only as it reflects the position of the Government of Canada, but the position of the other two main line parties in this House.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that my colleague from St. John's has entered into the debate. He is an Atlantic Canadian and he knows full well that Atlantic Canada has been able to develop and prosper because of Liberal policies such as equalization and fiscal transfers. He knows that full well. He sits on the side of the government that has done everything in its power to dismantle those economic tools of nation building.

Madam Speaker, anybody who tries to tell you that a constitution has nothing to do with economies is crazy. If peoples' economic well being is looked after, they are probably going to be able to find accommodations and compromises on those other things that divide us and which are currently the subject of great debate across this country as to whether or not we can truly stay together.

As far as the comments by that great Liberal Clyde Wells are concerned, I am certain that Premier Wells is in a very difficult position. He is dealing with a federal government that has basically bankrupted the country because of its fiscal mismanagement. Clyde Wells probably tells the truth in this case. Clyde Wells says he can understand what is going on, because these members opposite, the government opposite, has virtually bankrupted the country.

Many would argue that we are no longer a viable, competitive force internationally because of the high dollar, high tax and high interest rate policy of this government. So I can understand Clyde Wells.

I want to make one final comment, since the hon. member wants to talk about the Constitution. The Prime Minister of this country is very good for giving very verbose comments on the national and international stage about competitiveness. When these new constitutional proposals were put down in this House, he also put some papers down talking about a new economic renewal in Canada. Madam Speaker, if what we have seen over the last two years is any indication of his new economic vision, I can say firmly, and I know with the support of a majority of the people in Atlantic Canada, if that is their vision, thank you but no thank you, your vision is our nightmare.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate because the motion and the comments that have been made in speaking to the motion are misleading and inaccurate. It gives me an opportunity to set the record straight.

The issue of the equalization recalculation is not a surprise. It is not a quirk. It is not a change in policy. It is a fact of life. It has been there for many years, since equalization has been in place. There are no surprises. All the provincial governments involved know this. Their officials have been well aware of this. This is a very normal occurrence. For hon. members to express outrage is totally erroneous and misleading and not in accordance with the facts.

I want to deal with three specific points in addressing this issue, Madam Speaker.

The first point is this. We are not slashing, we are not robbing and we are not massively reducing transfer payments. That is categorical. The fact is that we are increasing transfer payments. We have increased them enormously and we will continue to increase them. As a matter of fact, in 1984–85 total transfers to the provinces including cash and tax transfer points amounted to $25.6 billion. In 1992–93 the projections are $38.1 billion, which means there will be an increase over that period of time of $12.5 billion. Common sense and logic would tell you that that is not a reduction, that is an increase and that fact has to be made.

• (1100)

I could go through each and every one of the components that make this up. EPF, which we have heard so much about, Established Programs Financing which provides assistance to the provinces for health, welfare and education, in 1984–85, the figure was $14.568 billion. This year, the figure is $20.368 billion and in 1992–93, they will continue their rise and will reach $20.620 billion.

How these members can stand up in this House and condemn the government for reducing transfer payments and do it with a straight face is beyond me. I do not understand it. Surely, this is a time when we should have an honest debate. There has got to be some integrity restored in this institution if it is going to have any credibility.

It is starting right there.

An hon. member: Be nice.

Mr. Mazankowski: When you lay out the facts and speak the truth in here, they get fidgety because they are paranoid. They continue to mislead.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Mazankowski: Maybe it is not deliberately, but it becomes habit forming. It is time to set the record straight, and that is the first point that I want to make.

An hon. member: That applies to you.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member over there, as long as he is dishing it out, he does not mind. He thinks it is a great place.

When you take them on and set the record straight, they either run for cover or they try to interrupt you, or try to shout you down.

The second point that I want to make is this. The expenditure restraint plan that is put in place has restricted the growth of fiscal transfers. That is true. We have asked everyone to become part of the solution in terms of dealing with the huge deficit and debt problem, and I think all hon. members recognize that.

All we are really asking everyone to do, and we are asking the provinces to do as we are trying to do, which is to contain the level of expenditures at the same percentage level of increase on an annualized basis in transfer payments as we are in terms of our over-all program payments.

We are containing our increase in program payments roughly in the area of 3 per cent and we are asking that these transfers be contained roughly in that percentage as well, but there are exceptions. One of those exceptions is, in fact, the equalization and the point that the hon. members are trying to take issue with here in terms of the transfers to the provinces under equalization.

The equalization program transfers have been exempted under the Expenditure Restraint Program. As a matter of fact, this happens to be the fastest growing expenditure in government. It is the fastest growing expenditure in government at an annualized rate of 8.3 per cent. It is 8.3 per cent on an annualized basis. As a matter of fact, since 1984–85 when we came into office, the growth of expenditures under equalization have increased by 61 per cent.

These guys across the way are trying to suggest that we are massively reducing and robbing from the provinces. That is absolute nonsense. If we have a situation where Canadians watch this institution, I think they believe what they hear. I plead with Canadians. We will document every fact that I am outlining here in the House today. Let us look at it.

Equalization: In 1984–85, the total expenditure was $5.422 billion. For this year, it is expected that that will rise to $8.465 billion and next year it will rise to $9.048 billion. Madam Speaker, I ask you: Does that sound like a reduction? Does that sound like a massive reduction? No. It is a massive increase.

The hon. member for Dartmouth just finished criticizing us for our economic policy. He said: "This government's high tax, high interest, high dollar policy, is destroying—". Interest rates are down. He wasn't around here 10 years ago today, Madam Speaker, when the prime rate was 22.75 per cent. As a matter of fact, 10 years ago today, the five-year mortgage—listen to this—the five-year mortgage was 21.75 per cent. Even when his leader was in office in 1979, the chartered prime rate was 12 per cent. The chartered bank rate today is 9 per cent, the lowest in 13 years.

He wants to raise taxes. Where are you going to get the money from? You want to spend more money; tell us where you are going to raise the money. Tell us where you are going to raise the money. If you are so good as resolving regional disparities, how come you did nothing about it in 25 years when your government was in office? Where were you? You didn't conceive of a program like ACOA.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Defend your own record, you are the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Mazankowski: I certainly will, and I will tell you it is a heck of a lot easier meeting a 9 per cent prime rate than a 22.75 per cent rate. I can tell you that any day.

What does this mean in terms of equalization grants on a per capita basis? Let us lay this out on the table, Madam Speaker, because I think Canadians have a right to know.

Equalization per capita, that is per person, 1991-92, the province of Newfoundland, $1,649 per person; the province of Prince Edward Island, $1,531; the province of Nova Scotia, $1,050; the province of New Brunswick, $1,201; the province of Quebec, $554; the province of Manitoba, $896; Saskatchewan, $498; and, of course, the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia get nothing because they are classified as the so-called have provinces.

I put these figures on the table because it clearly demonstrates that Atlantic Canada is getting the most out of the equalization payments on a per capita basis. I think that has to be clearly put on the record.

The third point I want to make is that the best guarantee to preserve our health care and education system across the country is to renew economic growth and sustained recovery with price stability, but for that to happen we have got to identify and get at the root causes of our problems, and that is to bring interest rates down. Interest rates are the key to stimulating economic growth. In order to get interest rates down, you must bring inflation down and you must bring the growth of expenditures down. You must tackle the deficit and you must tackle inflation.

This government has done both. We are making progress on both fronts. We must make progress on both fronts if we are going to lead to a sustained economic recovery.

I am pleased over the fact that over the last six month period the annualized rate of inflation was 2.5 per cent. I think it is better than any of us ever expected. That is very fundamental and very important if we are going to achieve two goals, the goal of price stability and the continuing decline in interest rates.

Our interest rates have gone down by almost 600 basis points or 6 per cent since the high of May 1990. The deficit and the way in which we manage our fiscal affairs is very, very vital and integral to identifying and tackling this problem. We must continue along the program of government expenditure restraint. We must continue to ratchet down the deficit. Our plan is to bring the deficit down to a level somewhere in the order of $25 billion in the next fiscal year, and by 1994-95 we will be in a position, hopefully, where we will not have to continue to borrow to meet our essential needs. At that point in time we can start paying down the debt.

This requires tough decisions. Everyone has to be a part of the solution. I am glad the hon. member for Don Mill is here, because I respect his interest in economic issues and I respect the fact that he attempts on every occasion to be constructive in dealing with these issues.

If we look at where we were prior to 1984-1985, the Government of Canada was spending $1.33 for every dollar of revenue it was collecting. That could not continue. We had to put a stop to that. We are now in a position where probably Canadians are getting less than $1 worth of service from their government for the dollar they are paying in terms of taxation. That will continue until we can bring our deficit and our debt under control.

These are tough decisions and these are tough times. I am sure that we have the will, the resolve and the wherewithal to deal with it. I recognize that there are difficulties out there. I recognize that there are unemployment problems. I am sensitive to the needs of Atlantic Canada, whether it is in the fisheries sector, the transportation sector or broadening the economic base, just as I am interested in broadening the economic base of western Canada and ensuring that there is growth, economic activity and job opportunities right across this country.

I want to deal with the equalization issue. Just for the record and before I get to the equalization issue, I want to put some other figures on the table because I believe this too is very important. I want to reiterate simply the growth of federal transfers since 1984-1985.

This is the total major federal transfers of EPF, Established Programs Financing, equalization and CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan. In 1984-1985 Newfoundland, on a per capita basis, was receiving $1,617 out of all these programs. In 1991-1992, it is receiving $2,473 per person.

An hon. member: Oh, imagine. That is a 60 per cent increase.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member singled out Prince Edward Island as being so hard done by, by this government. In 1984-1985—and that was part of the Liberal regime; it was the leftovers of the Liberal regime—every Prince Edward Island resident was getting $1,656. Today, in 1991-1992, every Prince Edward Island resident is getting $2,417.

Let us go to New Brunswick. In 1984–1985 every New Brunswick resident was receiving $1,443 from the federal government. Today they are receiving $2,154.

An hon. member: No wonder they can balance their budget.

Mr. Mazankowski: In 1984–1985 every Nova Scotia resident was receiving $1,362. Today they are receiving $1,938. In Manitoba in 1984–1985 they received, on a per capita basis, $1,115 and today it is $1,718. In Quebec in 1984–1985, $1,256 and today $1,534. In Saskatchewan in 1984–1985, $727 per capita and today $1,304.

An hon. member: That is double.

Mr. Mazankowski: In British Columbia, $794 in 1984–1985 and in 1991–1992, $1,004. In Alberta 1984–1985, $726 per capita; today, 1991–1992, $982; and in the case of Ontario, $689 per person in 1984–1985 and $966 in 1991–1992.

I think that gives some idea of the fact that we are not cutting back; we are massively increasing. As a matter of fact transfers from the federal government to the Atlantic Provinces in the case of Prince Edward Island account for 42.3 per cent of their total government revenues. In the case of Newfoundland federal transfers account for 45.5 per cent of its total government revenues. In the case of Nova Scotia, federal government transfers account for 42 per cent of the total government revenues. In the case of New Brunswick, 39 per cent of its provincial revenues flow from the taxpayers of Canada, not the federal Government of Canada. I ask you, Madam Speaker: Is there an injustice there? Are we short changing our friends in the Atlantic region? The figures do not bear it out.

Let me deal briefly with the equalization issue. That is what has triggered this debate. This debate has not been triggered because there has been any massive reduction in equalization payments. It has been triggered by a normal recalculation that takes place on an ongoing basis.

Just to refresh our memory, the equalization program is designed to enable the provincial governments to provide reasonably comparable public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation. It is a vital example of our national spirit of equality and mutual support. As hon. members have pointed out it is enshrined in the Constitution. We consider it to be very important. It is part of the sense of equality in giving Canadians equal opportunity and equal services across the country.

I repeat again equalization is not being cut. It has not been cut this year. It has not been cut last year and it is not going to be cut in the years ahead. In fact the entitlements of provinces for 1991–92 are expected to rise by $250 million over the last year's level, as I have said, for a total of $8.3 billion or $8.4 billion. It will be expected to increase to $9.48 billion in the year 1992–93.

As I said, while we have had program expenditure increases of roughly 3.6 per cent or 3.5 per cent, this program has been the fastest growing program of all government programs, growing at an annualized rate of 8.3 per cent.

We can talk until we are blue in the face, criticize the formula and criticize the legislation, but all that is happening here is that we are applying the legislation. It is a normal procedure. Equalization payments are provided to the eligible provinces in advance on the basis of the best guessed estimates and a preliminary set of standards, and as more accurate information becomes available these adjustments are made.

This process is well understood by the provinces. It happens twice a year, usually in February and October. Often it means in most cases that we have to make additional payments to the provinces. Other times it shows that they have been overpaid. For example, in 1982–83 the adjustments under the formula meant that Saskatchewan owed the federal government approximately $100 million. I did not hear any outcry from the folks who occupied the Treasury benches then but in 1988–89, as I said in the House the other day, and in 1989–90 all provinces received positive adjustments: $1 billion in 1988–89 and $720 million in the next year.

This time the revised calculations show that four provinces, including three of the four Atlantic provinces, have received more that the formula allows and some will be entitled to more. For example, the provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan will receive more. The others will receive less.

There are further adjustments that will take place down the road, so that may all balance out. A decrease in equalization is caused by a reduction in current year entitlements and a decrease in entitlements for previous years, so the adjustment is done over the immediate year plus previous years gone by.

Under the rules of equalization these loans have to be recovered. It also contains a provision to ensure that the repayment of these adjustments do not impose undue hardships on the provinces. The recoveries are made over the balance of the fiscal year and can be extended into further fiscal years.

Unlike when the federal government is asked to divvy up more it has to pay immediately, but in this particular case time is provided.

As other hon. members have indicated this is a subject that could go on and on. One could use 20 to 30 minutes more in a debate like this. but I thought it was important to lay out the facts in a very statistical way to set the record straight. I hope my hon. friends opposite will not mind that.

• (1120)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister.

A lot of us on this side of the House have deep respect for the hard work and the hours that this minister puts in. We know he is in a tough spot right now with the economy of this country and the economies of the world. However, during his speech he talked about the fact that people are watching us in this debate today. I would suggest, with respect, that there are few Canadians who really understand these terms with billions of dollars here, hundreds of millions of dollars there.

I believe the problem we have here in this city is that people, whether from Atlantic Canada or downtown Toronto like my riding, think that we are remote from the economic pain and the suffering, whether it is job loss, businesses going under or whatever. We seem to come to Ottawa and we get involved in debate here in which the numbers are not understood.

I would suggest that part of the problem is that we are not close to the specific problems, whatever region of the country it is. I want to put an idea to the Minister of Finance who controls the Treasury of this nation. We are heading into the 125th birthday of Canada. Would he not consider it a constructive idea, a good idea, if we moved this House of Commons, a week at a time, province to province, right across the country, including the territories so that we could get beyond the numbers and get into the communities supporting colleagues who are trying day in and day out to explain the suffering that is going on?

We have a problem with hospitals. Just recently a doctor friend of mine from Newfoundland said that he went to perform an operation the other day and his tools were not sharp enough. He went out and asked the nurse for more tools and was told there was no money. This is happening right across the country. I think we are becoming remote from the real problems. It is time to move this House of Commons out of Ottawa and put it on the road so that we can get closer to the people and sensitize ourselves to the problems of each other region to region and city to city.

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the hon. member's concern reflected in the question that he asks. I guess I could say at the outset that I could not agree with him more when he talks about billions in transfers and equalization and CAP and EPF. I am sure it is very difficult for the average citizen to comprehend. Unfortunately that is the terminology that is used for the purposes of this debate. I guess that is why I really tried to translate those terms into dollars per capita. I guess that was my modest way of trying to bring it closer to the people.

With regard to the hon. member's comments about the fact that we are removed from the people, I do not know about him but I go back to my riding almost every weekend. Most of our members go back to their ridings every weekend. They are out there and they hear very much about what is going on. In our caucus and in other forums that we have around here, their views are made known very well. I think the communications effort cuts both ways. It is awfully difficult to cut back on government expenditures. Everybody wants to see the deficit reduced as long as it does not affect them. That is one of the problems that we have.

There is a sense that there is a big balloon of waste in Parliament and in Ottawa that we should simply puncture. I challenge hon. members: if they can identify that balloon of waste and bring it to my attention, I will certainly give it serious consideration. I have been personally involved in the exercise of attempting to reduce government expenditures, and it is not easy. Believe me, it is not easy. Every time you do it and you try to be as fair as you possibly can, someone's ox is gored.

The issue of moving Parliament around in 1992, the 125th anniversary of Confederation, is one for Parliament to consider. I think what has happened in terms of the modernization of the rules with three weeks of sitting and one week back in one's riding is a step in the right direction.

I know, in talking to our own members, they seem to really get a lot out of it. I know that it gives individual members a chance to do an organized tour or groups of members to do organized tours. I know our cabinet colleagues from the province of Ontario during that week did a tour of the province of Ontario. I think that will go a long way, but to take it as far as the hon. member is suggesting, I suspect that there would be some criticism on the other side involving the cost for doing that. I guess it is a balance. I appreciate the hon. member's sentiment.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, this morning, the minister gave us a demonstration of what equalization means and how taxpayers get a return on their investment as federal funding is directed to all parts of Canada. However, Canadians are still rather confused. They often get the impression that equalization includes all federal transfers. Perhaps the minister would care to expand on this and tell the House what the Maritimes have received in addition to equalization payments. I am thinking, for instance, of the frigates contracts and Hibernia, and contracts awarded by CIDA in Western Canada for the purchase of food and other items. Perhaps the minister could further clarify, for the benefit of Canadian taxpayers, what equalization means, and also mention federal "spin-offs" that benefit all Canadian taxpayers, such as purchase contracts, for instance.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. I did not want this debate to get into chequebook federalism. I simply wanted to put on the record the facts that are existent and to lay it out in such a way as to demonstrate to hon. members that there is not a surprise or something unusual happening here. It is a normal course of events.

I guess that could apply for any reason. In western Canada we have the Western Diversification Program which provides assistance to broadening the economic base. We have the Northern Ontario Development Program. We have a regional development program in Quebec. We have programs in Ontario, for example, DIP. All these are in addition to the transfer payments that we talk about. We then go to the Atlantic region where we have support for the fisheries industry. We have had contracts that have been released to the Halifax-Dartmouth industries for the building of new vessels and new mine sweepers. We had the largest contract ever awarded by the Government of Canada, the frigate contract, to Saint John Shipbuilding. We also have ACOA.

ACOA has been a success story. It was not a program devised by the Liberal Government of Canada. It was devised by this government. It was devised by the members who represent the Atlantic region. It has been a program that has worked very well because it involves community. It involves the grassroots. It involves small business. It has created jobs and new opportunities and has broadened the economic base.

I think that those are dollars well spent. Those are the kinds of programs that will lift Atlantic Canada out of the kind of situation that it has experienced for many years. Hopefully, rather than being a recipient province under equalization, it will be a contributing province. I think that would be the desire of all Atlantic Canadians and that would be the desire of Quebecers as well.

What we are doing here is providing grants through Established Programs Financing, through equalization, through the Canada Assistance Program, to provide some equality of service right across the board. In addition, we are attempting to provide for programs that will encourage the enterprise skills and the innovative skills to be developed clearly to create jobs in long-term economic activity and prolonged and durable sustainable growth.

• (1130)

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, we are here today to discuss the following motion:

> That this House condemn the government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces, thereby threatening the stability of health care and education, and further condemn the government for its destructive policies toward the fishery, the railway and the post office.

What we are really talking about here is the problem of regional inequalities in Canada. If this government were serious about addressing those regional inequalities it would look at the economies of Atlantic Canada, the state of those economies and the difficulties those economies face. It would develop policies and strategies to address really and truly those concerns and to address the concerns of the people living in those provinces: people who have lost their jobs, lost their communities, lost their hope as a result of the economic policies which have failed.

If this government were committed to fairness across this country, fairness in opportunity, fairness in job opportunities, fairness for those in rural areas, fairness for those who have lost their jobs, it would address these worst case scenarios and it would address those regions in Canada which are suffering the most.

If we move out of the golden horseshoe or out of parts of Alberta and parts of British Columbia the economies of this country are in serious trouble. My own province of Saskatchewan in the last decade, as a result of pursuing the same policies that the federal government pursued, has lost almost 10 per cent of its population. Consumer bankruptcies are at record high levels. Business bankruptcies are at record high levels. Farm bankruptcies are at record high levels. Agricultural land held by financial institutions is at a record high level.

These economic policies in the regions of Canada have failed. We need a government which will re-orient economic policies to address inequality, to address the diversity of opportunities across this country.

If we look around the world, for example at the Thatcher government in England or the Reagan and Bush regimes in the United States, we see enormous equalities that have built up as a result of the pursuit of neo-conservative economic policies which have failed. The whole north of England is awash with unemployment, welfare and despair, and huge tracts of the United States are facing the same problem.

We need policies which address the concerns of people, which address these inequalities. Instead what we have had are big business agendas, the free trade agreement, an obsession with competition and the role of private capital.

If we look at the regions of Canada and at Atlantic Canada we can see that private capital and competition harshly judge these areas. We can see that the hinterland areas of Canada, which constitute most of Canada, are not well received when those with money to invest seek to invest that money. They would rather invest their money in Toronto real estate than they would in the creation of jobs in Newfoundland or New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia.

There is more money to be made by investing in Toronto real estate than there is in creating jobs and opportunities for those in Atlantic Canada.

The strategies that the government pursued, the strategies of leaving job creation to the marketplace, to private capital, will not work in places like Atlantic Canada. They cannot work, have never worked and never will work.

We are now receiving policies from the federal government in addition to the free trade agreement which will make things more difficult and have made things more difficult for the regions of Canada, including Atlantic Canada. Now we see arguments for free trade across the provinces, for eliminating provincial trade barriers.

A recent study carried out by an economics professor at Dalhousie University points out that by making those sorts of changes to reduce provincial trade barriers there may well be savings of about $50 million a year in Atlantic Canada, a relatively modest saving to the province which can then be used for other purposes.

If instead of pursuing those objectives, the government put emphasis on reducing unemployment rates by 1 percentage point, it would increase economic activity in Atlantic Canada to over $700 million, 14 times as much as might be saved by reducing provincial trade barriers. This government concentrates on reducing provincial trade barriers. It does not concentrate on providing programs to generate employment in those regions.

If we look, as I will in a moment, at the economies of those regions, they are in desperate straits. They are in decline in terms of jobs in the economy, but of course the one growth in those areas is the number of unemployed even though many people have been forced to leave their communities in search of jobs elsewhere in Canada and indeed in other countries. We have economic policies from this government which have more to do with moving people from their communities to jobs which should exist elsewhere than we have in taking jobs to those communities.

The thrust of neo-conservative economic policy is to say to people in a region where there is not much economic development: "You better move to an area where there is economic development. You better leave your community, your family, your roots and go somewhere else in search of jobs. We are not going to assist in the creation of meaningful, long-term, high quality jobs in your community".

The minister said that ACOA is a success story. Seventy-one per cent of all the business created by ACOA failed, so clearly even those minute interventionist strategies, those modest interventionist strategies have not worked because they concentrated on encouraging and assisting only private capital to come in from outside primarily and not generate the energy and the resources from within those communities.

On top of all that, on top of economic policies that have attacked those regions, the rural regions of Canada, the hinterland economies of Canada, we have seen government measures which have served to reduce the amount of money which otherwise would have gone to those provinces for health care and post-secondary education.

The minister talks about an increase in absolute dollar terms of money going to the provinces as a result of Established Programs Financing for health and post-secondary education. But for the changes the government has made, billions and billions more dollars would have gone to those provinces for education and health care. Indeed, the five-year freeze which has recently been introduced on transfer payments will result in a loss of over $13 billion to the provinces. It is $9.5 billion for health care and $3.8 billion for post-secondary education.

In a year of line-ups for health care, for surgery and of our young people being turned away from universities and colleges because of inadequate resources in those institutions and inadequate funding to provide for the education at a time when the government is stressing the need, quite rightly, for more education, for a better educated work force in order to compete in the world economy.

Instead of investing in the future, this government is selling off the future. In addition to that, it is attacking those regions of Canada which are the least able to defend themselves; Atlantic Canada, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the north.

We could go on at some length about the implications to the provinces as a result of cuts to Established Programs Financing, but it is sufficient to say that both Liberal and Conservative federal governments have, over the years of their operations, cut funding to those programs for health care and post-secondary education. They have instituted measures which, but for those measures, would have ensured that billions more dollars would be available to the people in Atlantic Canada and in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba and in the north to adequately serve their populations.

The important point to be made with regard to these funds going to the provinces is that they are investments in the future, in our young people, in the health of our citizens and but for these investments, this country will never get out of its economic problems and neither will we address those regional inequalities which exist across this country.

In short, if this country is about anything, it is about ensuring that Canadians, no matter where they live, should have roughly similar opportunities both in terms of employment and in terms of education and health care. To deny that equality of opportunity is to do a great disservice to those many Canadians who need the support of the federal government.

Lest we think that the economies of Atlantic Canada are in good shape, lest we think they do not need the financing which has been provided by the federal government, and in case we feel that a loss of hundreds of millions of dollars to those provinces will be unimportant, we should look at the economies of Atlantic Canada.

These economies are characterized by extremely high unemployment, by reduction in the number of jobs, by loss of population, by high family stress, and all the problems that come with the death of communities and with the loss of employment opportunities, a high incidences of welfare and so on, but basically a loss of hope.

Most of the economies of Atlantic Canada are either stagnant or declining. In terms of employment, for example, the number of people working in those economies—in Newfoundland, between 1990 and 1991 there was a reduction of 3,500 people in the workforce, the same in Prince Edward Island, a province with a population of only 140,000-odd; almost a thousand less people working in Nova Scotia and 1,500 less working in New Brunswick.

Not only do we have a situation in which their economies are in desperate straits but they are getting worse. The only conclusion we can make from this is that federal economic policies are not working, if what those policies are doing is attempting to increase employment opportunities and economic activity in the region. Clearly also the provincial government's strategies are not working in those regions.

So we have economies which are in desperate straits in Atlantic Canada. People living in Atlantic Canada simply do not have the opportunities that people in other parts of the country have. On top of all of this, rather than assist the people in those provinces more, to have the opportunities needed to raise their families and work, we see new cuts to equalization payments. Premier Wells of Newfoundland said that when you list all of the attacks on Atlantic Canada by the federal government, these cuts to equalization payments constitute the straw that breaks the camel's back. In other words, the premiers of Atlantic Canada realize that they have been done a serious disservice by this federal government.

But in spite of all of this, in spite of the feelings of the premiers of Atlantic Canada, three Liberal premiers and one Conservative premier, in spite of Premier Wells saying that this cut to equalization payments was the straw that broke the camel's back, let us look at what the premiers said in response to what they called "this financial crisis".

The Conservative premier of Nova Scotia said they would be asking the federal government for a meeting and: "I want to emphasize not a meeting demanding more money". He said they may approach the Prime Minister to ensure that federal funding to the provinces is sufficient to maintain national standards in health care and other social services. They "may" approach the Prime Minister to ensure that those standards are met.

The premiers of Atlantic Canada are not demanding that the federal government respond appropriately to the concerns of the people of Atlantic Canada. The three Liberal premiers and the one Conservative premier are basically saying; well, we have received a cut of over $100 million to the region but we are just going to say we do not like it, we are not going to stand up and fight against this Conservative government's cuts.

I think we can only say that it is shameful that those three Liberal premiers and that one Conservative premier are not fighting for the rights of the people of their region, are not fighting for the people who elected them, are not standing up for those people's opportunities in health care, education, employment and being able to stay in their own communities.

The government says it cannot do anything. It says that equalization payments are a formula and that the formula changes because of what goes on in the economy and that nothing basically can be done. It is just an accounting procedure that takes place and sometimes the numbers go up as a result of that accounting procedure and sometimes the numbers go down. Sometimes the provinces will get more money and sometimes less.

To the people who are affected by the loss of these millions of dollars it is a little bit different than that. It is about loss of opportunities, loss of employment and as we said before, loss of educational opportunities and loss of health care facilities.

The government forgets that when it says it cannot do anything in 1985 it did intervene to offset reductions in the 1985-1986 equalization payments to the provinces. It did provide supplements to the provinces of Atlantic Canada as a result of changes in the formula. If it did it then it can do it now. If it cared at all about the plight of people in Atlantic Canada, surely it would begin to address these concerns and make up the difference.

Another point regarding equalization payments which is worth making is that the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has said—these are not just my words—that if Ontario had gone for a balanced budget rather than the modest deficit it introduced, then the situation in Atlantic Canada would have been much worse in terms of equalization payments. In other words, the Ontario deficit budget is something which has assisted Atlantic Canada in making sure that the equalization payments did not reduce even further.

What that means is that Ontario is assisting to some considerable extent in the economic stabilization of the whole country while being attacked by the federal government and the Official Opposition and other provinces across this country.

While that attack is being directed towards Ontario it, in fact, as a result of its budgetary policies has assisted the less well off regions in Canada by ensuring that their equalization payments have not been reduced as much as they otherwise would.

We also have to ask why these equalization payments have reduced. Why do the have provinces have rather less to distribute in terms of equalization payments to those provinces who are less well off.

Again we have to look to the bankruptcy of federal government economic policies which clearly are not working across this country.

If I may say a few words about Saskatchewan, those same economic policies which the federal government pursues were pursued by the Conservative government in Saskatchewan until, thankfully, last Monday when they were turfed out of office by a party and a government that cares about creating jobs, cares about providing opportunities for people, cares about education and the health care system.

The very things that concern Atlantic Canadians, Saskatchewan people are concerned about as well. That is why they turfed out the government. That is why Mr. Devine and his Conservatives lost. They tried neo-conservative economic policies that simply do not work in the hinterland regions of Canada. Without a commitment from the government to make economic policy for people, those people in Atlantic Canada and those people in Saskatchewan will continue to be at a disadvantage.

We cannot allow these cuts to equalization payments to take place without criticism. We cannot allow Atlantic Canada to receive more than $100 million less than it otherwise would have received without voicing our strong opposition.

We in the New Democratic Party have called for the federal government to intervene to offset this reduction in equalization transfer payments. We have called for more adequate Established Programs Financing transfers, instead of the federal government's contribution to health and post-secondary education reducing and reducing in percentage terms each year, so that rather than as they once paid 50 per cent of health care and post-secondary education costs in the provinces, it is now something a little over 35 per cent.

• (1150)

In other words, the federal government is not pulling its weight in ensuring that there is equal opportunity in those areas of health care and education across this country.

We could say a few words about the fishery and railways which are also mentioned in this resolution, but the clear point with regard to the fishery is that the strategies of this government and previous Liberal governments have been totally ineffective in ensuring the appropriate management of that fishery.

The reason we do not have enough fish for our fishermen and our fishing communities in Atlantic Canada is that the whole stock has been totally mismanaged and basically has been handed over to the interests of two large fishing corporations which really do not care about the regions they are working in but only care about making profits.

There are other ways to ensure that job opportunities can be created in these regions. We will see these other opportunities, other approaches as the New Democratic governments of Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario and Yukon develop those policies as the Yukon and Ontario governments already are doing. We will see jobs created as a result of the resources within the communities rather than resorting to the only strategy that this government seems to understand, which is to resort to the marketplace, to private capital that is not interested in the creation of jobs in this economy in this country but is interested only in making profits.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, one sits here in the House, quietly listening to a previous speaker and doing some work. At the same time one suddenly realizes that the speaker is missing the boat in terms of what this motion is all about.

This House condemns the federal government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces, thereby threatening the stability of the Atlantic provinces. I heard the speaker blaming the premiers of the Atlantic provinces for the problems they have down east, never thinking to mention that it is the federal government that has caused such economic chaos in this country. The federal government has transferred that economic chaos down to Atlantic Canadians.

He stands there and he says: "Atlantic Canadian premiers are at fault because they have not challenged the federal government on this issue". What a hypocritical approach. I am sorry, but let us not transfer the guilt. The guilt is across the floor in this House of Commons, and let us make sure that the people of Canada know where the guilt lies.

Surely the previous speaker was not being partisan when he was saying that the premier of the province of Ontario had done such a wonderful job of creating a budget and that the economy of the rest of the country was being positively affected because of what that premier did. I wonder: Is there any relevance to the fact that the premier of Ontario is a New Democrat and the premiers of most of the Atlantic provinces are Liberals? Surely not. He would never be partisan in this House of Commons, would he? Never.

I would like to challenge the member of the New Democratic Party to put the onus where it belongs, that is on this government which has created economic policies in this country which are devastating especially to Atlantic Canada. I would like him to comment on that.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to comment on that. There is clearly joint responsibilities for the situation that has arisen in this country in terms of the economic plight we find ourselves in.

Former Liberal governments cannot exonerate themselves from their contributions to creating deficits which have been inherited by this government and added to by this government. The economic policies pursued by Liberal governments in the past were also policies which did little to change the situation in Atlantic Canada, both at the federal level and at the provincial level.

The economic policies pursued by the Conservative government in Ottawa are very similar to the economic policies pursued by the Liberal government in New Brunswick.

Look at the sorts of budgetary measures made by the Liberal government in New Brunswick, cuts to government services and reductions in health care and education. The same sorts of thrusts which have driven the Conservative government in Ottawa drive those Liberal governments and Conservative governments in Atlantic Canada because they stem from the same philosophy, various conservative economic policies which put at the forefront private capital and private interests rather than the interests of their citizens.

The point I was making with regard to the responsibility of the premiers in the region was not only that their economic policies do not work either. Those three Liberal premiers and the one Conservative premier in Atlantic Canada are simply reneging on their responsibility to their citizens by not attacking this federal government's cut to equalization payments.

I quoted from newspaper stories which make it quite clear that those governments are not going to come to Ottawa to demand that something be done about matching the reductions in equalization payments. That is a complete reneging of their responsibility to their own citizens. They should be fighting for their own people. The premier of Nova Scotia and the premier of New Brunswick should be fighting to make sure that this federal government's policies do not attack the people in their region.

The premiers are not doing it and they have said they are not doing it. All I have said is that they should do it. Surely all those people in the maritimes will be agree with me on that.

With regard to Ontario, it was not I who said the Ontario budget deficit assisted Atlantic Canada in its dealings with the government over equalization payments. It was not I who said that but for the Ontario budget the equalization payments in the Atlantic region would be less than they are already are. It was the senior economist with the Atlantic Provinces' Economic Council who is not well known for supporting the New Democratic Party or its policies or the policies of Premier Rae in Ontario.

All I am saying is that on simple economic analysis, with the way that equalization payments work, the Ontario budget provided some extra stimulus to the economy which rebounded to the benefit of the Liberal and Conservative premiers and the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador. Ontario played a stimulative role to the economy which assisted those provinces.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I just have a quick comment and then a question for the member.

I want to say that it is unfortunate the motion, while mentioning one of our most important resources in Atlantic Canada, the fishery, makes no reference to forestry. It is one of the comments that I would like to make later on in the debate. It is unfortunate that the framers of this motion did not consider giving us an opportunity to talk and expand a bit on the needs and importance of forestry in Atlantic Canada.

My comment, if that was a preamble, is just to reflect a very traditional view of voting in Atlantic Canada. It follows on the debate that was just had between the two members. Often people in my province of British Columbia say: "If there are these problems in the maritimes and Newfoundland and Labrador, why is it and who has been in office over all these years?" It has been Liberals and Conservatives.

My father always says: "One day maybe we will be lucky and hope that people there will vote for New Democrats and will form some governments that care about the people in that area".

The member made reference in his comments a number of times to the neo-conservative agenda being pursued by the government and by a number of the premiers in the Atlantic provinces. I would be interested in his comments on how that debate fits into the political debate in Canada right now.

We know that there are some who think that the Prime Minister would help the country by leaving and going to the United Nations. Others are concerned that we would not want to inflict him on the rest of the world, but with regard to the debate and rejection of the Reagan agenda, the Bush domestic agenda, there is a real rejection of these kinds of economic policies being pursued by this government.

I am wondering if the member could comment on how that fits into the political picture in the country of people identifying this government and the rejection of these neo-conservative ideas.

• (1200)

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, last week has shown us very vividly what people in British Columbia and Saskatchewan think about the pursuit of the economic policies of this federal government, the same economic policies which were pursued by its friends, the Social Credit government in British Columbia and its friends, the Conservative government in Saskatchewan.

The population of both provinces rejected those policies because they do not work, because they are unfair, because they do not put people at the top of the economic agenda. Those countries that do put people at the top of the economic agenda—and I hate to say this; I hope it will not be seen in a partisan way—are those countries with social democratic governments: Austria, Norway, Sweden, Denmark. These countries have dealt with inflation, with interest rates and with the interests of their currencies while maintaining social services and health care programs superior to Canada's and ensuring extremely high levels of employment and very low levels of poverty.

You will do well if you put people first, if you concern yourself with peoples' interests, ensure that people work, that the economy works, that the country's economic indicators all do well, that people do not live in poverty and do have an opportunity for job opportunities, superior health care, education and so on. These government policies are bankrupt, and the people of British Columbia and Saskatchewan said so last week.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate with mixed emotions. I listened to a lot of speakers. A lot of numbers have been tossed around and a lot of reasons as to why things are getting better or why things are getting worse.

I listened to the Minister of Finance across the way, a man for whom I have an awful lot of respect. One of the phrases he uttered was that this talk is absolute nonsense. If this is the case, if this is absolute nonsense, I as him: Why is there a five-year freeze on the Established Programs Financing? Everybody had been talking about this prior to the latest announcement the Atlantic premiers got.

Prince Edward Island would lose $12 million in transfer payments. Now the minister says that the transfer payments continue to rise. However, regarding the $12 million in the initial budget, it says here in a news report that Newfoundland in the new estimates is going to lose $110 million.

Will this not spell higher taxes? Will it not see fewer social programs? Most important, does this not sever the lifeline of Atlantic Canada? People spoke here this morning asking the Minister of Finance about the amount of money Atlantic Canada got compared to other provinces. I say to that member: yes, we would love to be a contributing province. I hope I live long enough to see the day when we are a contributing province. I believe the reason these transfer payments were put in place in the first place was to help these provinces and territories to maintain a standard of living equal to the rest of Canada.

As I see it unfolding, I believe the writing is clearly on the wall. I believe the fabric of social programs and medicare appears to be targeted as the first to go. As I said, smaller provinces and thinly populated territories will not be able to hold the system together or support the development of new or innovative specialty health programs.

How can the federal government expect small provinces to maintain national health standards when it freezes this EPF? In the past cash payments from the federal government have made it possible for Canadians to have highly developed systems of medicare and post-secondary education. Two weeks ago Premier Ghiz at the constitutional hearings in Charlottetown stated that one of his fears was that with these transfers of power to the provinces we would be a checker-board Canada with different levels of medical programs in different provinces across the country.

I believe that the health care gap can be measured by two standards: the have provinces and the have not provinces. We can translate this into terms of the people, which also translates into 10 to 11 years more longevity for the high income Canadians compared to that of low income Canadians. Moreover as our health care system advances we find people living longer lives. The cost of high-technology medical equipment is rising, but because of cuts in transfer payment, the provinces are forced either to slash essential services or to impose further taxes on an already overburdened taxpayer.

At one time Canada maintained national standards for health care and other basic services but no more. In the last budget the federal government vowed to maintain national standards through new legislation. Indeed we have a national standard: the slow death of medicare which has become the standard in every province.

In 1986 the present government finally recognized the health care gap. Let me quote what one of the Health and Welfare Canada's many documents said: "The first challenge we face is to find ways of reducing inequities in the health of low versus high income groups in Canada". Instead of doing this they introduced Bill C-69, the bill to limit funding to the provinces.

In his last budget, as in the one before it, the Minister of Finance continued to pass the buck to the provinces of this country. The federal government has simply transferred its federal fiscal problem to other levels of government. Smaller provinces will not be able to hold the system together or to support the development of new or innovative health programs. Moreover, the estimates of accumulative loss to provincial and territorial health care funding from 1986-1987 to 1994-1995 will total at least $22 billion.

It is frightening what this government is doing to what it once called a sacred trust of our community and country. With an aging population and the youth of my province having to relocate to central Canada to secure employment, P.E.I. has a higher than average age group. With this age group comes a greater demand for health care, and with a greater demand for health care of course comes a greater need for financing.

We saw what the freeze did in the federal-provincial transfer of payments in Newfoundland's last budget: 900 health care jobs and 360 hospital beds were lost due to cuts in the system. If this plan of action continues health care will be eliminated. The current medicare system, a source of national pride, respected and copied around the world will be but a dream.

In Prince Edward Island they now have to work harder and longer to achieve less than what is needed, at no fault of their own. In 1990 the average weekly earnings of industrial workers was the same as it was in 1975. What does this tell government? This government is not even committed to students, yet this government spoke not long ago of the need to double post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering. It has repeatedly said it is committed to the Canadian youth, but I believe it is only committed to telling us it is.

Each year as the population increases and more and more students realize the necessity of a higher education the demand for classroom space escalates. While the number of instructors per student declines the funding diminished.

Federal funding in post-secondary education is imperative to keep tuition fees from becoming unaffordable for most Canadians. It ensures better access to higher education for low income people and I believe this is a must. We need a strong federal presence in all social programs to ensure that Canadians will have access to similar services and similar benefits no matter where they live. A strong federal presence is impossible without a strong federal financial commitment.

• (1210)

As I said earlier regional disparities have always been a problem in this country. Without substantial financial contributions from the federal government, regional disparities will continue to grow and affect our national standard of living.

I ask the government: Has it forgotten that federal funding in the field of health was the incentive that led to the development of medicare in all provinces and territories?

Over 1.4 million Canadians are out of work. The number of people who receive emergency food assistance each month is over a half million, and included in this unfortunately is 186,000 children. The monetary and fiscal policies of this government have not worked since they were implemented. In fact they have worked solidly against what we elected members of Parliament need to work toward, and that is making Canada a better place.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, a few weeks ago here in the House of Commons the Prime Minister unveiled his government's constitutional proposals, calling on Canadians to join him in shaping Canada's future together. In his remarks the Prime Minister said that his government's proposals have one simple but nevertheless critical and crucial objective: to build a stronger and more prosperous Canada where all Canadians can feel at home.

These are fine sentiments but they have a hollow ring in Atlantic Canada. For decades we have known the indignity of being the have not provinces, the poor cousins of Confederation. For generations the best and the brightest of our young people have all too often had to search for prosperity elsewhere because there was no opportunity for them to use their talents at home.

In recent years we have watched the slow and in some cases rapid decline of the pillars of our economy: ship building, the fishery and coal and steel in Cape Breton. We have had to accept unemployment insurance payments as a main component of our income and endure the condescension that has accompanied that dependence. Regional development has come to mean a code word for: we do not measure up.

The sense of being a have not region, of having to rely on Ottawa for regional assistance, has seeped into our consciousness in Atlantic Canada. It has reflected itself in our literature, in our music and even in our humour. It has eroded our pride. It has on occasion spilled out in violent confrontation, though we are not by nature violent.

The occupations of the fisheries officers in Port aux Basques recently or confrontations at the gates of the Sydney Steel plant are simply a manifestation of the frustrations we all face.

Last week I was in my constituency of Cape Breton Highlands— Canso where the official unemployment rate is in the order of 23 per cent. But everyone there knows that the percentage of the labour force out of work is much higher. Collie Herman Chisholm, the seasoned and generally optimistic mayor of Antigonish, told me when I asked him, because he remembers, that the job situation locally has never been this bad, not even during the great depression. He was calling me about the rail line from Truro to Sydney, which goes through Antigonish and which CN announced recently it was proposing to sell to a private bidder.

The main customer on this line is Stora Forest Industries, a pulp and paper mill located at Point Tupper on the Strait of Canso. It directly employs some 2,300 workers. The CN announcement came as Stora and its parent in Sweden, Stora Kopperberg, were considering modernization and expansion plans involving some $500 million to $600 million. Without some form of modernization in order to enable Stora to compete in the international pulp and newsprint market of the future, the president of Stora, Tom Hall, has suggested the mill would become non-competitive and die. That would spell catastrophe for the economy of eastern Nova Scotia and the thousands of families who depend in one way or another on this industry.

For Stora, guaranteed and reliable access to rail is absolutely vital. The uncertainty caused at this moment, even by CN's consideration of these plans which are objected to by everybody including the premier of Nova Scotia, could well be the factor that causes Stora's parent in Sweden to choose to invest elsewhere.

Yet, in the face of this CN persists and both ministers of transport refuse to intervene to stop this ludicrous move. No wonder the Prime Minister's invitation to participate in constitutional renewal has a hollow ring in Atlantic Canada.

A week or so ago I was in Baddeck where Judy MacDonald, a housewife and mother, took the time to write down her thoughts for me on the economic situation in Cape Breton in the wake of the Prime Minister's constitutional initiative.

I regret that time permits me to quote only a small portion of Judy's letter. She speaks for many in Cape Breton when she writes:

> Much has been made of how hard central Canada has been hit by the recession. The joke around here is: "There is a recession. Someone should tell Cape Breton". The economy has gone from bad to worse. People in the depressed parts of Canada such as Cape Breton at this time cannot raise concerns about the Constitution or issues like it because they are trying to make ends meet and in extreme cases keep warm, fed and clothed. This is being interpreted as apathy toward our constitutional problems which is simply not the case. The only special status Cape Breton has is starvation.

Lately this House has devoted a fair deal of time and attention to the plight of the western farmer. Atlantic Canadians feel empathy for the western farmer. They were inclined to be happy and supportive when at the urging of this party the government, admittedly on the eve of an election in Saskatchewan, came through with an $800 million package.

However, it is awfully hard for us not to feel shortchanged and betrayed when the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador, who this year faced a total collapse of their fishery, received a paltry $39 million in recycled money. The timing of this package was contrived to exclude other deserving fishermen in Atlantic Canada like the herring fishermen in the southern Gulf of St. Lawrence in Antigonish County who also faced a collapse of their catches and their income.

Then of course there is the government's refusal to assist the Scotia Synfuels project which has been under development for 10 years and which is tailor-made for the Cape Breton economy. The Synfuels project will create some 2,000 jobs. It will create a clean use for Cape Breton's most abundant resource, coal, and contribute to Canada's energy security. It is just as viable as Hibernia or OSLO or Syncrude or the Lloydminister upgrader project on the Saskatchewan and Alberta border into which the federal government has poured hundreds of millions of dollars.

Yet, on September 27, on the eve of the Saskatchewan election, the Lloydminister upgrader which straddles by coincidence the ridings represented by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture received an additional $175 million on top of nearly $300 million from a supposedly cash starved, deficit conscious federal government.

Nova Scotians are praying for a provincial election. They want an opportunity to throw out the incompetent, corrupt, Buchanan Tory government. They are starting to realize that perhaps if we have a provincial election we might get Ottawa to move and provide some of the assistance they have been denying us over the last several months. It seems that only provincial elections are what get this government moving.

This week the four provinces of Atlantic Canada received news that their entitlements under the equalization payments program for 1991 had fallen by some $140 million below what had been budgeted.

Yesterday and the day before, when we raised this matter during Question Period, all the Minister of Finance could do was to wave his arms helplessly and say that this was outside this control.

• (1220)

The equalization payments were determined by a formula, and the formula was written into legislation. The equalization payments are based on a formula, but what go into the formula are the tax bases of five of the provinces: Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

The size of these tax bases depends on the level and the growth of provincial income, in other words on the strength of the economy of places like Ontario. Everybody knows that this government's policies have created a recession which has crippled the Ontario manufacturing sector and flattened the Ontario economy so that the Ontario tax base, which is the principal generator of entitlements under the equalization formula has not been able to generate the entitlements.

Why did the government create this recession? It created this recession to squelch a bout of inflation which it created three years ago by abandoning its so-called commitment to the deficit, to deficit reduction, in order to buy the 1988 election.

It did this by jacking up real interest rates, pushing up the value of the Canadian dollar, choking off investment, stifling exports and killing jobs in Atlantic Canada as well as in Ontario. It did not matter that we in Atlantic Canada were not the source of the inflation. We had to swallow the medicine anyway so we got it both ways from this government.

Its economic policies have stifled our ability to generate wealth and jobs through exports and expansion, making us more dependent on equalization payments. Now, by crushing the economy that generates the source of these payments, the government denies them as well.

The Minister of Finance yesterday suggested that we on this side of the House had a problem with the equalization payments formula. We have no problem with the equalization payments formula. The formula works. It is his economic policies that do not work.

It is time that this government stopped treating Atlantic Canadians like an appendage. It is time that this government started realizing that we are part of this country and, if the government wants us to be a part of constitutional renewal, it has to treat our economies as just as important as those economies of the rest of this country.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member.

If he had the opportunity to listen to the Minister of Finance today in the debate, I think a lot of the comments he made that this government does not pay attention and does not have concern for the eastern part of this country would be laid to rest.

I think he made that very clear. This bill today was triggered by an adjustment in the equalization payments. He admits that the formula is good, that it works. He had some argument with the amount of money that was adjusted, that three of the four provinces in the eastern part of this great country had a reduction while one had an increase. His province is one that had an increase, Nova Scotia, through the adjustments.

Two years ago through this adjustment program provinces realized a billion dollars more than they had budgeted which allowed a lot of provinces in eastern Canada to balance their budgets. Last year some $750 million went to provinces under the formula to help balance their budgets. Some of them came out with balanced budgets. God knows the federal government did not. It is something we would love to do one of these days. We have a plan to do that by 1995.

I take exception to the hon. member saying what he did because of the facts that have been laid out by the Minister of Finance this morning in the per capita help for the eastern provinces.

I am from central Ontario and I do not begrudge one bit of that. I wish in our province we could have 42, 46 or 47 per cent of our budget coming from the federal government. We do not. We have because of our geographical location a lot of advantages that the outreaches of this country do not have. We are prepared to pay our fair share and are doing that.

For the hon. member to stand and say that this government does not care or have concern for the eastern part of this country is not fair. As a matter of fact we have put together ACOA, a program exclusively for the eastern part of this country to diversify the economy, to encourage growth there. None of these organizations are ever funded enough because they always want more and more and more. There is no question about that, and the financial pressures on the government are tremendous at this time from all walks of life.

My comment is that it was totally unfair for him to say that. The facts would show this government does care and does spend a lot of its time both as a government and in cabinet on the concerns of eastern Canada.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his comments. I would like to correct some of the impressions which he received from my speech a minute ago.

The point of the argument and the point that people in Atlantic Canada are trying to make to this government is not that our underlying aim is to get more equalization payments. It is that we are seeking to strengthen our economy so that we will not have to depend on equalization payments.

The reason our equalization payments went up in the years between 1984 and 1988 is simply that the relative disparity between our economies and the economy of Ontario, which was generating a large chunk of the equalization payments, increased. That is the problem and the issue before us here.

We are seeking some assistance to be able to pull our weight in Confederation. We are looking for a government that is not just simply justifying handouts but is actually working with the people of Atlantic Canada to build a stronger economy.

I do not have time to talk about ACOA. Let me just say this about ACOA. ACOA, which came forth with such great promise, has not delivered on that promise in Atlantic Canada. That would be the subject of another debate and one which would be good for us to have in this House.

Mr. McDermid: I agree with the hon. member. Maybe ACOA has not fulfilled the promise that we would like to think it has. The point is that we have done something. We have actually put a program down there that I believe in many instances is working, and that is a debate for another time.

The point he is making is that he is not objecting about the transfer payments. He understands that and everything else. The motion we are debating says that this House condemns the government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces. We are not doing that.

The motion is absolutely incorrect. He stands here and says: "That is not what we are debating today. We are debating the diversity of the economy in eastern Canada. We will debate that at another time". He is absolutely right. That is the motion today. My point is that the motion is wrong.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, may I have 30 seconds to respond to those comments?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): Twenty seconds.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the motion is not incorrect. The point of my speech is that the government has reduced transfer payments by weakening the economy that is generating those transfer payments.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today about this subject because I am also one of those who is working day in and day out to strengthen the Atlantic economy and to strengthen it on a long-term basis.

• (1230)

I must say that the previous speaker, the hon. member from Cape Breton, has not been really straight with this House or straight with his constituents when he blames the economic circumstances of Canada today on the policies of this government.

He makes no reference at all to the 20 years or more of deficit spending that his predecessor government conducted in this country. It left us with a burden of debt that we have not been able to service without incurring continuing deficits.

Only through the budget recovery plan introduced by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre when he was Minister of Finance and now being carried on by the hon. Deputy Prime Minister do we have any prospect of ultimately eradicating that deficit, balancing our budget and commencing to pay down the tremendous debt with which we have been left as a heritage of more than two decades of Liberal governments.

For the hon. member from Cape Breton to gloss over that fact is to mislead his constituents and to mislead the entire Atlantic region in their perception of the economic circumstances which we face.

The situation in which we find ourselves today and the motion by the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls are based on an October calculation of equalization payments that unfortunately has resulted in shortfalls from expectations in the equalization revenues of three of the provinces in the Atlantic region. The worst of those has occurred in my own province of New Brunswick where it appears that the expectation will be short in excess of $100 million, amounting to about 2.61 per cent of the annual entitlement of $4.2 billion.

I think it is important to put our mind around that subject. The equalization entitlement to New Brunswick is $4.2 billion. On this occasion it appears that the follow-up data that reinforce the estimates on which these formulas are built indicate that the expectation in the estimates were too high and the past payments were too high. This adjustment occurs as a result of a formula that has been enshrined in legislation for many years, long before this government took office. It continues to be enshrined with the same formula that pertains today as it did then. That formula has on this occasion sadly resulted in a shortfall of expectations.

I sympathize with the ministers of finance in those provinces who have to experience that shortfall, who have to confront the reality that their budgets are going to be seen to be too ambitious, too optimistic, and who are going to have to adjust them downward.

It has not always been a shortfall situation. Regarding New Brunswick, I have a clipping from the Saint John Telegraph Journal of July 5, 1990 in which the hon. minister of finance for the province of New Brunswick advised that he was experiencing great exaltation as a result of a windfall of $47 million, a surplus beyond expectations. His estimates were too conservative and the realities of the transfer from the federal government were to be $47 million higher than he expected. This process of formula financing works out over time to produce the truth that the equalization formula is intended to reveal.

I would like to read into the record a few other facts. I am going to address particularly the New Brunswick circumstances this morning because New Brunswick had by far the greatest hit in terms of the decrease of budget expectations as a result of this October adjustment calculation of the equalization payment.

Major federal transfers to New Brunswick will total an increase of about 4.4 per cent over 1991–92. Per capita, New Brunswick will receive over $2,200 per person in 1992–93 which is almost 75 per cent higher than the national average. That is a statistic which demonstrates that the equalization concept is working.

The budget change in EPF transfers which I will address later on will account for only two-tenths of one per cent of provincial revenues in 1992. It is a negligible decrease. Again it is a decrease in expectation, not a decrease in dollars.

The major federal transfers will continue to account for a very high percentage of New Brunswick's total revenue. More than 39 per cent of New Brunswick's 1992–93 budget will come from federal transfers.

I would say that the only slashing and burning, as somebody has characterized the adjustment calculations, taking place is the abuse of fact. As the minister emphasized earlier this morning—and I am glad to repeat it—federal transfers to the provinces are not being cut. The Atlantic provinces are not being singled out. Health care and education are not being placed at risk.

I would just like to say that with respect to Established Programs Financing, the foundation for federal transfers to education and health, the total dollars to New Brunswick were $543 million in 1989–90. They were $546 million in 1990–91, and they will be over $550 million this year. They will grow in actual dollars again next year.

It is an abuse of fact when people say that EPF funding has been cut. The rate of growth of EPF funding has been cut and there are good reasons for that, which I will also get to in a moment. What is really happening is that our federal government is continuing to implement and build on the agenda for economic recovery which we introduced last February.

It is a plan for a strong, solid recovery that is already helping to put the recession behind us and set the foundations for continuing non-inflationary growth. It is a plan that asks Canadians, including other levels of government, to work more effectively in a partnership for prosperity.

Not surprisingly the budget had important implications for federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, particularly for parts of the system and major transfers to provinces which consist of equalization, Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan. These programs account for more than 90 per cent of all funding from the federal government to the provinces to help pay for a variety of very important services right across Canada.

For decades the federal government has provided large and growing financial support to the provinces in these respects. This year alone total federal transfers including both cash and tax transfers will reach almost $37 billion. Just the cash portion of the transfers accounts for one-fifth of all federal program spending.

Again let me echo the words of the minister. These transfers are simply too large to exempt from our expenditure restraint program. The deficit is a national problem and it demands a national solution. More important, it should be understood that in slowing the growth of transfer payments the federal government is seeking to encourage all levels of government to live realistically within their means, just as the federal government itself is called upon to do with its own programs.

It is significant to understand that for the past seven years the federal level of spending has grown at the rate of 3.7 per cent, versus a provincial average of 7.2 per cent. It just makes common sense that the federal government, in its responsibility on behalf of all Canadians, has to ask the other levels of government which constitute such a large part of its total expenditure program to restrain their spending within limits that are imposed upon the federal government itself.

The measures announced in the 1990 budget included a per capita freeze on EPF transfers. Although EPF transfers in total will continue to grow, as I have said in the New Brunswick case, with the population of each province, they will be frozen until 1994-95 at present rates of growth. There will continue to be no limit on Canada Assistance Plan contributions to less wealthy provinces. In addition, equalization transfers to the less wealthy provinces have been totally exempted from the budget expenditure controls.

For this motion to suggest that the levels of equalization transfers have been reduced is, as the hon. minister said earlier, simply not so.

The measures we have taken bring the growth of federal-provincial transfers into line with the current fiscal realities. In fact the rate of transfers will be at 3.7 per cent, whereas the rate of federal spending in all other areas will be at 3.4 per cent.

• (1240)

I am convinced that most Canadians know that the deficit and the debt are serious problems that must be solved. They know that firm determined action is needed to solve these problems. They believe this should be carried out with the least possible adverse impact on those in the greatest need. That is the way that the equalization formula and the application of the changes to the EPF funding and to the CAP funding have all been designed.

In the 1989 budget the government set out a medium term fiscal plan to reduce the deficit sharply and to bring an end to new government borrowing in financial markets by 1994-1995. That will be a welcome day. The 1990 budget reaffirmed this plan and introduced a program of expenditure control to meet it.

However, because the recession revenues are now lower than forecast, expenditures are higher due to the weak economy. We have an even more difficult road as we work toward that very enviable prospect of a balanced budget some day.

The motion which is before us refuses to recognize the importance of deficit reduction and debt control. It implies that we should not only be spending more than ever but that we should be making no effort to set reasonable limits on future spending growth. Of course that is hardly surprising. Both parties of the opposition have impeccable credentials when it comes to living the philosophy of credit card finance: spend now, borrow more tomorrow, and worry about the consequences next year or next decade. It is easy to contemplate and talk only about sharing the wealth when one does not take any responsibility for creating it.

The problem is that next year or next decade is now. We have seen how living beyond our country's means, including provincial transfers that increase at a rate well above inflation, can lead to a growing burden of public debt. In 1984 when this government took office the federal government was handing out $1.33 in programs and services for every $1 it collected in taxes. Mr. Speaker, how long could you live on your budget if you were spending $1.33 on services for every $1 you were earning? That was no bargain then and it is no bargain now. In fact we are now paying the price over and over again for too many years of consuming more government service than we were willing to pay for.

This fiscal year our public debt is forecast to reach $419 billion. That is more than $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest rate alone on the debt will eat up more than $43 billion this year, more than we spend on old age security, unemployment insurance and family allowances combined.

In the 1991 budget the government has asked Canadians to share the burden of further financial restraint. We recognize the sacrifices that many Canadians have already made in the name of restraint and we know there will be some reluctance to accept the necessity for more of the same.

If we took no steps to deal with this worsening fiscal situation, the deficit would be much higher than the forecast by many billions of dollars. This would aggravate all of the fundamental problems which must be solved if we are to ensure a strong recovery and a return to prosperity in the years ahead. Further increased spending would only make the debt problem that much worse.

In the 1991 budget the government has taken the tough responsible decisions necessary to ensure Canada's finances become healthy again. As a result of measures announced in that budget the government will hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this year. Despite the pressures of the recession the deficit will fall in 1992–1993 to $25 billion below that level for the first time in more than a decade. Growth in program spending will be held to an average of no more than 3 per cent in the years after 1991–1992 on an annual basis and the need for new federal borrowing in financial markets will be eliminated after 1993–1994. The 1991 budget includes measures providing Canadians with added assurances that these targets will be met.

In a significant change that alters the way that government manages expenditures we have released draft legislation which will impose mandatory limits on annual program spending for the next five years. That is the first time in history that the Government of Canada has legislated in law its spending restraints and budget limitations. We have tabled legislation to set up the debt servicing and reduction fund and have committed that all revenues from the goods and services tax and from privatization will go to the servicing of the deficit and the reduction of the debt. These revenues will be applied first against the servicing of the debt and, as they grow over time, will be used to reduce the outstanding debt.

The effort to reduce spending and the deficit will be reinforced by these government decisions to set its targets clearly in law. Through the plan for economic recovery the federal government will take action to establish fiscal stability and to strengthen confidence in Canada's future.

I know my time is running short, but I want to make a very important illustration of the importance of federal transfers to Atlantic Canada. In Atlantic Canada the total of all forms of federal spending and financial contribution in 1988 was $8.2 billion more than the contribution of revenues from Atlantic Canada to the federal Treasury. These figures are three years old and are in fact higher today. That represents $3,600 per person in Atlantic Canada. As I say, that is a higher figure today. In 1988 those figures in Newfoundland were $2.4 billion; in Prince Edward Island it was $600,000 per year; $3 billion in Nova Scotia; and $2.2 billion in New Brunswick.

It is clear in the context of this debate that the federal government is not diminishing its commitment to Atlantic Canada. These figures speak extremely strongly for the Atlantic commitment to a strong Canadian entity, a prospering, and lasting Canadian unification.

I do not think anything could speak in fiscal terms more abundantly and more clearly than do these numbers. The impact of them is not well understood by Atlantic Canadians. It is a subject that as we contemplate our place in Canada we have to confront realistically and not with the misleading implications of this motion or those on the other side who have spoken to it.

The adjustments that we have seen today in the equalization formula do not represent a threat to the welfare of Atlantic Canada. This is not a special burden being placed on the maritimes or on Newfoundland. It is a reflection of a continuing equalization program that is strong, lasting and valuable. It is a continuing commitment to share the benefits of Canada among all of its citizens.

It is also important that we share the challenge of getting our punishing national debt under control. It also addresses that. Exempting provinces from this challenge of debt reduction would be indeed to treat them as second-class citizens. The ultimate result would be to put Canada in jeopardy of becoming a second-class country.

Just as I finish, I should say as well that the entire system of federal-provincial transfers may well need adjustment. Perhaps it is time. I understand the Minister of Finance has sent some signals that in 1992 and subsequently those formulas may be reviewed and readjusted. For example, the regular recalculations under the equalization plan obviously do pose problems for provincial budgetary planning and program management.

I can sympathize with the ministers of finance in those provinces who today have to adjust their prospects. As stated in the February budget, the system of transfers to the provinces including equalization will be reviewed with a view to examining reforms that may be necessary.

Recommendations from the Atlantic provinces' premiers and their ministers of finance, such as those from their meetings yesterday and today, will be very helpful. They will help this federal government to reinforce Canadian Confederation as a fiscally sound and responsible agency, able not only to defend the financial sovereignty of this country but to share the dividends of prosperity in this country with all who participate in this Confederation, including the Atlantic region.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly commend my colleague on his excellent presentation of some of the problems connected with the Atlantic provinces. With a background in medicine I am certainly sympathetic toward the problems with financing education and medical care in these areas.

I was impressed with the figure that the maritimes in 1988 were net benefactors of $8.2 billion. Coming from one of the have provinces which this year has had its contribution from the federal government capped at a much lower rate, I would like to ask the hon. member just what his long-term plans and goals are in order to reduce the dependence of the maritime provinces upon federal financing.

As I say, coming from a have province, we certainly could understand and are sympathetic toward the maritimes provinces and the plight they had with the fishing industry and their mining problems. We understand that, but we would like to know just what goals and plans they have in order to reduce their dependence on the tremendous numbers of dollars being funnelled into those economies.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I must set my colleague quite straight at the beginning. He speaks with some sense of patronage. I know him well and he is not normally a patronizing man.

I want to make it clear that these transfers to the Atlantic provinces are not handouts. These are dividends to the Atlantic provinces for their roles in Confederation. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were equal partners of four in the creation of this country.

In the beginning nobody knew or could see where all the prosperity would occur. As with any investment or with any undertaking, original founders are entitled to share the dividends indefinitely.

The equalization formula of this country puts it in that perspective. I would like to disabuse my hon. friend of any notion that this is a handout, charity or anything of that nature.

I would like to go on further and tell him that we in Atlantic provinces are using our utmost initiative to take the fruits of those dividends, to invest them wisely and to help ourselves.

I must say with great credit to the Government of New Brunswick and to Premier Frank McKenna that in the past several years he has demonstrated perhaps the best rate of economic growth of any province in Canada amid circumstances which are very difficult.

That is why I would chide my good friend, his minister of finance, for making such a big issue of this $100 million recalculation and shortfall in his equalization fund. It was only a year ago that he was certainly expressing great pleasure and pride at the achievements of his budgetary calculations when he had a $47 million windfall.

ACOA, which is doing much better than even the hon. minister acknowledged a few minutes ago in his intervention, has put some very significant infrastructure elements in place. The Research and Productivity Council in my home riding of Fredericton has been endowed with something like $20 million. This has helped to make it one of the foremost research and development entities for business and enterprise that would otherwise not have the availability of those facilities.

That kind of investment will in the long run pay off in very large dividends. We have seen historically in New Brunswick the performances of the Irving organization and the McCain organization and dozens of others of less noble reputation but every bit as deserving of accolades on perhaps a smaller scale.

There is no shortage of the entrepreneurial spirit and the building spirit in New Brunswick or in any other part of Atlantic Canada. I would have to say to my hon. friend that the dividends we share from Confederation at this point will be well invested and the day may come in the long-range future when we may be sharing them in the opposite direction.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question.

I would just like to refer to an article in the paper today with regard to the comments made in the last election by this government in which its main theme was jobs, jobs, jobs. Here we are with 1.3 million people unemployed and we have nothing but excuses, excuses, excuses.

I say to the member: when we see these kinds of activities taking place, especially in our Atlantic provinces where the unemployment is that high, this government has not addressed the problem of the jobs, jobs, jobs and yet the commitment was made.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the figures with respect to employment since this government took office in 1984 to this point in 1991 are very dramatic, very constructive and very positive. You have to read them all in context.

We know that we are going through a recession. We know that we have had dramatic problems in the fishery of almost an unnatural nature beyond man's control. We have addressed those.

The hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, just a couple of weeks ago, was able to introduce a budgetary measure to bring relief to the fishermen in Atlantic Canada and parts of Quebec who are experiencing this terrible, drastic circumstance in the fishery.

In the long run, however, the application of the ACOA program and the application of the transfer system have produced successes such as I have just described by Mr. McKenna in New Brunswick. We are going to see tremendous success in Newfoundland in the months and years to come as a result of the Hibernia investment, again sponsored by this government. I believe we are going to see a recovery in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island as well.

In response to the question I would say that the measures taken by this government since 1984 have already reflected increased employment, significantly increased employment. The painful experiences of recent months with respect to the unemployment created by the recession will be resolved by the measures taken during those recent months and will reflect themselves in an increasing employment and prosperity in Atlantic Canada in the year ahead and the years to follow.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague for Fredericton—York—Sunbury a question in a bit of a different vein. He or I may disagree on whether the government's attempts at economic development through fiscal transfers, equalization, EPF and special economic regional development agreements have been sufficient or whether they have increased or decreased. I think we could argue those points fairly eloquently all day, but I want to ask him a question in a different vein.

The member is a representative of a riding in Atlantic Canada, a riding that is not terribly dissimilar to other ridings like my own in Atlantic Canada. As a member of Parliament, not as a Liberal, I ask him: Does he think that the Atlantic provinces and premiers in the coming weeks or months as the constitutional negotiations go on have to coalesce their desires and their aspirations? In particular, does he believe that there is a necessity to accelerate the economic union talks that are currently going on?

I know that his premier in New Brunswick is fully supportive of it. My premier in Nova Scotia is fully supportive, as is the premier in P.E.I., and Newfoundland is participating as an observer at least.

Does the member believe that the true answer to economic development in the Atlantic region is in a concerted effort by all of the provincial premiers to have an economic union so we can speak as one region? Does he also believe that there are some political bodies, boards or institutions which we could start looking at? When we deal with the federal government, which has conflicting demands placed on it from a very large Ontario, a very distinct Quebec and a very large and expansive west, would it be his view that the best approach for Atlantic Canada to get out of its perpetual position of disparity is to accelerate those talks on maritime economic union and to look at some political boards or bodies so that we can, in the future, represent our joint and collective interest to the federal government as one body as opposed to four different provincial legislatures?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I think unity and prosperity in this country go together. In my address I made the point, all too little known frankly and little appreciated, about just how dramatically dependent we are on our Confederation dividends from the rest of Canada. I said the figure was $8.2 billion in 1988 and it is larger now, $3,600 per person.

If any area of Canada has a vested interest in the unity of this country it is Atlantic Canada. I want to say here and now that I stand proudly and strongly and irrevocably in support of one unified country.

An hon. member: So do we all.

Mr. Bird: I have no doubt about that.

As to joining our efforts in Atlantic Canada, yes, we should do so wherever it makes sense. At the same time, however, we have our own characteristics as provinces. I am not sure, for example, that we should ask the Acadians to subordinate their culture and their distinctive identify into a larger amalgam simply because it makes good sense to be larger. I am not at all sure that it is better to have one voice than four voices, but it does make sense to co-operate as much as we can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): Shall we call it one o'clock?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, if I might have a moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): Thirty seconds.

Ms. Clancy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to say to you that rather than commence my remarks at this point I would be delighted if you would call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in February 1991 at the Prime Minister's request the University Research Committee of the Royal Society of Canada released the report Realizing the Potential: A Strategy for University Research in Canada. I wish to express my enthusiasm for that report which seems to have been forgotten by the government which is so preoccupied with the bottom line.

I would especially urge the government to accommodate the report's recommendation that the budget of the three research councils be increased. I know that the government is concerned with the deficit. I agree that we must spend within our limits the money we have to spend.

I also agree with one of Canada's foremost entrepreneurs Mr. John Panabaker of Mutual Life that the recommended expenditure on research council, which is less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the GNP over five years, should be dramatically increased.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that this government realize the most important resource of this country is its people. Let us harness that resource to its full potential.

CONSEIL DU PATRONAT DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on October 22, the Quebec caucus met 13 members of the executive of the Conseil du patronat du Québec, headed by Mr. Ghislain Dufour, a dynamic and effective leader.

The CPQ agreed that good government means doing what you can. For nearly two hours, we discussed some very substantial recommendations by the CPQ on federal government administration. We were very much on the same wave length, and quite often our objectives were the same, such as cutbacks and restructuring; reducing the deficit and keeping interest rates low; controlling inflation; the value of the Canadian dollar versus the American dollar, and so forth.

The CPQ is opposed to subsidizing industry but favours government assistance for research and development and export assistance as well.

On the whole, this kind of meeting the CPQ and the Quebec P.C. caucus is an excellent exercise for political leaders and an opportunity for us to emphasize progressive policies conducive to the harmonious development of Quebec businesses.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this exercise will be repeated on a more regular basis.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow afternoon this House will be debating my private member's motion on the David Milgaard murder case.

There is growing evidence that a grave injustice was done in convicting a young man who was 16 at the time. Just in the last few weeks there has been new evidence. There has been a report by Professor Neil Boyd of the School of Criminology at Simon Fraser University and Kim Rossmo of that same university in which new evidence is brought forward, to wit the forensic expert in the case would give different testimony today. Also a profile of a serial rapist who lived and operated near the scene fits the prime leading suspect.

I want to quote from the report which says: "There is virtually no case against David Milgaard". I challenge the Minister of Justice, who is now considering a new trial, that she overcome the bureaucratic inertia and order a new trial, and finally, that she take part in the debate tomorrow afternoon and bring her evidence before this House as I will in bringing the Boyd report before the House.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, small businesses are big business in Canada.

The importance of small business is often overlooked. Yet in the last 10 years it has represented 97 per cent of Canadian business. Firms with less than 50 employees create four out of five new jobs in Canada. One Canadian family in seven has money invested in a small business farm or professional practice.

With the free trade agreement, new opportunities are benefiting Canadian businessmen. Our government is committed to creating an economic climate conducive to small business. The Federal Development Bank offers management and financing services. Western diversification has assisted a number of small businesses. Industry, Science and Technology Canada is providing valuable assistance to improve our international competitiveness.

Last week my constituency office organized a federal government business information seminar to provide information on and assistance with government programs. We believe small business is the key to prosperity in Canada.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, October 21 to October 25 is Small Business Week in Canada. I would like to take this opportunity to salute the efforts of small business people across Canada.

Small business is the economic lifeblood of our country and our prosperity depends heavily on small business. This is especially true in my province of Prince Edward Island where there is no heavy industries or sizeable manufacturing base.

It is the tourist operators, the farmers, the fishermen and others of the province who make our economy run. Owning and operating a small business is a tremendous education and at times it can be very difficult.

This is especially true under the economic policies of this government. High interest rates and high taxes are driving down business and forcing many business owners to close their doors.

I call on this government to finally recognize the tremendous contribution made by small business in Canada and to implement economic policies to help them grow, not fold.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, acknowledging the difficult decisions which the CBC continues to face in reconciling its strategic operations to the realities of restrained budget resources, there remains one lasting omission in its broadcasting structure to serve all Canadians.

That missing link is an English language television station for the province of New Brunswick. While serious considerations have been given over many years to fill this void, it remains a fact that New Brunswick does not have a representative place at the national broadcasting table in Canada.

This is an intolerable situation, particularly in these times when national reconciliation, when New Brunswick serves as the only working model of our nation's linguistic duality.

Our province must be provided with a direct opportunity that such a CBC TV station would serve, to fully share and exchange the programming potential that will continue to our role in defining the national identity.

It is time for CBC to consider a new and difficult investment. I call on the leadership of the CBC to please address this matter on a constructive and current basis.

SUDDEN INFANT DEATH SYNDROME AWARENESS MONTH

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River: Mr. Speaker, the month of October has been declared SIDS or Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Awareness Month.

SIDS, which is sometimes referred to as crib death, strikes down apparently healthy babies suddenly and unexpectedly, leaving behind grieving families and a powerless medical profession.

Several families from Beaver River, including neighbours of mine, have recently lost a child to SIDS.

SIDS is now the leading single cause of death in infants under one year of age after the newborn period. While deaths from SIDS have increased, those from other causes such as accidents have decreased. This dreadful syndrome has no known cause and cannot be predicted or prevented.

The Canadian Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths will be holding its annual conference in Prince Edward Island from November 1 to 3. This year's theme will be "Working Toward a Brighter Future". This conference will gather professionals and volunteers as well as parents of young SIDS victims.

I am sure that I share the sentiments of all hon. members from this House in sending the foundation our House's wishes for a successful conference as they strive to understand, deal with and sometimes eliminate sudden infant death syndrome.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, the battle continues to rage and the people of Yugoslavia struggle to preserve what is left of their homeland. There seems to be little sign of conclusion.

For family and friends living in Canada it means they wage their own quiet battle of despair and fear. I have met with several of these people who ask me again and again to do all I can to stop the destruction of their homeland.

If as yet we cannot find it in ourselves as a government to recognize Croatia as an independent state, I urge that we continue to consider the important implications Canada's recognition could bring to this war torn country.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to do all she can on behalf of Canada to see that this extreme situation is brought to a swift conclusion. I will not be able to find the conviction to tell my Croatian constituents to be patient much longer.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, this government is failing to address a threat to Canadians and the world, that is ozone depletion.

A UN study just released warns that ozone damage is far worse than previously feared. A further 3 per cent reduction in the ozone layer is predicted by the year 2000 if the present rate of depletion continues. Skin cancer and crop failure will increase, according to UN scientists.

Canada's agreement to phase out chlorofluorocarbons by the year 1997 is not good enough, according to these same UN scientists. Canadian regulations have still not been introduced which will meet even this goal.

Despite continued calls by the public to have company executives held responsible for pollution and recent industry calls to have the polluter pay principle enacted to curb greenhouse gas emissions, the government has not acted.

This government must institute regulations to achieve an immediate reduction of ozone destroying CFCs and similarly lend technical and financial assistance to developing nations. Canada should also show leadership by immediately calling for an international meeting to set new goals for emission reduction.

LOUVICOURT MINING PROJECT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Louvicourt mining project in Abitibi is one of the biggest discoveries in recent years, both in Canada and worldwide. It compares with Kid Creek, and in fact, Val-d'Or has not seen anything like it for the past 20 years.

AUR Resources can now start exploration of its major mining discovery in Val-d'Or—Louvicourt, which will generate 522 direct jobs and revenues totalling $2 billion. This extremely rich property is 55 per cent owned by AUR Resources of Toronto, while the remaining 45 per cent is owned by Louvem of Montreal.

Since last year, Mr. Robert Bryce, Vice President, Production, of AUR Resources, has been working in Val-d'Or. If all goes well, production should start by the end of 1993. Commercial production should be under way by 1994, and operations will be in full swing, with an output of 1.8 million tons a year, by 1997.

Many thanks to the people in the Quebec and Canadian mining industry.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention by many of my constituents in Egmont of a new policy of Employment and Immigration Canada which is causing a great deal of hardship and controversy. It is this. It is called an insurable employment questionnaire and it has to be filled out and returned with an application for UIC benefits.

The first question on the questionnaire is: "Are you related to any of your employers by blood, marriage, including common law, or adoption?"

Immediately the question arises in the minds of the applicant that there is something wrong or evil if he or she is related to the employer.

There is a feeling of guilt or wrongdoing if such is the case. In many small communities such as those in Prince Edward Island, and especially fishing communities, this is indeed the case. Many employers are related to their employees. It has always been the case.

Suddenly there is an implication of something illegal with an employee being related to an employer. If the applicant checks "yes" then the UI application goes to Revenue Canada for an insurability ruling which takes two to three weeks, which in turn results in a six to eight week delay in the applicant receiving UIC benefits.

The other two questions are: Do you have a controlling interest in any of the companies for which you work, and, are you involved in any business relationship with your employer.

My questions, Mr. Speaker, areas follows: Is this questionnaire discriminatory? Does it infringe on the rights of our citizens and their Charter of Rights and Freedoms and why are applicants for UI being harassed in this way?

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Joining my colleague from Brampton—Malton, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call upon the world through this House to immediately intervene in Yugoslavia, to stop the bloodshed and oversee a peaceful resolution to the demands for independence being made by the various states, such as Croatia and Macedonia.

Today, Dubrovnik is being bombarded by the federal Serbian forces, destroying a 14th century city contrary to international law. Even the Nazis during the Second World War respected this law. More importantly, I call upon this House to extend immediate humanitarian aid of food and medical supplies to the Croatian people whose crops have been destroyed or disrupted by war.

This is the time for free men and women of Canada to act compassionately, decisively and immediately.

CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise in the House today to give special recognition to the work of the co-op movement in this country. National Co-Op Week was held recently to recognize the importance of this movement right across the country. In a quiet way, the co-op movement has permeated virtually every aspect of our community's social and economic fabric. Working at the grass roots level it has become an important force in our development and every effort should be made to ensure that a level playing field is provided the co-op movement.

The GST is one thorn in the side of co-operatives. It puts them at a disadvantage with other competitors in the retail sector. As it stands now, for example, in retail co-ops where groceries are sold, co-op membership fees are being taxed. This is unfair. In effect, members are being taxed on zero-rated items and the costs in terms of dollars as well as competitiveness are extreme.

I call upon the Minister of Finance to deal the co-ops a fair hand. Remove this inequitable tax and allow them equal footing as their competitors.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the four Atlantic premiers met yesterday in Halifax to discuss the reduction in federal transfer payments for the 1991-92 fiscal year.

The premiers recognize that under the present funding formula, the Atlantic provinces are suffering as a result of the slowdown in the economies of the richer provinces, particularly Ontario.

No one will argue with the point that these reductions will place the provinces in a difficult position. The premiers have opted to seek constructive alternatives to the present funding arrangements between Ottawa and the provinces and work toward streamlining of services and strengthening their provinces' voices in determining where and how regional development moneys are spent.

I applaud the Atlantic premiers for their positive approach to a very, very difficult problem.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In the 1989 Budget, the government promised there would be no increase in unemployment insurance premium rates in times of economic stress. Canada is now going through very hard times. There are over 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, and Montreal alone has more than 200,000 unemployed. In July, however, the government broke its promise when it increased UI premum rates by 24 per cent, and now it is rumoured there will be another increase of 14 per cent. Is it true the government intends to saddle Canadians with another increase in unemployment insurance premium rates next January?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong in her assertion. If we were to follow her line of thinking, we would violate the legislation. The legislation clearly outlines that the unemployment insurance account must be maintained on a self-sustaining basis.

In terms of any projections of future rate increases, the hon. member I am sure is aware that the process is very clear. The commission makes recommendations with respect to any changes in UI rate premiums, and that is subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. A rate has not been set and a recommendation has not come forward to me, so it would be premature to make any further comment.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

I would like to read to the minister the words of his predecessor in the 1989 budget when he said: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums".

Does the minister believe that we are living in difficult times right now, and if he does believe that 1.5 million Canadians are living in difficult times, will he do the right thing and guarantee no increase in the unemployment insurance premiums?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, whenever a recommendation comes forth, all of these things will be taken into consideration.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I see it is not just the Prime Minister's own UI scheme that the government is refusing to answer questions about, it is everyone else's as well.

I would like an answer from the Minister of Finance today. He made a promise by way of his predecessor in the 1989 budget that in tough times there would be no UI premium increases. The government broke that promise in July with a 24 per cent increase and it is now contemplating to hit taxpayers with another 14 per cent indirect tax hike.

Will the Minister of Finance guarantee that he is going to give some life to the economic recovery by denying any further UI increases?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it really is unfortunate that the hon. member does not listen to answers.

I said in the answer to her first question that the process is very clear. The commission sets the rate subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. That recommendation has not come forward. There is no recommendation so I cannot give it any consideration. I said in my second answer to her that all of the elements of the current prevailing climate would be taken into consideration.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, for the last three years not only have some of the heads of our Crown corporations received an annual bonus on their salary of up to 25 per cent, but now we discover that their salaries have increased by over $100,000 a year.

I want to ask the government by what logic can the chief executive officer of CN receive $396,000 a year plus a bonus? By what logic did the head of Canada Post get a $105,000 salary increase and now make over $300,000 a year plus a bonus? Is it because of the number of post offices and jobs he has done away with? Why these obscene, secret salary increases?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I do not agree at all with the statement just made by the hon. member. I repeat, his numbers are not true. He has access to the salary ranges, which are public.

I will repeat again that managers in the Public Service or in a Crown corporation receive a compensation package made up of two parts, salary and a performance pay. I do not intend to apologize for that because this is a good way of passing judgment on their efficiency. I do not apologize for that.

I will say again that all of those who come under the Canadian government will get 0 per cent increase in salary and 0 per cent increase in bonus for this year.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the salary range of the head of Canada Post went up $170,000 in the past three years.

Not only do government appointed Crown corporation executives receive bonuses, but now we discover that all executives of Crown corporations receive bonuses, compliments of the politically appointed boards of directors.

By what logic can politically appointed boards of directors use taxpayers money to give annual bonuses? By what logic can the recently appointed hairdresser to the board of the Federal Business Development Bank be giving out annual bonuses? Why does he not give them all a perm? That is good for a year, is it not?

An hon. member: No it isn't, George.

An hon. member: No, it isn't, George. That's a question to curl your hair. You got a perm last year and I want to know about it.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will need to take an increase. I cannot hardly take a perm, can I?

I am very surprised. This has come up a couple of times in the House, the rather negative statement about small business people. I have listened to the hon. member time and time again in the House and I listen to him very attentively because he can be very amusing. If I have to choose between the judgment of a small businessman and his, I will take the small businessman any time.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Today the Business Council on National Issues released its study by Michael Porter on Canadian competitiveness. Not surprisingly, given the source of the document, it is a study that supports many of this government's failed economic policies.

My question for the Minister for International Trade is this. What role did government officials play in helping to draft and prepare this document?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any role they played. We had discussions with Mr. Porter about a year ago now. When the contract was let, we requested Mr. Porter and his group to provide information on our competitive position using the various techniques that he has supplied in the case of a number of other countries.

As my hon. friend is aware, Mr. Porter has done studies of this kind in the case of at least a dozen other countries. We felt that would be useful. Mr. Porter has applied those techniques and out of that has come the study.

I might say to my hon. friend that he did have the guidance of a committee of experts in Canada who were advising him on certain Canadian aspects of it, but there are not any government officials on that group of experts.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have in my possession documents that were obtained through freedom of information which indicate that government officials in fact were deeply involved in defining the parameters of this study, in developing a communications strategy in co-operation with BCNI, indicating that senior officials discussed with Porter and with BCNI the themes of the final conclusions of this report.

I want to ask the minister: Why did the government provide $400,000 to its friends in corporate Canada to prepare this report? Why did it try to circumvent the direct role that an independent study should play? Why did it instead attempt to persuade Canadians that this was a study which came from other than the government when the government was involved up to its neck?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to the hon. member that we did set some parameters for the study as part of the ground rules that we set any time we provide public funding for a study. We say: "Here is what we want you to review".

Mr. Porter is an author of 12 books, 45 articles, an internationally recognized expert on competitiveness and provides advice to a range of major corporations around the world. If he is suggesting that Mr. Porter is going to make changes to his report based on requests from government officials, then I think he is selling short the quality of the man we have asked to do this work. I think the description that I have here of what Mr. Porter has done in advising on competitiveness would support the position that I have taken.

As I have said, we provide some parameters for him, as we would do in any case, but then it is up to Mr. Porter to write the review.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me just quote briefly from several of these documents, first from proposed clauses between the federal government and BCNI Communications, "BCNI and the government are to jointly develop an over-all communications plan"; second, from a memorandum from the Business Council on National Issues to the government advisory board, "preliminary discussion of the themes of the final chapter of the document which will address implications of the study findings for business and government".

I ask the government why it is trying to cover up the fact that it has been a major author of what is in fact a defence of government policies rather than an independent study.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to use language that is not appropriate to this House to describe the questions and the allegations that my hon. friend has just made.

Certainly we are going to sit down with Mr. Porter and make sure that the areas we want him to cover in a report are covered so that we can make sure that the $400,000, in this case, will be properly spent.

I would also say to my hon. friend that we have had similar types of discussions with the Canadian Labour Congress on a study that it wishes to do on the competitive position of the Canadian economy. We will apply the same ground rules with them. We will sit down with them and discuss what the parameters of any study will be and we will sit down with them from time to time to make sure that the work as it continues follows the guidelines and the rules set out by us in establishing that there is an appropriate use of government funds.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of the Environment. Canada is already committed to eliminating all CFCs by 1997. On Tuesday, a UN report concluded that current reduction measures are inadequate. The ozone layer is deteriorating twice as fast as expected.

Will the government follow the example of other countries like Germany and Norway? Will it make a commitment today to eliminate all CFCs by 1995, at the latest?

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to discuss this issue because Canada is a real leader in CFC reduction, as it was stated in the Montreal Protocol of 1988.

CFCs in our own schedule are to be reduced by 1997. But I would like to remind the hon. member that a very substantial commitment has been made by the green plan concerning the CFC reductions and the improving of the regulations.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): That kind of reply is simply inappropriate. The United Nations has just said that the basis for those commitments is entirely inappropriate, that the situation is twice as bad as we thought it was.

My question for the minister is this. Will the government call for an immediate emergency meeting of the world body that is dealing with the ozone layer? Will the government call for a meeting that will deal not only with CFCs but one that will, as well, call for an urgent end to all other ozone depleting chemicals? Canada has a leadership position. Take it.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada and Environment Canada have taken a real leadership role in this issue and the hon. member knows that. I want to remind him that we will be sitting down with other countries in order to review that. Our position is very clear and very strong.

CANADA POST

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In today's Ottawa Citizen Canada Post vice-president Harold Dunstan is quoted as saying: "Yesterday we thought we had an agreement. The union thought we had an agreement and Justice Gold thought we had an agreement. So there must be an agreement there".

It was also yesterday that Justice Alan Gold resigned as the government appointed mediator in this dispute.

Will the minister explain to this House why Justice Gold resigned when it appeared to both sides and to Justice Gold that an agreement was imminent?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House would with me like to thank Justice Gold for the excellent work that he did—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danis: —and for the excellent work that he has done for this country for a number of years as Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court.

The contract agreement ended on July 31, 1989. At that time the government appointed a conciliation commission which went on for approximately 10 months. There were over 70 meetings. At that time also there were over 300 issues that were not solved.

When we got the report I then appointed Justice Gold. At that time there were 22 items that had not been solved and I now understand they are down to very few. A lot of progress has been made by both sides, but it was Justice Gold's judgment that an agreement could not be reached. That is why he withdrew.

Second to my boss, the Prime Minister, Justice Gold is the best mediator we have in this country.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

I met with union officials this morning and they tell me the statements made by Mr. Dunstan in today's Ottawa Citizen are accurate so I do not buy the argument by the Minister of Labour. Furthermore, Justice Gold is also quoted in that same article as saying: "What I learned during the process I will take with me to the grave".

Will the minister acknowledge that the real reason behind Justice Gold's decision to resign is that he was pressured by this government and by the minister? Will the minister please give us the real story?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, anybody who knows Justice Gold, even by reputation, knows that is an impossibility.

The reality is that on a number of occasions all parties thought they were very close only to go back to the table to find they had spread apart and subsequently they came close together.

There is still an opportunity to reach a settlement at the table. I hope they will do so. Justice Gold gave it his best shot. He thought there was no more useful purpose to be served by him staying there.

As I say, they can still reach an agreement. They met yesterday afternoon. They do not have plans to meet again, but they can meet at any time and if there is goodwill on both sides they can reach that agreement. I hope they do that because I do not think the people of Canada need to again endure the disruption and cost of another postal strike. That would be the most irresponsible thing that could happen.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As the minister knows, the Yugoslav army has been ruthlessly shelling the historic city of Dubrovnik, wreaking devastation, injury and death, including an attack on the city hospital.

I want to ask the minister if the government will now condemn in the strongest possible terms this outrageous attack, provide desperately needed humanitarian aid directly to the people of Croatia and make sure that it gets through to the people of Croatia, impose with the European Community strong sanctions, and finally insist upon the immediate withdrawal of the army from Croatia so that the will of the Croatian people for independence can finally be recognized.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we propose to do. We are going to be raising the question of the Dubrovnik damage at the UNESCO conference in Paris today or tomorrow. We will be condemning, in the strongest possible terms, this senseless destruction.

• (1440)

The Prime Minister has taken the initiative to put this issue before the Security Council of the United Nations. We are working with our friends in the European Community to ensure that we get the broadest possible front, whether it is sanctions, peacekeeping or international condemnation, of what is happening in Yugoslavia today.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. The minister has still not indicated when the Canadian government is going to show leadership on the issue of sanctions. I think that is what Canadians want to hear.

My supplementary relates to another area in which there has been enormous personal tragedy and violence, Nagorno Karabakh.

In view of the history of deportations, shooting and detention of Armenians and the closing of the airport at Stephanakert, will the Canadian government support an international UN peacekeeping force in Karabakh and will we provide urgently needed humanitarian aid directly to the people of Nagorno Karabakh?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, these are all matters we are discussing with partners in the European Community and other countries who have like-minded objectives in this regard. We are doing everything we can possibly do on an internationally co-operative basis to cause many ceasefires to be held to so that we can see an end to this senseless destruction.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Canadians did not need the long overdue million dollar Porter study to realize that we are in trouble, that our competitiveness is falling, that unemployment is a major problem, that we are pitifully weak in science and technology, research and development and that training is wholly inadequate.

Will the industry minister tell us just what it is that he learned from the Porter study that Canadians and his own industry officials did not already know?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there have been, as my hon. friend is aware, a number of studies. There is not a clear consensus or a clear understanding as to what should be done. It is precisely for that reason that we asked Mr. Porter and his group of experts to review Canada, taking into account the international experience they have gained over the years in studying similar situations in over a dozen countries.

We are going to be launching, as my friend is well aware, a broad consultation within Canada so that we can pull together all of this work in a way that generates a national consensus. Out of this we can have a national action plan that will get the full power of the nation, not one level of government, not two levels of government, not the private sector, but everybody pulling together behind this national problem and improving our competitiveness.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, while this government dabbles, the clock is ticking away on Canada's economic future. We need action. We do not need more studies.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Peterson: Even Mr. Porter recognized that, and I quote: "Labour should be treated as a partner, not as an adversary". How can Canada be competitive when it is this government's policy and agenda to beat labour into submission? What steps will this government announce today to ensure that labour becomes a full partner in Canada's economic renewal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend and the member for Windsor have both been critical of government policy.

Today we have interest rates below 8 per cent. The Treasury bill rate is below 8 per cent for the first time in close to 10 or 12 years.

An hon. member: It is 13 years.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): In 13 years. So we have seen the results of the policies we have been following translated into real action in the marketplace that are bringing down interest rates and through that reduction in interest rates, generating the economic recovery that my friend is asking for.

My hon. friend says he wants action. There is the action. There is the performance that is going to bring about the economic recovery that we need in the country.

As regards labour and the role of labour, I think my hon. friend is quite well aware through reading the newspapers that, far from doing what he suggests we had done in his stupid preamble, we have been working with the Canadian Labour Congress to see that it is part of the consultations that we will be launching next week.

For its reasons, it has decided not to. I am sorry that that is the case, but I am sure that through other means and representations, through other involvements, the voice of labour will be heard in a strong way in these consultations.

TRAINING

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the Porter report on Canada's competitiveness is just the latest in a long line of reports that tells this government that Canada needs to seriously commit itself to training.

Before this report, we had reports from the Conference Board, the Economic Council and the DeGrandpré commission. I would like to ask the government how many reports it is going to wait for and how quickly are we going to get action on this extremely important issue to global competitiveness, namely national training.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the way the hon. member asks the question suggests that we have not done anything on training.

We started from a point of about zero government funds being spent on training when we took over the government from the Liberal Party in 1984. We have moved that to a point where this year there will be some $2.2 billion in federal government funding for training programs.

What my hon. friend misses is that governments alone cannot solve this problem. There are reports that show that the private sector in Canada is spending .03 per cent of our national income on training programs.

To put this into context, company training programs in the United States are double that. It is .6 per cent. In Japan, it is 1.2 per cent and in Germany, it is 2.4 per cent. What we have to do in this broad national consultation is impress upon the private sector management and labour alike that it is extremely important for the private sector to do its job in generating a greater degree of spending and commitment to training programs so that we can deal with the challenges that we are facing in an internationally globally competitive economy.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, what this nation needs is not more and more consultation. What this nation needs is action on the issue of training.

The minister's response inadvertently draws attention to his government's incompetence on this issue. Reports today indicate that the Canadian Labour Force Development Board has recommended an additional $400 million be spent on training. Half of that would go just to compensate for the cuts this government has made in the last two years.

I ask the minister: When is this government going to understand that if Canada is to compete globally, this government has to do more, not less, in the area of training.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot talk out of both sides of his mouth because we have demonstrated action in going from zero to $2.25 billion.

Part of those moneys was on legislation that was delayed by the Liberal Party of Canada for a full year. If the hon. member is criticizing the government for not spending more on training, it is only in the mirror that he should be looking to see why the delays occurred.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for International Trade.

Last week in Chicago, the minister said: "No man, no woman, no child goes without adequate medical care, decent shelter or proper food in Canada.

The minister surely knows that over 2 million Canadians live on welfare. Over 1 million Canadian children go to bed hungry at night and over 100,000 Canadians are homeless. In light of all this evidence of hunger and homelessness in Canada, why did the minister make such an erroneous statement to his American audience?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member should look at the context of that comment. I was making it in the context of a statement whereby the United Nations has stated that Canada is the second best place in the world to live, that we have the second highest level of measurement in a range of things including health care, the environment, and other things related to welfare.

• (1450)

We have in this country one of the best welfare programs in the world today. We have one of the best unemployment insurance programs in the world today.

The hon. member, in standing up and making the statements that he has just made, is casting doubts on what is widely regarded in other countries as the one of the best combinations of programs to support people in poverty, in hunger and who are in need of health care.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

One year ago in this House, October 26, in response to reports that there was a large projected deficit in the unemployment insurance account, the then Minister of Finance referred to the fact that there were fixed rates for UI premium rates for three years and said that: "If there is any shortfall then this will be made up by the government".

One year later we have another indication that there will be a shortfall. Will the government keep its promise that it did not keep last year when it increased UI premium rates by 24 per cent, and ensure that any shortfall will be picked up by the federal government as it promised? You promised it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in the House on two different occasions.

The hon. member is speculating on a premium rate change. All I can say to him is that the process is very clear. The UI Commission makes a recommendation for any rate increase or the maintenance of the status quo as a recommendation to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Finance has to approve it. That recommendation has not been forthcoming. The rate has not been set and, therefore, I cannot comment on the hon. member's question until such time as the recommendation is brought forward.

FISHERIES

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Employment and Immigration). The Coopérative des pêcheurs commerciaux du Lac-Saint-Pierre applied for a $200,000 grant under the community investment fund program. After spending two years preparing their case, which meets all the program's criteria, Quebec head office unanimously recommended—I have the document right here—that the department approve the grant. I may remind the minister that this was a request for start-up funds, not a job-creation program. Could the minister perhaps explain why she used her discretion in such a partisan way and refused to approve this grant, thus endangering the survival of freshwater fishing in Quebec?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am amazed the hon. member opposite should direct inquiries about the state of his riding business to a federal minister.

I am acquainted with the case. The hon. member and I discussed it several times in the lobby of this House. I even met the sponsors of this project to try and find a way out of the administrative impasse that had developed.

At that meeting I made a counter-proposal that was rejected out of hand. I felt that, as a minister, my responsibility included job creation, and that is why I made this proposal. The reasons why your request was rejected were mentioned in a letter I sent to the Quebec Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, with reference to an announcement made in my riding on May 24, this year. I think we could continue this discussion outside this House.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised at the minister's response. The minister said it was for administrative reasons, but there are no administrative reasons. The recommendation made by her own departments to her office was unanimous.

The minister indicated there was no partisanship involved. I have here a letter signed by the mayor of Bécancourt, the president of the Community Futures Centre, the director of the credit union, by five people who met the minister and who said the minister told them she turned down the request because the member for Richelieu was a member of the opposition. Is the minister prepared to sign the recommendation made by her senior officials and save the fisheries in Quebec, and thus shed the negative image this has created for the department and the program?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member hides behind our senior officials and airs publicly the results of negotiations conducted as part of an approval process. I am the minister responsible for implementing our job creation programs. I entered politics in 1984 to help our co-operatives and communities, and I resent being taken to task and scolded for being partisan because I made an administrative counter-proposal to break the administrative impasse in this particular case.

CANADA AT THE CROSSROADS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this morning Professor Porter's major study on competitiveness called "Canada at the Crossroads" was unveiled. My question is about the report and it is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

At its heart the report says that for Canada to be competitive, we must have co-ordinated economic policies between Ottawa and the provinces, have free trade within Canada and balanced budgets at all levels of government. I would like to know if the minister agrees with those goals and if he thinks they are realistic and can be achieved.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all I do agree with these specific thoughts that are in the Porter report. I would also make the point that what is needed here is not a period of partisan game playing as we saw in the House today, but a recognition that there are some very serious problems that we are facing in training programs, in the development of more research and development, in dealing with the problems of a common market within the country and how we improve our activities internationally.

We would welcome the active participation of members opposite as I know we will get from members on this side of the House in dealing with what is a national problem of challenging our private sector and governments to deal—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move on. The hon. member for Halifax.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency released its report "The State of Small Business and Entrepreneurship in Atlantic Canada" at a cost of $80,000. At the same time the unemployment figures in Nova Scotia are at 11.6 per cent and also in Nova Scotia bankruptcies are at the highest level in the entire country.

Will the Minister of Finance tell us what specific programs that he is putting in place to combat what is effectively the economic collapse in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member opposite, there are many programs that are already in place that are worked in conjunction with the Atlantic provinces. ACOA is only one of the programs which is administered mainly by the federal government. There are always ongoing talks with the premiers in Atlantic Canada for ways and means of improving the situation in their economy.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his answer but I again place a question to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister responsible for ACOA.

Will the minister finally agree with the Atlantic provinces premiers and set up a committee that will look at the mandate, the funding and the effectiveness of ACOA as a regional development agency?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we will look at any positive suggestions to improve the economic fortunes in Atlantic Canada. I think the best thing that we can say today is that interest rates continue to decline because we have brought inflation down to a tolerable level. As the Minister for International Trade pointed out, for the first time in probably 13 years the Treasury bill rate has dropped below 8 per cent. The bank rate is 8.17 as of today. That is a 13 basis points decline today.

I think that is heading in the right direction.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Immigration. According to today's Ottawa Citizen the Liberal immigration critic has proposed incarcerating refugee claimants while they await processing. This proposal has been described by the counsel for the Canadian Council of Churches as "sounding like the refugee concentration camps in Hong Kong".

• (1500)

He also calls it a stupid idea. Can the minister advise the House whether such an idea is the policy of this government and whether it ever will be for electoral or any other purposes?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): No, Mr. Speaker, this government never intended to set up a camp for refugee claimants, whether it is called "Welcome to Canada" or anything else. What we have done is to set up an administrative and judicial refugee determination process that is recognized as a model nationally and internationally. This system treats men and women equally, helps legitimate claimants and firmly sends back those who are not.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for youth.

With this latest government initiative against school dropouts why has the minister not announced comprehensive evaluation plans to be able to determine what kind of success this particular initiative might have?

How will Canadians know whether or not our young people will be able to get better jobs as a result of this particular program? When will the minister be able to tell this House and Canadians what he expects to do in this area?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has answered the question of what we expect to do in this area. We have a program in place that is being implemented across the land. I am told it is very successful, and as soon as I have some concrete numbers I will be very pleased to share them with the House.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State. About five million Canadians are functionally illiterate, and the federal government has decided to try to help them. Can the minister responsible for this program say how many people who were functionally illiterate can now find jobs in Canada as a result of this involvement?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, since this is a very specific question which should perhaps have been put on the Order Paper and since my colleague, the Secretary of State, is unfortunately not here today, I take note of the question and am sure that my colleague will answer him as soon as possible.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last June the former Secretary of State for External Affairs assured us that the atmospheric releases of radioactive contaminants from the Hanford nuclear waste facility south of the B.C.-Washington border posed no negative impact to Canada.

Today we find out that Canada's Atomic Energy Board actively discouraged the federal government from questioning U.S. officials about such radiation leaks for fear of reciprocal scrutiny of Canadian operations.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he will come clean and admit that the Atomic Energy Control Board has failed in its role as Canada's nuclear—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can put his question without the suggestion that there is some sort of wrongdoing on the part of the minister.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the question because it gives me an opportunity to put the facts on the record.

Mr. Norm Rubin is stated as saying that he was not able to get the letter. I have the letter here. He had a copy of it and I would be willing not only to table it but I would also like to be able to table the results.

In the results the point is this: the levels are being set internationally. We then set them even below that for Canadian standards and then below that. It was at 2 per cent of those levels.

We want to be in favour of the environment. We want to be in favour of the veracity of regulatory agencies. We want truth here. I expect it from members opposite too.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the deputy House leader concerning the business for tomorrow and the remaining parts of next week.

While the minister is on his feet, I wonder if he could indicate to the House whether or not the Minister of Labour who is in the Chamber will be making a statement tomorrow under ministerial statements explaining to the House what has transpired or not transpired with regard to the postal dispute that has resulted in the mediator resigning.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to introduce an act tomorrow to provide for the continuation of postal services. We hope that after discussions among the usual channels we can call it for debate at second reading on that day and possibly complete debate at all stages later on the same day. If not, then it is our intention to call Bill C-35, respecting the Miscellaneous Act, for completion at second reading and government Motion No. 5 on decorum in the House for completion.

For Monday and Tuesday, depending on the discussions with regard to the postal service bill, we will then decide what business will be called.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, that comes as somewhat of a surprise in view of the discussions that transpired among the House leaders of the respective parties. We thought that we would be proceeding on Friday as agreed with the conflict of interest motion that the government was going to put before the House.

Can the minister indicate whether or not the Minister of Labour will be responding to a specific question that I have raised with regard to a ministerial statement tomorrow about the post office?

Mr. Cadieux: It is my understanding that the Minister of Labour will be speaking with his critics this afternoon. I am sure that when the legislation is tabled, if it is tabled tomorrow and if debate occurs, the minister will be speaking in the debate.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I know that the deputy House leader does not wish me to get into the realm of the hypothetical, but this is a deviation from what we had agreed to earlier in the week.

Consent will have to be given by the House in order to proceed with the postal legislation. If we assume for a moment that it is not available, would the Minister of Labour indicate to the House if it is his intention, in view of what has transpired, under ministerial statements to give a comprehensive statement to Parliament as to what has occurred in terms of the breakdown and/or resignation of the mediator who the government appointed in the Canada Post dispute? Would the Minister of Labour or the deputy House leader be candid enough to give us that kind of information?

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. colleague that we should not work on hypothesis. I indicated in my answer that before the bill is tabled tomorrow there will be discussions through the usual channels. The Minister of Labour will be speaking with his critics and decisions will be made at that time. Depending on those decisions there will be acts that will follow. If need be, the Minister of Labour, as I have indicated, will be speaking in the House and I am sure that as Minister of Labour introducing that legislation he will be speaking.

If the Minister of Labour, after discussion with his critics, determines that he should do something else he will make that decision at that time.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY (S. O. 81)—ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Baker (p. 3918).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended at one o'clock, the Official Opposition had the floor and had agreed to divide its time into 10-minute periods each. I recognize the hon. member for Halifax; she has the floor for 10 minutes.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in this debate but I am very sorry that there is a need for it at this time.

When we recessed for the lunch hour, I had been sitting in this House listening with great interest to the remarks made by my colleague, the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, who is of course a member of the government party. It is very interesting because the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury and I have constituencies that have a great deal in common. They are both capital cities of small maritime provinces. They both have university constituents. I have five universities either within or very close to my riding. They both have several hospitals, although since Halifax is the larger centre it is the regional health authority and the regional health centre for Atlantic Canada. There are a lot of similarities between Halifax and Fredericton.

I have to say I was disappointed in the remarks of the hon. member, but I am disappointed on an almost daily basis because of the remarks of many members and ministers on the government side with regard to what is happening in Atlantic Canada.

In the city of Halifax we are very fortunate to be a centre of higher education and learning. We have universities that are second to none such as Dalhousie University with its superb professional faculties. Indeed in this House sit many graduates of that university such as the member for Kingston and the Islands. There are other members who almost graduated from that institution. and did not quite make it, but in the interest of decorum we will not get into that.

Mrs. Gaffney: Read the book.

Ms. Clancy: Absolutely. The member for Nepean says: "Read the book". I could not agree more.

However, in all seriousness, Dalhousie University, St. Mary's University, the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, the Technical University of Nova Scotia, the University of King's College, Mount St. Vincent University, the Atlantic School of Theology are all institutions of higher learning. But as I said in Question Period yesterday, their students, faculty and boards are bleeding from a thousand wounds.

The situation is no different at the University of New Brunswick or at St. Thomas University on the same campus. It is no different at UPEI as my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont, is reminding me. It is no different at the College of Cape Breton. It is no different at Memorial University. It is no different at the University of Moncton. In other words, it is no different in any of the Atlantic Canadian universities. We have the highest tuitions. We have the lowest pay for our faculty and staff. We have the oldest physical plants.

Let me tell the House about the age of some of the physical plants. Dalhousie University was Nova Scotia's centennial project, so the province has given a great deal to this university over the years that it cannot well afford. It is possible to be injured fairly severely if you walk around certain parts of one building because pieces of concrete will fall off and, if you are not careful, you will get hit by them. There are now signs around saying "stay away from this particular side of the building" because there is no money to fix it. There are also antiquated heating systems.

Last week I attended a rally of at least hundreds of students. The student union building at Dalhousie was jammed to all its doors with interested young people on the issue of their problems in the university today. One young woman stood and told us that she attends a class that should be for 15 people but there are 40 people in the class. This is really a small problem in the grand scheme of things because there are other classes that are supposed to have 20 and have 200, but the particular problem that she raised was not even the fact that 40 people are too many in a class that is suppose to have 15. The problem she raised was that the room where those young people, our children, are studying is set up for 15 people and there are 40 people in that room. If there was a fire or other problem in these ageing buildings that are under-maintained because the university has no money, what would happen to those 40 young people crowded into a space for 15?

These are the kind of realities that Atlantic Canadian universities are facing. Yet Friday this government cut upward of $170 million from Established Programs Financing.

Yesterday in Question Period, today in Question Period, every day the members from Atlantic Canada on the opposition side are on their feet talking about the needs of our constituents. We are getting a little tired of our needs, our constituents' needs, our province's needs, our region's needs falling on deaf ears.

An hon. member: And we are tired of listening to you.

Ms. Clancy: Well, no doubt you are. If that gentleman interrupts me again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call on the hon. House leader of the government to come in and protect me from indecorous acts and interruptions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Clancy: Thank you.

An hon. member: Get Harvie back.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, I want to know where he is when I need him.

After that dreadful attack, Mr. Speaker—I would think that the hon. gentleman might be able to do better.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: They are interrupting again. I do not know what I am going to do. I will just have to go and cry somewhere.

An hon. member: With Harvie.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, heaven forbid!

An hon. member: He is in there weeping.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands makes certain suggestions that are absolutely untenable.

Mr. Speaker, to get back to the serious issue at hand, the people of Atlantic Canada are very tired of coming hat in hand to the federal government. The people of Atlantic Canada are asking this government to give them the kinds of programs that create the atmosphere where they can compete.

This government is forever talking about competitiveness and when it talks about competitiveness it is putting muzzles on our universities. It is cutting our universities in two. It is decimating our universities and creating situations where our students cannot learn, where our faculties cannot do research and development, and where once great traditions are suffering because the climate is not there to allow them to do what they do best, which is to teach, to research, and to develop.

That is a crime.

I would like to touch very briefly on the second issue—

Mr. Belsher: The Liberals spend more money.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. parliamentary secretary tells me to spend more money, that is what the Liberals want to do. Actually, Mr. Parliamentary Secretary, through you Mr. Speaker, it is not such a bad idea. You have to spend some money to make some money. You have to be prepared to foster research and development if you want to have a country that is competitive and on the cutting edge. It may well be that the tight-fisted parliamentary secretary cannot see that point but perhaps he could come to some of our seminars some time and we could explain it to him.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, beyond that I do want to touch on the other area that is so important, not just to Atlantic Canada but to the country as a whole, but which in Atlantic Canada is part of the Established Programs Financing and that is health care.

My city of Halifax is the centre for most of the critical care in Atlantic Canada. We have the hospitals. We have the support programs, the rehabilitation centre, all sorts of different institutions that are involved in the care of Atlantic Canadians. Patients come from New Brunswick, Newfoundland, P.E.I., from all over Nova Scotia for treatment.

Beds are closed in our hospitals. Patients are waiting for elective surgery that if they have to wait too long can stop being elective and become crucial.

The general health of Atlantic Canadians is suffering because of the cutbacks of this government in Established Programs Financing. It is suffering because the Victoria General Hospital has to close beds. The Halifax Infirmary has to close beds. Kentville Hospital has to close beds, and on and on across the region.

Atlantic Canadians are not second-class Canadians. They are first-class Canadians. They have shown themselves to be first-class Canadians. They have first-class universities and they have first-class hospital facilities. Unfortunately, what they are getting is a second-class federal government with second-class ideas about funding.

Mr. Speaker, it is a shame.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me, as always, to hear the hon. member for Halifax make a speech in this House, and I wish to ask her some questions on what she said.

[English]

The member indicated that we have been asking questions of ministers about this very large cut. I believe she mentioned the figure of $178 million in cuts and grants to Atlantic Canada. Yet every day when these questions are asked in Question Period we get this same drivel from the government. I must say it must sound very difficult to understand to people who tune in and here that because the answer we are given is: "Well, since 1984, payments to Atlantic Canada have gone up by x dollars" and the ministers harp and carp about this huge increase we have had since 1984.

We know there has been a cut of $178 million. Could the member explain in simple terms, so that even I could understand, how it is that there has been this cut, yet we are told there has been this increase? What is going on. What kind of subterfuge is the government using to conceal the facts from Canadians in its answers?

[Translation]

Mrs. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

That is a very good question that my hon. colleague has asked. The answer is quite simple. There is a rate at which Established Programs Financing is given to the provinces that receive it. The rate accelerates each year under a certain formula. This government has decided to freeze the rate. So while there is a dollar increase, there is an over-all cut because of all of the costs increasing.

For example, I did not even get close to discussing some of the problems faced by universities relating to the GST on a lot of purchasing they have to make, particularly in the area of library books and things of this nature. The fact that the rate is frozen, and is frozen until 1994-95, means that they are not keeping ahead of the game.

A very good example with regard to universities is the question of books.

When I was a first year law student at Dalhousie University in 1971, and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will remember this because he was there just a year before that— Yes, we were both very young going to law school.

The member will remember that there is a torts textbook that is used by all first year law students, called Wright and Linden, standard in all common law schools in the country. I was fortunate, I bought my text from my aunt who actually was a classmate of the member for Kingston and the Islands. I did not buy it, she gave it to me. Families are like that.

Mr. Belsher: I did not know he was that old.

Ms. Clancy: No, he is not as old as my aunt. If she hears me say that she will be upset.

However, to get the point here, my textbook was given to me so I was very lucky. I was lucky that I had a member of my family who had been there just before me. The cost of that textbook in 1971, brand new, was somewhere in the vicinity of $20 to $22. It is an absolute. You must have it. Also, the editions change as the law changes. As we sit here and pass legislation, a lot of laws change and the jurisprudence reacting to our legislation, et cetera.

My former legislative assistant is now a first year law student at Dalhousie. He was showing me his books which cost him in excess of $750, not counting GST and Wright and Linden, now in paperback by the way, not hard cover, was in excess of $80.

An hon. member: Plus GST.

Ms. Clancy: Plus GST. Yes. That is what the student has to pay, but so does the university. The university must buy these books.

Stephen Leacock said years ago when writing about a Canadian university that all you needed for a university was a few people, a few chairs and a few books. Well, we have progressed passed that in the sense of the way our universities work today. Mr. Leacock was rightly talking in a sense of the philosophy of education.

We in this country know that education is more than philosophy, it is training. Even if it is only a few books, as Mr. Leacock suggested, we are taking away the money from the universities for those books.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that others have said the same thing, but it is not really a pleasure to rise and debate this particular issue because of the hardship that has been caused to Atlantic Canadians as a result of the government's high-handed practice in the area of transfer payments.

This is just one aspect of a continuing story of how the government is setting up an arrangement where it is going to have a patchwork Confederation. The equality which was enshrined in our Constitution is going to be lost because the government does not have either the financial desire, wherewithal or whatever reason to make sure that there is equality. It may have the wherewithal, but it does not really have the total desire to hold this country together and have the proper sharing between the rich and the poor.

In New Brunswick, we are going to lose about $110 million in transfer payments. Our province will have to find that $110 million somewhere or cut back on service as the alternative. That, quite frankly, is unacceptable because those areas that are going to be adversely affected are obviously the areas of education and health care in particular. Those two areas are the ones that should be least affected by any change in transfer payments.

When we look at this problem, it is hard not to be a little embarrassed, coming from Atlantic Canada and sounding like the poor cousin who is always asking for a handout or the dole so to speak. I find it kind of reprehensible that I have to stand up here and say that there should be equalization among provinces and that Atlantic Canadians are hard done by and therefore need more money. That is the reality of the situation.

If we are going to provide proper medicare and proper educational services, if we are going to provide the basic needs of Canadians including Atlantic Canadians, then transfer payments are necessary and this is what we are going to need.

This formula does not work because those Atlantic Canada provinces that are pulling themselves up by their bootstraps are starting to accomplish something, are finding themselves penalized by their success. New Brunswick has been doing reasonably well in these tough economic times. Through the good leadership of a Liberal government in New Brunswick, success is being achieved to a degree.

It is now going to be penalized by that success. Because it is doing so well, it is going to have a larger cut than any other Atlantic province. I believe the numbers are around $110 million for New Brunswick and about $17 million for P.E.I. and $18 million for Newfoundland, or something like that. Nova Scotia is going to get a little increase.

The province that is going to bear the brunt is quite frankly and quite candidly the province which has had the most success. That is another inequity in this situation. What you are doing is taking that success and eventually turning it into failure.

If these moneys were invested properly, which is what New Brunswick has done in the past, then we would see an improved educational system, an improved higher educational system. You would see a health care system that responds to the needs, an efficient health care system.

Instead, what we are going to have to see are cuts and more cuts. This will have the effect of taking something away from the system rather than making it work.

I would like to quote from Premier McKenna who is now talking quite justifiably about a new transfer formula because this one obviously is not working. "The formula reduces transfers to provinces whose economies are improving. When that combines with the recession hitting Canada's wealthiest province, the result is a massive reduction in payments."

"What we have seen this year should never be repeated. We are a victim of New Brunswick's economic success and Ontario's economic failure. The combined effect has given us an absolutely shocking decrease in equalization. The current system is flawed by being attached to the economy of Ontario."

"When Ontario's economy does as well as it was until the recession struck early last year, the rest of the country follows on its coat tails. When Ontario's economy falters and the have not provinces need assistance, the formula should reward them. But it doesn't. The system is also designed to help provinces whose economies are floundering, but in doing so punishes those governments who try to improve their situation". McKenna said he wants to see a new formula negotiated, possibly as a part of future constitutional talks which would encourage poorer provinces to prudently manage their money, keeping deficits low and encourage investment.

I think that is the nub of the point. What happens is that the provinces who have not been successful, the provinces who have not managed their finances properly, are rewarded in these circumstances and the provinces who have done a good job, who have kept an even keel, have bit bullet, so to speak and gone through the trauma of wage freezes, cutbacks and reorganizations in trying to accord a proper balance in the system and at the same time trying to encourage economic development, are penalized.

I think the premier is right when he says that we are going to have to look at this from a constitutional basis. As I read our Constitution as it presently exists there appears to be a constitutional requirement of equality. By this formula that equality is lost. All you have to do is visit any of the hospitals in Atlantic Canada, talk to the people who are managing those hospitals and realize the sheer impact of what is going on.

In my own community of Moncton, we have wards in the hospital that have to be closed, so they are not there to provide the necessary health care service. We have elective surgery being deferred for six, eight and nine months because we do not have the resources to provide the service in the area of health care.

That is a very serious problem for our province. That is why there is a national responsibility to assist New Brunswick and to encourage it. If New Brunswick is given that type of encouragement and that financial support, one day we will be contributing to Ontario's poor economy and we will have transfers coming from New Brunswick to Ontario. That is what we are aiming to do so that we in turn, as we helped out the west during the depression in the thirties, will be able to help Ontario through its tough economic times. We can do that by making New Brunswick and Atlantic Canada strong.

This does just the opposite. This puts Atlantic Canada further behind. It is going to be less able to be a full partner in this Confederation. That is why we have an obligation in this House to see that that does not happen. That is why we need this government to recognize that the formula is wrong, that the formula does not work, it penalizes success and it rewards those who are unsuccessful, all of which in my view, and I am sure in the view of many members opposite, is simply wrong.

As we proceed through this debate and look at what is going on in our country and as we talk about a new federation or confederation, I think that this is going to have to be one aspect discussed, that we try to find a different formula, a different system. We have to do something in the area of education because that is going to be the one main vehicle that is going to allow Atlantic Canadians to be full partners in this Confederation, that is going to be the saviour in my view of all of Atlantic Canadians. It is going to allow Atlantic Canadians to stay in Atlantic Canada rather than having to emigrate to Ontario, Quebec or out west because there are not the jobs and not the fulfilment that one would expect.

I know that my time is running short, Mr. Speaker. Let me say this. It is not a proud moment to be standing here cap in hand saying we need to receive some money from those who are richer and who are better off than we are. The reality is that this is an investment, not an expenditure. It is an investment in Atlantic Canadians. In the long run, it will pay a dividend to all of Canada.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member opposite a question concerning the motion before us. It states:

> That this House condemn the government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces—

What action has this government taken that is doing something to Atlantic Canada that it has not done to every other province in this country?

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I guess my first initial response would be one of saying that because harm has been done equally does not make it right. At a time when we have a government led recession and a government led poor economic circumstance, it is time when the federal government has to help those provinces that are least able to help themselves, and in this case it is Atlantic Canada.

If a formula which has worked over a number of years acceptably and things are okay with it, in trying economic times and in very difficult and unusual circumstances it does have a negative effect, then I think it is incumbent upon the government to step in to remedy that situation and to do something in order to correct the problem so that the adverse effects of a patchwork Confederation of poor education, poor health care and poor economic circumstances are eliminated.

This is going to take millions of dollars out of the economy in addition to having an adverse effect. That is what I think we have to protect against and that is what our obligation is as federal members of Parliament.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to congratulate my colleague for Moncton for initiating in trying to debate this motion a fundamental Canadian value, and that is the equal treatment of provinces across our nation.

On that basis I think the member has reminded us that the government must listen. It must open its heart again to this fundamental sensitivity to the needs of those who have least.

In this instance, when we try to decrease the escalator factor that allows for the averaging of payment, that allows for a stable funding and imposes this system on all provinces equally, it ought to follow that those with the least base for taxation will be penalized most. All experts have said that.

The other thing I would like to point out is that while there may be an absolute increase in amount, it is the rate in proportion to the needs that we must be looking into.

I would just like to conclude my comments with a comment made by a doctor speaking for the Atlantic provinces. He says: "Transferring tax points from federal to provincial will not help compensate for losing federal cuts because you cannot tax something that is not there".

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to take part in this debate which implies that the federal government is doing something to the Atlantic provinces that it does not do to anyone else, that threatens the stability of health care and education and that condemns the government for its destructive policy toward the fishery, the railway and the post office.

This afternoon we heard in Question Period questions put from the Atlantic province members concerning various government programs, that the provincial premiers and their own governments could do a better job of it administering these things.

I would like to put on the record this afternoon that the Government of Canada currently has 50 federal–provincial agreements in effect in Atlantic Canada. These agreements cover a wide range of initiatives from highways to high-tech projects.

• (1540)

With the exception of one initiative for youth forestry in Newfoundland, all these agreements are already jointly managed with the provinces and the vast majority are implemented by provincial governments.

These federal–provincial agreements have been signed under the umbrella of economic and regional development agreements with each province in 1984. These ERDAs establish joint priorities for each of the provinces and provide a process for changing priorities as economic circumstances warrant. ERDA priorities have changed since 1984, and these have been revised accordingly to reflect emerging issues.

As to ACOA funds currently being directed to the private sector through its action program, these funds are intended to promote job creation, increased earned income, entrepreneurship, innovation and technology development, and increased trade among others. Surely the provinces cannot disagree with these federal priorities.

I would like to take the next few minutes to discuss various things that are taking place within the fisheries. The Government of Canada is following a strong integrated set of policies to achieve important goals for the Canadian fisheries: first, a strong Atlantic fishing industry in a more diversified and self-reliant economy; second, a stable Pacific fishery dealing successfully with allocation issues at home and capable of competing in a strenuous international environment; third, an environment against destructive foreign overfishing; fourth, protection of the aquatic environment; fifth, an aboriginal fisheries policy recognizing the important rights of native peoples in Canada's fisheries and encouraging their participation in the management of these resources; sixth, an increased development of recreational fisheries; seventh, promotion of ocean based industries and development; and finally a review of fisheries management structures and institutional mechanisms.

We are making important progress on all of these fronts. Our challenge in Atlantic Canada is both short term and long term. Fishermen in many parts of Atlantic Canada this year faced the worst environmental conditions in memory. The Government of Canada has responded quickly and comprehensively to this crisis, beginning in May with payments totalling $18 million as compensation for severe ice conditions which delayed or prevented thousands of fishermen from pursuing their livelihood. More recently, with the inshore season largely over and the extent of catch failure assessed, this government announced further assistance of $39 million in a program of employment measures, fish processing opportunities and gear-up payments for more than 10,000 fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland and Labrador, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the Quebec lower north shore.

This assistance totalling more than $57 million is targeted to help meet critical needs across the Atlantic provinces. The employment measures alone are creating more than 45,000 weeks of work, much of it contributing directly to essential work on small craft harbours, fish habitat and the maintenance of fish plants.

Catch failure is a recurring problem. Part of our long-term strategy is to find permanent structures or approaches to the income and employment problems that fishermen and plant workers in one area or another face every year.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, along with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be consulting with the provinces, the fishing industry and unions to address these problems.

I might add that we do not have all the answers ourselves, but we look to others who are in the industry. We also look to the provinces to assist us in developing these programs.

Foreign overfishing is a serious problem. At recent meetings of the northwest Atlantic fisheries organizations we were able to make some progress against overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit by countries of the European community.

A new control system has been adopted called the hail system, to try to ensure vessels keep to their quotas. We continue to press for more comprehensive improvements to the international control measures outside the 200-miles. European ministers realize the situation is serious. There is a great deal of misinformation, some of it intentional, about foreign fishing inside the Canadian zone. We only allow into the zone fleets from countries that co-operate with us in conservation outside the 200-mile zone.

Those allowed into the zone to fish are only allowed to take fish that Canadians do not want to catch. If the foreigners did not catch these fish no one else would and they would go to waste.

Every foreign vessel carries a Canadian observer at the vessel's expense, and these vessels are policed rigidly to see they fish only what we allow them to fish.

These vessels provide benefits to Canadians. Their operators buy fish from Canadians. They land fish at Canadian plants providing employment for Canadians. They transfer their technology to Canadians and they also do research that we need in our waters.

A limited and controlled foreign fishery in Canadian waters is not an evil. It brings benefits that Canadians should appreciate, and many do. The government is committed to ending foreign overfishing outside the 200 miles by the present process if possible and by whatever means needed consistent with international law.

In the Pacific area important progress is being made toward international agreements to end driftnet fishing. Canada is in the forefront of international efforts to stop driftnet fishing and to promote high seas fishery conservation. Current developments include a new Canada-U.S.-Japan-U.S.S.R. convention which is expected to stop high seas salmon fishing in the north Pacific in the summer of 1992 and a new UN resolution to stop all driftnet fishing in the North Pacific this summer as well.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall when we were in Japan last week that we raised this question of driftnet fishing. You were there and heard the discussion that took place with the Japanese on this very critical problem that we face.

We are strengthening the management of fisheries in this country. Members opposite supported the government last year in amending the Fisheries Act. The changes strengthened our conservation strategy and the long-term rebuilding of stocks by providing increased penalties for illegal fishing and damage to fish habitat. We are now entering the second year of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program which is devoting $584 million to rebuilding fish stocks, adjustments for individuals and communities, and opportunities for diversification.

Through AFAP our scientific research programs have been expanded by $40 million. We are increasing our knowledge base to rebuild stocks of northern cod, northern gulf cod, Scotia groundfish and snow crab. We are implementing new conservation measures to protect young fish and expanding surveillance and enforcement. We are working with the provinces to support older plant workers and trawlermen seeking opportunities outside the fishery.

Economic diversification projects are directing significant funding to underutilized species, fisheries development, aquaculture and marketing.

Court decisions of late, notably the decision in Sparrow, are not only clarifying aboriginal fisheries rights but spelling out an important duty for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to protect and support those rights. DFO faces a great challenge to work with native people and others in the fishery to sustain and build fish stocks while providing for native participation. Native participation will take many forms, not the least of which is co-management of stock enhancement, fish habitat programs and opportunities in both the commercial and recreational sectors.

On the Pacific coast and in Atlantic Canada DFO is playing a vital leadership role to resolve these complex issues through consensus and co-operation with native and other interests, as well as the local governments themselves.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech that my colleague has just given. He has touched on one aspect of the Atlantic economy, the fisheries, which has been in a state of mismanagement and decline since this government took power.

• (1550)

I can take a great deal of exception to his comments as to whether the fisheries aid package which has been recently announced is timely, because it is not and whether it is adequate, because it is not.

Contrary to the statements that the member made, I want to make sure that the public is not intentionally or unintentionally misled into believing that all the fishermen in the Burin Peninsula in Newfoundland down to Cape Breton are jumping up and down with glee saying: "Thank you, thank you, thank you federal Tory government", because they are not.

What this government has clearly done has been too little too late. It has caused the collapse in the fishery by allowing too much foreign overfishing, and it has not provided the funds for diversification both of the fishery and of product market overseas.

That is not what I am going to speak on. I want to ask the member who has given his two cents worth on fish, although it is absolutely entirely wrong, does he believe in the principle of equalization? It is a principle that this country has been built on.

I mentioned this earlier, in our Constitution Act, 1982 is enshrined the principle of equalization. It says that one of the underpinnings of this country is that funds shall be transferred into areas to ensure that national standards and programs will be available to all, no matter where they live.

Does he not agree that in an area of less than 2.4 million people the cutbacks since 1988 in excess of $1.5 billion in regional development grants, the cutbacks of hundreds of millions of dollars in transfers through EPF for health care and the cutback of hundreds of millions of dollars in EPF to post-secondary education coupled with the recent cut of $170 million will ensure that those provinces on the Atlantic coast, the four Atlantic provinces which had a very limited tax base, do not have the flexibility to recapture through additional taxation the moneys that are lost?

Does he not believe that this is eroding the principle of equalization and the ability of those provinces to deliver services of national standards to the people who live in the Atlantic?

Mr. Belsher: The quick answer is no. The reason I say that is because I believe in equalization payments.

A formula has been developed. A formula has been enshrined in law. This year it just so happens that the total economy of Canada is down.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Whose fault? Who caused it?

Mr. Belsher: If a government could turn on the economy by the snap of its fingers, would we not be very stupid not to? If we have so much influence over the economy, would we not be foolish on this side not to turn on the tap and make sure the economy is robust?

The way you are sounding is that we are deliberately trying to turn things down. Nothing could be further from the truth. They are talking about us singling out Atlantic Canada here. There is a deficit in this country. Have you ever once mentioned the deficit? Get your head out of the sand. We have a horrendous deficit in this country and unless we come to grips with it we are going to go down the tubes.

There is a sharing that has to take place across this country. There has not been one cut made to any program to Atlantic Canada that has not been made to every other province in the country.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): That is simply not true.

Mr. Belsher: That is true, and you know it.

I asked the member opposite to name a program, and he could not. In the equalization payments no one in Canada has been singled out and you know it. Do not go out and say that because you are speaking falsely if you say those kinds of things.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the exchange we just had I certainly hope that the member opposite is not trying to imply that I am misleading the House when I stand up here and indicate that there have been massive cuts to Atlantic Canada.

An hon. member: I would like you to clarify that.

An hon. member: You said intentionally mislead when you were talking to him.

An hon. member: Or unintentionally. Check the "blues".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask for the collaboration of the two sides of the House. I think it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, on a different tack with the same sort of subject—and I mean this not in a rhetorical sense but in a very serious manner—I am aware that the hon. parliamentary secretary to the minister may not be totally familiar with the intricacies of my riding which is essentially a fishing riding and with some of the emotion involved in this very difficult issue.

As a parliamentarian he has had to deal with equally difficult issues such as potential base closings in his riding. I know that he has a feeling for the kind of difficulties we are facing here. It is with that background and an acceptance that he may not have the total details that perhaps I would have because I am the member for, I believe, the largest fishing riding in this country.

I want to give him some insight into the difficulties that I see facing me every moment. I just called my constituency office and the phone is constantly ringing. This is not rhetoric; this is really the goods.

They are upset about a number of things, but I am not going to get into a long litany about the failure of the fishery or who mismanaged it. It is not irrelevant to the conversation but it misses the point here.

The point is that the government came through with a grant to help those who are in trouble, and there is no question that it was seen as a relief. If you really bare-bones this grant, however, and take away the herring subsidy and the subsidies for CIDA and all the rest of the stuff, we are looking at $25 million for 10,000 people. Actually only $9 million goes to Newfoundland but the average in Atlantic Canada works out to $2,500. That may sound like a lot of money but it does not sound like a lot of money to me.

I want to convey to the hon. parliamentary secretary that his minister did rise—and I want to use this as a statement of fact; I am not being vitriolic about it—and say when responding to a question in this House on Monday which suggested by the hon. member for Burin—St. George's that we were experiencing great difficulties in there not being enough money to go around, and I quote if I could—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I hope that the hon. member will soon come to his question.

Mr. Mifflin: I quote:

> It has been suggested in the House and on the radio that there is not sufficient money. I am advising the House now that money is being transferred down. There is more than adequate money.
> With respect to whether a person qualifies, the rules are generous and any one who can show a reasonable connection to the fishery or to being a plant worker is going to be assisted, or my name is not John Carnell Crosbie.

My question is for the parliamentary secretary. I am aware that people are being turned off by some of the offices, the CEC offices, because they reckoned they had not had a reasonable attachment to the fisheries. The criteria seem to be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member opposite I would trust that in my remarks I have not sounded insensitive to the needs of the people in Atlantic Canada and the dire straits that some of them find themselves in. I grew up on the prairies and so I know what dire straits are. I was a depression baby in southern Saskatchewan and that says a lot to many people who understand those kinds of things.

The member opposite talked about it being only $9.2 million for Newfoundland. The figures I have been shown, in the job creation program alone, indicate up to $12.7 million for Newfoundland and Labrador.

There are also the herring export program, a portion of which would be collected I think by Newfoundlanders, and part of the food aid package, the $4 million that goes into that, some of which would go to Newfoundland as well.

• (1600)

When you start looking at the total program, it would be very nice if we had more money to put into it. We have to be so very careful because we do not have money. We are having to borrow money. We are staring at the $30.5 billion deficit this year. Dear knows assistance is needed. That is why we have taken the action we have. We just trust that it will meet the objectives as have been set out. We did go and we did consult with the industry, with the people who are in the industry, in order to come up with these figures.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in the debate on a very important motion that I think is correct in all its wording condemning the current government for reducing the level of transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces, thereby threatening the stability of health care and education" and further condemning "the government for its destructive policies toward the fishery, the railway and the post office". I mentioned earlier today during debate that it is unfortunate the motion did not cover areas such as forestry.

I believe we may have an amendment at the end of my comments that we hope will address these problems. It is pretty clear what is happening when you take a look at the evidence of what this government is doing, not just to Atlantic Canada but really to the rest of the country as well.

It is really treating the different regions of Canada in a very unfair way. The policies of this government are shown to have failed. It has pursued neo-conservative economic policies, the Thatcher and Reagan agenda that is being thrown out of the window by voters across Canada. We hope that will happen soon in a federal election in the next year or two when Canadians have an opportunity to judge this government on its economic policies.

What I would like to do in the time that I have is just talk briefly a bit about the question of equalization payments, the reductions that are taking place there, the fishery concerns in the Atlantic provinces, and a bit about forestry matters which unfortunately were not covered in the Liberal motion. I then would like to mention what we think are a couple of proposals that the people in Atlantic Canada would approve of. We hope they are listening to this debate today, hearing the debate and making some observations about what members in this House have to say about the concerns and the mess that this government has got us into.

The members of the government side say that there is no money, that the deficit is rising and that we have to be concerned about that. That is true. Just recently this government extended a $1 billion line of credit to Saddam Hussein. If Saddam Hussein moved to Halifax this government might then be prepared to help out the Atlantic provinces more than it is now.

All we have to look at is how many millions of dollars are going to be cut to the Atlantic provinces because of the activities of this government. According to news reports, primarily from the premiers' conference held recently, Newfoundland will be losing $20 million, Nova Scotia will lose $21 million, Prince Edward Island will lose $11 million, and New Brunswick will lose $64 million. The total—

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just wonder if I could correct an extremely serious error which the hon. member has made about the $1 billion line of credit. It is not to Iraq. It was to Iran. It is not the government of Saddam Hussein. I think that should be corrected for the record.

Mr. Gardiner: Again it points out that the government is more prepared to help countries outside Canada than it is its own regions in Canada. It is important that Canadians understand that. Those lines of credit and funds could go to help many parts of this country.

The important part is what this government has done to the economies of the Atlantic Canada regions and other parts. The premiers met the other day to try and discuss this major cutback of $116 million to the Atlantic provinces.

What do we have in the maritimes? We have a Tory premier so far. We do not know how long he will be in office, and then we have three Liberal premiers. They are really tough. They are going to meet with the federal government. I think these premiers out there are wimping out on their own provinces and on representing the interests of the people there.

It has come to the point where it is not just going to be the elected people in this House speaking out and trying to defend Atlantic Canada. It is going to be the people of the maritimes and Newfoundland and Labrador, who will be speaking out. As one member already mentioned, they are phoning the offices of members of Parliament saying how ridiculous this government's policies are and that it should be thrown out of office at the earliest opportunity.

Let us take a look at some of the resource issues, critical issues not just to the maritimes and Newfoundland and Labrador but to all parts of Canada and the management of those resources. We have had a lot of debate in this House about the concerns over the fishery in the maritimes. There has not been as much debate, unfortunately, over concerns about forestry in the maritimes.

Let us take a look at what some people have said about the fishery issue in Atlantic Canada. Perhaps it is dragging out the debate to point fingers at Liberals and Conservatives, but at some point I think it is important that people understand which governments were in office while this was happening.

As some background to just how important the fishery is to the people in Atlantic Canada, just let me quote from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council: "The fishery is arguably the most important single industry in Atlantic Canada. Over 100,000 people are directly employed in harvesting and processing in more than 1,300 communities. Over half of these towns and villages depend solely on fishing".

It is clear that in the whole debate around management of our fisheries resource, the whole question of foreign overfishing, is an issue that has been mishandled by this government and previous governments.

Let us take a quick look at the record. In April 1989 the Prime Minister committed the federal government to putting an end to the practice of foreign overfishing, and nothing has been done.

At the November 1989 First Ministers' Conference, the Prime Minister was told that between 1986 and 1989 the European community had overfished the Grand Bank by some 600 per cent over the quota set by NAFO. Nothing was done.

In February of this year a press release from the Department of External Affairs indicated that the European community had taken five times more fish in 1990 than it was allocated. It is incredible what this country is allowing to happen to the most important resource for the maritimes. It seems that the government has washed its hands of the entire matter, thus putting into question the survival of many of the communities that depend on the fishing industry for their very survival, whether they will continue to exist.

One of the comments made in some of the reports on the fundamental problems with the infrastructure in the maritimes is that along with the high unemployment and the fewer jobs being created people are leaving the area. Nothing can be worse for an area than when the young people leave and move to major centres. More problems are created in the major urban centres that we cannot handle. We have to give reasons and opportunities for people to want to stay in the fishing and forestry communities because that is where their livelihoods are.

That is where we hope young people will return and stay to help develop and improve the life of people there. In our party we have said that Canada should move toward extending control over the entire Grand Bank including the nose and tail. The organization charged with protecting it, NAFO, has failed to do so. We have to provide more and more effort in this area to ensure that Canada's fishery resource is not overfished as has happened in most cases to date under this government.

As I mentioned earlier, one particular concern that is not mentioned in the motion is the issue of forestry. I have two general comments I would like to make in that regard.

To the best of my knowledge—and I stand to be corrected on this—we have yet to ensure that the forest agreement between the federal and provincial governments is signed in Nova Scotia. If some members opposite can tell me otherwise I hope they will. That is an important agreement and, if done properly, it will ensure that both levels of government co-operate in the management of our forests.

We even signed an agreement in British Columbia under the former Social Credit government. It did not come anywhere near what was needed, but with all the difficulties that provincial government had we managed to sign an agreement. Now, for some reason, there seems to be an inability by the federal government here and the provincial government in Nova Scotia actually to sign that agreement. Maybe we are waiting for an election. I do not know. That could be the case. I guess we will have to wait until that election is called and then likely we will find out how quickly the announcement can be made.

I have had the opportunity to visit a number of the Atlantic provinces and, this past summer, to have paid a visit to a number of the forestry operations there. I found it very interesting. Of course many of the concerns and problems of the people in Nova Scotia are similar to those in my part of the country in British Columbia. It is an example of the problems in the forest industry. This government has followed a laissez–faire or a hands off the economy approach, unless of course one is a friend of the Conservatives. Then it is socialism all the way, but for anybody else, average Canadians, it is free enterprise: let the market do whatever it wants. Resulting from that many in the maritimes have alleged a rip–off of our fisheries and forestry resources.

What do we do when mills and what have you are run down? It takes millions of dollars of new capital to invest and rebuild. We end up with people who are thrown on the trash heap because they are not needed any more.

One of the major problems of course in the Nova Scotia area is the older mills. Some have alleged that the high dollar pursued by this government is a hidden part of the free trade agreement with the United States. That is certainly hurting the Nova Scotia area and economy. A great deal of work remains to be done in terms of the rehabilitation of forests. I am again mentioning Nova Scotia in particular. Working closely with the woodlot owners is a positive way that small entrepreneurs, people in the agricultural field and others, can actually get hands on experience managing our forests properly, providing fibre supply to mills and what have you. But the effort is not going to go anywhere if the government in Nova Scotia and the government here in Ottawa have yet to be able to sign that forest agreement. It is one of the vehicles by which we can ensure that proper management. We can do a lot of other things in our forests, good things, that cannot be done if that agreement is not signed.

During the earlier debate members mentioned ACOA as one of the proposals that this government has put together. We have a western diversification office in western Canada and ACOA in Nova Scotia. The figure was mentioned by my colleague about the success that ACOA was having. We know that the track record could be better. We understand that some 70 per cent of the projects funded by ACOA have gone under. It is part of the business. Some businesses just do not make it and that is the way it goes, you make a judgment call. But 70 per cent going under is a little high and we would certainly hope, with ACOA continuing, that the record can be improved. I also hope we take a look at one of the criticisms I heard of ACOA when I was in the area which is that it seemed to be reluctant to encourage local development and local ideas. It seemed to be more excited about ideas coming in from elsewhere. It tried to open a warehouse, got things going and in six months or a year it fell apart. Nobody was opposed to ACOA per se, but the emphasis could be shifted somewhat to make it a more successful operation.

We should try to ensure that when the federal government attempts to do some work in a community there is a co–ordinated approach. I suspect, in many areas, that is just not the case.

Our caucus met just yesterday with representatives from the Sault and from Wawa about the work that they are doing. They are trying to pull together what sometimes seems like an incredible list of different agencies and particular federal agencies and actually try to deliver a service. That takes a major effort.

A couple of proposals that we have had are worth looking at. We think there is room for the federal government to move in this area. This government has some problems with the approach it is taking, but I do not think it should write some of these ideas off. I think they are good, positive ideas.

Two of our proposals are a community development fund and a single industry community fund. Under these proposals, funds would be provided to co–operative and community development corporations and other community–based initiatives. In the case of single industry towns, funding would also be made to assist those communities to explore diversification options.

A number of other comments were made. One of them is about public sector pension funds and where they are invested. So there are a number of experiments that have taken place in the country that obviously we can all learn from. But it is unfortunate that this government has really had some difficulty in trying to understand some proposals and projects.

In summary, this motion is an important one. It is important to get a message to this government about the concerns from Atlantic Canada. The few times that I have visited the area I have found the people to be absolutely wonderful. They are always more than pleased to discuss their concerns with people in responsible positions about the economy and what can be done. But a government that is aloof and not prepared to deal with things directly will never be of benefit to the maritimes.

We need some initiatives and opportunities from this government so that it does not just throw the maritimes on the trash heap like it is wont to do.

In conclusion, I would like to move an amendment. I have it right here for you to send up. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words following the word fishery and adding the following thereto:
> passenger and freight railway, forestry, shipbuilding and the post office and, further, that the premiers of the Atlantic provinces be condemned for their failure to fight Ottawa on behalf of their provinces.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the amendment motion presented by the hon. member under advisement.

Questions and comments? Resuming debate, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleagues who have spoken so eloquently and so forthrightly on this very, very difficult and disturbing subject.

There are any number of subjects that I wish I would be speaking on this evening. Since I am speaking on this I want to try to remove the rhetoric from my presentation. It sometimes does creep in, particularly when emotion is involved. I want to stick to the facts and I want to try to create a perception in the nine minutes or so that are left of those people who I represent and how they have responded to this motion.

This motion talks about the cut in the transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces. It threatens the stability of health care and education and creates destructive policy with regard to the fishery, railway and post office.

Since the debate began this morning I have been talking to my constituency office and to some constituents. They have great difficulty understanding how we on this side of the House can get up and say that the government has reduced payments and the hon. Minister of Finance this morning talked about increasing them.

If I could clarify that. I want to take one example. Indeed they have increased but not to the extent promised. If I could use some figures that were quoted for Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance said this morning that in 1984–85 the per capita transfer payments amounted to $1,617 per person. He went on in the same breath to say that seven years later, in 1991–92 it was $2,473. Well on the surface that sounds very good. It is over 50 per cent and I am still getting the figures. But I did a calculation based on some pamphlets that I read and to stay abreast of inflation alone in those seven years, you needed over $2,500. So the $2,473 did not keep those people who were relying on transfer payments abreast of inflation. In that interval of seven years they experienced 22 tax increases, plus a goods and services tax. So I would suggest that that $2,473 buying power is not $1,617 as it was seven years ago, but more like $1,300 or $1,400.

I am sure the minister did not do this deliberately, but when you hear it in a phrase you can draw some pretty poor conclusions from it and I want to make that clear.

The second point I want to make clear is that there was a formula for the Established Programs Financing, which was one of 14 ways of transferring money to the provinces. The EPF, which is the provinces' assistance in financing health services, extended health care and post-secondary education was calculated by an authority, the National Council on Welfare which was quoted by my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls. It worked on changing the formula, which started in 1986. It started going with the economy. Then it was the economy minus two per cent. Then it was the economy minus three per cent and that was extended for two years, then for another five years and another three years beyond that.

The difference in those payments for which health and education rely on is $100 million in one year. The total from 1986 to 2000 is $100 billion for all of Canada. That is $100 billion less than it would have been if the formula had not been changed by the government.

That certainly clarifies the issue for me. Very simply, yes, they have increased the EPF but they have not kept up with inflation. It is a lot less than the provinces had expected.

In the case of Newfoundland, the minister said himself that the transfer payments make up 45.5 per cent of the total budget of Newfoundland. It used to be almost 49 per cent. It has gone down by many, many billions of dollars.

I want to talk also a little bit about the post office. A few years ago it was the plan of Canada Post to amalgamate, remove, change and replace 5,221 post offices that employ 10,000 people. In rural post offices 83 per cent of the employees are women.

We have in Newfoundland about 180 rural post offices, and they are being closed left, right and centre. If that was not bad enough, as again pointed out by my colleague, the head of Canada Post is getting a bonus of $100,000.

If you can tell me why that does not upset the people in my riding who see this from afar, by golly, Mr. Speaker, you would be a very understanding person. Let me tell you something else. I would like to create an image.

You are there in Newfoundland, and you are watching this happen. You are from the district of Port au Bras where a lot of fishing takes place, good professional fishermen as indeed in all the ridings.

They are watching foreigners take fish from a NAFO area that everybody in Newfoundland deserves: 3 November Oscar, 3NO. I have not got a track, but the northern edge of that NAFO area is 45 miles off the coast of Newfoundland. That is 45 miles. On a clear day, you can see the foreigners fishing from the capes on the Avalon Peninsula. They are fishing within our area. They are taking our fish and our fishermen are not allowed to go out and fish there.

They decide: "Well, we are going to try it on for size anyway. We are so frustrated'. So, they go out and fish and the government sends the navy to go out and arrest our vessels when we know that foreigners are overfishing.

I am not simplifying that. Newfoundlanders are watching that and the government is asking: Why am I getting emotional? Why am I using language that is unbecoming to me?

All you have to do is be in my riding for 10 minutes. You would do an awful lot of things that are not becoming to you or anybody else of reasonable measure. With regard to railway, a few years ago the government said: "We got a deal for you. We are going to give you $800 million over 15 years".

The railway in Newfoundland was losing $50 million a year and in 15 years, that was $750 million. They said: "We are going to give you $800 million and we are going to give you some roads". On September 1, 1988, we lost the railroads. We did not get any roads, and the provincial government made $50 million on the deal. That is not a good deal at all.

What have I covered: rails, fishing, post office and the clarification of the transfer payments. There is one other area that has become a by–word with Atlantic Canadians, certainly Newfoundlanders. It does not matter what the Minister of Fisheries says, it does not matter what his parliamentary secretary says, it does not matter what the Prime Minister says. The fact of the matter is that in our opinion, we are the only country in the world that gives away the very resources upon which that part of Canada depends to foreigners, legally.

We give it to them legally and we know they are taking almost as much as we are allowing Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians to catch illegally, but we send our destroyers out to arrest Canadian fishing vessels and bring them home. We do not get tangled up with foreigners, because the last time that happened I think we had some difficulties catching them when they went back to New Bedford.

I am not blaming that on the navy. What I am saying is that if you have something you want to enforce, why do you not target the foreigners, the ones we should be targeting. If you cannot do it with ships, try something else. I do not know, I am not the government. It should have the answers to that.

There is one other area while I am on the business of fishing and overfishing. I talked earlier about the Atlantic Catch Failure program. I really take objection to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—my colleagues do as well—trying to create the impression that there is more than adequate money there and that the program is generous.

The phones in my riding have not stopped ringing for the last week. I can tell you there are 400 or 500 people in my riding alone who cannot qualify because there is not enough money.

In conclusion—I am going to wrap up—I do not often become emotional. I do not often use language or rhetoric in this House, but I am telling you that we have been moved in Atlantic Canada. We understand the difficulty the government has with the deficit. It seems that every time it moves its hand to initiate a policy, we get the dirty end of the stick. That is the perception.

If you relive the last 10 minutes that I have described to you, it would be difficult to have a perception other than that. So, I enjoin my colleagues from the other side of the House to have some feeling for the difficulty we are in, to show compassion and perhaps some imagination and creative thinking in trying to rectify this demoralizing and devastating situation of which we are speaking.

• (1630)

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate today on a very important motion, one that was put forward by my party and one that concerns Atlantic Canada.

This motion condemns the government for reducing the level of transfer payments to Atlantic Canada because it will threaten the stability of health care and education and it also further condemns the government for its destructive policies toward the fishery, the railway and the post office.

My riding is Malpeque, Prince Edward Island. I want to say that in a small province like mine, reducing the level of transfer payments, as this government has done, has had a very devastating effect upon the whole economy. It is important that the federal government realize what a difficult position it has put my province in because of the reduction of transfer payments and the other economic policies which this government has inflicted on Atlantic Canada.

I am not here this afternoon to condemn in whole the equalization formula and I am not advocating in any way that it be scrapped. But when you are dealing with a small province like Prince Edward Island, I think it is important that the federal government realize the difficult position that a small province like Prince Edward Island finds itself in because of the reduction of transfer payments.

We are talking about my province that operates with a total budget of a little over $700 million. We are talking about a province where the per capita income is 34 per cent below the average. This province that has undergone an estimated economic loss of $40 million to $50 million due to problems experienced by our potato industry as a result of this government's mishandling of the PVY-N potato crisis.

That is for the first year alone. It is anyone's guess what we will be losing this year.

We are also talking about a province that has lost nearly $100 million due to changes in federal payments made by this government since 1988. To take that $100 million and break it down, it means that $45 million of that has been in equalization payments and $54 has been in established program funding changes, changes to the EPF. As we know, that is the money that is given to the provinces to go to health and post-secondary education.

Just as important, we are talking about a region of the country that is faced with very high unemployment. The unemployment rate in my province is approximately 17 per cent. We have businesses in the country that are going under in record numbers. The bankruptcy rate in eastern Canada increased 14 per cent this past August.

Many of the problems I have mentioned are simply a result of the federal government's economic policy that has advocated high interest rates and a high dollar over the creation of jobs.

This week my province learned that expected revenues from the equalization payments would be reduced by another $17 million. The point that I want to make is not so much that Prince Edward Island will need to find an additional $17 million in an already tight budget. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it will be very difficult. The point that I want to make here is that my province, along with other regions of our country, has been placed in a desperate situation by policies and past budgets of this government.

The latest shortfall of $17 million as I say will be hard to find in an already tight budget in Prince Edward Island. When you compare that with the $100 million that my province has lost by changes that this government has made to the established program funding and equalization payments since 1988, it may not seem that large. Given the current economic condition in my province, I could tell you that it will have a significant impact.

My province like many others is struggling to maintain its health care system. I know that many of my constituents have spoken to me about their concerns regarding the health care system, what this government is doing and about what this would mean down the road.

The minister of health and social services on Prince Edward Island has expressed his concern many times. I want to quote the Hon. Wayne Cheverie: "The reduction in the rate of increase and transfer payments is an attack on the basic foundation of our health care system. They represent drastic reductions of federal contributions that will have major consequences for the system of health care as we know it on Prince Edward Island".

That was the Minister of Health and Social Services. He along with all Islanders are really concerned about what the cuts in the transfer payments are going to mean to a small province like Prince Edward Island. Really we are seeing an example of these cuts already. We have already seen some hospital beds close and cuts to other services.

I know that my time is limited. I want to pass on to another area where these transfer payments are affecting and that certainly is education. This past fall the post-secondary students certainly felt the brunt of the cuts to the established programs funding as they were forced to pay higher tuition fees.

The president of the University of Prince Edward Island has expressed his concern about the dwindling government funding and he has indicated that this was the reason for the increase. He said: "Because of budget restraints and reductions in federal payments, the province increased UPEI's funding by only 4.1 per cent. The only thing we could do was raise tuitions".

That is a quote from Dr. Elliot who is the president of the University of Prince Edward Island and that is exactly what happened. They raised tuition fees by 15 per cent. Really what that means to each student is approximately $280 more for a 10-course term.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated to me that my time is running out. I just want to make some closing remarks by calling on the government to recognize the damage that its policies has caused Atlantic Canadians, to recognize the devastating effect that they are having on the whole economy in the eastern part of Canada and also to ask the federal government to put forward its commitment that the level of transfer payments will not be further eroded by destructive policies like this government has advocated in the past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate I would like to return to the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. Unfortunately it raises a new question that can only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice as set out in Beauchesne's 6th edition, citation 579(2). Therefore, I regret to inform the hon. member that his amendment is out of order.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Egmont. I apologize. I do not see the hon. member for South Shore.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Egmont is agreeable to the Chair recognizing the hon. member for South Shore.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning I would like to thank you for the obvious compliment you showed me. Obviously my diet is having an effect and I am wasting away to nothing.

I know the House waits with great interest for the remarks of my hon. friend from Egmont but with your indulgence I might make a brief intervention into the discussion here today. Needless to say I read with great interest the motion of my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls who I know has a great and longstanding interest in Atlantic Canada issues. His omnibus motion seems to suggest that the government has done less than well by Atlantic Canada.

I do not know if that is the point he is trying to get across or not but obviously he has been missing a few things with respect to what has been going on in Atlantic Canada. I would like to share with him some of the perspectives and views that I might have on this.

I noticed that he begins by talking about transfer payments. I listened with interest to my hon. friend opposite with respect to transfer payments and higher education funding as it affected Prince Edward Island. I find it amazing that every time I come into this place and hear my hon. friends opposite, be they from the Liberal Party or the New Democratic Party, they always talk about ways that governments can spend money. They are a little less good at telling us what taxes should be raised or whether we should increase the deficit.

We know that our friends in the Liberal Party are real experts at increasing deficits because when they left power in 1984 they left a deficit of $38 billion and a national debt of $200 billion. These have compounded to being a $400 billion debt today. They left us a $16 billion operating deficit that this government, through wise and sound management, has transformed into a $12 billion operating surplus. Now that is performance.

When we talk about reducing the level of transfer payments in the Atlantic provinces what we are really talking about is government spending. My hon. friends opposite are all in favour of government spending, though they seem to ignore the fact that the only thing you spend is taxpayers' dollars. I want to tell him something, and it is that the message I am getting from many of the Atlantic Canadians that I know, including the 77,000 I have the privilege to represent here is that they do not want higher taxes. They have had enough of taxes. I have heard my hon. friends opposite complain about taxes. They have complained about tax reform which is one of the wise measures this government has introduced to try to have a more equitable and fair tax system and a tax system that is going to facilitate economic growth and development in this country.

It is only through taxation that we accrue the revenues that pay for all the wonderful things that my hon. friends opposite think we should have, including transfer payments, including for example the $800 million that is paid to the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada through unemployment insurance. I hear some of my friends from Atlantic Canada complain that this government is taking a great deal of interest in supporting our farmers in western Canada. We had an announcement a couple of weeks ago of $800 million of aid to western agriculture in a time of crisis. We forget that every year we put $800 million into our Atlantic fishery in support, not to mention the other financial supports that are provided to our fishery in Atlantic Canada.

As my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls knows, and I am sure he applauded the government and indeed this Minister of Fisheries of Oceans, when not two weeks ago he brought down a $39 million aid package in support of the Newfoundland fishing industry which has faced the most severe crisis in its history with the ice problem this year. But the government responded. This government is not afraid to spend money when it is necessary to assist and support Canadians, but this government believes in fiscal responsibility and, furthermore, it believes that those other levels of government that spend the public's money have a responsibility to be fiscally responsible as well.

So when this government brings in measures that cap transfer payments, though there is no cap on equalization which is so important to Atlantic Canada, there is no cap on the Canada Assistance Plan which is so important to Atlantic Canada and, of course, this government introduced the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency with a budget in excess of $1 billion to support economic development in Atlantic Canada, all those measures were introduced because they were necessary and supportive of Atlantic Canada.

Earlier today I heard my hon. friend from Halifax asking a question in the House about what this government was going to do to help Halifax. I thought it was a very commendable decision that this government made, not to mention a very appropriate and proper decision that this government made, in placing the minesweeper contract in the port of Halifax. It will mean $200 million of expenditure for Nova Scotia and for Halifax.

The government is prepared to spend money, but this government spends money frugally and wisely as it should, because every cent that is spent by government has to be accounted for because it comes from the taxpayers. I would urge my hon. friends opposite never to forget that.

My hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls has recently been asking an awful lot of questions about expenditures by this government with respect to salaries of senior public servants and the heads of Crown corporations. I have got to tell him that he gets an awful lot of sympathy from this side of the House for some of those decisions. The one criticism that could perhaps be levelled at this government is that the system that it inherited from its predecessors which took back the two or three top levels of increments and made a bonus system. Unfortunately, it seems to have become a bonus system that is automatically paid, so my hon. friends opposite have been having a wonderful time looking at the fruits of the seeds that they planted when they set up that system so many years ago. I am sure my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls remembers it because he was a supporter of the government of the day that introduced that particular system.

When we talk about economic problems in Atlantic Canada, I think the first thing we have to recognize is that a good climate for economic growth is probably the thing that is going to help industry develop in Atlantic Canada better than anything else.

I look at my own constituency of South Shore, and I do not take anything away from any other part of Canada, but I must say there probably is no more beautiful place than the South Shore in Nova Scotia and there certainly no nicer place to live, to work and to make one's home. I look at one of the great accomplishments of this government with the free trade agreement which did not create that much change in tariff structures, but it guaranteed access to markets. I look at the constituency that I represent here and I look at the benefits that are accruing to my constituents because of that significant and important agreement.

Take, for example, the Michelin tire plant in the town of Bridgewater which employs 1,500 people. Seventy per cent of the produce of that plant goes to the United States, 10 per cent goes to Japan and 20 per cent is sold to the rest of the market in Canada. Guaranteed access to the U.S. market is critically important to Michelin Tire.

I could mention the Christmas tree industry. My goodness, Mr. Speaker, though you would not know it on a warm day like today in Ottawa, but Christmas is approaching. If I may, I might just digress for a moment to remind all members of the House that as they look forward to celebrating Christmas this year they should think in terms of having a real Christmas tree, none of these phony artificial Christmas trees. I hope that you will take it up with the high officials in this place and the fire marshall to see that we enjoy the benefits of real Christmas trees right here in the House of Commons this year.

• (1650)

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and remind the House that on the south shore of Nova Scotia we export 1.25 million Christmas trees a year. Fifty per cent of the Christmas trees exported from this country are exported from the south shore of Nova Scotia. As you know, Lunenburg county is the Christmas tree capital of Canada. That is a $30 million business from the south shore of Nova Scotia, a business that is secured and guaranteed because of the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement.

Furthermore the duties have come down on Christmas tree rates. As a result we have seen a significant increase in the export of Christmas tree wreaths, so that the access we are guaranteed through the FTA to our Nova Scotia Christmas trees is another benefit of the FTA.

I could go on and talk about the pulp and paper industry. I could talk about the Bowater–Mersey Paper plant which, like all paper plants in the world right now are going through tough times. We could be in even tougher times if we did not know for sure that the 80 per cent of the paper that is produced in that mill has a guaranteed access into the United States market where the market is for that paper. The 800 people who work for Bowater–Mersey I am sure are very pleased that their future is secure in large measure because of the access provided in that agreement.

Or, of course, I could talk about our fishery. I could talk about the 8,500 people on the south shore who make their livelihood through the fishing industry either as harvesters or processors in one way or another and the fact that two-thirds of the fish that we produce go to the United States.

I guess what I am saying is that my hon. friends opposite said this was a heinous, terrible and villainous thing. On the other hand, it sure has guaranteed the future of the people on the south shore of Nova Scotia.

Now that is not to say that we have not been through difficult times. That is not to say that the downturn in the fishery, which has been caused by overfishing by Canadians and foreigners and by various other circumstances, has not hurt, has not meant plant closures. And I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I know some of my hon. colleagues opposite have faced this, as have some of my colleagues on this side, there is nothing more difficult and challenging than to go to a one plant town the day they announce the plant is closing.

You know, I was in Lockeport two and a half years ago when they announced the closure of the National Sea Products plant. For two and a half years, under the leadership of an industrial adjustment service committee established under a program set up by the then minister of employment and immigration, the Canadian Jobs Strategy program, set that committee to work under the outstanding leadership of Mayor Mary Rose of Lockeport, working with provincial people and myself as a member. We have all worked together and we are going to continue to work until that plant reopens, which we hope is going to happen very soon.

It is the fact that the Government of Canada is open to responding to those kinds of problems that makes you hang in there and keep fighting.

I know my hon. friends from Newfoundland, I am sure, rejoiced this summer at the work that was done by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans when he put together deals and packages that reopened three major fish plants in Newfoundland. There was no partisan politics involved in that, because those fish plants were not all in ridings represented by government members. That is not the important thing. The important thing and the priority of this government is to look after the people. In this case we are talking about the people in communities in Atlantic Canada, the same people that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was concerned about when he brought in his ice aid package a couple of weeks ago. He is very sensitive to the needs of people in communities and that sort of thing.

My hon. friend's motion makes reference to the fishery. I might say we have had some very responsible leadership during difficult times in terms of trying to bring fisheries policy and the administration in the direction of the fishery and the fishery resource under control so that the maximum number of people can make a reasonable living in the fishery.

One of the harsh realities this government has faced is having to deal with a difficult financial situation. It could have run away from it and kept running the bills up as its predecessor did, but no, that is not its policy. It has tried to take control of the situation and bring it under control so that the country can grow, as it is starting to do again.

I see the IMF has predicted significant growth in the Canadian economy beyond the growth that is expected in the other G-7 countries. The government has done the same thing with respect to the fishery and bringing the fishery under control. They have increased enforcement measures, which has cut down significantly on cheating and other kinds of overfishing by our own fishermen.

They brought a helicopter into southwestern Nova Scotia. There was some concern expressed. I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the mayor of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia not so very long ago, and from the Chamber of Commerce in Yarmouth as well expressing concern that when the helicopter contract was up this March, it would not be renewed.

That helicopter has done a fantastic job of fisheries surveillance and it has done a wonderful job of air and sea rescue as well. It is a priority with everybody in southern Nova Scotia to see that contract renewed and see that helicopter remain there. It is an expensive thing, and the money has to be found.

Where there is a priority and people's needs and interests are in the forefront, this government responds. That is why I am confident that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Transport will work together and find the means whereby that helicopter will continue its stay in Yarmouth serving the people of that area and in particular the fishermen who risk their lives every day going to sea.

We have heard a lot of talk from my hon. friend. He talks about the fishery, condemning the government for destructive policies. I notice he is frequently up in this Chamber talking about foreign vessels fishing in Canadian waters. I know, knowing my hon. friend as well as I do, it is certainly not his intention in any way to mislead anybody with respect to the issues that he raises.

I think it is very important that every single member of this House, and indeed Canadians, in particular Atlantic Canadians, understand where foreign vessels fish in the Atlantic fishery.

In 1973, the nations of the world that had an interest in the fishery and in the oceans of the world got together at the International Law of the Sea Conference and agreed that it was appropriate that coastal nations be allowed to declare a 200 mile economic fisheries control zone off their coasts.

Canada was one of the signatories to that agreement, but it was a voluntary agreement. The primary intent of that agreement was that it would give control of resources and particular fisheries resources to the adjacent state out beyond the continental shelf.

Except for three places in the world, 200 miles covers the limit out beyond the continental shelf. To our advantage or disadvantage, however you wish to describe it, the Grand Banks of Newfoundland are not one of those areas.

As I am sure you know, Mr. Speaker, because I know you have a great interest in the fishery, we have the nose and tail of the Grand Bank and the Flemish Cap sticking out beyond, and those areas are beyond Canada's international control. We have no right to tell anybody what to do in international waters.

Under that International Law of the Sea agreement, we are required to make available to other nations fisheries resources that we do not wish to harvest for ourselves in Canada. When we allow vessels from foreign countries to come inside our waters, we allow them to come in as we are required to do under the International Law of the Sea to harvest those resources that we have not been using.

Anybody who knows anything about fishing knows that when you put a hook or trawl line in the water, you are never 100 per cent sure what is going to come up and knows you have to have a by-catch.

I know my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls from time to time has had a great time talking about codfish allocations to these foreign nations when what he is really talking about are by-catches.

With a by-catch, one of the conditions that you can bring in, which is what this government did two years ago, is the condition that that by-catch has to be sold back for processing in Canadian plants so that in fact those fish do not go away from the plants where they could potentially create jobs for Canadians.

Similarly, I know my hon. friend talks about allocations of fish to the French, but something he never raises is the fact that before this government had the courage and the integrity to sit down and try to settle the 200 year old dispute with the French over the waters around St. Pierre and Miquelon that we had no idea how many fish they were taking.

The results of that now are that in fact there is less fish being taken now than there was before, but it is under control. As I am sure all members of the House are aware, we are awaiting the decision of the arbitration tribunal that will determine exactly where the lines are. We were fortunate enough to be able to use against the French the arguments that they themselves had used against the Channel Islands not so many years ago. It will be interesting to see. The important thing is that this government did not run away from the problem as its predecessor had done for years. It tackled the problem in the interests of Atlantic Canadians and in the interests of the Atlantic Canadian fishing industry.

• (1700)

One of the toughest problems we have yet to take on—and I know my friend from Gander—Grand Falls will be commenting on this—is taking on the challenge that we have too many people in his Province of Newfoundland—Labrador trying to make a living on too limited a resource in the fishery.

What do we do about that? I will be looking forward to hearing what he has to say about what his party proposes in solving that problem since he is suggesting that this government is not tackling those problems in a manner that will have have long-term benefits for Atlantic Canada.

Do I sense, Mr. Speaker, that my time is winding down on me? I have many more comments I would like to make. Did I see you giving me the sign, or can I continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You may continue.

Mr. McCreath: I will absolutely continue because I certainly welcome the opportunity. There are many more things I would like to say in regard to the topics my friend raised.

There are just a couple of more things I would like to say about the fishery. I mentioned the new measures with respect to enforcement, including the helicopter. I might mention that the Minister of Fisheries has recently spoken about a couple of other ideas that will bring decision-making in the fishery closer to the individuals in the industry. That is to say issues with respect to licensing and with quota allocations. Nothing would be better than to turn those things over to the industry so that the people who have to live with the decisions have a greater impact, if not a decisive impact in making those decisions.

I see that you are giving me the sign, so with that I will conclude at this point. I appreciate the opportunity to participate. I would be pleased to respond to my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said a moment ago that there were too many fishermen in Newfoundland chasing too few fish.

The federal government announced two days ago that seven Japanese vessels would receive licences this year to catch tuna inside our 200 mile zone off his riding on the Scotia shelf. Does he not agree that foreign nations were given quotas this year inside Canada's 200 mile zone, in a meeting that took place in the hon. member's province? Under international agreement quotas were given for fish inside our 200 mile zone around Newfoundland, around Nova Scotia, to Bulgaria, Cuba, Denmark, including the Faro Islands and Greenland, to every country in the European Economic Community, to Japan, Norway, Poland, the U.S.S.R. and to another category called "others".

The only group there not allowed to come inside the 200 mile zone is the EEC. Does the hon. member not agree that before we start saying that there are too many Canadians chasing too few fish that first of all we should get rid of every single foreign fishing vessel in Canadian waters. Does he not agree that any Canadian, whether they are a full-time fishermen or if they are on welfare, has a right to go out there and fish before a foreign nation is given a licence by the Halifax office of the department?

I have seen him in action over in the Hague talking about foreign overfishing. I have seen him speak for three, four and five hours to those foreign nations, complaining about their fishing. He cannot deny it. Doesn't he agree that before one foreign nation is given a licence on our coast that every single Canadian has a right to that licence before it is given to a foreigner?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to those issues of my hon. friend because he has really just illustrated the point that I made in my general remarks, as I was confident he would.

First of all, I appreciate his raising the subject of our efforts on the other side of the ocean to persuade the Europeans to discontinue their destructive anti-environmental dangerous fishing effort outside Canada's 200 mile zone on the nose and tail of the Grand Bank. He knows perfectly well that one of the most destructive forces impacting negatively on northern Newfoundland is the destructive fishing that is going on by Spanish and Portuguese on the 2-J3KL cod stock outside, and on the flatfish stocks on the tail of the Grand Bank, primarily by Portuguese vessels. He knows that.

I am not sure whether he said I spoke eloquently, he said I spoke at length, but I must tell you that he and I were a great team over there, and contrary to what I have read in the press lately which suggested that he and I and others had other activities on our minds when we were over there—nonsensical stuff, by yellow-backed journalists—we were over there fighting for our fishermen as we should be. I agree 100 per cent with my hon. friend that not a single fish should be taken from within our waters by foreigners so long as we can get Canadians to go out there and fish it.

Now, when my hon. friend talks about allocations to foreign vessels to fish within our waters, you notice, my friends, that he neglected to mention what the quota allocations were that those vessels were getting. Did you notice? I didn't notice his reference to that. Were they cod allocations, were they pollack allocations, were they haddock allocations? I don't recall his making any reference to that. My understanding of those allocations was that those allocations were from under-utilized stocks that we are not harvesting, things like silver hake and capelin.

I want to remind my hon. friend of the leadership that this government took, because this government has had a long-standing policy that we do not provide fisheries allocations to be bartered to foreigners. The previous Minister of Fisheries, now Minister of Employment and Immigration, in my judgment did a very courageous thing and he has been criticized roundly for it. He has been criticized in my constituency. I have had grief from plant owners and operators in my area over the allocations that that former Minister of Fisheries made in order to put the towns of Canso and Burgeo back into business again by making allocations of unused silver hake and capelin quotas so that they could be bartered for codfish from the Russians, which has put 500 people back to work in the town of Canso. That is decisive action by this government.

I might tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am looking forward to this government doing the same thing for the community of Port Mouton. I have put a proposal before the Minister of Fisheries that would give us long-term allocations so that we can harvest those resources.

I will just finish on this point, Mr. Speaker, by saying that nobody is licensed to catch fish that Canadians are going to or are prepared to go and fish, nor should they be.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the member's remarks he asked the rhetorical question: What taxes should be raised, as if taxes were always an outflow from the pockets of Canadians and were always a drain on them.

I would like to give the member an example of how using taxpayers' dollars, both in terms of loan guarantees as well as loans themselves and grants in the range of $5 million to a community, regrettably for the example not in Atlantic Canada, but in my riding, where that money ensured that the revenues of the province of Ontario, at $10 million a year, were maintained, and that revenues for the federal government in the first year would be $16.5 million retained and $8.2 million thereafter, taxpayers' money.

I agree with him that it is taxpayers' money, not the government's money, although sometimes I think the government forgets that, which can be used to lever ongoing revenue to the federal and provincial treasuries. Should it not therefore be looked upon as an investment in the future of a community, a province or the country? I want to put it in the context of shipbuilding, particularly trawlers and what have you where we know that right now no trawlers are being built. It will take two or three years before from seven to nine a year are going to be built, but they cannot afford to have them built in Canada because of the high costs.

Would the hon. member not agree that we need to return to some form of level playing field internationally which means in the short term that we have got to match the kind of financial assistance offered to shipyards and to purchases of ships so that they can build them here at home instead of the reality today of almost 100 per cent of all shipyard work is government contracts?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises several very interesting points that I would like to comment on but obviously in one minute I cannot. I will briefly say this.

I agree with him 100 per cent on the use of loan guarantees. Canadians are fed up with free money being given to companies. Let us not forget that a loan guarantee still does tie up government funding that cannot be used for other things. Briefly, I agree with him totally on the use of loan guarantees and we need more of it.

On the shipbuilding industry, I think the secret to having a level playing field is for our shipbuilding companies to learn to be competitive. If we have too many shipbuilding companies, that is tough. We are faced with a fact that globally there are not a lot of ships being built. It is not just in Canada. Globally there are not a lot of ships being built, be they large fishing vessels which I think is what he is referring to, or other kinds of large ships. The question is: How can the Canadian government and how can the Canadian economy best cope with the inevitable downsizing in the shipbuilding industry that is going to take place?

I think where we can become competitive over the next few years is not so much in new shipbuilding, but in attracting, as the Shelburne shipyard has done recently, Russian shipping vessels or foreign vessels for repair and maintenance work.

I look forward to pursuing the subject with my hon. friend.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as has been stated before by many of my colleagues on this side of the House, we take no pleasure in speaking today in this debate. It seems that since 1988 we have had precious little economically or socially or constitutionally to brag about or be very positive about in this House of Commons.

I would just likely briefly refer to the previous speaker from South Shore. The reason we are having this debate today is because of the decrease in equalization payments to the Atlantic provinces. It is peculiar that the only Atlantic province that is receiving an increase in equalization payments this year is Nova Scotia, which means that basically Nova Scotia's economy has performed the worst over the past year.

If you listen to the member from South Shore you would think that because of the free trade agreement and everything else the economy in Nova Scotia was just booming. You would not really think he came from the same region as many of the previous speakers have come from and that is the Atlantic area. The figures show that he is definitely misleading or definitely giving the people of his province and the people of this House the wrong impression, that the economies of his riding and his province are doing well. Basically, the only reason his province is getting $1 million extra is because it has performed the worst of any province in Atlantic Canada.

Atlantic Canada is the region of the country that has by far the smallest population and within that region Prince Edward Island is by far the smallest province. Our small numbers and our limited resources and the seasonality of many of our industries make Atlantic Canada very vulnerable in these tough economic times, times of economic downturn.

One of the most distressing attitudes of this government is its obsession with the numbers game. If you do not have the numbers you just do not count. The human factor has been removed as a consideration when this government makes its decisions.

It is more interested in spending more millions of dollars trying to get credit for the few programs that remain in Atlantic Canada. For example in ACOA it spends millions of dollars in advertising and trying to take credit for itself for any programs that might be launched in the Atlantic area. It seems to put that emphasis on taking credit much more so than providing service to the region.

This government has become so bureaucratic and so legalistic in its approach that terms like compassion and social justice have disappeared from its vocabulary. They have been replaced with terms like cost recovery, bottom lines, user fees, rationalization and getting credit.

Many of our national institutions have been dismantled or are scheduled to be dismantled or are scheduled to be dismantled or have been privatized or scheduled to be privatized. We have a government that preaches national unity on the one hand and on the other it destroys the ties that have held this country together for well over 100 years.

In no place is this more true than in Atlantic Canada. Transportation, because of our location, is vital to our survival. It has been crippled by the policies of this government. It has become extremely difficult and extremely expensive for either people or goods to move within Atlantic Canada. It is also very difficult and very expensive to transport goods or people in or out of Atlantic Canada. The transportation problem alone puts us at a severe disadvantage.

When we combine it with other government policies in the region, we as Canadians are left to wonder about the real intentions and agenda of this government. We are left to wonder about the real effects of this government's decentralization policies. We are left to wonder about whether all Canadians are really equal in the eyes of this government. We are left to wonder if people are really a priority any more or are we being ruled by a corporate agenda.

This country has been in existence for over 123 years. In that time we have built a country that provides its residents with a standard of living, a quality of life that is the envy of the world. These standards and our quality of life are weakening rapidly. We have shown the world the benefits of unity. We, as Canadians, have reaped the benefits of unity. It is bitterly ironic that in the face of all of this we are now going through the worst unity crisis in our history.

It is a unity crisis that is sorely aggravated by our economic problems. Nowhere is this more true than in the Atlantic provinces. Our region is plagued by problems in every major economic sector; the fishery, agriculture, tourism. Atlantic governments have recognized how imperative it is that people who have common interests and common needs join together in common cause if they hope to make legitimate progress. They have made substantial moves toward economic unity and have plans to continue in this vein.

However, federal budgeting and legislative policies have made it very difficult for Atlantic governments to even maintain standards let alone improve them. A case in point is the recent federal decision to further reduce equalization payments by over $100 million.

While the press release issued by the premiers after their emergency meeting indicates they took the latest blow with some degree of equanimity, I must report that the people in my riding, and these are the only ones I have heard from to this point, are extremely concerned. They see a $50 million deficit for this province for this year. They know that this cannot continue and they know that something has to be done about it. They see more problems coming. There have to be cuts and the people know there have to be cuts.

The three main industries in my riding are fishing, agriculture, and tourism. The people in these industries have already been hammered by changes and difficulties beyond their control: the fishermen by changed carapace size, lower catches, and lower prices; the farmer by the potato virus and low beef and hog prices; the tourist operator by the GST inflated costs and a recession that has kept many tourists away. The effects of Bill C-21, changes to the UI Act, are starting to be felt. They fear more hard times are on the way and definitely they are right.

I want to emphasize that we are all aware of the hard times.

• (1720)

We are all aware of the deficit and we are all aware that we must do our share and we are willing to do our share. However, at this point we feel that a disproportionately high proportion of the burden has been shouldered by Atlantic Canada. We do not feel that we should be asked to carry more. Indications are, however, that this is exactly what is going to happen.

We were worried about the potential impact that constitutional change and the free trade agreement would have on programs such as health care. Now it looks like we will not have to wait for constitutional change as freezes and cutbacks are going to force changes right now.

People in my riding are looking at the health care system, medicare. Many are alarmed at what they see. We have already seen staff layoffs in hospitals. We have seen beds closed down. We have seen services curtailed. Now people see more of the same and these cuts are probably going to be permanent or are going to remain for quite a number of years.

People have reason to be concerned. They see this government cutting, cutting, cutting. They know that the capacity to deliver programs will be reduced because of these cuts. They know that people in our region will likely not be able to enjoy the same standard of health care as their fellow Canadians in more well-to-do provinces. For example, the Established Programs Financing program has been capped at 3 per cent. Health services in Prince Edward Island are increasing at the rate of 7 per cent which leaves a 4 per cent shortfall every year, year after year after year. How is Prince Edward Island going to be able to deliver the same level of services as British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my time is almost up so thank you very much.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to pass up on the opportunity of asking the member a little question given that it is small business week. Although the debate does not specifically centre around that particular aspect of it, I think that when we talk about rural post offices, when we talk about fisheries and when we talk about railroads and we talk about cutbacks in transfer payments to our Atlantic provinces, we are talking about a broader community than just those directly affected by these moves.

Specifically, I would suggest that through the cut in transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces, what we are doing is either cutting massively on services that will hurt our seniors and others, particularly lower and middle income earners, or we will have to see the increase in taxes in the area and taxes come out of the pockets of the middle class and the small business community.

My question to the hon. member is, given the fact of these cuts, given the fact of what will be looked at, does he have any suggestions to the people of Atlantic Canada, and certainly to those of us in the rest of Canada, who have already faced some of these cuts, as to what the small business community in his area will think of these cuts and how it will think of this particular government giving those cuts and what is going to happen to it in the future?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member, this is our second round of cuts. We have already gone through one round and this is our second kick at the cat in this regard. The less money that is in the province, the less money people have to spend and the less money will be spent in the small business sector of our province.

There is another thing I would like to mention that has been happening in Prince Edward Island, and I assume the same thing is happening in the member's own riding. The unemployment insurance program is a vital program for Atlantic Canada and especially Prince Edward Island where most of the main industries like tourism, agriculture and fisheries are seasonal industries and the majority of our work force is engaged in this three industries.

For the first time, with the fishing and tourism season being concluded, we see people going in to apply for unemployment insurance and they are faced with this particular questionnaire. It is called the insurable employment questionnaire. It says: "Complete and return with your application". The first question on this paper is: "Are you related to any of your employers by blood, marriage, including common law or adoption?" Then they go on to ask: "Do you have a controlling interest in any of the companies in which you have worked" and "are you involved in any business relationship with the employer?"

In areas of a small province such as Egmont in western Prince Edward Island, and especially in the fishing industry, very many of the employer and employees are related. It seems as if it is almost a crime to work for someone who happens to be your third, fourth or fifth cousin. It seems to be a crime to work even if your wife has a business and you as her husband are working in that particular business. This was never a problem in the past. In fact most of the recent court rulings have said there is absolutely nothing wrong with this particular employee and employer relationship.

If the applicant checks the "yes" block, then his form has to go to Revenue Canada and this tacks two, three or four weeks on to their waiting period. Instead of waiting for four weeks to have a claim processed to get money, which will then be circulated in the community, they have to wait almost two months.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on this motion today. As my colleague from Egmont has said, we in Atlantic Canada do not get a great deal of pleasure in speaking on this particular subject. It indicates that the people in our area are not as successful as we would like and that we have economic difficulties which we want to improve upon.

We have a very difficult economic situation in Atlantic Canada. I would like to say that we in the opposition are working hand in hand with the government to try to find these answers. But that is not the case. The government maintains that everything is going well in Atlantic Canada. It has backed away from the problems that Atlantic Canadians are experiencing at the present time.

This motion talks about three areas in particular which are fundamental to the problems in Atlantic Canada. They are not the only problems. If we were to list every problem we would not have time for the debate. It would take from now until Christmas to debate the inconsiderate attitude of this government toward Atlantic Canada.

I think my colleagues have stated quite well the problems that exist, particularly the questions on fisheries, equalization and transfer payments. These are problems that the government just will not change its course on. The fishery is just devastated. There are no groundfish available to catch and, if there are, they are not coming in to where the inshore fishermen can get them. Yet our government, in its interest to please the foreign jurisdictions, to be buddies with the European Common Market and other nations, is giving these countries increased quotas at the expense of our own fishermen.

One would think that in an area where there is economic difficulty the government would go out of its way to try to promote an industry that can create employment. Instead it is going the other way. It is going out of its way to take jobs away from the fishery in Atlantic Canada to give them to other countries.

One cannot help but agree with Atlantic Canadians when they ask: "Whose side is the federal government really on?" It is a natural response.

The question of the railway is really a most incredible thing that we are contemplating and experiencing in Atlantic Canada right now.

• (1730)

The government wants to sell a main line from Truro to Sydney. Now this main line has been there since the 1860s. It is vital to the economy of Cape Breton Island in particular because Cape Breton Island is probably one of the areas which has the most economic difficulties right now. It depends on a struggling coal industry and a struggling steel industry.

When you are transporting coal and steel you use a train because you are shipping to thermal generating plants in Nova Scotia. When you are shipping steel you ship by train. Here is CN which uses the product that Sydney Steel is producing, going to sell the railway and take the chance that the railway will close entirely. Then it would not be able to purchase the steel that the steel plant makes because the it could not be transported on the line.

Now certainly you can transport by ship but you can only unload that rail at certain destinations. You have to be able to ship the rails by rail. Yet the CN is saying no. Of course what it wants to do is sell it to a short line operation. It cannot abandon it because it would have to go before the National Transportation Association and that would not be allowed. It wants to do what it has done with Route Canada. It wants to sell it to a short line operation and get away from all of the federal restrictions that would be required if that short line operation went bankrupt. It would not have anything more to do with it, as it did with Route Canada. It would simply say it sold the railroad. It would have no further responsibility.

If the company which bought it went into bankruptcy it would say that it looked like a good idea at the time to sell it to them. It would say that it screened them, they were gold plated, they were this, they were that, but they still went bankrupt. And there would be nothing anyone could do. Once again transportation interests in this country would be sold out. I mean it is absolutely disgraceful.

The government is saying that a short line operation is the way to go. A short line operation can really work. But what it is not telling the people is that CN plans to intermodal from Moncton eventually, to take the railroad to Moncton and from Moncton to transport by truck. A short line operation, operating between Truro and Sydney, would be competing with CN's own trucking operation. Now that is absolutely incredible, and they expect people to believe this.

In addition to this we know that Canadian National is actually de-marketing its own operation. It is discouraging people from using the rail service. What it hopes by that is that the bottom line will look so bad it will prove to be the justification for selling the railroad.

Even with this de-marketing of its operation it still makes a profit. No matter how hard CN tries to discourage would-be users of the railroad, it is still making a profit. Now can you imagine a Crown corporation doing this in Canada? Can you imagine a government allowing this Crown corporation to do this in Canada? I mean it is absolutely incredible that this is what is going on at the present time.

It is no wonder that people in eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton Island are absolutely furious. They feel they have been absolutely abandoned by the federal government.

Generally in this country steel is in difficult shape. We just heard one of the senior officers of Stelco tell us that in the last year it has lost 500,000 tonnes in its Canadian market. Four per cent of its steel has been lost because of companies either moving to the United States or going bankrupt.

In Sydney we have a rail producer. We thought that if the free trade agreement would be of some benefit then it would be a benefit to Sydney Steel because it operates in a tidewater operation. It can sell rails and land them in the northeastern United States more cheaply than the steel can be brought from the mid-United States to that area of that country.

Yet what happens is that we are countervailed. The Sydney Steel plant is countervailed against, 120 per cent. Of course it cannot compete, but why did that happen? The government decided in its haste to have a free trade agreement not actually to come to terms with the definition of subsidy.

The problem of course is that it is open. The United States has used its own definition of a subsidy to serve its own interests. The agreement said that the definition would be provided in seven years. Now that has changed because Canada and the United States have said they want to wait until the GATT defines what a subsidy is.

We are constantly left to spin in the air. More and more the government has said: "This is a small part of Canada, four provinces with only 32 seats. It does not figure in our plans to try to get re-elected. It does not figure in our plans of what this country is all about". I think this is a tragedy.

We are talking about renewal of this country, yet at the same time we are abandoning four of our ten provinces. If this is what this government means by "Canada" then certainly it is completely at cross-purposes with what this country means to Atlantic Canadians.

Atlantic Canadians see themselves not as second level Canadians but on the same level as all Canadians.

This is only fair in this country. This is what we have promoted. This is the greatest country in the world yet we are choosing who are going to be successful and who are not. There have been some very stupid programs, but that stupidity should not mean that the government will try once and that is the end of its attempt.

I would ask this government to reassess its policy and treat Atlantic Canadians as being equal to the rest of Canada. It must recognize that Atlantic Canadians need the support of this government. They do not need the government working against them.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to agree with the comments my hon. colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys has made.

Although I represent the great city of Dartmouth on the mainland of Nova Scotia, I cannot deny my roots as a Cape Bretonner.

It was the influence of the member from Sydney that is partially responsible for my being here. He is exactly the type of member of Parliament that I would aspire to be. He is an individual who went into politics for the right reason, and that reason was to try at the national level to ensure that those people who gave him the privilege of representing him in the Parliament of Canada were well served and that their needs and desires were put clearly in the House of Commons.

Those needs and desires are not that different from those of the people who live next door to them on mainland Nova Scotia or in the city of Dartmouth or anywhere in rural Canada, indeed anywhere in Canada.

The member takes his job very seriously. He is one of the few who are not given to flights of rhetoric in this House. He speaks very seriously about the issues at hand and I want to get his perspective. He has represented the good people in Cape Breton—The Sydneys for quite a number of years. It must make him feel somewhat bad as a long-standing member of Parliament to be at this point in his career where we still need to have debates in the House of Commons about equality and fairness for all Canadians no matter where they live.

I want to get his opinion on the policies of this government, not just in transportation but in every aspect of its economic policy. Has this government done anything since 1988 that would make people in that great island of Cape Breton or anywhere else in Nova Scotia feel more of a Canadian or less of a Canadian? I happen to believe that what it has done is systematically, through its economic policy, dismantle this once great nation.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friend and colleague from Dartmouth for his kind remarks. He has hit upon what I think is a very sensitive issue. When one chooses to be a member of Parliament he hopes to be able to make a difference. He hopes to be able to influence things for his riding that will improve the state of the people in that riding. It is very difficult for me to sit here in this House of Commons and watch the government systematically dismantle our social programs, our regional development programs, and to categorically turn away from people in Atlantic Canada, particularly Cape Breton Island. That is not an accident. They have just chosen to do that as a priority. It is an insensitivity that I just cannot understand. As a Canadian I feel very, very betrayed by this, and as a parliamentarian this sense of betrayal is even greater.

• (1740)

I would like to say that the people in Cape Breton Island are as strong Canadians as any group in this great country. They fought bravely during the two world wars and the Korean conflict, they have flown the flag with pride, at every opportunity they choose at their own volition to demonstrate their love for their country. One looks at them and says these are true Canadians because their government is not doing anything for them. Yet in spite of the arbitrary and derogatory treatment they are receiving, they remain great Canadians and proud Canadians.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in the debate today on this very, very important motion. With regard to the member who just spoke, although we are on different sides of the House, I think we have a great deal in common. I start out by saying that for a particular reason.

Today I met with a minister from the Atlantic Baptist Federation. He is meeting with various members of Parliament, parliamentarians on all sides of the House. It was very refreshing. I met with him just minutes before Question Period and we spent I guess 15 or 20 minutes together. It was very refreshing because as a minister and as a concerned citizen, and as a church, they want to know what they can do for individual members of Parliament and what they can do for Canada as a country in the next coming months. They are no different than any other church or any other denomination, but I think it was very refreshing to see this individual and his people visit Parliament and take an active role in what we are doing here and maybe how they can help us.

That is sort of the theme of today's debate. What can we do to improve the situation that we presently have, and I wanted to say presently enjoy in Atlantic Canada but I don't think we can take too much enjoyment in it.

To go back to some of the remarks made by the previous member, he mentioned that the government would have Canadians believe that everything is going well in Atlantic Canada. That is simply not the case. The government clearly recognizes that we have huge problems in Atlantic Canada. Some of those problems have been with us since Confederation, there is no question about that. It is a reality that we may have attempted to ignore in past years, but this government certainly is not ignoring that.

What we are talking about here are transfers of federal dollars, just so the people back home will know. It is a transfer of federal dollars from within this Confederation back to the poorer regions of this country. What it simply means again is it is taking moneys from other provinces and putting it into some of the have not provinces of this Confederation.

In the last year or so none of us questioned that we have gone through a very difficult economic climate. We are in a recession. The government clearly has admitted that. But the problem that that creates for Atlantic Canada is that the provinces that usually have the economic clout, the money, to put into some of these poorer regions simply do not have it. If you take a very close look at where those federal dollars have come from in the last number of years, it basically boils down to three provinces. Moneys are being transferred to the poorer regions of this country from provinces like Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. That has been the story of this Confederation in regard to equalization payments, those transfers to the poorer provinces, so that the poorer provinces can distribute the kinds of services and programs to their people as the rich provinces can do.

Part of the reality is that these provinces have had a huge slowdown in their economies. The province of Ontario, for example, has had a huge slowdown. B.C. has experienced the same thing and so has Alberta. That is why the transfers to provinces like my province are being reduced. It is not as if we are out to punish the provinces, but we simply have to work by a formula that was established long before most of us arrived here in this House.

During good times that formula works to our advantage and during bad times we have to live with the results. I do not like living with those results. That means people in my own neighbourhood in my constituency are going to suffer. That is the difficulty with the formula. It can work for you and it can work against you.

Again, going back to the reality of the whole equation, the reality that we are faced with is we are going through some very difficult times. The opposition would like us to think or would like the Canadian people to believe that we are isolated from the rest of the world, that we are the only country going through this very difficult period. Believe me, we are not. We cannot take much satisfaction in that, but we are not the only country in the world going through this recessionary period. The unfortunate part of it is of course that we have to suffer the results of that in our own neighbourhoods.

One of the things that I want to mention, especially in light of the debate that we are hearing across this country at this very moment, the unity debate, the constitutional debate, a part of that I think is going to bring the kinds of answers or the resolution to the problem that we are suffering in Atlantic Canada. As I mentioned earlier, the have not status of Atlantic Canada is not new to us. We have experienced that since Confederation. Also since Confederation we have worked with an outdated Constitution. We have worked with an outdated means of dealing with the realities in today's marketplace.

One of the things that excites me about our economic constitutional proposal is the fact that for the first time we are taking a serious look at dismantling some of those 500 interprovincial trade barriers that have restricted the development of provinces such as mine.

We can point to the present way we do business in Atlantic Canada and see some monumental flaws in it. All of us can, both sides of this House. The difficulty is we could never agree on how we were going to resolve some of those or whether in fact there was the political will to resolve some of those structural difficulties in Atlantic Canada.

For the first time we are taking a very serious look at it, a very reflective look at it. Some of the premiers who have staked out these protected positions on their sort of individual fiefdoms are now taking a very serious look at dismantling some of those barriers that have restricted our ability to move along with the rest of Canada.

The economists are telling us that in all parts of Canada on average it is costing a family of four $1,000 in some of the inefficiencies built into the Canadian economy presently. Some have even extended that figure upward to $2,500. Whether it is $1,000 or it is $2,500 it is costing us something. We have to move beyond that.

It is refreshing to know that Canada does want to move beyond that. We want to bring ourselves into the 21st century in a way that we can all be very proud. We are going to have to do that by hard work and dealing with some of those structural inefficiencies that we have lived with for the last 125 years.

• (1750)

The various economists have various ideas. I guess you would get as many ideas as to how we can improve the lot in Atlantic Canada as you have economists. In fact, you have heard that expression, Mr. Speaker, if you had three economists in the same room you would come up with four different points of view because at the end of the day one of them would sure enough disagree with himself if he talked long enough.

One of the articles that I would like to bring to the attention of the House is an article by John Odenthal. Mr. Odenthal is an economic researcher with the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council which is based, as many of us know, in Halifax. The timing of this article is very refreshing. It is an article from the Commercial News of September 1991. It is only a month or so old. He is saying that many Atlantic Canadians seem to think that if the country were to split up, they would live and work pretty much as they always have. He goes on to quote some statistics here:

> According to a recent survey commissioned by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, fully 57 per cent of Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers, Prince Edward Islanders and Newfoundlanders believe in their immutable economic future.

He goes on to say:

> Well, it's time for that 57 per cent to yank their heads out of the sand. Whatever becomes of Canada, the economic status of the Atlantic Provinces is not going to remain constant over the next few years.

He goes on to mention equalization payments. The statistics are almost alarming. We mentioned the net reduction in transfers to the provinces and again none of us on either side of this House want to see this happen, but it is a reality that we cannot ignore, but one of the startling figures that he brings out is that these transfer payments compose 39 per cent to 46 per cent of the provincial revenues in the respective provinces of Atlantic Canada.

What he is telling us, and most of us in this House know that anyway, but it is just to remind ourselves more than anything else, is that when you have an area of the country that depends on almost 50 per cent of their income from the rest of Canada, it tells you that there is a big, big problem.

I went through some of the structural changes that have to occur in Atlantic Canada and we have mentioned them, but this situation cannot continue. That is why I am really pleased with some of the initiatives that the federal government has taken to come to grips with this recurring problem, this problem that we have had since Confederation. For example, despite what we may think of it on an individual basis, the free trade agreement that will allow us to access that huge American market which is geographically next door, in my riding within six hours you can be within selling distance of 20 million to 50 million people. It is six to eight hours depending on what direction you are travelling. But there are all kinds of possibilities there for us.

We have got to get there on our own. We cannot continually look for other parts of Canada to prop up Atlantic Canada. We are going to need it. The difficulty that I see, of course, is getting from here to there. We know where we want to be and we are going to have to get some help to get there, but we are getting some of that help and I do not think we can ignore that.

Canadians have borne the burden well if you want to look at it in that sense; in other words, the have provinces to the have not provinces. It is a remarkable thing about this Confederation of ours that we have been able to do it. There are not too many Confederations in this world that will do it as well as we have in Canada. Can you imagine 50 cents out of every $1 spent in Atlantic Canada by the governments of Atlantic Canada are coming from the pockets of other Canadians and other provinces. That tells me that our Confederation has worked darn well for Atlantic Canada. We have obviously got to do more and we are going to do more because we are going to work through this problem together and we are not going to do it by simply criticising. I think the days of criticising are over.

It is very, very refreshing to note that when the loss, if you want put it that way, in those transfer payments to Atlantic Canada was announced, the premiers of Atlantic Canada did not jump up and down and pull their hair out by the roots and scream and holler and point fingers at Ottawa. It is very refreshing to note that they took a very balanced, reflective approach to the problem.

Two years ago that would not have happened. Two years ago they would not have done that. They would have been in front of the television cameras screaming and hollering at the reduction in transfer payments. That sense of reality is coming through. That sense of reality is best expressed by Premier Clyde Wells, and I quote from The Montreal Gazette, today's edition: "We have to bear in mind the whole nation has a problem". He is looking at a confederated Canada, a full Canada in which we work together on common problems.

It is very refreshing to note Mr. Wells' position in regard to our latest constitutional initiative. He knows that if this country is going to work, we have to work together to solve our problems. We do not do it by fighting.

He also goes on to say: "But we want to make sure that the reduction in federal transfers is done in such a way that it does not unfairly burden the poorer provinces like the Atlantic Provinces". I agree fully. As long as we all share part of the cost, we will do it ungrudgingly because we will all bear part of the burden for keeping this thing together, working together to get through our difficulties.

The premier of New Brunswick has basically stated the same thing. Mr. McKenna has stated that he is not happy with it. One of the things he is clearly unhappy with is the fact that the better you do in terms of dealing with some of the difficulties in your economy, the worse you are treated at the end of the day in relation to the present formula we have to work under. That is clearly one of the difficulties. The premier recognizes that.

The premier of New Brunswick is now saying to us, to the federal ministers, the Prime Minister: "We will accept part of the burden. We will accept part of the cost, but let us consult a little bit more on what happens in Atlantic Canada and maybe on where some of those federal monies are going to be spent or how they might be best spent".

Again, it leads me full circle back to our constitutional proposal. It is clearly underlined in that proposal that Ottawa cannot do it alone, that we need to have some help in this thing and the help will come from the 10 provinces with which we will consult. We will work together to work through our economic difficulties. When the day comes to deliver a budget in the House of Commons, it will not be shrouded in the kind of secrecy in which it has been shrouded in the past. We will go through that consultative process so at the end of the day the finance minister in the province of New Brunswick knows what we are doing; the finance minister in the province of Ontario has a sense of where we are going.

We have all criticized in this House the finance minister of the New Democratic government in Ontario.

An hon. member: Not all of us.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member, a member of that party says "not all of us have criticized". I have not criticized him either. He was doing what he thought was right. He was elected to do that. At the end of the day we may disagree, but he was doing what he was elected to do.

If you reflect on the situation in Ontario, despite the party that has formed the government in that province, today it is going through the same kind of difficulties that we are nationally, federally. It is cutting it back. Maybe if it had to do it over again, it would not have gone on a borrowing spree as it had to in the spring of 1991. Maybe it would have pared it back then. It is recognizing that there are some structural deficiencies in the economy of Ontario and it is going through a very, very difficult period. It is going through that same process we have had to go through here for the last two or three years.

An hon. member: There is going to be less money for transfer payments to Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Thompson: The member said it. There is going to be less money for transfer payments to Atlantic Canada. I hope there is. I hope the economy in Atlantic Canada is so vibrant that we do not need those transfer of payments.

• (1800)

That is where we want to lead ourselves in Atlantic Canada to work through this thing. We are going to need the help of the rest of Canada for a few more years to come and some of the structural changes that we are proposing to the economy and some we have already carried out are going to help us in the long run.

I am a little bit uncomfortable in the short term because there are industries in my riding that are suffering as there are in all parts of this country, but it is not because we have ignored them. It is a problem of money. There is not enough of it to go around and I wish there were more, but there is not.

We are going to work through it together in the spirit of a true confederation, the kind of Canada that we all want.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's remarks in the House and he was speaking about the idea of breaking down provincial trade barriers. I want to suggest to him what would happen if we in effect removed the protection that we have for small industries located in Atlantic Canada. Let us use breweries for example. The great cry has been to allow Moosehead to be sold throughout the rest of Canada.

Is there not a danger that once that protection is removed and the transportation component, the high cost of transportation in this country is invoked, those Moosehead jobs or those of any other small manufacturing jobs in Atlantic Canada or in other regions will relocate to Toronto, and that Labatt's will buy the licence, add another shift of three or four people and match the output? Is that not the danger of arbitrarily removing the provincial barriers? Is it also not a danger of big companies from the golden horseshoe, from Quebec, getting the contracts to build whatever in Atlantic Canada and bringing their own workers with them?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, we are running out of time. I would love to have a few minutes anyway to attempt to answer that question, but I see we have one minute left.

That is a valid point and to respond to that I would simply have to say that transportation is only one component within many components or elements that determine the price of a product. I think the belief and the understanding is, and I buy into this philosophy, that any time a smaller economy has the opportunity to sell into a larger economy that smaller economy at the end of the day is the winner. I believe that our competitive position in New Brunswick will be enhanced by that arrangement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

EUTHANASIA AND CESSATION OF TREATMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved that Bill C–261, an act to legalize the administration of euthanasia under certain conditions to persons who request it and who are suffering from an irremediable condition and respecting the withholding and cessation of treatment and to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise to participate in further debate about the desirability of legalizing euthanasia in Canada, a position which is supported by some 80 per cent of Canadians in circumstances in which persons who suffer from an irremediable condition, an irreversible medical condition, and who request their life to end be permitted to do so, and to protect physicians who assist in that process.

If I can begin with a little background dealing with health and quality of life.

The World Health Organization, as we all know, utilizes an holistic definition of health which includes spiritual, emotional, family, environmental and physical aspects. Not only is our society's concept of health changing, but patient expectations of the health care system and its professionals are changing.

Many patients refuse to accept the simple reassurance that the doctor knows best. They are no longer content to be passive recipients of medical magic and in ever increasing numbers individuals are demanding to be active, informed and in part participants during the process of utilizing the health care system.

Whereas in the past the basic expectation of physicians was simply to extend life, Canadians now are looking for improvements to their lives, which most of us can safely assume will be long. We want not only to live to a ripe old age, we want to be healthy, free of ailments which could impede our ability to enjoy life to the fullest. Because each person's idea of a fulfilled life is unique, society has begun to assert its desire that the health care system be responsive to individual needs and desires.

All this is happening when, through modern medical technology, past fatal diseases have become conquerable. Unfortunately, such medical advances have led to the situation in which perhaps almost 75 per cent of us will die as a result of some chronic, degenerative disease such as cancer or heart ailments or strokes. Today's lethal diseases often cause us to suffer lingering and painful deaths.

On occasion the practice of medicine gives rise to conflicts between healing, preserving life, alleviating suffering and administering comfort. For some preserving life means more suffering.

With all of these changes, the evolving holistic concept of health, increasing patient participation, ever–advancing medical technology, it has become more difficult to define health just in terms of life alone.

Today it is possible for individuals to have life without enjoying any of the characteristics of health. The issue of quality surely must enter into any consideration of life and/or health. A better quality of life is only one–half the problem. People also deserve a better quality of death. Consideration of this flip side, the quality of death, gives rise to our discussion of euthanasia.

I think most Canadians think that we as a society need to seriously consider the legalization of euthanasia, and such consideration, as I said, has become unavoidable because of the accomplishments of medical science.

What is euthanasia? The meaning of the word is "good death." However, the meaning has become much more complex. The Ontario Medical Association, for example, has defined euthanasia as being an act of actively assisting to die the patient who has requested that his or her death be hastened. This definition perhaps provides no hint to the emotionally charged nature of this morally frustrating, ethically confusing issue which demands our attention.

Perhaps a better definition is one which defines euthanasia as signifying the termination of life when the quality of life as defined by the patient has degenerated to the point of meaninglessness, when the illness has reached a stage beyond the help of any physician.

A distinction is often drawn between passive and active euthanasia, with passive euthanasia being acceptable while active euthanasia is not.

This argument holds that passive euthanasia, allowing individuals to die by withholding or ceasing comprehensive medical treatment, is not the same as active euthanasia, some positive act which leads to death, such as the administration of a lethal dose of a drug.

In short, the argument asserts that somehow the latter is killing while the former is not. I think really there is no distinction morally between passive and active euthanasia, since the intention is the same.

There is another important question to be asked: is there a moral difference between physicians who assist patients in dying through their purposeful decision of non-action and physicians who assist patients in dying by administering a lethal dose of medication? Again I say that for physicians, the answer must be no, provided that either scenario takes place in accordance with the expressed wishes of the patient.

The issue of significance is whether the circumstances of euthanasia are voluntary or involuntary. We are limiting our discussion to voluntary euthanasia. It seems to me that voluntary euthanasia rests on a fundamental human right, the right to die if death is the only release from suffering.

Surely the right to choose to die is a very important demonstration of individual freedom, but no individual has the right to advocate it for another. Clearly voluntary euthanasia is not killing. It is physician aid in dying. Involuntary euthanasia on the other hand is in no uncertain terms murder.

• (1810)

When I state that I support the legalization of euthanasia, I am saying that a patient who is fully cognizant of all the facts regarding his or her diagnosis and prognosis should be able to request the aid of a physician in achieving his or her own death should they so choose. That is the first point of Bill C-261, that a person should have the right to make this choice in circumstances of an irreversible medical condition.

My second point is with regard to protecting physicians who assist. The law should be changed so as to permit physicians to fulfil such requests of their patients. In Canada we saw the partial acknowledgement of each individual's right to determine the circumstances of their own death when the act of suicide was decriminalized.

By not decriminalizing aiding and abetting suicide, we are preventing some members of our society from exercising this right and instead are sentencing them to lingering, painful deaths. The right to control one's own dying process, to die with dignity, needs to be accepted in our legal system and physicians who assist patients' wishes need to be free from any fear of criminal responsibility.

Should euthanasia become legalized in this country, clearly relevant laws must be carefully constructed. The rights of all individuals need to be enshrined within such legislation and the legislation must guarantee the freedom of choice to every Canadian. It must grant those with irreversible medical conditions the right to die with dignity and it must also provide medical professionals with the right to choose not to participate.

The key concept here, it seems to me, is choice. By legalizing euthanasia within clearly defined guidelines, all Canadians can be provided with the opportunity to choose euthanasia or not. By not legalizing it, many Canadians will be forced into the only option available, one which otherwise they would not choose.

Those who are opposed to legalization of euthanasia deny others the freedom of choice. Pieter Admiraal, a physician in the Netherlands and some like-minded colleagues summed up this discussion nicely when they explained that not everyone would choose euthanasia. There are those who would prefer to fight for life in the midst of pain up to their last breath. This is their right but we should all have the power to choose.

In the debate regarding euthanasia it has been accurately observed that to err on the side of life is to not fully understand that for some patients life in any meaningful sense is already over. Is this the sort of error that a society which truly values life would make?

The argument rooted in the moral issue of the sanctity of life is one of the most common barriers directed in opposite to euthanasia. We are encouraged by those who hold this point of view to consider the rightness or wrongness of allowing doctors to assist patients in their death upon their request, the rightness of taking life with the permission of the person involved.

It is also important to consider the flip side of this argument. Is it right to deny members of our society who have irreversible medical conditions an escape from the suffering they experience? Is it possible to profess a respect for life when we have little or no concern for those whom we force to endure it against their wishes. Certainly if as a society we want to preserve the moral value of the sanctity of life, we need to be clear about what is sacred about life. Is it biological existence of some measure of quality?

If we as members of the Canadian community truly possess a sincere respect for life we should accept that the meaning of life is defined in most personal terms by each individual that some will define their own life in terms of quality and others in terms of basic existence.

Should we not accept that through our own personal definitions of life some of us will support euthanasia and others will oppose it? Would not a genuine respect for life dictate that neither is more right than the other? If we do not want to violate the sanctity of life then I believe we are required to respect each individual's interpretation of life's meaning and accept that this will necessitate the availability of euthanasia within our health care system.

Another argument in opposition to legalization of euthanasia is rooted primarily in religion. Some put forth the argument that only God gives life and only God can take it away and thus euthanasia should be opposed. Can the medical technology of today which can keep the body's vital processes functioning for an indeterminate amount of time be described by those with this perspective in any other way than the moral intervention in this divine plan? Surely, though, those that take this view should not force their views and values on others who do not share them. Physicians are increasingly exercising their power to determine life and death in our own health care system.

Clearly physician aid in dying is occurring presently but without standardized regulations or safeguards. It is this ad hoc approach it seems to me that should be feared, not the legalization and regulation of euthanasia. The concern expressed that legalized voluntary euthanasia would lead to involuntary euthanasia is not warranted if the legislation is carefully developed and crafted.

One of the many arguments employed in opposition to any consideration of the legalization of euthanasia is that such a move would subvert the role of the physician. Those who make this assertion typically ground their argument in the Hippocratic oath. They refer to the part of this historic document which commits physicians to the role of healer and insists that this prohibits them from ending life. They suggest that the legalization of euthanasia could serve to relieve physicians of their pledged obligation to preserving life, and not only would the public confidence and trust in the profession be undermined but patients' lives would be at risk also.

I find it impossible to believe that the only thing that has prevented patients from being killed by their physicians is their pledge to the Hippocratic oath. Surely physicians, like most other members of society, are influenced by existing moral and societal values, which prohibit murder, and they are also influenced of course by their code of ethics and conduct.

Now, understandably, the initial purpose of the oath was to establish the medical profession as valuing life. However, it was created prior to any possible conception of what health care would become today and it was created in the absence of any real ability to prolong life in the fact of death. Times have changed drastically in this regard and I think we need to address these concerns in a different and more humane way.

When emotional and spiritual health are assigned similar status to physical health, the physician's commitment to the role of healer could not be interpreted as a prohibition from allowing death to occur if its purpose is for the relief of suffering. It has been suggested that doctors have to realize that in certain circumstances assistance in dying is a form of medical treatment. It is another way of relieving suffering.

On the subject of pain and suffering, in particular, one writer wrote: "Many people are in favour of the introduction of euthanasia for release from unbearable, painful or undignified existence, and far from resulting in an attitude that would undermine the foundation of society, euthanasia would be seen as an expression of the realization of the limits of human endurance and as an acknowledgement of the duty of care."

It is worth remembering when dealing with physical pain that not all physical pain can be relieved through the appropriate use of pain suppressing drugs. Most can, but not all can. For example, of patients suffering terminal forms of cancer about three per cent will experience pain which is medically untreatable. Some studies in the area of palliative care indicate that we have seriously underestimated the kind of suffering that does exist.

It also needs to be recognized that suffering can take many forms beyond physical and terminal manifestations. If we accept the holistic view of health that I discussed earlier so as to include emotional aspects, we are challenged to address the pain and suffering experienced at this level also.

I use the term irremediable or irreversible medical condition purposefully, because I believe that the various manifestations of pain and suffering are not exclusive to terminal illness. Alzheimer's disease is a useful example in this regard. It is not a terminal condition, yet some of the people faced with this diagnosis experience serious emotional suffering. They fear living a life completely devoid of dignity due to the symptoms characteristic of the advanced stages of the illness. Can any medical professional claim the ability to understand, never mind the ability to treat, the emotional pain and suffering of an individual whose life has been completely altered due to a health problem such as Alzheimer's disease is?

The urge to avoid, or worse yet deny, the emotional experience of pain and suffering endured by those with irreversible medical conditions is part and parcel of our society's inability to face and accept death as being part of life. Our society has been accurately described as one which exalts the young and the healthy. But as a society we need to understand and accept that for each of us there comes a time when death is no longer the enemy. It is our challenge, I think, to allow others to die when they are ready and not to impose our own desires upon their personal decisions. We need to discuss the taboo subject of death openly with our doctors, family and friends, and the debate regarding euthanasia is a part of this.

In closing, I would like to emphasize that this consideration of each individual's right to die with dignity, the right to choose euthanasia, is not some esoteric academic debate taking place within the margins of Canadian society; conversely, the majority of Canadians are seriously contemplating this issue and are in favour of its legalization. Indeed, in a Gallup poll in 1990 that survey found that 78 per cent of Canadians believe that the doctor should be allowed by law to end the life of a patient if there is an incurable disease that causes great suffering, if the patient has made a formal request in writing.

A study conducted by Dr. Molloy of McMaster University of 1,500 physicians found that 90 per cent of doctors felt that patient desires were important in life and death treatment situations.

With a majority of average Canadians in favour of euthanasia and a significant majority of the physicians believing that patient desires are important in the consideration of life extending treatment options, is it not about time that euthanasia became a health care option.

When a large number of physicians are willing to risk legal repercussions in order to practice in accordance with their patient's wishes and when we as health care consumers are increasingly demanding such personalized delivery of service, is it not time also to legalize euthanasia?

Now that we have medical technology that is capable of sustaining existence far beyond the point where all else that gives value to life has departed, is it not time that we legally sanctioned each individual's right to die with dignity?

I believe that that time has arrived. This bill and the suggestion that euthanasia be legalized at their core provide for two things: first, the choice for Canadians living under intolerable, to them, health conditions involving suffering and loss of dignity with no hope of relief and being able to make a choice to die. In other words, it is people having the opportunity and the right to decide when their medical condition is irreversible and intolerable to them to end their life. The second thing is for physicians who assist in carrying out their patient's wishes to be protected from criminal penalty.

In closing, surely as a society we are compassionate, tolerant and caring enough to provide for this choice and this protection.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss further Bill C-261, which would become the euthanasia and cessation of treatment act.

I commend the hon. member for bringing this forward for discussion, however, in my view this bill is inappropriate as I will try to show.

The difficult question of euthanasia deserves more careful attention than this bill has to offer. With advances in medicine, people are living longer and the number of those suffering from life threatening diseases such as cancer is increasing, as is the number of those with symptoms of Alzheimer's and other degenerative diseases which destroy the mind.

Medical technology now makes it possible to preserve life long after the person is able to function as a sentient being. With the spread of AIDS, many young persons, even babies, face the prospect of early disabling terminal illnesses. All these things have resulted in continued demands by concerned individuals and associations for the decriminalization of voluntary active euthanasia and counselling, aiding or abetting suicide.

At the same time, there is another group of concerns which cannot be left unattended if euthanasia is to be regulated. One is that many doctors will insist on attempting to treat for some time after there is no more hope of preserving or restoring any meaningful life.

In other words, many practitioners feel it is their duty to treat the terminally ill until the very last moment. The issue therefore becomes at what point should treatment cease and the person be allowed to die. There is also the concern that adequate palliative care for terminally ill persons may not be provided because of doctors' fears that administering enough of a drug to relieve pain may result in the death of the patient who has not yet decided or is not capable of deciding whether he or she wishes to die or live.

It can be misleading to confuse voluntary euthanasia with this group of concerns, although they are obviously linked to each other if only because they deal with ways to terminate life.

In my view, one cannot dissociate these concerns. Bill C-261 addresses to some extent these by adding sections having to do with the withholding and cessation of treatment. Unfortunately Bill C-261 does not differentiate between the two types of activities, leaving the issues more confused than before.

Clauses 16 and 17 of Bill C-261 seem to attempt to regulate the following: One, cessation of treatment where treatment is therapeutically useless; two, respect for the decision of a competent adult to refuse treatment; and three, causing death as a result of administering an appropriate amount of a drug to relieve pain of a terminal patient.

These activities do not by themselves entail criminal responsibility because they do not involve intentional killing. Instead, they raise the following types of problems, and I would like to go through this list:

1. How to give legislative recognition to an individual's wish to be allowed to die with dignity;

2. What constitutes treatment, that is, does the right to cease treatment include the right to withdraw nourishment;

3. Whether there are any public policy limits on the autonomy of adults;

4. Determining whether a comatose patient would want to have his or her pain alleviated even at the risk of death;

5. In what circumstances should the patient's agreement be necessary;

6. Whether third parties can provide valid agreement in circumstances in which the patient is incapable of providing it; and

7. Whether children can provide valid agreement, and whether there are any public policy limits on the autonomy of children.

While the latter part of this bill, and particularly sections 16 and 17, also purport to deal with these matters, I do not intend at this time to discuss them or the issues they raise because they are similar to the provisions of Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code, which will be known as the terminally ill persons act, and they will be discussed by others in the committee hearings on Bill C-203. I would just point out that these fundamental issues are not addressed by the provisions in the latter part of this bill.

I am here more concerned with the voluntary euthanasia provisions of this bill, and in this connection some background information may be useful. The bill is remarkably similar to the voluntary euthanasia legislation bill which was debated in the English House of Lords in December 1936 when second reading was moved and lost. This bill had been introduced in the House of Lords, it had never been debated in the House of Commons. The bill has been briefly summed up as follows: "The English Bill of 1936 requires that the patient shall be twenty-one years old (the age of majority at that time), of sound mind, and suffering from a fatal and incurable disease, accompanied by severe pain. A formal application is to be signed by the patient in the presence of two witnesses and submitted to the euthanasia referee, an official appointed by the minister of health, together with two medical certificates, one from the attendant doctor and the other from a specially qualified practitioner. The referee is to conduct a personal interview of the patient and establish that he fully understands what he is doing. Euthanasia is to be administered by a licensed practitioner in the presence of an official witness, such as the minister of religion or a justice of the peace. The bill sponsored by the Euthanasia Society of America is very similar, but provides for application to the courts for a certificate, the courts being empowered to appoint a committee of physicians and others to investigate the case."

This bill was severely criticized at the time and, as indicated earlier, never became law. Citing again from the same author: "This approach to euthanasia has been criticized as cold bloodedly formal and cumbrous, and Dr. Glanville Williams, who was the noted English academic authority on criminal law, has suggested that a more acceptable proposal would be to provide that no medical practitioner should be guilty of any act done intentionally to accelerate the death of a seriously ill patient unless it is proved that the act was not done in good faith with consent of the patient and for the purpose of saving him from severe pain in an illness believed to be of an incurable and fatal character".

Dr. Glanville Williams' advice was subsequently adopted in the voluntary euthanasia bill, which was introduced in the House of Lords in March 1960. As was the case with the 1936 bill, it was rejected on second reading.

The bill we have before us for debate is the 1936 English bill, with the addition of the good faith protection for medical practitioners, which in the 1960 bill replaced the earlier, more formal approach. Bill C-261 has thus been cobbled together with two English bills which were never debated in the English House of Commons and which did not obtain second reading in the House of Lords.

The only concession to Canadian content has been to replace the minister of health with the Attorney General of Canada as a person with the dubious privilege of designating the official to be known as the euthanasia referee.

Another difference is that in this bill, there is no requirement for official witnesses to the administration of euthanasia.

Most of this bill was prepared before World War II and its application is not restricted to the terminally ill. It applies to what is termed an "irremediable condition", which is defined as "an incurable illness, disease or impairment". This definition would include mentally disordered persons as well as persons with developmental handicaps and physical disabilities.

An hon. member: Even ageing.

Mr. Horner: Do not tell me that, please. It reflects an attitude by some that persons in these conditions were a burden to society and would no doubt wish society to help remove the burden if it were possible to do so in a legally valid manner. To put it bluntly, this English bill was part of another era and we need to devise a modern solution to modern problems. Importing a bill which was rejected twice is certainly not addressing modern concerns.

Do I have a couple of minutes left?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent of the members?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: I thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for giving me consent to proceed.

For these and other reasons, this bill is totally unacceptable. Its provisions are unfair to doctors, as well as to the general public. Under this bill, a doctor could administer euthanasia when the individual had changed his mind and the doctor was unaware of the change.

Under this bill an euthanasia certificate may be revoked by its destruction or cancelling it by writing "cancelled" or something similar on its face, but there is no requirement that the doctor review the situation with the person involved or even review the certificate before administering euthanasia. There is very little responsibility on the doctor to do anything after he gets the certificate from the euthanasia referee.

This approach could be compared with the Canadian Medical Association's position on resuscitation of the terminally ill, which requires that the attending physician and the nursing staff review a no resuscitation order at appropriate intervals and that a request by the patient to rescind a no resuscitation order should be implemented immediately.

It seems clear that there is a need to examine the claims of those who currently advocate the need for euthanasia legislation, as well as the position of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, that of other groups and the experience of other jurisdictions. It has been suggested that Canada follow the Netherlands model. It may be useful to inquire why the Netherlands, like the other European community countries, has no euthanasia legislation, although there is protection in Netherlands case law for euthanasia under very stringent conditions.

I want to conclude by saying that what is needed at present is an analysis of the issues and informed discussion, rather than an attempt to give an anachronistic British bill new life in the Parliament of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those days when I wonder whether I should be angry or sad; sad about the role we are being asked to play in the House today.

Mr. Speaker, this may sound old fashioned to some people, but I maintain that no one on earth has the right to decide whether someone may live or die.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today concerns so-called euthanasia. I always wonder why people feel they must use these terms in this kind of bill. I see here on page 2 of the bill: "Application for administration of euthanasia". If I ask Mrs. So-and-So in my riding to tell me what that means, she probably won't be able to give me a definition. Of course, what it means is an application to have someone else help us commit suicide. That is what it means. We can give it another name, but let's not forget what we are really saying.

[English]

Section 4 of the bill describes who is eligible for euthanasia. A person who is suffering from an irremediable condition and is not less than 18 years of age may make a written application to the referee on euthanasia for an euthanasia certificate.

Let us look at the definition of that word irremediable. It says: "means an incurable illness, disease, or impairment". It does not have to be life threatening or anything like that. Diabetes certainly qualifies in that group. It is incurable, at least as far as we know today. But is something that is incurable today incurable tomorrow? Probably all forms of cancer were incurable some decades ago. That is not true today. What is incurable at one point may very well change. Further, it does not even have to be a terminal disease.

Surely there is something wrong. Even if someone disagrees with me in my original statement, surely there is something wrong with that definition.

I could even argue that aging is incurable. What about arthritis? As far as I know many forms of that are incurable. Is that also grounds for the use of this bill?

Then I read the briefing note our colleague provided, and I thank him for this. I must say it does not make me want to support the bill more. It does the opposite but it does assist us in understanding what he is trying to do in spite of the fact that I disagree with it. It says that individuals of less than 18 years of age can only make such an application with the written consent of a parent. What are we saying? That an adult can give the consent for a child to be killed?

Is this what we are saying as a society? Were we debating this bill in the British House of Commons a few years after the Magna Carta in 1215 maybe that would be possible. Some years from now when someone dusts off the old pages of Hansard they will wonder in what century we were living when we considered ourselves modern, compassionate people, yet this is what we were saying. I cannot agree with that.

It has been said today by the proponent of the bill and I know I am paraphrasing, that the Hippocratic oath is perhaps outmoded.

Here is what it said. The Hippocratic oath said in part: "I will give no deadly medicine to anyone if asked, nor suggest such counsel."

The modern day Hippocratic oath was adopted in 1947. It is called the Declaration of Geneva. The Declaration of Geneva says: "I will give no deadly medicine to anyone, even upon request, nor suggest any such counsel." That was said in 1947, not 400 B.C. like the Hippocratic oath. It is equally true today.

One of our colleagues, a medical doctor, a specialist in paediatrics and child health, a professor of medicine and a member of Parliament for Winnipeg North, said earlier today and I asked him to write it down for me so that I could quote him in the House: "This bill violates the inherent and paramount principle of medical ethics, not to will or intend the death of a patient even when they wish it for themselves. I believe as well that life becomes even more precious when there is little left to live."

I share those views but I also am very concerned about what this bill could mean, or any other bill like it, for people who have reached a certain age in life.

I was party to a conference in British Columbia a number of years ago at which a physician by the name of Dr. Will Johnson spoke. Dr. Johnson said the following about what happens now in Holland. I quote from his speech: "What has this practice done to the concept of trust? Rumours abound. One psychiatrist muses that he has a choice of two nursing homes for his elderly patient. One of the homes he feels is involved in fairly aggressive euthanasia of the demented elderly, and he says 'my patient would not last half as long if I sent her there.' It has become common knowledge that some physicians take the initiative 'you really ought to go to hospital now or I could just give you an injection.' Given widespread fear of hospitals and ignorance of the effective palliation that is available, this ominous scenario is now complete."

Let me quote the following before I end. Again, from Dr. Johnson's speech: "In one published case, the Dutch general practitioner was called to a patient's home and meeting her for the first time, immediately asked her to choose between hospitalization and euthanasia. When the stunned patient could not reply, he gave her one hour to think it over."

We are debating this bill for one hour today. Let us think it over. If there is only one mercy killing I want to do right now, it is to kill this bill immediately and put it out of its misery. Let us forget about this kind of nonsense. There is Bill C–203 on the Order Paper and I do not think I can agree with it either. It is with respect to the living will. We are not talking about the matter of the living will in any case today. What we are talking about is state legislated murder.

I cannot agree with those who say that we preserve human life by killing human beings and that we accept death as part of life. Death is not part of life, it is the end of life.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The parliamentary secretary, on a point of order.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if you would answer a question in connection with this bill. Since it is 6.40 p.m, and considering that during Private Members' Business the bill must be debated for an hour, if I am not mistaken—unless the Standing Orders have changed—will there be a vote?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. This is not a votable motion, according to the information I have just been given.

Since no other members wish to rise on this motion, the period set aside for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 6.40 p.m, this House stands adjourned until 10 a.m tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.42 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ACT TO PROVIDE FOR THE CONTINUATION OF POSTAL SERVICE

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a motion in the House, and I want to ask unanimous consent for the following:

[English]

That, notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of this House, on Monday, October 28, 1991 at 12 p.m., the House shall proceed with the daily routine of business under heading Introduction of Government Bills and that a bill placed on the Order Paper on October 23, 1991 in the name of the Minister of Labour entitled an act to provide for the continuation of postal service be introduced, read a first time and deemed printed;

That immediately thereafter the House proceed under Government Orders with a debate at all stages of the said bill;

That the said bill be deemed completed later that same day;

That this order shall be rescinded if the Minister of Labour or government House leader rise from their seat at any time during daily proceedings on a point of order and advise the House that the employer and employees of the postal service have come to a mutual agreement.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in conversations with the Liberal critic and the Minister of Labour I think the Labour Minister knows that we will not agree to passage of all stages on Monday.

We have agreed, in order for the parties to get together today, Saturday and Sunday, that we would waive the usual notice and would allow the second reading debate to start on Monday. If the parties have not come to agreement or if we are in a situation where the parties come to us and say that they need more time to settle the dispute, we may again hold off the actual commencement of this debate. But there is no way that we would agree to passage in all stages on Monday of a bill that we have not seen. That just cannot be done.

The reason we are allowing or are willing to allow that we would start second reading on Monday is that we do not want any of the parties to see the legislation. We want them to be spending their time, their efforts, their emotions, their thoughts on negotiating over this weekend. If either party saw the legislation, they may decide that that would be better for them than actually negotiating.

We are holding off looking at the legislation, but we are willing to commence second stage reading if the minister finds that it is necessary.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague has reflected the consensus that was reached among the various parties. But just to be crystal clear, which I am sure the minister would want all members to be, we would concur with commencing the second reading of the bill in question on Monday.

• (1010)

However, if the parties are progressing with the various outstanding items and the parties so indicate to the minister and to the respective representatives of the party, I do not believe it would be necessary to proceed with the legislation on Monday.

In fact it would perhaps be inappropriate to proceed while negotiations are progressing. The minister should clearly understand that we would have to deny forthwith all stages of the bill on Monday but would be prepared to commence second reading on Monday if in fact the parties in the postal dispute indicate that there has been a breakdown and no possibility of resolving the dispute.

[Translation]

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, in that case, I would like to table the following motion:

[English]

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and usual practices of this House, on Monday, October 28, 1991 at 12 p.m., the House shall proceed with the daily routine of business under the heading Introduction of Government Bills and that a bill placed on the Order Paper on October 23, 1991 in the name of the Minister of Labour entitled an act to provide for the continuation of postal service be introduced, read a first time and deemed printed;

That immediately thereafter the House proceed under Government Orders with the debate at second reading of the said bill;

That this order shall be rescinded if the Minister of Labour or government House leader rises from their seat at any time during daily proceedings on a point of order and advises the House that the employer and employees of the postal service have come to a mutual agreement.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will find unanimous consent for this motion.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, that particular motion is fully in line with the understanding we have with respect to the motion.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, in order not to delay things, we agree with that particular wording. It is the understanding that we have.

Again we would urge the minister to review the situation on Sunday night and Monday morning, to talk to the two parties and, if it appears that the two parties are very close to an agreement, not to start the legislation Monday but perhaps Tuesday or later in the week if it is still necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While the Minister of Labour is in the House I am wondering if he might indicate, since it concerns the postal strike and that subject matter, whether he intends later this day on ministerial statements to provide Parliament and to provide the country as a whole with the contents of the report which I presume Mr. Justice Gold has filed with him.

An hon. member: Ask your question.

Mr. Dingwall: This is not Question Period. We are talking about business of the House.

I wonder whether or not the minister would like to table that report. If there is no report, would the minister be prepared to indicate to the House what his conversations with Mr. Justice Gold were concerning the postal? Would he share that with members of Parliament?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, this sounds like Question Period. I can tell the hon. House leader of the Opposition that I did not receive any written report from Mr. Justice Gold. He never discussed with me the contents of the negotiations or mediation between the parties.

However, last night I had long discussions with both Canada Post and the union on the outstanding issues in dispute. I do intend today to brief, on a confidential basis, the critics for the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party.

In the public interest and not to hurt the negotiations that are going on this weekend, I think that should be done and that is the only thing that should be done at this time, until the end of the weekend.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has been very lenient, and I would appreciate the co-operation of the House Leader of the Official Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, if you review the record I think you will see that we have been giving co-operation to a very serious matter which the minister has wished to proceed with. I want to thank the minister for his undertaking here today that in fact he will meet with representatives of my party, the New Democratic Party, to give them a full and comprehensive briefing in terms of the verbal report that he has received from Justice Gold as to why mediation services have broken down between the two parties.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think that the title of the bill sort of explains what the bill is all about, so very briefly I will give an indication of what it is. As the title says, the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1991 will give effect to the 1990 proposals for a miscellaneous statute law amendment bill tabled in both Houses of Parliament on February 15, 1990.

The proposals are part of the miscellaneous statutes law amendment program that is an ongoing means of correcting anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in federal statutes and of repealing federal enactments that have expired, lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

Those proposals were referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Justice and the Solicitor General which reported on them on June 13, 1990. They were then referred to the Standing Committee of the Senate on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in June 1990 and the Senate committee reported on them in February 1991.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments, now embodied in Bill C-35, are proposals that were approved unanimously by both the Senate Committee and the House Committee.

Perhaps I may advise hon. members that after second reading, I intend to ask unanimous consent for proceeding immediately with Committee of the Whole and third reading.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in this debate on second reading of Bill C-35.

I want to say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, since you have been the one who raised the issue of co-operation from opposition members of Parliament, that Bill C-35 was discussed at House leaders' meetings. We did not believe that we would be proceeding with it today. In fact it was indicated quite clearly that we would be proceeding with the motion with regard to conflict of interest.

However, the government has the right to change the agenda, which it has in this particular instance, and the minister quite rightly has alluded to the chronology of events surrounding the contents of Bill C-35.

The bill itself is a miscellaneous bill affecting a good number of statutes which I will read into the record momentarily. However, I wish to inform members that this is kind of an unusual procedure, unusual in the sense of previous occasions when a miscellaneous statute of this particular magnitude has come forward as it has in previous Parliaments and sessions. It has been customary that there would be a pre-study of the bill by members of Parliament so thereafter, when the minister would come into the House and ask to go to Committee of the Whole, leave would be granted. When he would ask to go on to report stage, third reading, to wrap the bill up, co-operation was always forthcoming.

• (1020)

That is the way it has operated in the past but that is not the way it is operating today.

We have indicated that we would not be able to proceed with this particular bill today, but nevertheless the government has decided to stick with its agenda and bring forward this particular bill.

The bill deals with numerous technical amendments to more than 90 statutes that cover—

An hon. member: How many?

Mr. Dingwall: Ninety federal statutes that cover virtually every facet of the Government of Canada. That is a sizeable number of statutes.

The legislative committee must take care on this bill. However there is very little to be said at second reading except for some of the points that I wish to make. I think I have unlimited time. I do not know if I will go on for a day or two or three. I think it important that we place certain things on the record which are of some importance to those of us on this side.

We will probably want to have additional speakers as we progress into the committee stage. Then it comes back from the committee on the report stage and then we go into third reading. Probably before Christmas there will be an opportunity for us to meet in this House and make a final adjudication on Bill C-35.

This is a breach of the traditions of this House. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would want me as an individual and as an opposition House leader to stand in this place and attempt to support the important traditions of this House, which we believe to be very important.

There are a number of amendments. One of the amendments that I wish to draw to the attention of the House, and I am sure the minister opposite would want to concur if not necessarily with the amendment itself but perhaps with my remarks following this particular amendment.

Section 9, headed the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act, says:

> 9. The heading preceding section 21 of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

And then:

> 10. Subsections 21(2) and (3) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> (2) The President shall, on or before September 15, 1993 and every five years thereafter, submit to the Minister a comprehensive report, in addition to the annual report of the Agency, providing an evaluation of all activities in which the Agency was involved and the impact those activities have had on regional disparity.

I am somewhat surprised when I hear the Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Minister of Public Works from Central Nova, and the Minister of Employment and Immigration from the province of New Brunswick refer to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency as being—as they say in news reports and in their public musings with small business and everyone else—the panacea to correct the regional inequalities and disparities within the region.

I have to ask myself if it is such a positive vehicle for positive change why do you only want to tell us every five years? Why would you not want to tell us every year about the wonderful workings, the tremendous contribution of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency? Why? Why would you wait five years? Perhaps the minister cannot prepare a report on an annual basis. There is an annual report. I will read the bill again for your understanding, Mr. Speaker, because I know that you are as concerned as I am with the efficiency and effectiveness of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The bill says:

> The President shall, on or before September 15, 1993 and every five years thereafter, submit to the Minister a comprehensive report, in addition to the annual report of the Agency.

An hon. member: Maybe it is not as good as they have been telling us.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, did you hear that? One of my colleagues said: Perhaps the reason why they would not want to do it, say every second year or every third year, is that they do not have anything positive to report.

That would be very different. That is very different from what we are hearing from the Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of Public Works. I do not know who to believe.

I want to say that I am leaning very heavily toward the comments of my colleague who happens to reside in the great province of Prince Edward Island.

I am leaning. I might get there. I might have a conclusion which will be obvious to each and every one of us in the House.

Just the other day the 1991 annual report of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was released and it said: "During 1990 the economy of the Atlantic provinces hosted a surprisingly good performance, despite the recession". Wasn't that wonderful? I did not hear from the minister. I did not hear from the member for Central Nova.

I want to talk about the member for Central Nova, the Minister of Public Works, because he is a leading figure in Nova Scotia politics. He is a dear and close personal friend of the premier of Nova Scotia, the hon. Don Cameron. They have done a phenomenal job in the province of Nova Scotia.

Unemployment in many regions of Nova Scotia is at an unprecedented high level. Youth unemployment is at an unprecedented high level. The Lingan mine in my own district is closing down. The port of Halifax and centres for women are closing down. Workers at Sydney Steel have no bridge programs in order to benefit them and their families who are suffering as a result of lay-offs. That has been a dismal performance by the hon. member for Central Nova. He ought to be ashamed of himself, for allowing this kind of gobbledegook about the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency while sitting in the federal cabinet.

I say that because the member for Central Nova, the Minister of Public Works, was the former Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Imagine saying "a surprisingly good year" as if there were no problems in Atlantic Canada. Bankruptcies were revealed today and 56,000 Canadians have had to file for bankruptcy in this country. I am surprised, if we are doing so well with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, that the government would have to wait for five years to give a comprehensive report telling the people of Atlantic Canada what a great job it has been doing for Atlantic Canada.

In my view the ministers and officials at ACOA have glossed over the the disturbing economic statistics in the period covered by its own annual report which shows that high interest rates and the high dollar policy of this government are dragging down the regional economy. There are significant increases in bankruptcies, higher unemployment throughout the region, startling declines in growth in forestry related industries, and an over-all decline in investment expenditures. That is the reality.

I am trying to discuss the public relations of the Government of Canada which it tries to slip into Bill C-35. We are told in Atlantic Canada, as my colleague from Charlottetown would gladly attest and support, that this agency, the panacea for rectifying regional disparities in this country, is doing a phenomenal job. In the legislation, tucked in with 90 other federal statutes, it says that the government is only going to give the people a comprehensive report every fifth year.

Perhaps there may be an election in that period of time which we on this side look forward to with great anticipation, as I am sure members opposite also look forward to it. This agency, which will now make a comprehensive report in accordance with this particular statute every five years, has had some very dismal failures. It has had some successes but to suggest and imply that this particular agency has fulfilled its stated legislative mandate is beyond comprehension and is not acceptable to those of us who live in Atlantic Canada.

This agency has been approached by numerous groups for funding only to find that the criteria has changed. Its agencies in many parts of the Atlantic region have been a dismal failure.

The hon. member opposite, who is in the Chamber today, may disagree with what I say. I can well understand that. The fact of the matter is that the four Atlantic premiers, including the Tory premier of the province of Nova Scotia who happens to be the dear friend of the minister from Central Nova, have all concluded that the effectiveness of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is certainly not what the ministers who sit on the benches opposite, representing Tory ridings in Atlantic Canada, have been telling the people in that region.

We have gross, and I underline the word gross, unemployment in Atlantic Canada. The fisheries industry is on its knees. Employees of the steel industry have had to resort to what many have termed civil disobedience to get any kind of attention whatsoever from the powers that be both at the provincial and federal level. The Atlantic premiers, one of them a Tory, have all commented on the ineffectiveness and the major shortcomings of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

When I read "every five years" and then hear the ministers say that it is the panacea, I say to myself: "That is double talk at its best. Perhaps some would even say hypocrisy at its best". I would not say that, but there are individuals in Atlantic Canada who would say that it is hypocrisy at its best.

This is a sham. What the Government of Canada is trying to do to those of us in the Atlantic region through Bill C-35 is a sham.

I have read the recent speech of the president of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency where he talked about the importance of tourism. Those of us who reside in the Atlantic region and those of us who represent constituencies in the Atlantic region know full well that tourism in P.E.I., Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland is indeed an important aspect of our economy. I would hope that when the comprehensive report is tabled before Parliament on the fifth anniversary thereafter in 1993, it would clearly spell out what the GST and the proliferation of the Tory taxes have done for tourism in Atlantic Canada. Individual operators in Atlantic Canada, whether they operate a motel, a small restaurant or some other commercial enterprise, will clearly say that the proliferation of almost 32 Canadian taxes by the government opposite, along with the GST, has taken a terrible toll on those operators in Atlantic Canada.

Tourism is down significantly among private operators and private entrepreneurs in my own region in Atlantic Canada, according to the Cape Breton Tourism Association. Jobs are fewer, the investments are down and the infrastructure is down. There is a substantial gap in the Atlantic economy.

I underline the significance of what we are debating here today. It is very important that these things be brought to the attention of Mr. Speaker and to members of the House.

I have countless constituents, and I know of many others, in Atlantic Canada who have come forward to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to seek funding and assistance, only to be turned down for a variety of reasons because they do not fall within the criteria. The criteria have changed. I am sure that the president of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has said that the criteria have changed because we have done consultations and our constituents have asked for that. I think in part that is correct, but the fact of the matter is that ACOA, as the leading federal institution in Atlantic Canada for economic development, has not been fulfilling its mandate to the people of Atlantic Canada.

Tourism is one example. You cannot operate in isolation. You cannot have ACOA providing small sums of moneys to small businesses in that region of the country on the one hand and then on the other hand the Minister of Finance, through the proliferation of taxes, draining Canadian citizens in that particular region. This makes it very unfavourable for Canadians to travel domestically to that region or indeed other regions of the country. I think of western Canada and in particular our neighbours to the south.

Now I understand. I understand why the government wants to give a comprehensive report only every fifth year. I understand, because what the minister says, what the ministers infer is very different from what is actually happening in Atlantic Canada. Is ACOA going to make a comment on transfer payments when they file in accordance with section 10 of Bill C-35? Is it going to comment in a comprehensive report in addition to the annual report of the agency, providing an evaluation of all activities in which the agency was involved and the impact those activities have had on regional disparity?

I will bet my bottom dollar that they are going to duck it. They are going to duck the issue. They do not want to stand up and talk about those programs of the Government of Canada and how the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency interfaces with those other agencies.

I will give another example. I talked about tourism. Let me talk about another one. Let me talk about unemployment insurance. This is a government that brought in Bill C-21. It told the people of Canada it was going to do all sorts of wonderful things. That has not materialized at all.

It told us in Atlantic Canada that the Government of Canada was moving out of the tripartite social contract that had been a fabric of Canada for a long time. The employee, the employer and the Government of Canada were all making contributions to the unemployment insurance fund which would be disbursed to individuals who through no fault of their own were either laid off or could not find meaningful employment.

The federal government has bowed out of that contract and has left the employees and the employers to themselves. We were promised in 1989 by the predecessor to the Minister of Finance that there would be no increases in the premiums for unemployment insurance. The fact is that the premiums went up 25 per cent. On January 1, 1992 they are going up another 5 per cent.

There are a good number of individuals out there who have commented. They now envisage that because of the job dislocation from the policies of this government and because of the high unemployment which will continue, other individuals will make applications for unemployment insurance. This will necessitate a further increase in premiums for the employer and the employee. It will further erode the confidence of small business in Atlantic Canada. It will cause further havoc to employees who are paying those premiums. The Minister of Finance could not give us a straight answer yesterday as to whether or not he would concur with an increase in the unemployment insurance premiums.

Will the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, which interfaces with all of the other agencies of the Government of Canada, give its comprehensive report? Will it speak to the issue of small business in Atlantic Canada and what its programs have done to small business in Atlantic Canada with the proliferation of the 32 taxes and the increase in the premiums for unemployment insurance? They cannot take it any longer.

If you are a motel operator in Souris, Prince Edward Island, if you own a restaurant in Glace Bay, if you have something in Restigouche, New Brunswick or in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, then that is a commercial enterprise. When you are a small business you are living from month to month or, still worse, from week to week. A further increase in premiums will cause undue significant harm to those small businesses which are operating. We all know because we have small businesses that are operating on a shoe string in every community in the country.

But, no, clause 10 of this bill says ACOA will report only every fifth year with a comprehensive report. I have to agree with those individuals in Atlantic Canada who from what the minister is saying in Atlantic Canada and from what this particular bill says call this hypocrisy. It is not fair or appropriate in the circumstances.

That is a second issue with respect to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. If it is doing so well, why not run to the finish line? Why not have the comprehensive report every second year to tell the people of Atlantic Canada what a fantastic job is being done?

Every year they are going to file an annual report. The annual report has some information in it. There is no question about that. The comprehensive report, as alluded to in this particular clause of Bill C–35, is of paramount importance to those of us who reside in Atlantic Canada.

I want to talk about another aspect of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the fact that it will be reporting every fifth year. Those of us who reside in Atlantic Canada understand that the role of the state cannot mean everything to everyone at any given time. We do understand that the state has a role to play. One of the things that we have argued vigorously and consistently is the fact that those of us in Atlantic Canada are without a significantly high quality public infrastructure to sustain the quality of life in Atlantic Canada and to urge economic opportunities in that region.

I take for example the province of New Brunswick. The province of New Brunswick has been making the request of the Government of Canada to participate in what we now know, and what we have known for a good number of years, is a renewed highway strengthening agreement. Roads, which are a basic tool of infrastructure, a basic tool of transportation, could be upgraded to meet the standards that we now understand to be important for 1991. But the Government of Canada and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency said: "Our mandate really does not cover that. You will have to do that through a special agreement between the province and the feds".

It has never come about. They have been asleep at the switch. ACOA's response is: "That is not our mandate. That is not part of our function. We cannot do that. We do not have the wherewithal. We do not have the monetary sums to expend on this type of program".

I have been asking the federal government in co–operation with the provincial government to extend what is best known as the Fleur–de–lis trail. It is a very picturesque route in Nova Scotia which my colleague from Montreal, the hon. member for LaSalle—Emard who has visited with me on several occasions, has travelled on. Even he, although a colleague, had to admit that this was a very scenic route and there was an obligation certainly by the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada to provide money. I do not mean oodles and oodles of money, as the hon. member from Toronto would lead us to believe, but a sum of money which would provide the basic necessities which other communities in the country have come to realize.

ACOA cannot fund it. It does not have any money. It has to go to cabinet. It is not tied into any federal-provincial agreement. It does not have it.

What did it do in Prince Edward Island? It took away VIA Rail. It took away the tracks. What kind of compensation did it give to the people of Prince Edward Island? Not a nickel.

It took away the tracks in Newfoundland. It provided some compensation, but not nearly enough in view of the fact that the province of Newfoundland is a picturesque province. It is almost as nice as Cape Breton. It is in second place. I know you would want to agree with that. It too needs the basic necessities of infrastructure in order that it has the proper transportation routes to move its products to market and that individuals have mobility within the communities. When I read that ACOA is only going to report every fifth year the hidden agenda becomes very obvious, that is that the success rate of ACOA has not been what the ministers have alluded to in the past. It is not likely to achieve that kind of success because there is no political will on the front benches to see it through.

• (1050)

An hon. member: There is nobody on the front benches.

Mr. Dingwall: Precisely. My colleague from Toronto says there is nobody—I did not make reference to it, Mr. Speaker— on the front benches. I agree with him. They may be here, but they are not all there as I am sure the hon. member would want to agree.

ACOA could provide assistance to those of us in the Atlantic region. It could provide assistance to small business. It could interface with other agencies. However there is no political will. You cannot make something happen if you do not have the political will to do it. The minister for ACOA fought tooth and nail for many weeks to get a fisheries aid package for fishermen in Newfoundland. Fishermen said: "Too little, too late". That is what they said. The farmers in western Canada said that too.

I know the Secretary of State who is, being the reasonable gentleman that he is, on the wrong side of the House. We will allow that for the time being and change that very soon in 1992, and relieve him of his pain and suffering. The fact of the matter is that the minister who also occupies the portfolio of Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was told very clearly by union representatives: "Too little, too late".

It goes on and on in the fisheries. Let us talk about the steel industry for a moment. There are 600 individuals in industrial Cape Breton who are presently on unemployment insurance due to run out very soon. As a result they will have to go on welfare to provide some dignity and some semblance of respect for their families and themselves.

The Government of Canada and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have not been of any assistance in this regard. However in fairness to the federal government—and I want to be fair as I always am—it is the provincial government, Tweedledee, and the federal government, Tweedledum, who have not shown the initiative to put forward a package which would be of some assistance to those steel workers displaced at Sydney Steel. It is they who have fallen down. As my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys has said time and time again, the Government of Nova Scotia is acting in concert with the federal government to deny Canadians in his constituency and throughout industrial Cape Breton the economic opportunity to provide for their families.

What is even more ridiculous is that the feds are going to pay anyway. They are going to pay anyway. Why? Because the feds contribute 50 per cent of the welfare costs. We are going to pay them the other way so why can the government not be somewhat creative, somewhat innovative and provide a work program. Many programs are needed in industrial Cape Breton, picturesque as it is.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dingwall: I did not hear what the hon. member said, but I want to tell him that if he has suggestions to make on how we can do that I invite him to the steelworkers' union hall. I invite him to lead the charge for the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre and others. I will introduce him and he can announce to all the steel workers, all the people of industrial Cape Breton what a wonderful program and idea that he has to provide an economic opportunity for those individuals who have been displaced. I will give him that opportunity. I want to thank the hon. member for that and we will duly forward him the appropriate letter in order to invite him to Cape Breton to make that kind of announcement.

He has a relative in Cape Breton. Aren't we lucky? I welcome the member back to the island of Cape Breton.

It goes on and on and on. Mr. Speaker, I see that you are giving me a few moments. I could speak for days and I know that members on this side would want me to speak for days.

Some hon. members: Keep it up, keep it up.

Mr. Dingwall: I want to say in the two minutes that I have before we proceed with Standing Order 31 that this is a terrible scam, a terrible scam. Think of the people, think of the human suffering, think of the despair, think of the denial of hope in that particular region of the country. Some members opposite may find it amusing. I do not find it amusing at all. My colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, my colleague from Charlottetown, and my colleagues from Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and other parts of Nova Scotia see the economic devastation that the policies of the government opposite have inflicted on Atlantic Canada every day that they travel in the Atlantic provinces.

I would hope that in due time we will have an opportunity to change some of those policies. Have no illusions. It will not be easy for any new government to change what this government has done in Atlantic Canada. We will provide the hope, we will provide the political will, and we will work with the business community in Atlantic Canada. We will work through the various agencies in Atlantic Canada. We will interface with the appropriate provincial, municipal and federal departments to put together a plan to provide economic opportunities in that region of the country.

I see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I hope that you will give me an opportunity when we come back at twelve o'clock to continue on with the short remaining remarks that I have. I know that you will want to see this bill debated quite vigorously on second reading, when it goes to committee and when it comes back to the House on report stage and third reading.

I wish to reserve my time for twelve o'clock if that is the guidance that I get from the Chair at this time. Is my time completed?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may remind the Leader of the Opposition that the first two members to speak are allowed a maximum of 40 minutes, and his time has therefore expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I know we just have a minute or two before we start statements so I would like to give notice, through you to the government, regarding the request we had from the minister concerning debating Bill C-35, this omnibus bill, that we cannot give unanimous agreement to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill today. It is 120 pages of proposed amendments. I will be pointing out a number of questions that I think should be raised and I do not think Parliament should move so quickly on a bill that is so detailed without a closer examination in committee. We will be making those points in debate after Question Period today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

INTERNATIONAL FILM FESTIVAL IN ABITIBI-TÉMISCAMINGUE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, tomorrow in Rouyn-Noranda is the opening night of the Tenth International Film Festival in Abitibi-Témiscamingue. On its tenth birthday, the festival will screen more than 82 films from 20 countries and showcase an impressive array of actors and actresses.

Quite frankly, Madam Speaker, ten years ago few people thought that what initially was quite an adventurous proposition would, over the years, become an event of such impressive scope and quality.

Congratulations to an outstanding team headed by Mr. Jacques Matte and to the people of Abitibi–Témiscamingue, who have constantly supported and promoted the festival. Film buffs—make it a date in Rouyn–Noranda from October 26 to October 31!

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced almost $40 million in aid to fisheries in Atlantic Canada. However, the minister forgot something important in the package.

He forgot Prince Edward Island. All of Atlantic Canada except P.E.I. received aid because of the disaster in the fishery. Fishermen on Prince Edward Island also need help. Many groundfishermen I know are in severe trouble and may lose their boats.

Prince Edward Islanders are part of Canada and deserve a fair share of the government's assistance. This is just another example of how this government is ignoring Prince Edward Island.

According to figures provided by the government, P.E.I. has received less than $150,000 from the $584 million aid package announced last year.

I suggest that the minister look at the map and realize that P.E.I. is part of this nation and its fishery needs aid.

TAXATION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, taxes in Canada are too high in order to encourage consumer spending and business investment. They ought to come down.

This is one of the reasons I wanted to come to this place, to try to influence policies that would lead to lower taxes but there is more than trying to foster a tax revolt inside and outside of Parliament.

The greater goal is to eliminate the reason why we have high taxes, and that is Canada's debt. If it did not exist, taxes could be lowered by $40 billion a year without affecting spending on government programs.

A newspaper report today paints me as a frustrated backbench MP demanding lower taxes, and this is not true. I demand a lower deficit, a reduced debt and then in the long term, lower taxes. To adopt any other position would be irresponsible.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, many members will know that the Income Tax Act contains a number of flagrant and abusive discriminations that I want to draw to the attention of the House.

If a mother or father stays home to raise a child as opposed to one who goes out to work, there are income tax deductions for that person who goes out to work.

With respect to married and unmarried couples, the unmarried couples get more deductions than the married couples. I am not seeking to lower the deductions for those who enjoy them. Clearly, that would be unfair as well.

What I am seeking, however, is fairness and some equity with respect to these two cases and any other cases where there are abuses.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, as previously announced by the Minister of Forestry, today marks the closing deadline for letters of intent to be filed by prospective applicants for participation in Canada's model forest program.

This competition to select and establish a network of between six and nine model forests across the country will conclude with final proposals due on December 20 and final selection decisions by the government on or before June 1, 1992.

I am very pleased to confirm that intent has formally been declared for the Nashwaak Valley area of New Brunswick to become one of Canada's model forests, and certainly the watershed of the Nashwaak River does reflect the broad diversity of values to be found in the typical forests of eastern Canada.

It is an area not only rich in most species of hardwood and softwood trees, but is also abundant in wildlife, fish and water resources.

As well, this valley is totally accessible and fully utilized by citizens of New Brunswick for recreational purposes. Not the least of its qualifications for model forestry status is a wide variety of forest land ownership which exists there ranging from large industrial to small private woodlots, all within the application of the New Brunswick Crown Lands and Forest Act which arguably remains the foremost forest management legislation in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

HANFORD NUCLEAR RESERVATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, just 300 kilometres south of the B.C–Washington border lies the soiled heart of the Hanford Nuclear Reservation, a legacy of the cold war which has become one of the most contaminated spots on the face of the earth. The release in 1986 of classified military documents has revealed decades of intentional and accidental release of airborne radioactive contamination which travelled throughout the Pacific northwest, including Canada.

Growing evidence of thyroid disease and elevated levels of thyroid and other cancers among populations exposed to the releases of radioactive I-131 has prompted two U.S. studies. Here in Canada, B.C. medical authorities and the Canadian Medical Association have urged the Mulroney government to join these studies to determine the level of risk to Canadians. The government's response has been appalling. Without any epidemiological data to support it, the government simply contends that there is no cause for concern.

It is easy to conclude there is no problem when you do not even bother to look. Residents of southern B.C. and Alberta deserve to know whether or not they have been put at risk.

CANADA SCHOLARS

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): The minister for science announced the names of 3,200 New Canada Scholars for 1991–92. Twelve of these scholars are from the federal riding of Cambridge.

These 3,200 New Canada Scholars are joining the ranks of more than 4,000 established Canada Scholars who are already pursuing studies in mathematics, engineering and natural sciences.

Canada scholarships are worth $2,000 annually and can be renewed up to three times for a total value of $8,000 to each student. A Canada scholarship holds more than its monetary rewards, it brings prestige, recognition and career opportunities to the recipients.

The Canadian government has pledged $80 million to this program. Today's Canada Scholars are tomorrow's scientists and engineers.

I would like to take this opportunity to extend congratulations both to the new and continuing Canada Scholars. I wish them every success in meeting the challenge of being a Canada Scholar.

NEWFOUNDLAND ECONOMY

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to register in this House the serious economic conditions of many of my constituents in the riding of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Despite the provincial and federal aid packages, which unquestionably have been helpful, there are still many whose earnings are less than $100 a week, well submerged below the poverty level, those whose dignity has been shattered and whose hopes for the future have all but been dashed.

I call on this government to reassess its Atlantic catch failure package with the goal of providing better subsistence for those Newfoundlanders whose fortunes have flagged in these extraordinarily tough economic times.

EMPLOYMENT CENTRE IN JONQUIÈRE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, today I have a special message for the people of Jonquière.

Tuesday, a number of people went to the Employment Centre to apply for jobs at the Jonquière Tax Centre. At eight o'clock in the morning there was a long line of people in front of the Employment Centre, and some people did not have a chance to submit their application.

They were critical of the process, so I asked the authorities at the Employment Centre and the Jonquière Tax Centre to reassess their procedures when offering employment.

Transparence and equity are important, and we will do what is necessary to take appropriate corrective action, in the best interests of all concerned.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the House a disturbing issue concerning the delivery of sewer and water services to Canada's Indian reserves.

Many of us know that most reserves have high unemployment rates, as high as 85 and 90 per cent and many are dependent, unfortunately, on welfare.

Their native children commit suicide at seven times the national rate and many young native men and women stand a better chance of going to jail than university.

Members may not know that many native communities do not in this day and age enjoy the kinds of things others take for granted, running water, hot showers, flush toilets, washing machines. Without these necessities the economic health and environmental problems on reserves will continue.

Despite recent agreements that are resulting in water and sewage systems being installed in native communities, native people are still being asked to pay for the hookup of these systems.

This may seem very reasonable in most situations, but in communities with 85 and 90 per cent unemployment, this is a fiscal impossibility. I call upon the government to provide—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, John Ross Taylor, the leader of the Western Guard Party was ordered by the Human Rights Commission to disconnect the telephone answering machine which was used to spread hatred against various ethnic and racial minorities. This case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and Mr. Taylor's one-year conviction was upheld. It is difficult to understand why the Human Rights Commission waited for over seven months to proceed with the process to have Mr. Taylor incarcerated.

The Human Rights Commission often times complains that it does not have the teeth to fight the promotion of hatred. Here it had the teeth and waited too long to use them.

WHITE RIBBON AGAINST PORNOGRAPHY WEEK

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise today to ask members of the House to join in recognition next week of White Ribbon Against Pornography Week.

The national group Citizens for Decency has set aside the week of October 27 to November 3 in order to raise public awareness of the damage caused by pornography.

We as legislators have always known we have special responsibilities, particularly to make war against those who would take advantage of children, the creation of and sale of pornography. The children particularly must never be used to enhance profit margins for unscrupulous wholesalers of pornographic material.

I have forwarded to each member and senator a white lapel ribbon so that they may show their support during this campaign next week. It is impossible to quantify the harm done to young minds from pornography, but our collective wisdom must steer us toward protecting particularly our youth from its effects.

I urge all members to show their support by wearing their ribbon next week.

CHATHAM, ONTARIO

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to commend the city of Chatham, Ontario as it tackles its economic future head on.

The Task Force on the Local Economy was set up under the able leadership of Mr. William Case. This is a city that is not going to take the recession lying down.

Chatham's auto industry and agriculture have been hit hard by the made-in-Canada recession. Many factories were closed with jobs lost forever.

They will work with the area business and labour groups and the city's Economic Development Commission to look ahead, to help our city compete now and in the future.

In the upcoming weeks, the committee will be seeking opinions of local people as an action plan is produced. They will be taking up the slack from the federal government that has abandoned its duties.

I wholeheartedly support their efforts as the city of Chatham plans for the future with confidence. Let us roll up our sleeves and get to work for the betterment of all.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, Canada's shipbuilding industry has been devastated by recent economic conditions and is in its worse slump since World War II.

We must now create an investment climate which permits us to capture a greater share of Canadian and world markets for specialized vessels. We must work to meet a greater share of our domestic requirements for vessels used in defence, coastal trade, search and rescue patrol and the offshore fishery.

Was this a quote from a union or from a shipbuilding company or from the NDP? No, it was a quote from the Conservative Party of Canada which said: "A top priority of a Progressive Conservative government will be to create a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry". That was its campaign promise in 1984, and what has happened since? Shipyard after shipyard from coast to coast to coast has been closed by this government. It has not done anything to help the industry survive.

Other marine countries around the world assist, either through financing or through subsidies, to allow the private sector to be able to afford to buy ships built in their own country.

I call upon this government to recognize the reality of the world that it too has to assist.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, as we enter the fourth quarter of 1991, the Canadian economy is showing signs of rallying from the effects of the recession. Part of the reason for this recovery can be attributed to the free trade agreement with the United States.

Despite the high Canadian dollar, firms are taking advantage of reduction in tariffs under the free trade agreement to tap the lucrative American market.

In my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, many companies are finding the U.S. as a place to expand markets and increase revenues.

A few years ago, the Sarnia division of Esso Chemical was selling 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the polyethylene made there to the U.S. This year, reports indicate sales have increased to 40 per cent.

In 1989, Shell Canada was not exporting any polypropylene to the U.S. in 1991; 10 to 15 per cent of that production is now going to the U.S. market.

The surge in the American market is also responsible in part for a recent $12 million expansion at Esso Chemical.

As evidenced in these examples, this opening up of the American market to Canadian companies is aiding our competitive position—

SUDDEN INFANT DEATH SYNDROME

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, the month of October has been declared Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Month. SIDS is the leading single cause of death in Canada for babies between one week and one year of age.

Sudden Infant Death Syndrome has taken the lives of an estimated 12,000 infants in Canada since 1973. Twelve thousand children are dead and have left behind grieving parents and frustrated doctors and nurses with no answer as to why these apparently healthy babies have died without warning.

The Canadian Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths will be holding its annual National Babies Breath Conference in Atlantic Canada for the first time in 10 years. This conference will be held in Charlottetown and will provide volunteer SIDS parents and professionals alike with practice and assistance for their work with grieving families. Together we can work to find the answer and stop future deaths.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. This morning, I spoke to Constantin Haddad, the son of a Canadian woman who was taken hostage in Lebanon in 1985. Her son first contacted the Canadian government in November 1985, and since that time he has received no written reply from the government about this Canadian hostage who is still in Lebanon. Why does the government refuse to do anything to help a Canadian hostage in Lebanon?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I say to the hon. member that if she had given the government notice of this question we would have been able to get the information, get the details and give her a full answer.

With the information that she has provided, I will seek out the information for her and get back to her as soon as I can. Without that notice, I do not think it is fair for her to expect that ministers would have all that information in the tops of their heads.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I would expect that the senior ministers of the government would be apprised of a Canadian woman whose family believes she is being held hostage in Lebanon when the Canadian government was originally contacted in writing about this issue on November 8, 1985.

The Department of External Affairs is very aware of this issue. I want to ask the government again: Why is it when Henriette Haddad, a Canadian woman, was taken hostage on September 26, 1985, that the Canadian government has not even answered her son's letters asking for its help in this case?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I am not the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs were here, and if my friend is correct in what she says, then the Secretary of State for External Affairs would know about this information and would be able to provide a response.

I am unable to do so without the notice which normally is given on something as detailed as that.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the notice has been given by the Haddad family. This woman's 87-year-old husband is sitting in a Montreal nursing home waiting for news of his wife. Her son has been in direct contact with the Department of External Affairs pleading for their help. Indirectly they have told him that they have not acted in this case because this woman holds dual citizenship.

Given the minister's apparent ignorance about the file today, will the government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister may want to answer. I think the hon. member has been told on two different occasions now that the minister does not have the answer to the question. I do not think that talking about the ignorance is helping in any way.

The hon. minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I accept the concern that the hon. member has expressed on behalf of the family. I am sympathetic with the concern that the family is expressing.

To take cheap political advantage by the way the hon. member is posing questions is not appropriate in a situation like this if the hon. member truly believes in the case that she is presenting.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology said that he had no new economic initiatives to propose because, and I quote: "There is not a clear consensus or clear understanding as to what should be done." This is nonsense. Canadians know what the economic problems are and even the government's own adviser, Professor Porter, was highly critical of this government's economic management.

Why does the government have to go on dithering? Why can it not act? There is a clear consensus and understanding about its failures in science and technology, research and development, training and a lot of other areas.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, rather than trying to make political points on the issues at hand, I would think that the hon. member, if he would read what Professor Porter said, would agree with some of the conclusions that he has come to and would be trying to help us, as a government, as a country, come to a consensus on the directions we should go.

What Professor Porter is saying is that the old ways of the past, an economy based solely on resources, is not the way to go, that we have to move in an economy that is based more on research and development, more on training and technology. He says that companies have to be continually upgrading, continually making themselves as individual companies more competitive and to suggest, as some members opposite have, that it is only because of the Canadian dollar, it is only because of the free trade agreement that we are in the position that we are today, according to Professor Porter is missing the boat.

What we are looking for here is some economy-wide changes, and this is what we are proposing in the initiative that we will be announcing next Tuesday. I would encourage the hon. member to look upon this initiative as a positive initiative, seeking out a consensus to build a national action plan to address these problems.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, for three years we have been telling this government—and Canadians have as well—that science and technology, research and development training are major problems and this government has been cutting back in these areas. It could reverse them today.

Professor Porter said yesterday that de Havilland is a success story and a key part of Canada's economic future. Will the minister change his mind and will he end the uncertainty about de Havilland's future? Will he commit to ensuring its ongoing future today? Will he also respond to the question I asked him last Tuesday in the House: What steps has he taken to ensure that the $1 billion that Canadians have invested in the STOL wing technology will not be stolen from Canadians.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): First of all, Madam Speaker, I cannot let some of the elements of the preamble to the hon. member's question go unanswered.

We are not cutting back on science and technology. We have been increasing science and technology. We have in place the most generous research and development tax regime of any of the major industrialized countries. We are not cutting back on training. We are increasing the amount of training. We started basically from scratch in 1984. We have $2.25 billion now devoted to training and upgrading of skills of Canadians. The hon. member does himself a disservice to repeat these untrue allegations.

The second point the hon. member asked about was uncertainty regarding de Havilland. As I have indicated, we are working closely with de Havilland, with Boeing, with A and A people in order to try to come to an agreement on this. Obviously it involves the province of Ontario. We are not the only player on it, so we alone are not able to eliminate that uncertainty. But we are working toward doing that and the hon. member I think is well aware of the efforts we are making to do that.

With regard to the STOL technology—

Some hon. members: Oh, come on now.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, we get three questions from the hon. member and hon. members opposite do not want to have the answers. I am trying to provide answers to the hon. member.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today marks the end of Small Business Week in Canada and for the 947 small businesses that went into bankruptcy last month, it means the end of their business.

The $1 million man, Michael Porter, from the United States who did a study recently on Canada's competitiveness clearly pointed out that it is this government's economic policies that show a lack of vision for the future of Canada.

Bankruptcies, a drastic decline in consumer spending, the GST, all have dealt a body blow to small business in this country. When is the Minister of Finance prepared to bring in a plan to deal with the very serious situation of 3 million people who cannot find a job and for these small businesses that are directly going into decline.

The backbone of our country, small businesses, deserve better from this government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it is encouraging to note that there has been an easing in business bankruptcies.

That is a reflection of the lower interest rates and the turnaround in the economy that is occurring. I am pleased to note that yesterday, the prime bank rate went down 8.75 per cent and that is certainly one of the lowest in many, many years. I think all members would applaud that.

That is clearly a very important element as the hon. member would agree in any small business enterprise, and interest rates are very, very key.

The other indicators such as the increase in housing starts, the increase in our merchandise trade balance, the drop in unemployment figures that have occurred in the month of September are an indication that there is a turnaround. We have to get the fundamentals right, and I think the hon. member agrees with that.

We have had to bring inflation down and the inflationary expectations down. That is occurring. We said when that would happen, there would be some reduction in interest rates. That is occurring, and we have the stage set for a durable, sustainable recovery with price stability.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I remind the minister that bankruptcies are 38 per cent higher than they were last September when we were officially in a recession.

I think it is pretty hard to tell that to the small businesses that are suffering.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, if the minister doesn't want to listen to what this side of the House is telling him, I suggest he listen to his own members. The message is simple: The government's tax policy is breaking the middle class. He can also listen to provincial Premiers like Robert Bourassa, who says people are paying too much tax, with disastrous results.

Will the government relieve the tax burden on the middle class by closing tax loopholes for the wealthy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government's record in maintaining strong growth for individual families has been excellent since we have been in office.

Real average family income grew at a rate of 2 per cent per year in the period 1984–89. That is a rate of growth that is comparable to the 1960s and 1970s. To suggest that there has been a depression in personal income is not in accordance with the facts.

The facts clearly do not bear that out. Of course we are concerned about the tax burden, but the hon. member will agree that we do have a serious debt problem. We have a serious deficit problem.

It is interesting to note that her colleagues who will assume the premiership of the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan have indicated the importance of bringing forth a balanced budget.

That is exactly what we are attempting to do and I would hope that we would have the co-operation of the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, on a supplementary, the minister knows that what we need in this country is fair taxation. The middle class and individuals have paid an increasingly high amount of the tax burden. The minister is aware of that.

When the minister suggests that things are getting better, I suggest he talk to those 3 million people who cannot find a job in this country, the one in six children who live in poverty, the 100,000 homeless and the 500,000 who use food banks.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Ms. McLaughlin: My question for the minister is now that he has worked jointly with large corporate Canada, will he give a voice to those millions of Canadians who are the victims of this government's idea of competitiveness?

• (1130)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, this is rather interesting. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party cannot have it both ways.

When there was a labour disruption on the west coast, her party voted against the resumption of work so that farmers could sell and ship their grain to support the small business enterprise in western Canada and, indeed, throughout all of Canada.

There was a disruption in Thunder Bay. They constantly harp about the fact that there is a decline in the amount of shipments going through Thunder Bay, yet they voted against going back to work and restoring normal grain handling operations.

She cannot have it both ways. She cannot pick and choose. She is either with small business and for small business, or against it. Half the time she is for it and half the time she is against it.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

New bankruptcy figures for September are in and they continue to climb. Forty-six thousand average, individual Canadians have had to declare bankruptcy. Over 10,000 Canadian businesses, many of them small businesses, have gone under, leaving over $4 billion in debt.

My question to the Minister of Finance is this. If this government's economic policies are so great, why have bankruptcies increased in the last 12 months alone by over 65 per cent in this country? Why?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have been in a recession for the better part of a year. There has been a turnaround in the second quarter and we expect that to continue, albeit at a modest rate of growth.

What is encouraging is that there is an easing in the level of business bankruptcies and that is an indication of the fact that there is strength re-emerging in the economy.

I ask the hon. member to consider the fact that the merchandise trade balance is up, housing starts are up to 181,000 on an annualized basis and unemployment rates are coming down. The indicators to which the hon. member refers, such as the bankruptcies, have a certain amount of lag time. I would ask him to take that into consideration.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

Only a Tory minister could call a 65 per cent increase in consumer and business bankruptcies in Canada good news for those who have gone bankrupt.

According to Statistics Canada, prices charged to Canadian consumers have actually gone down over the last year and it is the government's own tax policies that are actually fueling inflation and driving prices up.

Why is it that the average, middle-class Canadians, who constitute 25 per cent of all taxpayers, end up paying over 50 per cent of all taxes? Why is it that the government continues to pursue economic policies that drive average Canadians and small businesses over the brink of bankruptcy? Why does it refuse to bring in a fair tax policy and why do they not do it now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member should make up his mind. Yesterday he stood up in the House advocating the expenditure of more money, more transfers to provinces. Where will he get the money from if he does not get it from the taxation of Canadians?

You cannot have it both ways. This hon. member talks a great line about sending more money to the provinces in terms of EPF and transfer payments, yet he wants to talk about lower taxes. You cannot have it both ways. If you want to spend more money, you have to tax someone or you are going to have to drive up the deficit. What does the hon. member want, higher taxes or a higher deficit?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for my friend, the Minister of Finance, who yesterday in answering questions from the member for Hamilton East, did what was known as the Alberta two-step and refused to answer as to whether or not there would be a 14 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums coming this January 1.

I would ask the Minister of Finance if he would clearly state for the purposes of small business and employees across this country that he will stick by the word of his predecessor and have no further increases in the premiums for unemployment insurance.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, my answer today is the same answer I gave in the House yesterday.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on page 30 of the 1989 budget papers, his predecessor states, and I quote: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of unemployment insurance in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums".

I ask the Minister of Finance again, will he give an assurance that he will stick to the decision and the comments made by his predecessor, as the Minister of Finance, and there will be no increases in the unemployment insurance premiums as indicated in that statement? Yes or no.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I repeat, the answer that I give in the House today is exactly the same answer that I gave in the House yesterday. If the hon. member wants to quote the former Minister of Finance he can quote the budget of February 1991 when he said, and I quote: "Rates will be adjusted in such a manner to ensure the financial integrity of the account".

That is what the Minister of Finance said in the budget of 1991 and that certainly applies, Madam Speaker.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, the Porter study said something that most of us have been saying for quite a long time, and that is that regional economic development should be based on local strengths.

My question is for whomever is speaking on behalf of the minister responsible for ACOA, which has had a number of large projects under RCMP investigation over the past year. Now it stands to lose another $4 million in another patronage-ridden deal. This is the result of High Tech Woodworkers which went bankrupt after three months of operation and now has been sold for $1.2 million.

My question is as follows: Is it not about time that this government started building on local economic strengths to produce permanent jobs rather than local patronage to produce bankruptcies?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member sounds very clever in making that statement. Surely, if he was correct in his facts his conclusion would certainly be correct as well.

There have been a number of risks taken in trying to develop Atlantic Canada, which is the purpose for which ACOA was created. Its success rate is pretty high nevertheless. The rate of failures is about 5 per cent out of 100. There were a number of failures in the Cape Breton area, all of which was acknowledged. There was a report done in connection with the situation by Mr. Anthony Brait. The agency has been re-evaluated since then and a report done by the Moncton economist, whose name escapes me for the moment. You all know the name that I am seeking. We are following the recommendations of those reports and in Cape Breton in particular we want to concentrate more on smaller enterprises and on ideas and suggestions that come from within the region, rather than from without.

So, mistakes have been made and—Oh, give me a chance, I haven't been here for three or four days.

Mr. McCurdy: It certainly shows.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister may be able to jog his memory while we listen to the supplementary.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

The Porter report also criticizes the government for its research and development policy. Now we hear that the government is about to kill Canada's participation in the international fusion project.

My question is this: Given the great potential of this project to produce long-term environmentally sustainable energy, and given that Canada could be a likely site to receive $1.5 billion in benefits by virtue of the establishment here of the thermonuclear plant, does cutting this $13 million really make sense, I ask you, when we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars on TRIUMF-KEAON and hundreds of millions of dollars on a space project that will not produce nearly the benefits that this could potentially produce for Canada and the world?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member asked the question, and especially for his interest in fusion and the nuclear industry and his strong support for that industry.

I am pleased that the party has had a change of view since the questions were received yesterday. I simply say to the hon. member that the Minister of State for Research and Development and Treasury Board are looking at this project and Canadian involvement in it. I thank him for his support and I am glad also that he is going to make these representations to his party and his leader.

CANADA POST

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, the president of Canada Post was appointed by Privy Council Order 435, of which I have a copy, in 1986, for five years up to this year, at a salary "within the range $165,000 to $205,000". That expired on February 17 of this year and in March of this year, a month later, the Privy Council listed his new salary range from $248,000 to $310,000, not counting his bonus.

Does the minister not find this a little difficult to digest, awarding a 50 per cent salary increase to the president of Canada Post so quickly, so quietly, and telling the rest of Canadians to accept zero per cent and tighten their belts?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, when Don Lander took over as president of Canada Post the taxpayers of Canada were contributing by way of subsidy hundreds of millions of dollars, $500 million a year.

In the last two years under Don Lander's presidency, Canada Post has returned to the taxpayers, to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, almost $200 million by way of dividends.

I understand that the hon. member does not think that a man with that kind of accomplishment should get paid as much as some third string second baseman, but frankly the taxpayers of Canada have got terrific value for the money we have paid Don Lander in salary. We as trustees of the taxpayers of Canada should be applauding him and wishing that the other leaders in our economy were as productive as him.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, this government has closed post offices, replaced postmasters and postmistresses with outdoor boxes that freeze up in the winter time and in the interest of profit has destroyed our postal service in many ways.

Will this government return our postal service to its original purpose, to deliver the mail quickly and fairly to all Canadians, and will the minister now roll back Mr. Lander's salary to at least a measly quarter of a million dollars a year and tell him that he is not going to get his Christmas bonus this year for being a good boy last year?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is saying we should go back to the past when taxpayers dipped into their pockets to subsidize the post office $500 million to $600 million. We are still paying interest on those subsidies we had to borrow the money for in the past. I certainly would not recommend we return to the bad old past in that context.

The international postal union says that Canada Post is the most efficient postal system in the world. Surveys by independent market survey companies of the changes the post office has implemented in terms of new outlets in corner grocery stores and so on show a 90 per cent approval rating.

No, we are not going to go back to the past. Come on, George, join the present and the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the Tory government gave the president of Canada Post a salary increase of $131,250. Meanwhile, Huguette Perrier, a 65 year old widow, who has delivered mail in Dalkeith, Ontario in my riding for nine years, was fired to save Canada Post $1,500 a year. Is that justice?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of all sides of the House, in 1981 the member for Papineau introduced a bill creating a Crown corporation and we all agreed in this House that the corporation should run like a business and should operate at arm's length from the government. It was unanimously agreed. In terms of remuneration of senior officials in Crown corporations and agencies, we have an outside group that advises us on what is appropriate given the marketplace and the salary levels. That group, as a matter of fact, was set up by the Liberal government.

Is the hon. member suggesting we go back to the bad old days where all of these decisions as to who is delivering mail here are done on a partisan basis and are done by the politicians, or should be accept the judgment of this House in 1981 to let the post office operate at arms length, and should we not be applauding the fact that it is now the most efficient post office in the world.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, if I were this government I would not talk about nominating people on a partisan basis.

This has to do with fairness again. How can a government give the head shogun of Canada post a $131,250 salary increase and fire someone who delivers the mail in my riding, a widow, to save $1,500? Is that not at least wrong in the eyes of the minister or is there no sense of fairness at all left with this government?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As I tried to explain to the hon. member this government, in following the instructions of this House, does not get involved in the individual decisions of the post office as to how to deploy its staff, which businesses to open, and so on. That was the instruction from the House. We are following those instructions.

The hon. member is suggesting, presumably, that these decisions as to who is hired or fired are made by politicians. People would call that a patronage-based system. I do not think that is appropriate.

The question of the service to people and the management of the post office has been examined and assessed by independent pollsters. We have the track record. I think it is absurd for anybody to look at that record and suggest we go back to the bad old days when taxpayers had to dip into their jeans to subsidize an inefficient operation. We should be applauding—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are getting into debate.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, yesterday the federal Yugoslav army continued to wantonly shell the Croatian city of Dubrovnik. In response to a question in this House, the Minister for International Trade indicated the government would raise this issue yesterday or today at the UNESCO conference in Paris.

My question to the minister is this: Can he please update us on any action that the government took yesterday or today, and are we any closer to securing international sanctions or peacekeeping or condemnation of the Yugoslav army?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, we did raise the matter at UNESCO. UNESCO did pass a resolution, I understand unanimously, calling for all parties to observe the Convention on the World's Heritage and also demanded that the military forces withdraw from Dubrovnik immediately.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, farmers in Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan recently held large rallies to demonstrate their opposition to the government's agricultural programs and policies. Those farmers, including 7,500 in Regina last night, have said very loudly and clearly that there are deficiencies with the GRIP and NISA programs and that funds available under the so-called third line of defence must be increased.

In light of this protest, is the government prepared to acknowledge the farmers' growing plight? Will the government take steps to correct the obvious deficiencies in GRIP and NISA? Will the government increase the funds available under the third line of defence?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, GRIP is a tripartite arrangement that involves the provinces, the federal government and the producers. I want to remind the hon. member that payments are being made under both the NISA program and GRIP.

As a matter of fact and to put it on the record, Madam Speaker, some $548 million was to be paid by September 15 in the form of the emergency assistance which was announced this spring. There is roughly $1.5 billion to be paid between now and the end of the year under the interim payments under the GRIP program, plus the $800 million that will be paid out as soon as possible over this year and next year. That totals something in the order of $3.4 billion. If you subtract the producers' premiums of $536 million, there will be something in the order of $2.8 billion flowing to the agricultural community between now and the end of June. While they do not have that money in hand at the present time, these funds are being processed and/or being mailed.

I am sure that will be very helpful in farmers meeting their debt obligations and planning for the future.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): A supplementary, Madam Speaker. Seven thousand, five hundred farmers in Regina last night were very much aware of the money that the government has provided and they have said it is not enough.

I hope the government is listening to those 7,500 plus hundreds of thousands of others out there.

The calls for a deficiency payment have been voiced since spring. The money has been needed for months, yet it appears that the government's intention for the third line of defence payout will not come until some time in 1992.

Given that the money is needed immediately, is the government prepared to advance those funds now to meet the needs expressed so strongly last night in Regina?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in the spring we announced an emergency program of something in the order of $600 million. This $800 million deficiency payment is in addition to that and in addition to the payments that will be made out under the NISA and GRIP programs.

I remind the hon. member that between now and spring seeding, there will be something in the order of $2.8 billion or $2.9 billion net flowing to the farmers of Canada.

The hon. member suggests that is not enough. I think that $2.8 billion is a heck of a lot of money. In addition, we note that yesterday's Statistic Canada forecast indicates that farm income will be up by 10 per cent. We are expecting that there will be a further advance of credit to the Soviet Union which will probably result in an additional $400 million to $500 million worth of grain sales, a good portion of that which will be shipped in this calendar year. So there will be cash flow and there will be deliveries made.

The money is either in the process of being mailed or in the process of being calculated. I ask the hon. member to tell his producers that money is on the way. As far as the $700 million or $800 million that was announced, we will provide it as soon as we possibly can.

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Some time ago, the government announced that in January 1992, businesses would no longer be able to deduct the provincial payroll tax from their federal income tax. This is crazy! And all because the government has a difference of opinion with a number of provincial governments. Madam Speaker, this is an incredible act of discrimination against Quebec businesses that create jobs. Why the cut throat approach?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is simply to stop the erosion of the federal tax base and the hon. member I am sure would appreciate that.

There are ongoing discussions with the province of Quebec. The hon. member should realize that if this were allowed to continue right across the board, the federal tax base would be totally eroded. We want to try to work this thing out as amicably as we possibly can. Discussions are currently under way to ensure that this can be resolved in a satisfactory manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the minister responsible for Montreal. This tax clearly discriminates against Quebec, which will pay half the $7 million it will raise. This tax will bankrupt businesses and throw people out of work.

The minister says he defends Montreal, so why did he accept a tax that will further increase unemployment in a city where the unemployment rate is already over 13 per cent? How many more Angus plants will have to close before he understands?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member who is a very successful businessman should understand that when the federal government decides to help a city like Montreal by providing subsidies—Petromont was given a subsidy of $55 million—obviously, as the Minister of Finance just said, it must be able to raise the money first. That is what we intend to do, and with the revenue we collect, we will be in an even better position to help Montreal.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. As has already been stated and as the minister knows, over 7,000 farmers gathered in Regina yesterday. They expressed on their own behalf and on behalf of thousands of others the concerns of Canadian farmers.

The recently announced assistance will partially address the drastic shortfall in their incomes. My question is when are the farmers going to receive the recently announced $800 million in assistance? They are told it is next spring. I want to remind the House and the minister that their bins may be full, but their bank accounts are empty and their bills are due. The farmers know when all of the other moneys are coming forward as he has stated just a few minutes ago. When can they expect the money that has been announced lately?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated, between $2.8 billion and $2.9 billion will be flowing through to the agricultural community between now and spring seeding. Moneys are flowing right now. I was just advised that cheques are in the mail to the farmers of Manitoba, which is the interim payments under the GRIP program. There are payments going out under the NISA program and as soon as we can get a decision from the third line of defence committee as to what is the most appropriate way of distributing the $800 million, we will be in a position to start putting that in place. All I can say to the hon. member is that we will try to get the money flowing as quickly as we possibly can, provided we can find it, and as the hon. member knows, that is still a very difficult task. However, we understand the urgency and the plight out there and I know it is shared by the hon. member. We are going to do it as quickly as we can.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Deputy Prime Minister as well. As he knows, there are many ways we can assist the agrifood industry.

One year ago, the pesticide review committee submitted its report. No action has been taken to implement the recommendations of that report. Every time we ask, we are told "soon", "be patient", "it is coming", "it will be here shortly". Another year has gone by and the positive effects that can have for the industry should and could have taken place last year.

I ask the minister: when will the recommendations of that report be put into place?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the pesticide review committee was a very delicate initiative that had to balance both the concerns of the environmentalists and the environmental situation as well as agriculture and other elements. I think the committee did an excellent job in doing the study and coming forth with some very specific recommendations. It certainly is the intention of the government to implement those recommendations. I am not sure of the reason for the delay, but I will undertake to make those representations to the Minister of Agriculture on his return and get back to the hon. member as soon as possible.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister for International Trade. The U.S. government has started its investigation into whether Canadian provinces unfairly subsidize the softwood lumber industry.

Since the U.S. has announced its retaliatory measures, a number of Canadian softwood lumber exporters are suffering, specifically from Saskatoon.

My question to the minister is this: In a recent letter he wrote to me, he states that the federal government will make every effort to ensure that Canadian lumber interests are protected. I would like the minister to tell the House what the specifics of the efforts are from the government in this regard.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, what I was referring to in that letter was in regard to the conduct of our defence on the countervail action.

• (1200)

We will be working closely with the provinces, with the industry and with people in the United States who are also in support of our position on the softwood issue, to ensure that the strongest possible defence is put forward to counter the allegations by the United States.

I have also indicated to hon. members that if there are individual instances where they feel there are problems at the border in relation to the export of softwood lumber, I would appreciate it if they would bring those specifics to my attention so we can deal with them in a very precise way.

RETAIL INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Retailers have suffered a $15 billion drop in retail sales in August. This is clearly reflected in the latest bankruptcy figures which show an increase nationally of 38 per cent for the month of September and a devastating increase of 62 per cent in Atlantic Canada.

What is this government going to do to inject some confidence into the retail sector?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the September figures clearly show a little different trend.

The August figures to which the hon. member has referred showed a rather substantive decline in automobile sales. That really affected the old retail sales figures.

If she will look at the September figures, she will note that automobile sales have increased by some 11 per cent. While sales have not recovered completely, it does not paint as dismal a picture in September as it did in August. In some respects the August figures have been overtaken by those in September where there has been an increase in automobile retail sales in the order of 11 per cent.

I should say as well that another good indicator is that housing resales are continuing to climb. Housing starts have shown a 19 per cent increase in the third quarter over the second quarter, which I believe is a reflection of the reduction in interest rates. Housing starts are in the order of 181,000 on an annualized basis.

Those are the indicators that I think are very important. I should say that the reduction in interest rates reduces the monthly payment for a person holding a $100,000 mortgage by about $300. That is going to be extra cash in the hands of consumers which they will be able to spend and I think that will revitalize the retail sector.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we can see, short questions do not always bring short answers.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to put on the record something that I have had an opportunity to clarify with you.

I raised a question in the House with respect to a Canadian hostage. When I said that the minister was ignorant of the file in English as well as in French, ignorance does not necessarily connote a negative feeling. Rather, what I was about to say was: given that he was ignorant of the contents of the file, would he be prepared to make a statement in the House at a future date?

I realize the nuances in the word ignorant can sometimes be negative. It was not my intention to be negative. I basically said, because he did not know about the file, could he make a statement when he apprises himself? That was my intent.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I just want to tell the hon. member that the Minister of Industry, Science, Technology and Minister for International Trade will be immediately looking into the matter that the hon. member raised.

I am sure, if he does not get back to her today, he will certainly get back to her early in the week. It is his intention to inquire immediately and, if the hon. member is around, I am sure that he will be in contact with her.

COMMENTS OF MINISTER

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether members on the government side want to reflect upon the fact that the minister of energy, in his reply, indicated that he was unable to distinguish between nuclear fission, nuclear fusion and hydrogen technology and did not know which of them is radio emitted.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

12TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 12th report of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding the selection of votable items among Private Members' Business.

Pursuant to Standing Order 92(2), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

13TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present the 13th report of the Standing Committee on House Management as per Standing Order 114.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

CONCURRENCE IN 13TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) Madam Speaker, I move that the 13th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

TRANSPORT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

> That seven members and two staffers from the Standing Committee on Transport be authorized to travel to Europe from October 30 to November 9, 1991 to complete a study on high speed trains.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I intend to withhold my consent. Considering the frivolous nature of this request, since the Government of Canada has just been authorized to do a feasibility study of the project, I fail to see why hon. members should go on a tour of Europe, while the merits and the potential feasibility of this project are being examined. Consequently, I object to this as a frivolous expenditure.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, if the Bloc Quebecois chooses to prevent this committee from proceeding on that travel then I have no choice but to accept that at this point.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present in this House today petitions signed by over 1,400 constituents. They are deploring the fact that more postal outlet services have been both cut and closed.

They point out that not only will it disadvantage all constituents from the surrounding area, but business people, seniors and the handicapped in particular.

I should point out that this is another blow to this community and to the constituency because Metro Drugs, McCullough Drugs, Marion Grocery, and a number of other outlets have suffered similar reductions. This is unacceptable.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by residents of the community of Longworth in my riding, as well as Prince George.

They call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services, and to reject the Conservative agenda of cutbacks and closures.

• (1210)

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure and privilege to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from a number of my constituents primarily from the town of Sidney which is at the lower end of Vancouver Island in British Columbia.

They are very concerned with the amount of government cutbacks to the RCMP services throughout Canada, particularly about the loss of $4.1 million for the British Columbia division. This reduction has resulted in the closure of detachments in smaller communities. They are quite fearful that the reduction will extend to the town of Sidney where there is a force that has a good reputation, as it does throughout Canada.

I submit this petition and ask the government to reconsider any cutbacks to the RCMP.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 114 and 115.

[Text]

Question No. 114—Mr. Rideout

What is the expected date of completion of the Department of Transport's study of funding improvements on the TransCanada highway?

Hon Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada is not conducting a study of funding improvements on the Trans-Canada Highway. The Council of Ministers Responsible for Transportation and Highway Safety commissioned the Transportation Association of Canada (formerly the Roads and Transportation Association of Canada) to conduct a National Highway Policy study which would:

—Establish future needs and define standards for the Canadian primary highway system.

—Establish benefits and costs of meeting these needs.

—Establish funding alternatives for meeting these costs with a view towards recommending adoption of this policy by their governments.

The Transportation Association of Canada has produced Steering Committee Reports on the first three phases of the study and briefed the federal, provincial and territorial Ministers of Transportation on the findings. The Phase IV part of the study has been extended and the Minister of Transport will be briefed on its findings in early spring 1992.

Question No. 115—Mr. Vanclief

With respect to combat action seen by Canadian Army units in Greece and elsewhere in Europe during the Second World War, (a) which units were posted to Greece during wartime (b) which of those units seeing action in Greece received combat support from units of the Greek Resistance (c) are those members of the Greek Resistance who assisted Canadian combat units currently receiving financial assistance from the government (d) are members of Resistance forces from other Axis countries currently receiving financial assistance from the government?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of National Defense and Veterans Affairs as follows:

a) No Canadian Army units were posted to Greece during the Second World War.

b) Not applicable.

c) Since 1930, with the inception of the WVA Act, Allied Veterans have been eligible for War Veterans Allowance.

War Veterans Allowance is a form of social assistance available to veterans and their dependants who are in financial need. To qualify, a person must have the required war service and also meet age, health and income requirements. The purpose of this program is to ensure that, in recognition of war service, qualified individuals are provided with a regular monthly income to meet basic needs.

In 1985, the Federal Court of Canada ruled in favour of recognizing members of the Greek Resistance as members of the forces of His Majesty's allies or powers associated with His Majesty. Based on the Federal Court's ruling the War Veterans Allowance Board formally recognized members of the Greek Resistance as Allied Veterans.

d) To date there are 3 persons who served with the Italian Resistance movement during World War II receiving Veterans Affairs Canada benefits.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 105.

Madam Speaker, I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

[Text]

*Question No. 105—Mr. Duhamel

Since September 4, 1984, in the federal government (a) how many people have been hired for contract positions (b) what percentage is found in each of (i) visible minorities (ii) women (iii) aboriginal peoples (iv) disabled?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): There are no positions in the federal government that are classified or identified as contract positions and there is no comprehensive repository of government contracts awarded to individuals or to firms for the services of individuals. When contracting for goods and services valued at more than $200,000.00, departments must abide by the requirements of the Federal Contractors Program for Employment Equity administered by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission. However, no details on representation are held by the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, just before Question Period I had an opportunity to start putting a few comments on the record about Bill C-35, and I would like to continue now with them.

As you know, Madam Speaker, what we are dealing with in the House today is a bill with quite a title that I think Canadians would be interested in:

An act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

The legislation, which is being brought before us today, is a mouthful for us to consider. These are essentially a number of changes to government legislation that are, in the government's hopes anyway, deemed non-controversial and that should not have any debate.

I did say, at the opening of my comments, that when the minister who introduced the bill first spoke he said that he was hoping to get unanimous consent in the House to move as quickly as possible today into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill. I said at that time, and I repeat it now, that our party cannot give that unanimous consent.

I think that is an important point to make. A bill of some 120 pages that amends a large number of statutes should be given an opportunity for a closer examination in committee. That is only appropriate.

We are quite prepared at this stage of the debate to move along quickly. But it is only proper that this Parliament, when considering a bill like this, has a closer examination of the bill in committee to see just what is in there.

Certainly, when this House receives a report from the legislative committee, we will be more than prepared to give the legislation its consideration and its early passage.

Why do I say that we have to do this, Madam Speaker?

I have not been a member of Parliament for a very long time but I have had an opportunity over the past to see what other governments have done, including this government, when we are presented with these omnibus bills. When you start going through these bills you have a number of questions. As a member of Parliament I do not think that I would be serving my constituents or my country if I did not look closely at this legislation to ensure that we did not pass a stinker.

We have had that in British Columbia. The Social Credit government had quite a tradition. At the end of the session, when the legislature would be rising shortly and there is an eagerness to pass legislation, along would come an omnibus bill. Only later do we find out exactly what a particular bill did, what it eliminated or destroyed or changed. I think it is important for us to give close examination but we are also prepared to give a fairly quick one.

I would just like to point out a couple of parts of this bill that give reason for this examination in committee before we pass it through this House. For example, on page 12a of the bill there is an amendment to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which my interpretation would lead me to believe that we are reducing the authority and control that the government and the minister may have regarding toxic substances. That is an example where we certainly need the background material and comments from the government.

As well on page 13 there are questions of exporting and importing toxic substances. The question is whether this is a reduction in the authority of the government to take a look at the export or import of these dangerous products.

Another one, on page 15a, concerns amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. My interpretation of the interpretation is that the regulations the government would lay out in licences, and I quote: "—need not be prescribed by regulation". It is certainly my view that we have to follow due process and ensure that when the Government of Canada does issue a licence the minister does not just write something on a napkin and say: "It is okay and off you go". There is a process that we follow, the Order in Council process and gazetting, which is important for us to consider.

There is one part of the bill that is a positive change, which I think we could support. It is the addition of a clause which says: "This amendment which would add the underlined words would permit the drafting of legislation using feminine pronouns". All too often it is "he" will do this and "he" will do that. I think it might be a refreshing change for the government across the way if "she" were to do this or "she" were to do that. Of course it would refer to a minister generally, male or female. That is a positive change which we should have in this legislation.

Another one is a new amendment on page 37a. This is an amendment to the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act:

> This amendment will ensure that adjudicators can summon and enforce the attendance of witnesses.

Without seeing the rest of that act the question I have concerns legal representation. Often people ask that lawyers represent them. Does this deal with that section at all?

As well, on page 42a under the Statistics Act there would appear to be an amendment that will allow Statistics Canada to start sharing information with other departments, municipalities, or other corporations. The amendments here lay out how that is to be done. My concern is how the public is to know if Statistics Canada starts sharing a lot of information with Visa or MasterCard or goodness knows any other mailing list that people might be on.

My point is that I do not think it is a proper procedure for this House to be asked to go into Committee of the Whole immediately when we know that given the pressure of time we will be asked to pass this legislation without giving it the consideration and thought that is needed.

• (1220)

That is why we will be refusing the consent of the government to rush this through. I think there is reason enough to send it to committee, not to spend a lot of time in committee, but reason enough to give it some thought in committee so that when it is reported back to the House we will hear from all members of the House on that committee whether this bill on the whole is worth supporting. We will then know if there are some concerns about this legislation which require amendments, and we can then allow the rest of the bill to pass.

To wrap up, we are prepared to move this bill quickly into committee. That is where it has to go as far as we are concerned, but we are not going to give it the old legislative rush. We will certainly welcome comments from the government in due course. Then the legislation and some of the good points I have mentioned can be passed, and concerns about parts of the bill can be addressed.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. After what I just heard, I think it would be advisable, before the House votes on second reading, to ask the unanimous consent of the House for referral of Bill C-35 to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I did not correctly understand the request of the parliamentary secretary. The reference is to a legislative committee and not a standing committee. There has not been any discussion among House leaders with regard to a standing committee. Therefore I would like to defer any decision on that at this time. Perhaps we can have further discussions later in the day and thereby accommodate the hon. member. But there is no consent, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I have just checked and found that there were consultations and we did agree to it going to a standing committee. However, I respect the concern of the House leader for the Official Opposition that perhaps we need to revisit it quickly and then, hopefully before the completion of the debate, make a final determination.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As all hon. members know we would need unanimous consent, so we will put the motion as presented by the hon. member aside for the time being.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to add my comments to this proposed legislation and to help rush it through the House. In another motion here today I believe we are talking about the decorum and the way we do things in this institution.

I believe, as our House leader, the House leader of the New Democratic Party and other members of the other party have said, that we cannot bring this type of legislation in at the last minute and rush it through without more scrutiny. The member for Cape Breton—East Richmond mentioned items he found dealing with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. This agency will, among other things, now only have to make a detailed report every five years. This idea of reporting every five years leads me to wonder what is wrong with this regional development program. This program is supposed to be the program to assist Atlantic Canada out of the financial doldrums it has been in for so long a time.

We have had many federal agencies in Atlantic Canada in the last 75 years. This we were told would be the one that would answer our great economic problems. I find it problematic that after the number of years it has been in existence it is now only going to give detailed public reports every five years.

This leads me to wonder if this great organization is having more problems than we know about. This is just one thing that has been found in this omnibus bill as it proceeds through the House. I believe there are many others. We see the Federal Court Act. We see the Canada Pension Plan. Other items deal with the Financial Administration Act. Maybe there are areas in the bill which we should scrutinize much more closely rather than rush it through the House in one day's debate.

I believe that these omnibus bills should not be brought here and Parliament asked without notice to rush them through. There are some 90 acts within this piece of legislation. That is a lot of detail for members of Parliament to go over and decide whether they can agree with it or not.

We on this side of the House do not believe that we should do that at this time. In all sincerity I say that we are looking later in the day to make this place a better one in which to serve. I am all for that. I said that the other day.

We cannot bring bills like this to the House on Friday morning and wonder if we can get them through.

TRANSPORT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been further discussions, and I think you would find that the House is prepared to give unanimous consent to the following motion:

That seven members and two staffers from the Standing Committee on Transport be authorized to travel to Europe from October 30 to November 9 to complete a study on high speed trains.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, since the mover of the motion has made such an eloquent intervention on this particular matter, and in view of the fact that there have been consultations for extended periods of time and that there have been revisions of that particular proposal, I would like to give the consent of our party to this particular motion.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to signify the consent of the government side to the hon. member's motion for travel.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I would also like to elaborate on the comments by my colleague, the House leader for the Liberal Party, and compliment the three House leaders for their diligence in reviewing the submission and making sure that it worked.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question on Bill C-35?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Justice. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DECORUM IN CHAMBER

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 3871), the amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 3878) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (p. 3881).

• (1230)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to rise and speak on this motion in the House today. I would like to begin by going back to the beginning of the debate on Wednesday when the hon. government House leader rose and presented his motion. As I was listening to him, in the initial part of his speech I was moved by his words and I thought that this was going to be a pretty productive debate.

We hear from our own families and friends that we did not need to pay Mr. Spicer $27 million to hear that people across Canada, generally speaking, are absolutely frustrated and incensed at the way we sometimes behave in this House in terms of our actions and the insults we hurl at one another.

I sat there listening to the government House leader and all of a sudden, lo and behold, an incident came up and I lost it. I sort of blurted out something at the government House leader which I certainly was not pleased with. I reflected later in the day on why it is that we seem constantly to get into this use of language and finger pointing at one another to such an extent that we behave in front of national audiences in a way that we certainly would not behave if we were in a corporate boardroom, if we were in a classroom, if we were at a function, or probably even a family argument. When we have family dinners I am sure we all get in to arguments now and again where we get pretty hot and pretty incensed at one another. Yet, even in those situations we do not lose it the way we lose it in this place, and here we are doing it in front of a national audience, in front of Canadians coast to coast. In fact it is not only in front of Canadians. I understand that Question Period in the House of Commons is used quite frequently in political science courses in most American universities right now. They are absolutely amazed at the way we have this free-wheeling debate with one another. They are stunned at the language and the actions that we use.

So I asked myself: Why is it that when you come here with the best intentions, when you say "listen, I am not going to get involved in the cut and thrust of what has been going on in this place" and you try to do your best to put forward constructive alternatives to government policy, you still sort of lose it? I have been reflecting on this point for a while, and I think that very few Canadians really understand what goes on in this place when we are debating.

The television camera is very selective in the way it handles the question and answer period or the debating period. It does not have a wide angle lens. It does not see the whole dynamic of the House. Also the camera does not pick up the situation where if all of a sudden you ask a specific question of the government on a specific issue and the government, the front bench, the ministers of the Crown, stand up and give an answer which has absolutely nothing to do with the question that was asked. We are here representing our constituents. We are in a situation today where many of our constituents are in deep economic pain. We have almost 2 million people unemployed. We have people losing their homes. Bankruptcies are at a record high level. When we as members of Parliament on both sides of the House go back to our constituencies, we are presented with the problems that our constituents are facing.

They demand that we put forward ideas and recommendations when we return to the House of Commons. They ask us to say to the government: "Listen, we have people unemployed. The reason they are unemployed is that there is a lack of capital in the market. Banks are shutting down their lending practices. We have high interest rates. We have a high dollar. The immigration department seems to be moving slowly". Whatever the reason, our constituents expect us to come back here and make the government accountable for its actions.

We can stand up in this House day in and day out and be presented with answers which are not specific. Sometimes the government will answer in a way which is almost like number gymnastics. It will take a question and twist it in a way that the question we put just does not make sense or is not logical. This engenders frustration. It engenders a frustration in the opposition parties that triggers this language reaction or this decorum reaction.

I have only been here for three years. Initially I was pretty frustrated and disgusted with the decorum of this House, but I am beginning to understand fully why people can lose it in here. When one is part of an institution which tends to exist in almost a remote state from the grassroots of the people one can become insensitive. One can project, not by design but by inadvertence, an attitude which seems to be uncaring to the people of Canada. It seems to be lacking in action. This is what frustrates the spirit of this country more than anything.

Day in and day out I hear from my constituents: "What goes on up there in Ottawa? Does anything ever get done? Is there no way that you can move this government to act? What does it take?"

Mr. Speaker, do you know that most Canadians today have given up on the institution of government? Not just government at the national level but all governments. They have given up on government because they feel that their words are falling on deaf ears. When we as members, as recipients of that frustration, hear that frustration being expressed to us, we would be absolute fools if we did not come up here and try to pass on that frustration to the government.

• (1240)

We need action on tax reform. We need action on trying to put people back to work. When day in and day out we are stonewalled, it engenders feelings of frustration on this side of the House. I think that this motion on decorum and language in the House is totally misleading. It is misleading because it is not addressing the fundamental problem in this House.

The fundamental problem in this House is one where the issues are not being addressed in a specific and substantive way. What is our fallback position as members of the opposition? If the hon. government House leader were truly trying to be effective as to how to reform this House, then he would have put forward something that would have caused a break-up of the bureaucracy that not only runs this town but now tends to be running this very House which is the ultimate representative of all the people.

Again I want to put forward some constructive ideas to the government. I think that this government is probably one of the best manipulators of the government communications systems that I have ever seen. It is an expert in the power of proper packaging. It is so expert that I believe it actually fools a lot of the national media on many occasions.

This is something that I am really concerned about. I am concerned about the fact that the government itself, day in and day out, plays gymnastics with figures. This is what leads to the frustration which ultimately causes a breakdown in the language and decorum of this place. I am not standing here condoning it, but what I am saying is if we are truly going to have some kind of substantive reform in the way this nation's board room is going to function, then we have to get back to basics.

Here is where we should begin. If we are presenting specific questions on issues which all sides of the House know are of national concern, then it would seem to me that the government could go a long way toward reducing some of the frustration in this House by being a bit more specific in its responses, by being a bit more substantive.

We are at a position in this country where the economy, the mood and the spirit is so fragile that people want all of us, on all sides of this House right now, to do things that galvanize the will of this country, to do things that pull it together. I think that we could probably begin that process with the government, in the tone of its approach, maybe assuming some more of the collective responsibility.

I wanted to refer to the member from the New Democratic Party the other day who spoke on this very motion. He said that he felt that the government was basically putting forward this motion in a way that language and decorum needed to be changed. There seemed to be a suggestion that there was more of a problem on this side of the House rather than the government side. I would suggest to the government that it is partly its responsibility for reform, decorum and language clean-up here. When we participated in debate here, we should not be standing up with papers prepared for us by bureaucrats and officials and throwing statistics back and forth. I think we have to get beyond that and get into the spirit and listen to the frustration and the pain that our constituents are talking about.

This is sort of a motion of self-analysis today on all sides of the House. No one is claiming that they have any book on how to behave in this place. I think that we can all express our point of view as to why we become frustrated. Naturally the government can say to us: "You know that we are in a box in terms of expenditure control here. You know that we are not the only country in the world that is having difficulty". That is fair.

In the process of debate I would suggest that if the government is truly sincere in asking for radical change to decorum and to language then maybe it should participate in the process by being a little more substantive and creative in putting forth its answers on policy. Maybe it should also be a little bit more receptive to accepting ideas and policy from members of the opposition.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a little later I want to speak on this motion in a very non-partisan way. I would hope that that is the kind of attitude we would have. However, I would like to ask a question of the member for Broadview—Greenwood. He seems to be talking about the government a great deal and its kinds of answers.

I was taken the other day with a speech made by the member for Crowfoot who has been here a long time and who has a lot of concern, as does the member who just spoke. He said it did not seem like the rules of the House were being carried out to any great extent. A lot of these long preambles in Question Period and the innuendoes that come out of them may be part and parcel of this too. I am not taking anything away from the kinds of answers given.

I would be interested in what the member would think about putting questions into a more precise and concise form without long preambles containing innuendo that tends to elicit this pack mentality that seems to develop around this place. I would be interested in his comments on that particular point.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the member for Sarnia—Lambton correctly he is suggesting that the preambles are too long, or is he suggesting that in the preambles there tends to be a bit of a shot taken before we get to the substance of the question?

I think that is a fair point, but it goes back to my point. I think we have a mood of confrontation and frustration here and the nation is actually a mirror of the frustration. We are emissaries of the mood of the nation. That mood is very low, very frustrated, very up tight, because there is perceived to be—I put my emphasis on the word "perceived"—a government that is not listening and not caring. As a result we reach that level of emotion which leads to those cheap shots. I think the member has a good point. I think we do from time to time take cheap shots that probably should not be taken.

• (1250)

However we are taking these shots because our frustration level has reached a certain point. It is a two-way street. I guess my point basically is that need to get a sense from the government. I have never sat on the government side but I have worked for the government side before. There are times when a government can be perceived as being arrogant and uncaring and can be seen as not listening to the people, especially during a period of deep economic crisis. It is that perception which causes people to dig in their heels and become emotional and frustrated.

I take the member's point as constructive. It is certainly not a partisan point. I think that we have to work on cleaning up our act as all members do.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, there is a tradition in Britain that Whips never talk in the House of Commons about anything of substance. Over here we do not do that to quite the same extent. Certainly opposition Whips speak with great frequency. However it is not very often in the last three years that I have been government Whip that I have had a chance to speak in the Chamber. I did not intend to speak on this debate.

I had a little insomnia two nights ago and watched replays of the House of Commons. I heard most of the speech from the House leader of the Liberal Party and all of the speech of the House leader of the New Democratic Party.

In that close to one hour I experienced anger and ultimately disappointment listening to those speeches on a topic that is so essential to the reputation of the institution, so essential to the belief of a population in its own democracy. Is democracy a good form of government? The answer is yes. It is the best form of government until you lose faith in the institution itself. Maybe you have a word, maybe you have a process. When you lose faith in the institution you are really in trouble.

I do not think that any of us who serve in this Chamber and work at the job of going back to our ridings and doing all the other things can feel very sanguine today about the attitudes that Canadians have toward the Chamber itself.

The anger I felt in listening to those two speeches the other night was a result of the degree of partisanship in each. I have not listened to my own House leader and I have not listened to the parliamentary secretary. I was busy and did not hear those speeches.

I would be really surprised if either one of them made a speech without partisanship on this topic. If there was ever a topic on which we should be truly non-partisan in this Chamber it is this. This is a motion, well crafted or badly crafted, that deals with the essence of the possibility that the people of Canada can believe in the institution. If you do not believe in the institution then a whole series of good decisions are less likely to work because people will not have faith in them.

I took my pin off. I came here in 1979. I was raised in a community that experienced a lot of difficulty, a lot of poverty and things, and all of a sudden I was here. This place is a very important place and you feel proud. They give you a pin. It is for security reasons but it is also a symbol. It has a number on it. I am the only human being in the whole world who has that pin with that number. I had not been here two years and I took it off because I was so upset about the nature of this institution and the way it works.

I am one of the people who had a lot of hope in 1985, some five years after that, that with the reforms the roles of members of Parliament would be better and the whole place would be better. It is in many ways. I remember the days when committees never met. There was absolutely no opportunity to make an amendment. No matter how good your idea was and no matter how many witnesses, amendments were not made.

Since 1985 we made 174 amendments on the environmental bill. We made 39 on the gun control bill the other day. Canadians participate, they come. Members care, members listen, stay up late at night, argue about amendments and make them. They do it collectively across party lines.

The degree to which we work together on behalf of Canadians is one of the best kept secrets in this whole country. We do, all of us know that. Time after time after time we work together on an investigation or on a piece of legislation in committees. We work together well because people come here with talent. They are selected from their communities because they have talent and they have commitment. Then they come here.

The institution itself is viewed negatively. If you have a collection of people like that with concerns like that, ideological differences sure but really decent human beings who care and who are cared about, how can you bring them into a collective and have a negative perception of the place?

Ultimately we have had the negative perception in part because of the potency of television and the decision many years ago, before any of us came, to put television in the House. In many ways we have a rotten journalistic process in this country. It is a rotten, rotten, rotten journalistic process that depends on advertisers' dollars in large measure which believes that news must be encapsulated as a mini-drama with a hero and a villain in every situation.

The most discrepant view gets attention with the most common well vetted view. They get equal time. There is a perception over time of leaders in our society. They are high profile political leaders, but also doctors, dentists, clergymen, policemen and boy scout leaders. They are all being denigrated because the media give prominence to aberrent behaviour by a member of a class and do their thing which is create a mini-drama with a hero and a villain.

This Chamber itself is something that collectively we could do something about. Collectively we could change the reputation of it. I saw no hope for that at three o'clock in the morning watching the replay of just two of the speeches by two of the leaders in the Chamber.

I want to attack the New Democratic Party thesis. One basic message of the House leader of the Liberal Party was that this is an adversarial place. I say yes. I agree. I hope it never changes. This is the place for the free exchange of ideas. This is the place to argue. This is the place ultimately to vote.

Where else in society do we have adversarial situations? We happen to be in the middle of the World Series. We are headed toward the Grey Cup. The whole athletic team world is an adversarial world.

I have a little picture in my mind: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am glad to bring you this year's Grey Cup. We have a little surprise for you. Today we are going to make the coach and the management of each of the teams responsible for the rules. We are not going to have any referees during the whole Grey Cup, and aren't you excited? How well do you think it will work?"

That is where I began as a young man. I was heavily into athletics and I ended up as a referee. I refereed national championships in basketball and other sports. You could never be a referee without the concurrence of the players, the coaches and management. They give you that authority. They give you the rule book. If you are fair and consistent and clear on what those rules are and the enforcement of those rules, they give you their support even in very emotional moments. They give you the power to punish. For example, a technical foul in basketball or an ejection for a fist fight in a football game. Think about how little referees are sometimes and how big football players are and how many football players there are. If they wanted to crush that referee with their fists it would be boom, done, gone.

This place gives that authority to the Chair. It is pretty well accepted practice that we do not comment on the behaviour of the occupant of the chair because we have respect for the Chair as a symbol.

However we easily slide into something else. The House leader for the New Democratic Party said to the Speaker at the commencement of his speech the other day: "We want to congratulate you on your excellent work, Mr. Speaker". The Chair did not cut him off. I do not think anybody noticed. That was a comment in this Chamber to an individual about that individual on the quality of the work.

In this Chamber that is debatable. There is an obligation to debate it if you open the door. You should not comment on the occupant of the chair and whether he or she does a good job or a bad job because the minute you do it is debatable. You cannot be on one side. It is an adversarial place.

Laced throughout that House leader's speech are comments like: "This motion is sort of a subtle way of storming the Chair" and "this motion says you are not doing your job properly". We do not accept that. It is against the rules. Those comments themselves are against the rules. The Chair did not stop him. That is a microcosm of a larger problem.

Is it really official New Democratic Party policy followed by elected members in this Chamber that we do not want rules and we do not want a referee, that each party shall discipline its own members? I do not want to be partisan, but I raised a point of order on more than one occasion about two members who voted twice. It is clearly on the record; it is on the tapes. One apologized to the House ultimately. The other never has and there was no discipline.

I remember the day a member of the New Democratic Party walked across the floor of the Chamber with a fish and plunked it down on a desk. There were other sorts of advertising gimmicks here and there. There was no discipline. There was no discipline from the referee and no discipline from the party is to invite escalation.

In Croatia there have been all kinds of cease-fires between the Serbs and the Croatians but there is no referee, nobody with the power or the authority to enforce it. Even if you have the power and the authority but do not use it you invite escalation. There were two recent incidents, a comment on sexism and one on racism. Read the record. The member who invited the comment on sexism appears in Hansard. What does Hansard say? It says: "An hon. member". It does not identify the person. The comment is simply: "That is not true". They yelled: "That is not true". No action from the referee.

In a basketball game that is like an elbow in the chops. If the basketball referee does not penalize the elbow in the chops, you are going to get a blow to the kidney on the next foray down to the other end. By nature that is adversarial. Our job is the refereeing of society. That is what the Chamber does. It passes laws that govern business. It says yes, it is adversarial, but under these limits. We pass pollution laws that say do not go beyond this limit. We pass the Criminal Code. We are in the business of setting limits in the expectation that limits will be enforced.

I was so mad at the House leader of the New Democratic Party on October 11, 1990 because a statement he made in this Chamber was legally actionable outside this Chamber for a class of people called Conservatives. The Chair took no action. The statement was completed from start to finish. I was not even in town. I raised it and I was asked to back off and solve it behind closed doors. It sits there to this day as part of our records. I brought it in today. The statement is on page 14036 of Hansard.

I will give you a couple of examples which talk about Conservatives: "Conservatives want to be above the law". This is just a short statement in our Hansard. These are just a few lines of it: "They want to be tipped off to any RCMP criminal investigations into their parliamentary affairs". This refers to Conservatives and Conservatives only in this Chamber."A few weeks later her colleagues are looking for special laws for Tory MPs. Tories are willing to break all conventions, abuse closure, stack the Senate, and now they want to give themselves special legal privileges. No wonder Canadians have such contempt for this government".

If there is no referee to stop this kind of calumny then it invites retaliation and the institution suffers. There is no greater law. We did a filibuster back in 1980 and I was in my office till three and four o'clock in the morning. I read most of those books on that table in about a 15-day period of time. As a fairly new member I was looking for ways to raise questions of order and privilege in this Chamber to filibuster, to stop the constitutional proposal which made my province full of fifth- class citizens. I felt very deeply about it. Never once did I break a rule of this place, unless it was accidental, not once. The rules allow for obstruction. The rules allow for many things done with decency and responsibility.

That statement on October 11, 1990 was an indecent statement. There are only two basic rules in this place that need to be enforced, and the institution benefits. One is respect and the other is relevance.

When is the last time the rule of relevance was enforced in this Chamber? What relevance simply means is that we set aside time to deal with the topic. Miscellaneous changes to bills or decorum in the House is the topic now. The next one might be an income tax issue. But, if everybody spoke to the topic, debates would be quicker, neater and somebody tuning in could actually listen to a debate on the issue: what is right and what is wrong. If we conducted all of our debates and all of our behaviour with respect for each other as human being who care, human beings with talent, human beings who try, then the institution of democracy would benefit.

But we cannot ask the referee to referee unless we say: "In your refereeing we are asking you to enforce the rules not today, not tomorrow, but every day and every tomorrow and in every circumstance". If it is a bad rule collectively we will change the rule. If the enforcement is in the escalation of violence, such as in Croatia and Serbia, then the institution loses all of its credibility. This Chamber has seen a massive escalation of violence, verbal violence. There is no greater transgression on the collective privileges of this Chamber than the notion of contempt. The most contemptuous group of people in this country about this institution are journalists. They are incorrect on so many occasions.

• (1310)

We do not have the courage collectively to haul them before the bar and say: "Stop being contemptuous". It is hard to convince them of this. We cannot allow contempt for this institution to occur in this Chamber, and particularly by leaders in this Chamber, and not call it to account. The contempt for this institution and for the people in it has to stop here first. Then we have an opportunity, by our example, to call others to be accountable for the terrible things they say about the people in this institution and about the institution itself which have no basis in fact and reality.

The lead comes from allowing those comments to be made most often in this Chamber before they pass outside. That is something that we can stop collectively if we have the will to stop it.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments by the chief government Whip. I want to suggest that perhaps he has actually violated a few rules himself in his remarks, particularly in terms of impugning the motives of some of my colleagues.

I want to ask him a question dealing with an amendment made by my House leader and seconded by myself. It is directly in terms of his responsibilities as the Whip of the Conservative caucus. In part the amendment says:

> "The party leaders, House leaders and Whips be responsible for the comportment of their caucuses;"

I understand that the government House leader has rejected that. I want to know whether the government Whip feels that Whips should not have the responsibility for the decorum of their members while in the House; that the House leader should not have responsibility for the decorum; that the party leaders, whether it is the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition or the Leader of the third party, should not have responsibility for the decorum of their members.

My leader has made it very clear that if any of my caucus use racist or sexist remarks in this House she will be the one to punish them. As we know, there is nothing in the rules that clearly defines that sexist remarks or racist remarks are against the rules of this House. They should be, but they are not.

The member went on about how we need a referee. Where the rules are not clear, and there is an opportunity for House leaders, Whips and party leaders to enforce discipline, is it not our responsibility to do that? Would the member therefore comment on that particular amendment put forward by my colleague?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the question was raised. I have risen before. I have had complaints about my behaviour raised in this Chamber by members of my own caucus. I responded and do respond in terms of responsibility. I am an officer of the House as the Whip of a party and I have a responsibility to uphold the authority of the Chair. I have absolutely no difficulty with that, absolutely none. I can be quite firm on that.

If one of my members gets punched in the teeth they have a responsibility to defend themselves. If the Chair will intervene, great. If the Chair does not intervene then we have the beginning of a war. Today in Question Period the member for Hamilton East used the word "ignorant" in dealing with a member of the cabinet. We could have had intervention by the referee who would say: "That is an elbow. Stop it". If one lets it go then one is going to get something in response.

That is simply the way an adversarial process works. The member opposite does not believe and has said on many occasions in many speeches that business polices itself. It is the whole party platform that there should be rules and there should be referees out there who enforce the rules. That is where it comes from.

I just threw two or three things on the table about keeping the commitment he talks about. It is lousy. There has been no discipline within his own party for the kinds of behaviour that come easily to mind. If that changes, that is great. It has to be through the Chamber itself and through its rules. If we read the rule book Standing Order 10 says:

> The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order.

We have an obligation to support and encourage the Chair to do just that. That is our responsibility as House officers. That is what I have no trouble with. If the NDP believes that order should be replaced and we should eliminate a referee, eliminate a Speaker, and say that under House orders House officers called leaders and Whips and so on shall do such and such, then let us debate it.

Quite frankly there is not an adversarial relationship in the world where that principle works. Part of what you have as a responsibility when you are involved in a team, in a group, is the morale of the group, the strategy of the group and so on. Yes, one takes advantage of rules. One runs up to the edges of rules. One cannot be responsible for that. One goes to a meeting every morning that does exactly that. It is wrong to say that people must be disciplined if they step over the edge a little bit. That discipline comes from the Chair. The rule book says it. It is true in a court of law.

Can you imagine a lawsuit with two lawyers disciplining themselves about what is relevant and what is not? No, that is why there is a judge in the middle who says no to this and no to that and yes to this and yes to that. The adversarial relationship tries to get the main advantage for the client. That is the nature of this place. Collectively we have to say to the Chair that we want our rules enforced and we as House officers will back you up all the way. If we do not do that the institution suffers.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the government Whip was on to a couple of key points that I share. One was the point that he made that there are hours and hours of work that go on in this place, in committee and offices that the people of Canada never hear about. They only see the 30-second clip. From time to time there is almost a contest that goes on in this place as to how I can get a 30-second clip instead of trying to advance a particular cause or a particular policy initiative. Therefore I share the member's point on that observation.

He also made another observation that I thought was interesting. He introduced the fact that maybe there should be some accountability with the media as well. We have this exercise after Question Period that I am sure most Canadians are not even aware of. Members run outside and they troll up and down outside this Chamber hoping that some journalist will come along and they can get a clip for the media, for national television.

I saw today a colleague of mine from Scarborough was brutalized, a man who has worked most of his life on human rights issues and has done it in a very progressive way. He was working on a policy paper where the media actually took words that did not exist in the paper. He referred to things like concentration camps and words and language that my hon. colleague I know did not use because I spoke to him, and now, all of a sudden, the member's three years of hard work is gone out the window because the media is allowed to sort of take and twist things and sort of put them in a certain way.

The member has been around here a long time. Does he have any sort of creative ways or thoughts as to how we can sort of make that national gallery a little bit more focused on the substance of issues that are being debated rather than some of the tactical activity that goes on in here?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, simply and briefly. I have had a question of privilege in my mind. I used it partially off and on for over 10 years. That series of books about our rules and our precedents says clearly that biased information which brings the institution into disrepute can indeed be a contempt of Parliament and is punishable by Parliament. Cut off his head and put him before a firing squad.

The power exists. We are the highest court in the land. There has to be a will. There has to be a certitude in our minds that the institution is more important than any one of us. We have to take the obligation and the responsibility for the protection of the reputation of the institution seriously.

It is all there. Go through it a little bit. You could rise on a bunch of headlines in newspapers today and make the case and you can make it persuasively. Then it follows: committee investigation and then punishment. There is a rhythm there. Contempt of this institution is viewed by the law to be a crime that sort of takes us in the direction of treason. We just do not do it. We do not seem to have the courage to do it.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that I have an opportunity to get up and speak to the government motion today.

I want to say at the outset that I have no intention of calling for the heads of anybody or for anybody to be put before a firing squad. I think that is taking things to ridiculous and very violent extremes, even in this debate.

The motion that has been put before us is one to deal with decorum and civility in the House of Commons. It appears to me that this motion only attempts to reaffirm what is already supposed to happen in this place. Surely the majority of us, as members of Parliament, already know about a basic level of decorum and a basic standard of decent behaviour. It seems incredible to me that the government even brings this motion forward for debate.

What we have seen in the House of Commons in the last month in fact has been comments made in this place that have nothing at all to do with decorum, but have instead to do with racist and sexist attitudes. It seems to me that this motion that the government has put forward simply fails to address those two very critical issues that we have all seen in the media in every area of this country, and that is sexist comments and racist comments.

I believe that the government motion totally misses the point.

Racism and sexism permeate our society and Canadians, by the number of letters that I have received over the two most recent examples in the House of Commons, and the number of phone calls that I have received, are just not going to accept this at all any more. They are fed up with those kinds of attitudes.

It is not surprising that those attitudes are still surrounding us. Some of these attitudes in society are overt as they were in the race riots that we saw in Nova Scotia recently in the high school there. Some of these attitudes are subtle and the person to whom it is directed only finds out by accident that they have been denied a job or housing based on their race. There was an instance of a case of a visible minority woman who tried to rent an apartment and was told that the apartment was filled. Shortly thereafter a white person entered and asked about the apartment and was given that apartment to rent.

Some of us have grown up with these attitudes around us here in Canada. A very competent woman administrator was told to her face that she would not get the job she was applying for because they were looking for a man. This particular woman does not herself support equality issues. She does not see the connection between what happened to her in that individual circumstance and what happens to women in the Public Service.

There is a female engineer who was told by her male colleague that she was not an engineer, that she was just a stupid woman. Another woman's boss told her that if he were her husband, he would beat her black and blue. A woman with a degree in naval architecture who had operated her own electronics shop was asked during a job interview if power or hand tools scared her, was she afraid to get dirty.

These are all examples that come from our own federal Public Service. Negative attitudes toward women and visible minorities and other disadvantaged groups do have a direct economic impact on these whole groups of people.

I received from a woman in Nova Scotia who wrote to me saying that she was tired of seeing me up on my feet in this place, always whining, always complaining about what happens to women in our society. She said to me she did not know if I was married or not, but if I was married what I really needed was a good kick in the butt from my husband. Those attitudes are still our there in society. It shocked me. I was surprised—I am surprised I continue to be shocked—but they are still out there in society. There are serious problems in Canadian society: race riots in Halifax, shootings of black youth, violence against women in every community in this country from the north to the south, from Victoria, British Columbia to St. John's, Newfoundland. Women are assaulted in their homes and on the streets simply because they are women.

Members of Parliament often reflect the attitudes that they have grown up with, the attitudes that are out there in society, but the difference is that members of Parliament here in this place have control over the lives of 26 million Canadians and more than half of those Canadians are women. They are people of every racial, ethnic, and religious group.

The member of Parliament who hurled a racist slur is the parliamentary secretary for employment and immigration. He has to make decisions concerning immigration policy, employment equity and job training programs. As a matter of fact, the Employment Equity Act is coming back to this House soon for review. I would submit that his input is not needed in that debate at all.

The member of Parliament who called a female member of Parliament here a slut is the parliamentary secretary to the Treasury Board which is now handling the labour negotiations with the Public Service. One of the major issues, in fact the major issue there, is the issue of pay equity for women. I would submit that his input would be the wrong input to that debate.

There is a lot of heckling, a lot of name calling. I have heard the other members talk about it in this place. I agree with many of the members who have said that is to be expected in a parliamentary democracy. After all, we come here holding very passionate views on matters of substance in our society. We hold different political views. Yes, we are partisan. I am not ashamed to be partisan. I am proud of the views that I represent here and by having debate in this House of Commons, that is how we avoid the fighting on the streets, if you like. This is the place for that kind of debate. There are people here who come from very different perspectives and very different outlooks.

Many of us feel passionately about the issue of equality, as I do. Others come from a different perspective. In my three years here I have only once complained about a remark that was hurled against me here in the House of Commons. That was the time when a direct sexist comment was directed at me.

• (1330)

The point that I want to make and the point that the government Whip seems to misunderstand or failed to recognize is that when one member in this House is hurled a direct sexist insult, it is not just me as a woman member of Parliament who is offended and insulted by that remark.

It is a whole class in society. It is all women in Canadian society. After all, we are not a minority. Let me remind this House that women are the majority in Canada. We are not a minority, but when those sexist comments are hurled at me, it is casting that kind of disgust, that old attitude that women do not belong in this place and do not belong in certain places in society across the bounds to all women in Canada.

That is the difference and that is what the government side does not seem to understand in this debate. When my leader, the hon. member for Yukon, raised the issue with the Prime Minister, he talked about the insults that he has received. Yes, sometimes things have been said to the Prime Minister that are inappropriate, but they are not racist and they are not sexist.

When the Prime Minister talked about the fish, I want the Prime Minister to understand that there is no such thing as fishism, but there is racism and there is sexism that is here in this place. It is everywhere in Canadian society.

Why should I as an individual woman in the House put up with all the regular kind of heckling and name calling which happens, plus the extra sexist kinds of name calling? I should not have to. Why should I as a woman believe that this government and its members really care about women's equality when it has refused to punish or discipline the members who have denigrated women as a group?

Sexist and racist names do not tell you what a member thinks of another member. They tell you what that member thinks of a gender or a racial group of people. The government has refused to acknowledge that point. Actually, it refuses to see it or perhaps it just does not get it. To be charitable, perhaps they just cannot get it.

The motion before us simply asks the Speaker to enforce what are two existing Standing Orders. Standing Order 16(2) states:

> When a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between that Member and the Chair, nor interrupt him or her, except to raise a point of order.

I fail to see how this Standing Order can really be enforced short of perhaps asking the pages here in the House of Commons to stand by members' desks and whack the desk or wrap their knuckles if they are starting to stand.

However, there are no individual penalties for the interrupters. The interruptions continue. Standing Order 18 reads:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof. No Member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

These Standing Orders, although updated from time to time, come to us from a long tradition, from days in which this House was made up entirely of men and from traditions in the British House of Commons where also the traditions were established by men. The Standing Orders do not deal at all with racism or sexism in the House.

It is not just the matter of language. It is the attitudes that produce that kind of use of language. It is no comfort to me that now members will simply perhaps not hurl these insults. I want them to see women and minorities as real, full human beings deserving of equality and respect. That is the bottom line.

We have an association here now of women parliamentarians, a non-partisan association, where women in this House and women from the other place meet from time to time. That association has discussed what has has happened in the House. We have discussed a number of issues, but we have discussed most recently the two incidents that I think have brought this motion forward by the government.

That association is now drafting a proposal for you, Mr. Speaker, and for the House that will ask for specific changes to the Standing Orders. These changes would permit a Speaker to remove a member from the precincts of this place, levy a fine, or withhold pay in cases of racist and sexist behaviour.

Let me say as a parent that when my children have from time to time displayed attitudes or behaviour unacceptable to our family or in society there were consequences for their behaviour. That is how they learn. I think that is a policy that is used in schools across this country. It is a policy that is used by a coach of a minor sports team. If players on his or her team act inappropriately or display inappropriate attitudes they are sent to the showers.

It seems to me that here in this place there are no consequences for sexist or racist behaviour. They are what we need to see.

I am hoping that when this comes forward it will be taken very seriously. As I said it has the support of women from the government side, the Official Opposition and from my party as well, and there has been a great deal of discussion about it.

We all come to this place from various experiences. There are members who were teachers, social workers, lawyers, homemakers and doctors. We all bring a variety of experiences to the House of Commons. Some members of Parliament I suppose you would call professional politicians. They have been here for a long, long time. We come to this House with different experiences and from all regions of the country. I believe that does add a great deal of knowledge and a variety of different perspectives to the work that we do here.

However when many of us were elected we really did not know what we were going to be getting into. Many of us had no experience at all with the legislative process. I know there are many members in this House of Commons who have had no experience with equality issues. We make laws here; that is our job. We are supposed to represent our constituents. Let us all remember that over one-half of all our constituents are female. Let us remember that we live in an ethnically and racially diverse land with many different religions, many different languages and many different cultures.

We pass laws here that deal with immigration, with employment equity. What kind of attitude do the comments that we heard a couple of weeks ago bring to that debate and that discussion? These are not issues to be passed over just like any other insult. That is the difference between the government motion on decorum and what should happen with racist and sexist comments.

We are not talking about offending a single member in the House of Commons. We are talking about offending a whole group of people in society. Nowhere in the Standing Orders is there a mention of what to do about offending an entire group in our society.

We need to have more than just motions about decorum. Fancy words are not going to solve the problem of sexist and racist attitudes. I ask the Prime Minister to set an example by removing the two offending members from their sensitive and lucrative positions. A parliamentary secretary position is seen by Canadians to be a reward for good service to the government and an inclusion into the government hierarchy. He has failed to answer that letter and has failed to take that kind of action.

The leader of my party has said publicly in this House that she would remove any of our caucus members from their duties if they were to shout sexist or racist comments.

I hope that government members will look carefully at the amendments that have been raised by the Official Opposition and the amendments that have been brought forward by the New Democratic Party. I sincerely urge them to support those amendments. If those amendments become part of this motion then it will have real meaning to the Canadian people. As it is, it is meaningless. It does not address the issue that Canadians are asking us to address in this place. Sure, they say Question Period is theatrical. Sometimes it is pretty theatrical, but a lot that happens here in the House or in committees is very substantive and members do work together co-operatively. I do not want this place to be seen as the laughing stock of Canada or seen as having the lowest level of leadership and behaviour in our society. That is what Canadians are saying right now after these most recent examples of racist and sexist slurs. They think that we are beneath contempt on those kinds of things. We must take this issue seriously. We must deal with it in the short term. In the long term we have to work to change the attitudes that produce sexist and racist behaviour.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the time. I want to thank the members here for their attention and urge them again to support the amendments to this motion so that it will have real meaning.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby. I have listened attentively to her dissertation and know she speaks passionately on the equality issue. I have observed that since she began here time here in 1988. I know she believes very fervently in that. Does she not think that if all of us on both sides of the House were to pay closer attention to the rules already in the rule book House it would lead to a greater sense of decorum in the House of Commons?

It is a two-edged sword. With the adversarial role there are many times when the barbs and heckling go on, most often in good nature. She and I have exchanged good natured heckling with each other over the months. Would she not agree that closer observance of the rules, as we already have them, would go a long way to improving the decorum in the House of Commons?

Ms. Black: Of course I believe in individual responsibility. I believe that we were elected here. We have the endorsement of our constituents. I think they expect us to show a basic level of decorum. I said that in my comments. I do not think any of us should need lessons on that. We come here as adults. We should be able to behave in a respectful way and meet the decorum standards he spoke of.

My point is that racism and sexism are not a matter of decorum. They are attitudes that insult a whole segment of our society. When I was called a fishwife in this place, which is the only time that I have got up to ask another member to withdraw, it was not just an insult to me but an insult and denigration of all women in our society. That is the point that I am trying to make. Decorum is fine. How could anyone be against decorum? We would all like to behave. We all already believe in it.

We must deal with the racist and sexist attitudes that I know the hon. member agrees exist here. We must do something to change that.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. At the close of her remarks I thought she said something that was very valuable. She said that many times in the House and many times in committee work a lot of positive things happen.

Of course we have Hansard. This is the Hansard for October. There are many comments in it. The member unfortunately just highlights two, though she is correct in saying that even two is far too many. It is important that we emphasize the many positive things that happen here, the many times behind the curtains and in committees positive, constructive comments are made.

Sometimes I think we do it to ourselves by having a debate and only talking about the negatives. I cannot imagine any company with 295 employees that would not have a couple of bad apples that everyone might be ashamed and embarrassed of. Yet there are many here who come in on a Monday, do their committee work, go home on a Thursday, and when they get back to their riding their constituents say: "We do not hear from you".

Many of us come here with no rules given to us. I came and I did not know the rules but I thought I would behave like a gentleman and other people would behave like ladies. Obviously I am a little bit naive.

I guess that is the point I would like to make to the member. We are quite right in pointing out that we do have warts, but I think it is also equally important to let the citizens of the country know that most of the time this is a place of professionalism and that most of the time all of us are proud to be part of that institution. I would just like her to comment on that.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member opposite for his comments and his question.

Yes, a lot of positive things do happen in the House of Commons. You never take off your partisan cloak entirely but when discussing issues that you want to make progress on, that perhaps do not have the highly partisan nature that a lot of the debate has here, there can be co-operation. For example, I introduced a private member's bill in the House of Commons. I then worked to get the support of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Liberal critic. We worked together to get the support of other members of the House of Commons, and that bill went through. It has now gone through the Senate and is only awaiting Royal Assent at this point. We do work together at times and we should highlight that perhaps more often.

Unfortunately our friends in the media do not see that kind of work as newsworthy or headline grabbing as the other things that do hit the news.

The member mentioned that I highlighted two recent incidents that have hit the media in a big way. I could give him and the Chair many more incidents that have happened in this place, in committee and other places in the House of Commons. I did not want to do that. I did not want to raise the level of debate on those two issues, but believe me there are many more incidents that I could document.

You mentioned corporations earlier. Many corporations are now moving toward establishing a policy on personal harassment, establishing a policy on sexual harassment, a policy that is well written, publicized heavily throughout the corporation to its employees and management people, with a complaint mechanism and a human rights officer to whom those complaints can be taken. Perhaps that is the direction that this House should move in.

When I am insulted on a sexist basis around here I have a lot more equality, because I am a member of Parliament, than many of the female employees in the House of Commons working for members of Parliament. We should all be looking at this in broad terms to see how we can show leadership to Canadians on these issues.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and the House for the opportunity to speak to this motion.

This motion, as put forward by the government, makes no exclusions. It is a motion that equally affects all of us in this House. I think it is important that we reflect upon that. It asks us to show respect for one another. It asks us also to do that in the mood of respecting the differences we have and the different regions and the different constituencies we all represent in this House of Commons. I think that is important because we will stand and debate and we will have differences of opinion. We on this side do not want the opposition to be muzzled. We want ideas and approaches to be put forward. We all must do it in a matter than is somewhat different than the way this place has been operating.

• (1350)

Members have been mentioned today and members have made comments in this House. Good, hard working, diligent, intelligent members of Parliament have said things and made certain allegations that I do not condone. They have said them and do not condone them themselves. I am sure that when they go home their spouses do not condone them. That is of very, very great concern.

What causes this sort of thing? I attempt to reflect upon it because I sometimes have problems being in the House when that sort of thing happens and it troubles me a great deal.

Why does that sort of thing happen? Canadians have also picked this up. The motion says that Canadians have expressed alarm at the excessive partisanship and the lack of decorum and civility that too often is evident in this House. They have great concern about that.

Where does this mostly come from? A lot of this rolls out from Question Period. That is what people are watching. As best I can figure out is that a pack mentality develops on all sides. No way would these individuals walk up to another individual and say these things to them personally.

I had a situation not too long ago where a group of picketers were outside my office. When I went to speak to them, there were some very, very vicious comments made from the back of the group. What I would do in each case was stop talking and walk very directly through the crowd to the person who made the remark. In every case, without exception, they smiled and certainly had a very different personal attitude about the situation when that sort of thing happened.

Therefore, it was the pack that did it. It was the group that allowed them to start talking in that manner. That, of course, is what develops it appears on all sides with the people in the House from time to time.

Canadians certainly have a lot of certain. They say that they should have respectable representation from their members of Parliament. This comes from what they see at times on TV and what they see on the TV clip from Question Period is a very negative situation. TV is a major media for our constituents. It is there for them to be afforded the opportunity to see what is happening in the House of Commons. But they get very perturbed and very disturbed at what they are seeing of this sort of action in here. They said that very straightforwardly. Also they would be very concerned if that medium was taken away. They like it.

Maybe at times they are watching just to see if we are going to change our act. Is this place going to clean up its act and stop this sort of thing that is going on here?

That is really it. At times, as was noted earlier by other colleagues in the House, acting starts to roll out. I mean we are sensitive to the acting to the situation. I guess that is part of the political make-up, but again I say I think our constituents are asking us to clean up that act.

As we know, we get into emotional situations. We go to the movie. We know it is not for real and we get caught up in it in a big way of having tears and all sorts of things. That of course is what happens there.

Of course, as we know, the citizens forum in its report said that Parliament is a charade of political gamesmanship. "It is just terrible the way they carry on in Parliament like unruly children." I am quoting from the report. "Bad-tempered brats, no control, quarrelling between parties. Why do they not get together and use their ideas better?"

We are getting it from all quarters. We are getting it from our constituents, our friends, our families, that this place needs to be changed. There have been ideas put forward by some here either in their presentation or in amendments made that this all can be done by leadership and discipline. I think that certainly there has to be leadership. In addition to that if we are going to discipline, we are going to discipline somebody after the fact, after something has been done. Might it not be better that we do it in this House by a tighter set of rules or by the enforcement of the rules of the House so there is not an eliciting of this sort of mentality that develops. I think that is the kind of thing that we should be looking at.

Greater discipline is fine, certainly party leadership discipline. I am worried. We do not want the situation to carry on where the comment from a person will roll out of their mouth and cause them some problem because of what happens here.

I heard my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood earlier saying he got caught up and ended up doing it himself. He was sitting there the other day and something rolled out. In a debate that is going on that is certainly not sexist or anything of that nature, something may tend to agitate the person who is speaking. That was unnecessary and I am saying to myself "Why did my mouth open up?"

I think again it is that pack mentality, that emotion, that kind of thing that goes on.

I see the member across the way shaking her head at most of what I say. I am very sorry. I am very concerned about this and I feel very personal about it. If she does not agree with anything I am saying I hope she will stand up and say that. But, again, that is the kind of thing that happens. Here I am standing speaking in the House, speaking I think with some sort of feeling and interest, and I do not know if that sort of thing would happen if one on one we were talking to one another. This place seems to do that. I mean you do not talk to somebody and they sit or stand there all the time shaking their head no at you one on one. That does not happen. But why does it have to happen here?

I have concern that maybe there are a number of changes that we should go through. As we know we have looked at television in the House, and what that has caused, watching the House at work. A major report that was put out in December 1989 said that television has undoubtedly had a dramatic effect on the proceedings in the House. The general decorum of members, their dress, as well as their behaviour have all been affected and in the opinion of most observers has improved by the introduction of television. It has also been argued, though, that television has contributed to some less than positive developments. The most common complaint is that television has led to the over-emphasis on Question Period. Individual members tend to play to the cameras and they grandstand in hopes of getting a 15-second clip on the evening news. This was talked to a bit earlier.

• (1400)

It says there are problems but it is the responsibility of the members of Parliament to correct this. This report goes on and recommends that it would pan this situation here, to my right, where we have members standing back and talking. It would take a broader view and it would show Canadians what all is going on in the House of Commons. The actions and the funny expressions and those things that tend to agitate would be on national TV and then the constituents at home would say "I saw you doing something that was offensive" or "I saw this group all standing at the back behind the curtains having a meeting and making a lot of noise, and I saw you there". I think that sort of thing then would come home. We are all then partly responsible for this situation, where it is not just TV focused on the Speaker.

Another thing seems to come forward from my constituents and others. We have had testimony in the House management committee of people saying it is not what is seen, it is just what is heard, I mean this rumbling and this noise that goes on that they cannot see. That concerns people.

They want to see and they do not like what they see, but they keep going back to see it. Also they are concerned about what they cannot see and hear that is going on here.

The House management committee of course is looking at TV, not only for committees. Maybe the TV coverage kind of Hansard type of reporting that goes on in here should be changed, and that may help. A little bit earlier the member for Broadview—Greenwood talked about these long preambles that tend to get into innuendo and tend to agitate. I guess what he was saying is that in a way we are having a little trouble disciplining ourselves. We get over-zealous. Maybe the Chair and the kind of rules that we have here will then help us all do that sort of thing. That is maybe a way that we have to go at this thing.

These are the areas that I think need to be examined. I think all of us should get together to do it. If we do not, we are going to tear this place apart and we are going to have this ever more negative attitude put upon all of us. Certainly we have got to do some very fundamental things and we all have got to get to work in doing it together so that it does happen. Maybe if we get the partisanship out of it, and I think we are all trying hard to do that, we can then decide whether the rules should be changed. If rules are there should we then have the Chair be more disciplined in enforcing those rules? Maybe we need some help. It was certainly indicated to me by a member opposite that sometimes we all need some help. In the heat of the moment, the pack mentality that develops. It probably means that we need some help from the Chair. I would hope that we will all work together at that sort of thing developing and I think that certainly we can do that.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the House today on something that is of very, very great concern to me. It is of very great concern to the government, as was noted in the proposals of Shaping Canada's Future Together where it says: "therefore the Government of Canada, in co-operation with all parties in the House of Commons, will explore ways and means to strengthen the representational and legislative capacities of individual members of Parliament".

Also it says it will do that so that we will move toward a less adversarial and less negative attitude, perception and/or reality in this House. It is an important part of the proposals put forward in this very important document.

I think all of us want to do it. Let us all get together in a collective, non-partisan and intelligent way to make this the right kind of place to show our constituents that we are doing the right kind of job for them.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to respond to a couple of comments by the hon. member.

It is sad. I do not think he understands what the Canadian public is saying. I do not think the women of this country have phoned his office as much as they phoned ours after a comment like this.

The question of decorum in the House was introduced after a meeting between the status of women minister and the status of women critics about sexist comments and slurs against women.

No one was referring to a pack mentality. No one was referring to the fact that there is a negative situation. People are perturbed, upset, annoyed and alarmed when listening to sexist comments in this House. Pretty well every single member of Parliament today got up and talked about decorum.

How many of them talked purely about sexist comments? If we have to keep referring you back to saying you do not understand, please listen to what the women in this House are saying. Listen to what the women in Canada are saying or there is no use and no sense in discussing or passing this motion. We have to keep reminding you that what you are saying has nothing to do with the subject we should be discussing today.

I wonder if the citizens' forum and rally groups would have called it a charade. The forum said that we were acting like unruly children. What if it had heard the comments from certain members on the government side of this House? I do not believe it is just emotions that we get caught up in during Question Period.

I have another word for those two members of Parliament. It has nothing to do with being caught up in emotion, believe me. Most of the women in Canada feel the same way. I would just like to ask if you think that we are right as women in this House of Commons when we say that you have to learn to understand what we are talking about. We are not talking about partisan bickering. We are not talking about teasing one another across the hall. We are talking about a serious issue that concerns every single woman in this country. Could I have the member's comments?

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond because certainly I thought I was noting those grave concerns. I certainly did.

I have my notes here that I looked down at while talking. I talked about sexism and racism. I am very concerned about that. I have four women: three daughters and my wife. We have lots of chats about this. Certainly I have a lot of feeling for that sort of thing.

If you were on the street talking to somebody and they asked you a question, they would stay there, look you in the eye and wait for the response. This place does this sort of thing.

I really have a problem with that. Certainly what I was trying to say is that the kind of sexist remarks that were made are somehow caused. I am not trying to offer any excuses. A lot of things are said, some of them are not racist or sexist but there are other things said which are certainly not as serious. What could be more serious than that?

• (1410)

However they are agitating and tend to embroil us in casting aspersions back and forth. People probably say to themselves after they get home: "Why did I do that, why did I do that?" Hopefully you know that I have very serious concerns and I agree with you.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure that I made my point clearly to the member earlier when I was talking about our preambles. I said that we may from time to time take a shot which might cast a bit of an aspersion on the government in general. I was trying to suggest that the reason I believe we tend to do that is because so often when we ask a straight question we do not get a straight answer. Does the hon. member not think that if we the government tended to give a a straight answer when we ask these questions that could possibly be the rebirth of some kind of basic trust in this place?

This process has to have an initiative on the government side first. In other words you are the people with the power. Your front bench, your cabinet really controls the agenda of this country, this House, committees, et cetera. Very few people realize that with respect to the backbenches of the government. I realize it is tough for a backbencher in the government to have input into the power structure of a government.

Would the hon. member not think it would be good advice for the backbenches of the government side to give some kind of counsel or advice to the cabinet of Canada to be a little bit more focused and a little bit more straight when it is being asked questions in this House.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I hear where the member is coming from, rather than saying what might be done or what might not be done. Canadians do not want us just to talk about it; they actually want to see it.

What we could suggest is that when the hon. member next has the opportunity to ask a question of the Minister of Labour or his parliamentary secretary and if I am here to take it, he could put the question without a lengthy preamble and with no innuendo and I would him a straight, factual, concise answer. We could demonstrate to the rest of the House how to do this.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks I would like to have unanimous consent of the House to divide my time into two 10-minute periods.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: That reflects the spirit of co-operation that we are all showing in this debate. Perhaps it is an indication of how the members participating in this debate feel about the way this House has been run. If I could just speak from my recent experience of becoming a member of the House, having come in with the class of 1988. My expectations of the House have not lived up to the reality. I spent years before I arrived in the House teaching at the University of Winnipeg subjects such as Parliament and constitutions and interest groups. Now I am living the reality of what I have been teaching.

One of the concerns political scientists have when they write their text books and teach students is that the reality of an institution must match its symbolism. When things get out of sync and the symbolism of an institution does not match what is really happening then people begin to lose trust in that institution.

For example, if you go back in history the monarch began to lose power because the advisors wanted to rule things themselves. Then people said if it is the advisers let us elect them and Parliament evolved and so forth.

Right now we have a situation where Canadians do not really believe that Parliament makes them powerful. They believe that Parliament in fact is destroying their country and that when they turn on the TV it reflects this. Our behaviour reflects the destruction of an institution that is valued and not the creation of a dream that is important to them.

There is not one of us who has not at some time taken a cheap shot at someone else standing up in the House, whether it is heard or not heard. There has not been one of us who has not been frustrated by a minister's answer. There is not a minister who has not stood up and said: "I cannot believe the question you are asking".

I think we all have to realize that is the way this House has performed. Partly it is the responsibility of TV because TV brought the reality that this House is different from the way they imagined to the people of Canada.

In the old days when they sent people like my predecessor, Stanley Knowles—the long time member of the House of Commons who sits at the table every day—off by train there were certain expectations they imagined him to perform. The media reported those expectations and that the relationship was healthy. With television people say that this House does not represent them. It does not represent them because if you look at it from a political science point of view the real functions of government do not take place here. They take place in minister's offices, they take place in committees, and they take place in press conferences. What is left here is a shell. The shell does not represent anything but the shadow of its old self.

Very few great debates take place here. Very few votes that are not predictable take place here. Very few revealing questions are asked here. When the reality is shifted elsewhere people on television are left with just the shell of Parliament's former self.

Therefore we have to begin as colleagues to see our way through this. How do we reorganize the House of Commons so that people see us working in a way that is responsible and reflects their desire to have a government functioning on their behalf? Perhaps we should begin to shift the coverage on television to the committees.

All of us have sat on good committees. For example, I think of the work of a committee that I sat on when I first became a member, Standing Committee on Disabled Persons and International Human Rights Committee. That was a fine example of a committee working in a non-partisan or multi-party fashion in which motions were discussed beforehand. All the time I sat on it there was not one vote. Everyone agreed beforehand on what to do. There was a spirit of collegiality. Whenever any member did make a partisan comment he or she usually got a little note from an interest group saying: "We prefer that you don't make those comments about your colleagues. We prefer that you work together. The life of disabled people is too difficult to hear partisan remarks being made about what is going on".

It was a lesson to me to try to find ways to work with colleagues. I stand in the House as someone who is concerned that we must begin, and this motion is a beginning. I hope that the government side takes seriously the amendments presented on racism and sexism because it is time we upgraded ourselves and begin to learn a little bit more about how language used in a previous generation is very offensive to people.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, who just spoke a few minutes ago, and I represent the younger side of the House. This really is a generational thing. The people who grew up with one way of doing things have to learn that there is a nation out there that is much different. The composition of the House does not reflect the nation and in some respects the values of the nation.

We have to learn how to treat each other. Other people have mentioned that there is no other organization that gets into serious meetings in which the members divvy themselves up and say: "All right, here we have a budget of $140 billion. Here we have a deficit". What corporation would then take its top 300 people and say: "All right, you sit on this side and you sit on that side and let's fight about how we are going to solve this problem?"

No one out there believes that is how to create a country. No one in here should believe that is the way to create a country. There is natural conflict. We want different things.

There are five parties represented here who have distinctly different notions of a country. We go to the people every three or four years and put those different ideas in front of them. We ask them for their consideration. We spend money, we advertise, and we try to convince people. When we come back to the House, those visions have to be blended with the reality that we have been asked by Canadians to work together and that there is a difference in this country about what to do or else we would not have different parties. There is a consensus that they want something done in common. I think we should all take that lesson. There is not one of us who does not go home on weekends and have people look us in the eye and ask what is this all about.

• (1420)

I can tell you that I was never embarrassed to be an academic, although academics are usually considered to be pretty flaky people. The comments made to me were done with at least a little bit of awe that I somehow got there by some rhyme or reason that should be respected. I used to think that in some respects being an academic was not exactly the highest status thing to be, but I can tell you, compared to being a member of Parliament, being an academic is a piece of cake. It is because the lack of respect that permeates, not only with the average viewer seeing us, but I think, interesting enough with the interest groups. One of the big changes in Canadian politics is the fact that interest groups think it is quite appropriate to call members of Parliament pigs. They think that just because they disagree with us, they have a right to say whatever they want. That also contributes to the debate.

Those people who seek to reform us on the outside should remember that there are people on all sides of this House who have the good will of a country at heart, who are willing to compete but are also willing co-operate, are willing to put forward a new face and are willing to try to reform their institutions. In return, we need people to support us.

In the motion, the government talks about decorum. I think we have to take this through on a daily basis, begin to work through the committee system and work through our caucuses to add decorum to the House. Old habits are said to die slowly, but the institutions of Canada are also very much at stake. When the functioning of this House begins to resemble the country and begins to function as a reflection of the country's interest, people regain faith that when they send us to Ottawa that we are doing something worth-while. When they see us on the weekend they will be proud of us. When it comes to an election, they will know the bitter fights are done in a context of the good will of the country.

In that spirit, I think the government should be thanked for putting this on the table. The opposition parties should be thanked for putting forward some very worth-while amendments. The House should seek to work together by supporting this motion.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to address this particular question in the House and I shall refer to it as appropriate decorum, which means, as I define it, use of sensitive language and certainly not inappropriate gestures when one is using body language to communicate a particular point.

I called some people today once I knew I would be able to address the question. I was able to reach nine individuals, constituents of mine, and asked them how they felt about this. The first reaction was: "Thank goodness it is happening. It is about time". There was a feeling that this is something that should have occurred sometime ago.

I said: "What would you advise me to do in order to attempt to advance this debate and these questions?" They said: "Clean it up. There is no excuse for this kind of silliness, this kind of insensitivity, this kind of abusiveness". They said: "There must absolutely be less bickering. There needs to be more civility. Thank goodness you have made a beginning". They thought of it as a beginning only because we could clean it up here inside, but it must go beyond. It must go to the committee work, it must go in our relationships with each other as we have to deal with each other on some very important questions.

When I asked these individuals whom I contacted, men and women: "What is it that offends you the most?", they referred to the sexist language, the racist comments and the very abusive gestures.

I want to go on record to indicate in the strongest possible terms that I condemn all types of sexist language, all types of racial expressions and all insensitive gestures because what do they do, they simply bring out the worst in people, the worst in men and women as opposed to the best. It permits us to debase ourselves. It does not call upon us to give that which is best of every human being. It needs to be condemned, not only in this House, but wherever it happens.

Why does it happen? Clearly, on some occasions people do lose their tempers and they forget what it is they ought to do, how they ought to react. Also it is an expression of anger and it is their only way to express that anger. Also in some cases, it is very bad manners. In some instances as well, it is not only bad manners, it is certainly a reflection upon the way they were raised, the way they were educated, they way in which they were socialized and the fact that they have not kept up with the times, that they are still back there, while we should be up here looking forward.

[Translation]

I would also like to make an important distinction that does not seem to have been made today, and I am referring to the difference between inappropriate language and gestures and what I would call a certain commitment and passion about what we feel or want to say, which is called partisanship. I can be partisan—I am aware of that and I think I am from time to time—but I don't have to use inappropriate language or gestures in the process. There is a distinction to be made. I think the impression has been given, because we have not been vigilant enough, that there was a connection between the two. Well, these are two things that can and must be separated. We must separate them. We have no choice.

Partisanship can be used—when I am in a position to do so, of course—to shed a more favourable light on my party and to try and promote its values, programs and objectives. It can also be used to emphasize, from time to time, what other parties are doing wrong, or to demonstrate the superiority of my own political group. However, there is a major distinction between partisanship and language and gestures that are distasteful.

Mr. Speaker, the question arises why we are considering this particular motion now: I have been in the House for nearly three years, and during that time I have noticed gestures and heard terms and phrases that have been censured since time immemorial. It is mainly because of two recent incidents: the sexist and outrageous language used by one government member, and the racist term used by another government member, and all this in the past month. And I am sure that my own constituents and those of my colleagues are very upset.

When these incidents occurred, I received some telephone calls here in Ottawa, from people who told me: What is going to happen to those people because of what they did? If I am not mistaken, nothing did happen. They were probably censured by their colleagues. Something was said about it here in the House, and they were reprimanded. But did they lose their jobs? Were they expelled from the House for a number of days or weeks or months? No! And now people are wondering why. They want to know how to show their disapproval of this kind of behaviour.

[English]

When the member for Halifax was addressing this question, I asked: "Why do you think this is happening right now?" She hesitated for a moment and then she finally said: "I hate to say it, but I think sexist language often reflects the deep anger that people hold toward women and that they do not understand why". I reflected upon that and I suspect there is a great deal of truth in what was said.

When she responded to why there were racist slurs or expressions toward another individual, her explanation was very, very similar. I would like to be able to reject that, but I cannot do so in good conscience. I know that in some instances that is not the case, but I fear that in too many instances that is in fact so.

I also asked the member for Halifax what could be done to counteract this.

• (1430)

Of course, there were a number of measures not only proposed by her but by others. For example, we need to in fact deal with it rapidly, sternly, and we need to develop an attitude that this kind of behaviour is totally, totally unacceptable.

The people who do that will be reprimanded severely not only by their party but by the House itself. We need to educate people. We need to point out what errors are made. We need to be patient at times, but we also need to be very firm when such occasions demand it.

The one question that I asked her, she admitted to me later on, my hon. colleague from Halifax, why was this behaviour defended by members of that same party. I could not understand that. I remember being a member of the Beaudoin—Edwards constitutional committee where a member of government, I do not know what it is that caught that particular member that day, unleashed a tirade against a particular political leader. Immediately, without hesitation, the co-chair reprimanded that individual and dissociated himself from those remarks.

The same could have been done here. You do not defend that kind of inappropriate behaviour. Why does this behaviour happen primarily in the House? We see each other in the corridors. We laugh, we tease, we cajole. Why, why? There is no doubt that it is the 15 second clip that we are looking for.

What an example for youth. I am the father of three daughters who ask me: Why do I bother working in this place if I am going to be treated like that, treat others like that or perhaps be in a position where I am seen to be exhibiting that kind of behaviour. They are amazed.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood mentioned a particularly important point. We sometimes reflect the mood of the people out there who are angry because of the high unemployment, the uncertainty of the future, the constitutional instability, the loss of jobs and the grief that they are suffering because they do not know whether or not the country will continue.

I think we need to exhibit that, but at the same time there are appropriate ways to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked more time to explore certain aspects, but I realize my 10 minutes are up. Thank you.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to sit here in the House and listen to my colleague from Winnipeg in his comments on the motion put forward before us here today.

I think his viewpoints were probably very closely reflected to mine and the action and the appropriateness of this House and how we should all hopefully respond to any comments that are so directed either to us or we are directing against someone.

I would like to ask this member if there was something that we could do immediately, if there is something that we could do today in this House, what would be the first thing that he would do?

Mr. Duhamel: I thank my colleague for her question.

If I were granted one wish today, I would say that the moment that there is inappropriate language, insensitive gestures, sexist and racial slurs that are used, that the whole House stand and condemn that member and that member not return to the House until we are satisfied with that type of behaviour would not recur.

I would also mount an educational program to sensitize people to what is happening. Sometimes there is a lack of sensitivity and understanding that prevents people from behaving appropriately. I think we need to take that in our own hands. We need to deal with it for the young people of the nation and for all Canadians at times.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on an outstanding speech.

I would like a further explanation in his quotation of "there is anger in the people". Would he be so kind as to expound on that phrase that he used.

Mr. Duhamel Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond. Thank you for the question.

The distinction I wanted to make is that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood I think had made an extremely insightful point, that we are reflecting this anger, this frustration, this grief that has been suffered by Canadians. My point was that I think it is appropriate and necessary and that is what we are here for, to represent what we feel and what we hear out there. We have to do it in an appropriate kind of way. When I mentioned this anger I gave a few examples: the loss of jobs, high unemployment, the big bonuses. That is an affront to people. They get angry. They get angry that people receive bonuses, sometimes several times the size of ordinary salaries. Talking about the strikes and the violence that people see makes them very uncomfortable. The excessive taxation gets them so angry because they do not see themselves going forward, but going backward.

Reductions of services. We have talked about VIA Rail and CN. We talked about the postal services again today and someone receiving a bonus in excess of $100,000 and postal service is being cut in my constituency as well as in others.

We talk about the double standard in pensions. I mentioned that double standard in pensions, our own pensions and others. We talked about taxation, insensitive, contradictory and unfair taxation. If I was to raise my child at home and someone else were to go out and work and get receipted day care, they would get income tax deductions. Married and unmarried couples with the same circumstances are taxed differently.

All of that gets people angry and frustrated. They see no hope for the future. We are having serious difficulties in the country; the fishermen without fish in the Atlantic provinces, western Canadians unable to sell their product and bankruptcies in Ontario. I could go on, but I think I have given an indication of how I feel and what I think is making people angry and very frustrated and disappointed with the whole process.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we are talking in this House today about a bill which was provoked by comments made in this House by two members.

In the past there have been comments, terrible, offensive, that have been made by other members. It is too bad that a bill was provoked and has to be brought forward to deal with this type of issue.

I wonder whether through legislation dealing with the rules of conduct in this House we can really deal with the underlying causes of what is happening.

I am going to be very personal. A lot of discrimination is based on just sheer ignorance. A lot of this ignorance is generational. It was only 45 years ago that we had signs in Toronto saying: "No Jews or dogs allowed in parks". It was only in the 1950s that the Supreme Court of the United States said that blacks could ride on buses.

In the United States we still do not have an equal rights amendment. In Canada today we get very upset when people bring different customs to Canada from foreign lands. Be they simple customs of dress based on religion, people get upset because they cannot cope with these differences.

The history of our country has been one of discrimination; discrimination against our aboriginal peoples when we came here,. many fights and bitterness based on language, religion. We have not come a long way in learning to understand one another.

In a world that is becoming increasingly smaller, where we are closer through communications, through transport and travel, to people of diverse backgrounds, we have not yet learned that the diversity or the differences are not a source of challenge or confrontation, but can be a source or richness through our intellectual, cultural and to our spiritual beings.

• (1440)

Discrimination against women, is nothing new to our culture. In other cultures we have seen examples of it which are rampant. In some other cultures there is far less discrimination, less equality. In some there is more.

In my own personal case, I believe that was a certain generation of Canadians who grew up with the belief that a woman's place was in the home, and that was probably her only place, that she did not have to be involved in important decisions, involved in financed, involved in earning a living, involved in voting, involved in politics. You see part of the hangover of that today. There are so few women actually in this House of Commons. We are getting better. We are improving. We are working at it. We are trying to introduce positive measures to ensure that women are truly fully equal partners in the Canadian scene.

In terms of incomes, women are still at about 61 or 62 per cent of their male counterparts in Canada.

We have an awfully long way to go. We should look at our record and how we have treated so many people who are different from us, different from the male white majority. We are no longer the majority, which is probably good. We have to look at the record of discrimination, and I say it is not based on malevolence, it is based totally on ignorance.

I know that the younger generations that have come along have had a better opportunity by going to school, for example, where you are in an engineering class and maybe 50 per cent of the class is women. Now, that is a positive experience, and it is a learning experience for any male, and it is a better experience than when they went through engineering and there was not one woman in the class. I am not that old, but I went through a class where there was only one woman in our class at law school. That has changed dramatically.

Things are getting better. I guess the point I am trying to make is that no matter what we legislate here, it is not going to do much. Maybe it will be a small portion of educating ourselves, the 295 people selected by Canadians to represent their wishes in the highest court of the land. I mean, isn't it a shame that we have had to come to this, that we have had to admit that ignorance abides so much among us that we have to pass laws saying "Thou shall not be sexist, thou shall not be racist, thou shall not discriminate". My God, that is part of what we should all be about.

To me to have to admit that we are bringing in laws to deal with what should be the fundamental essence of being a human being in Canada, that has to be legislated or has to codified, is a sad day. I hope that through the efforts that are being made, maybe we as representatives of the people can be more conscious of just how ignorant we have been and how badly we as a body have served Canadians that we would allow these attitudes to be coming forth from this highest chamber.

Maybe one can explain it on the basis that older people were brought up differently, that the ethos was different when they were raised in Canada, that they were raised under different times when the role of women was different; when race was not an issue that people could bring forth in the way it has been, when race was even in law a basis for discriminating against certain members of our society. Those times have changed. The laws have changed. We have a charter of rights. I can say we have a charter of rights in Canada and therefore we do not need this type of law. They have a charter of rights in the United States. It took them over a century to recognize that blacks are people, even under that bill of rights. It is no panacea.

In a time when the economy is shrinking and people are becoming fearful, less confident of their own futures, with more people fighting for a smaller pie, people are genuinely worried about where we are going and their own futures in Canada. Maybe it is natural that people will try to step on the backs of other people or other groups in order to feel more secure themselves. This is a human reaction that takes place in many cases. We know it is not the solution because we know none of us can get ahead by stepping on the backs of anyone else.

We have to work harder in these tough times. When people see the cause for their own uncertainty, when they see that and perceive it to be lying with other people who may be getting ahead of them, people are going to tend to become less magnanimous in their view about the role of other people. This is, of course, what we must fight against.

Unless we are prepared to recognize the true and full worth on an equal basis of every person in our society, our diverse society, there is no discrimination based on sex, language, religion, country of origin, creed, unless we are prepared to recognize the full potential of every one of these people, we are not going to climb out of the problems that we face. Economically unless every one of these individuals is a full player, with full opportunity in our economy, we are not going to be competitive on a global basis. We do not want peons and servants. We want co-workers and partners if we are going to get ahead.

Getting back to what we have heard in this House that has provoked this legislation, the two individuals who made the comments either immediately realized themselves that they were wrong, or maybe they were told by their leaders that they were wrong and they apologized. That was the only action taken.

Maybe apologies are sufficient. Maybe the shame that these individuals brought upon themselves, not for the harm they did to two people on this side of the House, but for the harm they brought to all parliamentarians, and the shame they put us all in because we belong to a body. Would it even be perceived that this type of action was either funny or humorous or acceptable.

We are all diminished by what has happened. I would hope that we could all use this as an opportunity to renew our own sense of what it is to be a human being, to be a human being in a country which in law respects equality, but which so often in practice has fallen far short of that mark. I think it is an opportunity to look at those who may be different than the majority of us in this House who ask why there are not more of the others here. Are their voices being represented adequately here? Are we doing everything possible, in our own hearts and souls, to recognize the true worth of those in Canada who are different from the majority of us here in this House?

• (1450)

Maybe our record is not at the top of the list of Amnesty International in terms of worst performance, but we have a tradition much longer than other countries. We have had an economy. We have had the infusion of people from so many countries who left their own countries because of various values that we do not see expressed in full measure here in Canada. They did not have equality of opportunity because of religion, politics and sex. They came to the new world.

In many ways our nation benefited from the abuses of other countries because we got people who had the guts to leave the old ways and to find new equalities and opportunities in our country. But we have fallen far short.

Perhaps, more important than anything else, this bill can serve as a reminder to us that we have not achieved the objectives that we have placed in our laws, to which we have all paid lip service but which have not been there in our hearts.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to my colleague intently. I think all of us appreciate the comments that he has made and the view of his country that that reflects. I think it is a view of the country and a concern about some things that are happening in this country that many Canadians share.

He would be aware, however, that no matter how salutary this motion is it has precious little to do with the events to which he referred. As a matter of fact, perhaps the most significant aspect about this resolution is that it pays no attention whatever to the sexist remarks and the racist remarks to which he referred.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, you may recall that when the Prime Minister responded to our leader in respect to the imposition of particular sanctions for sexist or racist remarks, one got a clear indication that the Prime Minister did not seem to understand the significant difference between general bad behaviour and individual insults and what was represented by the sexist remarks and racist remarks to which we are now referring.

Insults are directed at individuals and individuals are hurt. Those are not appropriate to the decorum of the House. But I wonder if my hon. colleague would agree with me that it is tragic that the difference between individual insults and class oriented insults or group insults or deprecatory remarks is much more substantial in their significance to this House because this House represents Canada. We have now come to accept Canada as a diverse nation made up of different groups of men and women of different colours, different national origins, different sexual orientation and different languages. When any of those groups are insulted in this place, we are insulting the very fabric of this nation. It does damage to the symbolism of this House and its substantive function in this nation.

I wonder if my colleague agrees with that analysis. I also wonder whether my colleague agrees with the analysis that is applicable to the general issue of the tenure of this place and its alleged lack of decorum. When I came into this House, in that spot over there, and stood up for the first time to ask a question I was in awe. I had been chosen in a nation which had shown that it had become a very different nation by choosing me. This nation told me that by being elected by my constituents I could come here and change things and influence what the government has done and would do. I have come here for seven years, day after day. I have seen that there is no real impact on what this government does. When I perceive and have to explain to my constituents that I have no more power than they have to change this government, is it any wonder that the frustration loose in the land should be reflected here?

I wonder if my hon. colleague in respect to that analysis agrees with me that one way of improving the decorum of this place is to make it a far more democratic institution than it has been since this government has been in office.

Mr. Peterson: My hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, from Windsor—St. Clair has expressed a number of very important ideas. It would be very nice if when 80 per cent of Canadians, or more, spoke out against the GST that this House could have in some way reflected that view of Canadians.

It would have been very nice if when most Canadians disapproved of the economic policies of this government, which created a made-in-Canada recession, we could have reversed those policies so that we did not have the needless job losses and the hurt to individuals, a hurt which was reflected in the frustration we members feel.

My friend talks about two types of wrongs in this House. Wrongs against individual members go with the job. We are going to be insulted at times even by members of our own families. As members, we expect to be insulted from across the floor. Maybe insult is not the right word. We expect to have strong disagreements. I hope it would be on that basis, not on the basis of personality.

My good friend is quite right when he says that insults against groups are not insults against individuals in this House. There are insults against key core components and groups of Canadians. You cannot tell me what a Canadian is without mentioning first of all that we are a tremendously diverse, different group of people. There is no necessarily common thread when you look at language, sex, religion, culture, background, ethnic origin. Every one of us is a minority.

Probably the most significantly Canadian group are Canada's aboriginal peoples. They are different as well.

The hon. member was the subject of an insult, not against him personally, I agree. It was an insult, a racist comment that struck many Canadians through him, not just those who are black but Canadians of every colour. I would hope that Canadians who are white would feel it was a slap as well at them. After all we are a multi-coloured, multi-racial country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

JUSTICE

CONVICTION OF DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should recognize the serious possibility that a miscarriage of justice has resulted in the murder conviction of David Milgaard and order a new trial in the case.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on January 31, 1969 it was minus 42 degrees in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan that morning. That morning, very early, Gail Miller, a 20-year old nursing assistant, got up and got ready for work. She left her rooming house at about 7 a.m. Her bus stop was about a block and a half away. Between her home and her bus stop she was attacked, set upon, stabbed repeatedly in the back and the chest, and was sexually assaulted. She died tragically within 30 minutes of leaving her home. Her body was found about an hour later, just before dawn on that very cold and chilly Saskatoon winter morning.

The body was found in a snowy back alley between her rooming house and the bus stop. That same morning, three young people—and I will call them in the terms of the late sixties, three young hippies, basically teenagers—came from Regina. Their names were Nicol John, Ron Wilson and David Milgaard. Milgaard was 16 years old at the time.

The three young people came by car overnight from Regina. They arrived in Saskatoon in the early morning hours. They were looking for the home of Albert Shorty Cadrain. Albert Cadrain was also a teenager. They subsequently found the home of Cadrain. They picked up Cadrain and they left Saskatoon with him later that day, about noon, on the way to Edmonton.

Later the Crown charged David Milgaard, one of those young people, with murder. In 1991 Milgaard is one of Canada's longest serving prisoners. He spent most of what was really the most vital part of his life in prison. The key witnesses against Milgaard were Nicol John and Ron Wilson, the two people in the car. I think everybody would agree that they gave inconsistent testimony in the beginning, in the middle of this story, at the end of the story, and even today. But I will get back to that.

Their evidence at the time of the trial was that the three arrived in Saskatoon around 6.30 a.m. on N Avenue or O Avenue. That is in Saskatoon. They noticed a young woman in a black coat and they asked for directions. They continued to drive to the end of the block. They tried to turn but the car got stuck. Canadians in the west know what it is like on those cold winter mornings and evenings where cars can often get stuck. The car got stuck and the two boys got out to push the car, unsuccessfully. They could not get it out so they went off in different directions for help.

Wilson was away from the car for about five minutes. He returned, he said, to find Nicol John, the young woman, hysterical. Milgaard was away for about 10 minutes. The car became unstuck. They got the car moving and they drove to the Traveleer Hotel in Saskatoon where David Milgaard got out of the car, went into the hotel and asked for directions. The motel manager, one Rasmussen, said that Milgaard was perfectly normal except that he was wearing only socks on his feet, no boots. He was polite, did not seem to have any blood or wetness on his clothes, and he thanked the motel manager for giving him, Milgaard, a map.

The three youths then set out for the Cadrain home. They got stuck again and a couple called the Danchuks helped them, called a tow truck, and invited the kids into their home. At this time Milgaard was polite and his clothes were not wet according to the Danchuks, who are independent witnesses.

Finally the young people arrived in the Cadrain home one and a half blocks away from where the body of Gail Miller was found. Wilson, Cadrain, Nicol John and David Milgaard, four teenagers, got in the car and left for Edmonton—in the language of the 1960s—"in search of dope, in search of drugs".

One month later Cadrain was picked up on another matter and jailed for vagrancy. When questioned about Milgaard he said that he saw blood on Milgaard's clothes on the day in question.

Wilson and John were interviewed. Wilson was in jail for theft and told that he was a suspect. After a lot of pressure he finally said that he saw blood on Milgaard's clothing and that Milgaard had a paring knife in the car.

Nicol John was in jail. At first she said nothing. Then finally she made a statement to the police on May 24, 1969. She was in jail for the whole night. At the end of that evening she finally told police that Milgaard had left the car, tried to snatch the purse from the woman, and stabbed the woman who was in front of the car.

There was forensic evidence in the case. I will not get into all the forensic evidence. It is a little long and it gets very detailed. It deals with blood samples, pubic hair and semen samples.

I will deal with it in a moment, as it was set out in a new paper on the Milgaard case just recently released in the past few weeks by Neil Boyd, Professor of the School of Criminology at Simon Fraser University, and Kim Rossmo, a graduate student at that same university. They point out that the forensic evidence could go either way. In fact the forensic doctor says that if he had to give the evidence again that evidence would point not to the guilt but to the innocence of Milgaard.

The Crown's case had problems. The Crown's case went to a jury and after 11 hours the jury convicted Milgaard of murder.

I just want to deal with some of the problems we now have with the case. As Professor Boyd says in his paper: "But some important questions emerged from the trial transcript and defence counsel noted at trial the timing that would make this crime possible is extremely tight. Within no more than 10 minutes of having stabbed and raped Gail Miller, David Milgaard is seen by hotel manager Rasmussen over a mile from the site of the murder, relaxed, polite and wearing only socks on his feet. Within no more than 30 minutes of having killed Gail Miller, David Milgaard is seen by Walter and Melissa Danchuk. He is said to be chatty and polite".

There are further problems with the case. A decade after the case there have been some recent changes.

The first one is with respect to Albert Cadrain, Shorty Cadrain, who said he saw blood on Milgaard's clothing. In fact, as Mr. Cadrain's brother Dennis had said recently: "Albert was picked up by the police, questioned 15 to 20 times. There was constant pressure, threats and bullying and he developed stomach ulcers and became very paranoid. He was committed to the psychiatric ward at University Hospital in Saskatoon, approximately a year after the trial". His brother further said that Cadrain is: "prone to exaggeration". He suffered from schizophrenia before the murder and afterward.

More importantly the main witness, Mr. Wilson, has recanted his evidence. On page 23 of the Boyd report Ron Wilson says that his evidence was wrong, that he did not see what he told the police he saw. Professor Boyd says at page 23, and I quote:

> The minister's conclusion that Ron Wilson's recantation is simply not credible is difficult to support. Wilson's reasons for lying now are not easy defined. He risks a perjury charge related to his statements at trial, and there is no evidence or suspicion that he has received any financial benefit from his recantation. He seems, rather, to have suffered both personally and financially since his statement to the investigator, Paul Henderson.

• (1510)

The case has received a great deal of public interest, especially because of the fact that 10 years later we have suddenly realized that in the same area of Saskatoon there was a serial rapist loose right on the scene. His name was Larry Fisher and he was involved in—and I have the sexual assaults here in Saskatoon—seven assaults, including North Battleford and Winnipeg assaults. In fact, according to Professor Boyd, the psychological and graphic profile of the sex offenders in these cases fits one Larry Fisher who is serving time in jail now and not David Milgaard.

I want to summarize Professor Boyd's conclusion:

> There is virtually no case against David Milgaard. Only Albert Cadrain still believes that he saw blood on David Milgaard. Albert Cadrain also believes that David Milgaard will try to kill him if he gets out of jail. Ron Wilson now says that he lied at the trial, and Nicol John doesn't want to speak about the case. The forensic evidence tends to exclude David Milgaard.

The case has been written about recently. I leave this for the House and the minister. The Toronto Star said in an editorial on August 11, 1991 entitled "Will justice prevail in Milgaard's case": "Nor can Justice Minister Campbell ignore the disturbing signs that Saskatoon police officers quickly decided that Milgaard committed the crime and then rejected any evidence that didn't fit in with their theory".

In the August 16, 1991 Saskatoon Star Phoenix there was an editorial saying that there should be a review of the case. In The Toronto Star on August 22, 1991 there was an article headed "Troubling parallels in Marshall–Milgaard cases". It says:

> In the Marshall case Nova Scotia police used Pratico's new statement against Marshall to get supporting testimony from 14–year old Maynard Chant, saying that he had seen Marshall commit the murder. Chant's about–face was like that of John and Wilson in the Milgaard case. They originally gave statements removing Milgaard from the scene of the crime, then eventually conformed to Cadrain's version of the truth. Wilson has since sworn a statement to say "I was manipulated into lying against him (Milgaard). I was 17 years old and very frightened because I felt that the police were trying to pin the murder on me".

In each case, in the Marshall case and in the Milgaard case, young witnesses changed their key testimony from that of the trial.

The Winnipeg Free Press has been writing about this case as well. I will quote from a commentary in The Globe and Mail on Friday, October 11 where Peter McWilliams, a noted lawyer, writes: "It is time to let David Milgaard go". He points to the factual evidence that was not there at the trial which shows that the serial rapist who was afoot was at least as good a suspect, if not a better one, than Milgaard. The defence did not have that evidence and could not introduce it at the time of the trial. Mr. McWilliams also mentions that: "The Crown used the statement of Nicol John to cross–examine Nicol John". She never gave that evidence in trial but the jury knew while she was on drugs she seemed to see something happen in front of the car, a stabbing.

I want to conclude by saying that if you can accept any one of the following, you can find David Milgaard innocent. If you accept Mr. Wilson's testimony then I believe a jury would find David Milgaard innocent. If you accept the independent witnesses' testimony about the fact that there was no blood on Milgaard and the demeanour of Milgaard, you could in fact find David Milgaard innocent.

The forensic evidence which played an important role in the trials if anything excludes Milgaard. It does not include Milgaard. Indeed this view is now agreed to by the expert who said he would testify differently at the trial if it were held today.

Fourth, you can find David Milgaard innocent if you accept the clear evidence suggesting Larry Fisher, the serial rapist, was a far better suspect than Milgaard and that Milgaard never had access to the evidence to link Fisher to the crime.

There was evidence that the material link to Fisher was found near the crime. There was evidence that Fisher lived near the victim. There was evidence that Fisher acted strangely when confronted by his wife that morning of the rape.

There is similar factual evidence with other confirmed rapes. We could compare the kind of character that Fisher was and compare him to David Milgaard who was a 16–year old hippie kid who had no previous record of violence, as far as I know. You can find David Milgaard innocent if you accept that Albert Cadrain showed evidence of schizophrenia before and after the trial. His evidence that he saw blood on the shirt but not on the sweater of Milgaard is simply not credible.

Finally there is no direct physical evidence that David Milgaard was on the scene of the crime. The evidence putting him there is filled with contradiction. It was a result of young witnesses who progressively changed their story. I am not blaming the police. There was pressure on the police to solve the case.

Clearly they were young, unreliable and vulnerable. This thing builds momentum because the police do not want to go back and say: "Maybe a mistake was made".

What are the options? My background is as a Crown Attorney in British Columbia for the city of Vancouver and as a defence council. I appreciate this evidence and I am deeply worried that this great justice system that I think we have may have done an injustice here. That is why the minister has a number of options.

The first option is to order a new trial. I realize it will not be easy but it is a possibility. Second, she could refer this to the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal for review. The problem is Mr. Milgaard's original defence lawyer is on that court. Third, she could refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada for review or she could grant David Milgaard a free pardon which would make him clear of all guilt.

I know I have to conclude. I want to say one other thing before I conclude and I hope the House will give me time to just wind up. It is very important that in the Boyd report Professor Boyd mentions what was recommended by the Marshall commission.

Let me just quote: "In 1989, a royal commission on the Donald Marshall prosecution concluded that section 6(9)(e)," that is a review power by the minister should be replaced by an independent review mechanism. "We recommend that this review body have investigative power so it may complete and have full access to any and all documents, material required in any particular case and to have powers so witnesses can be compelled to provide information."

We cannot have the same people who prosecuted do an investigation to determine the possibility of a miscarriage of justice because it goes against their own interests. That is what the royal commission was saying in the Marshall inquiry. The Milgaard case is a perfect example.

This apparent miscarriage of justice has taken the best years of life away from David Milgaard. I believe it is time for the minister to rise above the bureaucratic inertia and show some real courage and show what can be great about our system. In Britain, the accused Irish group was subsequently given a new trial and the charge was dismissed. People said that was a great mistake, that the IRA people were railroaded into guilt when they were in fact innocent and it was a great tragedy of the British system. To me, it was the great genius of the system. The system had enough guts and enough courage and enough justice to go back and say: "We made a mistake".

I say to this House there is the evidence that I can see. I invite the minister to put the McIntyre report before the public and any other evidence she has. But the evidence looks to me, and I think to the the members of this House, that a miscarriage of justice has been done here. This man is still serving time. Surely the minister should refer it for a new trial or take a new look at this case. I urge her and plead with her to do that.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam and his motion before the House this Friday afternoon. I can tell this House it is very much colder in in Stony Mountain, Manitoba, at this very moment. While we are basking in some 18 degrees of warmth here in the nation's capital, it is quite cold at home with quite a bit of snow on the ground.

I would like to also tell this House that for many days, weeks, months and years David Milgaard has been incarcerated at the Stony Mountain Penitentiary in my constituency, not 15 miles from where I live. I suspect he would be watching with interest this particular debate in the House of Commons presented by the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

This is indeed a very serious motion. It deals with a person, a human being, his life, his past, his 21 years, I believe, in prison as a result of a conviction of murder. I can also say that I had the opportunity to meet with Mr. Milgaard personally almost a year and a half ago when his case was being brought into some prominence and being discussed by not only lawyers, but being reviewed by his family members. I know members of this House know and have talked to Mr. Milgaard's mother. She personally called me yesterday. Among the members of Mr. Milgaard's family is a great deal of hope that our Department of Justice, our Minister of Justice and, as a result of even a visit with our Prime Minister, this case would be reviewed.

Unlike my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam, I do not have a lawyer's legal background. I am not going to state the case as my colleague just has, as if he were instructing the jury, this House being the jury and all those listening to the House of Commons. I cannot say how they should view this case as a final summation. I cannot, like my colleague, say everything I have heard is absolutely 100 per cent correct. I certainly was not there. I can only go by the different things I have heard from individuals.

After 21 years, he still proclaims his innocence after being in a penitentiary and different jails in this country, notwithstanding what that must do to the human spirit, mind and soul. In fact, one does have to wonder, and I think all of us in this House will agree, that that alone would make any one of us consider whether there was, as suggested, a miscarriage of justice. I wrote the Minister of Justice beginning back on April 4, 1990. Later, there were two subsequent letters. There has been an unprecedented amount of media coverage of this particular case. Many of us, including my colleague from Winnipeg, have been quoted on statements we made with respect to the Milgaard case. We have been quoted because we have taken an interest. We are elected members of Parliament and we have to represent all Canadians, albeit the ones in Stony Mountain do not have a right to vote. I deem that still as an area that I represent. Upon any request I have for a meeting, whether it is with penitentiary management, the guard union or the prisoners' union, I have made myself available to them.

I do not know that I can draw the same conclusions, but I will say one thing with respect to this case. There appears to have been so much additional evidence since the original trial, so many more people coming forward providing a new slant toward this case, that I genuinely support the member's motion that the minister review this. The people of Canada should be provided with additional evidence that either it warrants a new trial or that the most intellectual people and people in positions of power, meaning perhaps former Supreme Court Justices who have all the evidence before them, can recommend that this particular issue of David Milgaard be revisited.

What the outcome of that would be I cannot say. Clearly we have another case which now warrants a new review by the minister as was put forward in this motion. If the answer to that by the minister is no, then I would hope that at the very least the evidence of why the case could not come back to trial would also be given. In other words, I do not think the public of Canada can accept just a plain no in respect to the Milgaard situation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have as much time as my colleague who moved this motion, but I sincerely believe that there is no one in the human race who is without fault, who has not made mistakes, whether it is us as members of Parliament, whether it is those who are presently serving and have served time for their sins and misdeeds to society. There are those who may pass judgment, such as lawyers, judges, people who have sworn testimony who may have made errors, or misled, and caused what is now considered by some to be a total miscarriage of justice. I alone, like many in this House, would not want to be sitting in that position.

Our Minister of Justice probably finds herself dealing with one of the most difficult decisions of her political career as a minister. I trust that she is viewing this particular exercise in the House as one of very important consideration in her judgment and that she will seek the best of council in reviewing this case. I would very much want to let everyone know that I support the motion by my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam.

• (1530)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am happy I was able to alter my plans to be here today to participate in this most important debate.

A man's freedom is on the line. Moreover David Milgaard's life is on the line. That is, what is left of it.

Our justice system has snatched away more than 20 years of life from David Milgaard. Those are years from the prime of his life and they cannot be given back to him but a wrong can be corrected. Our justice system can recognize its mistakes. Give David Milgaard his freedom. Let him go. He has suffered enough. The system has had its pound of flesh. Are his jailers so callous and so brutal that nothing short of death itself or a grovelling confession to a murder he did not commit will satisfy them?

In the short time available to me I want to explain why David Milgaard should be set free and should be granted a hearing so that the courts may re-decide this case. I am confident that if he can gain a new trial the Crown will fail to sustain its original conviction.

This was a botched case from the very first day. It was botched by nearly everyone who came in contact with it in those fateful days of the late 1960s. There were no heroes back then, not in this case. There was the over-zealous Saskatoon police under pressure to nab someone, anyone, after a series of brutal crimes in the city of Saskatoon. There was a questionable defence strategy which failed to tie the Gail Miller murder to other similar vicious assaults in Saskatoon around the very same time.

The Crown got a conviction all right. It got it on what is now discredited forensic evidence and on testimony from shabby, unreliable witnesses who claimed they were coerced by police. Even the judge may not have instructed the jury well enough.

What about the forensic evidence? Four days after nurse Gail Miller was stabbed more than a dozen times and left to die in snow on a cold Saskatoon morning in 1969 semen was found near the murder scene. Analysis showed it came from what is called a type a secretor. There is strong evidence that David Milgaard is a non-secretor. The jury was told that the sample of semen found was contaminated by blood, David Milgaard's blood. That was the Crown's theory.

Forensic experts have since seriously questioned that theory. It is now believed that the jury was not properly instructed on how to interpret the forensic evidence. There is an interpretation of the evidence that in effect says David Milgaard was not the murderer, but the jury was not told that.

What about the Crown witnesses? What a lovely bunch of coconuts. Professor Neil Boyd of Simon Fraser University and his associate D. Kim Rossmo, a Ph.D candidate at Simon Fraser, have written an excellent report on the Milgaard case. They say this about the friends of Milgaard who testified against him: "Ron Wilson, a witness who has since recanted, sketches a picture of disenfranchized street youth in 1969 on the fringes of the fledgling hippie culture and on the edge of a criminal lifestyle. They were all involved in using illegal drugs".

Ron Wilson was questioned by police for two months. He did not have to testify against Milgaard but as Boyd and Rossmo put it: "Implicating Milgaard was the easiest way to remove himself from a persistently stressful situation".

In an interview last year Wilson is quoted as saying: "I just wanted to get the hell out of there and whatever happened happened". The rest of the witnesses were no better.

Nicol John, in a statement to police, said: "Milgaard tried to snatch the purse from a woman and then stabbed her repeatedly". She said: "The knife was in his right hand". Milgaard is left-handed.

At the trial itself Nicol John changed her story and said she could not remember anything about Milgaard stabbing the women. There are other problems with John's statements.

There was another Crown witness, Albert Cadrain, who may have experienced paranoia while under intense police pressure.

Commenting on this experience with police Cadrain said last year: "They asked me the same questions repeatedly. This went on for months. They put me through hell and mental torture".

Two other witnesses made damaging statements against David Milgaard. Craig Melnick and George Lapchuk testified in a Regina motel room about three months after the murder that Milgaard re-enacted the murder and quoted Milgaard as saying he stabbed the woman 14 times. How reliable is that testimony? The court was told that Milgaard and some of the others had taken LSD earlier that evening. LSD is a mind-altering drug.

There is more to this bizarre and very tragic case. Around the time the murder occurred that morning in Saskatoon, perhaps only minutes after the stabbing, Milgaard, Ron Wilson and Nicol John showed up at a Saskatoon motel. Robert Rasmussen was the manager. Did he notice anything unusual about Milgaard, who allegedly committed a brutal murder just minutes earlier? The answer is no. Rasmussen testified that he noticed nothing unusual about Milgaard or his clothes. He said Milgaard was polite.

Minutes after leaving the motel the three teenagers got their car stuck in the snow. They were assisted by a couple by the name of Danchuk who invited the trio into their home to warm up. Was anything unusual noticed about Milgaard, who spent one hour with the Danchuks? The Boyd—Rossmo report says: "No witness observed that David Milgaard's clothing was ripped, a likely outcome of a struggle in a snowbank".

Walter Danchuk said Milgaard was polite and soft spoken and that he had been doing most of the talking for the group. He had been talking about selling magazines and about trying to find their friend, Albert Cadrain.

Not only does the Crown's case lie in tatters but there is evidence that another man, Larry Fisher, was the real killer of Gail Miller. Larry Fisher is a brutal, savage serial rapist. In the fall of 1968, just months before the January 31, 1969 murder of Gail Miller, Larry Fisher carried out three vicious rapes in Saskatoon. In the year following the Miller murder, in 1970, he committed three more vicious assaults in Winnipeg. He was arrested and given a 13-year sentence. He was released in 1980 and soon after attacked and nearly killed a woman in North Battleford. He is back in prison.

Why is he a suspect? He was committing his serious crimes around the time of the Miller murder. He rode the 20th Street bus to work in Saskatoon. So did Gail Miller. Certainly Miller's murder appears more likely to have been committed by a man like Fisher than by Milgaard who had no history of violence or sex offences.

The speculation about Fisher of course does not clear Milgaard by itself, but it is one more shadow of doubt over his murder conviction. There is a lot more to this incredible story but I cannot recount it here.

Will our justice system come crashing down if David Milgaard is freed and cleared of his conviction? No. Would it mean the system is riddled with lousy judges and lawyers? No. What it does mean is that we recognize human beings for what they are. They are not perfect. Our institutions are not perfect. Each and every one of them, including our justice system, can and does make mistakes.

Do we have the courage to admit our mistakes? Do we have the courage to admit that we have possibly incarcerated an innocent man for more than 20 years? I hope so. I certainly hope so for David Milgaard's sake.

In closing, I hope the government is listening, especially the Minister of Justice. I chose not to discuss her handling of the case today because the country already knows just how bad it is. It is never too late. There is still time for justice. There is still time for David Milgaard. Canadians are asking the Minister of Justice to heed the words of this motion and do what is right.

• (1540)

I would like to thank my colleagues for their support, those from Manitoba. I would like to cite them: Lloyd Axworthy, Ron Duhamel of St. Boniface, Ray Pagtakhan of Winnipeg North and David Walker of Winnipeg North Centre. They have all lent their support in this very worthy cause.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, a decision to exercise the executive's power to order a new trial in a case where the courts have already handed down a decision must be considered very carefully. We must bear in mind the independent role of the courts. It is up to them to decide whether the accused is innocent or guilty. In a trial before judge and jury, jury members are responsible for reaching a verdict based on the facts, while the judge determines how the law is to be applied.

To ensure this tradition is observed, ministers of Justice refuse to substitute their own opinion for those of jury members or judges. However, in cases where, on the basis of new facts that come to light after the court's decision, there is reason to believe there has been a fundamental miscarriage of justice, the Minister of Justice has subsequently made the appropriate decision, in other words, referred the case back to the courts.

It is important to understand where the prerogative of pardon fits into the criminal justice system and to use it the way it was meant to be used. Section 690 of the Criminal Code says the Minister of Justice may order a new trial or refer the case to the Court of Appeal. That is an extension of the Crown's prerogative of pardon which is reflected in our legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this recourse is available only when all legal recourse has been exhausted. In the David Milgaard case, an impartial jury declared him guilty, an independent Court of Appeal rejected his appeal, and an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was rejected in 1971.

Consequently, the applications to the Minister of Justice are outside the judicial process. However, the judicial review process provided under section 690 may, when it is desirable to do so, allow a new examination by the courts. That was the procedure followed in the Donald Marshall case, and more recently in the Wilson Nepoose case.

By passing section 690, Parliament has conferred on the Minister of Justice the authority to accept or reject such requests. This responsibility is exercised without any partisan or political considerations, in the broadest sense of the word.

When exercising this important responsibility, the minister must carefully examine each individual request. Decisions cannot be made lightly, and a thorough understanding of all the facts is essential The minister's decision must be based on a thorough analysis of all aspects of the case, in accordance with recognized legal standards.

For instance, when David Milgaard filed his first appeal, experts were called in to examine questions of a scientific nature and to give their opinion. Facts obtained from every possible source, including the lawyer's briefs, were carefully analyzed to determine whether there could have been a fundamental miscarriage of justice.

Mr. Speaker, the reports given by the media in this case overlooked a number of important points in connection with the first appeal. The Minister of Justice, however, analyzed them before making her decision. She cannot comment on the case in this House or in the media because she is prohibited from doing so by law.

One thing the minister considers frustrating in this matter is the tendency of some commentators in the media to report only part of the evidence in the Milgaard case and not to take account of how it fits into the total picture. Indeed, it is important to look at the case as a whole, from beginning to end, and that is exactly what several of the minister's senior legal advisers are now doing. It is just such partial and incomplete views of the affair that have given rise to misinterpretations and raised questions from some members of the House, which presuppose a certain view of the matter.

The minister considered the first request objectively, in accordance with the established legal standards, and will give the same consideration to any subsequent request, as she did with every case submitted to her in the past.

The Minister of Justice has the responsibility to ensure that justice is done. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the minister will fulfil this responsibility with the necessary objectivity, care and compassion.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said there was insufficient evidence. Perhaps she could put this evidence before this House. She cannot just come out and say: "There is no evidence." We, in the opposition as well as other members and also the government member who spoke before me, want to know where is this evidence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair does not take a position in this kind of debate. It is a question of opinion. Speakers have had every opportunity to express their points of view and the Chair listens carefully to the points of view expressed on all sides. If other members wish to speak, they can rise and do so.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, no other members having indicated they wanted to speak, I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to have the question put. We could put it on a voice vote.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member raises a point of order. This motion is not a votable item under the Standing Orders. Therefore I cannot grant the request made by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.
